COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE TWENTY-FIFTH DAY OF JUNE, 1959, TO THE EIGHTEENTH DAY OF JULY, 1959, INCLUSIVE

INDEX ISSUED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME

THE QUEEN'S PRINTER AND CONTROLLER OF STATIONERY

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EXTENSION OF HOURS OF SITTING—ANNOUNCEMENT OF FURTHER LEGISLATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Monday, June 29, 1959, and on every Monday, Tuesday and Saturday thereafter until the end of this session, the hours of sitting shall be as follows:

Mondays and Tuesdays: 11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m., and 2:30 p.m. to 6:00 p.m., and 8:00 p.m. to 10:00 p.m. and;

Saturdays 11:00 a.m. to 1:00 p.m., and 2:30 p.m. to 6:00 p.m. and;

That the order of business and procedure on Saturdays shall be as for Thursdays (government day).

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, on the introduction of this motion, which as a general rule means that the house will prorogue within about three or four weeks, may I ask the Prime Minister whether his anticipation is that the house, with the co-operation of the government, will close before the end of July?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the customary view of the government always is, when this kind of motion is introduced, that we are reasonably approaching the end of a session and that a month away is considered to be the normal anticipation. May I say that, as far as the government is concerned, it will present its program and of course ask for the co-operation of the opposition because, as has been often said in the past, the length of the session generally depends on the opposition.

I think I should mention one piece of legislation at this time in view of the visit of Her Majesty the Queen. Instead of having the gift of the Canadian people constituted within an estimate, it is the intention to introduce legislation to set up the fund and to provide in general for its administration. I hope it will be possible early next week, possibly on Monday—in view of the need to have this matter considered at the earliest possible date—for the resolution to be proceeded with and then possibly after the resolution consideration may be given to the bill itself. I would think hon. members generally would want to co-operate in this regard to the end that by the date of the Queen's arrival here the legislation will have received approval—provided it meets with approval—of this house and the other place so it may become official.

Mr. Winch: In view of this announcement —and I am sorry I did not ask the question previously—may I ask the Prime Minister whether all major legislation has been introduced or whether there is any other legislation still to come forward.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I can give a statement on that early next week. The legislation which is to be introduced was naturally mentioned in the speech from the throne, and I do not know of anything in particular in addition to that mentioned in the speech from the throne. The Minister of Justice has pointed out to me that legislation with respect to humane slaughter might very well receive consideration, depending upon the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. Winch: May I also ask the Prime Minister if it is the intention of the Prime Minister to introduce the bill of rights this session?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, at the present time the intention is to cover the legislative program. There have been various representations made, as the hon. member knows, with regard to the bill of rights. Only this morning representatives of the community of Canadians of Chinese origin—

Mr. Winch: I am just asking whether the intention is to introduce it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —met with me and made further representations. However, there has been no decision made not to proceed, and the general idea at the moment is that the legislative program should be presented at this time during this session, rather than postponing it until a fall session, a short session if you will. I believe the general feeling of the house is that we should complete the legislative program as it was enunciated by the government. The program is ready and it is being introduced as legislation receives the attention of the house, as well as the necessary passing of the estimates.

Mr. Winch: Can the Prime Minister give a definite answer? Is he introducing the bill of rights at this session or not?

Business of the House

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we do not propose to object to this motion. The Prime Minister, however, has said that a motion of this kind is normally introduced when the session is coming to an end. In that connection, Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that there are still five committees sitting. This will, of course, create a problem for the opposition, but I am not complaining about that. Committees will have to be sitting while the house is sitting, but they are five important committees. In addition to the committees we have still before us for consideration and decision, Mr. Speaker, the bill of rights, crop insurance legislation, farm credit legislation, export credit legislation, combines investigation legislation, which we think should go to a committee before it is finally disposed of, legislation regarding term 29 of the act of union with Newfoundland, amendments to the Criminal Code, and the coal production assistance act.

In addition to that formidable legislative program which includes some of the most important bills of the session, we have still to consider the estimates of certain important departments. Perhaps I can mention particularly the Department of National Defence, which will cause some discussion, I hope. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it requires a good deal of optimism to feel that this motion is being introduced as we are approaching the close of the session. However, I agree that if the session is to close perhaps this motion is necessary.

I would also like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will give us an assurance, so far as possible, that no additional legislation, except emergency legislation because that exception has to be made, will be introduced, and also whether all the legislation which is to be proceeded with at this session will be on the motion paper by next Monday so we may know exactly what we have to deal with in the closing weeks of the session.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Members of this group agree at this time to this resolution in order to facilitate Her Majesty's business, but I think I should take this opportunity to say on behalf of this group that we are of the opinion it is about time we used some common sense with respect to the planning of our sessions. We are, I think, one of the worst groups in Canada for inflicting punishment upon ourselves. Consideration should be given not only to the welfare of members and their families but also to the press and staff of this house by so planning our session that we could meet possibly for a couple of months before Christmas and then reconvene early in January in order to clear up the session's business by, say, the first of June. On behalf of this group I urge the Prime Minister to give some consideration to the introduction of the C.C.F. planning policies in the arrangement of the sessions of the house.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Everybody is trying to find a way to shorten the session, and I would suggest to the Prime Minister that if he really wants to shorten the session, keeping the Minister of Finance away as much as possible would help to do it.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Before this motion passes, I should like, speaking for myself, to dissociate myself from the views expressed by the hon. member for Kootenay West about starting a session in the autumn. I think the sessions are long enough as it is, and this would simply have the effect of making them longer.

Mr. Winch: I should like, in view of the fact that we have this motion before us which involves the hours of work and, what is more important, the days of sitting of the House of Commons, to ask the Prime Minister whether in consideration of our support of this resolution he will give consideration to the fact that the House of Commons now meets for approximately seven months a year, to the fact that Canada is growing and that the business of Canada and the business of this house is bound to grow in consequence. I suggest to the right hon. gentleman that consideration will have to be given not only to the suggestion made by my hon. friend from Kootenay West but also to the period during which this house sits. I would remind him that it is not enough to think of the convenience of those who live 100 miles or even 500 miles from home. There are those whose homes are 2,500 or 2,700 miles away. There are some of us here who have been home for only five days in the last six months, and who will have been home for only five days in seven months by the time this house rises.

For these reasons serious consideration should be given to a plan by which the house would meet say in the middle of October to debate the speech from the throne and consider preliminary legislation. Then there might be a month's recess, and we could come back in the middle of January to deal with the general business of the house. Then after approximately a month's absence at Easter we could return to deal with the budget and the legislation which flows from it, and be away by the end of June. Consideration should be given to a plan of this kind without delay. I know, however, that we are all in agreement with this motion, and that we shall support it, because after seven months' absence, I want to find out if I still have a home, a family and grandchildren, and meet them all again.

Motion agreed to.

TRADE

STATEMENT ON DISCUSSIONS WITH PRESIDENTS OF EUROPEAN COMMUNITIES

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a short statement concerning the visit of the presidents of the three European communities to Ottawa on June 22 and 23. On the invitation of the Canadian government the presidents of the executive bodies of the three European communities, Dr. Walter Hallstein of the European economic community better known as the common market, Mr. Etienne Hirsch of the European atomic energy community or EURATOM, and Mr. Paul Finet of the European coal and steel community visited Ottawa on Monday and Tuesday of this week and had discussions with the Prime Minister and ministers and officials dealing with trade and economic matters.

As hon. members know, these three communities bring together six western European countries, France, West Germany, Italy, Belgium, the Netherlands and Luxembourg, and provide for the gradual establishment of a single economic area within which goods, persons and capital would move freely behind a common external tariff. EURATOM provides in addition for a pooling of the efforts of the six countries in the peaceful development of atomic energy and in the construction of the basic facilities required for the development of nuclear energy within the community.

It is not necessary to emphasize that the constitution in Europe of a large integrated economic area grouping six industrially advanced countries which count among the major trading countries of the world is bound to have a profound impact on the pattern and development of international trade generally, and more particularly on Canadian trade. We therefore welcomed this opportunity to meet these distinguished representatives, to learn from them at first hand of these European developments, and at the same time to explain Canadian interests in these trading arrangements.

I think the presidents' visit was most successful and useful in accomplishing these purposes. We were encouraged by many of the things they said to us and also by their own broad and sensible approach on these important trading matters.

For our part we were able, I think, to impress upon them the genuine and long-standing sympathy and interest that Canada has shown for the objectives of economic and political integration in Europe. At the same time we emphasized again our concern that the new European economic and trading arrangements should not be developed in such a way as to create new barriers and restrictions for the trade of outside countries such as Canada.

We discussed briefly the significance of the advent of external convertibility for the major European trading currencies, and assured our visitors that nothing could do more to remove the fears and misgivings of outside countries concerning the European economic community than the early removal of the apparatus of discriminatory import controls and restrictions in Europe. These controls had been established because of balance of payments difficulties which have now largely disappeared, and had impeded the normal development and the pattern of trade ever since the war. The strength and vitality of the European economies made such a move possible, and as a first step any discrimination which remained against dollar imports should be removed; we made it plain that in our view discrimination has lost its purpose and its justification.

Dr. Hallstein and Mr. Finet have now returned to Europe. The president of the European atomic energy community or EURATOM, Mr. Hirsch, remained to visit our Chalk River establishment as a guest of Atomic Energy of Canada and will be departing today. I should just like to add that I think these discussions were extremely helpful for both sides.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the statement the minister has just made. I think a visit of this kind by representatives of these European agencies to Ottawa at this time is important and I am sure the discussions have been useful. All of us are very conscious of the importance of these developments, both political and economic, toward European integration, and I think they are to be welcomed. But in the economic field it is to be hoped, as the minister has pointed out, and indeed it is very important to Canada, that the removal of trade barriers within a European group should not mean the raising of trade barriers against those outside the group.

No country, Mr. Speaker, has a greater stake in this matter than Canada. The time is coming when we shall soon have to work out our relationship with such agencies as the common market. It had been hoped that the common market would be extended to the European free trade area. Delay in that extension has resulted in those European countries outside the common market beginning to consider the establishment of another European common market. It would be a most unfortunate thing for the world, and certainly most unfortunate economically for Canada, if the development of those great trading agencies took place in a way which prejudiced the multilateral trade of a country like Canada. I know the government is very much aware of the importance and indeed the danger of that development.

It is interesting to recall, Mr. Speaker, that the European share of international trade is increasing. In 1952 United States and Canadian exports accounted for 27 per cent of all world exports, but in 1957 that had gone down to 26 per cent. The sterling area accounted for 26 per cent in 1952, and that had gone down to 23 per cent in 1957; but Europe exported 28 per cent of all goods in 1952 and 32 per cent in 1957. The increase was accounted for almost entirely by the countries of the European common market. The same situation prevails in imports. North America purchased 20 per cent of all world imports in 1952 but only 19 per cent in 1957; the sterling area 28 per cent in 1952 and only 25 per cent in 1957, while the comparable European share, confined almost entirely to countries of the common market, was 29 per cent in 1952 and 34 per cent in 1957. These figures are a graphic indication of the importance of this European economic development, and it is especially important that these developments should take place in a way which will not prejudice multilateral trade in the world.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, because of the great dependence of Canada on exports and the value of her external trade, these common market proposals are of first importance to our country. We support wholeheartedly the emphasis placed by the leader of the official opposition on that aspect of this question and the necessity for the full development of multilateral trade relations. However, Mr. Speaker, we hope the spirit of the words "common market" will become a reality in our multilateral trade developments in association with this common market group.

We have the word "common", meaning equality, belonging, working together; then the word "market" meaning gathering together for the purposes of trade or satisfactory exchange. Mr. Speaker, if the terms are given effect as the result of discussions, meetings and co-operation, as evidenced by the report of the meeting the Secretary of State for External Affairs has referred to; and if we bestir ourselves in the proper spirit and purpose, these arrangements will be to our mutual advantage, and prove a worthwhile project by the results in years to come.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether any advances or proposals were made by spokesmen for the European common market to the effect that Canada might be invited to become a member? Or has the government of Canada, at these meetings, made any proposals to the European countries whereby Canada would offer to associate itself with the countries in the European common market? Or, failing either of these possibilities, has the department undertaken any exploratory work to investigate the possibility of Canada becoming actively associated with the members of the European common market?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, there was no such discussion, and there is nothing under way leading in the direction of Canada becoming a member.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether any discussions took place with the head of EURATOM on the question of supplying Canadian uranium to that international agency?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I was unable to participate in those discussions because of attendance at the agriculture committee, where the wheat board were present. However, we have kept closely in touch with the organization of EURATOM and have pressed the point with regard to the supply of uranium from Canada. We have the closest co-operation with that authority in Europe, and representatives of that authority have been closely associated with the development work going on at Chalk River, so I think our position is quite clear in respect of the possibility of supplying uranium to meet their requirements.

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENT OF BROADCASTING ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can he tell the house whether it is intended to introduce this session the amendment to the Broadcasting Act forecast in the speech from the throne?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): No, Mr. Speaker, it is not intended to introduce an amendment this session.

CIVIL DEFENCE—INQUIRY AS TO CALLING ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the house leader this question. In view of the fact that he says that before the end of next week we will be discussing the estimates of the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production, will it be possible to bring on before the end of next week the estimate for civil defence under the Minister of National Health and Welfare?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): As the estimate dealing with civil defence comes under the Department of National Health and Welfare, and I am quite sure the hon. member for Essex East will be making at least one and probably more long speeches on the first item of the estimates of that department, I therefore think it would hardly be appropriate to call both estimates at the same time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I have a supplementary question. My hon. friend is quite right in saying that when we come to the Department of National Health and Welfare the hon. member for Essex East will have many constructive things to say. But as my friend the Secretary of State for External Affairs knows, the government has decided now to apportion the responsibility for civil defence among three departments of government, namely the Minister of National Defence, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and the Prime Minister and civil defence is not normally regarded as fully integrated under health and welfare.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I would say—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must point out to the hon. member that the purpose of asking questions is to secure information, not to make statements.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Now that Your Honour has recognized the foundation for my question I would simply ask the Minister of Public Works or the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the leader of the house whether he would be good enough to arrange that all defence matters, including civil defence, might be discussed at the same time.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I am always anxious to meet the wishes of my old friend the hon. member for Essex East, but I am afraid I cannot do so on this occasion.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then we will have to continue on civil defence.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON CURRENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to ask the Minister of National Revenue, as the responsible minister for the C.B.C., if he is now in a position to give a report on the situation in that organization which, it is apparent, is most important to all of us.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): No, I am not. As hon. members know, I was not in the house yesterday because of a commitment which I made months before to address the biennial conference of the taxation officers of the Department of National Revenue who were meeting in St. Catharines. I left here the night before last and unfortunately was away from the house yesterday when several questions were asked of me, one detailed one by the Leader of the Opposition asking for specific information and others by the hon. member for Essex East, the hon. member for Laurier, and so on.

On the way to St. Catharines yesterday morning I saw some of the directors in the Royal York, had a cup of coffee with them and discussed the situation briefly. They told me that later in the day they were meeting some of the senior directors of the corporation and having a consultation with them. I went on to St. Catharines, returned late last night and caught the train. I bought a Globe and Mail, and after the train had left Toronto I read the Globe and Mail and found that some developments had taken place during the day. That was the first intimation I had about it.

The senior officials and Mr. Bushnell, I am told, are still in Toronto although I believe the directors finished their regular session last night. I have not been able to communicate with them. I do not want to make a statement of any kind unless I have very specific information from the corporation. I would ask that the house permit me to deal with this matter on Monday, and in the meantime I shall be able to obtain detailed instructions from the corporation on what are the facts.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a supplementary question. Has the minister noticed a report in the newspaper to the effect that the C.B.C. has not accepted the resignations of the 32 people, I believe it is. In view of the fact the committee has asked three of these people to appear on Tuesday at 9.30 and they have said they would do so but not on the basis of being still employed, would those three be protected on that basis?

Mr. Nowlan: I do not know what the hon. member means by "protected". I said I will answer the questions on Monday when I have accurate and detailed information, which I do not have now.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): In order that the house may be fully and accurately informed—I might say I appreciate the minister's position, and the fact that he will reply to some of these questions on Monday—will the minister consider making available to the house copies of statements made by the acting president of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation over the radio or television or to the press in connection with this matter?

Mr. Nowlan: If such copies are available I would do so.

IMMIGRATION

LATVIAN FISHERMEN—CONSIDERATION OF REQUEST TO ENTER CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I wonder if I might ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if she has any further information to communicate to the house about the Latvian refugees in St. John's?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I think the answer must be in the negative, but we are in constant touch with the situation. As the hon. member knows, it is not an easy problem to solve, but the officials of this department are working constantly on it and I hope to have an announcement to make the first of the week.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the hon. lady answer the supplementary question I asked yesterday, as to whether the government still follows the policy of making no deportations behind the iron curtain?

Mrs. Fairclough: No, Mr. Speaker.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

TABLING OF REPORT OF DEFENCE CONSTRUCTION LIMITED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Raymond O'Hurley (Minister of Defence Production): I have this morning deposited the English copy of the report of Defence Construction Limited. I am sorry to inform the house that the French copy is not available as yet. I expect to have copies of the report of Crown Assets Disposal Corporation in both English and French available soon, and I expect the French copy of the defence construction report will be ready in a few days.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

RE-EQUIPPING OF ARMED FORCES IN EUROPE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the fact his estimates are coming up shortly I wonder if, prior to the consideration of his estimates, he would make a statement on behalf of the government concerning the re-equipping of the armed forces overseas, and in particular the R.C.A.F., which I think is of interest to all hon. members.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): The fact that my estimates have not been before the house before now is not entirely my fault, as they were to come up a few weeks ago but at the request of the Leader of the Opposition, who was not available when they were proposed, they were postponed.

With regard to the other part of the question, the matter is still under consideration and I hope that by the time the estimates are considered I shall be able to make a statement regarding the re-equipping of the air division.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the minister mentioned that his estimates would have come up some time ago had it not been for a request I made, and a statement that I would not be here. It is true that there was one day during the last month when I said I would not be here if the minister's estimates were brought up, and the house leader was courteous enough to say that they would not be brought up at that time. However, since then we have been discussing the estimates of other departments during the last few weeks, and these estimates could have been considered on any one of those days.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): It is expected that these estimates and those of defence production will be brought up next week.

Mr. Winch: Did I understand that there was a statement as to when the estimates were coming up?

Mr. Green: Yes, we expect to bring the estimates of national defence and defence production before the house next week.

Mr. Winch: That would be the end of next week?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Winch: That would be the end of next week; the beginning or the end of the week?

Mr. Green: Under the rules we have to take legislation on Monday and Tuesday. We shall not get to the estimates until Wednesday or Thursday.

SUFFIELD, ALTA.—EXPERIMENTS IN GERM WARFARE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I regret once again to have to disturb the Minister of National Defence from his angle of repose but I wish to ask him a question at the request of a religious organization in Alberta. Is the Department of National Defence conducting experiments in germ warfare at Suffield, Alberta?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The department has been conducting experiments of a defensive nature at Suffield station. The objective of these experiments is to ascertain how best the spread of diseases which might be started by an enemy using biological warfare practices could be restricted.

Mr. Herridge: I have a supplementary question. Is the minister quite certain that these tests do not present any hazard to the health of people in the surrounding communities?

Mr. Pearkes: Suffield station comprises a very large area and movement is restricted in that area. I am satisfied that there is no danger of the results of these experiments affecting in any way personnel, cattle or crops in the surrounding districts.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Headquarters administration and national police services—

362. Operation and maintenance, $6,270,114.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I will just wait a moment until the private discussions cease.

The Chairman: Order. I wonder whether hon. members who are leaving the chamber will do so quietly so we may hear the hon. member for Skeena, who has the floor.

Mr. Howard: The important part, Mr. Chairman, is that because of the chit-chat and noise that is going on I did not hear the comment made by an hon. member down at the other end of the chamber. Last evening I had occasion to make quite a few remarks. In order to consolidate my thoughts all at one time, perhaps I may be allowed the liberty of covering a bit of the same ground again.

I mentioned that as far as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police enforcing particular laws is concerned, sometimes in the enforcement of those laws the R.C.M.P. make quite a number of enemies and bring a bit of discredit to the force itself. This does not arise because of the actual enforcement of the law itself or the manner in which the R.C.M.P. conduct themselves during the enforcement of some particular laws, nor from the exertion of force which they might find necessary in order to maintain law and order. Sometimes they fall into disrepute because the law itself is considered to be inequitable, especially by the people who fall afoul of it.

I am not suggesting in any way, of course, that our laws should not be enforced, but I make specific reference to what I and many other people consider to be an inequitable set of laws, notably those relating to alcohol and liquor as it applies to native indians. In speaking with members of the force in private conversations, I have asked for their opinions as to whether they think the liquor laws—and this applies to British Columbia particularly—as they apply to our Indian people are equitable or whether they could be changed. Without exception the members of the force with whom I spoke were of the opinion that there should be an alteration in the laws in so far as they apply to native indians. They felt that they were inequitable because the liquor laws apply differently to Indians than to non-Indians.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. My hon. friend is touching on a matter which I must confess presents a number of problems to the force. But the fact of the matter is that the provisions of the liquor laws as they affect Indians are not the responsibility of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Their only responsibility is to enforce them. Nor does the Department of Justice have the direction of policy that should be incorporated in those laws. While I appreciate my hon. friend's interest and his desire to be helpful, may I suggest to him that he might be more helpful if he would direct his remarks to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration when the question of Indian affairs arises.

Mr. Howard: If I may I should like to make a comment on the point of order. It is not my intention to discuss the actual laws themselves, which involve both the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the provincial governments. What I was seeking to do was to relate the enforcement of the law—whether it be provincial or federal is immaterial because the R.C.M.P. in certain circumstances enforce the laws within a province—and to develop the theme that by the enforcement of certain types of laws the Royal Canadian Mounted Police fall into disrepute and can have charges levelled against them.

That is the theme I was seeking to develop rather than the actual law itself, and perhaps I may be in order in that regard in pointing out that the force itself loses some of the stature it may have developed over the years, as police forces should develop such stature, because the laws they seek to enforce may be inequitable and may not be accepted by the citizens to whom they apply.

As to the question of alteration of the law, my friend the Minister of Justice is quite correct in saying that this question not only should be but has been discussed under the estimates of the Indian affairs branch, and I am sure will be gone into in more detail during the proceedings of the joint committee on Indian affairs which is currently meeting.

In that regard—and as I said I have spoken with members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police about this one specific phase of the enforcement of the law, the liquor laws, in so far as native Indians are concerned—I wonder whether at this stage I might pose a question which the minister might answer now or later. I would like to know whether the views of the R.C.M. Police, not the administrative or top officials at Ottawa or elsewhere but the ordinary rank and file members of the force, are ever ascertained or requests made for suggestions for the better use and operation of the force itself.

This question of the R.C.M. Police falling into disrepute in the eyes of some people and the resulting verbal charges which have been made, such as charges that they were engaged as strikebreakers, results merely from the application and enforcement of the present laws applying to private property, obstruction of roads, and so on. In one sense of the word the people who level these charges of strikebreaking against the R.C.M.P. could be quite properly justified in so doing, not because of the fact that they are in the strict sense of the word strikebreakers, as they are commonly known, but merely because of their actual enforcement of the law itself. That is the theme of my remarks.

There is another problem which I think the minister could take under advisement. Perhaps he has done it already, but in any event it relates to the respect or degree of respect for the force itself which people in various parts of the country may have. I have noticed, though I do not know the percentages, that there are quite a number of young people in the R.C.M. Police. In fact in some instances I believe there are members of the force who are actually under the age of 21 and have difficulty in entering beer parlors in order to see that the law is maintained in those particular establishments because they are not old enough to go in themselves.

Because there are a number of young persons in the force I believe some difficulty arises in the actual enforcement of the law in certain parts of the country, where there may be a large number of young constables, because of the fact that they may be immature and may not have been in the force very long. As in the case my hon. friend from Athabasca mentioned yesterday, the constable concerned was only in the force a short while and had not even been supplied with a uniform, yet he was asked to go out and participate with other members of the force in some sort of engagement, and he wondered whether with his lack of experience he should be called on to do that sort of thing.

There is this attitude existing, and I think it is rather widespread among the population, especially those who may come into close contact with the R.C.M. Police; not people, say, in large metropolitan areas but people in outlying areas who have the opportunity to come into closer contact with the force and meet them personally in their activities as law enforcement officers. They find there is a lack of diplomacy on the part of certain younger members of the force which tends to aggravate the relationship between citizens of the nation and the force itself and I am sure if we can engage to a greater extent in some sort of Dale Carnegie course amongst the younger members of the police force on how to influence people and use tact and diplomacy in the enforcement of the law, in that way we could overcome much of the difficulty and the aggravated and upset feelings that many honest and upright citizens in the community have with respect to the R.C.M. Police or certain members of it.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I would like to draw one item to the minister's attention; it may be covered in other legislation but I have not been able to determine that. I refer to the case of men who enlisted with the R.C.M.P. in the first world war as reinforcements to overseas units. In the particular case I am referring to a man while training at Regina was thrown from a horse and suffered shoulder injuries, and was later discharged from the R.C.M.P. Later on he enlisted in an army unit but was again discharged as medically unfit.

People in his position find that the revisions of the R.C.M. Police Act have not taken care of them, although they did with regard to the second world war. The provisions were not extended back far enough to take care of people who suffered this type of injury in the first world war, and this man is precluded from receiving medical treatment at military hospitals because he has not had service. Yet his injury took place while he was training with the R.C.M.P. on the basis of going overseas.

My question to the minister is this. Is there any provision in the act as it is being amended, either in the pensions act or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, which will take care of cases such as this?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, first with reference to the remarks made by the hon. member for Skeena, he asked me whether there was any definite policy of encouragement given with regard to suggestions made by members of the force in connection with problems they encounter in administering or enforcing the law. As I indicated when I rose to suggest that perhaps this was not strictly in order on these estimates, I do appreciate that there are always some laws which are not greeted with absolute favour by various segments of the population, and this does bring difficulties in enforcement.

The responsibility of an individual member as a policeman is not to question the propriety or wisdom of the law, but to discharge his duty of enforcing it with tact and diplomacy. We are aware that the liquor laws, particularly, are the subject of criticism by the Indian population and by others interested in their behalf, and I am very hopeful that the joint parliamentary committee, now sitting, may make some wise and constructive suggestions in that regard.

It is the policy of the force to encourage suggestions from its members, and there are various channels and means by which this can be done. There are the regular annual inspections by personnel officers, in the course of which or in the preparation for which every member is interviewed every year, and either the personal problems or the suggestions he may have with respect to difficulties he has encountered in connection with the discharge of his duties as a member of the force may be brought up by him, and should be brought up by him, with the personnel officers in the course of the annual inspection. Section n.c.o.'s are encouraged to make reports, not only factual reports as to what has gone on but reports containing recommendations or suggestions with respect to the problems they have encountered in the course of administering their sections. It is also open to any member to make recommendations whenever amendments to such laws as the liquor laws might be up for discussion. I would also point out that the R.C.M.P. are part of the suggestion award system organized by the civil service, and that it is open to a member to make any specific suggestion in that way at any time he feels inclined to do so.

With regard to the other comments of the hon. member, that members of the force should at all times be encouraged to exercise tact and diplomacy in the enforcement of the law, this is something which forms a definite part of the training they receive at the police training institutions here and in Regina. We do not claim to be able to produce perfection, but we do claim to be able to set a high standard and to place a great deal of emphasis upon the fact that every police constable in the discharge of his duties has the duty to maintain the Queen's peace; that he is not there to adopt an attitude, in any sense, of being somebody superior to the ordinary citizen of the country. He is there primarily to protect the citizens of the country from those who seek to break the laws of the country, and it is instilled into him that no person is guilty until he is proved to be so and that it is not his job to make a decision as to the guilt or innocence of anyone he may be investigating. That is for the courts of the land to decide.

In all these ways we try to impress upon the constable his proper role, and I think it is fair to claim that we achieve a satisfactory degree of success. But no system can produce perfection, and there are errors made by individual constables, as there always will be errors made by human beings; but as far as possible we endeavour to instil into these recruits the principles I have briefly outlined. We do also make a very serious attempt to maintain a close supervision of the activities particularly of the younger members of the force, and to counsel, advise and help them to discharge their duties in a responsible manner acceptable to the general public. While I do not deny that there are occasions —and we investigate those occasions—when things go wrong, I think in general the public of Canada is well served by the force and by the training system through which the recruits go before they are sent out to discharge their duties.

With regard to the question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South, the new pension legislation which is now before the committee of the whole does contain a provision in clause 36 which I believe may be the answer to the problem he has outlined. If it is not out of order, perhaps I could just read it. If enacted it would read:

> Where a person has, either before or after the coming into force of this subsection, suffered a disability as a result of any injury or disease or aggravation thereof that arose out of, or was directly connected with, his service in the force, he may be granted compensation, including medical and hospital expenses, at such rates and in such manner as the governor in council may prescribe.

That may take care of such cases, but of course the bill provides that the adjudication of such cases is the responsibility of the Canadian pension commission. It is for the commission to determine the extent of disability and whether or not a member is entitled to hospital treatment.

Mr. Fisher: The minister will remember that on previous occasions when his estimates were before the committee there was some discussion and some statements by him with regard to investigations carried out by the R.C.M.P., the directorate of security and intelligence and that aspect of the work of the force. He indicated that there was a considerable study going on in so far as the files kept on individuals are concerned, and especially in relation to the case which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate brought up relating to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation.

In the past year I have had a number of cases brought to my notice which indicate to me that the amount and kind of investigation which the R.C.M.P. do in cases where they sometimes, for example, recommend that citizenship applications should not be allowed is really rather superficial, and some of the information that must be garnered, or at least the information that is garnered, hardly seems to me to be sufficient, judging from my conversations with people who have been turned down.

[Mr. Fulton.]

The one thing that has struck me about all those to whom I have talked whose applications have been turned down is that for the most part they are simple people. There is nothing complex about them; they have given me no indication of anything scheming or Machiavellian about them. I am thinking especially of the case I brought up in this house in connection with the Finnish organization of Canada and some of its cultural activities. There is no question at all in the minds of people at the lakehead that the Finnish organization has, to a certain extent, a connection with communism or communist organizations, but where you have an organization which is carrying on gymnastic activities, road racing and drama activities, and drawing people from the Finnish community into those innocuous activities, it does seem to me unwarranted that membership in that organization should be used in order to deny citizenship, and it does give rise to certain qualms.

I should like to ask the minister whether he is continuing the study of the files that are kept and of the role of the R.C.M.P. with regard to them. I should also like to ask him if he has considered further the suggestion made two years ago that this whole aspect of the functions of the R.C.M.P. should be divorced from that force and put under a separate staff under the Department of Justice. The logic of this move is, it seems to me, that the R.C.M.P. are engaged in a great many activities including common police work, and one of the most disturbing features in a number of cases going back through the parliamentary record is the fact that the ordinary constable trained in police work is quite often collecting information regarding activities of a possibly subversive nature. When you have 20-year olds or 22-year olds out gathering information and going from door to door around a neighbourhood in connection with someone who seems to be suspect, I think we can really doubt both the efficacy and fairness of this kind of procedure. I think this is a very good point in favour of the suggestion that the whole of this anti-subversion work and intelligence work be divorced from this police force and put into the hands of specialists who would be directly answerable to the Minister of Justice. I should be very interested in the minister's comments on these remarks.

Mr. Fulton: The type of investigation to which the hon. member has referred in his closing remarks would, I imagine, be a routine security check which would not involve a high degree of judgment in assessing the information. The hon. member knows that we are called upon from time to time to report upon the activities and associations of individuals in connection with various matters. We, of course, only carry out such functions when we are requested to do so by an organization such as a government or a department which is properly entitled to request them.

The important point to bear in mind is that it is not the function of the R.C.M.P.—indeed, I can state on the basis of knowledge I have acquired that they are scrupulous in avoiding the exercice of this function—to assess the acceptability or the unacceptability of an individual on the basis of security. It is the function of the police exclusively to collect information as to what have been the activities of this person, what the record shows, and then they pass on that information to the agency concerned which makes its assessment as to the suitability or otherwise of the person for the employment for which he is applying or for citizenship or whatever the case may be.

The police themselves do not judge and render a verdict whether or not a man is suitable. They simply report what are the facts, and with respect to what I call such routine investigations it is true that on occasion we may employ the services of relatively young constables because it is to that extent a routine investigation. But the security and intelligence work of a type which involves assessment or judgment of what is going on is, of course, invariably done by specially trained and relatively senior personnel of the force.

Mr. Fisher: If the basis of the judgment is material gathered, as the minister seemed to indicate, by young and inexperienced people—

Mr. Fulton: I said that occasionally we may use a young and relatively inexperienced constable for the purpose of a routine investigation to establish the facts, not to form a judgment.

Mr. Fisher: What about the question of the facts which seem to determine the judgment?

Mr. Fulton: Those are reported to the agency making the inquiry, and it is left to that agency to reach their own judgment on the basis of the facts reported.

Mr. Fisher: How long are facts kept on file? For example, take someone who 15 years ago was a member of the Finnish organization and may be completely away from it now. I have to come back to this point because in two cases I can think of I can go to people who have been turned down with respect to bringing relatives into the country from behind the iron curtain or with regard to having a citizenship application approved, and I can get affidavits from a number of people as to their good citizenship. I know one person who was turned down who had been recommended very strongly by the provincial Conservative member for Port Arthur. I should like to know more about the standards that are applied. How can we be sure that some information that no longer has any relevance to the state or political attitude of the person involved is not taken into consideration?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, it is the duty of the force to make a report to the government or department of the government in every case where we are called upon to give information. As I say, we do not attempt to influence the decision of the department as to the judgment it may come to on the basis of the facts we may report. If we are asked to report on an individual and we have a file on that individual, then as I conceive it it is the duty of the police to make the report available; but I know on the basis of my experience, from discussions with my colleagues and in another capacity in another department, that my officials and I myself feel free to exercise a judgment and that judgment will be influenced in all cases, I would assume, by the length of time that has elapsed since the last report of any association such as that which my hon. friend indicates, and will also be influenced by the presence or otherwise of affidavits from responsible persons indicating that these matters are all well in past years and that there is a new pattern established at the present time. It still remains the duty of the force, if we are called upon to do so by some properly authorized person, to report upon the facts available with respect to an individual.

Mr. Fisher: I will not quarrel with that, but in all the statements I have read in connection with this matter the minister has said that information in the files cannot be released, for example to members of parliament. You cannot even find out whether there are files on members of parliament. But is there not some way we can discover what your standards are for keeping information, and what you consider properly subversive or dangerous to the state? Could not some kind of general memorandum be prepared so we could get some idea of what is involved when a person is turned down? It hardly seems to me that you have to be secretive as to your standards.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think my hon. friend is getting into a realm which again is not the job of the police because, as I say, we do not form the judgment. There are, of course, different standards required for different positions. Positions classified as security positions may require a higher standard of certainty and of safety with respect to subversive activities or actions than other types of positions, but those are all matters which are determined by departments other than the R.C.M.P. They are determined by the department concerned with the employment. We, as I have said before, maintain records—that is admitted—and, if called upon to do so by a department or agency entitled to call for it, we are required to make a report as to the information in our possession with respect to that individual.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the minister is emphasizing the passive nature of this particular directive, but in the brochure issued by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police it is stated:

> The directorate of security and intelligence must be prepared at all times to counter subversive activity. In the job of preserving national security, its chief tasks at present are to investigate communist activity and subversive organizations, maintain a watchful eye on the stream of immigrants, and in co-operation with other government departments foil efforts to place subversives in the federal government employment and vital industry.

Those are pretty positive chores that are given in this directive. I think the communist scare in terms of internal risk has certainly subsided enough that we should have some kind of assessment as to what you consider subversive. Give us an idea of some kinds of organizations that are subversive. I am sure that a great many people in the lakehead region would have nothing to do with the Finnish organization of Canada if they were perfectly clear in their minds that the government considered it subversive. Where are the definitions in this field? In all innocence people can get tied up with an organization like that; yet, judging by the experience of this lady who applied for citizenship, it is a definite black mark. Why do we have to have this zone of silence or this area that is unknown? Why can we not have a statement? It does not involve giving away any particular secrets that I can see. It is just an enunciation of what is considered subversive.

Mr. Pickersgill: Before the minister answers I should like to put a question to him supplementary to that asked by the hon. member for Port Arthur, and then the minister can perhaps answer both at once. I think the minister has rather left the impression from his answers that the information gathered by the police is given in the raw or crude form to other government departments. I wonder whether the minister can tell us what steps are taken to make an evaluation of information gathered, as the minister himself says, sometimes by constables without much experience, and what the police do before they supply information to other departments. Obviously it is not supplied just in the form in which it is collected.

Mr. Fulton: To reply to the last question first, as I am sure my hon. friend knows the answer might vary according to the form of the request. If the request is for advice with respect to whether there is any record of association with subversive organizations, that answer would probably be given by a relatively short yes or no; not exactly yes or no—

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think the minister—

Mr. Fulton: I think I will come to it in a moment—in a manner which is pretty well just an answer to the question. If the department concerned asks for particulars and says, "We want to look into this matter further", then the force will supply the particulars by showing what information is on file as to the record.

There are occasions when the force is asked to make an evaluation, and I shall come to this directly. As I have said, I have had experience on this from both directions, both as the acting minister of citizenship and immigration and as Minister of Justice; and I can say, that the force is scrupulous not to make any evaluation and to be the judge as to whether or not this person is a security risk. They will, however, make an evaluation, if asked, as to the nature of any subversive organization to which the persons concerned may be shown to have belonged. But again this is a statement of fact, and it is up to the department or the agency concerned to make its own decision as to whether or not the facts disclosed warrant a favourable or unfavourable decision on its part.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not think the minister has answered the question I asked. Probably it is because I asked it clumsily. This information about an individual is not necessarily all gathered by one constable, and certainly I think I am not betraying any secrets when I say that the information which is provided to another minister by the police is not the question—perhaps the minister would let me finish—and answer type that a policeman gets when he goes out and interviews people. It is a statement which is obviously, in many cases, a composite of various bits of information.

I thought that would help the hon. member for Port Arthur. I think he has a very legitimate question here which is in the minds of many people. I know many people came to me when I was minister of citizenship and immigration about the very kind of thing the hon. member is talking about. I think the public might be very much reassured if we were told not how the police made an evaluation as such, but how they assess the information; because some of the information is of such of trivial character that it would not be passed on. What trained and competent people do this?

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend, I am sure, did not try to suggest that my answer had suggested that the constable reports directly to the agency asking for information. These reports are, of course, sent in to the directorate of the security and intelligence agency of the force. As my hon. friend said, there may be a number of reports from different sources. These are evaluated in the security and intelligence agency. Perhaps what my hon. friend is asking me is what is the process by which they are evaluated as to the importance to be attached to them. There are, of course, different degrees of importance. If that is the question I think I can answer it in this way.

Mr. Pickersgill: I did not want to be unfair to the minister in any way. I think I know the answer myself.

Mr. Fulton: They are evaluated—

An hon. Member: Why ask the question, then?

Mr. Pickersgill: Because I think the public would like to know.

Mr. Fulton: If I may be permitted to answer, they are evaluated with respect to the reliability of the source of information. That is perhaps a feature that I should have realized would be of interest to the hon. member for Port Arthur in asking the question, because the department asking for the information will, of course, have the responsibility for making its decision, of assessing the weight to be attached to the information, and they are advised by the force as to the reliability of the source of information from which this record is compiled, or the various sources from which the record is compiled.

In the light of this discussion I should say, however, something with reference to a remark made earlier by the hon. member who started the discussion, and that is that we have absolutely no information to indicate that we would be justified in relaxing the security precautions that we took with regard to subversive activities in this country, no information whatsoever that would justify us in relaxing those at all.

Mr. Fisher: Does the minister mean by this that the threat is as dangerous in terms of numbers and potential as it has been ever since 1946?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be drawn into a discussion of degrees of danger. I will say this, that the efforts being made now are as great as they were in 1946, and I have already said we have no information or indication that would justify us in relaxing those efforts.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, let me return to one example that I used. There are approximately 20,000 people of Finnish stock at the lakehead. They are referred to as red Finns and white Finns. This is a cleavage that tends to split the community. I might say, to be fair, that the majority of this particular group have proved their loyalty, their allegiance and everything else. In the main I feel you can apply this to almost the whole group. If you want to analyse the Labour Progressive party vote you will find there has been a diminution that is exceptional.

When I brought up the matter of this woman who was turned down for citizenship I got all this publicity from the Toronto Star, and one of my acquaintances in the police force, who works in close association with the R.C.M.P., flatly said to me, "You want to get out of that. The Finnish organization of Canada is a communist organization; it is on the list of the bad ones". Why could we not know what organizations or groups there are in Canada that the R.C.M.P. consider subversive or dangerous? Is it a question of trying to protect the innocent people who may unsuspectingly get into such organizations? Should we not as the general public have the opportunity to judge the validity of the decisions made by the R.C.M.P. as to what organizations are subversive? Is it not possible that organizations can change and alter in their attitudes and in their personalities, and so alter the relative nature of their subversiveness?

Whenever we have a discussion of this kind from this new broom that was going to sweep clean and check up the bureaucracy all we get is the same type of stone wall. I do not see why there cannot be more frankness in this particular area and why we cannot know more of the standards that are applied in determining security risks and subversiveness. The situation in the last couple of years has given us so few indications of real risk that I think it is about time we looked at this again.

I like to feel that I am in the liberal tradition and always have suspicion of any police activities which are protected from the knowledge of the communality. I think we have to keep alert and vigilant in this particular field. Any time we give an organization authority and work to do that we cannot examine openly and know how they are working, we have to watch very closely; we have to check on it on occasion to make sure it is needed; that the dangers are so severe and terrible that we allow this particular type of police organization to be free from the surveillance of the elected representatives.

I do not feel personally that we have had that kind of reassurance from the minister either this morning or on the two previous occasions he has spoken on this topic. I do not think any member of this committee needs to be ashamed or even worried about standing up and questioning from this particular point of view, because a police organization is fundamental to the laws and the security we have in this country. However, when in certain areas you give a sort of carte blanche and the general public or the elected representatives do not know the standards under which the police agency operates, then I believe you have to keep prodding to find out what those standards are and keep reassessing the position that led to this particular aspect of police work being made so secret.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the hon. member appreciates the point I have made, and I will repeat it. The police in this field do not pass any judgment or perhaps I should say do not give any effect to the information obtained by translating it into a judgment to deprive a man of any status or any thing to which he thinks he is entitled. The police function is almost exclusively ascertaining the facts and reporting the facts to others who have to exercise their judgment as to what they will do in the light of those facts so reported. It would be very different indeed if the police had the responsibility not only of collecting the facts but also of exercising a judgment as to what should be done as a result of those facts or as a result of the information so collected.

Viewed in that light, then, I think it can be seen why it is proper that security and intelligence activities of the force should not be disclosed in detail. In the first place it is not, as I have said before, the responsibility of the force to lay down the standards of security that will be followed by any government department or agency in connection with its work; that is a matter of collective government responsibility.

As to the suggestion that we should name and list the organizations which have a record or an indication that they are undesirable, from a specific point of view this would be the most self-defeating policy or practice I could imagine. Practically every piece of information that was known to the police would immediately have to be made public; the extent of police knowledge would be made public, and the value and effectiveness of the work would be immediately almost completely negated. Efforts would have to be recommenced from the beginning to build up a file of information, a body of information which is now available.

Indeed, if we started naming names and naming organizations we would lose, I would think, at least 80 per cent if not more of the sources of information we now have.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that really correct in the case of an organization like this Finnish organization? It is common knowledge that there are a certain number of communist front organizations in this country, particularly appealing to some people who have come to this country fairly recently. I do not believe there is any doubt but that, as the hon. member for Port Arthur has said, a good many people get inveigled innocently into these organizations. There may be some secret organizations that the minister and the police would not want to reveal, but in the case of organizations that conduct their activities in public it does seem to me that there is a point the government ought to consider. I do not refer to the minister because the minister is quite right when he says this is a matter for the security panel and for the government, not for the R.C.M.P. However, I do believe there is a real point here which is deserving of consideration.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out that at no time, certainly since I have been minister and at no time prior to that of which I am aware, have the R.C.M.P. ever identified any organization as being a subversive organization. I should like to make it clear here that I am not accepting what my hon. friend says he was told by some other policeman. I am not saying he was not told, but I am simply saying that so far as the R.C.M.P. are concerned I am making no comment upon it because at no time have we ever identified any organization as being subversive. For the reasons I have given we do not intend to make such a statement. If we were required to say, in answer to a question, is this or that organization subversive, then the whole list would have to be named and we would then be in a position where we would have to give the house an answer with respect to every organization or every individual named.

Then indeed you would have a witch hunt, if you like. In the first place, you would have names being named on a basis that would possibly be unfair to the individual or the organization concerned. In addition, as I have said, the information that has been carefully built up over the years, including the sources of this information, would be rendered practically valueless. I am indeed surprised at what my hon. friend from Bonavista-Twillingate has said. He had some responsibility for many years as a very senior civil servant closely connected with this work, and later as a cabinet minister he assumed a different sort of collective responsibility. It is indeed surprising to think it has taken him all this time to come to the point of view he has put forward and which I am rejecting. I have never, when in opposition, said that this should be done.

Mr. Pickersgill: I never suggested, and I would never have used the word, that any agency of government should give the names of subversive organizations, because if there are any subversive organizations the government should prosecute them. However, there are communist front organizations—everybody knows this quite well—which are not classed as subversive. They have a legal existence in this country and have not been made illegal. They are generally known to sophisticated members of the public and officials of government departments. The suggestion that in some way the security of the country would be jeopardized by admitting publicly what we all know as a matter of fact is, I think, quite wrong. I rose merely to say that I never suggested subversive organizations be named, because I realize how ridiculous that suggestion would be.

Mr. Fisher: I feel it would be ridiculous too, Mr. Chairman, but I should like to come back to the minister. He is, for example, changing the definition of obscenity in the Criminal Code in an effort to enable the country to cope with the menace of indecent books, and that sort of thing. He is trying to set out a better definition so we can have something that will be more operative. Today we lack a definition of the subversive types of organizations, the genuine security risks. Surely the minister must be the first to recognize the anomaly when we talk about communist organizations in this little brochure, while at the same time we have a political situation in this country where the communist party and communist candidates are quite legitimate. So long as this situation prevails I think we need a reassessment, often and regularly. It is nice, from a cloak and dagger point of view or the sort of quick look you take at magazines on the newsstand which suggest that this sort of thing is threatening us, to believe that this magnificent red shield is protecting us from the menace.

I should like to know more about the menace from which we are being protected in the light of the fact, too, that we may have to depend upon the integrity and honesty of the minister himself in the assurances he gives us. I cannot see why, as elected representatives, we cannot know more about the standards of what is subversive, what is a security risk.

In so far as the point made by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate is concerned, there are a host of organizations which have had the label "commie" pinned on them. I can think of a number of unions that have had that label pinned on them, and a number of cultural organizations. If the minister suggests that by keeping things secret while the gossip runs abroad he is protecting people from a witch hunt, then I think he is putting up a rather shallow defence.

Mr. Fulton: I do not know that there is a great deal more I can add. I respect the point of view of my hon. friend and his sincerity in seeking to get what one could call a standard definition of subversive. Perhaps the point at issue between us therefore really is whether or not we can get a standard definition of "subversive", and I doubt that very much. It is for that reason that the responsibility for judging as to the suitability or otherwise of the applicant—be it an applicant for citizenship or for employment in the government service or by an agency of the government—is left to the department or the agency concerned. They assess the suitability on the basis of information which the force provides to them, that information having been screened at the headquarters of the director of security and intelligence with respect to its weight in this sense, particularly as to the reliability of the source from which the information is received.

We recognize that there may be prejudice and other motives, or that certain things may be based on hearsay or surmise, and a conscientious effort is made to make an accurate, independent and fair assessment of the reliability or the weight to be attached to the particular source of information. But as to laying down a standard definition of what is subversive and what should be judged to be a subversive or what should be judged to be a communist front organization, I do not think it is possible to arrive at such definitions. The methods of the communists are so infinitely various or devious or skillful I should think you would have to have a 500-page book before you could define every one of the members they might have and therefore every type of organization that should be deemed to be suspect on security grounds. I just do not think we can get a simple, over-all, standard definition of what is a subversive or security risk and leave it at that.

Mr. Fisher: May I just give an example to the minister. A couple of years ago when I was teaching grades 10 and 11 students an official of the department of education was trying to line up for me and several others just what our duties and responsibilities should be. He said to us, "You have a very serious responsibility. Many of these young people are going to drop out of school just about now, so in your social studies and in your teaching of citizenship and that sort of thing you have to prepare these young people to go out and face the communist menace".

At the time I thought it was a nonsensical bit of advice and I still think so. How are you going to prepare 15 year olds and 16 year olds in social studies to go out and face the communist menace? I do not know. If a teacher is obliged to assume that kind of burden he has a complete cloud or haze in which to work.

This is exactly the kind of analogy or parallel that I think we are facing today in so far as subversiveness is concerned. What is this communist menace, this subversive danger that we face, that requires these directives, that requires you to send constables around the country quizzing neighbours and that sort of thing? We just do not know what it is. We do not know its scope. We just have the assurance of the minister, which I respect very much, that he feels there really has been no change.

I think we could have a little bit more of a definition. The minister says the communists are so varied and so clever in their various approaches. I do not doubt that at all, but where is the public evidence of their cleverness? In a political way they have gone down the drain to quite an extent. They have lost or are losing daily their grip on any organizations where they have been strong in the labour movement. Where is this cleverness, this great worry that you have? It seems to me that the people of Canada in a very reasonable way have met the menace. I think it is about time we knew a little bit more or had a redefinition of what the Royal Canadian Mounted Police director of security and intelligence feels the menace is at the time and how they go about defining it and fighting it.

Mr. Pearson: I confess that I have some sympathy with the minister's reluctance to attempt the definition of "subversive". He might have exactly the same difficulties as if he were trying to define "freedom", "democracy", "appeasement" or "fascism". No doubt he had similar difficulty when he was attempting to define "obscenity", as I gather he has done although the results may appear to be inadequate to some members of the house.

I think he was right, of course, when he defended the practice of not making public lists of subversive organizations, which is perhaps not quite the same as lists of communists or communist front organizations which are known to be such. That is in contrast, of course, to the practice—and I think it is a good contrast—across the border where they do have their blacklists or lists of subversive organizations, and where I suspect they have lists of Canadian organizations which they consider to be subversive and perhaps a list of members of those organizations.

That leads me to ask the minister a question which I think is an appropriate one. He will know how far he can go in replying to it. The question is this. How are the arrangements working between the appropriate security authorities of the two governments in respect of the exchange of security information? Is the minister satisfied that these arrangements are not being abused? I am not suggesting that the arrangements themselves are not required and are not in certain circumstances quite proper. But are these arrangements being conducted in such a way that they are not being abused to the prejudice of Canadians who, for instance, may want to get into the United States and who find themselves on some United States immigration list as a result of information which the United States immigration authorities have obtained?

Is the minister satisfied that the security information which is sent to the United States authorities is not being used in Washington by agencies of the United States government, executive or legislative, in a way which would be inappropriate? That is the mildest word I can use in that connection. I am asking whether he thinks the arrangements—with which I am not necessarily quarrelling—are working satisfactorily, and by "satisfactorily" I mean in a sense which will not prejudice the rights or freedoms of Canadians.

Mr. Fulton: In so far as the basis of the exchange of information is concerned—that is to say, whether it is exchanged on an equal basis—I am informed that the feeling is that it is fairly worked out. We have no feeling that we are giving more than we have received or that anyone is holding out on us. So far as the basis is concerned, I am informed that we are satisfied.

It would be difficult for the force and I think unwise for us to attempt to make an assessment as to how in every individual case the other agency may use that information. However, we feel that by a relatively free exchange of security information on the basis that I have described previously—that is with an assessment of the reliability of sources and so on—we can in fact in some cases prevent innocent persons from being refused admission or pilloried in other ways, to which danger they might otherwise be exposed.

As is well known, of course, there have been cases in which we in this country have not been altogether satisfied with the ways in which the information given to others has been used, but I do not think that is a matter for the security officials of Canada to comment on. I think I am recollecting correctly what I have read in the official files on the matter when I say that if there is any criticism, I do not think it is directed so much against security agencies as against some other agencies of the other country which may not have used information given into its possession in a manner altogether acceptable to us. On the whole, with respect to the actual exchange of information I am informed that we feel it is to our advantage, and that it is exchanged on a fair and equal basis.

Mr. Pickersgill: One very factual question I want to put to the minister, and it may not be reasonable to expect a direct answer to it. The question is this. Is the minister satisfied, or are the police satisfied, that the same security is given to the information in the United States that it is given in Canada? There were occasions in the past when we were not satisfied with that.

Mr. Fulton: As far as we can ensure it and do anything effective to bring it about, we are satisfied that that is the case. I do not want to give an absolute blanket guarantee for the future, of course.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, no, and I am not asking for that.

Mr. Fulton: I would like to point out that we know of cases where as the result of the exchange of this type of information we arranged for a Canadian to enter the United States who had been previously refused entry.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, the point raised by the leader of the official opposition —I am careful to say "leader of the official opposition" since I was corrected some time ago—interests me a great deal because I have knowledge of two or three cases where it was obvious that good Canadian citizens suffered some injustice. It was explained to me later on by a person well able to give such information that United States authorities sometimes place a somewhat different assessment on information than we would in Canada.

On three different occasions I have been down to the United States on behalf of people in my constituency and met their junior officials. In one case I said, "I want to know what information you have", and they told me. They said, "This man attended a meeting in the civic arena in Nelson addressed by Tim Buck in 1942." I said, "Good Lord, the place was packed because everyone was curious to hear him." This official, who I thought was somewhat ignorant, tried to suggest to me that this was a sound basis for denying a man admission to the United States. Finally I went further than that and got bank managers, mayors, aldermen, church leaders and lawyers to suport his appeal; I had to mobilize many of the prominent people in the district to support the representations made on behalf of this man. That injustice was suffered strictly as the result of a different assessment of information than would be given here. I think they thought there were some other activities connected with attending this public meeting.

Mr. Chairman, I have had three cases like that, and that is why I was very interested in the question raised by the Leader of the Opposition. I do hope the minister can assure the house that information given to the United States authorities is given with the understanding that they should not make an entirely different assessment, as appears is the case, than that made by the R.C.M.P. and those responsible for security in Canada.

Mr. Winch: But the information is given them.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, there is exchange of security information; I admit that and make no bones about it. But we cannot assume responsibility for the assessment they make of security information they receive. I am told, as I have said before and repeat now, that as a result of the exchange and the discussions we have had relating to this exchange, we have been able in more than one case to secure the entry of a person into the United States who had previously been refused, perhaps on these grounds of a mistaken assessment of the information available. We just do not stop at the official exchange of statistics or written reports; we talk these things over as well.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I should on recollection, in fairness, make it clear that the official I was talking to was not by any means a senior official. I thought he was most unsuited to assess information of this sort.

Mr. Pickersgill: The government or someone in the government did manage to get a situation cleared up, if I remember rightly, where because of the peculiar name of the hon. gentleman's party, the Progressive Conservative party, there was some feeling in the United States that he was a dubious character.

Mr. Fulton: They are not as well informed down there as to the appropriate names of political parties as we are up here.

Mr. Johnson: Je me demande—Mr. Chairman, I wonder since it is two minutes to one whether we might call it one o'clock?

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to call it one o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

(Translation):

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Chairman, just before the house took recess, we were still dealing with the first item of the R.C.M.P.

While commercial shipping and even pleasure boating are under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport, the R.C.M.P. is responsible for the enforcement of the provisions of the Canada Shipping Act and its regulations. That is why I am taking the liberty of dealing with this subject while we are considering estimates relating to the R.C.M.P. We are now at the start of the shipping season and everybody realizes that civilian authorities, especially municipal authorities in communities that have boating clubs, are quite interested in the matter and concerned about possible accidents at the height of the pleasure boating season.

We, in the riding of Chambly-Rouville, are fortunate enough to live on the banks of the splendid Richelieu river which rises on the American border and ends up at Sorel. All along that grand river there are boating clubs, like those at Beloeil, Chambly and St. John. In those communities, quite a number of people—I might even say thousands of people —are interested in pleasure boating. The Beloeil boating club has several hundred members and it is my privilege to be one of them.

Now I know for having discussed the matter with the directors of those boating clubs, that children who indulge in such recreation in the summer time, just outside Beloeil and in the Chambly basin, are exposed to serious accidents because of the lack of supervision on waterways at those spots.

I know that, under the Canada Shipping Act, there is a control of light craft traffic. However, there are certain problems of jurisdiction with regard to the control of mixed traffic of pleasure craft and merchant ships. At Beloeil, more particularly, the boating club is located quite close to the McMasterville dock, where rather large barges take on cargoes of explosives for transport to the United States via the Richelieu. Now, it happens that when those commercial ships, returning to or coming from Sorel, head for the McMasterville dock, they travel at full speed up to the spot where the club's pleasure yachts are berthed and where there are a great many American tourists who expect to find a proper welcome in Canada.

Now, the captains or pilots, or any other person in charge of those ships, hardly bother to consider whether there are any small boats or craft tied up nearby so that frequently considerable damage is done to those light craft. This also represents a serious hazard for children bathing or using light pleasure boats in the vicinity.

Under a departmental order—and the minister may correct me if I am wrong—the R.C.M.P., generally referred to as "Mounted Police", has the responsibility of patrolling those waterways. In fact, under that order, the R.C.M.P. may control and ensure compliance with the regulations governing the traffic of both commercial and pleasure boats.

Even a provincial or municipal police officer has the right to see that the law is observed with regard to light boats, but there are serious doubts as to their jurisdiction over commercial shipping. Therefore, operators of commercial ships are little concerned with the local police, whether provincial or municipal.

More R.C.M.P. men should be assigned to patrol work there, or greater authority given the local police. I know that, in Beloeil itself, one constable is prepared to offer his services and ensure the enforcement of the law on week ends. Incidentally, I invite hon. members who are interested in regattas, as well as the Minister of Justice, to come out to Chambly next Sunday. They can then see for themselves that as a result of the heavy traffic of pleasure boats on the Richelieu, between Beloeil and Chambly, there will probably be a number of slight accidents or even serious ones, as there were on the occasion of previous regattas.

Mr. Chairman, would it not be advisable to consider the possibility of increasing first of all the number of R.C.M.P. agents doing that type of work?

I believe that, in Montreal, there are only two constables and one corporal to patrol the whole Montreal area on the St. Lawrence and on the Richelieu. In my opinion, this is utterly inadequate. In the first place the only job those men are able to do efficiently is checking up. They are doing the job now and I have only congratulations to offer to the agents of the Montreal division office. However, as I said a moment ago, they cannot do any more than check up. They call at boating clubs, check boats, warn people who do not comply with the regulations and advise them on water safety.

That is about all the work they can handle, and when regattas are held anywhere, those men, who are busy supervising boat traffic here and there along the St. Lawrence and the Richelieu, cannot attend. They can't be everywhere at once and therefore can't supervise all areas and lodge complaints against people who break the regulations.

I therefore urge the minister to consider the possibility of increasing the number of R.C.M.P. constables assigned to that type of work. Obviously, my request brings up another problem, that of additional expense. When municipal and provincial police are asked to supervise traffic on those waterways, it means increasing the personnel, and we know that if the provincial government should establish a division of the provincial police to supervise navigation, and if municipal governments should do likewise, it would lead to additional expenditure which it would be rather difficult to require from the province and especially from smaller towns like Beloeil and Chambly.

I therefore urge the government, and particularly the hon. Minister of Justice, to consider the problem in that light.

Mr. Chairman, may I also take this opportunity to do my small bit to arouse public opinion with regard to water safety. All kinds of campaigns are organized every week end for the prevention of highway accidents. We profess to be shocked by traffic congestion on week ends; solemn statements are made, and this or that highway is described as a "death trap", etc., etc. Violators of traffic regulations are roundly tongue lashed; in short, attention is paid to highway safety. However, I feel that in the summer season too little attention is paid to the problem of insuring safety on the waterways. Why could the R.C.M.P. not sponsor, organize or support a public education campaign on water safety?

I have here a pamphlet issued by the Department of Transport information division, under the title "Safety afloat for owners of small boats", which deals with this problem. I wonder just how many people who own some kind of boat are aware of the existence of this pamphlet, or have some slight knowledge of regulations governing the operation of watercraft.

I therefore urge officials of the Department of Transport or Justice to organize, sponsor or support—through the R.C.M.P.—a large scale campaign that might be designated "Water safety campaign".

Mr. Chairman, I have one more problem to refer to. It is the matter of joint jurisdiction with regard to pleasure boating and commercial shipping. There should be closer supervision over barges and other commercial craft on such rivers as the Richelieu, where pleasure boats account for most of the traffic. It is a question of safety for the lives of Canadian citizens.

On behalf of all boating clubs in my area, I submit this request to the Minister of Justice.

(Text):

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, only time will tell why the federal government withheld permission to send Royal Canadian Mounted Police reinforcements to Newfoundland when the province was facing a great crisis. It cannot be denied that it is the government's first duty to preserve peace and order in every province where the mounted police act as the provincial police, and Newfoundland should be no exception. When that duty has not been performed, Mr. Chairman, the whole nation has been betrayed.

Newfoundland is a province which has always lived and abided by the laws of the province and of the dominion. Pressure came from church, state and laity. Telegrams and letters were sent and telephone calls were made to Ottawa, but to no avail. It is unnecessary for me to take the time of the house to recall all the factors that led up to the chaos which threatened to destroy our province. If law and order cannot be maintained, then the freedom of Canadians becomes meaningless.

For a period the city of St. John's was left without sufficient police protection, and I shall now read some messages which will help the house to realize the tension which existed at the time. The president of the Newfoundland conference of the United Church of Canada sent an urgent message to the Minister of Justice which reads as follows:

St. John's practically deprived of police protection because of necessity of sending all available trained men to central Newfoundland where emergency conditions exist and are liable to erupt into further mob violence. This has arisen because of your failure to honour contract with government of Newfoundland to supply extra personnel to R.C.M.P. which is exclusively responsible for all police work outside St. John's. Only this afternoon news release discloses conditions look ugly at Grand Falls.

Having learned with consternation that board of evangelism and social service of our church at Toronto has requested your withholding sending reinforcements of R.C.M.P. to our province, the executive committee of the Newfoundland conference of the United Church is now meeting in emergency session and condemns this action which was taken by that board without full knowledge of situation in and your obligation to Newfoundland, and without consulting Newfoundland conference of the United Church of Canada as to facts, and urgently request of attorney general of Newfoundland that adequate police reinforcements be sent forthwith to maintain law and order, as reports indicate men are available and are being withheld on your instructions.

That powerful request came from Rev. Albert N. Holmes, president of the Newfoundland conference of the United Church of Canada. I have another message to illustrate the gravity of the situation. The following telegram was forwarded by his worship Mayor H. G. Mews of St. John's to the Minister of Justice:

I am informed officially that at least half of the police force required for the normal services in St. John's have been dispatched to central Newfoundland to assist R.C.M.P. in the maintenance of law and order pending the arrival of additional R.C.M.P. personnel.

Under these circumstances I am compelled to request that R.C.M.P. reinforcements be dispatched immediately to central Newfoundland in order that normal police services may be restored in St. John's.

[Mr. Johnson.]

We have heard appeals for help from the church and from the provincial council, and now a few brief words from a working Newfoundlander:

I am not a die-hard Liberal nor am I a Progressive Conservative, but an ordinary broad-minded citizen, with no axe to grind, always giving my privilege of voting an amount of thought.

The refusal of the federal government to comply with the request of Premier Smallwood to send additional R.C.M.P. to Newfoundland, and the attack by Prime Minister Diefenbaker on our premier, and the government, and the opposition has shocked many of us extremely. Mr. Diefenbaker certainly did not make any friends in Newfoundland by his recent statements.

I shall now read excerpts from a letter from a housewife:

We just came from the funeral of the late Constable William Moss. We are sick in Newfoundland, sick with sorrow, anger and sick with our representatives in the federal government, and with the mainland press. Surely you must have seen how right the premier was when the members of the opposition were with him all the way. Surely you must have seen how they were in accord to a man, because of their concern for Newfoundland.

We are a simple folk in Newfoundland, living in peace with our neighbours, with life in our small towns and villages centred closely around the church, and now these mainland reporters have told that they were refused sanctuary by two priests, one an Anglican, and the other a Roman Catholic.

Let us hope that on Monday you will stand to a man in the commons, and condemn the action of the federal government in not sending R.C.M.P. reinforcements; that you will condemn the mainland reporters for their lies; and that you will pledge your support to the provincial government in the step that they have taken. May it never be said that you helped to quench the small candle which has been lit in Newfoundland, and that you made denial to your own people. If you are tempted to take the easy way and say nothing, remember the boyish face of a rookie cop.

I think I have written pretty strongly, but I am only one woman who feels this way, there are thousands more like me. The women have been aroused, and feelings are running high. I have not always been with the premier, but now I back him all the way, and 98 per cent of Newfoundland with me.

What really happened when the minister refused to send extra police assistance? Police had to be sent anyway, and who suffered? Not only the area directly concerned, but the city of St. John's and the immediate area. Reinforcements were sent from St. John's following the refusal of the Minister of Justice, who has taken full responsibility for withholding extra police assistance.

Yesterday the minister referred to the fact that no further violence had taken place. He credited it to the fact that reinforcements had not been sent. The minister used this as evidence of his wisdom in refusing to send extra reinforcements. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that there was no further outbreak of violence, but it is not true that this happy outcome is due to the fact that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in central Newfoundland were not reinforced, because they were. Members of the Newfoundland constabulary were dispatched to the scene of violence, and further help was volunteered by war veterans. The situation was such that this had to be done, and as a result St. John's was left almost entirely without police protection.

Telegrams were sent by the premier of Newfoundland and requests were made by the attorney general of Newfoundland and by other prominent Newfoundlanders. And because much needed help was not sent, Commissioner L. H. Nicholson submitted his resignation. He has, as I am sure we will all agree, helped to place our federal police on a level second to none in the world.

The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has been continually criticized for statements he has made regarding the situation, but Newfoundlanders and people all over Canada have expressed their desire to back fully many of the remarks he has made. This has been proven through the medium of the press, radio and television. I hate to think, Mr. Chairman, what might have happened had this outbreak gained momentum.

There is no doubt in the minds of millions of Canadians but that reinforcements should have been sent to Newfoundland. Because they were not sent the present government broke faith with the province of Newfoundland. I suggest that doubts have been created in the minds of many of our people as to the efficiency of the present justice department because even now, months after the crisis, Canadians are still questioning the action and final decision taken by the Minister of Justice.

The reference made by my friend the hon. member for Timiskaming yesterday to police policy and personnel in Newfoundland is entirely incorrect. We have now, and always have had, as good police personnel as could be or can be found in any other province in the Dominion of Canada. As Newfoundlanders we have been entirely satisfied with the manner in which they have performed their duties as rangers, as provincial police or as members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, Newfoundland is proudly represented in all branches of our federal police, many of whom served as rangers and as provincial police in my riding.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I want to speak very briefly partly to draw attention to the fact that yesterday the minister tabled a telegram from the mayor of St. John's, which was read by my hon. friend from Trinity-Conception, but there is no evidence that the minister tabled the reply. It would appear to me from having heard it read that that telegram was and can only be construed as a protest against the failure of the government to send the reinforcements, and therefore should properly have been included in the order that was tabled.

I am not making any particular point of that, but I think we should be told before the item is passed what the minister said in reply to the mayor. I am not going to make anything of the point of order, but I would ask him to put it on the record.

While I am on my feet I should like to draw attention to the fact brought out by the hon. member for Trinity-Conception that the net effect of what the government did—I say what the government did in refusing to reinforce the mounted police—was to deprive the city of St. John's of a police force for a very critical period because the Newfoundland constabulary had to be sent in place of the reinforcements which were denied. So far as that area was concerned it made much less difference than it would to an area that was not affected at all, but was deprived of police protection by the action of the government.

I should like also to put on the record the fact that whatever his present views may be, the mayor of St. John's is very well known to hon. gentlemen opposite and was not only a strong supporter of their party but at one time was provincial leader of their party. It seems to me that is not without significance in indicating what the feeling was in Newfoundland generally about this action.

There is one other question I should like to put to the minister. The hon. member for Trinity-Conception has reminded us of the references which were made by the hon. member for Timiskaming to the Newfoundland constabulary. The Newfoundland constabulary, as the minister knows, were serving under the command of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I do hope the minister is not going to ignore these slurs upon a police force which he told us by arrangement, as he suggested when the subject of reinforcements first came up, were sent to central Newfoundland. I hope the minister is not going to allow these slurs upon a splendid force to pass without any reference from him.

Mr. Batten: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to make any extended remarks on this topic at this time, but I do want to make some comments with regard to the failure of the government to send the Royal Canadian Mounted Police reinforcements to Newfoundland when they were requested and when they were required. In the few comments I have to make I shall follow the members from Newfoundland who spoke yesterday and I shall not, of course, discuss any of the contractual obligations, neither shall I go into a discussion of the situation which brought about the need for reinforcement of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

I would, at the beginning, like to comment on the remarks made yesterday by the hon. member for Timiskaming. The hon. member made reference to the fact that some of the R.C.M.P. in Newfoundland at that time may well have been, in years gone by, members of the old Newfoundland ranger force. Those who know anything about this force will remember that it was brought into being at the time when Newfoundland was under commission government. I am not now in a position to say how well these men were trained, but they were trained and during the time they were operating in Newfoundland they did a very effective job. After 1949 a number of the members of the Newfoundland ranger force were taken into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, as were a number of members of the Newfoundland constabulary.

Well, that happened 10 years ago, and during that 10 years these men have had considerable training given to them; and with the training they were able to bring into the force they are now very creditable members of the R.C.M.P. I know a lot of them personally. I knew them when they were members of the Newfoundland ranger force, and I know them now. Even if some of these former rangers were amongst the group of R.C.M.P. at Badger—I am not saying they were—I am very sure that their presence had no effect in reducing the efficiency or effectiveness of the R.C.M.P. Again, if there were two or three of them there they did not directly reduce the effect of the collective body.

I take exception to the remarks made by the hon. gentleman, because I feel that those men who were brought into the R.C.M.P. are now well trained, and those who have been given promotion were certainly given promotion on the same strict standards as any other member of the R.C.M.P. I feel that they are able to give the force as efficient service as the men from any other province who have been promoted. Whatever the actions of the R.C.M.P. in Newfoundland, I certainly think there can be no reflection on their efficiency because of the fact that included amongst their numbers there may have been members of the Newfoundland ranger force or the Newfoundland constabulary. This is a reflection that I could not accept.

The hon. gentleman went on to refer to the attorney general of Newfoundland. It is true that some time ago he was a director of Bowater's Newfoundland Pulp and Paper Mills Limited, but only under an elective position. When the government's interest in this company had been changed he was no longer there officially to advise. If he had to make recommendations to the Attorney General of Canada he was making them through or on the recommendation of the inspector of the R.C.M.P.

In all, Mr. Chairman, I feel the effectiveness of the R.C.M.P. in Newfoundland in this particular situation is something that is not deserving of the slurs and the most uncomplimentary remarks that have been made concerning it. Certainly there was a very difficult situation at that time. An extremely tense situation existed, not only between the parties to the dispute but also amongst the general populace. There was a need to preserve the peace, not only between the two parties concerned but also amongst the people in general. There was a need to protect life and property, and there was a need to protect the general public.

There is little need to give an account of how the people felt about this. I am sure many hon. members in the house have received letters from the various parts of this country, and I am sure that many have seen the newspaper reports. It is a fact that the people of Newfoundland did expect the R.C.M.P. reinforcements to come at this particular time because they were needed. They were needed to preserve law and order and to protect those who required protection. The claim that the R.C.M.P. acted in Newfoundland as strikebreakers is one that is completely invalid.

I can understand that there are people who would feel that the R.C.M.P. were carrying out their regular duties, not only in instructing people in what the law was but also, unfortunately, in having to enforce the law. There may be others who were of the opinion that they were strikebreakers, but I think it would be very difficult to sustain that position so far as the R.C.M.P. are concerned. I feel they conducted themselves in a most commendable way under most difficult circumstances.

I do believe that when the situation became so tense that further reinforcements were required—I am going to have to differ with the minister here—they should have been sent forward at that time. When the minister says he was informed by the inspector in Newfoundland that these reinforcements were not required to protect the personnel already there, I think that is a fair statement.

Yesterday the minister explained his position in that regard, and I am quite willing to accept his explanation except for the fact that the feeling is abroad that this was a major reason why the R.C.M.P. enforcements were not sent. As my friend the hon. member for Trinity-Conception has explained, a serious situation developed when members of the Newfoundland constabulary were taken from the city St. John's and sent out to the troubled area, leaving St. John's without the necessary police force that it requires. I think this was a serious thing, and would not have been required if the necessary R.C.M.P. reinforcements had been sent to Newfoundland when they were requested.

It was also suggested yesterday afternoon that the R.C.M.P. were required in Newfoundland in order to evict a union from the province. No such thing, of course, is true. These men were required to go to Newfoundland in order to preserve law and order, and were not concerned in the dispute that happened to be going on there at that time. I am sure nobody knowing the facts would accept the statement that they were required to be sent to Newfoundland to evict a union.

I am also wondering whether, in making his decision, the Minister of Justice really entered into sufficient discussion with the officials of the Newfoundland government to determine exactly what the position was. There are many today who feel that this decision was not the right one and they are wondering now, if in the future such an emergency were again to arise, what protection they could hope to get if they were living outside the city of St. John's, which is the only centre that has any provincial force in any numbers. The result is that there are many in Newfoundland today who feel that the decision made in this regard was the wrong one and it has left grave doubts in their minds.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take just two or three minutes in which to reply to some of the remarks made this morning by the hon. member for Port Arthur. It will be remembered that the hon. member for Port Arthur was having a number of exchanges with the Minister of Justice on the topic of subversive activities, and in the course of these exchanges asked the minister to provide a definition of "subversion". He also pressed the minister to divulge the names of organizations that might be considered subversive; and when he was not getting from the minister a suitable answer he went on to imply that there was no menace. "Where is the menace?" he asked. Then to prove his point he referred to the decrease in the votes which the Labour Progressive party had received in recent elections.

I think it is dangerous to allow that argument to remain on Hansard unanswered, because that is one of the favourite means employed by the communist party to lull us into a false sense of security. In order to prove how worthless that argument is I should like to inform the house that in Berlin last May Mr. John McGovern, a British member of parliament belonging to the Labour party, while in Berlin at the request of Mayor Brandt, made the statement that among the members of parliament of the Socialist party in Britain there were 26 who were actually undercover agents, and there were another 70 members who were fellow travellers. That statement by Mr. McGovern caused quite a bit of trouble in his party and Mr. Morgan Phillips, secretary of the Labour party in Britain, asked him to recant. He has steadfastly refused to do so because he says it is the truth and he has never made false statements even against his opponents.

Mr. Regier: And you believe it?

Mr. Carter: I certainly do.

Mr. Regier: Have you any evidence?

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Carter: You produce your evidence when your turn comes. The difficulty of defining "subversion" is obvious, because the most insidious subversive activities occur in the realms of thought and ideas. The aims and objects of the communist party are to undermine our confidence in our institutions, our values and our leaders. All that, of course, involves the use and the planting of ideas and the breaking down of our values.

This is done in many ways. It is done by broadcasts, films and plays. One of the most fruitful sources of this activity, of course, is in our universities. We know that most universities have communist agents planted on their staffs for that very purpose, and it is reasonable to assume that the same thing is happening here in Canada. Surely we cannot expect the Minister of Justice to divulge to the house what people or what universities are concerned or what activities are going on in this field.

It was only a few days ago that a prominent member of the communist party in Canada was asked whether membership in his party was growing. He said, "No; we are not getting very many new members, but that matter is not important because there is already a wide public acceptance of the issues which we have advocated". That is where the most dangerous subversive activity is being carried on.

I realize that the hon. member for Port Arthur has a problem—and I think it is one that deserves attention—in that some new citizens, when they come here from other countries, are likely to become involved in subversive organizations without knowing their true nature. I believe this situation could be met, in some measure anyway, if the department of immigration would in some way warn these new immigrants that before joining or associating with such an organization, or any organization at all, they should make careful inquiries from people in whom they have confidence, as to their true nature.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I must take the time of the committee for a moment or two in order to refer to the most unusual statement made by the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, in which he said that a member of the British Labour party while in Berlin said that there were over 20 undercover communist agents in the British Labour party.

Mr. Carter: Twenty-six elected members.

Mr. Herridge: Members of parliament?

Mr. Carter: Members of parliament.

Mr. Herridge: That there were 26 members of parliament of the British Labour party who were undercover agents of the communist party.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I rise to raise with you the question of how anything that members of the British Labour party said or did not say in Berlin, is related to the estimates of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. Winch: Why did you not stop him?

Mr. Fulton: I was reading something else. Otherwise I would have done so, I assure my hon. friend.

The Deputy Chairman: The point is well taken. The hon. member for Burin-Burgeo made that point. In order to be fair I think I should allow the hon. member for Kootenay West a moment or two for the purpose of giving his side of the story.

Mr. Herridge: I just want a minute or two, Mr. Chairman in which to reply on behalf of this party. The hon. member said there were 26 members of parliament belonging to the Labour party in Great Britain who were undercover communist agents, plus over 70 fellow travellers.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to correct the record. I know the hon. member who made the statement did so in good faith, because he is not the sort of person who would willingly state an untruth to the house; but to correct the record I want to say that the secretary of the British Labour party, on behalf of the leadership of the British Labour party and the national executive of the British Labour party, denied this statement as being completely untrue, and denied it most emphatically shortly after it was made.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps at this time, Mr. Chairman, I should deal with the remarks of the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville. He raised a matter which I think requires some reply when he drew attention to the situation in his constituency resulting from the fact that there are on the waterways in that constituency, if I followed him correctly, a number of pleasure boats and at the same time a substantial amount of commercial shipping. He made the request that we be more aggressive in our enforcement of the small boat regulations. I think he suggested that we do not have sufficient members of the force enforcing the regulations, with the result that dangers arise from the conduct of the boats in that area. I can assure the hon. gentleman that I will be very glad to do what I can to make a contribution to solving the problem, and I will be pleased to bring his remarks to the attention of treasury board.

I do not like making excuses, so I will merely state this as the fact. I said on an earlier occasion that we are faced constantly with the problem of establishment limitations. There are a number of additional functions we would be prepared to undertake and a number of functions now being discharged which we feel we could do better if we had additional personnel. But in this as in every other department of government activity there is the problem of over-all expenditure and the limitations which must necessarily be placed upon the strength of the force, as is the case with the civilian personnel employed in the department. We have rarely if ever been able to persuade treasury board that we should have as large an increase in our establishment as we think is necessary to meet the requirements we are called upon to meet.

However, this year for the first time treasury board did authorize one position at Montreal for this purpose; that is, the purpose of the enforcement of small boat regulations through the criminal investigation branch establishment at Montreal. I should perhaps remind the hon. member, however, that there is in addition a provision in the small boat regulations published in the Canada Gazette for March 25 of this year under which a peace officer for the purpose of these regulations is defined as including a member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, a member of any harbour or river police force, and a member of any provincial, county or municipal police force. So it will be seen that there are other personnel available for this work besides the members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

It may well be, therefore, that the problem here is one of co-ordinating the activities of the mounted police and the local municipal police forces. That is a matter which I shall be glad to ask my officers to discuss with the Department of Transport, to see whether there is any room for improvement in the situation by a greater degree of co-ordination of those forces.

Mr. Johnson: Would the minister permit an observation at this point. I raised the question of different peace officers authorized to enforce the law, but I was questioning the possibility of these peace officers excepting of course the R.C.M.P.—I am referring to harbour, river, provincial, county and municipal police forces—having authority to enforce the law so far as commercial navigation is involved. I believe these regulations cover the small vessels section but not the commercial, and I was calling the attention of the minister to this particular point, that since these police officers might not have this power with commercial vessels they could be laughed at—and that is a fact; they could actually be laughed at—by some of the pilots or masters on board big ships travelling close to marine clubs.

For example, I know that in Beloeil the officer there is doing a fine job in this field trying to stop these commercial vessels from running too fast on the river near the marine club, but he was laughed at and so was a sergeant or a corporal of the R.C.M.P. last year when he tried to warn certain persons. He was told that he could not do anything to them because they were travelling in their boats on the river. I believe what caused the whole problem in Beloeil in particular was that the corporal was laughed at by masters or pilots who they did not care whether they caused damage by running their boats too fast close to the marine clubs.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I will be glad to discuss this matter in the light of the remarks of the hon. gentleman, and in particular to discuss the question with the Department of Transport and see whether any amendment to the regulations is necessary to give the officers a greater degree of authority.

Mr. Johnson: Without committing the government, of course, is there any possibility that the R.C.M.P. could take the lead in a vast campaign on this particular matter of safety on waterways?

Mr. Fulton: It is a matter about which we have a certain amount of sensitivity still, Mr. Chairman, but we recognize the importance of the subject. We feel that the lead perhaps should be taken by the Department of Transport, and I understand that department is doing its best to give wide circulation to its safety pamphlet and also to the regulations regarding the operation of small boats. But as we are interested in the question of enforcement, and as enforcement is made more satisfactory when you have the co-operation of those concerned, we also have an interest in acquainting the public with the necessity of obeying the regulations in this regard. That is also a matter that I would be glad to have my officers discuss with the Department of Transport in order to co-ordinate efforts and see if we can contribute to bringing the importance of this matter to the attention of the public.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister ask the Minister of Transport to establish a coast-guard on the Richelieu?

Mr. Fulton: I hardly think so, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, I wish to touch on a point which has not been dealt with, and it concerns the role of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in connection with our tourist industry. The classical reputation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for intelligence, efficiency and training, as everyone knows, and for good looks as well, is practically world-wide. Tourists from other countries, especially from the United States, as soon as they cross the border expect to see our Canadian mounted police, the red-coated mounties.

Unfortunately they can only be found around our parliament buildings. I suggest that border points be considered as suitable locations for members of the force to be on hand to gratify the desire of these tourists to meet these world-famous men. I should like to ask the minister if any consideration is being given to this question and, more particularly, to the presence of these men on the Pigeon river border near Fort William at which point many thousands of tourists from the United States enter Canada every summer.

Our country has built up a great tourist business which is growing every year. Would it be asking too much of the government to consider an increase in the force in order to take care of this extra service, the expenditure for which would consist only of a very modest contribution toward the encouragement of the tourist industry in which both private enterprise and provincial governments have invested huge sums of money? Would the minister give an indication whether he is ready to consider this suggestion?

Mr. Fulton: I appreciate the interest shown by the hon. gentleman. This is a continuing problem for the force and it was dealt with specifically and quite conclusively in the last annual report for the year ended March 31, 1958 and if the hon. member would look at page 47 of that report I think he would see that a complete answer is given to the problems he has raised.

Mr. Badanai: The minister has not, however, given me any indication that the Pigeon river border area is being considered. That is not mentioned in the report.

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman. I have not referred specifically to the Pigeon river area because that is only part of the larger problem of making R.C.M.P. personnel available as tourist attractions, and this problem was covered in the annual report to which I made reference.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister one question regarding the proposed conference of the provincial attorneys general to discuss the contract which, I understand, has been postponed until the autumn. In view of the fact that one of these contracts is now before the courts, may I ask what it is proposed to discuss at this conference?

Mr. Fulton: I felt that one of the reasons why this conference should be postponed was because of the difficulty of discussing a matter which I felt we should discuss, namely the clause regarding reinforcements, while that clause was before the courts. That was one of the reasons why I found difficulty in holding the conference at the time we arranged it orginally, namely late April or early May.

Mr. Pearson: Will the minister postpone this conference further if the case has not been completed?

Mr. Fulton: That is difficult to say. The original purpose of the conference was to discuss the financial basis upon which the services of the police were made available to the provinces. Since the difficulty with Newfoundland arose it became evident to us, and it was our intention, that the conference should also devote specific attention to this difficult question of the reinforcement clause. I had hoped that feelings might die down—if I might use that expression—by the fall, and for that reason I discussed with a number of the attorneys general the postponement of the date and that was generally agreed to. In the meantime, however, legal action was started and that does make the whole position difficult. If the action to which the hon. gentleman referred should not be settled or disposed of shortly it may be that we shall have to see if we can have a conference in relation to the financial aspects of the matter, leaving the reinforcement question to be discussed later. That is a difficult situation to visualize. I do not think I can say very much more. We did not start the action, and I think I must leave it there.

Mr. Pickersgill: In a manner of speaking you did start it. The minister was going to read the telegram he sent to the mayor of St. John's.

Mr. Fulton: Yes. This telegram was not, in my view, a protest against the failure to send reinforcements, and for that reason it was not tabled in the return which was made. The hon. gentleman spoke to me about the matter yesterday and said that in his view it should be tabled.

Mr. Pickersgill: I also asked the minister before I asked for the return and he agreed to table it.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, when the hon. gentleman spoke to me about it yesterday he drew my attention to the fact that earlier, in March, he had asked for the tabling of the telegram, and I suggested that in the circumstances rather than make a supplementary return now, I would simply table it in accord with the earlier request. That earlier request did not ask for a copy of my reply. That is why I did not include it. This is the reply. It is a telegram dated Ottawa, March 13, 1959, addressed to His Worship H.G.R. Mews, mayor of St. John's Newfoundland, and it reads:

> Your telegram received and in reply I wish to assure you that all aspects of this situation including the effect of the move of constabulary from St. John's are before the government here and the whole situation is being continuously watched and urgently studied. Your representations will be drawn to the attention of my colleagues and given full weight.

It is signed: "E. D. Fulton, Minister of Justice".

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to ask a question of the Minister of Justice.

Has the Cuban government, led by Mr. Fidel Castro, applied to the Minister of Justice for information in regard to the organization of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: We did have some communication from Mr. Castro and a meeting was arranged with him when he was in Montreal at which time the attitude of the force with regard to any forthcoming request was indicated in general terms. Since that time we have received no further communication.

Mr. Winch: If I may make a brief comment on something which was said by the minister a few minutes ago on the taxpayers' money being spent in cases where the R.C.M.P. is used as a tourist attraction, as I understand it sometimes is. May I say that I have no objection to that at all—

Mr. Fulton: But we do not have the men.

Mr. Winch: It might pay good dividends to Canada, and as to the force being a tourist attraction, the minister should go out in front of this building and he would understand that. I do not think they are doing anything much in the way of our protection, but they are certainly an attraction to tourists. No one questions that.

But I should like, if I may, to get some answer from the Minister of Justice with respect to the taxpayers' money being spent on the use of the R.C.M.P. to investigate honest, decent, upstanding citizens of this country, and although this may not be admitted officially, it is nevertheless a matter of fact. I know that the minister, and naturally so, has already made clear his pride in the R.C.M.P. and that he objects to any attack being made upon them. May I say through you, Mr. Chairman, to the minister that anything I have to say—and I think this applies to everybody else in this group—is not an attack on individuals, nor on their position, but on the use made of them by successive governments over a long period of time. I am not just talking from hearsay when I say there is great objection to their use in the manner I have indicated. I think I have had a greater experience than many hon. members with regard to this way of using the force. I do not blame the individuals.

I can go back to when I was only nine years of age, when no less than once a week the R.C.M.P., between four and six o'clock in the morning, invaded my own father's home. They did so because he was the president of the one big union and at that time it was something terrible to be a trade union leader. I have been kicked out of my bed at five o'clock in the morning by the R.C.M.P. in the period between 1916 and 1919 because they wanted to search under the mattress to see if there were any books on Marxism or something of that nature. That is my first recollection. I am not complaining about the individuals who were involved because while they were doing that in the bedrooms of our home my father was downstairs pouring tea for them.

Why did I enter politics? Because in 1930 I happened to become involved in an unemployment demonstration and was very severely beaten by the R.C.M.P. I do not think the R.C.M.P. wanted to beat up me and the others but they had their orders to clear the streets. I simply give these two examples. When we ask questions now about the use of the R.C.M.P. they are not questions about individuals but about the use that is made of them and the orders that are given, especially when they are used in connection with strikes.

I have been leading up to a question which I and others have raised over the past few years and I hope that for the first time I will be able to get a direct answer from the Minister of Justice this afternoon. The R.C.M.P. come under his jurisdiction, at least as far as estimates are concerned and, in fact, I believe the Minister of Justice has complete authority over the force.

A few moments ago we heard a discussion of subversive activities and investigations. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice this question. Since he has held office has he put an end to utilizing the time and services of the R.C.M.P. under somebody's orders, whose I do not know, to report on the travels, activities and statements of active trade unionists and those who do not belong to either the political party of the government or of the official opposition? Has the minister done anything at all to investigate why that was done in the past and to ascertain what records are now held by the R.C.M.P.?

I will stand in this house and say that nobody in the House of Commons has a greater belief in and love for democratic procedures and principles and a geater love of this country than I have. There is no person in this house who is more anti-communist than I am and many others whom I could mention. Yet I know of at least one member of the house who, although he is not supposed to have seen it has seen a record concerning himself compiled by the R.C.M.P. I have never seen my own but members of the R.C.M.P. who have resigned have told me that there is a file on myself. I have actually seen quotations from it. When we are as democracy-loving and anti-communist as we are, I should like to know whether this is still going on. In my opinion there is only one man who should know. We have been told in the past that the minister did not know but I say that the minister must know where the money comes from because it is in his estimates somewhere, and if this practice is still being carried on in Canada I maintain that it constitutes subversive activity on the part of the force.

I should also like to know about this man Pat Walsh. I have inquired for years about his statement that he did more to create subversive activity in the communist party than almost any other man in Canada. Seven years ago when he got out he said that all the time he was engaged in subversive activity he was an agent for the R.C.M.P. I have never been able to get any answer with respect to that matter because the reply always is that the R.C.M.P. and the minister cannot give us that kind of information. I should like to know the answer from the Minister of Justice because we have never yet been able to get an admission with respect to whether the R.C.M.P. were being used to incite the communist party to engage in disturbance and aggression through a paid official.

What is the position now of Pat Walsh? In view of the fact that I am so strongly anti-communist I am getting a little bit fed up with receiving through the mail week after week publications from this man addressed to "Commie Lover, Harold Winch." Is he still on the R.C.M.P. payroll and is it still part of his work to antagonize those who are true democrats simply because we do not happen to be Conservatives or Liberals?

Mr. Johnson: Why don't you sue him?

Mr. Winch: That is what I am asking. Is this a democratic country or are you only a democrat if you happen to be a Conservative or a Liberal? I think this is a serious matter. We have never yet been able to get a straight answer as to the use of the R.C.M.P. with respect to active trade unionists and those who happen to be opposed not just to the two old political parties but to the economic system. We have never had a direct answer in the six years I have been in the house. The Minister of Justice is a democrat and I know he would never question my love for or loyalty to this country. I also know he would never question my anti-communist attitude. I am going to ask him here and now if he will have the decency, the fortitude, the honesty to get up in the House of Commons right now and tell us what use is made by the R.C.M.P. of a certain fund that is under his jurisdiction and why and under what conditions a particular section in the R.C.M.P., and I know there is one, checks on certain individuals. I should like him to tell us on what basis they make these checks on trade unionists and certain members of the House of Commons. I think we are entitled to know the answer.

Mr. Fulton: With respect to the questions asked by the hon. member for Vancouver East, I do not know whether I shall be branded as lacking those qualities which he hypothetically attributed to me if I fail to answer his questions to his satisfaction, because I am not going to be able to answer his questions to his satisfaction. I think that on reflection, when he reads tomorrow what he said in Hansard, he will find that he has asked me questions resembling, have I caused the R.C.M.P. to stop beating their wives? That is not a question that can be answered, nor can the questions that the hon. gentleman has asked be answered for a variety of reasons, but most of the reasons are that he phrased his questions in that form.

With regard to the interest of the hon. gentleman in preserving the democratic way of life, I unreservedly state that I respect his interest in that thought and I respect his anti-communist feelings and I make no suggestion that he is not entitled to the answers because of any suspicion of his motives or of his patriotism. The hon. gentleman was here this morning when we had a discussion and the reasons were given at that time why these questions cannot be answered.

With regard to the question of files on individuals, I did on an earlier occasion, July 8, 1958, in answer to a question in the house asked me by the hon. member for Skeena, make an extended reply explaining the reason why questions of this sort, asking whether there were files on individuals, whether we make investigations of individuals, whether we have individuals who are on the payroll as agents, cannot be answered. I would refer my hon. friend to page 2047 of Hansard of July 8, 1958, where he will see the reasons which I gave at that time for my inability to answer such questions.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said on this matter.

Mr. Fulton: It was all said this morning.

Mr. Peters: I realize some of it was said this morning but I do not agree with what was said. I am of the opinion that Canada is not in a condition of war or of threat of security risks of that nature. I think that this force has been built up by some of the officials—

Mr. Fulton: Vote against the item and let us get on with it.

Mr. Peters: I think some of these forces have been built up by that department and now it is growing beyond all proportion. I understand that we are now enlarging the headquarters of the R.C.M.P. I might suggest we are probably enlarging it because what the minister promised a year or two ago did not come to pass and will not come to pass, namely his statement that if these files proved inactive for a period of years—and I think at that time he mentioned the period of five years—they would be destroyed.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am not aware that I made any such promise. Before my hon. friend makes such statements of a general scattered nature I think he should turn up Hansard and give us the reference. If he has a specific undertaking in mind that he wants to deal with I shall be glad if he will refer me to it and I will deal with it, but I do not accept general allegations of that kind.

Mr. Peters: I did not know this matter was going to be raised again and therefore I have not the reference in Hansard. It happened the first session I was here, in 1957. I do not say the minister gave the assurance that those files would be destroyed; I think he said at that time his officials informed him that if they were inactive for a period of time—if I remember rightly, it was a period of something like five years—they would be disposed of. I cannot speak from personal knowledge either as to whether they have been or not; I have not been across the border for a number of years and I do not know. I cannot speak from personal knowledge that I have a file at the border point, that this information has been given to the United States immigration authorities or the Canadian immigration authorities because I have not been there recently.

If the minister wishes to carry on this type of department, if this is going to be done, then the next time the minister's estimates come up we are going to have to personally mention some of these files, and I am not sure that that is advantageous. If the minister is going to continue in this way, then we shall have to produce the names of some of these secret service agents. I am quite sure we can find out who some of them are who are operating in the Kirkland Lake and Timmins areas. I do not think it will be too difficult to find out the names of some of those people. If we want the names and information on what they are doing and who they investigate, what kind of investigations they carry on, and so on, I think that because of the connection that some of us have with municipal police and municipal authorities we can obtain that information, and I think this will eliminate their usefulness in those areas.

If this is what the minister wishes to do, if he wishes definite proof each time of these things, then I think we can probably get it. I suggest that we may be able to get some of these files from their offices. I think we may even be able to do that if we are going to have to play with the Department of Justice, or it is going to carry on activities against members of parliament and others. Maybe it is time to start a little private investigation of our own. We have some connections, and I think they will give us some information on some of these matters. I think the time has come for us to quit chasing after this political dilemma.

Mr. Fulton: So do I.

Mr. Peters: We should cease thinking that everybody who has ever said anything in public is a subversive, anybody who has ever attended a meeting held by the communists, the fascists or practically anybody else, is a subversive. It might be interesting to the committee to know that I am informed that the leader of the former minister of justice was also investigated not so very long ago when he was premier of Ontario, by a man whom he appointed as his security officer in the province of Ontario for the department of highways. It seems that at one time or another he had attended a meeting and therefore, I presume, would be suspect. The same gentleman informed me that he also had checked his attorney general at that time who was a member of the same party and that he had a file also because he had committed an indiscretion in younger days and had attended a meeting that was held by what would be considered to be a front organization.

I was informed by the commissioner of the R.C.M.P. a number of years ago of some of the facts that were in my own particular file. I do not think there is any secret as to what they were. I was going to a veterans school under the veterans university extension grants. I became president of a council in that school and we had a number of difficulties with the government of the day. We objected for one thing as a council to the food we were getting. We circulated a petition that came to the House of Commons and some objection was raised to that, but when it ended up in my file, according to the information from the commissioner of that day, I was considered to be a rabble rouser to be watched.

Another matter that entered into the file had to do with some difficulty we had when I was in the air force. We had a problem which was quite a simple one. We lived in town, lived off the station. We arrived at the station on several occasions a few minutes late because the buses, just as the buses in the city of Ottawa are at the present time, were very crowded at peak periods. We got to the station late and they confined us to barracks. A number of us were sitting around having coffee and we decided that this was not fair. We were working from eight o'clock in the morning until about five at night and it was not fair to confine us to barracks because we were late. The minister can laugh; the minister can think this is a big joke; but this is in my own particular file. This is the type of evaluation that the minister and his department are giving to the immigration authorities which causes people embarrassment every time they cross the border. You say you give it no evaluation, but I am telling you what is in it. It is the type of file you would have, too, if you had attended a communist meeting for one purpose or another.

In this particular case you may even refer to it as a sitdown strike. We did not repair the aircraft on which we were working. We accumulated, by arrangement, more aircraft on the field than were normally held there and a meeting was held in the squadron I was with. They told us if we did not come in, if we were late or did not work overtime at night, then we had to put in another four or five hours. Now, nothing was ever said about it but, according to the commissioner of the R.C.M.P. at that time, these were the two things that happened to be on this particular file on me. These things were in the R.C.M.P. file. One of them came from the air force and another one came from a veterans' school.

I suggest that these are not the kind of files that protect us against security risks. I have done many things that were much stronger than those since then, and the file might be accumulating a great deal of weight. I do not believe any of those things were unpatriotic. I do not believe any of them have been breaches of security of Canada as a nation. These files are the type that should be disposed of. If the minister says that we cannot disclose this information because it would be a security risk, then I say I believe the minister is wrong. If he gets up and tells me that is his opinion, then I am going to spend the next six months finding out just exactly what some of these individuals in the R.C.M.P. do. I am going to check and find out what some of the officials do, because some of these officials must have small, narrow, little minds that should be investigated. If this is the type of security that they are affording to our country, it is time for a change in the regulations that govern it.

I have no objection whatever to investigating and keeping a file on people who are acting against the security of this nation; that has to be done. There are many people, even housewives of whom I know in the town of Timmins who have been investigated because they knew somebody who had a brother or was connected in some way with the labour progressive party. We are going to have to deal with these files, and we are only going to keep those files which serve some purpose. The rest of them should be thrown out the window.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just before the item carries, I wanted to ask the minister if he was aware of a publication called Canadian Intelligence Digest. I should like to tell him why I am asking this question. This periodical—I suggest that is the way to describe it—that is distributed gives the impression that it has some official or quasi-official connection. I know it reaches my desk in some fashion unsolicited by me. I think it would be useful if the minister would indicate quite clearly it has no connection whatever with the police or with the department.

Mr. Fulton: I have not seen what is known as the Canadian Intelligence Digest for some time, and upon which my friend bases his statement that it does give some impression it is a semi-official publication. The reason I have not seen it is that it does not get any closer to me now than my wastepaper basket.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister has a secretarial staff, and I have not.

Mr. Fulton: I have not seen it myself, but I have no hesitation in saying it has no connection whatever with the R.C.M.P. or any department or agency of government.

Mr. Pearson: Can the minister also give the committee the assurance that the kind of information which my hon. friend has spoken about could not get into the hands of the authorities of the United States in a way which would prevent him being permitted to enter the United States? I do not question the right of the United States to keep out anybody they want to keep out, but I should like assurance that they could not keep Canadians out on the basis of information obtained in that way.

Mr. Fulton: Nothing that the hon. gentleman thought was on his file was of a nature that would be communicated in the manner raised by the Leader of the Opposition. I was tempted to ask the hon. member for Timiskaming what commissioner it was, and what the details were that were given but I was afraid he might say that I was persecuting him or following up an unfair investigation. I should be very surprised indeed if any commissioner of the R.C.M.P. gave all the information with which the hon. gentleman has regaled the house. I just want to say that I do not for a moment intend to try to follow all the implications of what the hon. gentleman said because the very vehemence and absurdity gave their own answer. I do not, for a moment, accept the implication that a particular member of parliament is picked out, if any members of parliament are picked out, and investigated, whereas those favourable to the government or the official opposition are not. I have indicated in my statement to which I have already referred on July 8, 1958, page 2047, how these files are started. Files are started in that way only, whether the subject of the file is a member of parliament or not a member of parliament.

Mr. Winch: I am going to say a word about these files. I am going to challenge the Minister of Justice right now to tell the members of this house whether the R.C.M.P. do keep track of any members of parliament, in what they do and in what they say?

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry. I did not want to take the time of the committee, but apparently I shall have to read the answer I gave on an earlier occasion. The question was this:

> Does the R.C.M.P. maintain any files or dossiers on members of parliament? If so, upon which members of the present parliament are such files or dossiers maintained?

The answer is recorded on page 2047 of Hansard for July 8, 1958 as follows:

> All Royal Canadian Mounted Police files on individuals are confidential and many are secret. One of the primary duties of all those responsible for such files is to respect and preserve the confidential or secret nature of their contents.
> It will be appreciated also that a large number of such files are started by reports, statements or knowledge of activities coming to the attention of responsible members of the police which they are bound to investigate in the course of their duties. The follow-up on such reports in many cases reveals no necessity for further action, yet there is still a file. This means that many files will be in existence under the names of individuals against whom there is nothing of a substantial, let alone a criminal, nature.
> It will therefore be generally agreed that it would be grossly unfair to any such individual to have it revealed or even suspected that there exists a police file under his name, yet there may be many ways in which such a suspicion could be raised. One of the surest ways of laying the foundation for the raising of suspicion would be to isolate a group of individuals, such as members of parliament, start answering questions as to whether there are any files on any of them and then refuse—as would have to be done—to go any further when questioned as to the existence or non-existence of a file on a specific member or members of such group. But this is exactly the door which would be opened by an answer to this question.
> Not only would this lead to the possibility of prejudice to an innocent individual, but if there were in fact with respect to any one or more members of such group a file or files which contained information serious enough to warrant further investigation, the success of the investigation and possibly the security of the state, might be seriously prejudiced by giving any information whatsoever.
> It therefore follows that, both in order to protect innocent individuals on whom there may be files and to preserve the interests of the state, the answer must be that it is considered to be contrary to the public interest to give a specific answer to this question.

Mr. Winch: All I can say is this: I have no objection whatever, and you can produce my file any time you like. As a matter of fact, I should like to see exactly what is in it. But beyond that, I do want to say that, if you are continuing your investigation under your gestapo in the R.C.M.P.—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Winch: —I do not mean "your" in a personal sense because I have—

Mr. Fulton: On reflection I do not think the hon. member would want to apply that language to our present people. I do not think he would really want to use that word in respect to the force.

Mr. Winch: If you have in any police force of a nation a secret force investigating individuals at all times, including active, honest and true patriots in trade unions and in parliament, then I say that is a gestapo.

Mr. Johnson: Why don't you say N.K.V.D.?

Mr. Winch: However, if you do not like the word "gestapo" I will withdraw it and I will say that I object to the principle in a democracy of a secret force making secret investigations which cannot be known to the individual at any time and as a result of which he can be condemned and damned without himself knowing anything about it or being able to answer any of the charges.

What I rose to say was this, Mr. Chairman. As far as I am concerned, I appreciate the remarks of the Minister of Justice that he himself in no way questions my own democratic attitude, my own loyalty or my own patriotism. What I want to say is this. If the R.C.M.P. wants to carry on spending the taxpayers' money, it is going to be a waste of it because I never intend to change my loyalty and patriotism and I think the taxpayers' money can be better spent in other directions.

Mr. Peters: The minister wanted to know when this information became available to me. In 1947 or 1948 I attended Carleton college. At that time there was some question about the student group at Carleton making inquiries to join a student organization which I previously had known to be communist dominated coming out of a university in Montreal. Also there was a chap at college at the time who was known, certainly to one or two other members of the house here, or considered to be communist and who headed up the L.P.P. at the time. He produced the request in a meeting in which we were asked as students to join this organization. At that time I objected to joining the organization. I objected to joining the organization because I understood it was a front organization. One of the members here may remember this occasion as I believe he was there at the time.

The meeting finally broke up with the suggestion that I approach the R.C.M.P. and find out whether this was a communist front organization or whether it was not. Because of this, I went to the headquarters of the R.C.M.P. and asked the man at the desk whether that organization was a communist front organization. He immediately showed me in to see an officer who immediately, after I put the question, showed me in to the officer in charge and in about four jumps I was in Commissioner Wood's office. He at that time discussed the matter with me. He asked me a number of questions about it, why I assumed it was, and a number of other questions. Then he turned to a corporal and he said, "Would you go in and see if we have anything on this particular gentleman and also see if you have anything on Peters?" When he came back with the communist file it was a small thin one. When he came back with the one that was mine, it was quite a big one and he pointed out some of the things that were in this particular file at the time.

Mr. Howard: I should like to make one brief inquiry not on this particular theme that has been the subject of discussion here. I wonder whether the minister could tell us how many members of the force there are who are assigned to what I would classify as the narcotics detail or the one that deals specifically with tracing or looking after the flood of narcotics into the country and the apprehension of the people who are either in possession of or are trafficking in narcotics.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think it will take a minute or two to get that information. I wonder whether I could answer the question under item 364. I hope to have the information by that time. That is under land, air and training division, operation and maintenance. I shall try to have the information by the time that item is reached.

Mr. Howard: I should like to pursue the matter a bit beyond the actual statistical figure. Would I be able to discuss narcotics under item 364?

Mr. Fulton: Yes because it is under land and air operations that the narcotics squads of the C.I.B. operate.

Item agreed to.

Land, air and training divisions—

364. Operation and maintenance, $35,227,872.

Mr. Fulton: I have not the information yet. The reason we are a little bit slow in getting it is that the narcotic squad are parts of the criminal investigation branch and the general breakdown is C.I.B. in each division and subdivision but they are not broken down by narcotic squads. We would therefore have to isolate the men in the narcotic squad in each division. We are working on that now. Perhaps my hon. friend would like to make his general remarks and I will see whether I can get him the details.

Mr. Howard: Generally my remarks relate primarily to the question of where have we discovered that narcotics come from. From what country do they enter Canada or from what ports of entry is the concentration of the inflow of narcotics. What countries do they originate in generally speaking? Is there any close liaison between the narcotics division or branches in other countries of the world, specifically the United States because of its proximity or countries in which narcotics originate, in order to keep in touch at the international level with the channeling or distribution of narcotics from one country to another? Generally, how effective is this sort of watch?

Apparently with the continued increase in the number of people who are addicted or are becoming addicted to narcotics, it would seem to me that inasmuch as we do not—and this is only a belief of mine—grow and produce narcotics here in Canada—somebody may grow in his backyard a row of poppies but beyond that I do not think that Canada itself produces any narcotics—just how effective, if there is such a thing, is this international liaison with other countries. Do we exchange information with other countries, say particularly the United States because of its proximity and because of the easy manner in which people travel from one country to another? Do we exchange information with the United States narcotics officials about known addicts and traffickers here in Canada and do we receive from the United States or other countries dossiers or information about known narcotic addicts or traffickers or agents who are in those countries.

Mr. Fulton: I am informed that there are 68 members of the force on full time narcotic squad duties, mostly in Montreal and Vancouver and some in Toronto. In addition, of course, any member of the C.I.B. can be detailed specially to narcotic work at the time of any special investigation or round-up. With regard the country of origin of narcotics, they come mainly of course from countries of the Middle East and the Far East. I am told that the main port of entry into Canada is Montreal. The amount of actual entry through Vancouver, oddly enough, is comparatively small, although Vancouver is one of the main centres of narcotic activity in the sense of the presence of addicts. In view of the presence of addicts, I believe, it is what might be called an attractive place for pushers or peddlers, but it is not one of the main sources of entry for narcotics themselves into the country.

With regard to the exchange of information, we do exchange full information on narcotics with respect to known addicts and all other phases of anti-narcotic law enforcement with the United States and with all other countries who are members of an organization called Interpol, which is an international police organization. We have maintained the normal contacts with the United States through Interpol, and I am informed in addition we have a special continuing liaison with the United States on narcotic problems because of the proximity of our two countries.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, it is very kind of the minister to give that sort of information. I was a little surprised, pleasantly so. I would have thought the concentration of addicts in Vancouver may have been occasioned because Vancouver was the port of entry of narcotics; but I guess we can attach the reason for it to our balmy and well tempered weather out there.

The minister mentioned that the Middle East and Far East countries are the major sources of origin of narcotics for distribution to other parts of the world, and I wonder if he could indicate to what extent narcotics are supplied out of Hong Kong, and whether or not those which come from Hong Kong, say to Montreal in this case or to other parts of the world from that area, originate in the mainland of China? To what extent is China, as far as we know, participating in the growth and distribution of narcotics to the rest of the world?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am told we are not able to trace directly the narcotics coming into Canada to red China. It is believed that the majority of the supply coming into Canada comes in from countries in the Middle East. The raw material is grown in countries in the Middle East, processed in Italy and France, and comes into this country mainly via Montreal and New York.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I just want to ask the minister a brief question. It has appeared to me over the past few months that there seems to have been a great number of arrests and prosecutions in the city of Winnipeg with regard to possession and trafficking charges. I do not know the number but it appears to me there are more this year than last year. I have not got comparative figures so perhaps I am wrong and the minister can correct me. I would also like to know, if the minister has the figures there, whether or not there is any evidence or reason to believe that there is any greater trafficking or possession of narcotics in the city of Winnipeg than has been the case previously.

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman. I am told the activity in Winnipeg both with respect to the number of men working on anti-narcotic work and the number of prosecutions is about normal.

Item agreed to.

365. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $5,826,605.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I want to make a brief reference to the recent policy of the department in building R.C.M.P. headquarters and facilities in the smaller communities to a much greater extent than in years past. I must say I heartily approve of it because I think it makes for much better administration and provides better facilities for the members of the force who have to serve in the smaller communities sometimes with very poor and inadequate facilities. I presume the policy is now developed and more stable because of the continuing contracts with provincial governments for the services of the R.C.M.P. I am very pleased at the program of the department in undertaking the construction of these smaller buildings in the smaller communities at a time when it will provide employment instead of some measure of unemployment. I think it is very wise that planning is undertaken in that respect particularly in smaller communities where work possibly to some extent is more seasonal. I understand the department is planning to have construction undertaken where it will employ people who would otherwise be unemployed.

I understand the department is building several of these smaller buildings in the Switzerland of Canada, which is Kootenay West. I am very pleased to know that the one at Castlegar is about completed. There is a good deal of local interest in this question. I have received letters from organizations and individuals as to when construction will start, what is the type of building which will be built, and so on. Could the minister inform me when it is likely that construction will be commenced in the village of New Denver and in the Elysian village of Nakusp?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am grateful to my hon. friend for his interest in this matter and for his appreciation of the construction policy of the force. We are trying to work this out on a national basis, on the basis of a complete program, assigning to the various points where R.C.M. Police are stationed a priority with regard to their accommodation requirements. Then we can arrange to meet the requirements at a set annual rate, and by the time the program is finished we will have provided accommodation at every point, we hope, where it is needed. I make that general explanation because I want to explain why some places where police are stationed are not having buildings built this year whereas other places are. I know it does give rise to hard feelings as far as certain areas are concerned. They say that if such and such a place with perhaps a smaller population has a building built there, why cannot they have a building built where they have more people. The program of priorities being worked out is worked out having regard to all the factors properly to be taken into consideration, one of them being the state of the accommodation at each point, so that a point which has a reasonably adequate building now, although it may not be all that is desired, is likely not to be given as high a priority as an area where the building is pretty well totally inadequate.

With regard to specific points, at New Denver the site has been purchased and we will probably go ahead with preparing plans and specifications this year or early next year; but it is not intended to commence construction this year because the priority assigned to New Denver does not call for construction this year. As regards Nakusp, I believe tenders are out and construction is expected to be completed this year.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister tell me how many of these buildings are actually under construction in Newfoundland, or projected for this year, and where they are?

Mr. Fulton: With respect to Newfoundland, at Corner Brook we expect to go ahead this year with the construction of a sub-division administration building and a garage, $100,000 being provided for this in this year's estimates. Construction of detachment quarters is proceeding as follows: At Gander, now in progress and to be completed this year; at Port Saunders, now in progress and to be completed this year; Grand Banks, now completed; Channel, under construction but may not be completed this year.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why is the hon. minister discriminating against Bonavista-Twillingate?

Mr. Fulton: I have no knowledge of what constituencies these quarters are in. If there is no place in Bonavista-Twillingate selected for construction it is because in accordance with the program I have outlined, it does not rate the priorities necessary. It has just been pointed out to me that a new building was completed at Twillingate in 1953, and I hope that the rigours of the Newfoundland climate have not made a new one necessary yet.

Mr. Pickersgill: Buildings have been put up more recently than that. There was one at Glovertown more recently. In fact, the R.C.M.P. has done well in that part of the country.

Item agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: That completes the estimates of the Department of Justice.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

380. Departmental administration, including fees for membership in the international organizations listed in the details of the estimates, $2,636,084.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, on Friday last I tabled the Department of Trade and Commerce annual report for 1958. Copies of the report were at the same time made available to all members of both houses of parliament. The form of the department's annual report has been considerably altered this year. The usual factual account of the trade situation has been expanded and a new section "Trade Policy Developments" has been introduced. The discussion on administrative matters has been greatly reduced. The objective is to give hon. members a clearer and more comprehensive account of the department's activities and objectives. In these remarks I will bring the material in the 1958 annual report up to date. I will deal with the various subjects in the order in which they appear in the report.

I turn now to world trading conditions. Section A of the department's annual report indicates that world production and trade declined in 1958. There were, however, encouraging signs of general recovery by year-end. Since then, expansionary forces have broadened and gained further momentum.

In the United States, economic activity has been expanding steadily since the spring of 1958. Aggregate production in that country regained its previous maximum by the beginning of 1959 and has subsequently moved into new high ground. By May industrial production had increased 20 per cent from the recession low and was four per cent above the previous peak of early 1957.

Recovery in the United States has had a stimulating effect upon conditions in other parts of the world. A rising level of purchases by the United States in other countries has helped to stimulate physical activity, and has contributed to a further strengthening in the balance of payments and reserve positions of overseas areas. Sterling area reserves have continued to mount since the end of the year.

Recovery in other industrial countries has lagged behind that in North America. Nevertheless recessionary trends were checked during 1958, and there is now a clear indication of renewed expansion in the United Kingdom, West Germany and Western Europe generally, and also in Japan.

Meanwhile, the less developed areas of the world, though still handicapped by foreign exchange limitations, stand to benefit from the moderate improvement under way in world commodity markets and from greater availability of funds from international financial institutions and other sources. An increasing supply of foreign earnings and capital funds will permit more rapid development in these countries and this, in turn, will stimulate world production and trade.

In general, the international economic climate is better now than a year ago and is improving steadily. In Canada the pace of activity picked up sharply in the closing months of 1958. Previous peaks in aggregate production and employment were surpassed even sooner here than in the United States. This upward movement in general activity has continued in the current year. The improvement under way is forcibly illustrated in recent economic statistics. Figures on Canada's gross national product recently released by the dominion bureau of statistics show that the value of national output in the first quarter of 1959 increased by two per cent from the previous quarter and by six per cent from the corresponding quarter of 1958. Industrial production, which for the most of 1958 was below the level of the previous year, is, on the basis of the latest figures available, running nine per cent higher than a year ago. Total employment, which had remained fairly stable during 1958, showed a stronger trend than usual in the early months of the current year. In May, 100,000 more persons held jobs than in the same month last year, an increase of about two per cent. Unemployment has been declining and is now appreciably below the recession level.

Widespread increases in operating rates throughout Canadian industry have brought a simultaneous pick-up in both business and employee earnings. By the first quarter corporation profits had increased by one-fifth from the recession low and were already up to the maximum level reached in the previous boom. Labour income, which had declined briefly during the business slow-down, has moved sharply ahead since last fall and by March was seven per cent higher than in the same month last year. So far in 1959 returns to farmers have held to the sharply improved levels of the previous year.

These indicators of general activity reflect a substantial and continuing improvement in economic conditions in Canada. The current upswing to date has been relatively free of physical dislocation and strain and the general level of prices has remained steady.

A major stimulus underlying the current expansion has been a freer spending attitude on the part of the Canadian public. Consumer incomes had continued to rise even during the recession, and this upward movement has been reinforced by the recent upsurge in employee earnings. For a time spending lagged behind incomes. However, new consumer interest, particularly for automobiles and other durables, appeared in the closing months of 1958 and has been maintained throughout the early part of the present year. This pick-up in consumer spending appears to have been based, in large part, on cash sales. Increases in instalment credit have so far been quite moderate, indicating sustained strength in the financial position of the Canadian consumer.

Another important expansionary influence has been the change in business attitudes toward inventory holdings. Substantial liquidation of stocks in the early part of 1958, followed by a general strengthening in sales, has led to a renewed build-up of inventories. Since the beginning of 1959 this inventory accumulation has added materially to the flow of new orders.

Favourable market prospects both at home and abroad are also having their effect upon the capital investment climate. The year-end survey of investment intentions for 1959, which became available early in March, indicated a projected level of capital outlays, both private and public, amounting to $8.3

billion, slightly below the $8.4 billion expended in 1958. The customary mid-year review of spending plans is now under way. Although the final figures will not be available for another two weeks or so, the results to date indicate upward revisions in anticipated outlays sufficient to raise total projected spending for the year up to and probably a little above the actual outlays in 1958. This improvement is indicated despite the present decline in housing starts which had been indicated in the earlier estimates. Realization of these revised investment plans would entail a rising volume of work on construction projects and machinery and equipment orders during the balance of the year. In other words, aggregate demands arising from capital spending are likely to be another important expansive influence in the economy in the months ahead.

The favourable effects of the current strengthening in market conditions are already evident in most sectors of Canadian industry. Among the material-producing industries notable advances have been made; in primary iron and steel, where output is up 20 per cent so far this year; in lumber products and wood pulp, and in various chemical fields. The growth in automobile sales, while still favouring European-type cars, has nevertheless brought a nine per cent rise in domestic passenger car production in the year to date. The increase in output of commercial vehicles has been more pronounced at about thirty per cent. Home appliance trades have been unusually active with sales of larger items such as refrigerators and freezers, stoves and washing machines, up by substantial percentages. Clothing and textile industries, though slack in some areas, have been operating at considerably higher levels than last year. The present resurgence in industrial construction along with continuing growth in commercial and public building should mean another very active year for the construction industry and related trades despite the current fall-off in housing.

Competition from imports continues to cause difficulty for a number of Canadian industries. In addition to automobiles, clothing and textile trades, rubber footwear and some other sectors have experienced a diminution in their share of the domestic market. For a majority of lines, however, shipments from domestic sources have been rising more than imports during the initial phase of the current upswing.

In the trade field the department's annual report indicates that a high level of exports over the course of the 1957-58 recession was an important sustaining influence in the Canadian economy. This stability in total exports in the face of a general decline in world trade was a notable achievement, especially when considered in the light of Canada's dependence upon traditionally volatile world food and material markets. This achievement can be interpreted as a reflection of the diverse nature of Canada's trade and of the broadening out into new export fields, which has proceeded at an accelerated pace during the present decade. As a result of this diversification, declines in the sales of industrial materials were offset last year by increases in other items, including newly developed export lines such as uranium.

For the first five months of 1959 total sales abroad have held within three per cent of last year's high level. This slight decline in exports so far this year is not to be considered as indicative of an underlying weakness in Canada's export prospects. Quite the reverse would seem to be the case. Rising production in the United States and in other countries has yet to exert its major impact upon material requirements from Canada. Sales of certain items, such as lumber, chemical pulp and iron ore have strengthened materially. In the case of a number of other commodities, however, the initial increases in material requirements arising from the world upswing in production are being met through the utilization of idle capacity within consuming countries themselves. The current increase in aluminum consumption in the United States, for example, is being supplied from domestic sources, a development made possible by extensive additions to capacity within the last few years. A somewhat similar situation applies in the case of newsprint. As the current upswing broadens, greater reliance on Canadian sources of supply can be anticipated.

Meanwhile some of the special market situations which had contributed to the high volume of exports in 1958 have been changing. Wheat exports in the current crop year are a little below the unusually high sales of 1957-58 but are still at a good level; higher, in fact, than the average of the last five years. Following the completion last fall of deliveries of military aircraft under certain NATO contracts, exports in this category so far this year are down by $35 million, accounting for most of the decline in total exports. However, these figures do not tell the whole story. Large orders recently placed from the United States for Canadian transport aircraft will give an immediate lift to the industry even though this new business will not appear in trade figures until shipments are under way. The success achieved in this highly competitive field is further indication of the opportunities open to Canadian manufactured products in export markets.

Despite the somewhat mixed trends now evident among different categories of exports, underlying influences are encouraging. Rising production levels in the principal industrial nations should lead to a general upswing in world trade. While existing surpluses and restrictive measures affecting individual commodities may, for a time, limit the movement of certain goods, Canadian export industries generally are in a favourable position to benefit from further general strengthening in world markets.

Meanwhile steady expansion in the Canadian economy has resulted in increased imports which so far this year have been running eight per cent higher than a year ago. More imports, coupled with slightly less exports, have resulted in a deficit on merchandise trade larger than a year ago although still below that of 1957. This growth in the trade deficit is a natural consequence of Canada being in the forefront of the world economic advance and in these circumstances is not a reflection of weakness.

Looking at shifts in the geographic pattern of Canada's trade so far this year, it is noteworthy that sales to the United States have been increasing. On the other hand, the increase in Canada's imports has been shared by all major trading areas. This means that the regional balances in Canada's trade have continued to move in such a way as to benefit overseas trading areas.

This broad look at conditions in both foreign and domestic markets suggests generally bright prospects for the Canadian economy. As the year goes on the expansion in business activity now under way should be supplemented by strengthening demands from abroad and rising investment domestically. We have as yet to experience the full force of the current economic expansion.

I wish now to report on the main developments that have taken place since the beginning of the year in the field of commercial policy and in Canada's trade relations with other countries. As indicated in the annual report of the department the broad initiatives that were taken at the commonwealth trade and economic conference at Montreal, looking toward freer trade and payments, are being actively followed up in other international forums. Reference is made in the report to the decisions taken at the end of the year establishing the external convertibility of sterling and of other major trading currencies. These steps are of particular significance and create a new situation in world trade.

Canada, in concert with many other countries, is giving high priority to ensuring that the full logic of convertibility is translated as soon as possible into concrete trade results through the removal of discrimination and through further progress in the dismantling of import restrictions generally. There now exists a unique opportunity for the restoration of a truly multilateral system of trade and payments which would be of direct benefit to Canada and to the world trading community as a whole.

In reviewing our trade relations with commonwealth countries, the steps taken in recent months by the United Kingdom, Australia and other countries to dismantle import restrictions are of particular interest. We warmly welcome these measures. We have reason to expect that, in line with policy objectives pursued by the commonwealth, there will be further substantial progress made in this direction in the course of the year, and these moves will provide increased opportunities for Canadian exporters in commonwealth markets. The new trade agreement between Canada and Australia, which has been the subject of negotiations in recent months, should provide a framework for expanded trade between our two countries. Arrangements are now being made for the formal conclusion of this trade agreement and I hope soon to be in a position to report to the house on this matter. Preparations are now under way for a review of our trade relations with the West Indies Federation and it is our intention to proceed at the earliest opportunity with trade discussions looking toward further strengthening our traditionally close association with that area.

I turn now to the United States. The meetings of the joint Canada-United States cabinet committee on trade and economic affairs, which took place in January of this year, provided us with a valuable opportunity to review with our United States colleagues many matters of mutual concern and interest. I feel sure that as a result of these discussions closer understanding and good will have been developed between Canada and the United States. The subsequent decision of the United States to exempt Canadian oil from restrictions is a recognition of the importance of Canada's economic and industrial development to the well being and security of both our countries. No solution has, however, as yet been found for the problems created for Canada by the maintenance of United States restrictions on imports of lead and zinc. We continue to be seriously concerned about these restrictions, which place an unfair burden on Canadian producers. We have made our views on this matter perfectly clear to the United States on various occasions and have urged them to remove these unjustified restrictions.

The European common market is now in its first stage of development. In January of this year these six countries implemented the first steps in the reduction of tariff barriers and quantitative restrictions among themselves and some of these tariff cuts were extended to other members of the GATT, including Canada. The six common market countries are at present in the process of formulating their common agricultural policies and are also working out the level of the common external tariff which is to replace gradually the existing separate national tariffs. The development of this new economic entity in Europe is, of course, of major significance and importance to Canada and to all other trading countries.

Canada has already indicated its sympathy and appreciation for the broad economic and political objectives pursued by these countries. At the same time and bearing in mind the contractual obligations of the common market countries under GATT not to raise new barriers to trade, Canada and other countries are keeping the common market arrangements as they develop under careful review. Detailed discussions and consultations are actively being pursued within GATT to ensure that the views and interests of all trading countries are taken into account by the common market in the formulation of its policies. We will have an opportunity to make careful examination of the agricultural arrangements being developed by the six. In addition, arrangements have now been made within GATT for the negotiation of the levels of the common external tariff before it is put into effect.

We feel sure that the European common market, as one of the world's major trading groups, will wish to play a positive and constructive role in world trade, and will join with Canada and other countries in a common endeavour to expand world trade on a truly multilateral basis. As hon. members are aware, the distinguished presidents of the three agencies which administer the affairs of this new European community visited Ottawa recently and at that time we had a welcome opportunity to discuss these matters with them.

Apart from the common market itself, certain other countries in Europe, including the United Kingdom, are currently exploring the possibility of a free trade area among themselves, looking toward a broader association covering all of western Europe. These discussions are, of course, of great interest and significance for Canada. It is too early to be able to give any precise indication of their possible outcome, but I can assure the committee that we are following developments closely.

Through our participation in the general agreement on tariffs and trade we have now had an opportunity to review with other countries the full implications of the moves toward convertibility of currencies. At the meeting of the contracting parties in May of this year we were able to press home our case for the complete removal of discriminatory restrictions against Canadian goods and were encouraged by the response. There was general recognition by the contracting parties that, in accordance with the GATT provisions, there is no longer any financial justification for continued discrimination and we have a right to expect other countries now to implement their full GATT obligations toward Canada and take early steps in the removal of these controls.

Another major issue dealt with at this GATT meeting was the question of import restrictions maintained by Germany. We were successful in obtaining a firm undertaking from Germany to remove its import restrictions on a wide range of products, including certain basic materials of importance to Canadian trade. Germany was, however, unable at this time to undertake the removal of restrictions on a number of agricultural commodities. Arrangements have, however, been made under GATT which, while permitting Germany to maintain these controls subject to agreed conditions for a maximum period of three years, ensure that German policies in this regard will be brought under detailed and continuing scrutiny by GATT. This settlement, while not fully satisfactory, goes some way to resolving what has been a difficult issue in Germany's international trade relations.

At this May session of GATT we were happy to welcome the accession of Israel to GATT and the association of Yugoslavia with the work of the contracting parties. This will not only strengthen our own trade relations with Yugoslavia and the new state of Israel, but also provides evidence of a continuing and increasing interest among trading countries in this agreement.

We have continued to pay close attention to our trade relations with the countries of Latin America. A Canadian observer attended these recent meetings of the economic commission for Latin America, which were held in Panama. Canada also joined in the work of the coffee study group set up last year in Washington. This organization is of particular interest to a number of Latin American countries which depend on exports of coffee for a large proportion of their foreign exchange earnings. We also had an opportunity within GATT to consult and co-operate with representatives of Latin American countries on a range of problems including proposals to achieve an expansion of world trade in agricultural products. We have customarily bought close to twice as much as we sell in our trade with Latin American countries. Last year our export sales to the area declined in the face of import restrictions, which many of these countries were forced to impose as their exchange earnings declined in a period of world recession. Now that international economic conditions are improving we look forward to the removal of these restrictions and to a substantial improvement in our trade with this important group of countries.

In the Far East, markets for Canadian goods are important for such products as wheat, coarse grains and industrial materials. In this area Japan is by far the most important trading partner. Our exports to Japan and to most of the other Far Eastern countries declined during 1958, reflecting the effects of the world recession. The outlook this year, however, is for improved business projects in Japan and elsewhere in the region.

There has been very little change in the level or distribution of Canadian trade with Middle Eastern countries despite the political changes which occurred in that region. Traditionally, Canadian crude oil imports from the Middle East result in a trade surplus for that area with Canada. Middle Eastern prosperity stemming from oil production and exports is reflected in a demand for Canadian durable consumer goods, basic foods and industrial materials. Opportunities seem to be open for Canadians to develop this market. There has not been any change in the framework of our commercial relations with Middle East or Far East countries.

The department's annual report reviewed some of the more important developments in the field of international commodity conferences and agreements during 1958. Early this year an important lead and zinc conference was held under the auspices of the United Nations in New York. On May 18 I tabled the report of this conference and indicated that there is now some prospect that world production and consumption of lead and zinc will be brought closer into balance.

It is premature to suggest that our lead and zinc industries are out of difficulties. There is presently a substantial surplus of idle production capacity in various countries. Stocks are large. However, it seems that the corner may have been turned. There is a downward trend of producers' stocks in the United States apparent from the most recent figures. It is to be hoped that these developments will encourage the United States government and other governments similarly affected to resist pressure for increased protection for their domestic producers.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): I regret to inform the Minister of Trade and Commerce, but his time has expired.

Mr. McIlraith: Carry on.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Is it the wish of the committee that he continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Churchill: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. In April Canada ratified the international sugar agreement. A number of signatory countries have yet to complete ratification formalities and the deadline has consequently been extended until October of this year.

In the international tin council there have been some favourable developments of benefit to commonwealth and other producing countries. At the request of the council the U.S.S.R. has agreed to reduce its exports of tin to western countries during 1959. Russian exports have been depressing world market prices and this new development will have a stabilizing effect.

At its meeting in February the council was able to increase export quotas permitted under the agreement to producing countries. Canada and other countries participating in the agreement have removed import controls on tin imposed in 1958, also as a result of the understanding reached with the U.S.S.R.

Another important development in the international commodity field was the successful negotiation of a new wheat agreement which will run from August 1 of this year until July 31, 1962. There is now a resolution on the order paper for ratification of the new agreement and I expect to give the house a detailed statement when this item is called. For the present I will only point out that the new agreement has the full support of all farm organizations in western Canada and has been signed by all the nine exporting countries and by 26 importing countries. Under the new arrangements a larger proportion of the world trade in wheat will come under the agreement and new administrative facilities will be established for intergovernmental consultation on wheat production and marketing policies.

The administration of Canada's foreign aid programs is the responsibility of the department's economic and technical assistance branch, formerly the international economic and technical co-operation branch.

During the first six months of this year foreign aid programs have been expanded. Colombo plan funds have been increased from $35 million to $50 million and are earmarked primarily for capital aid to underdeveloped countries in southeast Asia. As in previous years a large proportion of the total funds has been set aside for aid to India and Pakistan for specific development projects, ranging from cobalt beam therapy installations to hydroelectric projects, and for commodities, such as wheat, nonferrous metals and fertilizers. This continues the pattern of last year and reflects the continuing urgent need for development in industry and agriculture in Pakistan and India.

The level of assistance to other Colombo plan countries is being generally maintained, and in the case of Malaya increased. The Mekong river development project, which will benefit Laos, Viet Nam, Cambodia and Thailand, is in an early stage of preparation, and over the next two years $1.3 million of our Colombo plan funds will be channelled into this undertaking. A further amount of approximately $200,000 will be spent in financing the Colombo plan medical book scheme, which will make available to individual universities in southeast Asia a supply of up to date medical texts and works of reference.

In the second year of the Canada-West Indies assistance program, $2.1 million have been allotted from the $10 million fund to be spent over the 5-year duration of this scheme. Much of this money will be used to pay for the initial stages of constructing the two ships which Canada will present to the West Indies Federation.

The Canada-Ghana assistance program is being expanded this year to include all commonwealth regions which have not until now benefited from Canadian bilateral aid; compared with last year's allocation of $135,000 an amount of $500,000 is required in 1959 to finance the larger scheme, which will be known as the commonwealth technical assistance program.

Our expanded foreign aid activities are also taking the form of increased technical assistance. Since January 1, 1959 we have sent five more technical experts to Colombo plan countries, and three new advisers to Ghana. Meanwhile 52 trainees have been brought to Canada for specialized technical instruction under bilateral aid programs. In the first five months of this year the cost of these endeavours amounted to over $232,000. Canada has also co-operated with such multilateral aid agencies as UNTAA and UNESCO by recruiting five technical experts for overseas service and providing facilities for a further 79 trainees.

Finally, an entirely novel aid program which was foreshadowed at last September's Montreal conference is taking shape largely on Canadian initiative. This is the commonwealth scholarship scheme. The objective here is to provide 1,000 scholarships to deserving students in the commonwealth. Canada has undertaken to provide for 250 of these scholarships at an annual cost of about $1 million. The scheme will be a major topic of discussion at next month's commonwealth education conference at Oxford, England, and will go into effect in the fall of 1960.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I should like to pay tribute to the Canadian business community. Our expanding trade and economic opportunities are not the result of physical resources alone. In the final analysis it is individual businessmen who translate ideas and opportunities into transactions and who take the risks and the consequences required under our free enterprise system. In an economy as heavily dependent on foreign trade as ours the high standard of living we enjoy is to a very great extent a measure of the enterprise and efficiency of Canadian businessmen.

Over the past year, I have met with hundreds of individual businessmen and have participated in many meetings of trade associations. My officials are constantly in touch with manufacturers and exporters. They visit businessmen in their plants; they participate in study groups and meetings organized by trade associations; they receive company officials in the department in Ottawa; and they provide a commercial intelligence service to businessmen which is unequalled by any other country. We value this regular contact highly. No new initiative is taken in the trade policy field, no new trade offices established or trade fair planned without consultation with our exporters.

It is, of course, not always possible to adopt all the suggestions we receive from industry. There are often conflicting interests within the business community itself or among the various sectors of the economy. On occasions we are asked to do things which do not fall within the jurisdiction of the federal government. The department, however, welcomes suggestions and representations from Canadian business and ensures that these views receive serious attention.

The two trade fairs sponsored by the department in the West Indies in January, February and March of this year are good examples of how this close liaison with exporters works to the advantage of our foreign trade. Officers of the department meet regularly with businessmen and trade associations interested in foreign trade fairs and when it became clear that the situation in the West Indies was favourable for the development of increased trade with Canada, arrangements were immediately put in hand in co-operation with all interested exporters to present Canadian trade shows in Kingston, Jamaica, and Port-of-Spain, Trinidad.

Ninety-three Canadian firms exhibited at Kingston and 118 at Port-of-Spain. Over 166,000 West Indians visited our pavilions to view Canadian goods and to meet Canadian exporters, bankers and provincial and federal trade officials. As a result, many thousands of dollars of new export business was developed and many new friends made for Canada in this rapidly emerging sister nation within the commonwealth.

These trade fairs in the West Indies were two of the 28 separate events the department had in hand this year. The business community is convinced that participation in trade fairs abroad will lead to the development of new markets and our program is being stepped up in response.

I have mentioned our trade fair program as one example of co-operation between the Department of Trade and Commerce and the business community which has contributed to the expansion of our trade. There are, of course, many other areas of the department's activity in which this co-operation is proving invaluable. Our trade commissioners abroad are providing exporters with a growing flow of information on commercial possibilities and they in turn receive each day suggestions from Canadian businessmen about new products for which markets may well be developed. Our trade negotiators consult with industry before every international conference. As a result, they proceed with a clear understanding of exporters' interests.

There is on the order paper, Mr. Chairman, a further example of co-operation and consultation between government and industry to be found in the bill to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act. Through the amendments that the government is proposing new credit facilities will be provided in order to enable Canadian exporters to compete on even terms with exporters from other countries when they are competitive in other respects. These amendments, if passed by parliament, will enable the Export Credit Insurance Corporation, when authorized by the governor in council, to provide direct guarantees to lenders on approved export transactions. The amendments will also authorize the corporation to buy, sell and make loans on guaranteed export paper. The government's proposal has the strong support of the business community. I cited that as an example of our interest in the attempts to expand the export trade of Canada.

I have now reached the conclusion of my remarks. It is impossible, without taking much more time, to cover all the activities of such a wide-ranging department as that of trade and commerce; but through the annual report which has been expanded this year I think hon. members will have an opportunity to see how extensive the work of this department is and to see its ramifications throughout the world. During the course of the discussion of the estimates we shall be able to assess the work of the department during the last year and consider the program for the coming year.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the committee has listened with interest, I know, to the comprehensive statement of the minister on this extremely important matter. As I rise to speak at this time I do not feel that I shall be able to cover on this occasion all the points he has raised or indeed all the points that I may wish to deal with. As I will not myself be able to be here at eight o'clock, I shall make some preliminary observations now and perhaps will have an opportunity later of contributing to the discussion. Particularly, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to repeat—and I am sure the committee does not wish to hear—observations from this side of the chamber on the general economic and trade picture of the country, a subject which was rather exhaustively covered by the budget debate. However, the minister has given an optimistic picture of the economic and trade situation. He has shown that the economy, during the year he covered in his statement, has given indications of strength, recovery and resilience and that there has been economic improvement both nationally and internationally. Certainly for Canada the two things go together.

Naturally we on this side of the chamber as Canadians welcome any indication of this strenghtening of the economic and trade situation in the country. We must welcome every move that is being made in that direction. As I have said, the minister has given an optimistic picture. It is an optimism which is based on the favourable evidence that he has been able to muster, a great deal of which appears in the annual report. He has mentioned how things like consumer spending and inventory accumulation held up and have made their contribution to that which he has called national expansion but which I think more realistically could be termed national recovery from recession. Expansion has not taken place but recovery has to some extent taken place. Of course, recovery is a necessary foundation, I admit, if expansion is to take place.

On the basis of the evidence that he has submitted the minister talks about national expansion and compares what he calls international expansion with what has happened in the years prior to 1958. He refers then to the world recession from which we are nationally recovering and expanding. In his statement he has made it quite clear that in this recovery which we must all hope will be the foundation for expansion, nevertheless our dependence on international developments is as great as it ever has been. We cannot escape that particular hostage which we in this country have given to fortune. In that dependence on international conditions it is clearer than ever that our economic and trade relationship with the United States plays a most vital part. If this country has ever been economically dependent on the United States and United States conditions—and of course it has always been dependent to some extent—I suggest that dependence now—and I think the figures will show this, notwithstanding the varied nature of our international trade—is perhaps greater than it has been at any other time.

I do not know how we will escape this. I am not asking at this stage whether it is desirable or not to escape it, but I know that the minister and his colleagues in former years pointed out in no uncertain terms and with great vehemence the danger to Canada because of this economic dependence. It was a danger to Canada's political and national development generally because of the undue importance of our commercial and trade relationships with one country, a country so close to us in every way as is the United States.

We now have all the detailed information concerning the Canadian balance of international payments for the first quarter of 1959, and the minister has made reference to it in his statement. That information reveals that while there are forces of recovery at work, as I have mentioned, there are also weak points in the economy. There are some dangers and difficulties ahead, and just as the minister has emphasized the bright side of the picture, it is our right and our duty to point out some of the difficulties and dangers which, if they are not met and dealt with in so far as any national government can do so, will impede and hinder these forces of recovery which are at work.

A dominion bureau of statistics publication of June 18, 1959, the Daily Bulletin of that date, gives some indication of the nature of these difficulties and dangers, and what I mean when I talk about the serious side of the economic situation. Here are some of the headlines from that particular bulletin for the first quarter of 1959. We had during that quarter a current deficit of $450 million in goods and services with other countries, compared with $282 million and $427 million, respectively, for the first quarters of 1958 and 1957. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, the current deficit is the highest in our history for this particular period of the year. I recall what my hon. friends opposite used to say about deficits of this kind and the threat that they involved to our economy and stability.

During this period there was a rise of nine per cent in the value of merchandise imports, to which the minister has given his own interpretation, which along with a slight drop, a very slight drop, in the export total had the effect of producing a trade deficit of $188 million in the first quarter of 1959, compared with $63 million deficit in 1958. It is just about three times the deficit for the same period last year. The deficit from non-merchandise transactions continued to rise and reached $262 million, compared with $219 million in 1958, $201 million in 1957, and $176 million in 1956.

The current account deficit with the United States—and we used to hear so much about the danger to this country from increasing deficits with the United States—rose from $320 million in 1958 to $428 million in 1959; but at the same time the surplus with the United Kingdom continued at about $12 million. This deficit was compensated, as indeed it had been compensated in the past when it occurred, by a net movement of foreign capital into Canada, the main supplier being the United States of America. We have been informed more than once in the past of the difficulties which involve our country in this type of influx of capital to such a great extent from one source, the United States of America.

Mr. Chairman, last year I recall the minister making quite a virtue out of the fact that the deficit with the United States had been reduced. We pointed out to the minister at that time that indeed that was the case, but it was the case because the imports had gone down faster than the exports, and that was not the right way to reduce a deficit. Nevertheless the minister felt that was an encouraging feature in the situation, the reduction of the deficit. This year the minister admits, of course, that the deficit with the United States has increased, but he gets a different kind of encouragement out of that. The minister says that it is due to the fact that business expansion has developed and we are importing more than we used to from the United States, and if the deficit has increased it is encouraging because of the nature of the increase. In other words, it is impossible to make the minister anything but optimistic with regard to trade figures. If the deficit is reduced it is a virtue; if it is increased it is a virtue.

Here is another bureau of statistics Daily Bulletin, dated June 23 which gives detailed information on imports during the first quarter of 1959 and which has a bearing on some of these developments which I have mentioned. Let us see what these figures show. The United States and the United Kingdom were the respective sources of 71.8 per cent and 8.8 per cent of Canadian imports during that first quarter. There is certainly no indication of any trade diversion in those figures. In relation to that famous diversion proposal or policy about which we used to hear so much, but not so much now, it is interesting to note the following changes in our import trade in 1959 as compared with 1958.

The minister said a few minutes ago, if I recollect it correctly, that the increase in our imports was spread over the whole field of foreign trade. But the figures in the report to which I am referring do not indicate that, because imports from the United States during this period rose by almost four per cent while imports from the United Kingdom—and remember it was the policy of the government to divert imports from the United States to the United Kingdom—during this same period declined by about six per cent. Therefore it does not seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that this policy of trade diversion is working out very successfully. As I have already said in the house, it seems to me to be working in reverse.

I wonder what there is to show for this trade mission of a year and a half ago to the United Kingdom. What is there to show for this pilgrimage to the United Kingdom which was conducted with so much publicity and great expense, the purpose of which was to increase British exports to Canada, or to increase our imports from the United Kingdom, and reduce them from the United States? It is true that imports from the commonwealth exclusive of the United Kingdom did rise by about five per cent. It is also true that our imports from Europe rose by more than 22 per cent, and from Latin America by three per cent. But the real diversion has not been the diversion we heard so much about a year and a half ago or so; it has been the opposite to that. We are importing less from the United Kingdom and more from the United States.

Let us look at the figures for exports about which the hon. gentleman had something to say. The same dominion bureau of statistics bulletin published on June 19 contains information on our export trade in May and for the first five months of 1959. The minister maintained that our export trade in a period of what he called world recession had held up remarkably well in 1958. That is true in the sense that the figures were just about the same. There was a very slight decrease, but the figures were just about the same as they were a year before. But that is not good enough for a country such as Canada which depends so much on the export trade. Exports must increase every year or we are going to be in trouble in this country, and the nature of our export trade in 1958 shows that we would have been in serious trouble at that time had it not been for three things. The development of our uranium exports under an agreement concluded in 1956 to the point where uranium is now our most important mineral export figures for which this year may reach $300 million, was one thing that held our exports up. Exports of cattle were something else, and our exports of aircraft under NATO arrangements and under the Colombo plan, which were not strictly speaking exports but were gifts or transfers, also helped. Had it not been for these particular items we would have been in a serious situation last year with regard to exports.

In comparison with last year, when there was no increase over 1957, our exports in May were down by more than 10 per cent and they declined by about 3 per cent in the first five months. This is partly explained, as I think the minister mentioned, by the fact that last year there were exceptionally large deliveries of aircraft to Germany and a rather high volume of financed exports but, nevertheless, it represents a situation which must cause a certain anxiety, whatever the reason may be.

Both in May and during the first five months our exports to the United States increased, but our exports to the rest of the world, including the United Kingdom, declined. As a result, in the first five months of 1958, 58.1 per cent of our exports went to the United States as compared to 62.5 per cent in 1959. Our eggs are more and more concentrated in only one basket, this United States basket, and the danger of this kind of concentration should be very apparent to members of the government who talked so much about it when they were on this side of the house.

These statistics which I have quoted—and they are the latest available—show that we are now experiencing the highest deficit in goods and services with other countries in our history, and that our export trade on the basis of the first five months is declining. We join the minister in the hope that that decline will be arrested during the rest of the year, but at the present time we are faced with this decline and we are becoming more and more dependent on the United States with respect to our trade arrangements. Our imports are rapidly increasing and that increase comes from all countries in the world except the United Kingdom, but again mainly from the United States. Our net imports of capital are also increasing, and I suggest the committee will want to give serious attention to the policy implications of this particular picture, and we shall want to hear more from the minister as this discussion goes on about the trade policy of the government in this respect.

Perhaps at this time I might mention one thing which, as the minister knows, is a matter of immediate and great importance, and I have asked him a good many questions about it in the house. In the light of these decreasing figures for exports it becomes all the more important—indeed, it becomes a matter of the most vital significance—to make the necessary arrangements with the United States government to continue its imports of uranium from Canada once the present treaty arrangement lapses. The minister has been to Washington to discuss this matter with the United States government. He spent a day there a couple of months ago, I think, but I suggest to him that the importance of this matter justifies the most formal and the most impressive representations that can be made to the United States government at the highest possible level.

I am very familiar with the background of this particular arrangement because I had something to do with its negotiation, and I remember that at that time the United States said: "Go ahead and develop every pound of uranium you have in Canada; it is vital to our security and to the security of the free world and to your own security; commercial considerations must take second place; we need this; the supply is not equal to our demand; this is a matter of first importance, to develop these fields in Canada; we will help you; we will make this contract with you; we will do anything necessary; we will see that you get a good price for it, so go ahead."

Canadian producers went ahead and made a very good arrangement for the longest term possible, namely five years, with an option to continue this contract at the end of the five-year period. If it should happen—and I certainly hope it does not happen; it seems to me there is no reason why it should happen—at the end of this period that the United States authorities should come along and say: now we have a lot of uranium of our own—and they have got a lot of uranium—we have developed our own fields during these five years; we have our own political problems and we have our own economic problems; we have had to take care of our own interests and our own producers; and while we have been very happy to have your uranium during the past five years we do not need it now, it would be an intolerable position and one that could not be accepted by any Canadian government.

Yet the time is coming when the Canadian producers will have to know whether in fact arrangements of this kind can be made to continue the conditions under which they are operating and I think it would be a great relief to them if they could be told before the end of this year. There have been suggestions made in the United States by officials—and I hope they are not well founded—that it may be difficult to continue the present arrangement with Canadian producers. I hope that not only will the government give this matter the attention it deserves on the highest diplomatic level but that before long it will be able to make an announcement that a specific arrangement has been made with the United States. If continental defence means anything at all—and, of course, it does mean something—it means that some consideration has to be given to the economic and industrial aspects of defence on a continental basis as well as to the strategic aspect and if there was ever an important economic and industrial aspect of defence it is the supply of uranium for defence purposes.

There is no doubt in my mind that the long term prospects for uranium production in Canada are good, and I think this will be the view of all hon. members. The world is going to need this commodity. But there may be a difficult period between the end of this contract and the development of new uses for uranium for industrial purposes, a period which would be very difficult indeed if the United States decided not to take into full consideration the position of Canadian producers. I sincerely hope that this will not happen and I certainly hope it will be a major policy of the government to see that it does not happen because it involves export trade this year, as I have said, of some $300 million.

It is not possible, Mr. Chairman, to talk about the importance of our export trade in any of its aspects without at the same time referring to our import policies because we are not going to be able to develop our export trade unless we can make satisfactory arrangements with our customers for a reasonable import of goods from those countries into Canada. I thought of this the other day when the Minister of Finance made an announcement regarding a voluntary arrangement which had been made with the Japanese government for the reduction of certain imports into this country from Japan. I certainly appreciate the problem involved in the importing into this country of goods with which it is difficult, if not impossible, for Canadian producers to compete because of the conditions under which these goods are manufactured in the country of origin. When competition is not fair, then, of course, the government has to take steps to meet unfairness of competition and protect and help Canadian producers.

But I should like to point out that we shall have to be especially careful in the steps we take in respect of a customer which already buys three or four times as much from Canada as it sells to Canada. I do not have the exact figures but I think it is about that proportion. I am talking about Japan now. The Toronto Globe and Mail will not be accused of being a paper which is unfair to our manufacturers or unduly starry-eyed about free trade, and in the issue of June 22 it had this to say in an editorial:

> Considering the fact that Japan buys far more from Canada than it sells to Canada, the Japanese government is most obliging when it agrees, at the Canadian government's request, to curtail Japanese exports to Canada.

The editorial goes on to say:

> The steps taken to restrict imports will undoubtedly help those industries which have been hurt by them, and in that respect the government's policy will reach its goal. But it is a very limited role, and one which in being achieved may do considerably more harm than good. There is much more to this question than mere protectionism.

The final paragraph reads in part as follows:

> We are more concerned, apparently, with the effect on our domestic producers of imported Japanese underwear than with the catastrophe looming over the Pacific horizon.

What was meant by that, and it is a very good illustration of the interrelation of politics and economics, was that if Japan is driven from or discouraged from entering the markets of the west she will find her own markets on the continent of China because there will be no alternative, and if Japan begins to build up a trading relationship with continental China because she is denied it by the west that relationship may have political results which would be very unfortunate indeed for the west.

The minister had something to say about the development of the European common market, the development toward European integration. I was glad he spoke about this because I do not know of anything more important that has taken place in the economic and, indeed, perhaps almost in the political sphere at the present time. It is true that in the last dozen years we in this country and other free governments have worked out our multilateral trading relationships quite satisfactorily and on the whole successfully through GATT, and I think GATT has performed a most useful function in those years in the removal of restrictions and the building up of multilateral relationships.

But while GATT in recent years has been retained as a general framework, the conditions under which GATT was formed in the earlier years are changing and I think it is becoming more and more apparent now that perhaps a new look will have to be taken at this whole idea of international trade and the basis on which it should rest. The practical operation of GATT has become increasingly altered by the domestic policies of many countries and many of those countries who are members of GATT and who pay lip service to its arrangements are beginning—some of them have more than begun—to base their trading policies on more restrictive arrangements than those of GATT.

The sterling area has been maintained as an important trading group. The United States continues to be a vast and relatively isolated trading area. The Sino-soviet bloc is rapidly expanding as a trading area and the European common market, which was not considered when GATT was formed, is becoming a reality, a reality which I think on more than economic grounds we should welcome provided it is brought about in the right way.

Then, only recently the Latin American countries have initiated discussions about the possibility of forming some kind of economic union of Latin America, and world trade therefore is increasingly becoming dominated by economic giants and economic trading blocs. In the intermediate period at least we may expect a further extension of extranational systems of pooled currencies, customs unions and large scale bilateralism and perhaps even a more limited application rather than a wider application of the multilateralism as envisaged in GATT.

No country stands to be affected more by this development than Canada. It is still, of course, too early to say what will happen to world trade within this new context and to those countries like Canada whose prosperity, whose independence, whose economic stability, depend to such a large extent on an expanding multilateralism. This contrary evolution presents serious potential dangers which should be considered most carefully by any Canadian government.

For instance, the establishment of a common market in Europe, to which the minister has made reference, will undoubtedly produce benefits both economic and political, I hope, but it may also bring new difficulties for world trade and even for the maintenance of the western alliance. What I mean when I say that is simply this. If this European movement takes place without some kind of association with North America we will have an economic trading area in Europe increasingly divorced from a North American trading area, let us say at present from the United States. If that happens the effect will be political as well as economic on the Atlantic alliance, and if we do have this kind of European development which has not been able to make arrangements with the United States, what is the position of Canada going to be at a time when the continental aspects of security are also becoming increasingly important in the United States as opposed to the Atlantic aspects? If somehow the European development cannot become an Atlantic development, and I have said this many times, Canada will probably have to make one of the most difficult choices in her history and, as I ventured to say this morning, not only is this important for Canada politically but it is going to be very important for Canada economically because this new European development promises to become one of the major trading areas in the world. It is already increasing its percentage of world trade while North America's percentage is going down.

Because of the memories, experience, devastation, destruction, poverty and distress after the war, we are accustomed to think of Europe as still being a kind of distressed area. Perhaps that is too complacent a view, as the figures which I put on the record this morning would seem to indicate. Therefore I suggest that there can be no more important aspect of trade policy at the present time than the conversion of the European free trade area into an Atlantic freer trade area. The common market has begun to work out its own difficulties but the European free trade area, which it was hoped would evolve from the common market, is not making very much progress.

But, as the minister pointed out in his statement, those countries which are now in Europe outside the common market are beginning to consider forming another European common market. In the discussions which have just been held in the last few weeks—I think they were held in Stockholm—there was a good deal of support given to the idea of building up this other European area, which would include the United Kingdom if the present common market could not be expanded into a free trade area. If this is done, what will be the relationship of the United Kingdom in that market to her commonwealth trading relationships?

Perhaps the minister has noticed this, as I have, in reading British weeklies such as the Economist and the Times. High officials of the British government are now willing to consider the position of the United Kingdom in that kind of European organization and the relationship of that position to their commonwealth trading obligations. Therefore, this is a matter not only of economics but of very considerable political importance. Also, Mr. Chairman, if this European movement is developed, and if it develops in the right way through the removal of trade barriers against those outside the arrangement, then surely it is not too soon for the Canadian government perhaps to take the lead in trying to work out arrangement by which the United States and Canada can be associated with these developments.

You have the European common market. They are now discussing over there a second common market which might join the other into a European free trade area. The time has come to try to expand the discussion at least of these arrangements to an Atlantic basis. And if, as we are so often told these days, the real problem ahead of us in our relations with the countries behind the iron curtain, the Sino-soviet bloc, is going to be more economic than political, if the danger to us is economic as much as it is political, then on political as well as on economic grounds it becomes a matter of the first importance to build up the European into the Atlantic area.

There are some other things I should like to talk about arising out of the minister's statement, but perhaps, since it is almost six o'clock, I will reserve my observations on this until a later stage in the debate.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall we call it six o'clock?

Mr. Pearson: No.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, there is an unfortunate circumstance in connection with the discussion of these estimates that perhaps is just one of those things that nothing can be done about at this stage and it is this. The committee concerned with the operations of the wheat board and the board of grain commissioners reports is sitting at the same time as the committee of the whole house is discussing these estimates. It means a duplication of demands on the same members who are interested in being in both places at the same time. I would hope that another year it will be possible to arrange the programming of the committee's sittings and of the sittings of the committee of the whole house on the estimates a little more conveniently so that that can be avoided. I know the difficulties this particular year in detailing the arrangements and I am therefore not objecting to the agriculture committee sitting today while these estimates are before the house.

There are many general remarks which could be made because the subject of trade is so wide ranging and perhaps if I sought to deal with one or two of the matters of policy on which we are seeking to get clarification at this stage of the estimates that is on the first item of the department's estimates, it would be a more orderly way of proceeding.

I should like to raise for further discussion from the minister the subject of trade with the West Indies; that is, something fuller by way of report as to what progress has been made in the development of the trade relationship with the West Indies area since the estimates were before the committee one year ago. In particular, I should like the minister to elaborate on our relative position in that market. I fear that in the development of the federation and the economic development going on in that area, which we hope will continue and accelerate, Canada may be in danger of not holding its relative position and developing the potential of trade in that area to its maximum possibilities.

The trade in that area is particularly important to Canada to a degree more than is indicated in terms of dollars because of the nature of the products which we exchange; that is the products we import from that country seem to supplement the products we produce here to a greater degree than is true of most of the trading areas.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, another reason why the trade with the West Indies has extraordinary significance for Canada beyond the number of dollars indicated in the figures, important as that aspect of it is, is that the products the West Indies take from Canada come largely from the Atlantic region where the problem of finding markets for their output is undoubtedly more severe than in many other parts of the country. This trade, therefore, has abnormal significance to that area.

There is a great deal of capital development going on in the West Indies and I have the impression—I should like the minister to comment on this—that the capital development going on as a result of enterprise supplied from outside the area is not being contributed to by Canada to as large an extent as we would wish. I believe that some of our competitors in that market may be supplying a larger porportion of the capital development than their trade with the area would warrant. If we are not supplying our proportionate part, this would ultimately tend to result in a lessening of our trade with the area, that is a lessening of our proportion of the trade with the area.

I dealt with this subject at some length a year ago on a private member's motion which I put on the order paper. At that time I indicated my criticism of the government for having disposed of the Canadian National steamships and, in that way, having impaired shipping to the area at a time when the federation was just in the process of being formed. I thought that was a wrong action for the government to have taken, although I was quite willing to concede that there was some difficulty in carrying on that shipping and that a subsidy was required. I then went on to deal with trade agreements and tariff matters. I fear that the tariff aspect of that discussion became overdeveloped because tariffs are not the main barriers to trade with the area. The tariffs are relatively low. The difficulties seem to arise from other sources, one of them of course being that the federated area has no customs union within itself. There are different duties applicable to each part. In addition, they do not have control of their own currency and this makes things more difficult.

I should like to hear the minister's report on any discussions he has had with the United Kingdom on the subject of trade with the West Indies, and particularly the currency aspect of the matter. When one considers what a tremendous achievement the development of Canada's own currency was some 100 years ago one can fully appreciate that it is a somewhat restricting force when an area like the West Indies does not have control over its own currency. I do not want to discuss matters that are internal to that area and are not our concern here, but I do hope that the area is able to solve these problems that are peculiarly within its own control or should be within its own control in a way that will help them develop their economy. I hope when that comes along we will be able to develop our trade with the area to our mutual advantage. I am one of those who attaches a great deal of importance to the control of the currency in the area so far as it affects our trading relations. I would hope that the minister would take every proper opportunity he can to discuss this aspect of trade relations, particularly with the United Kingdom government, to the end that we can enlarge the volume of trade in that part of the world.

Another matter with which I wanted to deal at this stage of the estimates is our trade with Japan. The trade figures, as I have them here, show the imports from Japan in 1957 at $61,604,000 and the exports from Canada to Japan in that year at $139,151,000; in 1958, imports from Japan, $70,215,000; exports to Japan, $104,890,000; for the first three months of the current year imports from Japan amounted to $21,468,000 and exports for that period amounted to $27,175,000. It is interesting that the main export seems to be barley, as I recall. I believe in the year 1958 the barley exports to Japan amounted to something of the order of $62 million in value, a very large part of the total exports. I should think that the members from western Canada would be particularly interested in this particular trade with Japan.

The Minister of Finance made an announcement to the house on June 19 concerning the suspension of certain exports from Japan to Canada. His statement is found at page 4927 of Hansard of that date. I shall not read it, but there is a sentence or two which might help me make my point. The minister was referring to the representations made to the Canadian government by certain manufacturers in Canada on the subject of the damage being done to their industries by imports from Japan. I am very well aware of that and I do not wish anything in my remarks to underestimate the importance of looking after that matter.

The point I want to discuss is that the minister went on then to say that the Canadian government, following these representations from the Canadian manufacturers, had made representations to the Japanese government. I will quote him precisely as follows:

> Accordingly discussions were undertaken with the representatives of the Japanese government in Ottawa and Tokyo, in the course of which the views of the Canadian government were communicated to them. Within recent days I have held discussions with the Japanese ambassador which gave me the opportunity to state the Canadian position. This meeting was followed up by meetings between senior officials of the Canadian government and representatives of the Japanese government.
> We were informed only last night of the decision of the Japanese government respecting the suspension of the issuance of new export licences.

Then he goes on from there. What concerns me is this. The figures of trade with that area, and particularly our exports to Japan, show that the exports are very much larger than our imports from Japan. There is a very substantial imbalance of trade between our country and Japan. They show further that our exports to Japan decreased sharply from 1957 when they were some $139 million in value to 1958 when they dropped to $104 million in value. The first thing I should like the minister to do is to explain that drop in our exports to Japan. I suspect that one of the factors—and I think he will agree with this statement—was the shortage of dollars that the Japanese had with which to buy our goods. That factor poses a real problem because, as our western friends will be very quick to remind us, it is extremely important that we retain that market for the export of the many products we ship there. I took barley by way of illustration for Japan is much our biggest market for barley. I should therefore like the minister to deal with that problem.

Then I want the minister to deal more fully with the whole subject. The Minister of Finance, in making the announcement to the house, very appropriately confined himself to a statement of the bare facts but I should like the minister to elaborate on this somewhat difficult subject very fully so that we will know what the policy of the government is with respect to the trade in this particular area.

I have spoken only of the trade significance of it. My leader this afternoon, in speaking about this same subject, made reference to other aspects of the matter that are of tremendous importance to the welfare of this country and to our future in this country, aspects that are even more important than the trade aspect. However, I want to confine my remarks at the moment to the trade aspect.

This statement of the Minister of Finance is fairly factual and fairly blunt, if I may say so. I should like to know from the minister just what representations were made to the Japanese government. This statement, as it stands in Hansard, almost looks as though fairly firm pressure was applied or fairly firm representations were made as to what would be done. My point in raising that matter is this. I hope that we are not embarking on any program of undue force or improper force, if I may use that term, in our position in these matters. While I believe in great firmness, I do not believe in threats of any kind or anything of that nature. I am not saying that the statement of the Minister of Finance contained that implication but I am saying that the subject requires further elaboration and development.

Then the matter of the treaty with Japan, the rights we have under the treaty and so on, should be developed. There is, of course, the whole aspect of the matter of protecting our industries in Canada that may be unduly hurt by products coming in that are priced below what is a fair and reasonable price and so on. I am not unmindful of that problem in discussing the trade aspect of the matter but it is a very severe thing to have exports to one country drop by a third in one year. There probably is some explanation for this but as the figures stand, that is what they show. It is something that I hope the government will keep in mind and that I hope the minister will deal with at some length.

Then there is one other matter with which I should like to deal. The minister this afternoon in his statement, as I recall it, in speaking about the expansion of the economy, of the increase in imports this current year, about exports and the deficit on merchant trade being wider than it was last year as I noted his remarks, said this among other things:

> Looking at shifts in the geographic pattern of Canada's trade so far this year, it is noteworthy that sales to the United States have been increasing. On the other hand, the increase in Canada's imports has been shared by all major trading areas.

What I should like him to clarify a bit for me is this. The figures of sales to the United States, as I have them, show that there was a decline of some $425 million in exports to that country last year and that exports to that country are up some $30 million in the first four months of this current year but that in the first three months of the current year they were down. I think the figures support this statement. I have the statistical summaries here if the minister wants them but I think they support that statement. The May figure is not distributed yet, but from what the minister says I assume it may also be up. The point I want to make on that matter is this. If the minister is taking a one-month period only as the factor to indicate a change in direction or trend, his statement is surely straining the desire to be optimistic a bit too far. If you have three months in which there is a decline in the trade and then in the fourth month you have an increase, surely it is hardly a fair way in which to leave the matter just to say that sales to the United States have been increasing. It is true as far as it goes if you take last month as an example, but surely that is not a fair way of presenting trade figures to the house. I for one certainly do not want to read into any such short term figures as that a long term trend. I think it is just not a realistic way in which to handle this subject, because exports can vary quite sharply from month to month as the minister well knows. If you pick out any one month, I suppose you could prove almost anything from the statistics. I wish the minister would elaborate a bit more on that point. Then in the next sentence he went on to say this:

> On the other hand, the increase in Canada's imports has been shared by all major trading areas.

I have the figures for the imports from the United Kingdom, a very important customer indeed. As I read the figures for 1957 our imports for consumption from the United Kingdom amounted to $521,957,000 and for 1958, $526,650,000 or in other words an increase in imports from the United Kingdom of $5 million in the year 1958 over the year 1957. But when I come to the year 1959 I find that the imports from the United Kingdom for the first three months of 1958 had been some $116,170,000 in value and for the first three months of 1959, some $108,872,000. In other words, there is a decline in imports in the first quarter of this year over the comparable period for last year of some $7.4 million or something of that order. On the other hand, the statement that the increase in Canada's imports has been shared by all major trading areas seems to require some further explanation, because the United Kingdom is a very important trading area and it is not sufficient to have a generalization like that when we remember that one of the problems in trade with the United Kingdom is that we have a substantial surplus of exports over imports from that country. In addition, and I think this is fair comment, the minister and his colleagues made a great deal of how they were going to lessen that differential in trade with the United Kingdom; they talked a great deal about that. They were going to divert some of the imports from the United States to the United Kingdom, and so on. But that problem has not been met, and indeed any figures available, for example the figures used some months ago when the government talked about how they had succeeded in effecting that situation, when analysed show that what happened was a lessening of the differential in trade by reduced exports from Canada to the United Kingdom. Therefore I would like to have that item explained a little more fully.

Then there is a further matter I would like to speak about, and that is the whole problem of the export of farm surpluses as it relates to trade. In other words, I am not seeking to reopen the discussion we had with the Minister of Agriculture about farm incomes and that sort of thing. What I want to deal with tonight are the implications of that policy carried out by the government of disposing of farm surpluses at considerably below their cost; the taxpayers buy them from the farmers and then they are sold in the export market at a very much lower price. It will be recalled that on March 6 of this year, as appears at page 1720 of Hansard, I asked a question about the sale of eggs to Venezuela by the Canadian government since December 1, 1958, their price, and so on. The answer I received, which I can summarize, shows that the Canadian government was adopting a policy of buying eggs at 44 cents per dozen, grade A large, Montreal, and had sold these eggs, in this particular case to Venezuela, at from 5 cents to 16 cents per dozen below that price, and there may have been additional costs involved too. That will indicate—

Mr. Smallwood: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. McIlraith: Yes.

Mr. Smallwood: Has the hon. member any proof that they were grade A eggs which were being sold?

Mr. McIlraith: I only have the statement of the Minister of Agriculture. He stated that was the basis of the price paid, and I would not want to quarrel with the word of the Minister of Agriculture on this occasion. I certainly do not think it would be fitting for me to do so; the hon. member may do so if he wishes.

Then on April 13 I asked a further question on this same subject, which appears at page 2652 of Hansard. The question concerned certain agricultural products being purchased by the government and sold abroad. I will just pick out one or two of the items to illustrate my point. We were buying powdered skim milk at a price up to May 1, 1958—perhaps I should give the figures for the whole period—of from 12 cents to 17 cents per pound and we were selling that product to a great number of countries at as low as 3.15 cents per pound; in other words, something of the order of a quarter of the price we paid for it. That sale was presumably on a feed basis, though the answer does not say so in so many words. However, the point I want to make here is this, that we have embarked upon a policy of using the public revenues of this country to buy these farm products and then to sell them on the foreign markets at very much below the cost to the taxpayers.

Mr. Chairman, there are two or three implications of that, and I can find no statement of policy from the government on the trade aspects of the subject. It must be pointed out that in shipping products like this to countries like Denmark, we are in fact subsidizing competitors in certain of the other markets of the world to the detriment of our own product. We have lost some of the markets in the United Kingdom for agricultural products because our prices are already too high. But the government is now subsidizing a competitor who has taken over most of the market, or a large part of it to compete against our product, our product being, as I say, already too highly priced. It seems to me that is not a reasonable way of meeting the difficulty which we have in Canada of keeping the farmers' incomes sufficiently high. This so-called solution is not a solution at all.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry; I must inform the hon. member his time has expired.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, we have been reminded that Canada is dependent on foreign trade to perhaps a greater degree than any other nation. I have seen figures which state that one job out of every five is dependent on foreign trade. As far as British Columbia is concerned, I believe the figure would be one out of four, and this figure would be higher for the prairie provinces. So the economy of western Canada is even more dependent upon export trade than that of eastern Canada.

We are particularly interested in promoting an increased trade with the United Kingdom, because the products of western Canada are more or less complementary to products produced in the United States. The United States market represents a large and most important market to us but it represents products which the United States domestic producer can also produce and with whom we must compete to sell in that market. The sterling area, however, represents not a limitless market but a market which could be developed to a far higher degree than it is today if our trade pattern could be so increased or if our trade volume between the sterling area and Canada could be increased so that we could take advantage of that market.

The British Columbia lumber manufacturers association, the British Columbia fisheries council—all our primary producers—have made numerous representations along these lines. We believe more could be done in that way to promote the sale of United Kingdom products in Canada. For instance, I happen to know that in the engineering field a British manufacturer who wishes to enter this market is told that service must be of such and such a standard, that his design must be in conformity with the United States standards in the form of screw threads, pipe sizes and so on and that there must be good delivery. I should like the committee to know that many a United Kingdom manufacturer has come over to this country and been able to fulfil all those requirements yet he still does not get any business even with a low price because our technical people know the United States product and they do not know the United Kingdom product.

It will be said that this is a matter of salesmanship, and it is, but even after the manufacturer has gone to a lot of expense and trouble he is still in an inferior position vis-à-vis his United States competition because they are entrenched in the market, their product has been accepted and there is a bias toward that product in many cases because of the control of the company and the policy of that particular company. I know of many instances where equivalent United Kingdom producers were low bidders but because instructions had been received by the firm concerned that they were not to buy that equipment, the bid was not accepted. I think the same process takes place, though not as a result of instructions, with regard to government purchases because I know of examples where, because the engineers in the field were familiar with the United States product, that product has been supplied for some reason or another in place of a competing United Kingdom product even though the United Kingdom product has been acceptable and in use in this country for a good many years. So I say that a program of education is required in the lower echelon of even our own civil service in the way of training to carry out the policy of the government in achieving a widely diversified and multi-lateral trading program.

I have here some newspaper clippings which might illustrate some of the troubles we run into, because these clippings have to do with selling in the United States and buying from the United States.

The second major market is the United Kingdom but I have a clipping from the Vancouver Province of May 12 in which it states "Low Canadian Tender Shakes U.S. Bidders" and continues:

> The offer of a Canadian firm to build eight hydraulic turbines for the Big Bend dam in South Dakota for 30 per cent less than the lowest U.S. bidder has American electrical industry leaders deeply concerned.

Now the "Buy American" act does allow United States firms a 12 per cent price advantage over their competition, but the thing that shook the United States firms was the fact that these turbines were not going to be made in Switzerland or the United Kingdom but in Canada where our manufacturing costs are comparable with those in the United States and it could not be claimed that this price advantage would be a product of low wages.

And then in the Financial Post of May 16 under the heading "Inglis Expects Big U.S. Order", one paragraph says:

> A Liberal member said in Ottawa this week that the bid had been rejected, and suggested that the U.S. had violated its production-sharing arrangements with Canada.

Then on May 30 there is a long story on the same subject. As far as I know, a decision has not yet been made but it is the office of civilian and defence mobilization which will be making the decision on this matter and the only reason this office has authority to reject a low bid would be in the interest of national security.

The other clipping I have is from the Globe and Mail of June 2 and it is headed: "Mayor Irked but TTC Sticks to U.S.-Made Buses". This article says that the TTC bought General Motors buses at a much higher price than Canadian buses because it believed they were better buses and felt they would be better value. The moral of this story, to me, is this. We are a small industrial nation with a wide open free market here, yet the industrial giant of the world, the United States, must have protection against us. I think there is a job to be done in opening up the United States market, not just for Canadian primary products and semi-processed goods such as pulp, minerals, asbestos and newsprint, but for our manufactured goods. I suggest that some of the troubles which our manufacturers have in reaching the United States market are artificial ones such as a hodge-podge of U.S. customs regulations particularly against manufactured goods. Everybody remembers the case of the ping pong balls being classified as ammunition, but the fact is that the Canadian exporter to the U.S. is under a liability which may extend up to seven years for any extra duty which may be suffered from reclassification. I believe it is possible for our manufacturers to enter the United States market to a far greater degree if they are given the opportunity.

Then, of course, there is the final barrier in that so much of our manufacturing industry is controlled from the United States and they are not going to have their Canadian subsidiaries competing with their own plants within the United States. But there is a United States market there which can be developed and which will help to make that bigger trade pie we are trying to develop by means of greater imports from the United Kingdom and greater exports to that country, and greater sales to the United States because, after all, we are running a deficit with the United States of about $1 billion a year and there is certainly room in that area for the United States to buy much more from us. Then, of course, there is our own Canadian market. I was interested in a paragraph in Industry, a publication put out I believe by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and in one paragraph it said:

> In 1957, despite our position as one of the leading manufacturing nations of the world, we imported, fully finished manufactured goods to the tune of $262 for every man, woman and child in the country. By comparison the British figure was $48 and the U.S. a mere $28.

We have within our own country a large market which could be supplied by Canadian manufacturers at, I suggest, no increase in price to the Canadian consumer. I suggest we might improve our position by developing our own internal trade and also by widening the range of our multilateral trading program and, in that regard, devising some way of operating a massive export credit program for dealing with nations such as Brazil and other South American countries who operate almost on a barter basis.

I think we can continue to increase our trade and build it to the point where it will provide more employment and greater prosperity in the country than today.

With regard to the rather belittling attitude taken by the opposition as to our export trade last year when the level was just about the same as the preceding year, the highest figure on record, I was interested to note in a trade publication that United States export trade had fallen by some 12 per cent, I believe. Having in mind the comparison between the performance of Canada and that of the United States and the fact that we maintained an export volume equal to the highest level in the history of this country in a year of recession, I think this is a tribute to the work of the department and a tribute to the minister.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, the former minister of trade and commerce, the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, led several delegations to various countries and with remarkable success. At the recent Atlantic congress held in London one of the major objectives of the NATO alliance was emphasized to be the promotion of trade within the European community. I wish to read a couple of paragraphs from one of the resolutions dealing with the subject of trade.

> The aims and interests of the North Atlantic community will be best served by ensuring the maximum possible freedom of trade and stability of prices and exchanges. Governments should regard further progress toward freedom of trade and currencies as a major and urgent objective of economic policy. Governments, while recognizing that during this process they may have to resort to temporary expedience, should not take measures which involve a return to restrictionism.

[Mr. Broome.]

The question I wish to ask the minister is this and I hope he will be able to hear me. Does the minister intend to visit the countries of the European community for the express purpose of stimulating trade with these countries and does the government intend to give consideration to a complete study of international trade? It appears to me that the government should regard further progress toward greater freedom of trade as a major and urgent objective of economic policy for the government of Canada. I sincerely trust that the minister will give due consideration to these proposals and that I will have an answer from him.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring to the attention of the committee certain problems which vitally affect not only my own constituency of Saskatoon but also other centres in Canada which at present have similar problems that affect their economic growth, the development of their commercial potentials and the expansion of their abilities in the field of trade.

Agreed charges and competitive rates are growing at a fast rate in western Canada as a whole but they are naturally being applied to those movements where alternative forms of transport offer serious competition to the railways. Saskatoon is too far from the west coast to share the advantages of sea transport via Vancouver, which has brought about some relief in freight rates in British Columbia and Alberta. Rail competition through the United States has led to some agreed charges for centres near the international border but Saskatoon is too far north to benefit from these.

The only effective competition with the railways as far as Saskatoon is concerned is highway transportation and load limits on the highways in the province of Saskatchewan are so low as to prevent this being an effective force. Cities on the trans-Canada highway to the south and others in Alberta and Manitoba where weight limits are higher have benefited considerably from agreed charges resulting from highway competition. Thus, while agreed charges are rapidly bringing lower transport costs to western Canada as a whole, Saskatoon is not sharing these benefits because it is poorly placed for service from competing forms of transport.

The development of agreed charges and competitive rates has operated to the disadvantage of Saskatoon in that most other major cities in western Canada have received a competitive advantage in the form of lower transport costs. Already this means that both producers and consumers in Saskatoon face higher costs than in other prairie cities, but its most important impact is on the future development of our city.

Saskatoon is naturally situated so as to become a major centre for the planned development of mineral resources in the northern part of the province. The existing freight rate differentials between Regina and Saskatoon for movements to and from eastern Canada and the west coast mean that any industry locating in Saskatoon faces severe disadvantages vis-à-vis locating, for example, in Regina. Thus, while geographic and economic consideration would naturally lead to the rapid development of Saskatoon as a manufacturing centre, the present freight rate structure is a severe handicap which threatens to slow down the development of Saskatoon and with it the prosperity of the whole of the province and, indeed, the success of plans to develop the northern areas will be handicapped with the handicapping of Saskatoon. This type of effect which results from a system of agreed and competitive charges is most undesirable from our viewpoint.

It was not intended originally and it certainly was not foreseen but it does none the less suggest that a critical reappraisal of the whole system of competitive freight rates is urgently needed. This problem, which is a very real one as far as Saskatoon is concerned, is repeated in other centres throughout Canada facing similar difficulties. An industrial centre does not benefit from low cost highway transportation until it is developed to a considerable extent unless it happens to lie on an existing route. It does not benefit from agreed charges until it has effective competition, and thus the development of new centres on which we rely so much for the expansion of the Canadian economy, particularly in the north, is hampered by the fact that the present freight rate structure gives substantial competitive advantages to existing industrial centres.

It is argued that the basis of agreed charges is sound and it is also argued that there are sound reasons against extending the lower rates of agreed charges to all movements, including those where no effective competition exists. Perhaps both these arguments taken independently could be used to justify the lower charges for most centres and the higher charges for Saskatoon respectively, but I do not agree. When they are used together to justify the existing differential they are unsound as further considerations become important. Professor Winch of the University of Saskatchewan has given a hypothetical example of this situation. He says:

> A new industrial plant planning to develop mineral resources is considering its location. Unless it can pay its full costs, including transport costs, it is not a sound proposition . . . If rail were the only means of transport and rail rates were consistent on a mileage basis, geographic and other considerations would dictate that it settle in Saskatoon. But if it settles in Regina it would have the advantage of lower highway transport costs. It is therefore offered an agreed charge for Regina but not for Saskatoon. It settles in Regina and ships by rail. The net effect is that the industry uses rail transport whether it settles in Saskatoon or Regina, and on the basis of rail and other costs Saskatoon is the preferable location. Yet the industry is forced into locating in Regina because of the existence of highway transport which it will never use. Clearly there is something wrong with a railway system which brings this about, and it is typical of the distortion which the present system will inflict on the rapid industrial development planned for Canada in the future.
> The solution is to recognize that the principle of agreed charges is sound, but that it has much wider application than is at present realized. The essential position in the above example is that the agreed charge for Regina is a competing form of transport with the standard rate for Saskatoon and therefore justifies an agreed charge for Saskatoon. But the future of Canada, and particularly of the prairie provinces rests on new industrial development, and the industry with the most flexible location is that which is not yet built. In other words new industrial settlement is the one problem which the present rate structure ignores, and unwittingly impedes, yet it is one vital to the future economy of Saskatchewan, and indeed to the whole of Canada. One of the most important undesirable effects is that of industrial location, and this effect constitutes a severe problem for the whole future of the city of Saskatoon.

I must say that in this connection I am indebted to the board of trade of the city of Saskatoon, the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix and Professor D. M. Winch of the University of Saskatchewan and others who have put effort, time and research into the exposition of this particular problem.

I should like also to refer briefly to another aspect of the trading problem of the west. Here I refer to the use of the port of Churchill as a port for the western provinces. The Hudson bay route association in their annual presentation to the cabinet this spring advocated increased grain storage in the port of Churchill. They suggested on different occasions that increasing the storage facilities there by five million bushels would be of real assistance in the development of this port. They have suggested that more loading berths are necessary. The suggestion they make is that perhaps three more berths are necessary in addition to the ones already located at Churchill. They point out that two only would be required if at least one tie-up wharf for advanced customs inspection was otherwise granted.

There is the problem of the right to ship grain and potash through Churchill from C.P.R. points. Saskatoon has a rapidly developing industry in the industry of potash production. Saskatoon has now come to be rightly called the potash centre of the world. The potash deposits around Saskatoon and in the province of Saskatchewan as a whole are extensive; the markets for potash are very considerable. In order to aid in the further expansion of this potash industry it is necessary that consideration be given to making a proper reduction in freight charges through the port of Churchill over the railway in order that the potash producing companies may sell their products in the southern states, for example, and in South America, using the port of Churchill, the Hudson bay railway and the maritime transportation facilities. I am assured that were suitable freight rates granted on the railway, potash from Saskatoon could be placed in the southern United States, using maritime transportation facilities from Churchill, at a competitive rate with United States potash.

I will not deal at this time with the grain car demurrage rates at Churchill except to say that so far as that phase of this particular problem affects the rates at the opening of the season they should be made to equate with those rates charged at Fort William. By the suggestions that I have mentioned tonight the economy of the city of Saskatoon, the surrounding area and the economy of the province as a whole could be significantly and materially improved.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, we all realize the importance of export trade to our Canadian economy. I think we all realize that export trade does not come to Canada automatically. In the majority of cases it is essential for the companies of our country and for the government of this country to put on a selling campaign. In view of the present situation in the export field and the growing need for expanding trade for Canada, I sometimes wonder whether the minister or any of the officials of his department have any knowledge of the number of companies in Canada, in particular the large companies of Canada, which have not and are not now putting on any selling campaign and are not trying to get markets outside of Canada because of the fact that they are controlled by parent companies in other countries, and are not permitted, because of that control, to have the temerity to seek markets outside the borders of Canada. I need not make reference at all to the incident of over a year ago where a Canadian car manufacturer was not allowed to sell to the southeast Asian market because of control by a foreign company. We all remember that very well. Of more recent date, we all remember the situation in which the Aluminum Company of Canada declined to make a sale to China, not because they did not have the authority but because they did not want to take a chance of antagonizing their market in the United States in any way.

Now, as a result of incidents of that nature I think it is a reasonable question to ask how far policies of this type extend to the detriment of Canadian companies and, of necessity therefore, to the detriment of fuller employment in this country. About three years ago an export-import company in British Columbia was interested in finding out if a large number of companies in Canada were interested in exporting to Asian countries, so they wrote a series of letters to varying types of manufacturers across Canada. This company was surprised to receive replies, in a great many instances, not from the Canadian companies interested in these matters but from the parent companies in the United States conveying the information that the Canadian companies were not permitted to deal with production and export outside of the boundaries of Canada. This subject was dealt with wholly and solely by the parent company in the United States.

You will remember, Mr. Chairman, that when the aluminum company declined to make an export to the mainland of China I took up the matter in this house and the newspapers of our country were kind enough to make some mention of that fact. As a result of that I received a letter from this export-import company in which they told me of their experience of some 2½ or 3 years ago. In this letter, which I have here, they give excerpts from the replies received from some of these companies. In order to illustrate how far-reaching this control is, I should like to give the committee a number of the excerpts from this letter. There is an excerpt from a letter from Canada Sandpapers Limited, Preston, Ontario, datel February 15, 1956, which reads as follows:

> At the moment it would be impossible for us to ship any goods to China, for we are affiliated with a U.S.A. concern, and with the current U.S.A. state department policy, this precludes our shipping any goods to the iron curtain countries.

Here is an excerpt from a letter from Chain-Belt (Canada) Ltd., Willowdale, Ontario, dated February 27, 1956:

> All the export business of Chain-Belt Company and Chain-Belt (Canada) Limited is carried on through our export department in Chain-Belt Company, Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

The third excerpt is from a letter from Garlock Packing Company, Pallmyra, New York, dated March 12, 1956:

> This refers to your letter of March 5, addressed to our Canadian subsidiary, Toronto. As the latter does not engage in any export operation, at present our business is necessarily restricted to Hong Kong and Taiwan.

This excerpt is from a letter from Canadian Allis-Chalmers Limited, Lachine, Quebec, dated March 12, 1956:

Your offer to represent our company in China has been noted with interest. Canadian Allis-Chalmers is a wholly owned subsidiary of Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company, Milwaukee, Wisconsin. All of our export negotiations are handled through Mr. P. Dietz, manager, export department, industries group, Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Company, Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

The next letter is from United States Rubber, International, Rockefeller Centre, New York city, dated March 14, 1956:

Your letter of March 6 to Dominion Rubber Company Limited, Montreal, has been referred to me. As Dominion Rubber Company is one of our subsidiaries, we handle any export business that might be developed through Canadian organizations.

Then there is a letter from Jones & Laughlin Steel Corporation, New York city, dated March 22, 1956:

Your letter of March 13 addressed to our company in Toronto has been referred to this office for acknowledgment and reply, since all matters pertaining to export are handled here.

I shall just give one more example, although I have plenty more. This letter is from Johns-Manville International, New York city, dated March 29, 1956:

Your letter March 6 addressed to Canadian Johns-Manville Company Limited has been referred to this division, since all overseas matters are our responsibility.

We thank you for your offering to assist us in sales in the Chinese market but regret that we cannot accept your kind offer.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that we in this house have a responsibility to try to find out just how widespread is this control of Canadian companies by parent companies in the United States. We should ascertain to what extent they are restricted in their desire or their potentiality for employing Canadian labour working on our Canadian resources, and their freedom to export to any market to which we have any opportunity or desire to export. I feel, Mr. Chairman, that this is not only an important matter but a very serious one. I believe that we can look upon it as a very disturbing situation. There must be some foreboding about Canadian companies, and therefore Canadian workers, being not only under the control of parent companies outside this country but also dependent upon the whims and policies of a government of another country.

I should like to ask the minister if any consideration has been given to finding out how widespread this control is with regard to exports from Canadian companies. If it is as widespread as is indicated by even the excerpts which I have placed on the record, I wonder whether any consideration is being given to establishing the necessary policy, taking the necessary steps to introduce legislation to guarantee that we have control of our own resources, our own export policies, without domination from outside.

Mr. Fisher: The fundamental source of income, Mr. Chairman, in our particular part of the world is the pulp and paper industry and the newsprint aspect of it. One of the most disturbing things about the newsprint and pulp and paper industries has been the fact that its percentage share of its main market in the United States has been going down in relation to the expansion of that market and in relation to the expansion of United States production. Since pulp and paper products are the largest single item of export trade, being much more important even than uranium that was mentioned by the Leader of the Opposition, it seems to many of us that the position in which this industry is and its trend toward having a lessened share of the United States market, and of course the world market, is perhaps the most disturbing thing on the economic horizon.

The committee on mines, forests and waters of this house was so greatly interested in this particular point that it brought before it a number of witnesses, including the president of one of the pulp and paper organizations. I refer to Mr. D. W. Ambridge, head of the Abitibi corporation. I wanted to bring to the minister's attention, if he missed it, some of the points that were made by Mr. Ambridge. I should like to qualify, before I give this point, that while I agree with this particular aspect of Mr. Ambridge's evidence there was some of it with which I disagreed. But after reviewing, through questions, the situation that he had seen in Brazil where Canadian firms were not able to compete with Swedish firms because of Swedish government facilities in dealing with Brazilian currency, Mr. Ambridge went on to say this:

The Canadians have about as much chance of selling anything in Brazil as a snowball in hell. You cannot do it because there are too many of these arrangements around. We have nothing like that.

Later on Mr. Payne of the committee asked him this question:

Are you in an way satisfied, even in an indirect way, that help is provided to your industry in the search for new markets, through a government agency? Is there such help or is there not?

I should like to point out that Mr. Payne is a member of the minister's party and that the very way in which he phrased the question suggests that he had some concern as to whether this help was available. Mr. Ambridge's answer was:

Not that I know of. The only thing I might name as being of help to us is that the government does provide statistics, through the commercial councillors at the various embassies, legations and what-have-you. I think probably we in our newsprint association have the most complete and accurate statistics of anyone in the world.

I am sure Mr. Ambridge is referring to his own product.

Most of those figures overseas come from our commercial councillors in those places. They are helping us in that way.

Mr. Payne came back:

Is there any method you might suggest by which assistance could be given of a practical nature?

I like to see this example of a Conservative member searching for ways of improving the service of this government. Mr. Ambridge came back in reply to this question and said:

I certainly think that the government should give some very serious study to the question of how we are going to finance exports, because this business of cash on the barrelhead is absolute nonsense; it is out of date. We cannot compete. We say, put the money, the American dollars, on the table before we will ship anything. That is crazy. We should certainly have some government body or—I hate to say—committee. You know what they say about a committee. They say a camel is an animal which looks as if it had been put together by a committee.

This led to our turning a bit astray and then we came back and Mr. Ambridge went on to say this:

I think the first thing to do is to get a change of attitude. I do not know who is responsible for this. However, for many years in the Canadian government, the general idea has been that we are not going to get ourselves involved, in extending credit. We are not going to get ourselves involved in barter deals. We are not going to do a damned thing, except take the money when they have it for the products they have to sell. I think that whole attitude might have been valid in the first decade after the war. Since then, it is not valid. We have to face the powerful competition all around the world and we cannot deal with it in any such primitive manner as that. It is primitive.

The business of just going to the market and selling and getting American dollars in New York, is primitive, compared to our competitors.

That is fairly strong stuff and from a free enterpriser like Mr. Ambridge it is very strong when he wants the government to get into this particular field. One of the things I notice is that when anyone ever quotes a Globe and Mail editorial in this chamber there is a tendency to say "That good friend of the government". One of the points that I am almost willing to make, following the Globe and Mail editorial policy in recent months, is that it is no longer a good friend of this government. I think this particular editorial gives an indication as to why that is the case. This is from the Globe and Mail of May 21 and it refers to what Mr. Ambridge said. It states:

The president of Abitibi Power and Paper Company, Mr. D. W. Ambridge, is the latest executive to complain about this dangerous lack of foresight.

It goes on to quote a short extract from what I have already read. Then the Globe and Mail editorial goes on to state as follows:

The government at present has no facilities for granting credit to foreign customers. The limit of its assistance is to insure the sales of Canadian exporters so that the exporters may collect up to 85 per cent of the value of the order if the buyer cannot pay. This service is handled by the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, a crown corporation which in the past five years has made a profit of $136,000.

There is nothing in this country remotely similar to the export-import bank of the United States, a government agency which for 25 years has loaned money to foreign buyers for purchases of American goods and services.

Then the editorial goes on to point out that the dominion government in those good old Liberal days was not always so aloof to this problem; that between 1945 and 1948 it extended credit worth some $750 millions. It goes on to say that that program was a courageous step. Then it goes on to lament that really this government has not done much about it and has not given any indication that it is going to get into this extremely important field. The concluding paragraph states as follows:

The important thing is to establish credit facilities now, before it is too late. They will be of no value when our customers have gone for good.

The problem of the pulp and paper industry is much larger than just a question of exports. There is the question of competition. I hope the minister will do a bit of reading on the competition we are getting from southern pine and from the increased use of hardwoods in the lake states and in the New England states. All this is leading to more and more investment and development by United States manufacturers to look after their own domestic market and our share is going down. The main point is that we still have tremendous forest resources that, on a sustained yield basis, we can exploit, but we are not getting any of that. I do not know whether the minister is aware that there are pulp and paper companies in the constituency of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River which for a long time have been trying to make up their mind about putting a pulp mill into the Sioux Lookout region. For some reason they always back out. These various companies have been delaying for years now. This has tended to be a pattern in the past 10 years. We are getting expansion in plant of mills that are already established but we just cannot seem to get new ones in, especially in the eastern interior and in the boreal forests where we are close to markets.

I am not suggesting this whole pattern is part of the minister's responsibility or interest. But one of the claims that is getting everyone exercised in connection with the pulp and paper business is that this government or the federal government does not give leadership in financing or credit facilities for this industry in world markets. One of the other things they claim, of course, is that it overtaxes the industry. With all the informational sources that the Minister of Finance and Minister of Trade and Commerce have I think they should be able to come up with some suggestion that would help out this particular industry which at the present time and for many recent months has been producing below capacity.

One of the difficulties, Mr. Chairman, in ever making remarks when the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce are before the committee is that he has such a wonderful capacity of sitting there and shaking his head or giving little smiles to indicate that he feels that what is being said is nonsense.

Mr. Churchill: No; on the contrary. I object to that remark, Mr. Chairman. I was shaking my head on getting a report from my friend to the effect that just a few minutes previously the hon. member read into the record part of the proceedings of a committee that has not yet reported to the house and he is completely out of order. That is why I was shaking my head at it.

Mr. Fisher: I wish you had raised the point.

Mr. Churchill: I would have done so if I had known that the committee had not reported.

Mr. Fisher: I did not realize I was out of order. I could have managed it anyway because Mr. Ambridge's words have been reported very extensively in the press and in the trade magazines. I think I could have managed it but I apologize if I have broken the rule.

One of the points I want to make more seriously than any other point I have ever made in this House of Commons is that the pulp and paper situation in Canada is extremely serious, and if this industry does not pick up our part of the country can almost figure on packing up for a while. I have not exactly a lack of confidence in the particular region, but if pulp and paper does not prosper our region does not prosper. I can point out to the minister that we have had the shipyards closed down in that particular area. The third largest airplane manufacturing plant in Canada is in danger of closing up. We just are not getting secondary industry development, even of a minor character, and if pulp and paper gets into deep trouble in the next couple of years we will be in a situation comparable, I suppose, to some of the have-not provinces down in the eastern part of Canada. It is about time the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance did some serious thinking on this particular problem, or at least gave us the assurance that the people in the industry and the unions who are crying calamity should not be crying calamity.

One of the other points I want to touch on deals with the much mooted small business aspect of this government's policy. One of the largest sources of support for this government in past elections, it seemed to me, was from many of the people in the small manufacturing businesses and I think one of the most appealing aspects the government put forward in its election campaigns was a strong indication that it would help small business. Without going into too much detail the minister has now had two years to get some kind of program under way. One of the great examples in this particular regard is the small loans administration in the United States which, not in a major way but in a minor fashion, has been doing what is considered to be very successful work in the United States for a long time. I would like the minister to confirm that it did not take the United States government two years after it got the idea to commence that particular administration. The United States government got it going very quickly and with a certain sense of urgency.

One of the prime problems in Canada today in a political sense is to try to determine whether the small type of business has a future and whether we should try to preserve it in the face of the build-up of the huge national corporations, or corporations working in a regional sense. They can very soon put small business out of the way. It often seems that small businesses in the present trend have a very bleak future. I had assumed from the stand taken by the government and the minister that it had been decided that small businesses were worthwhile and that the encouragement of small businesses and small manufacturers was very important. But so far all we have had is an indication that there is a senior official who is interested in the problem and that a certain amount of research has been done; that this bureau, or whatever it is, will be prepared to assist small business in an informational sense. But I think they want more than that.

The periodical or brochure which was put out by the department, "The Techniques of Export Trade", is an excellent thing on an informational basis. One of the things, however, which is missing in it is any indication of extended government credit facilities that the Globe and Mail and Mr. Ambridge called for. I am sure the minister and his assistants in this small business field will be able to turn out just as good a brochure advising the small businessmen how to take care of themselves.

However, I think the minister does recognize that they want more than that. They want a loans administration for small businesses and manufacturers. I cannot see why the example of the United States has not been some encouragement to the minister, and I would like him to give us at some time during his estimates an analysis of why it has not been an encouragement to him to get into this thing. He might at the same time tell us why the example of this United States export-import bank has not been any stimulus to him. It seems to me it is one of the great ironies that the United States, which is usually considered a great free enterprise nation, should be the one that in these particular fields can give our country which has been labelled much less enterprising than the United States such leads or indications of government leadership and initiative. I would hope that in these two fields, and especially in relation to the predicament in the pulp and paper industry at the present time, we will hear more from the minister before his estimates are through.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I believe the minister has consented to allow this item to stand eventually if it appeals to the members of the committee to proceed to other individual and specific items. I want to assure the minister that on that account I am not going to ramble unduly or deal with matters which I do not think specially appropriate to this administration item. I would be very glad to deal with some of the matters we heard about today such as the diversion of trade, the United States conference in January, the 1959 capital investment intentions, of course, and a few matters of that kind. But I cannot find any other appropriate place to say a few words and ask a few questions of the minister with respect to the small business section referred to in the annual report. More than that, it was, of course, given a great deal of prominence, as the minister knows, in both the 1957 and 1958 election campaigns. I think the people of Canada have been led to believe that the government would have moved much further under a new government and something much more tangible would have been done with respect to aid to small business than we yet see either in referring to the report or in the remarks which have been made so far in this debate by the minister. In fact, I think he has made no reference to small business.

[Mr. Fisher.]

Just to indicate that I think I am on pretty sound ground in this respect in outlining what I think is the public opinion with respect to it, these are some of the strong statements which were made by the leader of the Conservative party in 1957 and 1958. I have here some quotations from the Prime Minister. In the last election he said that only minor tax concessions had been made; but he indicated there would be greater assistance. We know that the recent budget actually increased taxes rather than reduced them. Then at Cornwall on February 24, 1958, he said that small business was crucified by the Liberal policy of tight money. I do not need to elaborate on that, but that surely gives even the small group in this chamber tonight a fairly good opportunity for a hearty laugh. Then in starting this campaign at Campbellton, New Brunswick, on May 4, 1957 he said:

> We intend to do something to assist small business in this country. They find themselves today caught, irretrievably caught, in a situation where they cannot survive.

That was more than two years ago.

> We believe the time has come to provide very much after the fashion of the federal government of the United States.

About six months after this government took office the United States government very considerably widened the availability of loans to small businesses in that country; that is about 18 months ago. I would hope that before we pass the item the Minister of Trade and Commerce will tell us what progress has been made with this particular small business section that has been set up in his department with much fanfare and flurry. May I say that I thought the assistant deputy minister appointed to take charge of this section was very quick to make public policy statements after assuming office, statements which, I thought, should more properly have come from the minister or from the government. But I have watched the papers carefully since, and a number of months have elapsed during which there has been a singular silence about the activities of this particular section, and I hope we shall hear more about it now.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, when I was speaking earlier this afternoon the elapse of time allocated to me interrupted a point I was seeking to make concerning the sale of surplus farm products in the export markets of the world at prices well below the cost to the Canadian taxpayer, and I referred the hon. gentleman to two answers to questions given in Hansard indicating particular sales by way of example. One of the sales to which I referred at the point of time when my argument was curtailed was the problem which arose in connection with the export of surplus dried skim milk for feed purposes to Denmark at a price of the order of something like one-fifth of its cost to the Canadian taxpayer, and I pointed out that one of the implications, in a trade way, of that kind of action was that we were directly subsidizing a competitor in a market in which we were seeking to sell, and I referred particularly to the United Kingdom market.

Now I want to make further reference to another question and answer as it appears in Hansard of June 22, 1959, at page 4993. In reply to a question of mine addressed to the Minister of Agriculture concerning the sale of surplus canned pork by the Canadian government to Czechoslovakia, the minister confirmed that there had been such a sale, and I will read part of his answer:

> We have been negotiating with several European countries for some time in an effort to dispose of some of the surplus pork which the stabilization board has held, and particularly from the point of view of attempting to get back into the European market, as far as pork and other agricultural products are concerned.

Then the minister went on to explain that there had been a sale of some 2,200,000 pounds, and he referred to it as being in the nature of a trial shipment and expressed the hope that we should be able to sell in constantly increasing quantities pork and other agricultural products in the European market.

That is a hope which I think everyone will wish to see fulfilled, but what I want to make clear is this: the implications of this policy are manifold. With regard to the example I have just quoted, the minister did not state the price at which the pork was sold, but I understand from outside publications that it represented a loss of the order of nine cents or slightly more a pound. I have not been able to verify that figure as yet, and the minister can correct me if it is wrong. At any rate, on this one product alone there is a surplus of canned and frozen pork of the order of 100 million pounds at the present time, so the loss to the taxpayer would be of the order of $10 million if the figure I have given is correct or substantially correct. That, indeed, is an important item when we bear in mind that we already have a substantial budgetary deficit. So there is this implication of the loss to the taxpayer. And the matter does not end there.

There has been a great deal of debate in this house on the question of the budgetary and financial policy of the government, and I do not wish to enter upon this argument during a discussion of these estimates, but I would point out that one cause of increasing the interest rate in this country is, undoubtedly, the large deficit. This kind of policy contributes to that deficit, and the deficit, in turn, contributes to increasing interest rates which makes it harder for exporters, manufacturers and producers who are engaged in the export trade to borrow money. It makes it more costly for them to develop their export business, and this in turn increases the cost of our exports and makes it harder for them to compete. In other words, the effect of this policy of disposing of surplus farm products as far as the export market is concerned is to take us in a vicious circle in which, in some cases, the continuation of such policy for these exports tends to destroy the possibility of continuing our normal exports.

There is yet another aspect of the matter. We have had some reason to complain about the farm surplus disposal policy of the United States because we felt that they have been interfering with our markets, and always in earlier years when we made complaints of this kind, we were able to argue with considerable force and put forward a very strong case. We ourselves are now dumping the surplus farm products on world markets at below cost and doing the very things of which we were complaining with regard to the operations of another country. For these reasons I should like the minister to deal fully with this subject and explain the precise nature of our policy in so far as it concerns the disposal of these products outside Canada. I have sought in putting this forward to confine my remarks to the trade aspects of this matter. I appreciate, of course, the attempt which is being made to keep up the level of farm incomes, but I suggest that this is not the best way in which farm incomes can be supported and that there are other ways of dealing with the farm income aspect of the problem.

There is one other question I wish to direct to the minister. His colleague the Minister of Agriculture, in giving the answer to which I have referred, spoke of using this shipment as an attempt to get back into the European market as far as pork and other agricultural products are concerned, and then he spoke of this being in the nature of a trial shipment. I should like to ask the minister if he would elaborate on that part of the answer by telling the committee precisely what is being done and what the government has in mind in its effort to get back into the European markets for agricultural products. Are we to seek to get into those markets by having the Canadian taxpayer subsidize these exports? Is that the new attempt that is being made, or the new policy? If not, what is the policy and on what lines is the government endeavouring to work it out?

The market prices of these various products in the European market would seem to indicate that our agricultural products are much higher in price than those coming from other competitive areas. We have only to refer to the comparative prices of New Zealand dairy products and our own in the London market and the comparative prices of Danish bacon and our own in the London market. Would the minister indicate to the house just what this new policy was to which the Minister of Agriculture referred and how is it to be carried out? Does it involve a new principle of subsidizing exports, which we have not embarked on hitherto and which even in this case was only an incidental by-product of what happened with regard to the particular transaction? Just what is involved in the matter?

The Deputy Chairman: Is there any further discussion on item 380?

Mr. McIlraith: Is the minister not going to answer some of the points raised?

Mr. Churchill: In view of the fact that we have arranged to let item 380 stand in order that the hon. member for Assiniboia may speak on it when he returns, I think it might be wiser for me to make the complete answer to the others who have spoken after he has finished his remarks some time next week rather than to attempt to answer in the short space of time available tonight. I would only be able to answer in part some of the questions that have been asked. If there has been a full discussion of the first item I hope we may be able to move on and pass some of the other items.

Mr. McIlraith: I have no objection to moving on. There may be a question about trade with Italy that I hope the minister will deal with when he is making his further remarks. There appears to be a considerable drop in our exports to Italy and I would ask the minister to deal with that when he makes his remarks on this item later. In other words, I do not want to preclude the subject matter of the first item from the subsequent discussion. With that understanding I am quite agreeable to moving on.

The Deputy Chairman: As I understand it, it is the desire of the committee that item 380, which is nominally known as the first item, be allowed to stand and that we continue with the other items.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

Trade commissioner service—

381. Administration and operation, $3,747,293.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the minister deal briefly with the increase in this item?

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. Benidickson: There is a slight increase in money and in staff too.

Mr. Churchill: This has to do with the trade commissioner service. The increase amounts to $277,366 and the increase in the staff is seven.

Mr. Benidickson: Is there any significant addition to the countries we are represented in or is that for the first year of change handled by the unallocated item that is shown on page 476?

Mr. Churchill: An office was opened in Ankara and we anticipate other new positions during the course of this year and have made allowance therefor.

Mr. McIlraith: Were any offices closed?

Mr. Churchill: No, no offices have been closed.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the minister give consideration to increasing the service in the United States with a view to seeking the sale of more of our manufactured products in that country?

Mr. Churchill: That is a good point which is really worthy of consideration. We have seven offices there now. I had the pleasure of visiting the one at New York, the one at Chicago and the one at Boston during the last year or so and I was very much impressed with the work that is being done by our trade commissioner service in these places. I also talked to the other trade commissioners stationed elsewhere in the United States. They have been doing some very impressive work in interesting Americans in Canada and in purchasing from Canada.

Just a little while ago I was at the trade fair we held in Boston. It was a good trade fair, was well attended and the exhibits by Canadian businessmen were very good. Last fall I attended a meeting at Chicago organized by the Canadian-American committee of the chamber of commerce of that city. There was a large attendance and a great deal of interest in the problems affecting trade between our two countries. It is noteworthy that that area of the United States is the greatest importer of goods from Canada and the largest exporter, by areas in the United States, to Canada. It is also the area from which a great deal of capital has flowed into Canada and from which subsidiaries have been set up in our country. I found it a very stimulating and interesting experience. I was encouraged by that activity and by the work of our officials in Chicago in getting Americans interested in our country. The results of that work show in a place like Chicago where there has been intense activity as between our two countries.

The trade fair at Boston and the other work being done there will be helpful too. Other areas of the United States that are not as close to Canada naturally have not been affected to the same extent.

My hon. friend's suggestion that we might perhaps extend our trade commissioner service in the United States is something that is well worth considering because trade between our two countries is developing and we want to do everything in our power to encourage the import into the United States of Canadian manufactured products as well as the raw materials which are going there now. I thank the hon. member for drawing the attention of the committee to that particular aspect.

Mr. McIlraith: Because many Canadian manufacturing companies are comparatively small they are not aware of the export potential that is possibly available to them. If they could obtain an export market in addition to the market they supply at the present time in Canada, it would tend to permit them to lower their costs. I would feel that is particularly true of exports to the United States in a way that it is possibly not true of exports to certain other foreign countries because many Canadian companies are not large enough to have the facilities for handling normal export trade, but could handle export trade to the United States because of similar trade practices. These smaller firms just have not got the facilities and are not thinking about export, and the trade commissioner service may be able to assist them to increase our exports to the United States if we give more attention at this time to extending their activities, whether by opening new offices in additional areas of the United States or supporting the present offices with expanded services and staff.

This is well worth following up rather closely because, it seems to me, our exporters have a constant problem of operating in a comparatively high cost economy. It is going to be a continuing problem and anything that can be done to get export markets for many of these manufacturing companies not only will be a good thing from the point of view of the business involved but it will be a good thing in that it may help such manufacturers to lower costs both to Canadian consumers and for the export market.

Item agreed to.

382. Construction or acquisition of buildings, land, equipment and furnishings, $222,000.

Mr. McIlraith: Will the minister explain the increase in this item?

Mr. Churchill: The increase is $61,000. This vote, of course, is for the purpose of providing homes for trade commissioners who are living in areas where in some instances the climate is difficult and in other instances other types of accommodation cannot be rented. Each year an assessment is carried out as to whether or not it is proper to purchase a piece of property or to continue to pay rent. The question of supplying motor cars comes under this item as well. It is rather a modest item, I think. In the long run, where we have been able to purchase rather than to continue to pay out rent, it has been proved to be quite satisfactory.

Mr. McIlraith: I had rather direct experience with this particular matter in 1952. It occurred to me that the department was losing a great deal of the efficiency of its staff through lack of proper accommodation in some of the areas of the world where health conditions are not as good as they might be and accommodation is rather difficult to obtain even although for health reasons it is more necessary than in other parts of the world.

I am very glad to see this policy of acquiring properties in such areas is being continued by the present government. I do not know that it is proper for me to name the particular country I had reference to. On that occasion the situation was simply that the trade commissioners and their families were in a state of ill health owing to lack of proper accommodation, bearing in mind the climatic conditions in that area. Can the minister tell us in what countries properties are being acquired.

Mr. Churchill: The committee will be interested in this. We own houses in these locations: Accra, Kingston, Singapore, and two in Tokyo. Then there are houses which are leased and furnished by the department, two in Bombay, one in Colombo, one in Copenhagen, one in Jakarta, one in Hong Kong, one in Karachi, one in Leopoldville and two in New Delhi. Consideration is being given to purchasing accommodation in Teheran and in Paris but that may not occur until next year.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister made reference to automobiles acquired by foreign service officers which would be paid for out of this item. Is there a standing regulation with respect to using Canadian manufactured automobiles?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, that is quite right, Canadian manufactured cars.

Item agreed to.

383. Exhibitions branch, $790,592.

Mr. McIlraith: Will the minister indicate the activities of the exhibition branch this year?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, the committee has been very co-operative. I will be quite content if the clock appears to you to represent ten o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McIlraith: Will the acting house leader indicate the business of the house for Monday?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, Mr. Speaker. There will be a slight change from the announcement made last night. Last night the house leader indicated that the business for Monday and Tuesday would be four items which are the responsibility of the Minister of Justice. It now appears that the Minister of Justice will be unavoidably absent after the noon hour on Monday. In consultation with him I therefore suggest to the house that the order of business will commence with item No. 1 on today's order paper, Bill No. C-57, respecting the superannuation of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. The second item will be item No. 8 on today's order paper, Bill No. C-58, to amend the Criminal Code. I might say that the Minister of Justice will be present until one o'clock on Monday and these might be taken before his departure. The third item would be item No. 11 on today's order paper, the second reading of Bill No. S-24, respecting the testing, inspection and sale of seeds; item No. 4 would be item No. 14 on today's order paper, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Agriculture with regard to crop insurance; item No. 5 would be item No. 16 on today's order paper, the resolution in the name of the Minister of Agriculture with regard to mortgage credit to farmers under the Canadian Farm Loan Act; then No. 17 on the order paper dealing with amendments to the Coal Production Assistance Act, a resolution under the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Then, if that business happens to be completed, we would go on, as item No. 7, with Bill No. S-20, to amend the Length and Mass Units Act; then, second reading of Bill No. S-21, to amend the Weights and Measures Act. Those are rather small bills, and as a standby, item No. 10 on today's order paper, an act to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

STATEMENT BY MINISTER ON CURRENT SITUATION

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition the other morning asked me if I would bring together the statements which have been made on behalf of the corporation in connection with the matter which has been occupying the press over the last few days. The first statement was issued and read by my colleague the Minister of Justice the other day, but I think for continuity all the statements should be put together at this time. This is a statement by Mr. Bushnell, and if the house would agree it could appear in Hansard at this point, as it was read the other morning.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house to have this statement printed in Hansard rather than being read at this time?

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether, in view of the importance of this statement, and it is not a very long statement, the minister would read it so it will be fresh in our minds?

Mr. Nowlan: Very well. This is the statement issued by Mr. Bushnell to the press on Monday, June 22, as I am advised:

Some two weeks ago the corporation decided to replace the "Preview Commentary" from Ottawa, which followed the eight o'clock C.B.C. news, with a "Special Parliamentary Report" prepared by the C.B.C. news service. It was felt that this would improve the corporation's service of reporting the proceedings of the previous day in parliament.

This has been followed by resignations of several members of the corporation's talks and public affairs national office in Toronto, on the grounds that the substitution of the opinion broadcast "Preview Commentary" by the factual C.B.C. news report implied political interference with the C.B.C.'s broadcasting of controversial affairs. The corporation does not accept this implication.

The C.B.C. has the fullest confidence in the talks and public affairs department which over the years has contributed some of the C.B.C.'s most distinguished and responsible broadcasting.

Then I am advised that on June 24, following a series of meetings of the board of directors which had taken place in Toronto, the following statement was made at six o'clock in the evening:

Since the C.B.C. board of directors began its regular meetings in Toronto, assertions have been made that a directive of management which replaced the "Preview Commentary" by a factual report on the daily proceedings in parliament was prompted by considerations incompatible with the independence of the C.B.C. The board and management of the corporation are convinced that the intent of the directive has been misinterpreted by the public. Accordingly, and in order to remove any doubt as to the independence of the corporation, "Preview Commentary" will be resumed on Monday of next week.

The board of directors and management of C.B.C. at this time wish to reaffirm the established policy of freedom of expression in C.B.C. programs devoted to the discussion of public issues.

Following that Mr. Walker, of Toronto, issued this statement on June 24:

Mr. H. G. Walker, the director for Ontario and English networks division of the C.B.C., announced tonight that the resignations submitted by employees earlier this week have not been accepted by C.B.C. management. Mr. Walker hopes that all employees will find it possible to resume their normal duties.

And in connection with resignations, I am advised that none of the resignations have been accepted by the corporation and that all the employees have returned to work except Mr. Peers, supervisor of talks and public affairs, Mr. Hugh Gillis, his assistant and Mr. Bernard Trotter, who have said they did not want any action taken on their resignations until they have appeared before the House of Commons committee on broadcasting tomorrow.

That comprises the official record of the documents. I am told that Mr. Bushnell held a press conference, but I have not seen any notes of this and I believe no record was kept, except what subsequently appeared in the press, and I also understand that Mr. Bushnell made a statement over the C.B.C. in an interview, notes of which I have not in my possession.

While I am on my feet, so that the record may be complete, may I refer to the series of questions which the Leader of the Opposition asked me last week when I was away. I think perhaps these questions should be answered here now so as to make a continuous record. The Leader of the Opposition asked, as recorded on page 5086 of Hansard:

Were discussions held in the past ten days in Toronto or Ottawa between management of the C.B.C. and persons who have since resigned from their posts in the corporation?

The answer is yes.

I was also asked:

If so, who were present at these discussions for C.B.C. management and for talks and public affairs personnel.

The answer is, Mr. E. L. Bushnell for management and Mr. Frank Peers for the talks and public affairs department. The last part of the question was:

How many such meetings were held, and on what dates?

The answer is that one meeting was held, on Sunday, June 21. That is the full answer to the questions asked by the Leader of the Opposition. The hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Essex East also asked questions with respect to the resignations, but as I have already stated all the persons concerned except the three I have named have returned to work, and I am not in a position to give more detailed answers to those questions than those I have just given.

When I referred to this matter on Thursday morning, I think it was, when I returned from St. Catharines, I said I would make a statement to the House on Monday. I think that was an unfortunate phrase. I was not thinking at that time that these gentlemen were appearing before the committee or that this was a continuing matter, and I think it would be improper for me, as this matter is sub judice, to comment on the broader implications of this matter until the committee has considered whatever evidence may be brought before it and taken whatever action it may wish to take as far as examining witnesses is concerned. For that reason I do not propose to say anything on that particular issue until it has been clarified and dealt with by our committee of the House of Commons.

However, with the permission of the house I would like to say a word about Mr. Bushnell, whose name has appeared in the press in the last few days in various reports and rumours of impending resignations and so on. Mr. Bushnell was appointed assistant general manager of this corporation when it was reorganized last fall. Mr. Ouimet was made general manager. Mr. Ouimet was appointed president and Mr. Bushnell vice-president respectively.

In December the corporation was faced with the strike of Radio Canada. Mr. Ouimet had been away. He returned and tried to deal with that strike. As a result he collapsed, and as we all know has been seriously ill since that time. I am glad to say that his doctors report that they think he can return to work within a matter of two or three weeks, although not to assume full responsibility initially. As a result of that illness Mr. Bushnell carried on not only as assistant general manager but as general manager, as president and vice-president. In other words, he was doing the work of two men.

Those of us in this house who have been close to the situation in the last few months —and I see this was mentioned in the Canadian Press dispatch in this morning's papers—are aware that the last six months have been probably the most hectic in the history of the corporation. I can say of my personal knowledge that during this period Mr. Bushnell has worked tirelessly and given himself wholeheartedly and solely to the corporation. I know that on many occasions he worked 17 or 18 hours a day throughout the strike. Although I am not a doctor I can tell hon. members—and I have had advice to this effect as well—that Mr. Bushnell is completely and totally exhausted after having carried this heavy burden during this period of time. In fact I have been afraid that we would have more than one man in hospital with a heart attack and I still fear this possibility.

Mr. Bushnell is carrying on and intends to carry on despite reports to the contrary. There has never been any thought of his not being here until this committee has finished its investigation into this particular phase in the matter of interference with the corporation. I hope when this has been concluded Mr. Bushnell will be able to get away for a few weeks rest—and I say "few weeks" advisedly—because I am told that the answers concerning other matters to be examined into by the committee can be supplied by other officials of the corporation, and it will not be necessary for Mr. Bushnell to be present.

Mr. Bushnell inherited the situation and did not create it. He was recommended to me by the former general manager and chairman of the board and by all the senior officials of the corporation, I was told, I believed, and I still believe that the morale of the corporation might have been prejudiced if Mr. Bushnell and Mr. Ouimet had not been appointed as president and vice president.

During the last few days I have personally received many telephone calls from officers and employees of the corporation not only from Ottawa but elsewhere across the country telling me of their confidence in Mr. Bushnell and their resentment at the charges of weakness and incompetence and so on and so forth which have been made against him.

I can only say that I have been closely associated with him, as I was with Mr. Ouimet prior to his illness, since the day they became president and vice president of the corporation. I must say I have heard from Mr. Bushnell some "Bushnellisms" because our discussions have been frank and free in dealing with all aspects of the corporation. I have seen no sign of weakness or incompetence. I personally believe that Mr. Bushnell deserves the confidence of the country and the corporation for the way he has given to it of his strength and his whole being during these very difficult months.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of National Revenue is right and wise in not seeking to prejudge the question that is going to be considered by a committee of this house tomorrow. I am sure I will be expressing his views as well as my own when I say I hope that investigation will be carried on in a calm, judicial and non-partisan spirit, and that there will be no attempt made to prevent the committee from finding out the truth.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we in this group feel it is very important that there shall be at the head of the C.B.C. a strong management; that the C.B.C. shall maintain its independence at all times, and perform the function of promoting public discussion on controversial issues without any interference whatsoever. We have been disturbed, naturally, by recent events. We hope the inquiry that is about to take place will result in the strengthening of the C.B.C. and maintaining it for the purpose given to it by parliament when it was first set up. We think in a country like Canada with a bicultural nature and two official languages a strong C.B.C. is essential to the preservation of the very integrity and independence of this country. For these reasons, which are very strong ones, we trust that the difficulties will be resolved and that in the future there will be no question but that the independence of the C.B.C. is being maintained.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LEGISLATION TO CONFIRM CANADA-NOVA SCOTIA AGREEMENT RESPECTING RESERVES

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-25 (from the Senate) to confirm an agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the province of Nova Scotia respecting Indian reserves.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RESEARCH

ESTABLISHMENT OF QUEEN ELIZABETH II FUND FOR RESEARCH INTO CHILDREN'S DISEASES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee later this day to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That in order to mark the occasion of Her Majesty's visit to Canada and Her personal interest in the well-being of children, it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the establishment of the Queen Elizabeth II Canadian fund to aid in research on the diseases of children, for the purpose of assisting individuals or organizations to undertake or carry on research into the diseases of children and the causes, prevention and treatment of such diseases, and for the payment into the said fund of the sum of $1 million out of the consolidated revenue fund; to make provision for administrative and technical services and facilities required for the purposes of the act; and generally to make such other provisions as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of the act.

Motion agreed to.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

FORT FRANCES, ONT.—BRIDGE

Motion No. 125—Mr. Fisher:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged between the federal government and the province of Ontario, the state of Minnesota, the government of the United States of America and any other authorities or persons, regarding a bridge at Fort Frances, Ontario, since January 1, 1956.

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, there is no objection to this motion passing.

Motion agreed to.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO CALLING OF CONFERENCE ON FISCAL MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the fact that the premier of Quebec has announced his intention of attending the conference which opens next week between the provincial treasurers and the Minister of Finance, the government has made any arrangements to invite the premiers of other provinces to attend this conference who are not themselves provincial treasurers?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge that such an invitation has been sent. The Minister of Finance is unavoidably absent today in Toronto in connection with the visit of Her Majesty the Queen. He will be back tomorrow I think. I would suggest that the question might be taken as notice to be answered by him.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

ESKIMOS—INQUIRY AS TO ART INSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in an effort to do something to lower the temperature in the house I want to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources a question about the Arctic. I did not send any notice because it has just come to mind. Has the minister received any complaints from people in Canada about teaching the Eskimos forms of art other than their native forms?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

LATVIAN FISHERMEN—STATEMENT ON CONSIDERATION OF REQUEST TO ENTER CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. lady, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, if she has any statement she can make to the house about the two Latvian refugees, in view of the press reports.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the press reports have pretty well covered the situation. By now it is known that the two Latvian seamen have made a formal request to remain in Canada. They have been given a minister's permit of one year's duration, and it is my understanding that they are at present in the care of friends in the city of Toronto.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder whether the minister is now in a position to answer the general question about deportations behind the iron curtain.

Mrs. Fairclough: It is not a case of being in a position to answer it. Personally I do not think this should be a subject for open discussion. Each case is handled on its own merits and carefully considered, and I think that is about as far as I care to go.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PEACE RIVER BRIDGE—INQUIRY AS TO STRIKE OF STEELWORKERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. C. Henderson (Cariboo): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can the minister inform me what steps are being taken to halt the strike of steelworkers on the Peace river bridge in order to recommence work at the earliest possible moment? I have received telegrams from the Dawson Creek chamber of commerce and the mayor and city council of Dawson city requesting immediate action on the matter.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have looked into the situation and I am informed that this matter is entirely under provincial jurisdiction.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SKIDEGATE, QUEEN CHARLOTTE ISLANDS, FIRE—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if she is able to give the house any detailed information about the disastrous fire which took place at Skidegate, Queen Charlotte islands, over the week end.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the fire took place, as the hon. member has said, at the end of last week. There was a preliminary investigation on Saturday afternoon but the cause of the fire was not established. The fire marshal is there now investigating the situation, and an inquest will be held on July 1. It was a most heart-touching tragedy because it took the lives of five children, three of them Indian and two non-Indian, and an adult Indian man. Until such time as the inquest is held I do not think we will have anything further to report other than that I expect to have the fire marshal's report as soon as it is completed.

HOUSING

C.M.H.C.—INQUIRY AS TO DIRECT LOANS TO BUILDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Would the minister care to comment on a report in the press that the minister made a statement to the national house builders association that beginning this year loans will be made directly to builders by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in order to prevent a drastic reduction in housing construction? Can the minister say whether this announcement is one that will be made firm in the near future?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I saw this dispatch myself. I made no statement to that effect to the officers of the national house builders association when I discussed the whole situation with them a week ago. I think the report is a case of jumping to conclusions. When a policy has been decided upon it will be announced in the house.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say whether consideration is now being given to this proposition?

Mr. Green: Consideration has been given to the whole housing problem not only in the last week but for many months.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO PROCEDURE ON DOMINION DAY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister what arrangements have been made for the business of the house on Wednesday, July 1.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hoped that the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Assiniboia might meet with me and that we might agree, subject to confirmation by the house, as to the course to be followed. I would think—and I merely make this by way of a suggestion—that the house might sit in the forenoon and adjourn for the afternoon when the proceedings take place on parliament hill, provided, of course, that this procedure meets with general approval.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

REFERENCE TO CHAIRMAN OF SEAWAY AUTHORITY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Acting Minister of Transport whether he is aware of the fact that the chairman of the St. Lawrence seaway authority who presided at the opening ceremony of the St. Lawrence seaway on Friday was born in Twillingate and educated in Bonavista?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that fact. I am sure the house is very pleased to hear it.

RESEARCH

ESTABLISHMENT OF QUEEN ELIZABETH II FUND FOR RESEARCH INTO CHILDREN'S DISEASES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That in order to mark the occasion of Her Majesty's visit to Canada and her personal interest in the well-being of children, it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the establishment of the Queen Elizabeth II Canadian fund to aid in research on the diseases of children, for the purpose of assisting individuals or organizations to undertake or carry on research into the diseases of children and the causes, prevention and treatment of such diseases, and for the payment into the said fund of the sum of $1 million out of the consolidated revenue fund; to make provision for administrative and technical services and facilities required for the purposes of the act; and generally to make such other provisions as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Diefenbaker thereupon moved for a leave to introduce Bill No. C-65 to mark the occasion of Her Majesty's visit to Canada by providing for the establishment and administration of a fund to aid in research on the diseases of children.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read the second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Speaker: By unanimous consent now.

Mr. Diefenbaker moved the second reading of the bill.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak at any length. I appreciate the attitude of the house in agreeing that in respect of this measure immediate attention shall be given to the several readings to the end, if it meets with the approval of the house, that the legislation might be passed today and be made available for consideration in the other place.

I would point out first that it was on June 11 that the decision of the government of Canada was announced that in place of the usual gifts that are made to Her Majesty on great state occasions such as a visitation by her, it was decided that course should not be followed and that Canadians as a whole would like to see something of a memorial of the visit which would be generally beneficial to Her Majesty's subjects in Canada. As reported at page 4559 of Hansard I set forth the proposal which is now represented by the bill before the house.

In the course of the discussion the Leader of the Opposition mentioned a matter that had already received the consideration of the government. He suggested that with respect to the fund to be set up, provision might be made to enable private citizens to make contributions. I would ask leave of the house to make some reference to the several sections of the bill, though normally this is not done on second reading. I should like to answer by way of anticipation the questions that I believe might arise. The first would naturally be the wording of the preamble. The preamble is somewhat different from the normal preamble in that it starts with these words:

> Most Gracious Sovereign,
> Whereas it has pleased Your Majesty to approve the suggestion that the occasion of your visit to Canada and your personal interest in the well-being of children should be marked by the establishment in your name of a fund to be devoted to the furthering of research into the diseases of children and the prevention and cure of such diseases, to which all who wish in this way to make a gift to Your Majesty may contribute—

The wording is somewhat similar to the wording of appropriation bills. Then follows the actual enacting section:

> May it therefore please Your Majesty, that it may be enacted—

And so on. The purpose is to set up a fund to be known as the Queen Elizabeth II Canadian research fund to aid in research into the diseases of children. This is an objective that through the years has represented a particular interest on the part of Her Majesty. Her interest in children has been pre-eminent. On the occasion of her present visit one is more impressed than ever with the fact that while she occupies the position of Queen of Canada and in other parts of the commonwealth that of Queen of the several dominions and in still others that of head of the commonwealth, her interest in children is apparent wherever she appears.

As I said a moment ago, this fund has been generally applauded and approved throughout the country. Indeed, it has been most interesting during the past few weeks to have noted that several provinces—such as the province of Ontario and the province of Alberta—have set up funds for educational purposes and the provision of scholarships, those matters being within the exclusive ambit and jurisdiction of provincial authority. In the province of Quebec a fund has been set up for heart disease research. In other words, this visit in general will be marked by provision being made in many parts of our country for beneficial steps to raise standards both of education and health, to the end that Her Majesty's subjects may enjoy ever increasing standards.

In no field has it been more apparent that action should be taken than in the field of children's diseases. Indeed, the tremendous changes which have taken place in the last 25 or 50 years in this and other fields have brought about an increase in life expectancy. There are those who today predict that in consequence of medical advance in research within this century, a man may well look forward, where the highest medical standards prevail, to an expectancy of close to 100 years.

In order to make this fund widely available for support on the part of Canadians as a whole and also of individuals who choose to make contributions, provision is made that gifts, bequests, appropriations and other contributions may be made not only now but throughout the years that follow while this fund is being administered. In the typewritten draft which was delivered to the Leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Assiniboia, section 5, subsection 2 provided that a chairman and six trustees be appointed by Her Majesty the Queen by commission under the great seal of Canada. The law officers have advised me today that there is no necessity to have that section included, and all contributions made will be subject to the usual rules respecting contributions to charitable organizations under the Income Tax Act. Therefore there will be no need to have that portion of section 5 included in the bill.

In so far as the purposes are concerned, those purposes are set forth in section 3. That section provides that the fund is to assist individuals or organizations to carry on research into the diseases of children and the causes, prevention and treatment of such diseases. There is also provision for an audit and a report to parliament so that parliament, having contributed on behalf of the Canadian people $1 million, will exercise that degree of parliamentary control which is essential in expenditures made by parliament and on behalf of the Canadian people.

I think there is nothing further that I need add. The general acceptance of the principle was made clear by members representing the official opposition and the C.C.F. group when the matter first came before the house. I believe this is a major step forward in achieving that relationship between the Queen and her subjects which represents something mystical and yet real, which was so apparent two days ago at the opening of the St. Lawrence waterway when she represented the people of Canada, and in co-operation with the President of the United States gave an exemplification of co-operation which might well be the hope of other parts of the world. In her person she represents the unity of our nation within the commonwealth, and in the personification of her position through funds such as this she typifies the essence of democracy, which is co-operation for the benefit of all her subjects.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is not of course, normal procedure to put a bill through all stages, as we are doing today with this bill, in such a short period of time before, indeed, we have had an opportunity in advance to study the bill. But, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, the circumstances are not normal. Even in respect of the language of the bill we are impressed by the fact that the circumstances are not normal. Not only are they abnormal; they are very happy indeed, and are circumstances which make it desirable to put this bill through the house in one day so it can be passed by the time the Queen reaches her capital tomorrow.

The objective of the bill, Mr. Speaker, is one which will appeal, I am sure, to all Canadians, designed as it is to facilitate research into children's diseases; and we are sure that objective will be aided by this particular act. We know the need. We know also there is great need of research in other related fields, such as heart disease and cancer. This particular bill will make a contribution to this need. I am glad the Prime Minister and the government have seen fit to include in the bill a provision by which individuals may make contributions to the fund. It will associate individuals with the government in pursuit of a worthy objective.

Mr. Speaker, I am reminded that in the celebration of King George V's jubilee some years ago a fund was set up for cancer research to which contributions came from individual Canadians to an amount, I think, of something over half a million dollars. It was a fund which did much at that time to facilitate research into this dread disease, as also I am sure this fund will do at this time. I recall that that particular fund was put under the trusteeship of the prime minister, the chief justice, and I think also the leader of the opposition, and I believe it was an effectively administered fund, as I know this will be. I would merely express the hope that the Department of National Health and Welfare may be closely associated with the administration of this particular fund.

So, Mr. Speaker, we on this side give our warm and hearty support to this legislation. We know that as a result the children who have been welcoming Her Majesty the Queen with such unrestrained enthusiasm and who have shown no trace of indifference to her visit will in the future, because of the passing of this legislation, have even greater cause to welcome that visit.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on behalf of this group to express our complete support for this humanitarian measure, and I am sure this measure, as the leader of the official opposition has said, will receive the support of the whole nation.

This bill to provide a gift of $1 million to Her Majesty will form the foundation of a fund which will grow as the years go by to establish and carry on research into the diseases of children.

Mr. Speaker, Her Majesty is the symbol of the past, present and future of the commonwealth and all it stands for. This gift, this fund, will provide for research to remedy some of our neglect in the past; it will provide the financial resources so badly needed in the present for the benefit and for the welfare of the children of today and of the future. We in this group trust that from this token of affection for Her Majesty, this happy thought, this common sense measure, which has our unanimous approval, and from this mutual expression of our common humanity will flow an ever-increasing stream of benefits for children of today and generations yet unborn.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

Clauses 1-4 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 5—Board of trustees.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Perhaps I might say a word with regard to clause 5. The printed form of the bill contains just subclause 1, to establish the board of trustees, and subclause 2—"the head office of the board shall be at the city of Ottawa." It does not contain the words to which I made reference in my earlier remarks. Those words appear exclusively in the typewritten form, but if the printed form is accepted there would be no need of another amendment.

Clauses 6-15 inclusive agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not wish to make any comments on the merits of this bill, but I do hope that the Minister of National Health and Welfare will become very closely associated with this measure. As the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, there is no reference to the department of health and welfare in the bill, but it would seem to me because of the national health program the Minister of National Health and Welfare must be very intimately associated with this measure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition, now repeated by the hon. member for Essex East, is one which will receive the fullest consideration. As a matter of fact, no other department will be more intimately concerned with the objectives which this legislation has in mind. For that reason I know the minister of health and welfare and his department will have wide responsibilities under this legislation.

Mr. McMillan: Is it intended to appoint pediatricians to the board of trustees? I am very much in favour of this measure. I think Canadians in the past have done wonderful work in the field of research, for instance in the investigation and treatment of diabetes. Children were very vulnerable to diabetes and often died from its effects until Dr. Banting discovered insulin. I am just wondering whether the government intends to appoint pediatricians to the board of trustees, or whether such medical groups are to function apart from the board.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not speaking with finality on the subject. The suggestion made by the hon. member is worthy of consideration. I think in the administration of this act representation should be fairly widespread, covering not only pediatricians and a representative of the national research council but also the department of health and welfare and possibly one or more representatives from provincial departments of health, to the end that in the administration the objective of the measure will be attained to the fullest possible degree.

Mr. Herridge: I realize that I am somewhat out of order, but I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister with regard to clause 5. I did not hear the clause passed. I am referring to the Prime Minister's explanation that there was no necessity for this clause to contain the words "the board will be a charitable organization in Canada". Because I am interested in doing everything possible to promote gifts to the fund, would the Prime Minister mind explaining to the house why that phrase should not be necessary, and what other legislation protects persons who might wish to make donations to this fund?

Mr. Diefenbaker: As I pointed out—and possibly my remarks did not have the clarity they should have possessed—in the typewritten copy the words referred to by the hon. gentleman appear, namely "the board shall be a charitable organization in Canada". In the printed copy those words do not appear, and the reason for that change was that in the light of fuller consideration by the law officers of the crown, and in order to keep the bill as simple as possible, the words "charitable organization in Canada" were thought to be unnecessary in order to achieve the objectives and purposes of the measure and were, accordingly, omitted.

The hon. gentleman will note that clause 12 reads:

> A gift or bequest to the fund or to the board for the purposes of the fund shall be deemed to be a gift to Her Majesty.

If we had left in the earlier words in clause 5 there would have been redundancy or, at least, duplication. The meaning of clause 12 is simply this; that any person, individual, corporation or the like who chooses to make a contribution to the fund will be entitled under the Income Tax Act to those credits which are allowed with regard to contributions to charitable organizations.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was puzzled by that language. As the Prime Minister knows, I am not a lawyer, but is a gift to Her Majesty a charitable donation under the Income Tax Act?

Mr. Diefenbaker: As a matter of fact the credit is given when the wording is "a gift to Her Majesty in the right of Canada" but it was felt that there was no necessity, in the opinion of the law officers of the crown, to include those words "in the right of Canada".

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

AMENDMENT TO REVISE AND CONSOLIDATE CERTAIN PENSION PROVISIONS, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 23, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-57, an act respecting the superannuation of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—Mr. Fulton—Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Finance explained that the purpose of this bill was to revise the old Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act and make it less confusing, but after reading this bill I have reached the conclusion that far from being less confusing it is more confusing and incomprehensible. It would have been better to change the former act and leave just one piece of legislation on the statute books instead of creating several acts referring one to the other. For instance, the former act used to bear the name Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act which is precisely the short title of Bill C-34. The former act has been amended and bears the name Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act. It was formerly chapter 241 of the revised statutes of Canada, 1953.

An examination of the new bill indicates that most sections of the former act have been repealed with the exception of four or five sections. While the former act is repealed we see that the new bill makes many references to the former act, which still applies to some members of the force who get benefits under the new bill. It is difficult to understand how we can determine what section of the act will apply to one particular member of the force if we have to consult anywhere from three to six acts in order to learn what a member is entitled to. The new bill refers many times to the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian forces superannuation act and the former act which has been repealed. The minister has made the law much more confused than it was previously.

Another criticism of the new bill arises from the fact that interpretations or definitions of words are scattered throughout the bill. Clause 2 gives definitions of a few words, but others are defined in other clauses. Clause 6 subclause 2 defines "interests", clause 8 subclause 1 defines "annuity", "immediate annuity", "deferred annuity", "cash termination allowance" and "return of contributions". Clause 14 defines "widow" and "widower", clause 15 defines "recipient", clause 17 defines "elective contributor" and clause 29 defines "former act". Does the minister not agree that there should be one definition clause or interpretation section?

Another weakness of the new bill is that some clauses contain sentences ranging from 37 to 42 lines in length without a period. Clause 5 contains a sentence of over 104 lines. When you reach the end of it and encounter the verb you have forgotten the subject to which it applies. I know it will be answered that these are excerpts from old acts, but my main criticism is that instead of one comprehensive act we now have five or more.

Bill No. C-57 is called the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act. We have also recently passed Bill No. C-34, which bears the name Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act. This was the name of the former act now amended by Bill No. C-57, which will hereafter be referred to as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act. Sometimes the bill refers to the former act which applies to some members of the force. Therefore reference is made to a former act which has been repealed. I understand that the word "repealed" means the act is no longer in effect. When the next revised statutes of Canada are printed I am sure they will not contain former acts which have been repealed, and in order to get information in respect to certain cases we will have to refer back to previous revised statutes in orders to obtain the information we seek.

Surely it would have been less confusing if we could have had one act to cover every circumstance and case. I have observed that words such as "pension" "benefit" and "contribution" are interpreted in the same way and repeated in all these bills or acts. The Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Pension Continuation Act are based on the same principle, so there could be one piece of legislation dealing with all the categories of people mentioned who take advantage of these various clauses. My good friend will deal with this in more detail when we come to the different sections.

I regret that the Minister of Justice, in introducing new bills to clarify the matter or make it less confusing, has missed the point. I ask him to see next year or two years from now whether he cannot take advantage of these suggestions and instead of having four, five or six bills which are intermingled, introduce one clear bill which will apply to every category of the R.C.M. Police, the Canadian forces and the civil service. If he will look into all the acts covering these people he will find that the ways of calculating the service one has given to the government come to about the same thing. Sometimes there may be a difference of one or two years, as we said when we discussed Bill No. C-37. Sometimes one category has a greater advantage than the other but still some of these bills are much more confused than they were before.

It is very difficult to interpret this new bill which refers to the former act, which is being repealed in respect of some of its contents but still bears another name. I ask the Minister of Justice and his officials to introduce a new superannuation bill next year so that anyone who wishes to look into it in order to find his own category will not have to refer to four or five other acts, or to a law which is repealed except for a few sections.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I should like to raise at this point a question which I was not aware of when the Canadian forces superannuation act was discussed either in principle on second reading or in committee of the whole. I was informed that there is some difference with respect to the Canadian forces, the civil service and the R.C.M.P. retirement leave or rehabilitation leave. A member of the Canadian army or of the Canadian navy with 20 years' service is granted before retirement four months' rehabilitation leave plus 30 days annual leave. I am told that is done according to the regulations of those services. In the civil service a man with 20 years' service is granted three months' rehabilitation leave plus one month annual leave, as he is entitled to under the regulations.

I am told that in the R.C.M.P. it is quite different. A man with 20 years' service actually is granted two months' rehabilitation leave and in some cases is granted annual leave only because I am told, the annual leave in the R.C.M.P. cannot be taken unless the person actually worked in that particular fiscal year. Therefore it would seem to me there is a difference of appreciation of service of some kind, or a difference in the chance that a member of either of those forces has as opposed to those in civil life.

As I said before, retirement leave is known in all the services. The Canadian forces, the civil service and the R.C.M.P. have rehabilitation leave. This is given on the grounds that those persons are subject to transfer during the last period of service, and to provide those persons with a chance to decide where they will establish their domicile at retirement on pension. It may be that a person who enlisted in the R.C.M.P. while he was domiciled in Nova Scotia may reach the retirement stage of his career in Alberta. This leave is given to him in order to give him a chance, as I said, to decide where to go on retirement.

As I said earlier, in the civil service an individual receives three months' rehabilitation leave, and in the Canadian forces he receives four months. Why is it not possible for all these public servants, the Canadian forces personnel, the R.C.M.P. personnel, to be given the same period of rehabilitation or retirement leave?

This is a point I was not aware of earlier. If I had been I would have raised it on the bill presented by the Minister of National Defence. I want to raise it now so the Minister of Justice will be able to consult with the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State to try to iron out those differences and give the R.C.M.P. personnel the same chance that the members of the Canadian forces have, and so that at the same time the members of the public service will have the same chance as the Canadian forces personnel, namely the four months' rehabilitation leave and the 30 days annual leave.

I raise this point now because I was unable to see where in the act I could raise it.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, to deal first with the point raised by the hon. member for Megantic, I should explain that retirement leave does not form part of the provisions regarding superannuation. It is, therefore, not covered in any way in the superannuation bill. Retirement leave in the police is taken care of by the regulations under the main act which we recently passed in this house.

I am informed that with respect to both the armed forces and the public service generally the same scheme is followed, that the question of retirement leave is covered by regulations under the National Defence Act or under the Civil Service Act, as the case may be. So in no case are the provisions for retirement leave set or even regulated under the superannuation act. They are covered by regulations under the main acts in each case.

It is true that there are variations in the amounts of retirement leave made available as between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and other branches of the public service, but we have prepared and have ready now for submission to treasury board new draft regulations under the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act when it shall have become law, and those regulations will introduce uniform standards, in so far as uniform standards are possible, as between the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and other branches of the public service.

Mr. Roberge: Would the minister permit a question at this time? It is based on information passed to me by one of my colleagues. I am informed that the regulations were more or less drafted with the aid of those people who deal with superannuation in the civil service.

Mr. Fulton: That is correct. These regulations, in so far as they have any financial implications, are always discussed with treasury board first and in that way—

Mr. Pickersgill: I presume the minister means the staff of treasury board.

Mr. Fulton: Treasury board staff, treasury board officials—and in that way there is assurance that they will be co-ordinated and in so far as possible differences as between various branches of the public service will be eliminated.

With respect to the remarks of the hon. member for St. Denis, I have to confess that the R.C.M.P. superannuation bill is a complicated measure. It may not be a completely adequate defence but I can defend it in part at least on the ground that that is true of other superannuation measures, the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Canadian forces superannuation bill which was approved by the house just recently. But I can assure him that, again in so far as it is possible to do so, the three measures will now proceed on exactly the same basis and there will be uniformity in the superannuation provisions applicable to the public service generally, the armed forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police of Canada. This bill then is of a uniform pattern with the other superannuation measures passed by parliament.

I also agree with him that it is perhaps unfortunate that there must be a reference back to other measures, but unless we made reference back to other measures under which pensions have been payable to members of the force in the past I can assure my hon. friend that this bill, as my officials suggest, might be at least twice as complicated as it is at the moment and certainly would be twice as long.

I am interested in the suggestion that there should be one general superannuation act covering all branches of the public service, that is, the civil service, the armed forces and the R.C.M.P. I would have thought it more efficient and clearer to have three separate bills, because inevitably there are certain differences in the conditions of service and thus in the superannuation benefits as between the three services. I would think that if you had one general act you would have to introduce so many detailed provisions making variations and exceptions that you would not in fact accomplish the object of clarity.

It is a matter in which other ministers are just as concerned as I am; therefore it is not one on which I can act unilaterally. However, the suggestion is worth looking at, and I am quite sure that the officials before me will take note of it. Indeed, I will see that it is discussed with treasury board officials, but I would not care to go beyond that because, as I say, it seems to me there would be more difficulties and complications created than there would be saved by following such a course.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, may I mention one point with respect to the definition of the word "pay". We have two different definitions in two sections of our law because section 2 of the former act is not repealed. In Bill C-57 we have another definition of the word "pay" in clause 2 (j). Which one is to apply? We have a third definition in section 93 of the old act. Which one applies when we want to know the meaning of the word "pay"? The minister was supposed to eradicate such confusion from the legislation.

Mr. Fulton: The definition of "pay" as given in the new clause 2 will be the definition of application to Bill C-57 itself and all pensions and superannuation benefits which are to be determined in accordance with this bill. But in part III the bill provides for a continuation act; therefore the definition of "pay" in section 2 of the old act, which as my hon. friend says is not repealed, will be the definition which has application for the purpose of the continuation pensions or continuation superannuation.

Mr. Denis: What about section 93 in part V of the old act, subsection (h)? This part is repealed.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, that disappears entirely because part V of the pension provisions of the former Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act is being replaced by the bill now before us, so there is no need to continue any part of part V of the old Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, while we were considering the previous measure having to do with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police I asked the minister a question and made some reference to the superannuation for the retiring commissioner. At that time the minister pointed out to me that the appropriate time to deal with that matter would be when the measure now before us came up for consideration. I am having a little difficulty in trying to locate the clause which might deal with that phase of superannuation. May I also say to the minister that I hold no brief from the retiring commissioner to speak about the matter, but my interest is more than just academic. My interest stems from the fact that a very formidable editorial appeared in the Montreal Star which raised the question, and it is quite possible that similar situations might arise in the future.

I do not have to discuss at this time the merits of the retiring commissioner, and I know the minister has recognized the great service he has rendered to the country. But there seems to be a feeling, as expressed in the Montreal Star, that here is a man who retired almost at the point when he would have reached his maximum superannuation, and he did not retire for any of the causes mentioned in the act which would in some way disqualify him. I am raising this point now on clause 1 because I do not know on what clause I can discuss the matter. I do not know whether it would be clause 17 dealing with special cases, clause 20 dealing with the establishment of a pension board or clause 21 which sets up regulations for the pension board.

I am hopeful that somewhere within these sections there is a provision that could enable the pension board or parliament or the governor in council to say, or would give them the authority to say, either dealing with this case or any similar case in the future, that here is a public servant who has given Canada very satisfactory and excellent service but who through circumstances of a disagreement felt it was not consistent to hold his job—whatever the circumstances, he retires; and he retires, I do not say with the blessing of the minister or of the house but certainly without any hostility—and it is felt that after 20 some years of service he should not be prejudiced.

Mr. Fulton: Thirty-four years.

Mr. Crestohl: The minister says 34 years. That makes my case still stronger. I am not arguing Mr. Nicholson's case. I am arguing the case generally of a man who has had that record and who has actually been prejudiced by his retirement through no fault of his own, and am asking whether a provision should not be created, if one does not exist, by which the country can say to a man like that, "You are on the point of retiring; you have another year or two years to go. We will grant you two years' leave of absence and allow you to retire on your full pension". I believe it would be a popular measure throughout the country, and I believe it would be well received.

While we cannot decorate a man for public service of this kind, we can recognize it to some extent by seeing that he is not prejudiced. I do not care what the amount involved is. He should be permitted to retire on full pension and a fortiori if he has only one more year to go in order to achieve it.

[Mr. Crestohl.]

What provision is there in the act that would enable parliament, the pension board or the governor in council to deal with a case of that kind?

Mr. Fulton: There is no provision in the act or in the bill before us which would enable parliament or the governor in council to deal, of its own motion as it were under the act, with a case of that kind. A special case of the type which this retirement certainly represents would, in my opinion, not be a proper one to cover in an act of general application.

The scheme of a retirement or superannuation act such as this one or the old parts of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act which it replaces is, especially in the case of officers, to require a period of minimum service which must be fulfilled before full pension will be payable to an officer who retires voluntarily. I think this is a sound provision because, it will be appreciated, the organization of the force would be difficult to maintain if there were any encouragement or, indeed, if there were any lack of discouragement of officers, particularly those in key positions, retiring before they have served the length of time which it is agreed it is reasonable to ask for.

Second, there is a substantial investment—to put the matter on economic terms alone—in the training and careers of officers and it is therefore a matter of policy to discourage them from retiring voluntarily before they have completed the minimum length of service. In the case of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police the minimum length of service for officers is 35 years. That is the minimum length of service before full pension will be paid on voluntary retirement. After he has completed 35 years of service an officer may retire voluntarily and he will get the full pension which he has earned by his length of service. But in order to carry out the policy to which I have referred, namely to discourage voluntary retirement while an officer is still able to serve efficiently, there is in the present act, in section 45, a provision that an officer who retires voluntarily after 25 years of service but with less than 35 years of service is entitled to a pension for life of 20 per cent less than he would have been entitled to if he were retired compulsorily.

That provision is in there for this purpose. As will be appreciated, if an officer is retired compulsorily before he completes his full term of service—either because, let us say, he incurs some medical or physical disability which makes him unable efficiently to serve or if for any other reason it becomes desirable to discharge him from the force or to remove him from the force—it should be possible to retire him compulsorily without his incurring any penalty with respect to his pension. That is why the section to which I have referred, namely section 45, is framed in that way; that an officer retiring voluntarily after 25 years' service is entitled to a pension for life 20 per cent less than he would be entitled to if he were retired compulsorily. But the effect of that provision—and it is a principle with which I agree—is to deprive an officer who retires voluntarily before he has completed the full length of service of a portion of his pension. It is a penalty with respect to which the act leaves no option. As I have said, I think it is a sound position for the reasons I have given.

With respect to the individual case of Commissioner Nicholson, however, I am reasonably convinced that parliament did not intend that type of case to be covered or be dealt with in this way, or that parliament would not have intended that case to be dealt with in this way if it had been before parliament at the time the act was being drafted. Here you have a case, as the hon. gentleman says, of an officer within one year or, I think it was, one year and some three days, of the maximum length of service, namely 35 years, after which he would have been able to retire voluntarily on full pension and who felt in his conscience that he was unable to continue to serve for reasons which were given and which we do not need to go into here. He therefore felt called upon to retire.

This is not the ordinary case of an officer just deciding after a certain period, "I want to get out. I can go out on full pension and therefore I will go." This was an exceptional case. I do not know that there has ever been a case like this one previously. However, as I have said, the act left no option but to impose —if I may put it that way—a 20 per cent penalty. As I have already said, I am quite certain that parliament would not have intended this particular case to be dealt with in this way. However, I was and I am still unable to deal with it in any other way in view of the provisions of the act as enacted by parliament. I do not think we should change the provision of the new bill to provide exceptions of general application, because I think cases such as this are so exceptional that it would be unsound to introduce them into the bill.

However, what I should like to say is that I have been concerned over the fact that the former commissioner, following what he regarded to be an honourable course, a course which he felt he had no option but to follow, should have been penalized in this way. While, as I say, I had some disagreement with him as to whether he was right in following that course, and I made it clear that I did not think he was right, nevertheless I respected his motives and his sincerity. However, only parliament can adjust the situation. My hands and those of the governor in council are tied by the provision of the pension act.

In order to bring this matter to a head I am prepared to say this. If there is any indication from parliament, as constituted here in committee of the whole of the House of Commons, that they agree with what my hon. friend opposite has said and with what I have just said as to the undesirability of penalizing an officer with this record, and if I have any general indication that parliament would like to see the matter rectified or adadjusted in this individual case, I would be perfectly prepared and indeed happy to recommend to my colleagues that an appropriate provision be inserted in the estimates of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for next year. It would be a provision having legislative effect. It would be a provision the effect of which would be to restore to this particular person the pension he would have got had he completed his full 35 years of service.

Mr. Crestohl: Mr. Chairman, I agree with the minister in his analysis that it would be unwise to make such a provision in this act. I certainly agree with his reasoning in not including it. But if the minister will remember, I said that if I had possessed the authority to introduce a bill when I was on my feet speaking on the matter I would not have hesitated to do so. I was very happy to hear the minister's approach and his desire to deal with this matter. I feel that would certainly gratify the entire country and certainly would recognize a loyal civil servant who stepped out in a manner which was symbolic of the force itself in the way Mr. Nicholson did retire.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I have spoken to the Leader of the Opposition—not the "official" opposition for the benefit of the hon. member for Kootenay West, who is not in his seat—and as far as we are concerned the suggestion made by the minister we think is very good. I hope if there are any further supplementary estimates in this parliament the minister might—

Mr. Fulton: In this session.

Mr. Pickersgill: —in this session, the minister might consider the matter a little earlier.

Clause agreed to.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): The Chair will call the definition clause in whole instead of in part, unless the committee wishes otherwise.

Mr. Roberge: I want to address myself particularly to paragraph (d).

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Then we will go one by one.

On clause 2, subclause (1), paragraph (d) —Disabled.

Mr. Roberge: On paragraph (d), I note there is a difference from section 2 of the Public Service Superannuation Act, and I want to have reference to the latter part of the subclause. In the bill as proposed the word "ordinarily" is used in line 5, and in the Public Service Superannuation Act the word "regularly" is employed. Is there any reason for that, or any difference in the meaning; and why was the change made?

Mr. Fulton: I am told by the draftsmen that they think "ordinarily" is a slight improvement on "regularly", and I would therefore suggest that if there has to be a change our act should be taken as the model and not the former one, because ours is the newer one. I am told there is no substantial difference. When I said "because ours is the newer one" I recognize, of course, that that is not a good reason. We think "ordinarily" is better, but I am told there is no substantial difference. However, if there is to be a change perhaps it should be by changing "regularly" to read "ordinarily", rather than by changing "ordinarily" to read "regularly".

Mr. Denis: Does the minister also take credit for the added confusion in the law?

Mr. Fulton: I see no confusion in the use of the word "ordinarily".

Mr. Roberge: Would the minister indicate what is the difference, or the amelioration?

Mr. Fulton: As I say, I do not think there is any substantial difference. I would think that "ordinarily" is a little more in favour of the member than the word "regularly" would be.

Mr. Roberge: Is the Chair intending to call them clause by clause?

Mr. McCleave: I think the committee has agreed the Chair shall call them by a breakdown.

Mr. Roberge: I suggest the entire clause be called.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Contributions.

Mr. Roberge: I would like to ask the minister if there are any members of the force now receiving less than $1,500 a year in salary.

Mr. Fulton: Less than $1,500 salary?

Mr. Roberge: Pay and allowances.

Mr. Fulton: A few special constables may be receiving less. I am told the minimum there is $1,420 per annum.

Mr. Roberge: On that question, under the old Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, a man who was receiving $1,200 a year or less was paying 5 per cent as contribution; a man who was receiving $1,200 and less than $1,500 would be paying 5½ per cent; and those who were receiving $1,500 or more were paying 6 per cent. Under this act as proposed I note that for the male members of the force it is an even 6 per cent for all.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I can clear this up; I have probably created a wrong impression. I was asked whether there were persons receiving less than $1,500 in pay and allowances, and I am afraid I gave the answer with respect to pay only. The lowest paid special constable receives $1,420, but these special constables, I am told, receive a double ration allowance, and that would put them over $1,500. Therefore we feel 6 per cent on uniform application is fair.

Mr. Roberge: Well, if everyone is receiving pay and allowances of over $1,500, it is all right.

Mr. Fulton: That is correct.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Pensionable service.

Mr. Denis: I wish to point out to the Minister of Justice that clause 5 is 104 lines long. Moreover, within this same clause reference is made to part V of the former act. It refers to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, and I would like to ask if it relates to the bill passed last week, or does it refer to the former act which bears the same name? Is it the former act which bears that name, or is it—

Mr. Fulton: It is the new act.

Mr. Denis: C-37?

Mr. Fulton: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does that not raise a dangerous point, which I think came up before in the course of other legislation? Is this not rather a presumption that hon. gentlemen in the other place are simply going to rubber stamp something that came from this place?

Mr. Fulton: Not at all, because both these bills, the superannuation bill and the police bill, are to come into force on proclamation, and if the other place were to refuse to pass one or other of them we would have to consider an amendment to the one they refused to pass. But we do not anticipate anything like that, and we feel that, since both are made subject to proclamation—

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it is a somewhat dubious proceeding, but I do not think I will go beyond that.

Mr. Denis: I did not finish the references to the 104 lines of this section. In order to try to comprehend this clause you still have to read the National Defence Act. On page 6 you have to read the Public Service Superannuation Act and then at line 33 you have to read the Civil Service Superannuation Act, the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian forces superannuation act and the Canadian Forces Act, 1950, as amended by the Canadian Forces Act of 1954. You have to read all those acts in order to understand, if you can, this clause 5 which has about 104 lines with no period except the last.

Mr. Fulton: The reason for that is simple. We do have persons transferring to the force from the armed services. They have accumulated certain superannuation benefits under the provisions of the act applicable in that regard, so we have to refer to those acts when we are providing for the carrying into force of those pensions. Similarly those transferring from other branches of the public service have accumulated certain rights applicable to them, and we have to refer back to those acts when defining the extent of the benefits which they are entitled to bring forward into the force on transfer.

Mr. Denis: I do not object to these references being put into this clause. What I am trying to tell the Minister of Justice is that in trying to make the law less confused he did not succeed to the extent that he could put it into the newspapers and make publicity out of it.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps we never succeed to the extent we should like, but I think any member of the force who comes in on transfer will understand what these provisions mean, and if he does not we will be glad to see that the proper officers of the force or of treasury board explain exactly what they mean.

Mr. Denis: I believe in the R.C.M.P.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 6 and 7 agreed to.

On clause 8—Kinds of benefits.

Mr. Roberge: On clause 8, I have read the record of Hansard for the year 1952 and I have failed to find any reference to section 8 of the Public Service Superannuation Act. I wonder why. I should like the minister to refer to this bill, especially in line 32. I should like to know why, when there is a return of contributions, that return is made without interest; but when a member of the force has to pay arrears he is called on to pay with interest at 4 per cent per annum.

Mr. Fulton: I am informed that the main reason is to preserve the actuarial soundness of the superannuation fund on the basis of contributions at the rate of 6 per cent, and that if contributors when they became entitled to withdraw contributions also became entitled to withdraw them with interest it would be necessary to increase the rate of contributions to keep the fund on an actuarially sound basis.

Mr. Aiken: There were some increases in pensions allowed in 1958. I should like to ask the minister if the new method of calculating benefits will lead to any increase in the over-all picture, or if they will receive approximately the same benefits as were then allowed.

Mr. Fulton: The provisions to which my hon. friend has just referred related to pensions which were already in effect, benefits received by persons who had gone on retirement some time ago, and as he will recall, it was felt that those pensions were too small. Therefore the Minister of Finance introduced first by order in council and then asked the house—and the house agreed—to ratify it by legislation, a scale of increases in those pensions. That, however, will have no effect on the method of computing benefits under this bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely the minister does not mean to suggest that the Minister of Finance paid out additional money to pensioners or anyone else by order in council.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps I have been a little careless in my terminology. The provision was first made by an item in the estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Appropriation Act.

Mr. Fulton: It was then incorporated in the Appropriation Act. I should have said "by estimate" and not "by order in council". It was done by an estimate on the first occasion and then by statute.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 9—Computation of annuities.

Mr. Roberge: On clause 9 I have one more observation. On the bill we passed the other day to amend the Canadian forces superannuation act the method of computing was six years, and in this bill it is also six years. Under the Public Service Superannuation Act passed in 1952-53 it was ten years. I should like to ask the reason if there is any reason for this and, if not, to suggest that next year the Public Service Superannuation Act be placed on the same basis.

Mr. Fulton: I am informed that there is an actuarial study now under way to see if that is feasible.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 10—Benefits payable on retirement.

Mr. Roberge: On clause 10, I do not remember if the Minister of Justice was in this committee on June 23 when I raised a question with the Minister of National Defence on the other bill. I would refer the minister to page 5046 of Hansard of June 23. I would not like to repeat the entire argument I made then, but I should like to summarize, otherwise I would not be logical with myself. I am taking the clause as a whole. Under 10(1), a member who has less than 10 years' service is entitled to a return of contributions or to a cash termination allowance, or if he has served in the forces for 10 or more years he is entitled to an annuity. Under subclause 2, that is the case of a member retiring on account of a disability after less than 10 years, he is entitled to a return of contributions or a cash allowance, but if he has 10 or more years' service he is entitled to an annuity. It seems to me that these two subsections referring to a member who has reached the retirement age or to a member who is disabled are alike, and that the member is entitled to exactly the same benefit.

However subclause 3 provides an immediate annuity after more than 20 years' service. It seems to me there is a certain degree of discrimination there. If a man is retired before reaching retirement age he is entitled to benefits. If he is disabled he is entitled to exactly the same. If he is retired from the force for reasons of economy or efficiency it is not his fault, and it seems to me that he is penalized. If he reaches retirement age it is not the fault of the force. Under subclause 3 he seems to have less choice or option than other members under subclauses 1 and 2.

I have prepared an informal amendment to subclause 3. I am afraid that if I move it I will be declared out of order because perhaps it would add a burden to the treasury. I should like to read the amendment as I have prepared it and submit it to the minister for his consideration. Perhaps he will get in touch with the Minister of National Defence, who has the same problem, and then ask the members of the other place to study the amendment and perhaps move it in the other place.

My proposed informal amendment reads:

That subclause 3 of clause 10 be amended by deleting subparagraphs (a), (b) and (c) thereof and by substituting therefor the following subparagraphs:

(a) If he has served in the force for less than ten years, he is entitled to

(i) a return of contributions, or

(ii) a cash termination alowance, whichever is the greater, and

(b) If he has served in the force for ten or more years, he is entitled to an immediate annuity.

As I say, I am not moving this as a formal amendment because it would be out of order coming from a member of the opposition rather than a member of the government. However, I should like to submit it to the minister so he could consider it in the meantime before the bill goes to the other place. On the other hand, if he wishes to consider it now I should be happy to have him do so.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the care with which the hon. gentleman has studied this matter and prepared his suggested amendment, but without making a final decision as to whether or not I could accept it at the moment I must say to the hon. gentleman that it does run counter to the principle upon which clause 10 has been prepared. That principle very definitely is to treat more generously those who are retired by reason of disability than those who are retired compulsorily for any other reason such as to promote efficiency or economy. We feel that those who have to retire because they have incurred some disability while they have been serving members are entitled to more generous treatment than those who have to be retired without having incurred disability for such reasons as to promote economy or efficiency, because in the former case the member would have continued to be a useful and valuable member of the force but he has been disabled through no fault of his own. In the latter case the member would not continue to be a useful and valuable member of the force and that is why he is retired compulsorily.

It has been felt as a matter of general principle that the former member should be treated more generously than the latter. I would not care to be taken as giving any commitment that we would depart from that principle, but I will study the proposed amendment. If I can see my way clear to accepting it I shall do so, but it must be understood that I am not to be taken now to be giving a commitment to accept it. If that is understood I am prepared to leave it there.

Mr. Roberge: I would be glad if the minister would take it into consideration if it does not offend any actuarial principle.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 11 to 18 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 19—Service that may be counted.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I realize that I am in the hands of the committee here and the committee is being very generous, but I have an amendment to propose myself to clause 19. I do not know whether or not it is fair to ask the committee to continue its generosity.

Mr. Roberge: We would agree to go beyond one o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: The amendment is fairly long and the committee may want to take time to consider it before deciding upon it. I would ask my colleague to read the amendment in order that the committee may have an opportunity to study it.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That Bill No. C-57, a act respecting the superannuation of members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, be amended

(a) by striking out lines 9 and 10 on page 21 thereof and substituting therefor the following: 'any period of service in the force or any period of service described in section 5, that,'; and

(b) by striking out lines 41 to 51 on page 22 thereof and substituting therefor the following: 'of any service of that person described in subsection (1), and the person so electing shall be subject to the provisions of subsection (1) in all respects as though he had not become entitled to an annuity, annual allowance or pension under that act but had elected under subsection (1) to pay for the whole of that service.'

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, may I suggest that I give the explanation so it will be on the record. Perhaps then we can let this clause stand and deal with the others. When hon. members have had an opportunity of considering the reasons for the amendment we could deal with the amendment and the clause later.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, may I inquire if the purpose of this amendment is the same as that of the amendment to the Canadian forces pension act?

Mr. Fulton: Exactly the same.

Mr. Roberge: We are prepared to agree to it.

Mr. Pickersgill: We could deal with it right away.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clauses 20 to 45 inclusive agreed to.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, before we carry the title I should like to express appreciation to hon. members of the committee for their generosity in allowing me to get the bill through this stage at this time.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a third time; now?

Mr. Pickersgill: By leave.

Mr. Fulton moved third reading of the bill.

SEEDS ACT

MEASURE RESPECTING TESTING, INSPECTION AND SALE

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-24, respecting the testing, inspection and sale of seeds.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the explanatory note attached to this bill, which is now in the hands of hon. members, states:

The purpose of this bill is to revise the Seeds Act to meet recent trends and developments in the production, processing and merchandising of seeds. The bill contemplates no substantive changes in policy and is in a form similar to other agricultural statutes enacted in recent years.

The Seeds Act is the instrument which ensures the reliability of seeds sold to Canadian farmers. The first legislation in this field was introduced in 1905 and the present act has been on the statute books since 1923, which is the reason that a revision is necessary at this time.

The act and the regulations under it establish quality standards for seeds for such factors as germination and purity; require imported seed to meet minimum quality standards; and provide for the licensing of new varieties of certain crops and for the grading of registered seed produced under crop pedigree certificates of the Canadian Seed

Growers' Association. It is in connection with this act that seed testing laboratories are maintained by the department.

The bill to revise the act in no way changes the basic requirements of the present statute. The act now, however, contains certain provisions of detail of a nature which require amendment from time to time to conform to changing conditions of seed production and distribution. These have to do with such matters as markings on seed containers, the specific grades which are to be used for seeds, the types of inspection certificates which are to be issued, and the crops to which variety licensing is to apply. Several of these detailed provisions are in need of revision, and representations to that effect have been made by the Canadian Seed Growers' Association and the Canadian Seed Trade Association, the two bodies chiefly concerned with this act and regulations under it.

These detailed requirements are deleted from the bill revising the act and authority is provided to prescribe them by regulation of the governor in council. The bill in this respect is in a form similar to other agricultural statutes enacted in recent years.

I might mention one matter which will be familiar to any hon. members associated with seed production and which constituted one reason for revising the act. The act now establishes two classes of pedigreed seed, namely registered and certified. Registered seed is based on the registration of crops by the Canadian Seed Growers' Association, while certified seed is based on the certification of crops by the department. These two services are, under present conditions, a duplication of each other, since both serve the purpose of guaranteeing the purchaser seed which is of a pure variety. The seed growers' association and other agricultural interests have urged that this duplication be removed.

The bill to revise the act, unlike the present act, does not establish classes and grades for seeds directly. It requires that seed must conform to prescribed standards and provides for grades to be established by regulation and for the use of the standards of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association. The present duplication between registered and certified seed can therefore be removed in the grades to be established by regulation under the act, and crop registration by the Canadian Seed Growers' Association can be recognized for grades of pedigreed seed.

I am pleased to be able to inform the house that the bill was approved both by the Canadian Seed Growers' Association and the Canadian Seed Trade Association at their recent annual convention in western Canada.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, having lived in the province of Manitoba longer than in any other province in this country, and knowing the province of Manitoba probably has a greater number of members of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association than any other province, I should like to say a few words with respect to the bill. The minister did read the innocent sounding explanatory note, and I imagine that the bill in its intentions is entirely along the lines of the explanation he has given.

This bill, of course, was introduced in the Senate by the government leader there, and he used a similar phrase. He said, as reported at page 766 of Senate Hansard:

> Certain details of the present act are deleted, and provision is made to establish them by regulations.

While I have no doubt that this is probably an efficient way to go about the operation of this act, I do find it a bit amusing, having heard for so many years criticism and abuse from members opposite to the extension of authority under order in council, but this was indicated as the main purpose of the bill before us. I think this was a frank cat out of the bag statement that was given by the government leader in the Senate. In other words, henceforth with respect to seed administration we are going to have a greater amount of government by order in council.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think hon. members will be gratified to know that while last year the actual sales of the products of specialists in seed growing to other farmers were lower and rather disappointing, their membership has actually increased very substantially, I think some 31 per cent more pedigree seed was grown when one compares 1957 with 1958; although, as I say, at the recent meeting of the Canadian Seed Producers' Association it was admitted that their actual sales of these very worth-while pedigreed crops, which were in abundance, had not sold as freely last year as one would have expected in this age when there is every desire to have the utmost efficiency.

While I know it is in slight breach of the rules to refer to a section of the bill, but inasmuch as I do not propose to speak on clause 1 of the bill I might just indicate that the co-operation between the association of specialized farmers who grow certified and registered seed is recognized by the government and has been for a great number of years, as set out in clause 4 (1)(a) where it says that the Canadian Seed Growers' Association will play a very prominent part in the establishing of the regulations to which the minister referred.

I think most members of the house are well aware that there is a very high degree of western interest in this measure, in that last year about 80 per cent of the growers who were issued certificates by the association were farmers of western Canada. With the exception of oats, practically all the registered and certified seed grains were produced in western Canada, and they also produced a very high percentage of the oil-bearing crops such as flax, rapeseed and the like, in addition to a great number of grasses and clovers. I think my own district of Kenora-Rainy River can be said to be a prominent area with respect to the growing of pedigree clover seed. At the recent annual meeting in Saskatoon the president of this association, Professor E. A. Lods, had this to say:

The main change involved—

He was referring to the new legislation, which is the result of co-operation between the association and the government over quite a number of years.

—is that the recording of certified stocks is added to what we have done in the past. Probably there will be changes as to details and possibly changes as to grades, names of grade and of classes of seed. However, the basic principles of pedigree seed production remain as before. Our objective is that of producing and making available seed, genuine as to kind and variety, and seed having a really high degree of purety as to variety. These are the essentials. The regulations were adopted so as to facilitate attaining our objective. They are not a sort of parade ground drill, they are not for us to follow simply as formalities; they are to help us avoid pitfalls when trying to produce good seed.

I have indicated that the membership of the seed growers association has increased very notably in the last year or two, now numbering some 7,000. I hope that the plant products division of the Department of Agriculture, in co-operation with this association and others who are interested in the matter, will be able to provide to more farmers with greater rapidity the types of improved seeds which will result in improvement of our crop quality.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the introduction of this legislation does something to stir my memories of years ago. We have come a long way in the past 25 or 30 years with respect to the registration and certification of seed. A classmate of mine at the Ontario Agricultural College, who graduated in 1913, went to British Columbia and became an official of the Department of Agriculture. It was his responsibility, under the Conservative government of the day, to visit the various farms on which seed was grown and to inspect potato crops for certification. On one occasion he went to the farm of a very prominent grower on Vancouver island who had, I think, 20 acres of potatoes which he wished to have inspected as certified seed potatoes, and he refused to do so because the crop had a certain percentage of mosaic.

He reported to the deputy minister of agriculture, who was quite concerned and said, "Now, look here; do you not realize that this man is a very influential Conservative on Vancouver island, and that it makes a very great difference to him so far as price is concerned whether or not this seed is certified? I suggest that you go back and have another look." So he went back and had another look to make certain, but he did not change his mind. He came back again and turned in a similar report. The result of the faithfulness, shall I say, of that civil servant to the law and to the high standards that were set was that he was promptly discharged. Later he went to work as senior agriculturist for the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company.

I am not saying that this practice, which was quite prevalent in those days, was peculiar to one party more than the other, but I know from personal experience that there were certain political overtones with regard to the inspection of crops or seeds for registration or certification.

As I said before, we have come a long way since then, and I am very glad to know that the government has introduced this bill after receiving representations from the Canadian Seed Growers' Association and the Canadian Seed Trade Association, and that both these associations have endorsed the terms of the legislation. Why has there been this great improvement? I think, using the words of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, it is because of the influence of farm organizations, seed growers associations and the seed trade association.

Finally I wish to say that as long as any government pays attention to what the farm organizations have to say with respect to legislation affecting them or the seed growers or the seed trade association or other organizations they will be receiving very sound advice for the development of legislation such as this. With these few remarks, Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to wait until the bill is in committee.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. McCleave in the chair.

On clause 1—Short title.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the minister explain why the bill does not seem to have the usual indications of what sections are being amended, what sections in the act are to be continued and so on? Looking at the bill in its present form it is very difficult to ascertain with respect to this legislation which has been on the statute books at least so far as the last amendment is concerned since 1923, I think, just exactly what sections are being amended although of course, as the minister has pointed out, the amendments are not of a substantive character.

Mr. Harkness: The explanation is that this is not an amending bill. This is a complete revision, and I think it is generally the custom in a complete revision to bring in a bill in this form as compared with the situation where a bill is introduced merely to amend an act, in which case you have references throughout the bill to the sections which are being amended. In this instance it is a new bill, and in effect it is a complete revision.

Mr. Herridge: Can the minister explain to the house what are the recent trends and developments in the production, processing and merchandising of seeds that have required the introduction of this bill? I am simply seeking information.

Mr. Harkness: As I said in the brief speech I made on second reading, the first thing is the matter of bringing together registration and certification and doing away with that duplication which actually caused an increase in the price of seeds. The second is doing away with a considerable number of what are now antiquated provisions with regard to marking and so on in the old act.

Mr. Benidickson: I made some broad remarks. I wonder whether at this more informal stage of the debate the minister would make some comment. I indicated that while the area producing seed grains, according to my information, had increased very noticeably—for instance in one year—the use of registered or certified seed in Canada is not noticeably increasing. Has the minister any comment to make on that matter? I was impressed by the fact that this section of his department employing some 80 inspectors made 31,640 seed inspection visits and that 5,520 samples were taken in addition to the visits. That record is very impressive statistically, but if we are increasing the number of farmers who are growing these pedigree grains, why is it that the use of these grains is not apparently progressing in a similar fashion?

Mr. Harkness: All I can say about that matter is this. The use of certified seed or pedigree seed, as it was in the past has depended to a considerable extent, I think, on what farmers thought was the possibility of selling this grain at an increased price or at a price considerably higher than the average price of grain of that particular kind.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

The opportunities along those lines naturally vary up and down. I do not think I could be more specific than that. I know of no particular reason other than that for the fact that the number of certified seed growers or registered seed growers has not increased more rapidly than it has in the past. I know that in my own area just south of Calgary the number of people engaged in growing registered seed has varied up and down quite markedly over the last 15 years. There have been a considerable number of people in it when they were making a good deal of money out of it, and as soon as the spread between the ordinary price of grain and the seed narrowed down, many of them would go out of it.

Mr. Benidickson: Would I be right in thinking that about 95 per cent of the devotion to this cause is in the cereal grains such as wheat and barley, flax and oats?

Mr. Lennard: In connection with what the hon. member has just asked I think I could perhaps throw some light on that subject. I am interested in a farm, and while we have never bought registered seed we buy seed that is one crop removed from registered seed. We buy from someone in our own neighbourhood who has grown from registered seed the year before. In a great many cases I think you will find that what is happening is that people are using better seed but they are not necessarily buying it as registered seed.

Mr. Harkness: I have the figures as to the number of acres inspected. In the last 30 years there has been a marked increase. In 1928 there were 27,445 acres inspected with an estimated yield of just over 1 million bushels. In 1938, ten years later, the figure was 178,000 acres with a little more than 2½ million bushels of cereal. In 1948, ten years later, it was 612,000 acres—these are round figures, of course; I am not giving the hundreds—with over 15 million bushels. In 1958—that was last year—

Mr. Benidickson: About 20 million?

Mr. Harkness: —it was 814,000 acres with a total yield of 25 million bushels. Hence there has been in the 30 years a marked and rapid increase.

Mr. Cardiff: I should like to ask the minister a question as to these inspectors. Do they inspect the standing crop before it is harvested?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, Mr. Chairman. My own experience with this matter when I was growing some registered wheat was that the inspector came out twice. On the second occasion he told me there were a limited number of weeds in one corner of this field and I had better get them out or he would not be able to pass it.

Mr. Forbes: I wish to thank the minister for introducing this bill at this time. It will remove from the department the issuing of certificates and will place the authority entirely in the hands of the Canadian Seed Growers' Association, where I think it should be. I might say the production of registered seeds in western Canada particularly is a very important business at the present time. The United States in their efforts to maintain as high a quality of wheat as we produce in western Canada are buying large quantities of our seed every year. In fact in the past year we have exported to the United States 3½ million bushels of registered Selkirk seed alone. There is a considerable quantity of registered seed available in western Canada for local growers if they wish to avail themselves of this quality of seed. We find from time to time that countries such as Brazil, Greece and so on require large shipments of wheat, and they prefer to buy it on a protein content and quality basis. It is possible for them to buy this registered seed and get their requirements, which is not possible in buying commercial wheat.

With respect to one or two questions asked by one of the hon. members a moment ago with regard to inspection, may I say this. Your crop is field inspected standing first, and then when your seed is finally processed and cleaned up ready to be sacked and sealed, it is further inspected to assure purchasers that they are getting seed of the quality that has been advertised and which they purchased.

Mr. Harkness: In reply to the hon. member for Dauphin, may I say that the association will issue the certificates. We will inspect, however, and put on the grade and so on.

Mr. McBain: As to the hon. member for Dauphin who has just spoken, I know he is one of the top producers of registered seed. I also happen to be a registered seed grower. I along with other members in this chamber welcome the revision of the seed act.

In connection with the Ontario soil and crop improvement association, may I say that we have sponsored several resolutions over the past few years asking for several changes to be made in the Canada Seeds Act. I wish to compliment the minister this afternoon on the changes that are going to be made, especially on the elimination of certified seed. At times when you have too many grades of seeds the situation comes a bit confusing, as the average purchaser sometimes does not distinguish between certified and registered seed. I am sure that seed growers and the Canadian seed trade will welcome the changes in the Canada Seeds Act.

Mr. Benidickson: I suppose there would be no point in adding in clause 4 (1) (a) the other association to which the minister made reference in his speech. You would deal only with the Canadian Seed Growers' Association?

Mr. Harkness: The seed sellers' association so far has nothing to do with standards.

Mr. Benidickson: I did not remember the name.

Mr. Harkness: The Canadian Seed Trade Association.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should like, if the minister does not mind, to comment on the point made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River with regard to the governor in council having power to make regulations, thereby removing some of the substantive provisions which were previously in existence. It would be interesting to have an explanation about that.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, I would be glad to comment on that. Under the previous act, power to make these regulations was vested in the minister. Now it requires an order in council, so I would think rather than hon. gentlemen opposite looking upon this as a backward move it would be looked upon as a forward one.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, no; we are not saying that.

Mr. Herridge: With respect to clause 4, which seems to be quite well drafted, I look upon it as a forward move in the application of this bill. But there is one point I want to raise. While these orders in council will be published in the Gazette, how do you get this information to the growers themselves within a reasonable time? What channels do you use?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, we consult with the seed growers' association before the regulations are sent forward to be passed by order in council. Of course after they are passed we send copies of the order in council to the association, and they are responsible for circulating the information to their own members.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 5—Administration. Inspectors and analysts.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would the minister explain what subclause 2 means? This is seemingly a very wide power. The inspectors and analysts appointed under clause 5 (1) are to be regarded as being appointed under the provisions of the Civil Service Act, but the minister is empowered in subclause 2 to designate any person as an inspector or analyst for the purpose of the act. Is this appointment for an ad hoc situation, or is the minister at liberty to appoint an inspector for a definite period?

Mr. Harkness: First of all, as far as inspectors are concerned, it sometimes happens that more inspectors are required for a short period than we have on our regular inspection staff. This gives the minister power to appoint an inspector for a short temporary period. As far as the analysts are concerned, most of the analysts' work is done in our own laboratories, but sometimes it is necessary or desirable to have some of this work done in the laboratory of a commercial analyst, and this gives the minister authority to appoint a commercial analyst to do a particular job.

Mr. Herridge: Could the minister tell the house what percentage of these inspectors or analysts are graduate agriculturists or agronomists, and what are the minimum qualifications required of a person appointed ad hoc to either of these positions?

Mr. Harkness: There is a distinction here. The inspectors are all graduates in agriculture. These are the regular inspectors on our plant products division staff. The analysts are not, and what the proportion is I do not know.

Mr. Herridge: Would a temporary inspector be appointed who was not a graduate agronomist or agriculturist?

Mr. Harkness: He might be. We would attempt, of course, to get qualified agriculturists. If we could not get one we might have to appoint someone who was not a graduate agriculturist. These appointments we are now talking about are all purely temporary.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I had the bill marked for a question on this section similar to that advanced by the hon. member for Essex East. If one looks at the interpretation clause, subclause (c) it indicates that an inspector means a person appointed or designated as an inspector under section 5. That is understandable, but we have two kinds of inspectors. The minister indicates that there would be a necessity to engage a commercial inspector for a short period under certain circumstances. I think the minister should be free in that respect and not be subject to subclause (1) of clause 5, but should that not still be restricted to a temporary hiring? Would the minister not ask one of his colleagues to make that clear in the clause by amendment?

Mr. Harkness: As the hon. member knows, I am not a lawyer and have to depend for the legal interpretation of these things on the law officers of the crown. My understanding was that this was sufficient as it was without having to spell out the fact that they were purely temporary appointments, because subclause 1 says that the inspectors and analysts necessary for the administration, and so forth, shall be appointed under the provisions of the Civil Service Act. In other words, they are regular civil servants. Then subclause 2 says that the minister may designate—not appoint, just designate—a person as an inspector or analyst; in other words, for a purely temporary job. But if a man is a regular inspector or analyst he has to be appointed under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. Benidickson: So the minister's impression is that the civil service, even for temporary work, will actually do the engaging?

Mr. Harkness: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Benidickson: The civil service commission under clause 5 (1) will actually do the hiring for temporary work, but the minister may designate that temporary person and give him the privileges and authority contained in succeeding clauses of the bill, such as clause 6?

Mr. Harkness: That is correct. I might point out that this clause is contained in the act to establish a national standard of agricultural products passed on June 28, 1955. Section 7 of that act, subsections 1 and 2, is exactly the same as these provisions. It says that the minister may designate any person as an inspector or grader for the purpose of that act. In other words, it is standard drafting.

Clause 6 agreed to.

On clause 7—Seizure.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Chairman, a moment ago the minister said he was not a lawyer, and he may not be in a position to answer this question. As the minister knows, agriculture is a matter that extends to both the federal and provincial governments under the co-ordinated jurisdiction provided in that field by the British North America Act, sections 91 and 92. But as I look at clause 7, and as I also looked at clause 6, I wonder if the law officers of the crown have given the minister any advice about the extent of the powers which the government, apart altogether from legal limitations, should take.

The inspectors here are given pretty wide powers, to enter property, to make seizures, and do things which normally would be regarded by the courts as coming under the property and civil rights section, which is section 92. Is the minister satisfied from the advice he has been given by the law officers that there could be no doubt about the competence of the federal parliament to take power in connection with a matter which arises out of a section of the British North America Act which gives to both senior levels of jurisdiction the co-ordinated authority but nevertheless touches a restrictive aspect, namely the property and civil rights clause?

Mr. Harkness: The legal officers' advice is that we have this power, and as a matter of fact this is in exactly the same terms as the act to which I have just referred, the Agricultural Products Standards Act, and also the Fertilizers Act, both of which were passed under the government of which the hon. member was a member.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question, but before doing so I must congratulate the hon. member for Essex East for demonstrating a marvellous and excellent co-operation between the Liberal labour and Liberal farm leanings of the Liberal party. Can the minister tell us the number of violations under the old act last year?

Mr. Harkness: I am informed that there were no prosecutions last year or the year before. During the period between 1930 and 1959 there were 81 prosecutions under the Seeds Act, and in the period from 1949-50 to 1958-59 there were 426 detentions of samples of seeds of various sorts under the act.

Mr. Herridge: That seems an indication of the basic honesty of Canadian seed growers.

Mr. Harkness: It also seems to have improved.

Mr. Henderson: I want some information about selling seeds. In the country I come from, seed salesmen came in from Saskatchewan. They were all over the country, cleaning up $25,000 to $30,000 and they did not deliver the seed. I have been getting letters, and in fact I gave one to the minister to read. One fellow has written me and says he never got redress or his money back. He bought northern grass seed, I think he calls it, and gave a fabulous price for it; now he threatens to go down to Regina and kick the fellow's office to pieces. During the winter this fellow apparently went to Florida. Many farmers have threatened to take action. I wrote to the attorney general but he never answered the letter. Has a prosecution to be carried out by the government there, or do the federal people have anything to do with it?

Mr. Woolliams: I think I can throw some light on that subject. I represent 55,000 farmers in Alberta who are interested in the same thing. This is not a case of any violation under the act. This is a case of breach of contract. The seed was purchased from a legitimate seller but the seller did not fulfil the terms of the contract, and that particular case is now before the Alberta supreme court.

Mr. Harkness: This act deals, of course, with standards of seeds and the registration of seeds, and has nothing to do with ensuring that a farmer who pays money for seed gets the seed. That, of course, is a matter of civil law and comes under the jurisdiction of the province within which the offence, if there is an offence, takes place. I may add that in Alberta there is a seed dealers' act under which matters of this kind could be handled. Whether or not there is one in British Columbia I do not know.

Mr. Benidickson: I am not satisfied with clause 6, but if it has been carried, I will not ask to go back to it.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 8—Obstruction of Inspector—False Statement.

Mr. Rapp: Mr. Chairman, I rise to bring the minister's attention to the case of farmers who could not have their fields inspected because, due to a shortage of inspectors, the plant products division could not carry out the inspections. Because of this shortage of inspectors farmers in my area have had to swat their registered crops, suffering heavy losses in consequence. Would it not be possible to have arrangements made under the amended act so that an inspector could always be available when farmers apply for one? Action along these lines would prevent considerable financial losses to the farmers concerned.

Mr. Harkness: Without knowing the exact circumstances of the case I could not say anything definite with regard to that matter, but there is sometimes a delay in western Canada, in that we must have a cut-off date and if people do not ask for the inspection of their crops in sufficient time it is sometimes impossible to inspect the crop before that date. We run into a certain amount of trouble every year because people delay requesting the inspection until too late.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 9—Offence.

Mr. McMillan: Suppose somebody was importing seed from the United States but did not have a label. Would he be subject to prosecution under this clause?

Mr. Harkness: As I understand it, the seed would not be cleared at customs for entry into Canada unless it were labelled.

An hon. Member: I did not catch that.

Mr. Harkness: Unless the seed were properly labelled it would not be cleared through customs. It would not be allowed into the country.

Mr. McMillan: A number of people at the border, for instance, import grass seed, and I have not seen any government label of any kind on this particular grass seed.

Mr. Lennard: Have you ever seen the seed, even? I don't suppose you have even seen the seed.

Mr. Harkness: The seed allowed in has to meet the seed import standards, which are the same as the standards within this country, and it has to be tested to ensure that it does meet those standards. Otherwise it would not be allowed in.

Mr. Benidickson: Inasmuch as this is a bill in substitution for the existing Seeds Act I wish to ask the minister how the penalties under this section compare with the penalties under the Seeds Act.

Mr. Harkness: Perhaps I should read the old section 21 which lays down the penalties under the old act. These are for a first offence, a fine of not less than $5 and not more than $25, and for subsequent offences a fine of not less than $25 and not more than $250. The maximum is now doubled.

Mr. Baldwin: Clause 9 says:

> Every person who, or whose employee or agent, has violated any provision of this act or any regulation made under subsection 4 of section 7 is guilty of an offence—

I was wondering about the case of an employee or agent who had violated any one of the sections without the knowledge of the principal. Would the legal advice given to the minister be to the effect that in such an instance the employer would be liable to be prosecuted and found guilty whether or not he had any knowledge of the violation by his employee or agent?

Mr. Harkness: The situation normally is that an employer is responsible for the actions of his agents or employees in a matter of this kind, but the determination of whether or not he is liable to a penalty would depend upon the judgment of a court in each particular case.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Peace River has raised an important point. This is punitive legislation, and I am not so sure that it is not criminal legislation. I suppose it is. There is no doubt that a man who is prosecuted under this act, is brought within the mischief of the act, but the mere fact that he is an employee of a "Mr. X" who does not know this, does not mean that this clause is intended to have "Mr. X" found guilty when he knows nothing about it and is not before the court. The hon. member for Peace River is a lawyer and I am sure his legal training has caused him to be concerned about the implications of subclause 2. Has the minister been able to ascertain the implications of this from the law officers of the crown? Certainly on the face of it this looks like a very doubtful provision.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, all I can say is that once again this follows the same pattern as the previous legislation, the acts I have mentioned and so forth. Of course the legal training of the hon. member for Essex East will tell him immediately that if the employer can establish the fact that he was innocent he will naturally not be subject to punishment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): But that is not the way subclause 2 reads; that is the point. I was trying to deal with the point raised by the hon. member for Peace River. Does the minister think that subclause 2, on rereading, is still open to the interpretation to which reference has been made?

Mr. Baldwin: Unless this subclause is construed to be sufficiently positive as to exclude the principle of mens rea, I think if any employer who is charged could establish that his agent or employee committed the act without his knowledge he would have a good defence. I would think on reflection this would have to be a little more stringent than it is to create that result.

Clause 10 agreed to.

On clause 11—Certificate of analyst.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, subclause 2 of clause 11 reads:

> (2) In a prosecution for a violation of this act, a document purporting to be the certificate of an analyst shall be received in evidence, without proof of the signature of the person by whom it purports to be signed and without proof of his official position.

Can the minister explain why proof is not required in both those cases for the protection of the seed grower who would be charged under this bill? It seems rather unusual to me.

Mr. Harkness: I must confess I find myself a little at sea with regard to these legal questions. I am certainly in no position to give the hon. member legal advice, as he is well aware. I am informed that the certificate is intended to present a prima facie case and then the case has to be met.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It can always be rebutted.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, Mr. Chairman; as the hon. member for Essex East points out, it can always be rebutted. The production of the certificate constitutes a prima facie case and the accused has to rebut that if he can.

CROP INSURANCE

PROVISION FOR FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO PROVINCIAL SCHEMES

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the payment of contributions and the making of loans by the Minister of Finance out of the consolidated revenue fund, in respect of the operation of provincial schemes for crop insurance.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. McCleave in the chair.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I propose at this stage to speak rather briefly on the crop insurance proposal, and I shall go into the matter in considerably more detail on second reading, at which time copies of the bill will be in the hands of hon. members and they will thus be in a better position to understand completely what I am talking about.

The demand for all-risk crop insurance, as I am sure all hon. members of the committee are aware, has been quite strong for many years. There has been a great deal of talk about an all-risk crop insurance scheme being put into effect. Many bodies of various kinds and many individuals have examined into the matter both here and in other countries, and various schemes have been put into operation in other countries including the United States.

During the past two years during which I have been in charge of the Department of Agriculture, officials of the department have been studying and assessing the schemes in operation, particularly those in operation immediately to the south of us in the western United States. The officials have also studied the reports which have been made by Canadian commissions, boards, individuals and others who have studied crop insurance and made recommendations in connection therewith. There is a considerable mass of material in connection with this matter. Unfortunately, however, when one comes to examine it there are very few what you might call definite recommendations which have been made by the various bodies that have investigated crop insurance.

I should like to point out that our constitutional set-up places property and civil rights under the provinces and that this would constitute a bar to a wholly federal crop insurance scheme. Of course that problem might be overcome by getting the consent of the provinces to such a scheme. However, without that consent—and we have no means of knowing whether or not it could be obtained—a wholly federal crop insurance scheme could not be put into operation. In addition, the studies carried on in connection with crop insurance indicate that conditions vary so greatly from province to province that a scheme which would work well and be practical in one province would not work at all in another province.

We have come to the conclusion that the only practical means of dealing with crop insurance is to employ the same principle that has been used in making construction grants for hospitals and in the hospital insurance scheme. In other words, it would be necessary for the dominion government to lay down certain minimum requirements. If these minimum requirements were met by a scheme set up by the provincial authorities the federal government could then make certain grants and loans.

I shall briefly outline what these grants and loans are proposed to be. The crop insurance bill which will be brought in following this resolution will authorize the Minister of Agriculture, with the approval of the governor in council, to enter into agreements with the provinces to provide for the payment by Canada to the provinces in respect of costs incurred by the provinces in the operation of crop insurance schemes. It will also provide for making loans to provinces for the operation of such insurance schemes. The contributions and loans are:

(1) Payment by Canada of 50 per cent of the administration costs of any scheme set up by a province.

(2) Payment by Canada of 20 per cent of the premiums charged.

(3) Loans to provinces in the amount of 75 per cent of the amount required to meet indemnity commitments less $200,000. In other words, if the indemnity commitment—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Would you mind repeating that.

Mr. Harkness: I will repeat it in this way. If the indemnity commitment in the first year that the insurance scheme was in operation was greater than the amount of the premiums which had been collected—which could very readily be the case, as the hon. member who is familiar with insurance matters knows—then, if that shortage in the insurance fund was not more than $200,000 the province would not be entitled to a loan, because it was considered that any province is in a position without endangering its financial situation to meet demands of $200,000. But if the shortage is in excess of $200,000, then the province is entitled to secure a loan from the dominion government up to 75 per cent of the amount of the shortage. The purpose of this provision is to place provinces in the situation where, if they happen to meet a very bad crop year, particularly in the first two years of operation of the scheme before the fund had been built up, they would not be financially embarrassed as a result.

One of the chief objections which has been raised in some of the provinces to a crop insurance scheme is this very matter, that if they did meet a bad year, or particularly two bad years, in the early years in which the scheme was in operation it would cripple the provinces financially and make their entire financing very difficult if not impossible. That is the reason for this loan provision.

Mr. McMillan: Would that be $200,000 for each province?

Mr. Harkness: No.

Mr. McMillan: You said "for a province".

Mr. Harkness: The scheme which is entered into with each province really would be a separate scheme. We will make an agreement with each province in regard to the scheme of insurance which they set up and if they have a loss which is more than $200,000 more than the amount that they have in the kitty, we will say, then they are entitled to secure a loan of 75 per cent of that amount from the dominion government.

Mr. McMillan: That is for each province?

Mr. Harkness: Yes, certainly.

The financial assistance which it is proposed to provide will be available on condition that the crop insurance schemes are actuarially sound. In other words, this is designed to be an insurance scheme and not any type of what you might call a relief scheme such as we have had under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

Many people have looked upon prairie farm assistance as an insurance scheme. It was distinctly stated at the time it was brought in that it was not an insurance scheme and that point has been made constantly ever since. It was really a drought relief scheme and it continues basically to be that. This scheme is to set up an actual insurance scheme and one which will be actuarially sound but one to which of course the dominion government will assist in the cost and financing through paying 50 per cent of the administration costs and 20 per cent of the premium costs.

I was saying that this assistance will be available on condition that the crop insurance scheme is actuarially sound; that is, that it is a scheme which on statistical information or evidence would mean that sufficient money would be collected over a long period of years to pay the indemnities which would have to be met; and next, that a minimum number or proportion of farmers come into the scheme. In other words, you cannot put in an insurance scheme in which you take in only the very poor risks.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There is no compulsion.

Mr. Harkness: No; so far as our proposal is concerned there is no compulsion. The purpose here is to make this scheme as flexible as possible so that each province will be in as favourable a position as possible to set up a scheme which will be adapted to its own conditions. Owing to the fact that I mentioned earlier, namely that conditions do vary so much in Canada, it is impossible to lay down hard and fast conditions covering every crop which is grown in every part of Canada. Therefore, you must leave it up to the provinces to determine what crops they wish to cover and what the contributions are going to be in connection with those particular crops.

But as far as we are concerned, we will not pay the grant to the provinces unless, as I said, first, it is an actuarially sound scheme; and, second, that the minimum number or proportionate number of farmers come under the scheme. What we have in mind at the present time is 25 per cent of the farmers or of the acreage in whatever the insurance unit is. In some cases the insurance unit may well be a township; in other cases it may be a municipality. That will be up to the province but it must be a sufficiently small unit so that the long term average yield in that unit is much the same throughout. In other words, it would be inequitable for the farmers and the governments concerned to try to have the same premium rate, for example, in all parts of western Canada in a scheme of that sort. It would not work; it would not be practicable. Therefore, we have to have some area which will be called an insurance unit, as I say, it may be a township, it may be a municipality, in which the rate will be the same. In that unit one of the requirements will be that 25 per cent of the farmers or 25 per cent of the acreage must be covered before we will contribute in order to prevent the scheme being put in a position which is not actuarially sound.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say whether in any given province there must be a minimum number of units that come under the act?

Mr. Harkness: No. As far as the act is drawn a province could have one unit.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Harkness: I wonder whether I might just finish these things because we seem to be going down various tracks.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I just want to understand what the minister said. He said that 25 per cent of the farmers within a unit must subscribe to the scheme and the premium must be the same. Does that mean the premium in the unit or the premium in the whole province?

Mr. Harkness: This is one of the reasons that you must have these insurance units, you might say, so that you could have a difference in premium from one part of the province to another.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. Harkness: We have covered two of these conditions which must be met for financial assistance to be available. The third is that they be insured up to but not exceeding 60 per cent of the long term average yield in the area. In other words, our 20 per cent of the premiums will cover only 20 per cent of the cost of insuring the crop up to 60 per cent of the long term average yield.

Mr. Benidickson: Is it 60 per cent the cash investment of the crop loss that my hon. friend has in mind?

Mr. Harkness: Now the hon. member is getting into the details which I think we should deal with in committee of the whole after second reading. There are an infinite number of details really which could be brought up and dealt with. At this stage I think it is desirable really just for the committee to consider the general principles of the scheme which I have just attempted to outline and not get into these very numerous details which could be brought up and which could be discussed, and many of which I expect will be. I do not want to give the hon. member and the committee the idea that I am trying to avoid any questions, but at this stage I do not think it is desirable to go into this because we could keep on actually for days on these numerous small points.

There is one other point that I should like to make, namely that farmers will not be eligible for both crop insurance and prairie farm assistance.

Mr. Argue: Oh!

Mr. Harkness: The Prairie Farm Assistance Act will continue in effect but a farmer who is insured will not be eligible for the insurance and for prairie farm assistance both. In other words, we would consider that the contribution made by the federal taxpayer toward the cost of crop insurance is one thing and the contribution made by the federal taxpayer for the cost of prairie farm assistance is another thing, and that the same farmers should not be eligible to receive both of these at the same time.

Mr. Argue: You borrowed that from the Minister of Finance's budget.

Mr. Harkness: At the same time, the farmer who comes in under the crop insurance scheme will not be required to pay the 1 per cent levy for Prairie Farm Assistance Act payments. In other words, he will neither pay into the Prairie Farm Assistance Act fund or will he be eligible to take money out.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Agriculture indicated that we had before us a very complex subject which has had the attention of several royal commissions certainly in the western prairie provinces and perhaps elsewhere. As the minister indicated, we now have some experience to guide us because since approximately 1939 there has been a federal crop insurance scheme in the United States which has been revised on at least two occasions since then.

I believed, after reading the resolution in the broad general terms as it appeared on the order paper, that this would be the position we would be in. We had here the barest bones without any indication of the meat that might be provided in the bill. But having listened to the minister I am convinced we will find that there is going to be a great deal of vagueness and inadequacy in the bill because from the few remarks he has made it would appear there are so many provisos that I rather question whether very many of the provinces are likely to co-operate with the minister on something as nebulous as he has outlined to the committee at this time.

The minister indicated today that he had had a certain number of representations urging crop insurance, as many of us have, but from which provinces has the minister had anything officially in the nature of an enthusiastic indication of interest in connection with the kind of scheme he has outlined in the barest form to the committee this afternoon? We will reserve our detailed examination and comment until we see the bill, but our fear, enforced by what the minister has said, is that this measure really is window dressing and that we are likely to be faced with something which will be just an empty dummy shell. The bill may prove otherwise but no encouragement in that direction comes from the remarks just made by the minister.

One of the strongest supports for that assertion on my part is the statement of the minister that no farmer will be eligible for both P.F.A.A. and the new scheme of federal-provincial crop insurance. This seems to be entirely inconsistent with the minister's earlier assertion in his short speech that P.F.A.A., as the royal commissions also indicated, is not and was not intended to be crop insurance. The minister will be well aware that the recent commissions in 1955 and 1956 under the authority of the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan both felt that a proper crop insurance scheme should at least be complementary to P.F.A.A. What we fear, and we will retain our fears until we see some reason in the substance of the bill for changing them, is that the minister is really asking the house for a blank cheque with regard to something that was talked about in the recent election campaigns.

The minister has been in office for two years and has had at least an annual conference with the ministers of agriculture of the provinces. Which provinces have indicated that they would be interested in a scheme with the backdoor provisos such as he has enunciated? Was it the expectation of the government in introducing this resolution that it would likely have some national application in the near future? I find that the only reported reference to crop insurance made by the Prime Minister in the 1957 election campaign which I have been able to discover was in a speech he made at Brantford on May 9, 1957. He enunciated his agricultural policy at that meeting and is reported by the Brantford Expositor as having said that he would develop "a more realistic crop insurance plan for drought, flood and hail in co-operation with the prairie provinces". I note that the resolution does not contemplate any restriction so far as the provinces are concerned, but from what provinces other than the prairie provinces, has there been any indication as a result of the two annual federal-provincial conferences held under the minister's regime that what he indicates will be offered in the bill is likely to obtain very early acceptance?

He indicated that there must be a minimum number of participants. I believe that was a recommendation of the Saskatchewan commission which made its report in December, 1956. They felt that they could criticize the undue voluntary content of the United States plan. The Manitoba commission pointed out that actually only 7.6 per cent of farmers in the United States are carrying some kind of crop insurance under the voluntary scheme and that in 1955 only 2.66 per cent, in terms of dollar value of crops, were insured under, as the commission reported, the excessively voluntary scheme there.

This seems to be a very far cry from the type of thing we heard from the minister last year and, indeed, from the Prime Minister. I recall that on August 30 last year the Prime Minister uttered ringing words about the possibilities there might be in this kind of scheme. He referred to providing a comprehensive crop insurance plan. In his remarks this afternoon the minister referred to an all-risk insurance plan but he indicated definitely that it might not apply in certain provinces in a general way and might apply only to one particular crop.

Mr. Harkness: That is entirely up to the province.

Mr. Benidickson: In addition, the evidence before both the Manitoba and Saskatchewan commissions was such that neither was prepared to recommend to their governments that something of this kind be undertaken without federal participation in much more than half of the cost of administration, or greater participation on the part of the federal government than the Minister of Agriculture has indicated that he is prepared to recommend. In other words, the catastrophic losses that the commissions indicated were possible and which both commissions said were beyond the financial capabilities of a provincial government would be met under the minister's scheme simply by loans, not by contributions. That I do not think is likely, having regard to the commission reports, to commend itself for early acceptance by the provincial administrations unless the bill has in it something different from what the minister has outlined.

Mr. Argue: I should be greatly interested to learn from the minister to what extent provincial governments have shown interest in the type of legislation he has presented to the House of Commons this afternoon. I have taken a great deal of interest in the subject of crop insurance and the subject of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in the past and I have always said that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should be expanded and extended to specific crop areas outside the prairies in order to provide for agriculture, where crops face serious hazards, the same kind of protection as the people on the prairies have enjoyed under this scheme now for twenty years.

I have no knowledge of whether the Minister of Agriculture has consulted with all or a majority of the provinces but I would consider that this would be an essential requirement before bringing in such a bill. The minister has said that the federal government has not the jurisdiction to go into a scheme of crop insurance as has been presented here or as has been forecast here this afternoon. But the federal government undoubtedly has had sufficient jurisdiction to provide a scheme like the Prairie Farm Assistance Act which covers farming within a certain area. In other words, the federal government has had ample jurisdiction over a period of twenty years to have established and implemented a system of payments for crop failure to producers in time of loss. The announcement in this legislation, even though it may be extended to other provinces, shows that it is a restricted type of insurance. In addition to that, it will require substantial contributions from the provincial governments themselves. In other words, this is really a retreat in jurisdiction. Yet the minister says that in this retreat the government could bring in a proposition which would contribute only to provincial schemes.

In bringing in legislation such as that which the minister has forecast, I would think he would have had many conferences with the provinces, that he would have consulted each and every one of the ten provinces, and that before he would bring in a scheme such as this one he would have substantial support from the provincial governments that must embark on this scheme and must provide for premiums to be paid into the plan. Other than that, unless this kind of consultation has been held, this would appear to me on the surface to be something of an invasion of provincial jurisdiction, although in a subtle way. By this legislation the government is saying that it will pay into provincial schemes if they are proceeded with. By providing exactly the same conditions, so the minister says, for each province, it means that those provinces requiring the assistance most—those provinces and those producers—will be obliged to pay the highest premiums.

In bringing in this legislation the minister has had the advantage of the various royal commissions and the various studies that have been made in the past on this proposition. The Saskatchewan royal commission has made far different recommendations from the ones contained in this bill. As a matter of fact, it merely advocated that an experimental and restricted type of crop insurance might be undertaken with the federal government meeting almost all of the costs and with the provincial government being restricted to certain administration costs and acting in an advisory capacity.

One of the earliest studies in the field of crop insurance was made by Mr. R. E. Motherwell, who was a grandson of a former minister of agriculture, a graduate of the Saskatchewan university and executive assistant for some time to Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner, a former minister of agriculture. In the past I have paid many tributes in the House of Commons to Mr. Motherwell's work, particularly with regard to the study of crop insurance that he made back in 1944. I say again today, as I have said on many occasions in the past, that this was an excellent study, that it was a comprehensive study and that in general I agree with his conclusions, namely that the type of crop insurance scheme that had prevailed in the United States was not one which could be made applicable to western Canada with full benefits to all producers but rather in Canada—and I speak particularly with regard to the prairies—we should endeavour to expand and improve the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

In the province of Manitoba a royal commission was set up to study crop insurance and among other conclusions they had this to say:

> (1) That the 1 per cent levy now paid by Manitoba farmers to P.F.A.A. would be "quite inadequate to provide any form of all-risk crop insurance"; that, indeed, it was probably insufficient to cover P.F.A.A. payments over the long run.

The reason for that reference is the fact that in Manitoba the producers by their 1 per cent paid in slightly more than they have received under the act, since the act became effective in 1939.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And they said also that it would be inadequate to provide any kind of risk insurance.

Mr. Argue: Yes. They said further:

(2) That the yearly potential risk of loss in a crop insurance scheme, unless distributed over a wide geographic area, could be enormous even in period of relatively good yields.

(3) That, although it may have appeared reasonable at the time, the earlier recommendation for crop insurance in Manitoba "cannot be successfully applied . . . under today's farming conditions."

Mr. Harkness: What date was that?

Mr. Argue: September, 1955. As I said earlier, Mr. Chairman, I do not know, of course, whether the minister has consulted with the provinces about this legislation. If provinces other than the prairie provinces believe that this type of legislation will meet their needs, I think the legislation will be helpful to that extent. But as I see the situation, as an alternative to the type of insurance or the type of protection that we may have under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, and particularly under an expanded and improved Prairie Farm Assistance Act, this legislation is most inadequate.

We have had the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in operation now for almost twenty years and it has a great many things to recommend it. One of the most important things to recommend the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in the three prairie provinces which it covers and in the section of British Columbia which it also covers is that within this area every single producer is protected. It covers everyone in the grain-producing area. Everyone who is covered in that area and who sells grain pays a small levy of 1 per cent. This means that not only is everybody covered but that, to make a general statement, there may be a few exceptions, such as people who raise livestock only and feed all their grain—everybody contributes by a 1 per cent levy on the grain that is marketed.

This, I think, has a tremendous advantage over a scheme that will not cover everyone within the provinces, and I do not think the Minister of Agriculture himself, who is introducing this legislation, is going to make any such claim. The United States has had a scheme in operation for some time. The administration costs of their scheme are borne by the United States government. The administration costs of the Canadian Prairie Farm Assistance Act are borne by the Canadian government. The administration costs of a United States crop insurance plan is equal to 25 per cent of the indemnities which are paid out. The cost of administration, compared with the cost of administration of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, is excessive and shows that from an administrative point of view crop insurance is much less efficient than the prairie farm assistance. I think the administration costs of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act run to half a million dollars a year, or a little more, depending, of course, on the benefits which are paid out. The minister can give us the correct percentage, but I would estimate that our administrative costs are less than one-quarter of the administrative costs of the United States under a crop insurance plan.

In comparing, of course, the benefits which are paid out one would not expect that the Canadian benefits paid out under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act would anywhere near equal the indemnities which are paid out under the United States crop insurance plan applied, as it can be, to the whole of the United States. One would not expect either that these payments would be anywhere near comparable to payments in the United States because their coverage does equal 60 per cent of the yields, and because, of course, their wheat acreage, while it varies as ours varies, is in the neighbourhood of 70 million acres, whereas our wheat acreage is more in the neighbourhood of 20 million acres.

After the United States had changed the type of scheme they were using to some extent, between the years 1948 and 1954, the indemnities paid to producers in the United States amounted to $136 million. Canada, with a scheme not paying benefits at the same high rate, and restricted to a smaller agricultural area and a much smaller acreage, nevertheless paid benefits, which I think are rather startling in comparison with the $136 million of the United States, of some $90 million. We have had a long experience under prairie farm assistance. I have no hesitation whatsoever in saying that it has been a good act and today it is a good act, and I see nothing in the legislation which is presented to the house today which would influence me to substitute the kind of legislation that is being forecast for the kind of legislation that we have had, more particularly if that legislation is improved as it needs to be from time to time.

Mr. Benidickson: You cannot have both.

Mr. Argue: The minister said we cannot have both. There is sad news in the announcement that he makes, because it means for the farmers in the high risk areas, the farmers whose crops are subject to crop failure most often, that they will be able to get very little benefit from the general type of legislation that the minister has introduced. They will be very hesitant to insure, and I am sure very resentful, to be told that in order to insure their crops under one act they must withdraw from another act. It would be just as ridiculous to tell the farmers on the prairies, "If you take out hail insurance and there is a widespread crop failure because of hail, we will not pay you prairie farm assistance."

That used to be the thinking, but after some criticism and some changes in the act the government discarded what was at that time a very bad feature. Coverage on the prairies under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act in general is 100 per cent. At one time farmers could not be covered if they had another business or another occupation. The present Minister of Agriculture introduced amendments which allowed farmers who have some other income to qualify for prairie farm assistance; so in general there is full coverage. In the United States the coverage under their scheme is not nearly as great as it is in our country. As a matter of fact, under their scheme the percentage of participation in 1948 was 37 per cent; in 1949, 21 per cent; in 1950, 21 per cent; in 1951, 23 per cent; in 1952, and the most recent figure, 29 per cent in 1953.

Mr. Benidickson: Grain only.

Mr. Argue: That is wheat only.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, wheat only.

Mr. Argue: For multiple crops, in general the percentage premium is relatively the same, if anything slightly less. Even in the state of Montana and the state of North Dakota, in any high risk area of those states coverage is as little as one-third. The premiums of course of the crop insurance plan in the United States vary. The premiums under this plan will vary; but the premiums in the United States in the general grain growing areas vary to a large extent, from around 8 per cent up to 16 per cent in the higher risk areas. We have a system of crop failure protection now under the prairie farm assistance scheme which gives to a farmer who has an ordinary sized farm in times of total crop failure payments of $4 an acre up to a maximum of 200 acres.

The farmer gets these payments for having paid a 1 per cent levy. To qualify for a levy under crop insurance in the state of Montana or the state of North Dakota, states which come up to the borders of our prairie provinces, the farmer has to pay rates of 8 per cent, 10 per cent, on up to 16 per cent. So no matter how one looks at the proposal which is put before us it is a very expensive proposal as far as the producers are concerned.

If the government intends that the provinces themselves from their own treasuries should supplement payments which are made, then this will be very expensive legislation for the provinces. If this government has in mind asking provincial governments to subsidize this scheme, then they would need to have long prior consultations and go into detail as to the administration of the legislation which is forecast, and they would have to endeavour to seek approval from the governments concerned.

The Prairie Farm Assistance Act has provided payments to producers since 1939 up to the end of 1957 to a total of $204 million. The federal contribution to this scheme has been about half of that amount. Of course, as far as the provinces are concerned, they have paid in different amounts and have received varying benefits. The province of Manitoba in the history of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has paid in approximately $16 million and has received in benefits approximately $14 million. So Manitoba is the one province which has paid in slightly more than her producers have received by a way of benefit. Saskatchewan has received benefits amounting to $139 million in round figures and Saskatchewan producers have paid in $69 million, so we have received from this plan $1 from the federal treasury for each dollar paid by the producers. The province of Alberta has done approximately the same, having received benefits from the act of $50 million and having paid in about $30 million. Of course, the reason why Saskatchewan and Alberta, have received more by way of benefits than has been collected by the 1 per cent levy is because these are high risk areas, because these are the provinces which have experienced widespread crop failures and emergencies in past years, situations which have been considered to be national emergencies and in which the federal government has come to the assistance of the provinces.

In advancing reasons why the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was enacted in the first place and why it has been maintained ever since, and giving reasons why the amendments which were introduced from time to time were designed in general to extend the scope of the act, the former minister of agriculture used to explain that the federal government had a national responsibility since within the Palliser triangle, the high risk area of the prairie provinces, it was national policy which led to that area being settled in the first place. It is true that in consequence of this policy great wealth was produced in that area but it was also in consequence of that policy, and because this is a high risk area, that people within that region suffer great hardship from time to time. The former minister of agriculture advanced the action taken by the federal government and by federal governments in the past as the reason why it must now accept responsibility in times of widespread crop failure.

As far as the prairie provinces are concerned, particularly in the light of the clause in the bill which says that if a producer wishes to obtain benefits under this measure he can no longer obtain benefits under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, this bill beyond question is a retrograde step. I am concerned about whether or not this legislation has been brought in after consultation with the provinces and, in particular, whether it has been brought into this house after consultation and approval with and by the prairie provinces where the Prairie Farm Assistance Act now applies.

Inasmuch as this legislation may be valuable to the provinces generally, we are, of course, glad to see it introduced, but in so far as it may place additional financial burdens either on producers or provincial treasuries while the federal government at the same time is prepared to withdraw the benefits of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, we think it is a retrograde step.

I make one further suggestion, and I do so in the hope that the government and the minister will accept it, namely that this legislation should be referred to the standing committee on agriculture and colonization. Let us have before that committee spokesmen for the leading farm organizations of this country to speak for the producers. Let us have before that committee representatives of the provincial governments and provincial departments of agriculture to tell us how this proposed legislation may apply within their provinces. This, undoubtedly, is a step which should only be taken after there has been the greatest degree of consultation, and I suggest that since there are features in this bill to which I am certain provincial governments will object and to which I am certain producers will object, I feel that the government is bound, if it wishes the best possible legislation, to accept my suggestion and have this bill referred to the committee on agriculture for further study.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, a crop insurance act has been in force in the United States for about twenty years. It has been and still is of great service to farmers. In my opinion, crop insurance legislation will help, in the first place to stabilize farm economy; in the second place it will encourage farmers and their sons to stay on the land and, third, it will promote agricultural prosperity.

And while this legislation will be of benefit to all farmers, it will be particularly so to growers of special crops.

As everyone knows, the federal constituency of Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm is the heart of pipe, cigar and cigarette tobacco production. In the past, many tobacco growers have faced disaster and lost much money because all of a sudden frost, hail or drought completely destroyed their work and ambitions.

Tobacco growers can of course insure with private insurance companies, but rates are so high that it is practically impossible for a grower to buy coverage for his entire crop. That is why I hope this bill will include protection against various risks such as hail, drought and frost, as well as many others.

In the past, many farmers, not only in Quebec but in Ontario and in other provinces, have had their whole crops ruined by calamities such as hail, drought and frost. Crop insurance legislation will therefore mean increased prosperity for agriculture and will give better protection for special crops.

For my part, I am in favour of this bill.

(Text):

Mr. Harkness: I think I should take this immediate opportunity of replying to some of the questions which were raised by the hon. members representing Kenora-Rainy River and Assiniboia and also of clearing up some of the misconceptions which have been disseminated as a result of the statements made.

First, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River wanted to know what provinces had shown an interest in this matter. I have now, I think, had four meetings with the ministers and deputy ministers of agriculture of the various provinces since I became minister for the dominion, and this question of crop insurance was brought up at each of those meetings as far as I recall, and there was some discussion on it. As one would expect, the provinces which displayed most interest in it were the three prairies provinces which were all interested in a system of crop insurance and in instituting such a system at the earliest possible time. There was also some interest on the part of British Columbia, particularly as far as the fruit growing areas of that province are concerned. In Ontario there was also some interest as far as fruit, tobacco and certain other crops are concerned. The same thing applies in Quebec. In the maritimes there was little interest in a system of crop insurance. The ministers from those areas pointed out that they are not subject to crop failure very frequently. Because crop failures are infrequent in the maritime provinces they did not think the provincial governments or the farmers in those areas would be interested in a system of crop insurance. However, they were quite prepared to look at whatever scheme was produced before going any further than to say that this would probably be the reaction in those provinces.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River also made the statement that this measure was mere window dressing. This is anything but window dressing. This system of crop insurance is actually a generous scheme, considerably more generous than the schemes in effect in the United States. It is a scheme which carries with it very heavy contingent liabilities so far as the dominion government is concerned.

Mr. Benidickson: The federal government in the United States pays the whole administration costs.

Mr. Harkness: There have been several different schemes in the United States and there are several in existence now. As I understand it in some cases the administration cost is paid by the farmers' co-operative which runs the scheme, collects the premiums and so forth.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I do not believe they have P.F.A.A.

Mr. Harkness: Any particular scheme in operation there at any particular time would have to be compared with this in order to achieve a valid comparison. However, the main point I am making is that this is a very generous scheme. We are offering to pay 50 per cent of the cost of the administration of this scheme set up in any province and 20 per cent of the premium cost. The total of these two would mean we would be paying somewhere between 25 and 30 per cent of the cost of the insurance scheme in any particular province. Therefore it is roughly equivalent to the cost to the federal treasury of engaging in the unemployment insurance scheme where we have contributions made by the employer, the employee and the dominion government with the dominion government in that case paying all of the administration costs. If you take the total cost of the scheme you see that the dominion government would be paying somewhere between 25 and 30 per cent of the cost of insurance in any province. I believe that is correct, but my colleague the Minister of Labour can correct me if I am wrong.

Mr. Starr: When you consider the administration costs it is more than that.

Mr. Harkness: I think it runs somewhere in that neighbourhood. As far as the cost of this scheme is concerned I believe it will be roughly parallel as far as the contribution of the dominion government and the Canadian taxpayer is concerned. We will be paying an amount in excess of 25 per cent of the cost of this scheme. As I say, it will involve really heavy contingent liability so far as the dominion treasury is concerned.

For example, if all the wheat in western Canada were insured the annual cost for administration and premiums would be in the neighbourhood of $11 million on the basis of the premium rates which the Saskatchewan royal commission spoke about. Our contribution, of course, would depend on the premium rates because we propose to pay 20 per cent of the premium.

Mr. Argue: You will never get farmers generally into this one.

Mr. Harkness: Any estimates made in this connection would of necessity be rough estimates because we have no actual experience to go on except the experience of the various schemes in the United States. That is the only country where we can find anything approaching comparable conditions and where the experience is likely to be at all comparable. In any event, as I say, the contingent cost to the dominion treasury will be considerable. Rather than the scheme being mere window dressing as was suggested by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River it will mean a commitment on the part of the dominion government to make very substantial payments.

The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River also asked why the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should be ruled out. If a man has his crop insured under this scheme he will be getting a considerable return if he loses his crop and therefore he does not need P.F.A.A. payments. Hon. members must bear in mind that P.F.A.A. payments are a form of drought relief. This has been extended to loss of crops from other causes but it is not an insurance scheme. It is essentially a relief scheme. If a farmer receives payment under the crop insurance scheme to which the dominion government has made a very considerable contribution there seems to be no good reason why he should also receive a form of relief under P.F.A.A. to which the federal government also makes a substantial contribution.

The hon. member for Assiniboia throughout the course of his speech appeared to be saying, "I am opposed to crop insurance."

Mr. Argue: That is not true.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. gentleman does not want a crop insurance scheme at all. What he wants is an expanded relief scheme. Every argument he advanced was an argument against crop insurance. Everyone knows that if an insurance scheme is to be worthy of that name it has to be on an actuarial basis. The hon. member does not want an insurance scheme on an actuarial basis. He wants an expanded relief scheme. That is what his whole argument amounted to, in effect. Most of his speech was devoted to a discussion of P.F.A.A. It is perfectly all right for the hon. member to talk about that if he wishes but it must be borne in mind that we are discussing a crop insurance scheme and not P.F.A.A. which is essentially a form of drought relief.

Mr. Argue: This scheme is designed to get rid of P.F.A.A.

Mr. Harkness: This is an insurance scheme and P.F.A.A. is not. The hon. member did not talk about crop insurance at all but spoke about P.F.A.A. and the need for increasing payments under it and expanding its provisions.

Whether or not he deliberately sought to do so the hon. member also conveyed the impression that P.F.A.A. was being abolished. In my opening remarks I made it very clear that P.F.A.A. is not being done away with and that any farmer in western Canada who does not come under the crop insurance scheme will still be eligible for P.F.A.A. He will pay the 1 per cent levy on the grain he delivers whereas if he comes under the insurance scheme he will not be required to pay that levy but he will also not be eligible to collect P.F.A.A. benefits.

It is well known, of course, that the hon. member for Assiniboia always wants everything both ways. He wants greatly expanded schemes of pushing out federal government money whether or not it is required, whether or not it is asked for and whether or not it is desirable. His position is always one in which he says, "You should have done more." It does not matter what government has been in power in Ottawa or in any of the provinces with the exception of Saskatchewan, the position taken by the hon. member for Assiniboia is always that the government has not done one-half enough, one-tenth enough, and so on. Nothing that is done by any government is ever enough in the view of that hon. gentleman.

Mr. Argue: Boy, how you have changed. You have been reading Jimmy Gardiners' speeches.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. gentleman likes to make these rude, loud-voiced interruptions which mean nothing.

[Mr. Argue.]

Mr. Argue: Read on.

Mr. Harkness: The hon. gentleman went on to say that this is a restricted type of insurance. There is nothing restricted about it. Any province can insure any type of crop at all. There is no limit or restriction placed on what a province does in regard to the crops it desires to insure under its insurance scheme. He went on to say that this scheme will require substantial payments by the provinces. I made it clear that the proposed act was designed to be as flexible as possible. Nothing in the legislation will require a province to pay one nickel toward a crop insurance scheme if it does not wish to do so. The province can charge the entire 50 per cent of the administration costs or the entire 80 per cent of the premium costs, neither of which the dominion government pays, to the farmer and the province does not have to spend a nickel on this scheme if it does not wish to do so. On the other hand if the province does wish to do so it can put in what it likes. There is no requirement for the provinces to spend substantial sums of money on this scheme as the hon. member suggested and on the contrary there is complete flexibility in that regard.

After making a peculiar argument to the effect that if we tried to put into effect a federal crop insurance scheme which was entirely under federal administration and control we would not really be in any conflict with the provinces' control over property rights and so forth—

Mr. Argue: It has already been done.

Mr. Harkness: —the hon. member went on to argue against himself and said that this scheme was an invasion of provincial jurisdiction. He said putting into effect a scheme of this kind would represent an invasion of provincial jurisdiction. This is no more an invasion of provincial jurisdiction than any grants made to a province which it can take or not as it wishes or earn or not as it wishes. As I indicated in speaking before, in the hospital grants, the contributions for hospital construction and so forth, the principle is exactly the same as in this proposed legislation.

The hon. member also went on to compare the administration costs of the United States crop insurance with prairie farm assistance. He said that the administration costs of prairie farm assistance were much less than in the United States crop insurance scheme. Certainly, they are much less because in that crop insurance scheme and in this crop insurance scheme the thing is going to be done on an individual farm basis.

The hon. member for Assiniboia has been standing up in this house to my knowledge for the last 10 years saying that prairie farm assistance should be paid on an individual farm basis. If it were paid on an individual farm basis, then the administration costs of it would be very greatly increased also.

I think these are the main complaints that were made and I hope, Mr. Chairman, I have been able to demonstrate that they have no validity. I think the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River who expressed some doubts as to the provinces' acceptance of this scheme will find that the scheme will be quite well accepted, particularly after it has been in operation for a year or so and the provinces have had an opportunity to see how it works.

Mr. Benidickson: How can it be accepted after operation for a year or so?

(Translation):

Mr. Racine: Mr. Chairman, I have a few comments to make in connection with this resolution respecting crop insurance. However, I have no intention of dealing with the resolution in all its details and my remarks will be brief.

When my colleague from Drummond-Arthabaska (Mr. Boulanger) took part in the debate on the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, he asked that the legislation be extended to eastern farmers. All the more so should this new supplementary legislation on crop insurance.

In January 1958, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) made a statement before the Canadian Agricultural Federation in Montreal —it is true that the minister was speaking on the P.F.A.A. at the time; but he nevertheless explained how difficult it would be to collect contributions if ever such assistance scheme were established in Quebec. To that effect, I shall refer to an article published in a Quebec paper, i.e. L'Action Catholique of July 23, 1958, which contains the following paragraph:

In this regard Minister Harkness answered that a crop insurance system was still being considered, but that considerable difficulties were involved in the scheme. —"Ever since I have been a minister," Mr. Harkness said, "I have repeated that the greatest single step toward improved farming conditions in Canada, would be the introduction of a crop insurance system. Studies are going on and I hope to be able to introduce such legislation before long."

And a little further on, the minister added:

"I may say that the result of this meeting has been to complicate matters even more, because a certain number of provinces did not show any interest in a crop insurance scheme. Some were interested, others less so and still others not at all."

I cannot disagree with the minister's statement, and I recognize that the situation is rather complicated. But since he has decided to introduce this legislation, I hope it has been thoroughly considered and that it will prove practicable with regard to all parts of this country, bar none.

As evidenced by the article I have just referred to, and following his meeting with the provincial ministers of Agriculture, the minister stated that some provinces were interested, others less so and still others not a bit.

It seems to me that the bill about to be introduced should be worded so that all provinces might benefit from it, according to climate and crop hazards, in the best interest of farmers. The fact has often been mentioned in Quebec at farmers meetings grouped under the U.C.C.; but, to my knowledge, no detailed study of the matter has been undertaken until now by the U.C.C.

The reasons behind this seeming lack of interest are said to be, first of all, that the P.F.A.A. was a very particular kind of crop insurance plan to which the federal and provincial governments were contributing. Then, the province of Quebec, with its mixed farming and its great variety of vegetable and animal production, was complicating the matter with regard to the administration of an act which benefits western Canada.

According to the U.C.C., tobacco and apple growers in our province made certain experiments. Insurance was provided by private enterprise and, of course, at the option of farmers themselves.

With regard to tobacco, and more particularly to cigarette tobacco, experience seems to have shown that it is possible, as the hon. member for Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) indicated; but even in those cases the rates were often prohibitive.

With regard to insurance for apple growers, since it is established on a voluntary basis, producers in the areas most likely to suffer from drastic changes in temperature were the ones to avail themselves of this protection, which proved fairly expensive and more or less practical.

Not only would it be important to consider the possibility of putting crop insurance at the disposal of farmers engaged in special farming, but it would also be important to put it at the disposal of those who are engaged in mixed farming and in a variety of vegetable and animal production.

In my opinion, this crop insurance legislation should include sections providing for a special credit policy in favour of farmers who are victims of damages caused by nature, such as floods, hail, tornadoes, etc. By such a policy a certain category of farmers, or even a whole agricultural area could be protected against localized damage.

In those specific cases, the legislation providing for such government credit facilities to agriculture would make it possible to grant the necessary credit with no interest charges to farmers affected, except, of course, to those who defaulted in their payments.

It seems to me that a clause to that effect would afford a measure of protection to a certain number of eastern farmers. Furthermore, such legislation could at the same time provide for the repayment of the capital, over a period of 3 to 10 years, according to the extent of the damage suffered by the buildings, or the various types of crops of a group of farmers of a given locality or area.

In my opinion, it would be extremely important that such a provision be added to the crop insurance bill which will be submitted to us shortly, because it often happens that excessive damages are caused in some areas through the vagaries of nature.

For my part, I am in favour of the crop insurance legislation principle, provided that such legislation be made applicable to all areas of Canada without exception.

However, in his brief remarks, the Minister of Agriculture indicated that this crop insurance bill which had been promised us requires some study in so far as its application in various areas is concerned. In my opinion, that legislation is actually a federal subsidy to the provinces, since the provinces themselves will have to determine what crops may be insured. However, we are in favour of this bill, although, as the minister stated, it seems most complicated.

Although the minister spent several hours preparing this bill, I would ask him whether he would not be prepared to put in a few more hours on it and, in that case, whether he could perhaps use that time in devising some way of getting the premier of Quebec to accept this legislation which would be of benefit to Quebec farmers.

Some hon. Members: Never.

An hon. Member: Not applicable.

(Translation):

Mr. Racine: In order to help the minister, may I suggest that he read over section 95 of the British North America Act, which provides that the federal government has concurrent powers in so far as agriculture is concerned.

I hope the minister will agree to my request and that eastern farmers, particularly those in the province of Quebec, will also benefit from this legislation.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, coming from the province of Saskatchewan and having listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia I rise to make a few observations, mostly corrections, so that the record will be accurate. In the first place, the crop insurance legislation now before us in resolution form is part of the national agricultural policy laid down in the house on August 31, 1958.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): August 30.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): August 30.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Dates are very important.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): This was one of seven points. I would recommend to all members of the committee that they realize the significance of the remarks of the Prime Minister on that day. As I see it, the key remark he made was that agriculture is not a local but a national problem and must be looked upon as something that is the responsibility of the House of Commons within its jurisdiction with respect to very part of Canada. This crop insurance bill makes it possible for every province in Canada, if it so desires, to make an agreement with the federal government to enter into a scheme that will relieve some of the risks brought about by the ups and downs of the weather. This is part of a national agricultural program because the whole problem of agriculture is a basic one and can be described very briefly as follows.

Traditionally in some parts of Canada agriculture has been bothered with the ups and downs of prices. The government has attempted to meet that situation with agricultural prices stabilization legislation. The second risk, and it is greater in some parts of Canada than in others is that due to the uncertainties of the weather and therefore the crop insurance legislation now before the committee is a vital part of our over-all national agricultural policy. In turn, when the farm credit legislation comes before us it too will be evidence of another promise made to the people of Canada and another promise kept.

In the past I have twitted the hon. member for Assiniboia for never quoting in the house or throughout the country the report of the royal commission on agriculture and rural life in Saskatchewan. At long last he has shown evidence that he has looked at the report. He brought it into the house today and, going rapidly through it, he read some selections. The first selection he read was from R. E. Motherwell's report which was pessimistic or negative with regard to the feasibility of crop insurance on the prairies. He read this portion of the Motherwell report into Hansard today. The Minister of Agriculture asked the hon. member for Assiniboia for the date of the report and, after looking around quickly, the hon. member said "September, 1955."

Mr. Argue: I rise on a point of order. I do not think the minister is trying to be unfair, but at that time I was not quoting from the Motherwell report at all. I have it on my desk but I have not marked any references to it in the report of the Saskatchewan royal commission. I was quoting the conclusions on page 15 of the report referring to Manitoba crop insurance commission. If I left the impression that I was quoting from the Motherwell report I am sorry because I left the wrong impression. I think the minister wants to be fair. I was not quoting from the Motherwell report.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I am very glad to have that correction because most members in the house will recall that the late Mr. Motherwell died before 1955. I sent out for my copies of the reports and, incidentally, the Motherwell report was made in 1944.

Mr. Argue: I have it in my hand. I know the report well.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I have accepted the hon. member's question of privilege. I wish I could make my remarks in reasonable peace. The Motherwell report was a summary of the findings of the Saskatchewan committee on crop insurance which had been studying schemes all during the 30's. The report was made in 1944. I definitely got the impression, and I am sure the Minister of Agriculture did too or he would not have asked for the date of the report, that the hon. member read that pessimistic comment. So I am going to put on the record what the Saskatchewan royal commission on agriculture and rural life had to say about the Motherwell report. This royal commission was established in 1952 and reported in 1956. One of their first observations in dealing with the various reports they had before them, was to say this about the Motherwell report, as found on page 13:

> Motherwell concluded his report on the feasibility of crop insurance in Saskatchewan with this rather pessimistic comment—

The royal commission recognized that he was reporting on the pessimism of crop insurance studies made during the 30's. If the hon. member had read the Saskatchewan royal commission report carefully he would have noticed the following statement on page 5 at the bottom of the righthand column:

> Crop insurance and P.F.A.A. were discussed at 16 of the 57 community hearings. The majority of the people in attendance at these 16 hearings favoured the establishment of a crop insurance program.

All the way through this report you sense the great need of people living in a drought area for help in the form of an insurance scheme to guard against some of the risk due to weather. Those people who know something about farming in the dry land areas of the United States and Canada know the great hardships that were suffered by the people in the 30's when there was no such thing as a crop insurance program to provide some help. As a group of people in Canada we were forced to accept relief from the rest of the people of this country. That relief was given in a very generous and Christian fashion but it did something to many of our people that some of us will never forget. That is why there are many in the house today, not the least of whom is the Prime Minister, who led a group of us who said that if we ever had anything to do with running the affairs of the country we would make a tremendous effort to set up some scheme whereby the farmers of western Canada and any other area that needed help could have it on a self-supporting basis so that men's feelings and integrity would be left whole. Therefore this crop insurance legislation is to some of us the fulfilment of a dream long before us.

I am not going to bother the committee at this stage with a long recital of all the arguments and recommendations in the royal commission report but I would recommend the report to members of the committee who are seriously interested in trying to provide some form of insurance against the weather and to protect the growing of crops by the agricultural industry of Canada. If hon. members do not have time to read all of it I would suggest that they look at chapter eight and the recommendations. There is no sense of pessimism here. The pessimism of the Motherwell reports is dismissed by this royal commission and this is what they say in the opening paragraph of their recommendations:

> Nevertheless, this commission, after consideration of the evidence before it, is convinced that, in the long view, crop insurance is feasible for the Canadian prairies.

This is the report of a five-member royal commission composed of Mrs. Nancy Adams; professor W. B. Baker, the chairman; T. H. Bourassa; H. L. Fowler; Charles W. Gibbings and J. L. Phelps. I can say with some assurance to the members of this committee that no one can say that those people named as the royal commissioners in this report have never had the interest of agriculture at heart. When the hon. member for Assiniboia condemns the recommendation of those royal commissioners—

Mr. Argue: I did not say that.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —set up by the C.C.F government in Saskatchewan, he condemns J. L. Phelps,—

Mr. Argue: Nonsense.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): —an ex-minister of the C.C.F. government. He condemns T. H. Bourassa from Lafleche and all his contributions to the co-operative movement in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Argue: Nonsense.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): He condemns Charlie Gibbings, vice president of the wheat pool. He condemns H. L. Fowler, one of the leading men in the co-operative movement in Saskatchewan, and he condemns Mrs. Nancy Adams.

Mr. Argue: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, may I say this. I did not differ with this report when I was speaking. My question of privilege is this. I mentioned no people who were commissioners on the Saskatchewan royal commission. I condemned no one. The minister's statement in this regard is completely false.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Chairman, the question of privilege raised by the hon. member as you, of course, recognize, is not a question of privilege at all. This was the same attitude that the hon. member took when the stabilization bill was brought into this house. I rose in my place and challenged him at that time and asked him why he does not rise and read the report of the royal commission. Despite all the name calling that went on at that session I said that we would go back to the people of the west and that we would let the people of Saskatchewan decide what they wanted and whether this was a condemnation or rebuttal of this kind. Saskatchewan spoke very strongly in March of 1959. I would suggest that when the hon. member spoke here today he will have to explain to the people of western Canada, and particularly he will have to make clear to the people of western Canada, whether he was speaking for the C.C.F. party at all levels in Canada. Is this the attitude of the C.C.F. party in Saskatchewan toward crop insurance? Does he speak for the C.C.F. government on this occasion? Is this going to be the test before the people of Saskatchewan real soon? I say to the hon. member that I shall be glad to stand up before the people of Saskatchewan on the record of a royal commission that looked into this matter very carefully and whose recommendation for crop insurance I support because I know the needs of the people. I know they do not want relief. All they want is a chance to help themselves and this gives it to them.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going into all the points raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia. The Minister of Agriculture did an extremely effective job of pointing out the fallacies of some of his statements. I think the hon. member suffers from his tendency to jump too quickly and to exaggerate. Then he pays a heavy penalty of regret. I should just like to remind him of some of the recommendations which I wish he would read:

> Recommendation No. 2. That reserve requirements for the experimental program be provided by the federal government, and that the central administrative functions be undertaken either by P.F.A.A. or by a new agency which would incorporate the P.F.A.A. and crop insurance programs.

There is no separation. They can both work together or anything you like.

Mr. Argue: The minister is separating them.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Another recommendation is as follows:

> Recommendation No. 20. That areas which qualify for crop insurance be excluded from P.F.A.A. coverage and levies.

After a long study a royal commission composed of once friends of the hon. member recommended that those areas benefiting from crop insurance be excluded from P.F.A.A. and those individual farmers who do not want crop insurance can have P.F.A.A. We have followed this recommendation to the letter. The hon. member who purports to speak for the C.C.F. party in the house now says that this is a terrible thing we have done. I could go through the whole report and decimate these various points that he has raised but since they have been well covered by the Minister of Agriculture I am just going to make this one point which I hope goes out to every farmer in the grain areas of the west.

Mr. Peters: It will be your first one.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Under the P.F.A.A. there is a $4 an acre relief contribution in the case of crop failure. This act which was so good according to the hon. member for Assiniboia had to be amended in many ways last year. We have supported this act and we have supported the amendments. But let hon. members who come from the grain areas do a little bit of arithmetic. This bill sets up a coverage of 60 per cent of average yield. If the average yield is 15 bushels, the coverage is for 9 bushels per acre. A coverage of 9 bushels an acre at $1.50 a bushel means $13.50 an acre coverage which you pay for partially yourself and partially by contributions of the federal government. The farmer of western Canada is not asking for handouts. He is not asking for relief. However, he will be glad that we are contributing half of the cost of administration and 20 per cent of the premiums because it is roughly the same as we give to the workingman of Canada. In the unemployment insurance arrangements for contributions they have had this since 1940. At long last, 19 years later, we give the same equal treatment to those in the agricultural industry.

I will just point that fact out to you, Mr. Chairman, in the hope that those who have the responsibility to carry the truth of what is happening here to the people of Canada will not let the type of comment made by the hon. member for Assiniboia get out across the country. If the truth be known, we then have no worry in our minds as to what the people will think of what we are doing here.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think the committee will recognize that this particular resolution, in principle,—I do not say in fact; and I do not deny that possibly the bill when introduced will have many features that will be highly desirable—is one of the most important matters to be put before this parliament at this particular session. I join with the hon. member for Assiniboia at once in expressing my regrets that this bill is being introduced at this late stage at a time when I am afraid the house will not be afforded the opportunity of giving the kind of consideration which this measure deserves. This is not the only important measure that is being introduced by the government at this late stage in the session. There is before us other legislation that should have been introduced earlier in the session.

This measure is one of the greatest importance. It is a bill that can provide the greatest benefit to the agricultural community of this country; but it is a measure that ought to be thought out carefully. It is a measure in connection with which we should invite the views not only of the provincial governments but as well all the national farm organizations. This can only be done by having the bill sent to a parliamentary committee. Whether it be to the existing committee on agriculture or to a special committee, as was done in the case of unemployment insurance, I am not now arguing, but I do suggest, and in doing so I take advantage of the Prime Minister's presence at this time, that a measure of this importance ought to be examined from every point of view, and the only way that can be done is by carrying out the suggestion made by the hon. member for Assiniboia.

I do not propose to examine the historical features of the proposal because I do not pretend to have the knowledge that some other hon. members have on this subject. I have looked at the report to which the member for Qu'Appelle has just directed our attention, the 1952 Saskatchewan royal commission on agriculture and rural life. I have examined some of its conclusions in the fourteen reports which were presented in December, 1956. I have spent some time in studying the report made by the Saskatchewan section of the United Farmers of Canada when they submitted a plan for all-risk crop insurance applying to all grain crops. I have paid some attention to the study which was made by Mr. Motherwell in 1944, who reported I believe as a member of the Saskatchewan reconstruction council on crop insurance, and to the study in Alberta in 1935.

Since no reference has been made to that, so that the record might be more complete, I would just mention that in that province crop insurance received consideration, and in 1936 a government committee report was issued suggesting three courses of action: First, an all risk crop insurance plan which would guarantee a minimum return either in yield or in value to the farmer; second, crop income payments; and, third, farm storage, that is sealed farm storage for grain in good years which would be available on the farms in dry years. Then there is the study in the Department of Agriculture itself when Mr. W. J. Hansen of the economics branch of the Department of Agriculture made a complete exhaustive study of this problem in connection with P.F.A.A. in 1936. So there is a wealth of material on this subject.

Much comment has been offered about the crop-insurance scheme in the United States. We should understand how that scheme is written, and how it is sold, and that certain types of crop insurance cannot be carried out in a country like Canada or even in that country in areas of low crop production. It could only be carried out in areas of high crop production and therefore does not attack the problem which prairie farm assistance attacks in this country; and it should not be forgotten that they do not have what we have in Canada, P.F.A.A. I think if the minister of agriculture in the St. Laurent government has the opportunity of reading today's Hansard and what the hon. member for Assiniboia said about that particular measure, and associates with that what the Prime Minister said in 1958, Mr. Gardiner will feel that he has indeed at long last received from his opponents, none of whom was more vigorous than the hon. member for Assiniboia, the kind of tribute and acknowledgement which I wish the hon. member for Assiniboia had given to Mr. Gardiner when he was a member of this house.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if I could tell the hon. member for Essex East, who wants to be fair, that I have done that many times.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I am very glad. So that the record will be complete on that score and Mr. Gardiner can enjoy his period of occupation at this time as a western farmer, I would recall the words of the present Prime Minister who, on February 20 of 1957, said as reported at page 1472 of Hansard:

> The Prairie Farm Assistance Act had its inception through the vision of the Minister of Agriculture—

Then Mr. Gardiner.

> —and what has been done deserves the appreciation of those who live in drought areas.

When we are comparing the United States system of crop insurance, bearing in mind that they do not have P.F.A.A., I think that these words of tribute to Mr. Gardiner, who was really the greatest friend western Canada ever had in this parliament, will show that what he did constitutes a great record in the field of agriculture. I do not think there is any question that the present Minister of Agriculture must day to day be confronted with evidence which was not open to him before and which indicates what an outstanding minister of agriculture we had in the person of Mr. Gardiner.

When the minister introduced this measure today he referred to it as an all-risk crop insurance. I note that that phrase "all-risk crop insurance" is used in the Saskatchewan report of 1952, the one in Alberta in 1935, the one in Manitoba in 1954, and so on, but I wonder if that is an accurate description of what the minister really has in mind in the resolution he puts forward today. I suggest to him that this is not a proposal for all-risk crop insurance, and before I take my seat I hope to establish the validity of this statement.

The minister said that the government is confronted in the proposal that it has made with the hindrances and obstacles which are embedded in our constitution, and that the federal government cannot bring forward any other kind of scheme in principle than the one introduced today. I would suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that that is not the case. This may be the desirable thing to do, but if he wants to use the analogy of unemployment insurance he can follow the example taken by the government of Mr. Mackenzie King in 1940. The government of that day did not bring in unemployment insurance without consultation with the provinces. It had no power under our constitution to impose any kind of contributions for the purpose of unemployment insurance on the employers or workers of our country. It had to get that power from the provinces as the minister knows.

Mr. Harkness: I pointed that out.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, my hon. friend pointed it out, but he did it in such a subdued manner as not to indicate that he was fully aware that what had been done in that case he might well have done in this case. My hon. friends opposite are on record as having promised the people of Canada a comprehensive system of crop insurance; the words of the Prime Minister are there for everyone to read. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River referred to the statement made by the Prime Minister on August 30, 1958, whose words appearing on page 4346 and page 4347 of Hansard for that date clearly establish, as the hon. member pointed out, that what the Prime Minister had in mind was provision for a comprehensive crop insurance program. That is not what is before the house at the present time.

Then because this matter is important, I put on record the words of the Prime Minister uttered in this house on September 6, 1958, to be found at pages 4747 and 4748 of Hansard. Here is what the present Prime Minister said:

> When the next session arrives we intend to introduce a measure for which the farmers have asked from the earliest days in western Canada, something which has also been requested by farmers in other parts of Canada, an insurance plan to bring about the assurance of at least a modicum of income, that degree of income which will not cost the farmer too much to assure himself of, and through which during the dark days of drought the farmer may be assured of at least a fair and reasonable rate of return. That is one of the things that came about under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. That met the situation in the western provinces to a degree. That legislation was placed on the statute books as a result of the initiative of the Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner. It has been expanded, it has served a successful purpose and has been beneficial. Farmers generally are today asking for something further in that direction and it is because they are asking for that, we intend to provide the opportunity at the next session of parliament of taking this further step.

My submission to this committee is that what we now have before us is not the kind of measure which these general words of the Prime Minister indicated was in the mind of the government as legislation in the field of crop insurance to be introduced during the present session. The hon. gentleman need not feel inhibited by the constitution. If the minister wishes he can do what was done in 1940, when we embarked on unemployment insurance. He has the same course open to him as we had; he can have the provinces called together, he can ask for an amendment to the constitution and he can bring forward a comprehensive scheme of crop insurance.

Mr. Benidickson: The same thing was done in the field of old age security.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, as was done in the case of old age security. That was in 1951. We had no authority to propose any form of contributions to senior citizens of this country in 1951, but we wanted a comprehensive old age security scheme and we got one. The only way we could do that was by having the constitution amended, and the only way to get that done was by calling the provinces together and obtaining their consent. We got that consent. So let no one think that in this matter now before us the minister has brought forward a comprehensive scheme of crop insurance, because that is not the case.

Mr. Harkness: That is your opinion. It is not the opinion of a lot of people.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That may be so, but I am submitting this argument and I hope I will receive the same attention as I have paid to the hon. gentleman when he spoke. This is the contention I am making. All the minister is doing today is precisely what the government of 1925 did in the matter of old age pensions. He has resorted to the same pattern, and 1925 was a long time ago. What was done then was to pass an act in this parliament saying that the government of Canada was prepared to extend certain financial grants to provinces which were prepared to embark upon schemes having to do with the establishment in Canada of old age pensions. But that was not an immediately comprehensive measure and no one ever pretended it was. So the hon. gentleman is, I think, struck at once with one of the real obstacles in this matter, an obstacle which suggests that whatever advantage might lie in this particular resolution it is not, as was indicated we would have, a comprehensive crop insurance scheme. I suggest to the minister that it is not too late for him or for the government to take the kind of step which would present to the farmers of Canada a comprehensive national scheme of crop insurance.

If this is not done, may I point out that we have had from the minister no assurances whatsoever as to what the attitude of the provinces is going to be. We know that in 1958 there was a conference with the provinces. I think the minister mentioned that this afternoon, and the minister referred to this conference when he spoke in this house in 1958. But he intimated then that the discussions were of a general character and that no final conclusion was taken. The minister said, I find, on June 4, 1958 as reported in Hansard at page 829:

> As a result of the recent conference with the provincial ministers of agriculture, Mr. Speaker, no particular consideration has been given to this matter. The whole matter, however, has been under very active consideration for many months past, and a considerable number of members of the Department of Agriculture have put a good deal of study and a good deal of work into the whole question of crop insurance and have prepared certain recommendations, which I am considering at the moment.

What provinces are going to enter this scheme? Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta? These provinces have, of course, studied this question. But what is the position of Ontario? I know what was said in the election of 1957 all over southwestern Ontario by those who now sit on the treasury benches. At that time, as very hon. member from western Ontario now sitting in this house knows, the farmers in that area had suffered very great economic losses as a result of crop damage by storm and we were told by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe, among others, that if this government came into power, in co-operation with the province of Ontario under Mr. Frost, we would be presented with a plan for the compensation of our farmers either directly out of federal and provincial treasuries or by virtue of some legislation which would be passed. In fairness to the Minister of Agriculture I must say that I wired him after the election of June 1957 and reminded him of the promise made, particularly by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. I also spoke to the Minister of Agriculture on the telephone and he said: I am not commenting on that. I am simply saying that what you are now submitting is not the policy of the government of Canada at the present time. I do not know if the Minister of Agriculture remembers this. He pointed out what the constitutional position was; that it was up to the provinces, and if they found it could not be done out of their own financial resources, if they found these resources did not enable them to take care of the situation, they had the right in that event to turn to the federal government. But there had been no such request made by any provincial government and consequently the Minister of Agriculture took the frank position that notwithstanding these promises I could expect, certainly for the farmers of Essex county, no such assistance as had been promised by hon. gentlemen opposite.

The minister has gone into some detail today. He has indicated that the federal government intends to pay 20 per cent of the cost of the premiums. The federal government has indicated—and I want to get this right—that where the revenue from the premiums is in excess of $200,000 the federal government will loan 75 per cent, make a loan to the province of 75 per cent of the excess.

Mr. Benidickson: No, the excess.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I thought I had said that. And the federal government is going to pay 50 per cent of the cost of the administration. That leaves 80 per cent of the premiums to be paid. An analogy has been suggested between this matter and unemployment insurance, but surely the fact that the federal government is going to pay 20 per cent of the premiums leaving 80 per cent still to be paid requires further explanation from the government before the analogy can be regarded as complete. Does the minister now know whether any particular province has determined (a) to come in and, (b) if it has, what percentage of the premium it is prepared to undertake. Is it going to accept 40 per cent to provide for an analogy as in the case of unemployment insurance where that percentage is borne by the employer and 40 per cent borne by the worker, or is it expected that the whole of the balance of the premium will be imposed on the farmer? If that is the case I am sure that we cannot expect that there will be many farmers who will come in under the scheme.

I know that the federal government has no legal authority—and if it had I know that certainly no government would want to take responsibility—for whatever policy a province arrives at as to the share to which it would commit itself with regard to a scheme of this sort but surely in the light of the statements made by the Prime Minister in 1958 and in the light of his own assurances about the studies that had been undertaken the minister is not in a position where he cannot tell this committee what provinces are going to come in and, if they do come in, what will be the percentage of financial responsibility they will bear.

All hon. members of this committee no matter where we come from recognize that the farmers of Canada have very special problems and if this particular scheme or a scheme like it will assist them in the great losses which have occurred from time to time we will all be very pleased indeed. But I think it should be borne in mind that all the farmers in Canada do not live in western Canada and that the farmers in eastern Canada, as was mentioned by several hon. members who spoke previously, have problems and losses from time to time. Sometimes those losses are comparable to those suffered by any other group in our country. Take the loss which threatened right in my own county to which reference was made the other day by the hon. member for Kent, Ontario, in the matter of tomato contracts. Take the great loss that occurred in 1957 all throughout southwestern Ontario. These were very serious losses to the farmers of that area. I suggest that a crop insurance scheme can apply not only to wheat but to corn, soybeans, sugar beets and all of those things.

Mr. Harkness: That is the purpose of this scheme; it will cover any crop.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In fairness to the minister I should state that he said that if a province decides to bring in any number of crops the federal government is prepared to the extent of its commitment in this legislation to be committed likewise. I suggest to the minister that if he wants to have a comprehensive scheme he has the opportunity of doing what the Liberal government did in 1940 and in 1951 with regard to unemployment insurance and old age security.

There is no question concerning where we in this group stand with regard to this subject. At the national Liberal convention which chose the present Leader of the Opposition as leader of the Liberal party it was affirmed that we support the extension of the principle of P.F.A.A. to all parts of Canada where it is desirable to provide emergency assistance and to provide adequate financial assistance to provinces which establish crop insurance plans. That resolution is an indication of our willingness to support a practical measure, one that will not prove too burdensome on the farming community and one which comes within the possibility of their acceptance having in mind what I think is the very desirable standard of measurement laid down by the minister, that the scheme ought to have sound actuarial principles.

It is significant that in the resolution before us we have nothing to indicate that this is a comprehensive crop insurance scheme. On the contrary the resolution as presently drawn and the minister's observations in connection with it suggest not only that no proper system of crop insurance has yet been set up but also that no plan has yet been worked out in so far as co-operation with the provinces in the inauguration of a joint plan is concerned.

I suggest to the minister that he ought to give us an opportunity of giving this measure the most careful attention in the dying days of this session. This measure ought to be sent to a committee so that we can ascertain what are the wishes of the provinces, what are the possibilities of their acceptance and what are the attitudes of the farm organizations. If that is not done I can foresee what will happen. I do not say that the Minister of Agriculture will do this, but I am sure my genial, vigorous and highly imaginative hon. friend the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources will go from one end of the country to the other telling the people of Canada that this government has an agricultural policy second to no other government in the world; not only has it got a vision for the north but it has a vision for the farmers of Canada, and he will call as his witness the crop insurance plan introduced by that distinguished hon. gentleman, the present Minister of Agriculture, which plan no province will have supported. Nevertheless he will have given the farmers of Qu'Appelle, the farmers of Essex East, and the farmers of Kent, New Brunswick, the impression that this, the most vigorous government we have had in Canada, has at long last brought forward a crop insurance plan. These men, the farmers of Canada, will not examine the bill in the way that we now have the opportunity of doing. Therefore, they will say, "At long last we have something that is going to provide for us when we have crop failures as a result of acts of God, and the like; at long last we have something that is going to give us the kind of security we require. We have been maintaining the urban workers through unemployment insurance and now we have something for ourselves." The real fact will be that all they will have is a bill passed by this parliament in the dying days of the session without consultation with the provinces or with farm organizations, a bill that has only some value in that it adopts a principle which if accepted by all the provinces might give it some substance.

I appeal to the Minister of Agriculture using in paraphrased language the kind of appeal he used to make when he sat in the third row back here on this side of the chamber when he in his insistent manner used to prod the minister of agriculture of the day and sometimes even the poor, helpless minister of national health and welfare of the day to take a particular course. I ask him now to consider this. This is an important bill. This is the kind of bill that could do a great deal for the farmers of our country. But let us make sure it is the kind of bill that will do that. Let us not bring forward a measure merely for the sake of gaining temporary political advantage, for the sake of being able to indicate, in form at any rate, that a promise has been kept. The real way to keep a promise or to gain political advantage, I suggest to the Minister of Agriculture—

An hon. Member: You should know.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, I should know. To return to my thought, the real way to keep a promise or to gain political advantage is by bringing forward substantial measures that really have something in them and not measures that merely give the impression of something being done. Someone said that I should know. Yes, I should know because I was a member of a government which brought down very substantial measures. P.F.A.A. was one of them. When I think of the criticisms against that legislation that were voiced in this house by so many members and when I hear the kind of tributes that are now paid to the former hon. member for Melville, the former minister of agriculture, who was the initiator of that measure, as the Prime Minister said, I realize that we did bring down useful measures and, as the hon. gentleman said, I should know about these things.

This is an important measure. This could be a most useful measure. Let us see what are the weaknesses in this bill. The way to do that is not by the kind of speech we have just had from the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources telling us that this is another spoke in the wheel of achievement in the field of agriculture. Let us put this government policy to the test by confronting the members of an agricultural committee with this measure and by asking the president of the federation of agriculture, by asking the interprovincial farm union and the corn and sugar beet growers of Essex county and similar organizations to express their views on it. Let them be given the opportunity in this session of parliament of indicating whether or not they look upon this as a substantial measure or whether they look upon it simply as mere window dressing, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River said. I am not saying it is window dressing, I do not know. I want an opportunity to examine this bill. It is because I have confidence in my persuasive powers on the Minister of Agriculture that I ask him to accede to this very reasonable request.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, if the resolution before us is, as the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources pointed out, a resolution that is going to complete the plan for agriculture that was pointed out by the Prime Minister in August, 1958, then I think a great deal more information should be available in the remarks made by the Minister of Agriculture than accompanied this particular resolution.

I should like to endorse the comment and support the argument made by the hon. member for Assiniboia and also the hon. member for Essex East that this legislation be referred to a committee so that some consultation could be had with those people who are qualified to give us the information. I am surprised, Mr. Chairman, that there has not been more consultation on a formal basis with the provinces before this particular resolution was brought before us. It is quite true that the people in my area could have received great advantages on a number of occasions in the past if this type of legislation had been in effect. But I think that much more consultation must take place before any indication can be given of what good this particular legislation is going to accomplish.

Crop insurance could cover a wide variety of natural phenomena. It could cover hail, flood, drought and many of the other natural phenomena, and each one of those could have disastrous effects in a particular area. In my particular area I can remember only one occasion in my lifetime when there was so much flooding that no crop was harvested. It was back in 1928. Since that time, although there have been partial crop failures in areas in particular grains, it has never reached the magnitude that it did in that particular year. It is quite true also that there are other small segments of the area which are affected by frost or by drought or by some other condition. I think this type of insurance could be very economical. It is the type of insurance which could cost the farmer very little.

I remember some of the arguments I heard when I was in western Canada on several occasions in the last few years. On each occasion when crop insurance was discussed during the provincial elections in Manitoba not long ago the farmer was more concerned with whether this was going to cost him more money than he could afford to put out for this type of insurance. I think it must be borne in mind by the Minister of Agriculture—and he may continue to forget this fact—that many of the farmers that I met that are receiving the benefits of the prairie farm assistance had not the amount of money available, and they have not had it for some time, that would be required to cover the premiums under a provincial scheme. Many more considerations must be taken into account before this plan is implemented.

If the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources was correct—and I assume he was—that the Prime Minister is implementing an agricultural scheme to solve the problems of rural agriculture in all parts of Canada, then this must be part of that scheme and it must fit into the scheme on a national basis. If this is true, then why not refer this to a committee which will have the opportunity of calling before it witnesses from all parts of Canada who have the information. I think it is quite easily understood that there is a great deal of difference between covering, for instance, grain and potatoes in my part of the country and covering cherries, apples or other small fruits in the Niagara peninsula. There is no connection between these products. The amount of insurance that would be necessary to cover these two fields would vary greatly and in most cases they would not be suffering from the same problem. In one instance frost would affect the crop and in the other instance it would probably be a wet condition or not enough rain or some other condition.

I think the Minister of Agriculture must be aware of the fact that the great problem in agriculture today is not crop failure or overproduction but lack of markets and lack of returns for the produce the farmer is producing. If the farmer were given a fair and reasonable price for his product, if he were guaranteed this on a forward carrying basis, then I am quite sure we would have no reservation in accepting the fact that the farmer ought to be able to carry this type of crop insurance himself. But in the circumstances there are many farmers in my part of the country who are not going to be able to participate in any type of crop insurance unless it is paid for 100 per cent by people other than themselves because their income has been such in the last two years that they are not capable of carrying crop insurance at all. They will not be able to pay the premiums, or if they do their families will probably go hungry.

If the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is interested, as he appears to be, in this legislation for agriculture, then the major problem he is faced with today is not this piecemeal program of putting into effect all the Prime Minister wants to accomplish on a national basis for agriculture but it is the real problem of prices. If he is going to get himself involved in the Department of Agriculture, then I think he cannot neglect also to use his influence to see that prices are maintained and established on a parity basis so that we shall know exactly what we are going to insure and how we are going to insure it.

There are many people who, if they want this type of scheme, will be paying on a crop that they have not the faintest notion what it will be worth by the time it reaches the market. I am quite sure that all hon. members have received letters from the fruit producers and the vegetable producers in the Niagara peninsula in particular where this problem is much more prevalent than it is in any other form of agriculture, where they are producing a high price commodity for a market which may not pay the cost of production when it is finally put on the market.

I would suggest to the Minister of Agriculture that it is going to be very difficult to insure this type of crop against crop failure if they are not even sure it is worth saving. In fact, it might be quite a saving to the producers if it disappeared before it reaches the market stage because the small amount that they will save will probably not be worth enough to make it worth while insuring the amount that they have lost.

It seems to me that if we are to consider this crop insurance program in terms of the much bigger scheme that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources implied had been envisioned by the Prime Minister and partly implemented by this particular legislation, then I think much more consideration will have to be given to it. My information arising from a superficial examination in Manitoba of part of this problem would indicate that in the main the farmers of that province are not going to give up prairie farm assistance for crop insurance. On the other hand, I know of no group in Ontario that has developed plans so far to implement crop insurance if it is brought into being under any scheme. I have talked to a large number of farmers and representatives of farm organizations and, having regard to the scheme now before us, I think they are going to be less interested in developing plans to put crop insurance into effect.

Therefore I think there is a great deal to be said for the request of the hon. member for Assiniboia and the hon. member for Essex East that this matter be placed before the standing committee where we would have an opportunity to hear presentations by the various organizations concerned with the subject. If this does not come to pass, then I suggest that the government is not prepared to support this measure by argument before the various organizations and that members of the government, just as the hon. member for Essex East has said, are going to travel throughout the country and say to the people that they have given them all they promised to give and that if they do not get any benefit from the scheme it is the fault of the province.

This argument can only be met if the Minister of Agriculture is willing to call a conference of the provincial ministers of agriculture in order to discuss this and other matters in a concrete way so that he and certainly the various oragnizations will have a much better idea of what is available so far as crop insurance is concerned. I think in Ontario we need crop insurance and have needed it for some time. It should be established on an actuarial basis having regard to the record over a number of years. It should also be based on the ability to pay of the farmers, the municipality or whatever unit is used because I think it has been generally accepted that those who are least able to pay are the ones who need help the most. I am quite sure that this will apply to crop insurance if and when it comes into effect in the province of Ontario. Those who need it are going to be least able to take advantage of it.

The problem of how to finance the scheme, how far it should be extended and the advantages that can be provided can only be solved by hearing representatives of the organizations and if the measure is passed in its present form it will probably not be satisfactory to the majority of organizations who would like assurance with regard to one thing or another. It will not solve their problems.

Mr. Benidickson: Does the hon. gentleman as a resident of Ontario think that the terms outlined by the Minister of Agriculture would likely be accepted by the province of Ontario as the basis for a partnership deal?

Mr. Peters: I am only guessing but I am quite sure they will not be. As far as Ontario is concerned, I am quite sure that the legislation will not be used at all.

Mr. Benidickson: That is my view.

Mr. Peters: From the superficial experience I have had in talking to a number of farmers in Manitoba I also suggest that the farmers of that province are not going to trade what they have for a crop insurance scheme. Many of them have said that to them crop insurance appeared to be too expensive for them to take advantage of it. In my own area in Ontario, for instance, there is a lot of dairy farming and I cannot see that the farmers would be willing to have hay and grain covered unless the premium were very small. Unless everybody engaged in farming in the province is going to be covered, unless the scheme is on a very comprehensive scale, then the premiums will be so high that nobody will be able to take advantage of the plan.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. The Chair is aware that the clocks have been stopped for some 15 minutes. We are proceeding on the basis of the time provided by the watch of the Clerk of the house.

Mr. Fraser: Did the C.C.F. stop the clocks?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): The time is 12 minutes to six, table time.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I have been interested in the remarks made by the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. When I spoke initially I said that I had hoped and had reason to expect, having in mind the importance of this legislation, that there had been some prior consultation with the provinces on the kind of proposal that has been presented. In reply I believe the Minister of Agriculture said that this matter had been discussed at four conferences.

I should like to know from the Minister of Agriculture whether the main proposals contained in the bill have been discussed with the provinces. I am not interested in knowing whether the question of crop insurance came up generally at one of these conferences. What I am interested in finding out is whether or not the Minister of Agriculture discussed the main proposals in the bill, the proposal that the federal government would pay a 20 per cent premium, the proposal applying to the prairie provinces that if a farmer there wishes to take out insurance under this legislation he forfeits the right to be covered by prairie farm assistance. I should like to know specifically with respect to that question whether the minister of agriculture of Saskatchewan has agreed to this very far-reaching proposal contained in the legislation. I have grave doubts whether the provincial ministers of agriculture are aware of what is in the bill. As a matter of fact, I think that if the bill had been discussed with the provinces the minister would not have received general support for the type of legislation that is being introduced, certainly not from the prairie provinces.

I think this adds substance to the request already made by myself and the hon. member for Essex East that this very important legislation should be referred to the standing committee on agriculture. I think the provinces should be prepared, as I am certain they would be, to give their views on this legislation in public. I think we should have the benefit of the views of the various ministers of agriculture from the different provinces in order to see whether their views concerning this proposal, which in the words of the Minister of Agriculture concerns something that is not a federal but a provincial responsibility, were taken into account before the measure was presented.

The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources has made a great to-do about the report of the Saskatchewan royal commission on agriculture and rural life. He seems to take the view that if one differs in any degree with anything contained in the report one is immediately condemning all the commissioners and everything they stand for. Is this not a strange attitude on the part of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources? Would he apply the same logic to the stand taken by one of the commissioners Charlie Gibbings on deficiency payments? Does he mean that the proposals respecting the deficiency payments presented by the Saskatchewan wheat pool and other farm organizations must be accepted and are accepted by the minister because Mr. Gibbings is in part the author of a report on deficency? If there is any logic to the minister's argument, then he stands for deficiency payments as proposed by the farm delegation, which we all know, of course, is far from the fact. They all know that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is very actively and very strongly opposed to deficiency payments as they have been presented. But what the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is attempting to do—

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The hon. member is putting words into my mouth.

Mr. Argue: The minister can reply. He is an authority on putting words into peoples' mouths. We saw him doing it in this very house not so very long ago.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Pretty weak.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, no matter what government appoints a royal commission—whether it be a Conservative government, a Liberal government or a C.C.F. government—I reserve the right to look over the recommendations of the royal commission and on my own judgment to say whether or not I believe they are fully in the interests of the people covered by the report. I do not take the view which the minister of northern affairs would have us believe he takes—and which he does not take at all—namely that this is his bible, that he has taken it to his bosom and that he accepts everything that is in it. If he does so, there will be some rather strange things that he has accepted.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Will the hon. member name a better reference for information on crop insurance than a better report?

Mr. Argue: I would not go to the minister if I were looking for a better reference, I can tell him that. I can tell him what I will do. I will give him a copy of Hansard for today containing my speech which I think is more realistic than the conclusions, if you put them all together, of all the royal commissions on this subject, many of which have different points of view or outlook, and some of which arrived at different conclusions at different times. I would suggest that the conclusions that have been arrived at by this government are not conclusions that are supported in the royal commission on agriculture in Saskatchewan or any other royal commission or in their campaign promises; but most important of all, they are not supported by the farmers and the producers of western Canada.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Am I clear on this point, namely that the hon. member considers that he is a greater authority than the royal commission report? Is that the significance of his remarks?

Mr. Argue: If the minister wants to ask me whether I think that some parts of the west should be taken out of crop insurance, I would say no. But of course the Minister of Agriculture pretends that he accepts this report—he pretends that—and then he does not quote all the parts of it that have to do with recommendations when he is quoting them.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I have not quoted anything from this report.

Mr. Argue: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. I meant the minister of northern affairs. I will come to the Minister of Agriculture in a moment or two. The minister of northern affairs quoted certain things from page 99 of the report. I should like to quote some more things from it. These are found under the title "Administrative and Financial Responsibility":

> In view of the interprovincial nature of the need for crop insurance, the limited financial resources of individual provinces, the necessity of spreading risks over as wide an area as possible; and in view of the federal government's accumulated experience in administering the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and its earlier acceptance of responsibility for crop insurance at the time P.F.A.A. was enacted,—

Listen to that, Mr. Chairman.

> —the commission recommends:
> Recommendation No. 2. That reserve requirements for the experimental program be provided by the federal government and that central administrative functions be undertaken either by P.F.A.A. or by a new agency which would incorporate the P.F.A.A. and crop insurance programs.

Mr. Benidickson: Read No. 40 on page 97.

Mr. Argue: I had better stick to what I have been reading instead of going to what the hon. gentleman is reading. This is further spelled out, as has been suggested, in item 40 on page 97. From page 99 I read further:

> Recommendation No. 3. That the participation of provincial governments in crop insurance include (a) assuming regional administrative costs and (b) acting in an advisory capacity to the program.

From the whole of this report I think it is clear that it was the intention of the royal commission that this scheme should be a federal plan administered by the federal government and, of course, as the report points out time and time again, should be in its initial stages an experimental crop insurance scheme confined to pilot areas and not be on a general province-wide basis.

The minister of northern affairs has referred to the P.F.A.A. as relief and he has said that farmers would surely prefer to be covered by a crop insurance scheme instead of relief under prairie farm assistance. I challenge the minister's interpretation of prairie farm assistance. I challenge the statement he has made that prairie farm assistance is relief in the ordinary sense of the word "relief", namely a handout or a present. I suggest that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is a national act in this country recognizing the federal responsibility, in the words of the former minister of agriculture, to provide certain benefits to western producers under certain conditions when there is a crop failure. These are benefits to which the producers are entitled by law and are in no sense a handout or relief.

Mr. Pickersgill: Good Liberal legislation.

Mr. Argue: It needed to be much better than it was. After fighting with the Liberals for eighteen years, I believe it was, we got some improvements in the legislation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Who put it there in the first place?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I do not know why I get these shouts from the side.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was supporting the hon. gentleman.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Argue: Before you call it six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I say to you that the farmers on the prairies will resent this aspersion by the minister of northern affairs that the benefits they receive under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act are in any way shape or form relief or that they should be termed that, above all by a minister from the prairies. May I call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock I was saying that the farmers on the prairies will resent very much the reference by the minister of northern affairs to the present Prairie Farm Assistance Act as one by which the farmers are given relief. I think one of the most serious faults in the measure as forecast by the minister is that farmers who wish to come under the act must forgo the benefits of prairie farm assistance. Prairie farm assistance generally is a program that has been accepted by the farmers of western Canada. They feel that as far as it goes it is a good program, and they will resent very much having to forgo the benefits of this good program in order to qualify for crop insurance as defined by this legislation.

One of the questions which might be asked is whether or not this is a practical scheme; whether or not in most areas it can be expected that farmers will take advantage of the program as it is likely to be brought about. The Saskatchewan royal commission on agriculture and rural life in its ninth report, which is the crop insurance report to which reference was made earlier, has divided Saskatchewan by way of example into three general areas where the commission has examined into the feasibility of crop insurance and the premiums that would likely have to be paid under such a scheme in those areas.

First of all, I might say that in setting forth these examples the Saskatchewan rural commission has said that the following rules as to insurance will apply. The premium unit would be a group of delivery points so that at a certain group of delivery points all the producers within that area who wish to be covered by crop insurance would pay the same rate. The indemnity unit—I take it the unit on which payments will be made—in time of crop failure as defined in the legislation is also a group of delivery points. So, according to this analysis, farmers would not be paid on the yields from an individual farm but the indemnity unit would be a group of delivery points. That certainly would tend to reduce the size of the premium and some of the administrative costs. The coverage would be 60 per cent of the long term average yield group.

The Regina region is one of the three examples used, and the Regina region is used as an area of relatively low risk. This is the land that according to the Saskatchewan assessment commission, from the standpoint of production of wheat, is the most valuable land in Saskatchewan. It is relatively free from crop failure, has level topography, is near to markets and so on. In putting forth this example, the royal commission on page 139 of its report had this to say:

> The average premium rate for the Regina region would be .735 bushels per acre for an average coverage of 9.4 bushels per acre. . . . The average amount of protection per farm would approximate $2,754.

The premium would be $215, making a ratio of premium to coverage of 7.8 per cent. The 7.8 per cent premium in this example in the Regina area—and this is an area relatively free from crop failure—is to be compared with the 1 per cent premium under the present Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

The next area of medium risk is called the Hanley-Davidson region, and in this area in order to be covered under the same formula the premium would be 13.8 per cent. I suggest that a premium of 13.8 per cent is a very high premium. It is a premium which very few farmers are likely to consider they are in a financial position to meet. The chances of them insuring with such a high premium is less today than it was a few years ago because the price of wheat, the main commodity in the area, is lower today relative to the cost of production than it was a few years ago. As the cost-price squeeze continues and the farm production costs continue to rise while prices for farm products remain at about the same level, and in some instances go down, farmers will be more and more reluctant to take advantage of such a scheme, and would find it much more difficult financially if they thought it to their economic advantage so to do.

Now I come to the third area, the Swift Current-Shaunavon region. In that region it is pointed out that with an average of 170 insurable acres per farm, the average premium cost per farm unit becomes $169, the maximum coverage about $1,035, and the ratio of premium to coverage becomes 16.3 per cent. Here is an area in Saskatchewan where crop failures are widespread. Here is an area which is more in need of crop failure protection than many areas; and here is an area where it will be absolutely impossible, if these figures are correct, to insure farms because farmers will find it impossible to produce a 16.3 per cent premium in order to provide in this average type of farm coverage amounting to $1,035 when such a farm, according to the same example, would have coverage of just under $700 under prairie farm assistance for a rate of 1 per cent.

I say in all seriousness to hon. members from the prairies, particularly those hon. members who represent high risk areas, that there is nothing in this measure to recommend it to them. As a matter of fact, in the areas where crop failures are more persistent this measure does not provide any advantage. The government would have been far better advised as it affects the prairie provinces to have improved and expanded the Prairies Farm Assistance Act to provide greater coverage to the people who do in fact have crop failures, and to provide this greater coverage under the very important principles that apply to prairie farm assistance. This legislation can but cover a small minority of the farmers of western Canada. It will exclude the majority of the farmers. It places an obstacle before farmers who wish to come under the act, and it is an endeavour by the federal government to transfer the bulk of the financial responsibility for protection in time of crop failure on to the backs of the provinces and/or the producers.

The minister has not quarrelled with the statement I made that the administrative costs in the United States have worked out to about 25 per cent of the indemnity. If that is the case in Canada, then of course the 20 per cent of the premium which the federal government is paying together with half of the administrative costs is a very small proportion of the total costs which will be involved.

Mr. Benidickson: The federal government in the United States pays the 25 per cent anyway.

Mr. Argue: Quite correct. In the United States the federal government pays the whole of the 25 per cent, and after that they ask their producers to pay the rest, and all the studies of the United States system of crop insurance state it is impracticable of implementation as far as Canada is concerned. Yet in spite of all this the government is endeavouring to transfer this responsibility at least to some extent to the provinces. The government hopes, of course, that by putting forward some kind of a scheme the demand for improvements in the Prairie Farm Assistance Act can be turned on to the provinces, thereby avoiding what is in my submission a federal responsibility. A great deal has been made of the position taken by the Saskatchewan royal commission, and as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River pointed out before the supper adjournment, paragraph 40 on page 97 is very clear. This is what it states:

Potential liabilities in crop insurance—even in a test program—are beyond the fiscal capacity of a single agricultural province. Federal participation is therefore essential. A federal program, moreover, would avoid the high concentration of risks which would inevitably occur in a provincial program. Administrative needs also make it highly desirable that the federal government assume the major role.

This is the key recommendation in this report, namely that even in a test program, and most certainly in a wider program, the federal government must assume a major role. This is where this legislation falls down, because it is endeavouring to transfer back to the provinces in 1959 a part of the responsibility which was accepted as a federal responsibility in 1930.

The minister of northern affairs in his speech this afternoon made an oblique reference to impending debates out in Saskatchewan. Probably he had in mind some reference to the Saskatchewan election, whenever that may be called. The minister of northern affairs seemed to suggest that he would like to debate agricultural issues with me. Nothing would please me more than to meet the minister of northern affairs on a public platform in Saskatchewan to debate the agricultural policy of this government, including this inadequate legislation which is now before us and to let the people who might come to such a debate at some convenient place decide whether or not this government has fulfilled its commitment to the people of western Canada and to the farmers of Canada generally, namely to give them a fair share of the national income. This legislation, instead of endeavouring to do that very thing, is a means of trying to transfer what must be essentially a federal responsibility back to the province.

Mr. Chairman, in the light of the fact that there has been very little discussion with the provinces I think that this legislation will be exceedingly disappointing as far as western Canada is concerned. I believe it will be considered entirely inadequate and that it will bar from effective participation the very producers who need protection most.

Mr. Michaud: I should like to ask the minister if I understood him correctly this afternoon with regard to his comment about the position taken by the maritime provinces. Would the minister mind explaining again what is the attitude of the governments of the maritime provinces in this matter?

Mr. Harkness: What I said this afternoon was that during the various conferences I have had with the ministers of agriculture, when the question of crop insurance was under discussion the ministers from the three maritime provinces indicated that they did not think their provinces would be very interested because of the fact that they very seldom have serious crop failures. But they were quite prepared to study any program which came forward and decide then whether or not they were interested in coming in.

Mr. Benidickson: I have previously indicated a certain amount of skepticism, having heard from the minister in his major speech about various escape hatches he is preparing in this bill. I want to see this bill, because I think it will be full of such escape hatches as those about which the minister hinted.

The minister replied to the few remarks I made in this way—he attempted to show how much interest had been displayed by the various provinces in the course of the dominion-provincial conferences which have taken place during the time of his administration of the federal Department of Agriculture. That was not the question which I addressed to the hon. gentleman. I asked him about the probabilities and expectations as a result of these conversations over the past two years. How many provinces does the minister think, having in mind the terms which he knows are in this bill, are likely to accept a proposal of this sort?

This raises a point which is 18 months old. I think that on October 17, 1957, the minister was asked whether a request had been made by any of the provinces for the enactment of a national all-risk crop insurance program, and the minister's answer, as reported on page 59 of Hansard of the 1957-58 session was to the effect that there was no indication of any such request or any such pressure. I think before we conclude our debate at this stage the minister should not just debate the question as he did by saying that there was interest. Of course, interest would naturally be displayed at four meetings of federal-provincial representatives of departments of agriculture, but the question I raised, and the question which the minister avoided answering, was this: how much probability is there that the terms enunciated in this bill which the government has prepared are likely to be so attractive that several provinces, or a majority of the provinces out of ten, would probably accept them in the near future?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman is asking me to engage in prophesy. I know of no more fruitless occupation and I do not intend to enter into it.

Mr. Benidickson: Another question was asked more directly by the hon. member for Assiniboia. He asked whether the minister had indicated to the provincial ministers of agriculture what was likely to be in this bill and whether there was any indication of whether these terms are likely to be accepted by a fair number of the ten provinces. Or are we just to be left in the dark with regard to this proposition which the minister has put up.

Mr. Argue: I should like to know from the minister whether these main proposals in this legislation have ever been discussed with a single provincial minister of agriculture. I ask this question because I think it is clear from what the minister has said that any discussions on crop insurance which have taken place with the provinces so far have been in the course of a general agricultural conference, and the subject has been discussed in a very general way. Since the provinces under this measure will be expected to bear more than 80 per cent of the total cost of such a scheme I should like to know whether or not the provinces have been made aware of the kind of legislation that is being proposed. I would be interested in knowing if the government had gone so far as to make them aware of the proposed legislation. I should have thought that in discussing legislation with the provinces the main principles involved in the legislation would have been discussed with them prior to the legislation being introduced. I am wondering if the minister will say that this is so.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member knows quite well that I would not have discussed the details of this measure with the provinces and had I done so he and others in his party would have been the very first to complain about my having made this informatian available to the provinces before revealing it in the House of Commons. The hon. member would have emitted bellows that you could hear back as far as the Confederation building that I was disregarding the rights of parliament and so on and so forth. He knows full well that that is the situation.

Mr. Argue: In other words, the provinces have not been made aware of the main proposals of the government. In addition to that I take it—and the minister can correct me if I am wrong—that at no time did the government discuss with the provinces the program that might be put in practice dividing the costs of a crop insurance scheme. I would not expect the minister to take the detailed bill to the provinces for prior approval but when he is asking the provinces to bear more than 80 per cent of the cost I think in all fairness—

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I really must protest at the hon. member stating something that is completely incorrect. Under this proposed bill the provinces are not required to bear a nickel of cost as I pointed out this afternoon.

Mr. Argue: No, not if they decide not to go into it. What a gun the minister is trying to hold to the heads of the provinces.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Come off it.

Mr. Argue: The minister is introducing legislation which if it is to be of practical value requires the provinces to bear 80 per cent of the cost and he has not had the courtesy or decency to discuss the question with the provinces. I think this is a shameful attitude on the part of the government. It reveals that the government is not at all interested in having good federal-provincial relations in this country. If the government wished this scheme to win acceptance from the provinces it should have placed its proposals before a federal-provincial conference on agriculture.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): How do you know there will not be acceptance? Get out your crystal ball.

Mr. Argue: It is obvious from the statement of the Minister of Agriculture that there has been no consultation with provinces yet the minister has brought before parliament legislation which if it is to be effective requires the provinces to pay more than 80 per cent of the cost.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): That is not correct.

Mr. Argue: Yes it is. The federal government will pay 20 per cent of the premium. Of course the provinces can make the farmers pay the 80 per cent but it will be outside the payments of the federal government. That is what the minister has placed before us.

Mr. Pugh: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Argue: My hon. friend asks what is wrong with it. Apparently he thinks this is the way to achieve successful federal-provincial relations; not to consult with the provinces or discuss your proposals but introduce legislation in parliament which if it is to be effective requires the provinces to pay at least 80 per cent of the cost. This represents an undermining of federal-provincial relations.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Oh, bosh.

Mr. Speakman: Nonsense.

Mr. Argue: I appreciate all the attention my remarks are receiving as evidenced by the innocuous interruptions of hon. members opposite. When a royal commision has stated that crop insurance is a national problem, it is not my concept of mature government action when the federal government introduces into parliament legislation under which the provinces will be required to make substantial payments and concerning which they have not been consulted. I think this is an insult to the provinces. This is the worst possible way to conduct public affairs in Canada in respect of issues and in fields where the federal government is asking the provinces to co-operate.

Why was there not a federal provincial conference on crop insurance? The provinces and the farmers within the provinces are to be asked to bear 80 per cent of the cost. In the prairie provinces it will be even worse because the farmers there will have to pay 80 per cent of the cost and forego legislation that is already on the statute book. A conference of this nature has been requested by at least some of the provinces, but such a conference did not take place.

Not only do I protest some of the provisions the minister has said will be in the bill but I most emphatically protest the arbitrary, high-handed and unilateral way the government has handled this legislation. There can be only one way in which the government should proceed from this point on and that is to call a meeting of the standing committee on agriculture and colonization or some other appropriate committee if the government so chooses and let us hear from the farm organizations and the provincial ministers of agriculture concerning their views of the proposals contained in this legislation. Let us have what would be in effect a federal-provincial conference on a delayed basis, a basis much inferior to that of a conference being held in advance of the introduction of the resolution.

After this arbitrary and high-handed attitude of the government and the arbitrary way in which this has been handled which represents a gratuitous insult to the provinces I suggest that the way to proceed from this point on is to have a meeting of the standing committee on agriculture before which the provinces would have a chance to express their views. Even more important than that, the farm organizations would have a chance to come before the committee and tell us how producers can be expected to come under the terms of this legislation and pay premiums of 10 or 15 per cent or more.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Assiniboia has again been busily engaged in setting up a strawman and tearing it to pieces in a loud voice. He is attempting to introduce some difficulty as between the dominion and the provinces over this matter where no difficulty in the world exists. It is entirely a figment of his own imagination and is designed for no purpose other than to try and create disunity and difficulty in the country.

As I have said, I have discussed this matter on several occasions with the ministers of agriculture of the provincial governments and none expressed any opposition toward the general question of crop insurance.

Mr. Argue: Against paying 80 per cent?

Mr. Harkness: As a matter of fact all were quite willing to have legislation brought in to implement a system of crop insurance and some were extremely anxious to have it brought in. A number of provincial ministers of agriculture who expressed views on this question thought that whatever scheme was brought in should be under provincial administration because the provinces would be in a better position than the dominion government to administer it, particularly in view of differences in crop conditions in various parts of Canada and things of that nature. I believe this is a self-evident fact. The real difficulty the hon. member for Assiniboia has is that he is against crop insurance. The speech he made this afternoon was a complete speech against crop insurance; the speech that he made this evening, in which he got into this other gambit of dominion-provincial relations, was against crop insurance. He does not want a crop insurance scheme. In trying to prevent a crop insurance scheme going into effect he is trying to throw every possible impediment that he can think of in the way of implementation of a crop insurance scheme, and then go out in the country and say that a Conservative government promised that you would have a crop insurance scheme, but you see they have not produced it. This is the type of tactics he pursues.

I should like to make it very clear, Mr. Chairman, that the statement which the hon. member for Assiniboia has made time after time that the provinces will be required to pay 80 per cent of the cost is absolutely false. The provinces are not required to pay one cent of the cost. It is up to them how much of the cost, if any, they pay, and the dominion government actually will be paying something over 25 per cent of the cost of a crop insurance scheme in any particular province, made up of 20 per cent of the premiums and 50 per cent of the administration costs.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get into any argument between the minister and the hon. member for Assiniboia. I listened very carefully to what the Minister of Agriculture had to say and as I wrote them down his words were "No difficulty exists with the provinces on discussion". Why should there be? Who is against crop insurance? People are not against it. You assert it. I am not getting into that. That is the thing I am not getting into. The minister said, and I wrote this down, "There is no sentiment against crop insurance". I agree with him. As has been put on the record, the Liberal party is in favour of crop insurance. But what I want to know is, are the provinces likely to accept crop insurance on the terms enunciated by the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon with all those escape hatches that I spoke about?

I do not want to prolong this debate on the resolution stage because I want to see the bill. There is nothing in the resolution to give us any indication of what might be provided, but I have a suspicion that the possibility of crop insurance in this country in the near future has been strangled by these kinds of provisos, back door provisos and, as I say, those escape hatches, which I do not think have been presented to the provinces and which I want to know about. I would be prepared to allow the resolution to pass at the present time and see the details of the bill and see whether or not I was right when I said I suspected it was an empty shell. I would like to see it, and I would like an undertaking from the minister that a certain time would elapse, not long, perhaps a week, and within that week we could then determine whether or not the minister, say on second reading, would be prepared to come forward and tell us that in this interval he had had any indication other than what he has announced so far that provincial governments are very interested—let me go back to my original question—and are likely to accept in the near future the proposition that he advances in this resolution.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, in spite of what the minister says, we are endeavouring to obtain a scheme that will be acceptable to the people of western Canada in particular and also to people in other provinces who may be interested in coming under this scheme.

The minister has said that I have put up a strawman; that what I said was a figment of my imagination, but he has not said, and he was careful not to say, that the accusation I have made was wrong, namely that there have been no consultations and discussions with the provinces on the basic proposals that were to be contained in legislation advanced by the government. There has just been a little discussion on crop insurance and, of course, provinces have said they were greatly interested in crop insurance. They would like to know the government's views on crop insurance. Saskatchewan wanted to discuss with the minister the government's views on crop insurance. The government of Saskatchewan wished to consult with the federal government and with the governments of other provinces at a round table discussion at a general conference the kind of proposal that would make a most acceptable crop insurance plan, but this government has refused and there has been no discussion except in this very general way.

The Minister of Agriculture can define it as he likes but the fact remains that the federal government in this plan is accepting only 20 per cent of the responsibility, 20 per cent of the premium responsibility. Eighty per cent of the plan must be borne by the province and/or by the producers within the provinces.

He has said that some provinces wanted provincial administration because provincial administration would be more acceptable. I ask him what are the names of the provinces that have asked him to provide for provincial administration, or have suggested to him that they wanted to administer the act? I would ask him whether the thinks there is one province in Canada which is satisfied with the federal government bearing only 20 per cent of the responsibility as far as premiums are concerned and half of the responsibility as far as administration costs are concerned?

I cannot underline again too strongly the objectionable provision of this legislation which says that those producers who are in a high risk area, if they are to come into this legislation must forgo the benefits of prairie farm assistance. That in itself pledges the death knell of this legislation over very wide areas of western Canada. I see the hon. member for Swift-Current Maple Creek in his seat. I referred earlier to the statement of the Saskatchewan royal commission that in that particular part of Saskatchewan, an area which is in the hon. member's riding—I have many similar areas in my own—in order to qualify for the kind of crop insurance scheme set forth by the royal commission it would require premiums of 16 per cent or more. I suggest that such premiums are absolutely impossible to pay and that in large areas of western Canada this legislation will be of no benefit. It will be of no benefit because it has this impediment in the legislation, namely if a person wishes to insure under this legislation he must forgo the present Prairie Farm Assistance Act. This is not only a method of endeavouring to transfer a substantial responsibility the federal government now accepts back to the provinces, or back to the producers, or both, but it appears to be legislation calculated to undermine the present Prairie Farm Assistance Act. I suggest that rather than undermine the Prairie Farm Assistance Act it is going to demonstrate the Prairie Farm Assistance Act has much wider application in western Canada than has this legislation under discussion.

Mr. Pascoe: Mr. Chairman, a great deal of smoke screen has been thrown up in regard to this resolution, particularly by the hon. member for Assiniboia. I should like to congratulate both the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources on their clear outline of what is involved in this legislation. I consider it is essential that government bills be explained clearly by the ministers concerned, because it appears somehow that the criticisms of government bills apparently get more newspaper and radio coverage than the benefits of those bills.

Mr. Argue: So you are going after the C.B.C., are you?

Mr. Pascoe: No. I should like to take a few moments to outline again the main highlights of the legislation because, as I say, I think it is essential to have the facts before the people most concerned. I should like to take a moment to mention one or two of the main highlights. This is a voluntary crop insurance plan. It will not be forced on the farmers and it will be brought into effect only if each individual province agrees to play its part and is willing to help the farmers to the extent that the federal government is prepared to help them.

The federal government will pay 50 per cent of the administration costs and will also pay 20 per cent of the crop insurance premium. It is hoped to establish the plan on an actuarially sound basis which would set the crop payment loss at 60 per cent of the long term yield of a particular area. The federal government will also lend the provincial government concerned 75 per cent of any indemnity above $200,000.

The Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources referred several times to the report of the Saskatchewan royal commission on agriculture and rural life and the hon. member for Assiniboia has also referred to parts of that report. I had considerable to do with the report. I was on the secretarial staff, travelled all over the province with the commission, and should like to refer to two or three highlights to emphasize what the farmers themselves think of crop insurance.

Mr. Argue: They never saw this bill.

Mr. Pascoe: I should like to deal first with public opinion and that is the part I was mostly concerned with at the public meetings.

Crop Insurance

I refer to the condensed report of the royal commission, page 2, where I find the following:

> Although a succession of high yields had temporarily lessened the urgency of crop insurance . . . a substantial proportion of communities and organizations drew attention to the limitations of P.F.A.A. and to the need for crop insurance.

I was at these meetings when this matter was brought up and it was discussed very fully. The report goes on to say that P.F.A.A. was considered to be inadequate. I also paid a good deal of attention to this point which is dealt with in these words:

> There was also a general feeling that, although farmers should pay their own way to the maximum degree possible, some government subsidy would be required.

That was discussed many times. The farmers were not asking for a straight handout. They wanted to try to stand on their own feet as best they could but they knew they could not handle the whole crop insurance plan themselves. I submit that the bill before us fits in with their ideas of what the federal government should do. On page 3 the summary of the report goes on to say about P.F.A.A., to which the hon. member for Assiniboia referred a great deal:

> The act was also intended to provide a vehicle for distributing relief payments to farmers on the basis of need.

The farmers wanted to get away from the suggestion of relief. They wanted to have a system whereby they would pay part of the cost themselves and expect payments when they had crop losses. On page 14 the summary of the report goes on to say:

> Potential liabilities in crop insurance, even in a test program—

They refer to starting a test program.

> —are beyond the fiscal capacity of a single agricultural province. Federal participation is therefore essential.

I submit that federal participation is shown in this legislation.

Mr. Benidickson: In a small fraction.

Mr. Pascoe: On page 20 of the report it is recommended that the participation of provincial governments in crop insurance include assuming regional administrative costs. Here the federal government is assuming half of the administrative costs. If I may refer again to P.F.A.A. and draw the attention of the hon. member for Assiniboia to it, I would point out that it is recommended in the report that areas which qualify for crop insurance be excluded from P.F.A.A. coverage and levies. These points are in the report of the commission and I just wanted to put them on record.

Mr. Argue: Did you read recommendation 40?

Mr. Pascoe: I read the recommendations that apply in this particular case.

Mr. Argue: You omitted the main sentence.

Mr. Pascoe: I was very surprised at the vehemence of the protest against the crop insurance plan by the hon. minister for Assiniboia—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pascoe: The hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. Argue: You are as wrong about that as you have been throughout your speech so far.

Mr. Pascoe: I would have thought that the report of this commission, appointed by a C.C.F. government and reporting to a C.C.F. government, would have received the wholehearted endorsation of the C.C.F. members.

Mr. Argue: It has not been followed. Why don't you read what it says?

Mr. Pascoe: I should like to emphasize that, so far as my own province of Saskatchewan is concerned, the issue is entirely up to the provincial government. It is their decision whether the farmers of Saskatchewan are going to enter into this crop insurance plan, because if the C.C.F. government of Saskatchewan throws up its hands as indicated by the hon. member for Assiniboia there will be no crop insurance plan for Saskatchewan farmers.

We have heard a great deal about escape hatches. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River referred to escape hatches several times tonight. I submit that the hon. member for Assiniboia set up an escape hatch whereby a provincial government that does not want to discharge its duty to the farmers certainly can make its escape.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to participate in the debate for I am no authority on farming or agricultural problems. However, after listening to the inane and perhaps at times insane remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia I felt compelled to get up and make two points clear so that the situation will be clear on the record. The friend of the farmer, there he sits, the hon. member for Assiniboia, the friend of the farmer today and perhaps the friend of labour tomorrow. Who knows?

Mr. Argue: The friend of both today.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Let us put these points on record. He is against crop insurance.

Mr. Argue: Oh, nuts.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): He stood up in the house and spoke against crop insurance. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River gets up on his feet and says that the Liberal party first thought of crop insurance. They had 22 years to put it into effect and they did not do it in that time. It took this government only two years to bring forward a resolution for crop insurance.

Mr. Argue: They have given it to the provinces.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): And there sits the friend of the farmer voting and speaking against crop insurance.

Mr. Argue: This resolution will not bring it into effect.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): There he sits laughing about crop insurance which is important to the farmers of western Canada. Let that be noted on the record. The hon. member for Assiniboia also says that it is his opinion that if and when this legislation goes through none of the western provinces will accept it. Put that on the record because I feel compelled to say that if and when the legislation goes through I am sure in my own mind that at least one, if not more, of the provinces of western Canada will take advantage of this forward step by the federal government to help the farmers not only of western Canada but throughout the whole country.

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask the hon. member who has just resumed his seat whether he makes that assertion after having read the report of the Manitoba crop insurance commission, admittedly made to the previous government? But does he believe that the new government would run contrary in its decisions to a recommendation that this would not be desirable for one provincial legislature?

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to answer that question. We now have in Manitoba a forward looking government, a government that is vitally interested in the interests and problems of the farmers. If crop insurance is introduced by this government and it is going to help the farmers, they will go along with it. They will do anything to help the farmers in Manitoba.

Mr. Benidickson: The hon. member is assured that Mr. Roblin will support this legislation. Is that so?

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I cannot speak for Mr. Roblin but I like to answer these questions. I can only say that the farmers in the province of Manitoba are the first consideration of the Manitoba government, because they are citizens of the province of Manitoba, and they will receive their equal due along with every other citizen in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. Racine: The minister has told us that he had some discussion with the provinces about this matter. If so, I should like to know what was the attitude of the province of Quebec.

Mr. Harkness: All I can say about that question and similar questions that have been asked is that the discussions that have been held for many years past between the Minister of Agriculture and the provincial ministers of agriculture have always been on a confidential basis and I am not at liberty to say, and certainly would not think of saying, what each individual minister at that conference said in connection with this or any other matter.

Mr. Benidickson: Prior to the carrying of the resolution may I say this. I indicated that there was high feeling about the inadequacies, as mentioned in his speech, that were likely to be found in the bill. Would the minister give us an undertaking that a period of a week or ten days would go by from the time of first reading and presentation of this bill, and would he really say to this house something that he was not prepared to add to the comments he made in 1957 and 1958, about real agreement on the part of the provinces with respect to the proposition that was the basis for the bill?

Mr. Harkness: The hon. member knows that I can give no assurance of that kind. As a matter of fact he is talking about ten days which I presume would be ten sitting days. We are hoping that the session will be over or practically over by that time.

An hon. Member: What a hope.

Mr. Argue: Would the minister say whether he is prepared after second reading to recommend that the bill be sent to the standing committee on agriculture?

Mr. Harkness: As I think I indicated in answer to a question along that line some time ago, this is a matter which has not been decided and I am in no position to make any commitment with regard to it.

Mr. Argue: On that point which we have been pressing for some time. The minister says he is not prepared to say now whether such action can be taken. That answer suggests to me that the minister still has the matter under advisement. I would hope that he would discuss this matter with the Prime Minister and that a question so important as crop insurance would be placed before the standing committee on agriculture. If this legislation does not go before that committee, then I think there will be even stronger criticism heard outside of this house than any of the criticism that has been heard here today.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Harkness thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-66, to provide for contributions and loans to the provinces in respect of crop insurance.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

AGRICULTURE

REPEAL OF CANADIAN FARM LOAN ACT—PROVISION OF LONG TERM MORTGAGE CREDIT TO FARMERS

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the establishment of a system of long term mortgage credit to farmers, to incorporate therein the provisions of the Canadian Farm Loan Act, to add thereto a new type of supervised farm mortgage credit and to repeal the said Canadian Farm Loan Act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. McCleave in the chair.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, from the point of view of the long term welfare of agriculture I believe this is one of the most important bills which has been considered by the Canadian parliament. The importance of credit used by farmers as a supplement to their own capital has increased almost continuously during the last 50 years.

The increased mechanization of agriculture and improved technology is tending continually to enlarge the size of farm operations and the capitalization per worker in the farming industry. In fact, the increase in capital used in agriculture and the productivity resulting from this use has been very substantial in the post-war period. This tendency toward increasing capital requirements, both for fixed capital in lands and buildings and for livestock and equipment, necessarily enlarges the role of credit, not only for the operation of the economic farm unit as such but for the transfer of the economic unit from owner to owner, or from generation to generation.

In 1958 the Canadian farmer had about $11 billion invested in land, buildings, livestock and equipment. About 60 per cent of this investment was in land and buildings. In 1921 close to 80 per cent of the investment was in land and buildings and in 1941 it was a little over 70 per cent. In other words, the investment in equipment and livestock has been constantly increasing. The investment in land and buildings as a result has been constantly decreasing, although the actual amount, of course, has been increasing.

In addition, the average farm size in Canada, based on occupied farm land, has increased from 198 acres in 1921 to 304 acres in 1956. In the case of the prairie region the increase has been from 344 acres in 1921 to 546 acres in 1956. This change in composition as well as addition to the total investment has meant that a young farmer to get started today, not only has to consider ways and means of obtaining capital for lands and buildings but usually has to have chattels valued at only slightly less on the average than the capital to be invested in the land if he is to farm efficiently. In addition considerable experience in farming as well as the use of the many advisory services available are almost a must in the average situation if the farmer is to keep up with new production and marketing techniques.

During the past few years, in addition to the findings of several royal commissions, both provincial and federal, the government has received many representations regarding extensions and additions to the government's participation in the farm credit field. There have been many statements to the effect that the existing provisions for farm credit, private and public, federal and provincial, do not fully meet the changing needs of Canadian agriculture. Suggestions have been made that the total amount of governmental credit might usefully be enlarged, that existing loan limits should be extended, that farmers wishing to undertake larger and more economic operations should be given special assistance, that many non-veteran farmers—particularly young farmers—could benefit from the type of supervision and guidance available under the Veterans Land Act, that additional government incentives be provided to increase the supply of private capital, and that other changes be introduced into the present federal government system of farm credit.

With the passing of farm credit acts in a number of the provinces recently, most provinces now have some form of legislation to make credit available to farmers. At the last session of parliament an amendment to the Canadian Farm Loan Act was introduced which had the effect of increasing the amount available to the Canadian farm loan board for making loans from $80 million to $120 million.

Mr. Benidickson: There were no changes in the terms to the borrowers, of course.

Mr. Harkness: Yes. Oh, I understand what you mean. As you are aware, loans made by the Canadian farm loan board in the last fiscal year amount to close to $30 million compared to less than $10 million in all except one year before 1956. At the last session certain acts relating to cash advances and financing farm-stored grain were also introduced to aid the farmers' financial position.

Following a review of the over-all farm credit situation during the past several months the government has authorized the following developments in the federal farm credit system.

1. The introduction of amendments to the Veterans Land Act which extends the lending authority of the director with respect to veterans established under that act.

2. The introduction of amendments to the Farm Improvement Loans Act which provides for increasing the maximum guaranteed farm improvement loans.

3. The introduction of a new farm credit act for which the resolution is now before you. As stated in the resolution, the proposed farm credit act provides for the establishment of a system of long term mortgage credit to Canadian farmers. It also provides for the establishment of a farm credit corporation with an advisory committee, the majority of such committee to be composed of farmers or representatives of farm organizations.

The proposed act authorizes the corporation to make loans on two basic types of long term mortgage. One type is for loans to farmers on a basis similar to that now being granted under the Canadian Farm Loan Act, except that there are extensions and additions to the lending authority granted to the corporation as well as making the farm credit corporation the successor to the Canadian farm loan board. Among these additions and extensions are included the raising of the maximum loan from $15,000 to $20,000, and the increase in the amount of loan authorized from 65 to 75 per cent of the appraised value of the farm lands and buildings.

The second type of farm mortgage credit makes provision for loans to farmers upon the security of farm lands, buildings, livestock and equipment provided the borrower is between the ages of 21 and 45, has at least five years' experience in farming, and the farming enterprise to be established with the aid of the loan is an economic farm unit. It also provides that supervision will be a requirement when the amount of such loans is above 65 per cent of the appraised value of lands and buildings. Supervision will be available to the applicant for a loan who submits an acceptable plan of operation for his farm. This plan will in effect become part of the agreement between the corporation and the owner and can be modified by mutual consent or abandoned when the loan is reduced to the agreed level.

The total amount of loan which may be made as a supervised loan to farmers between the ages of 21 and 45 may be as much as $27,500, or 75 per cent of the appraised value of lands and chattels on the security of which the loan is made, whichever is the lesser. Farmers operating under this part of the act will not be eligible to receive a farm improvement loan under the Farm Improvement Loans Act except when the principal amount of the supervised loan has been reduced to less than 65 per cent of the value of the farm lands on which the loan is secured or $20,000, whichever is the lesser. The act also authorizes the corporation to provide supervision for any loans which may be made, regardless of the amount of security, if the borrower so desires.

The proposed bill also makes provision for the transfer of present capital and operations of the Canadian farm loan board to the farm credit corporation and for the increase of the maximum limit of moneys that can be borrowed from the Minister of Finance for use in lending operations from $120 million to $200 million. Another extension proposed is the inclusion of a provision for the corporation to determine the method of repayment. This will allow the use of crop share repayment when applicable. The definition of "farmer" has been widened to include cooperative farm associations and family farming corporations. It also provides that where a person has two or more major occupations, one of which is farming, the corporation may determine which of these operations is his principal occupation for the purposes of this act.

You will note also that the proposed bill provides, as in the case of the Canadian Farm Loan Act, that there will be no subsidization of interest rates and that the corporation will be run on a self-sustaining business basis so that provincial and private schemes will still have their place, thus allowing farmers their choice of agency. I can assure you that it will be the intention of the government to keep the cost to a minimum so that the cost to the farmer for borrowed money may be as low as possible.

A survey by the director of the Veterans Land Act of potential earnings on a sample of farms based on average efficiency at the present time indicates that the provision of capital to enlarge and establish an economic farm unit is of major importance. If economic farm units such as this are established they can pay reasonable costs for money borrowed and leave the individual with an improved position in so far as his basis of net returns is concerned. It is hoped that no individual capable of operating a farm business on an economic basis may be denied an opportunity through lack of capital to develop such business to a stage which will provide a reasonable economic return. Such supervisory assistance as necessary will be provided on a cost basis for persons who indicate, through their own experience, initiative and planning that additional capital will make their future operation an economically sound farm business.

Before agriculture became so largely commercial the rural prejudice against debt was to a great extent justified. Now credit has become one of the most important elements in the management of the farm business. Its use increases very much the scale of operations and investment open to the family with ability and some assets. Within the rather restricted size of the economic farm unit for most types of farming, the keener ability and the greater the assets of the family the larger are the benefits they may derive from the use of credit. Like the physical equipment which the farmer uses, credit requires the exercise of much judgment in determining whether or not to use it, in selecting the source from which to obtain it and in manipulating it to secure the greatest returns.

With reference to the discussions in this house at the time of second reading of the amendments to the Veterans Land Act, I would indicate that provision is made for the use of the staff of the director of the Veterans Land Act to the greatest extent possible by the new corporation. It is also provided that the present staff of the Canadian Farm Loan Board will be transferred to the new corporation. In general, it is expected there will be the greatest co-ordination possible between the various federal, provincial and private agencies in the farm credit field on behalf of Canadian agriculture.

In conclusion I would say that at this stage it is felt that the proposed farm credit act, along with the other federal acts mentioned above, will provide the necessary federal participation in the farm credit field. If experience shows that more is necessary for the improvement of farm family living, farm operating and farm purchase, this government will be prepared to give further consideration and introduce further legislation as may be deemed advisable.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that in a general way the house and the country will welcome the statement which has been made by the Minister of Agriculture.

[Mr. Harkness.]

I think there is no question in anybody's mind but that agriculture is an industry which returns to those engaged in it a lesser percentage than perhaps any other industry. We also recognize that it is a basic industry and must remain in a country if that country is to prosper as we all hope Canada will continue to prosper.

I remember having made statements on several occasions in the last ten years with respect to amendments to the farm loan act. In order to show that some progress was made even at that time, and not only now, I recall that in 1952 the maximum loan permitted under the act was $5,000; when the present government took office in 1957 it was $15,000. The minister indicates that in certain categories the increase will be to $20,000 which will be parallel to a recent increase that we had under the Veterans Land Act. I think the minister indicated that in the second category of his new corporation proposal the young farmer of between 21 and 45 would have the possibility of a maximum loan of $27,500. I commend the minister for this because I think that in the light of the obligations incurred by the young farmer, even when he takes over from a relative, and certainly when one pays regard to the capitalization of agriculture at the present time, these are more realistic figures, but there are one or two factors which I will critize, as the minister would expect.

First of all, I want to say that this debate—probably to the great advantage of most hon. members sitting here in this extreme heat—will be reduced because so little information was given in the resolution itself. I compared it with the resolution of February 8, 1956 when other extensive changes were made in farm credit legislation. I draw that to the minister's attention not in a nasty way but just for his future guidance. This resolution, in contrast to what he has announced to this house, shows, I am not going to say contempt for parliament, but a disregard of the parliamentary obligation for debate. Great detail was given in 1956 when major changes were being made with respect to government agricultural mortgage possibilities, but it would hardly be possible to find a resolution which contains less detail in it than the resolution which is now before us. I say that that is not fair to parliament, and it is particularly offensive, as the minister himself would have been the first to say when he sat on this side of the house, when we read in the Ottawa Journal of June 16, after he had introduced this innocuous resolution, a disclosure by somebody in that vast empire over which he presides giving details about this bill, details which can be given to newspapers but not to parliament on a resolution stage, as was done, however, in 1956 when full information was given as to the percentage of increase on appraisement, as to the increase in the maximum amount of the loan and other factors, all of which enabled members of parliament to speak at this stage of the debate. I must say that this is a wrong tendency and it is one to which I object to on the farm loan bill. The minister is not taking this too seriously. I think that the precedent was very clear and I hope that in future in presenting legislation to this house the hon. gentleman will endeavour to give as many particulars as possible at the resolution stage, and not to allow his staff to give this information to the newspapers as was done.

Mr. Harkness: I wonder if I might ask the hon. member what he means by "given to the newspapers"? There was no information given to the newspapers as far as I know, and I think no information appeared in the newspapers except a guess following the introduction of the amendment to the Veterans Land Act that the maximum loan would be around $20,000 which, as it happens, is incorrect.

Mr. Benidickson: No, I have here a copy of the Ottawa Journal of June 16 following the introduction of this resolution in the House of Commons and we find that much of the detail given there is accurate; much more information is given in that newspaper report than was given to the hon. gentleman's colleagues in this House of Commons and that, I think, is a bad feature.

Mr. Harkness: Nothing was given to the newspapers as far as I am aware. It was a guess.

Mr. Benidickson: I admit the minister has introduced one new novel feature, the possibility of a maximum of $27,500 for the farmer between 21 and 45.

Both political parties when they appeared before the people in 1958 agreed that certain amendments should take place in this field. I have indicated that there had already been a great improvement in a relatively short period of time when the maximum permitted loan rose from $5,000 to $15,000 and the appraisal percentage went up from 50 per cent to 65 per cent. But I think we have all been impressed by the fact that the financial requirements of agriculture have increased in accord with requirements for credit in all lines of life.

It has also become a fact that when we have legislation authorizing government lending to a special class other people depart from that lending field. This process has been very evident in Canada in recent years and I think the minister would agree with me that this legislation is necessary partly because institutional lending to farmers has been diminishing as the opportunity to borrow from the government has increased. The minister indicated that he did not distinguish between the corporation class 1 loan and the corporation class 2 loan, but as I recall it he did make an emphatic statement that he felt that henceforth there would be every opportunity for private or non-governmental lending. I am not particularly concerned about that point, but the minister intimated that he proposed to offer for the first time supervised lending to a certain class of people on demand.

Perhaps we shall find in the bill details as to the extra expense to the borrower of this type of supervised borrowing to those who ask for it. I take it the minister meant that the borrower was a volunteer in this respect, and that this would not be something imposed upon him. And the minister also told us that he expected the total result of lending and borrowing under this new supervision would be, as in the past, a balance sheet showing neither a loss nor a substantial profit. I hope that when we get the details of the bill we will see more about this.

I heard nothing from the minister with respect to any lengthening of the possible term of the loan. Perhaps there is something in the bill about that. The minister will recall that two prominent farm organizations, the interprovincial farm union and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, both felt that this was a desirable change in the existing law. No reference was made to this by the minister.

I think all of us will be interested to know who will control the interest rate. Will it be the corporation based upon the cost of government money which it has to pay as a result of government borrowing in the usual course of events plus, perhaps, a service fee, or will this rate be set by order in council? That was not mentioned by the minister in his remarks this evening.

Because of the dark cloud surrounding the resolution as a result of information lacking in the resolution as presented to us—although I suggest this information was given to outside sources—we cannot properly debate the details of this legislation until we see the bill.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman I wish to make a few remarks with respect to this resolution which is barren as far as the contents of the bill are concerned. This group considers it a justifiable criticism to say that the government should have brought in this legislation much earlier in the session. This is important legislation which has been waited for by many farmers all across Canada and mention of which was contained in the speech from the throne but it is not until June 29 that we have the resolution before us and a glimpse at some of the contents of the forthcoming bill as a result of the statement made by the minister a few moments ago.

We all agree that the development of the machine age has caused an increasing necessity for more capital in the development of land, the acquisition of chattels, stock and equipment, and the erection of modern buildings. That is recognized from all quarters including farmers organizations and members in all parties in this chamber. We wish this legislation had been brought before the committee sooner so there would have been more opportunity to discuss the matter with various organizations, our constituents and other persons.

We were pleased to hear mention in the minister's statement of the fact that the present farm loan board will be replaced by the farm credit corporation. If I heard the minister correctly the board will be composed largely of farmers or their representatives, is that correct?

Mr. Harkness: The advisory committee.

Mr. Herridge: We are glad to hear that the advisory committee is to be composed of farmers or representatives of farm organizations. If the government listens to a committee of that sort it will get much sound advice in the administration of this legislation because it will be in closer touch with farmers and in touch with changing conditions than will be the government itself.

I cannot resist saying this to the chairman. I want to congratulate you upon occupying the chair so well during the day. I am sure you will not allow anyone to use such unparliamentary language as to refer to this group as dedicated dough heads. I am sure you will stop accusations of that kind immediately.

We were pleased to see that the total loan is to be increased from $15,000 to $20,000 in the first instance. We all expected that because, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River said, we read it in the newspapers some time ago. This increase corresponds with the increase in the loans under the Veterans Land Act amendments which we recently passed. Another advance is the increase from 65 per cent of the value of the property to 75 per cent as the basis on which a loan can be given. It is remarkable how that percentage has increased in recent years and it has increased because the farm organizations made representations to the former government and to this government as to the necessity for this increase. We are pleased to see that this government has responded in this respect as did its predecessor.

Mr. Benidickson: The previous government's increase was bigger than this one.

Mr. Harkness: It took the former government much longer to put it in effect, though.

Mr. Herridge: I will not enter that argument because there are arguments on both sides. We are interested in knowing that there will be supervision when the loan is about 65 per cent of the value of the farm and we think this is a step in the right direction. No doubt this was included on the basis of the successful experience of the Veterans Land Act administration. If the new farm credit organization is as successful in the administration of land as the administration of the Veterans Land Act has been there will be many thousands of young Canadian non-veteran farmers who will benefit from this legislation.

We were pleased to note that the total value will be increased to $27,500 including land, chattels, livestock and, I presume, buildings.

Mr. Harkness: That is right. It is a package deal.

Mr. Herridge: It is a very acceptable proposal in this legislation. I understood the minister to say that the bill will provide for an increase in the capital of the corporation from $120 million to $200 million. I think that is a wise provision because I expect in the near future there will be considerable advantage taken of this legislation.

My colleagues are inclined to mutter when speeches are being made. They forget that I am an old man who is deaf in his left ear. Some mention was made of repayment of loans on a crop-sharing basis and no doubt we will be hearing more about that later.

The minister made some reference to the farmer with two or more occupations and said that the board would decide the major occupation the farmer would be considered to have, if I heard him correctly.

Reference was made to the co-ordination of all agencies, the farm credit corporation and the supervision of the Veterans Land Act administration and co-ordination with provincial credit agencies and, I suppose, to some extent with private credit agencies to get a sort of total application of the credit principle to the needs of Canadian farmers.

Mention was made by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River of the fact that the interest rate was not mentioned—

Mr. Benidickson: I asked the minister to tell us who would control the rate.

Mr. Herridge: Yes, and what the rate will be in actual fact. I understand that the Canadian Federation of Agriculture has suggested 3½ per cent. Anyone who has read the history of agricultural credit in Europe, Great Britain and other countries will realize it has been proven from experience that agriculture cannot sensibly pay a rate throughout the years of more than 3½ per cent net for loans under these circumstances.

We hope that when the bill comes before us the wishes of the federation of agriculture, the interprovincial farm union council and other agricultural groups will be considered in that respect.

Our major criticisms are: first, that this legislation should have been brought before the house this session much sooner than it has; second, we believe that the bill should be sent to the banking and commerce committee so that the various agricultural groups, organizations and representatives could express their views on the legislation and their criticisms to the committee and make their suggestions. I think that is very essential indeed, and this is one of the reasons we would have liked to see this legislation introduced much sooner in the session. We also want to hear their views on the interest rate and as to what amount they think agriculture could stand on a sound basis so far as interest is concerned.

If I remember correctly, I did not hear any reference on the minister's part to the length of the term of the loan, which is a very important matter when it comes to agricultural credit, and particularly in certain circumstances where you are developing a certain type of farm and a certain type of agriculture. That is a matter which should receive the attention of the committee. First, there is the interest rate and, second, the length of the term of the loan and any other surrounding factors that the persons representing farmers can bring to the attention of a committee of the House of Commons in consideration and study of this legislation.

We think this is a step in the right direction. There are many things in this legislation we approve of. We are concerned mainly with the interest rate and the length of the term of the loan that is proposed in the legislation.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, the government cannot be too highly commended for improving this legislation with regard to our farmers.

To my mind, the bill would be of great service to the farmers, as farm loans will now be more readily available to eastern farmers. In the province of Quebec, for instance, the Canadian Farm Loan Board had the reputation of never lending anything. As a matter of fact, the number of loans granted in Quebec since the creation of the board has been very small compared to those awarded by the Quebec provincial farm loan authority.

The creation of an advisory committee composed of Canada's leading agriculturalists has also been a wise move on the part of the government. I urge the administration, as well as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), to appoint to this advisory committee, with regard to the province of Quebec, a representative of the U.C.C. and a representative of the federated co-operatives.

From now on, the Canadian government will lend up to 75 per cent of the estimated value of the farm, instead of 65 per cent as in the past. Moreover, the amount of credit available to farmers will be raised. Eastern farmers will be able to meet competition by offering better quality products which will sell easily on our markets. Farmers continually have to acquire better machinery in order to keep pace with labour problems. I believe that this legislation will be of great benefit to them.

Henceforth, farmers in the eastern provinces will benefit from a form of credit which, I think, was not available to them in the province of Quebec or in Ontario.

I, for my part, commend the government for taking this action. I consider this from the farmer's point of view the best piece of legislation introduced in the last 20 years.

(Text):

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, there is just one brief observation I should like to make on this resolution. This resolution proposes to abolish the old Canadian Farm Loan Act and to replace it with a better system of long term mortgage credit to farmers. It proposes also to extend to those farmers the benefit of supervised mortgage credit which has proved so successful in connection with the Veterans Land Act.

Mr. Benidickson: The borrowers are going to pay for it.

Mr. Carter: This is a move in the right direction and I think one to be commended. The real reason I asked for the floor, Mr. Chairman, is to point out to the government that there is no comparable legislation of this kind extending benefits of this kind to fishermen whose problems and needs are very similar to those of farmers, and to direct the attention of the government to that deficiency. I express the hope that it will be remedied before too long.

Mortgage Credit to Farmers

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I should like to support the remarks of the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo, seeing that I too feel that this act should be extended to include fishermen. I am very pleased at any time to see improvements in legislation affecting farmers and I would like that legislation to apply to fishermen. When I see fishermen getting the benefits of the Unemployment Insurance Act then, of course, I would like those benefits extended also to farmers; but I think fishermen are in the position where they require long term loans at reasonable rates of interest just as do the farmers in this country.

I do not think the minister has yet said whether it is his intention to refer this legislation to the banking and commerce committee, which has been the general practice in the past with similar legislation.

Mr. Benidickson: No, agriculture.

Mr. Argue: No; this legislation in the past has been referred to the banking and commerce committee or to the committee on agriculture. A reference to that committee will be quite satisfactory.

In 1956, when the legislation referred to by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River had received second reading in this house it was referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce. I can remember so well that the beginning of those meetings of the banking and commerce committee dealing with amendments to the Canadian Farm Loan Act was held before Easter, the initial meetings, which is a good deal earlier than the discussion of this legislation which is taking place toward the end of the session. When we asked for a full discussion of that matter in the banking and commerce committee, at that time it was said by government spokesmen that the benefits were so important and the farmers were so greatly in need of them that the members should hurry up and pass the legislation. We found on further inquiry that the date of the coming into effect of the benefits would not be affected by our passing the measure in one session or a number of sittings. The result was that the banking and commerce committee dealt with farm loan legislation following that Easter recess in a rather comprehensive manner. We had placed before the committee at that time rather exhaustive studies that had been made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. I want to acknowledge and to compliment the minister on having included in the legislation today a number of the recommendations that were placed before the committee at that time. There were recommendations that the maximum amount of first mortgages should be increased to $20,000. The committee was asked to give consideration to the provision of credit that would be supervised for the benefit of the farmers. There were a great many other recommendations.

Mr. Benidickson: The committee did not recommend that that should be at the borrower's cost.

Mr. Argue: Oh, no. There were a number of recommendations that have not been fulfilled by this legislation today. I have not heard the minister say anything about the length of the period or the maximum loan under this legislation. The recommendation was that the maximum loan period should be increased to 40 years. There was a further recommendation that the interest rate should be reduced. It was stated in the presentation by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture that the rate should be reduced to 4½ per cent, that the federal government—I think this is the answer to the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River—should assume the administrative and certain other costs as detailed in the submission, and it was the opinion of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture that if this were done we would have an interest rate of 3½ per cent.

But I am going to make the suggestion to the minister that in the legislation to be introduced there should be a maximum ceiling on the rate of interest that can be charged. The provision in the present Canadian Farm Loan Board legislation is that the rate of interest shall be at such a level as is necessary to cover the cost of borrowing plus the cost of administration.

Mr. Benidickson: Not quite—as the board decides.

Mr. Argue: The Canadian Farm Loan Board has been lending money at a rate of 5 per cent. Unless there is a substantial change in the interest rates prevailing in the country today I do not think the time will be long coming when there will be an increase from the current interest rate of 5 per cent charged to farmers. I tell the minister that no matter what other advantages are being built into this legislation, and there are advantages, they will be largely annulled if the rate of interest that producers have to pay goes much above 5 per cent. I see that the hon. member for Rosthern is agreeing with me by displaying a wide smile of affirmation. I take it that it is because he knows as well as I do that if the farmer has to pay an interest rate of 6, 6½ or 7 per cent the result will be, in the light of that situation and the other policy of the Minister of Agriculture of pulling the rug out from under the price support legislation, that the Canadian farm loan corporation to be set up under the bill—

Mr. Benidickson: And no deficiency payments.

Mr. Argue: —may own more than mortgages if that situation comes about. I say to the Minister of Agriculture that the farmers cannot afford to pay an interest rate in excess of 5 per cent. I ask him to give serious consideration to placing such a limit in the legislation when it is brought before parliament. Indeed, farm organizations have pointed out in the past that if one allows the farmer a reasonable return for his labour the farmers' investment in his agricultural plant over the years has paid a return of just better than 2 per cent. In the submissions presented by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in 1956 they calculated that an acceptable interest rate would be 3½ per cent.

I would ask the Minister of Agriculture, as an influential member of the government and as a member from western Canada who, I would hope, has the ear of the Prime Minister, to make very strong representations to his colleagues in the cabinet to reverse the high interest policy that is now being followed and to stop increases in interest rates one after the other so that the beneficial effects that can flow from this legislation will not be taken away. I see that the hon. member for Greenwood is in his seat. I always like to listen to him when he makes a statement in the house. He will agree with me, I am sure, that the farmers are not in the position of the great corporations in this country who can say that their interest charges on their indebtedness have increased from 5 to 6 per cent and that there has been an increase in the cost of doing business this year of another $500,000 and therefore they will increase the price of their product and recover the increase in interest charges.

The farmer can pay increased interest charges only from one source, only from money that he would otherwise use for living expenses. He can pay a higher interest charge only by tightening his belt. I say to the Minister of Agriculture that the farmers of this country cannot afford to pay an interest rate of more than 5 per cent and I ask for immediate action on his part to place a ceiling of 5 per cent in the legislation in order to make certain that the high interest policy of the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Harkness: There is no high interest policy.

Mr. Argue: Oh, no? The rates just go through the ceiling. On one-year bonds we are paying the highest rate in Canadian history.

Mr. Benidickson: The highest ever.

Mr. Argue: But when the former administration was paying lower interest rates what strong statements were made by the Conservative party. How the government of the day was condemned and damned for high interest rates, for tight money. But today we have a government paying the highest interest rates in the history of this country. I ask the Minister of Agriculture to suggest to his colleagues that there should be a 5 per cent ceiling, which is a high interest rate, on the interest that can be charged under this legislation in order to protect the legislation from the wrong and misguided policy now being followed by the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance, if he is allowed to run wild with these high interest rates, can ruin—

Mr. Benidickson: He just sits. He does not run.

Mr. Argue: —much of the benefit that can come from this legislation. As I said earlier, if one examines the submissions of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture in 1956 to the standing committee on banking and commerce he will find that many of its recommendations are being fulfilled in this legislation. I ask the minister to consider the other recommendations set forth at that time, particularly the request that the maximum period for repayment of a loan be made 40 years and also the request that the interest rate be lowered. Finally, I ask the minister to consider immediate action to place a ceiling of 5 per cent on the interest rates that can be charged by this corporation, and if the policy of the federal government results in higher interest rates generally and therefore a loss on the part of the corporation, then let that loss be paid from the treasury.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, after speaking on the introduction of a resolution of this kind one always recalls one or two things that are overlooked. I think all members will be sympathetic in that respect although they will not want me to delay the progress of the committee unduly. But the minister did refer, without naming anybody, to the possibility of co-ordinating efforts of the V.L.A. administration and the new corporation in order to save expense. I think it was I who made this particular reference in the debate on second reading of the Veterans Land Act amendments.

It just happens that since that time I have heard indirectly that I could not have been serious in the remarks I made. I want to assure the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Veterans Affairs that I never was more serious. I was a member of the veterans affairs committee. I looked at the figures submitted and listened to the evidence very carefully. I am convinced that under the V.L.A administration we have a very fine appraising staff and a farm loan advisory staff that is underemployed. I was very glad to hear from the minister that he would use this staff to the greatest extent possible.

However, I want to tell him that I am going to watch this situation very carefully. I was not satisfied at simply hearing through another minister that he would do it to the greatest extent possible. I want to say that I have no doubt that he has read, as have I—and I read it actually after my remarks in the house last week—the submission of the interprovincial farm union council with respect to farm credit in Canada. I know the minister has also read it. In the 22 pages he will find that there is a recurrent emphasis upon co-ordination and centralization of farm credit policy in Canada.

I want to say to the minister that I have not the skill that one has after spending some time on treasury board. I sometimes attended treasury board as an observer or as an invitee. However, I want to say that as a member of parliament like himself I was completely convinced that we probably would in the near future lose this appraising and agricultural and guidance staff under the Veterans Land Act unless there was co-ordination of all departments of farm lending in government. I was never more serious, although I have been accused in the past of being very light in my comment that $5 million might have been saved.

May I say that $5 million is $50 million in ten years. The figure I gave last week was that perhaps the Canadian Farm Loan Board this year would lend about $90 million which was almost the figure on the books of the V.L.A. administration. I have been critical of the minister in some respects tonight but I want to say that I am highly pleased that he saw fit, before the introduction of this legislation, to make available to all of us—I think in some haste because the report is dated March 31, 1959—the last report of the Canadian Farm Loan Board.

Mr. Michaud: I should like to say only a word or two at this time. First of all, I want to say that I welcome the measure which is now before the committee. In the second place, I wish to express the hope that the farmers in the maritime provinces will make wider use of this measure than they have made in the past of the facilities of the Canadian Farm Loan Act. In the province of Prince Edward Island I would say satisactory use was made of the Canadian Farm Loan Act but I think it must be said that in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia the use made of the farm loan board was only fractional as compared with the overall picture in the rest of the country.

I hope that the farmers in these provinces will, as I have said, make wider use of this new measure and that they will also use it particularly to enlarge their acreage. Therein, I think, lies the main problem in our maritime agriculture, namely that operations are too small. Under this legislation it might be possible for farmers to increase their acreage and thereby make their operations more profitable.

Mr. Harkness: I have just about three short remarks to make. It is intended to make full use of the Veterans Land Act supervisory staff. As far as the administration of this act is concerned I should like to assure the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River that the length of term of the loan that is proposed will be thirty years. The maximum age for so-called young farmer loans is 45 years. That would mean that by the time the term was up the age would be 75 years and it is considered that is long enough. If the term were 40 years, it would make him 85 years of age and I think most people would consider that is too advanced an age to lay down in a mortgage contract on a package deal of this kind or of the kind that is proposed.

There is just one other point. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River made the statement that he had understood me to say that supervision will be provided only if it is asked for. That is not the case. As far as the package deal is concerned, for which the maximum loan on land and chattels is $27,500, supervision must be accepted in order for a young farmer, so-called, to get the loan. Once he has reduced his indebtedness until he owes just 65 per cent of the value of the land or $20,000, whichever is the lesser, then he can withdraw from supervision if he wishes to do so.

Mr. Benidickson: I take it that he applies for a supervised loan or knows that a supervised loan is going to be involved in the type of application that is made?

Mr. Harkness: Yes. As far as any farmers are concerned, whether they are under the ordinary provisions or under the supervised credit provisions, they can secure supervised credit if they wish to do so.

Mr. Benidickson: May I just ask this question. The minister made the broad statement, as I recall it, that there would be no change in objective, that the interest on borrowings under the new corporation, would be for expenses. Does that include these supervised loans?

Mr. Harkness: The supervisory work will be carried on by the Veterans Land Act administration and they propose to charge the farm credit corporation a small fee for this supervisory service, and that small fee will be charged to the farmer.

Mr. Benidickson: There will be a differentiation in interest rate between part I and part II borrowers?

Mr. Harkness: No. There will be no differentiation in interest rates. However, as I say, if supervision is provided there will be for that supervision a small fee which will be charged by the Veterans Land Act administration.

Mr. Argue: In discussing the Canadian Farm Loan Board provisions a year ago the Minister of Finance at that time, if I remember correctly, said that as far as he knew there would be no increase in the interest rate under the legislation. I have asked the minister to consider whether a ceiling of 5 per cent could be placed on the interest rate under the act. He has not commented on that matter. I wish he would do so. I think that an interest rate of over 5 per cent would be a mistake. I think it would place on the agriculture industry a burden that would be difficult to bear. I wonder whether the minister could give the committee this much information. Can the minister say what he expects the starting rate of interest will be for loans by this corporation? The minister must have some idea when the corporation itself will start functioning. He knows the history of borrowings by the Canadian Farm Loan Board and the amount of the interest rate that will be paid on that indebtedness taken over by the board. Can he assure the committee that at least initially the new corporation will begin with interest rates that are not in excess of 5 per cent?

Mr. Harkness: No. It is provided in the act that the interest rate will be the cost of money to the dominion government plus, as the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River stated, a small service charge, which is the normal thing in these loans which are made to a province, a crown corporation or anything else.

Mr. Benidickson: Last year we had evidence that the Minister of Finance had interfered with that procedure. Will there be an opportunity for the Minister of Finance to do that or will the corporation be the sole judge of that matter?

Mr. Argue: I know the minister is well aware of the fact that the current cost of money to the federal government is in excess of 5 per cent. If you take the cost of money to the federal government at this time as in excess of 5 per cent, add to it a small service charge and then to that add the cost of administration of the new corporation so that it does not lose money, you will get a very high rate of interest which, in my submission to the minister, will be impossible for the agriculture industry to bear. I hope that that does not happen, but everyone knows interest rates are going up so rapidly now. When we suggest in this house that a new high interest rate is a matter of urgency we are told, quite properly by Mr. Speaker, that this is something that happens practically every week.

Mr. Benidickson: Because there is no policy.

Mr. Argue: We have had a succession of high interest rates. The government itself pays interest in excess of 5 per cent. Add to that a service fee plus the cost of doing business under this legislation, it is possible—I do not say it will happen because I sincerely hope it will not be allowed to happen—that you would get interest rates of 6 per cent or more and saddle farmers with the heavy loans which they need if they are going to have economical units. What you will do in effect is to destroy much of the value which would otherwise accrue by this kind of legislation. I will be speaking out, as will other hon. members I know in this house, most strongly if in the future interest rates under this legislation at any time should exceed the rate of 5 per cent, which in the words of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture back in 1956 is an excessive rate that agriculture cannot bear.

Mr. Badanai: May I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Chairman, I only wish to say a few words in connection with this resolution.

The minister in his statement indicated that under present conditions any young man who starts out farming requires stock and equipment involving a considerable amount of money. Therefore I am encouraged to believe that it means a liberalization of farm loans. If this means the adoption of a liberalized measure which will enable farmers in need of assistance to obtain loans where under the present farm loan act they were turned down, then I am happy to say that the change is indeed welcome and I congratulate the minister for introducing this new act.

My particular concern about this legislation is the actual availability of provisions to the small farmers of the Thunder bay district. I know the minister would say that there is no discrimination in the matter of approval of loans to any farmer large or small anywhere in Canada. The fact remains, however, that actual experience has shown that the small farmers in my constituency have encountered almost insurmountable difficulties in obtaining consideration for loans. This is not the first time I have had occasion to speak on behalf of the small farmers in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. There are several hundred families living on comparatively small farms, some of which are models of agricultural development; others are in the process of becoming fairly good and prosperous units. There are some, however, which are on the fringe of undeveloped areas and which require assistance; assistance in securing capital to improve their holdings, and loans for the purpose of improving their buildings and the purchase of modern farm equipment.

This bill if it is to perform what it is designed to achieve should be so administered to give consideration to the less prosperous farmers applying for loans. The present farm loan board activities are so restricted that unless an applicant for a loan has collateral assets to the extent that he does not need to borrow he is politely told that his holding does not appear to offer the prospects of being self-liquidating and therefore a loan on this particular property is not warranted.

The farm loan board should also be directed to consider loans to associations of farmers for the purpose of establishing cold storage facilities in addition to the federal grant that the establishment of such cold storage facilities entitle the farmers to, which is now set at not more than $50,000 for any establishment regardless of the total cost of the plant. Another aspect of the benefit which this bill could perform would be direct financial assistance to prospective farmers, people who are ready and willing to settle on the land and make farming their career and life work. This assistance, if extended to bona fide immigrant farmers desirous of acquiring a farm, could mean a new era in the development of our sparsely settled districts of northwestern Ontario. All we would need to bring about a movement toward the land is the active encouragement and assistance of the government which to my mind would rank higher than any other vision that I can think of.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the proposed new farm mortgage credit board should include a member from northwestern Ontario, someone familiar with farming operations in the region.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Harkness thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-67, to provide for the extension of long term mortgage credit to farmers.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the leader of the house would tell us what the business is going to be for the rest of the week?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall commence with item No. 17 on today's order paper, the resolution preceding an amendment to the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act; then take item No. 6, second reading of an act to amend the Length and Mass Units Act. Then we will take item No. 7, second reading of an act to amend the Weights and Measures Act; then item No. 10, second reading of an act to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act. Then we will take item No. 8, second reading of an act to amend the Criminal Code; then item No. 9, second reading of an act to amend the Combines Investigation Act.

The Minister of Justice will be back at 2.30 p.m. and we will try to put his bills on at 2.30. If something is not finished at the time of the adjournment at 1.00 we will try to finish it before we go on to the Department of Justice bills. Therefore this order will probably mean that some of the trade and commerce bills will follow the Department of Justice bills. Probably on Wednesday we will try to complete these items of legislation and then go on to the defence estimates and those of the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is not proposed to take defence estimates until Thursday?

Mr. Green: Probably they would not be taken until Thursday.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister think he has really given us enough on the menu for tomorrow morning?

Mr. Green: If we find that all that business is completed we could include item No. 18, the international wheat agreement and, probably, item No. 12, an act to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act. Also, there are some very small bills which could be taken at any time—item No. 3 and item No. 5—and there is a bill which appears today under first reading of Senate bills concerning the agreement with respect to Indian reservations in Nova Scotia.

At thirteen minutes past ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 30, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

HOURS OF SITTING ON DOMINION DAY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition brought up a question as to the sittings of the house over Dominion day. I suggest, subject to the approval of the house, that instead of proceeding by a formal motion we might agree to sit tomorrow morning in the usual way from eleven o'clock until one o'clock, and then at one o'clock the adjournment could be made until Thursday at 11 a.m.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give unanimous approval to the proposal made by the Prime Minister?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It will be in order, then, and recorded in Hansard, that when the house adjourns tomorrow at one o'clock we rise until 11 a.m. the following day.

HEALTH INSURANCE

NEW BRUNSWICK—ANNOUNCEMENT OF DECISION TO PARTICIPATE

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in his unavoidable absence from the house my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has asked me to make a brief announcement on his behalf. This is a particularly pleasant duty for me, since it involves a matter which will be of great benefit to the people of my home province of New Brunswick.

On Saturday last Mr. Monteith joined with Hon. J. H. McInerney, minister of health and social services for New Brunswick, in signing an agreement under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act. Taking effect on Wednesday, July 1, this agreement will provide comprehensive hospitalization coverage for every resident of New Brunswick. As such I know it will be welcomed by all hon. members as a further important step in bringing this vital health protection to Canadians throughout the country.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): The announcement made by the Minister of Veterans Affairs does not, of course, come as a surprise to members of this house because it appeared in the press yesterday or on Saturday, I forget which. I, at least, heard it over the radio on Saturday, I think it was.

We all welcome this announcement that the province of New Brunswick has decided to enter the hospital insurance scheme. I wonder if the minister could tell us whether or not the agreement provides for the province of New Brunswick taking advantage not only of the offer to extend financial assistance in respect of diagnostic services in hospitals but also for diagnostic services outside? As the minister knows, not all the provinces have agreed to the federal proposal for diagnostic services for outpatients. It would be interesting to know whether or not the province of New Brunswick has gone a step further than the province of Ontario, and accepted both offers from the federal government.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the announcement made by the Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare will meet with the approval of Canadians generally. It means that the majority of the provinces have now provided a progressive hospitalization program in co-operation with the federal government under the national act. This is one instance of federal-provincial co-operation which has brought great benefit in the field of health services to Canadians generally. With this demonstration of the success of the act I hope the government will soon embark on a further extension of this act—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Argue:—to provide additional national health insurance legislation to include the payment of medical services—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Apparently the house considers, as I do, that the hon. member is going beyond the scope of the announcement.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Essex East I might say that in addition to the basic list of services to patients in hospitals required by the federal act, the plan embodies a broad range of outpatient services. These include laboratory procedures as specified by the commission and furnished by the provincial laboratories, services for emergency diagnosis and treatment of injuries resulting from accidents, diagnostic and treatment services required for medical rehabilitation and other diagnostic and treatment services as specified by the commission. I believe that answers the hon. member's question.

COMBINES ACT AMENDMENT—SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT OF CONSIDERATION UNTIL NEXT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. In view of the fact that the bill amending the Combines Investigation Act is bound to have important consequences on the Canadian economy, and that those immediately concerned with this legislation including consumers and producers associations and groups would not have sufficient time before the end of this session to make representations about the bill, will the government postpone its consideration by parliament until the beginning of next session, when it could be referred to a committee as has been suggested by many individuals and groups?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice is away today and I am unable to give a final answer to the question asked by the hon. gentleman. However, I do feel that this legislation, important as it is, having been considered over a number of years, should be proceeded with at this session. As to the general question of its submission to a committee, I notice that the hon. gentleman would ask for that only in the event that the legislation did not proceed at the present session.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No, no. We asked that the other day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I feel that any further elucidation might well await the return of the Minister of Justice.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FOOD FOR PEACE CONFERENCE—MEETING OF CONTINUING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister say whether a meeting of the continuing committee dealing with food for peace which on May 7 the minister announced would likely be convened by the end of June has been called, and if not when such a meeting will take place?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the committee was called together in Washington. The Leader of the Opposition asked this question of me just the other day. I thought I had the reply available to give him this morning, but I do not locate it in my papers. I propose giving a report on that matter; perhaps I might do that tomorrow.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I have located the answer I mentioned just a minute ago. The Leader of the Opposition asked me a question on June 24 with regard to the Washington meeting on the export of surplus farm products. The wheat utilization committee established by the food for peace conference, on which I reported to the house on May 7 last, held its first meeting on June 15-17 in Washington.

Membership of the committee comprises Argentina, Australia, Canada, France and the United States. The FAO is represented in an observer adviser capacity. The representation at this meeting was at the same level as the preministerial meeting of senior officials held last April. The Canadian delegation on this occasion was led by Mr. John H. English, deputy minister of trade and commerce, and included officials from the departments of trade and commerce, agriculture, finance and external affairs and from the Canadian wheat board.

The purpose of this meeting was chiefly organizational. The principal outcome was the establishment of procedures for the operations of the committee, and guide lines concerning concessional sales of wheat to apply in the selection of recipient countries and the determination of minimum commercial quotas.

Possible schemes of market development and the setting up of national food reserves were also discussed. In this connection a working group at the embassy level was appointed to study and report on these two items for consideration at the next meeting of the committee.

The administrative procedures of the committee were left simple and flexible. The office of the administrator of the U.S. foreign agricultural service will serve as a permanent focal point of contact. The committee will normally convene in the spring and fall of each year at a place to be decided by the committee.

It is expected that the next meeting of the committee will be held next fall in Washington.

Mr. Argue: I have a supplementary question. Can the minister say whether at this meeting any consideration was given to the United States disposal policy with regard to feed grains, particularly its policy of disposing of barley for strategic materials bartered under public law 480 and the way in which this policy has interfered with the Canadian market for barley in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Churchill: I think, Mr. Speaker, all subjects relating to the disposal of surplus grain were under consideration at that meeting.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say whether the United States gave a satisfactory reply with respect to the invasion by the United States of Canada's market for barley in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Churchill: I am not certain with regard to that point but the matter will be looked into most thoroughly. The hon. member for Assiniboia sometimes uses some rather astounding adjectives which would cause alarm in people who were inclined to be a little nervous, but I shall examine his statement with some care and let him know what the situation is.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask a supplementary question, and I hope my adjectives will not alarm the minister. At this particular meeting were the increased barter transactions in agricultural products of the United States since last November brought to the attention of the United States delegate to this committee?

Mr. Churchill: Oh, yes, Mr. Speaker. All these matters were under consideration. One of the great values of this wheat utilization committee is that there will be close consultation with regard to all matters dealing with the disposal of surplus food. There will be an avoidance of difficulties among exporting nations when this knowledge is available to them, and available in advance. I think nothing but good is going to come from the meetings of this committee. Heretofore surplus disposal transactions have been carried on and exporting countries have perhaps heard about them after they were completed. Now the hope is, and I believe it will be fulfilled, that proposed surplus disposal projects will be announced to the committee. There will be consultation and there will be an opportunity for all the exporting nations to participate in some of these projects. That is a great advance over what has prevailed in the past.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether he proposes to use this committee to inform the United States in advance of surplus agricultural disposal policies of the Canadian government before they are put into effect?

Mr. Churchill: Oh, I would think so. In fact over the last two years we have maintained very close co-operation with our opposite numbers in the United States concerning transactions having to do with the disposal of grain. We have done the same with Australia, and it has worked very satisfactorily. I see no reason why that should not be done under these circumstances.

FISHERIES

NEW BRUNSWICK—SALMON FISHERMEN, LIFT PERIOD AND STORM DAMAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): I wish to direct two questions to the Minister of Fisheries. Has the minister arrived at a decision in connection with the request of Miramichi salmon drift net fishermen for the elimination of the two weeks lift period for this season? Also, can the minister advise the house whether any plans have been formulated to date toward rendering assistance to Miramichi salmon drifters and lobster fishermen who suffered extreme losses of boats, nets and gear in the recent tragic storm?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): In connection with the first question may I say that any change in the regulations will require an order in council. I am making a recommendation designed to meet this situation, but it is not in the exact terms of the question asked by the hon. member. However, very shortly I hope to be in a position to add to my reply to this question in more definite terms.

With regard to the second question may I say this. As the hon. member is aware, the Department of Fisheries provides a subsidized insurance system for fishermen with regard to boats and lobster traps. In many cases I believe insurance was carried. Ever since the storm occurred all available men from my department have been in the area to assess claims so that any claims payable may be made as quickly as possible. There are, of course, cases in which insurance was not carried, but I must say that in connection with a disaster of this type, the first responsibility rests with the provincial level of government. However, I am sure that any requests which may come through that channel for assistance would be very sympathetically considered by this government.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ADVISORY COMMITTEE—INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Labour if he is now in a position to say whether the vacancies on the advisory committee of the unemployment insurance commission have been filled as the result of nominations by the labour organizations concerned and the Department of Labour?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): All the names have not been submitted yet and the matter has not been finally completed. However, we expect to make the appointments within the next few days.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister if he has offered the members who resigned, Mr. Burt, Mr. Andras and Mr. Marchand, the opportunity of continuing in their function?

Mr. Starr: I wrote letters to the Canadian Labour Congress and the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour asking them to submit names for consideration.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR AGENDA OF FORTHCOMING MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance may I ask the Prime Minister whether he will inquire of the Minister of Finance if it will be possible to make a statement to the house tomorrow on the agenda of the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I will try to have that available tomorrow. I hope the Minister of Finance will be back from his enforced absence in the company of the Queen. If he is not, I hope I shall be in a position by Thursday to make such a statement.

IMMIGRATION

SANDOR SZILAGYI—REQUEST FOR SYMPATHETIC CONSIDERATION BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration if a decision has yet been reached about the Hungarian refugee who was detained in Toronto and whose case was under consideration some little time ago and referred to in the house.

[Mr. MacLean (Queens).]

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, the matter has not been concluded as yet, and no decision has been reached.

(Translation):

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

PRINTING BUREAU CONTRACTS, QUEBEC—ATLAS OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State. Is he in a position to give me, very shortly, particulars about the questions I asked on the 22nd?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, as soon as I receive the information requested by the hon. member for Hull, I shall table it.

(Text):

MARITIME COAL PRODUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS EXTENDING APPLICATION, INCREASING AMOUNTS OF LOANS, ETC.

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act to extend the application of the act to coal producers in all parts of Canada; to provide that the aggregate principal amount of loans made to coal producers under section 6 of the act shall be increased from ten to twenty million dollars and that the aggregate principal amount of loans made to any one coal producer under the same section shall be increased from seven and one-half to twelve million dollars; to extend the operation of the act from the 31st day of October, 1959 to the 31st day of October, 1964; and to authorize certain amendments to the agreement made under the act with the Dominion Coal Company Limited for the purpose of varying the terms of repayment of principal and interest as provided under section four thereof.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. McCleave in the chair.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, the resolution submitted states, in brief, that it is expedient to extend the provisions of the existing Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act by an amendment to that legislation.

The Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act was studied and passed by parliament in 1949, and provided a fund of $10 million that could be advanced to coal producers in the Atlantic provinces in the form of interest bearing loans to be spent to increase the efficiency of coal production by means of mechanization. The act provided that no loans could be made after October 31, 1959 which, in effect, limited the period to 10 years.

Under this act the operators have been given the opportunity of obtaining loans that might not have been readily available from the usual financial sources. Those who have negotiated loans have also benefited from the special depreciation allowances on the capital cost set out in the act. Since the inception of the act 15 loans have been approved to various coal operators, in the amount of $9,997,101, thus using practically all the funds allotted under the legislation. Of the 15 loans, five have been repaid in full and all others are in good standing as to repayments of capital and payment of interest to May 31, 1959 under the terms of the agreement covering each loan. These loans have all borne interest at rates approved by the Minister of Finance.

Annual reports with respect to the operations under this legislation have been submitted to parliament. The last report covering the operations for the year ending March 31, 1959 was tabled on Monday, April 13, and members will find full details therein of the position of the fund at the close of the fiscal year.

This legislation has been a distinct success in its assistance to coal operators. While costs of producing coal have risen along with costs in all other phases of industry, the help given by the mechanization projects financed under the act has had the effect of increasing the efficiency of mining coal, with the result that the increases in cost have not been as great as they would have been without this help.

The operation of this act has been closely followed by the Dominion Coal Board, and the board have recommended (a) that the provisions of the present act should be extended for a further period of 10 years; (b) that since the funds provided have been exhausted, a further $10 million be made available, and (c) that the assistance be made available to all coal producers in Canada. It is therefore proposed to introduce an amendment to the present legislation which will:

1. Make it a national act so it will apply to all coal mine operators in Canada;

2. Increase the aggregate amount of loans that may be made by another $10 million;

3. Extend the time limit by five years to October 31, 1964;

4. Increase the amount which may be loaned to one operator from $7,500,000 to $12,000,000.

The amendments proposed will also provide authority for a revision of the agreement made under the act between Her Majesty and the Dominion Coal Company Limited. Representations were made by the company last year for some changes in the schedule set out in the agreement of repayments on their loan of $7,500,000. These representations were considered, and it was deemed advisable under existing circumstances to alter the schedule of repayments under the agreement. This revision will:

1. Allow the company to make no further repayments until June 30, 1963, at which time they will again commence repayment at six month intervals based on 30 cents per net ton of production.

2. Increase the interest rate to 4 per cent per annum from 3½ per cent per annum as from July 1, 1957.

In 1957 Bill No. C-54 was introduced authorizing amendments to the original act, intending to meet the representations made by the company. This bill was passed by this house on August 18, 1958. Unfortunately the provisions of this amendment did not fully cover the difficulties, and it remains necessary to clarify the matter by further amendment. The proposed revision provides that the total loan to this company will be fully repaid by June 30, 1970, as set out in the terms of the legislation.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I would repeat my earlier statement that this legislation has been of great assistance to our coal producers in modernizing their methods, in promoting stability in production, and in helping Canadian coal to meet the intensified competition from other fuels. It is our belief that the extension of the assistance in time, in funds, and particularly to all operators across Canada, is timely and will be of even greater benefit to the industry.

Mr. Robichaud: Mr. Chairman, we of the official opposition have followed with interest the statement just made by the minister in introducing the legislation having to do with amending the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act.

As was stated by the minister, the purpose of the present amendments to the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act is first to extend the application of the act to coal producers in all parts of Canada. Mr. Chairman, we welcome this change, which has been made necessary by the present position of the coal market in this country. I would like the minister to tell us before this resolution is passed if it is the intention of the government to change the name of this act, or will it remain under the name of the Maritime Çoal Production Assistance Act? The minister has stated that the act will now be applicable to Canada as a whole, and I wonder if it is the intention of the government to change the name of the act.

The minister has also stated that the purpose of this amendment is to increase from $10 million to $20 million the fund made available for loans under this act. As the minister has stated, this act has been beneficial to the coal industry. It has made possible the modernization of our coal mines which in turn has made it possible to increase production without a corresponding increase in cost.

In answer to a question I asked in this house on February 23, 1959 we were given the details of the loans made under the present act, and as the minister has said five of these loans have been repaid in full. I may note at this point that four of these loans which have been repaid were made to coal producers in the province of New Brunswick.

I also note that it is the intention of this amendment to make it possible for any one coal producer to increase his loan from $7,500,000 to $12,000,000. I presume that the purpose of this amendment is to make possible a further loan to the Dominion Coal Company for the purchase of a washing plant. I hope the Dominion Coal Board will see fit to recommend to the government that such a loan be granted. It is urgently needed by the company concerned in order to make it possible for this company to compete in the coal market.

The amendment to this act which we are asked to pass will also, as the minister has stated, include a further amendment to the present legislation. We know that this act was amended in 1958, but apparently there was an omission at that time in that the government or those who prepared the amendment failed to realize that the loan made to the Dominion Coal Company could not be extended under the existing terms of the act. We will definitely support the amendment which will make possible the extension of the present loan.

Mr. Chairman, the minister has made it clear that this legislation has been a distinct success in providing assistance to coal operators. This is legislation which was introduced by the previous administration. It has been of great benefit to the coal producers of this country and, as I said at the outset, we of the official opposition will be pleased to support this bill. Before this resolution is passed, however, the minister might inform the house if any further action has been taken following the announcement by the Prime Minister on March 17, when he said that a thorough study of the long term market prospects for coal was urgently required and that meetings were to be held with the government of Nova Scotia and the coal companies concerned. I hope the minister is now in a position to inform the house what action is being taken in this regard.

We in the official opposition realize the importance of this amendment, also, inasmuch as it is likely to benefit the marketing of coal in this country. It is unfortunate that coal production has decreased very substantially during the month of May, as shown by figures recently released by the dominion bureau of statistics. In fact Canadian coal output slumped 32 per cent in May, to 562,000 tons from 823,114 tons a year earlier, according to these figures. Moreover, this decrease in the production of Canadian coal took place during a period when landed imports were 21 per cent higher, at 1,308,543 tons as against 1,079,754 tons in May of last year. I hope the minister and the government will look into this matter very seriously, as it may have a very serious effect on the marketing of Canadian coal.

We shall wait until we see this bill, but I repeat that on this side of the house we will support it in principle and do everything in our power not to delay its passage.

Mr. Peters: We in the C.C.F. group also support this resolution, but would like to point out several things which we think are missing. First of all, this is the second time in a period of a year when the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act has been amended, and I think this is another example of Conservative policy with regard to all matters of major importance; no consideration has been given to the long term problems involved and no care has been taken to relate this bill to other acts which are similar in character. For example, a short while ago we passed a national energy act and this present bill, which is concerned with coal production, should obviously come within the scope of that act.

The present amendment adds another $10 million to the fund available under the act, which was set up to assist coal production in the maritime provinces and to help modernize mining equipment. We are pleased that the minister has seen fit to extend this assistance to all Canada, but unless the bill is extended in scope and further amended it can never become a national fuel act and can play no part in any Canadian national fuel policy. We suggest that the minister should consider setting up a national fuel production board which would concern itself with all forms of fuel and come within the scope of the national energy act. However, we welcome the decision to make this additional money available, because mining conditions in the maritimes are becoming increasingly more difficult and the need for improved and more modern machinery to take care of deep and dangerous mining conditions is constantly increasing.

We welcome also the decision to make this act national in coverage, because these same problems are arising in all the coal production areas of this country. We think the $20 million which is now to be available will probably be sufficient to modernize the remaining mines in Canada, but once again I urge the minister to give serious consideration to setting up a national fuel board and bringing this and other acts of a similar nature within the jurisdiction of that board so they might be studied in the light of a national fuel policy which would take into consideration all the forms of energy available to us so these resources could be utilized in the best possible way to the advantage of the Canadian people.

Mr. Comtois: There was a question asked by the hon. member for Gloucester about the name of the new act. This new act will be named the Coal Production Assistance Act. We thought it would be fitting to change the name. A question was also asked about the amendment which is being made to the act, and if I remember well it was about the maximum loan now to be permitted. In the event that a loan is granted to the Dominion Coal Company we must extend the maximum to $12 million, because the first loan granted to the company was $7,500,000 and if the act were not amended the highest loan which could be granted would remain at $7,500,000. That is why we wish to amend the act. Under the first act, the maximum was $7,500,000, and so, in order that this loan may go through, if it does go through, we must raise the limit from $7,500,000, to $12 million.

The other questions will be answered when the bill is discussed. I thank the hon. member for Timiskaming for his suggestion, which will be studied and considered. That is all I have to say at the present time.

Mr. Regier: Is the minister able to tell us whether the coal producers of Alberta, British Columbia or Saskatchewan have asked for this amendment? If so, can he tell us if there has been any indication as to which of the provinces is likely to take advantage of the legislation?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, Mr. Chairman. Every coal producer in Canada may take advantage of the new act and apply for a loan.

Mr. Regier: I understand that every producer will be able to take advantage of it, but has the minister received any indication from the coal producers of Alberta, British Columbia or Saskatchewan to the effect that they do intend to take advantage of the act? If so, in what province are the mines located that intend to take advantage of it?

Mr. Comtois: I cannot give details, but if my understanding is correct two or three mine operators have advised us that they intend to apply for loans.

Mr. Regier: Can the minister say if these mines are in Alberta, British Columbia or Saskatchewan.

Mr. Comtois: I cannot say, but I shall obtain that information.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Comtois thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-68, to amend the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act and to authorize certain amendments to the agreement made under that act with Dominion Coal Company Limited.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): When shall the said bill be read a second time?

Mr. Comtois: Later this day, if the house agrees.

Mr. Robichaud: Provided the bill is available so we can have a look at it.

Mr. Comtois: Of course.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Shall the bill be read a second time later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

LENGTH AND MASS UNITS ACT

AMENDMENT CHANGING VALUE OF POUND IN RELATION TO INTERNATIONAL KILOGRAM

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-20, to amend the Length and Mass Units Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have just a short statement to make with regard to this very small amendment. The Length and Mass Units Act is chapter 164 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952. This act was passed in 1951. At that time the hon. member for Ottawa West gave a learned discourse to the house on what is a highly technical subject. For those who would be interested in reading that discussion it may be found at page 3474 of Hansard for May, 1951.

In the act the Canadian yard and the Canadian pound were related to the international metre and the international kilogram. This did away with the necessity of having specific physical copies representing the Canadian yard and the Canadian pound. This action had two main advantages; the Canadian weights and measures system was tied directly to the most satisfactory international system of measurement, and the most permanent standards of length and mass in the world became the basis of the Canadian units of measurement.

The ratio defining the Canadian pound was taken as the original conversion factor relating both the United Kingdom pound and the United States pound to the kilogram. However, in 1951 it was recognized that the English pound had decreased somewhat in size, creating a difference between it and the United States pound. At that time it could not be foreseen what ratio would be chosen by the United Kingdom and the United States to unify their two pounds. In using the originally accepted ratio relating the pound to the kilogram in the 1951 legislation the need for later revision of the act was foreseen when the United Kingdom and the United States reached agreement.

Over the last three or four years discussions have taken place among these countries to endeavour to resolve the existing differences. A major part in those discussions has been carried on by Dr. L. E. Howlett of the national research council of Canada. An agreement was reached and announced on January 1, 1959 relating to the international yard and the international pound and giving the figures. The international yard equals .9144 metre and the international pound equals .45359237 kilogram. This then necessitated a change in the Length and Mass Units Act altering the last two figures after the decimal point from 43 as now appears in the act to 37. No change is required for the yard-metre ratio but this slight alteration is required for the relationship of the pound-kilogram. The change is significant only in measurements of the highest precision, and does not affect ordinary commerce and industry.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the legislation with which we are dealing is of highly important significance to those working in certain types of advanced scientific work, but has no significance in ordinary trade and commerce. I think it is well to draw to the attention of the house a little of the background of the legislation.

Canada's units of measurement of length and mass had been governed by the weights and measures legislation. We had accepted the standards which we obtained from the British government in 1873. It is interesting to observe that by 1951 the variation in the standards concerned were of such significance as to be important in certain advanced scientific work. It is an indication of the development of this field in Canada and indeed an indication of the development in some of the advanced technology in our production field arising out of developments subsequent to the war that such fine adjustments became of significance.

In 1951 the standards were taken out of the Weights and Measures Act and a separate act was created defining those standards in terms of the international metre and kilogram, and also providing in the Weights and Measures Act that our Canadian national research council should be charged with maintaining our Canadian unit for industrial and trade purposes.

I was glad to hear the minister acknowledge what I and I think all hon. members who have studied this subject will regard as the very splendid work being done in this field by the national research council division headed by Dr. Howlett. It is outstanding work and the type of work of which I think the Canadian government and the Canadian people will be proud.

The actual legislation itself, as I understand it, involves agreement among a great many of the trading countries in the world as to this more precise measurement. In 1951 we did not have that final agreement bringing in the main, the United States and the United Kingdom governments and ourselves together on the precise unit. As I understand this legislation, we now have that agreement and the legislation merely puts in legislative form the result of that agreement. Actually, as I understand it, it reduces the weight of our pound by six one hundred millionths of a kilogram. I think that is the correct way of expressing it.

It will be seen that reduction is of scientific significance only. However, it is interesting that over the 80 years during which we were on the other standard in this respect there was a variation in the British standard bar but during that time there was practically no variation in the international metre. It is one of those things which are perhaps easy for the scientist to explain but which are rather difficult for the layman like myself to follow.

There is, of course, an advantage in this legislation, namely that of getting a scientifically accurate unit. There is also a further advantage in that this indicates that we have obtained international agreement among many nations on this subject. I should be glad if the minister, in his closing remarks, would indicate the countries which will be adopting this standard. I think there are some seven or eight of them, as was indicated in the other place.

Mr. Churchill: If the hon. member has them readily available perhaps he would not mind giving them. I have not that information in front of me.

Mr. McIlraith: I have it here somewhere among my papers but I have not it at hand at the moment.

Mr. Churchill: I forgot to bring that information down with me.

Mr. McIlraith: In the explanatory note to the Weights and Measures Act—and the amendments to that act are merely consequential on the amendment we are making to this act—they are indicated. I think they should be placed on the record. There is, of course, the other larger question involved in this matter, namely that of having the metric or some standard unit adopted throughout the world. However, that is another question and I will not develop it here. I hope the minister will continue to see what progress can be achieved in having a more uniform and simpler system adopted by more and more countries of the world. As I say, that is perhaps another question and we can at this point perhaps leave the matter at that.

I do not think I have anything more to say on this particular bill. I think the amendments to the Weights and Measures Act are consequential on this one and perhaps it will not be necessary, as far as I am concerned, to repeat my remarks on that bill.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. McCleave in the chair.

On clause 1—Mass.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister tell us how many countries in the world have been party to the international agreement which I understand superseded the change that is contemplated in this legislation? The morning press carries a story pointing out the leadership that Dr. L. E. Howlett of the national research council has given in this field, and the way in which Canada has acted as a mediator to bring more closely together the nations which have used or still use different standards of weights and measures. Can the minister tell us just how extensively changes similar to this are being made in other countries?

Mr. Churchill: My information is that the international agreement was arrived at among Canada, New Zealand, the United States, the United Kingdom, South Africa and Australia. I thank the hon. member for drawing attention to the article in the Globe and Mail this morning which carries a summary of some of the work that has been done by Dr. Howlett over the last few years and gives an indication of his continuing endeavours to achieve these standards of measurement and standards of weight that will be accepted throughout the world. I think it is a highly desirable objective.

Mr. Argue: On that point may I say this, though I am not certain that it is completely relevant to this measure. There have been many reports from time to time that Canada might adopt the metric system for the sale of our grain. I am wondering whether there has been any change or any contemplated change from the standard bushel as we have known it in order to bring transactions throughout the world on a more similar basis.

As the minister knows, a great deal of thought has been given to this matter. Some of the commercial interests in the grain business are anxious that this be done. There are many people who support this step being taken. I know there are certain impediments, but I am wondering if the minister can say whether this further step toward international agreement with regard to weights and measures is likely to be taken by Canada.

Mr. Churchill: My attention has been drawn to the subject matter referred to. I do not know of any immediate steps that are likely to be taken, but in any case it would have to be a matter of consultation among Canada, the United States and the United Kingdom if the change to the metric system was to be made for the grain trade. The metric system, of course, is legal in Canada and there is no problem there. However, the problem would be in getting international agreement for that purpose. I do not know to what extent the matter is being pursued currently, but there would be an advantage in international trade if the standards were the same.

Mr. Chevrier: Are there not a number of countries which have adopted the metric system? It has been brought to my attention that at a recent convention in Canada there was a resolution adopted recommending the metric system. Has the minister any ideas on whether it would be advisable for our country to join those other countries which have found it advisable to follow the metric system? I understand that since the last war the metric system has been officially recognized in nine countries. The point of my intervention is whether the minister or the department has given any consideration to this matter.

Mr. Churchill: I have not the information at hand. I know that discussions have been carried on along that line. I think the same problem was raised when the hon. member for Ottawa West was introducing this act in the house in 1951. However, I have not the answer to the hon. gentleman's question.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall clause 1 carry?

Mr. McIlraith: Just before we leave that clause may I say this. There has been quite a development on that point since the act concerned was introduced and dealt with by the house in 1951. I wonder whether the minister would follow the subject up, and perhaps we could deal with it on some other item of business before the house on another occasion. It seems to me that this is something that should be followed up. I am quite sure there has been considerable development internationally on the subject since 1951.

Mr. Churchill: I will follow it up, and the opportunity will arise when the estimates of the department come before the house again.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT

AMENDMENT CHANGING VALUE OF POUND IN ACCORDANCE WITH INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill S-21, to amend the Weights and Measures Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is consequential upon the amendment just made by the bill altering the Length and Mass Units Act. The Weights and Measures Act is chapter 292 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952, and was passed in 1951. The bill was introduced on that occasion and piloted through the house by the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith). Anyone interested in reading the debate at that time will find the reference at page 3780 of Hansard for June 6, 1951.

One of the fundamental changes dealt with the primary standards of length and mass. With the enactment of the Length and Mass Units Act, while the standard unit of extension, that is length, and the standard unit of weight remained the yard and the pound respectively, their values were henceforth to be determined in terms of the international metre and the international kilogram. The relationship of both has now been established by international agreement, as I mentioned a few moments ago, among Canada, New Zealand, the United States of America, the United Kingdom, South Africa and Australia, and is to be implemented by legislation in the countries concerned.

The value for the yard established by the agreement is that at present incorporated in the Length and Mass Units Act. The value for the pound is changed by approximately one part in 7½ million. If hon. members will refer to schedule 3 of chapter 292 of the statutes they will see the details set out there showing the former relationship of the pound as expressed in kilograms and we are now making a change in the last two figures from "43" to "37", so that the new relationship will be

$$\frac{45{,}359{,}237}{100{,}000{,}000}$$

As the Weights and Measures Act incorporates the values in the Length and Mass Units Act, the amendment to the latter in the pound-kilogram relationship must be carried forward to the Weights and Measures Act. Additionally, the Weights and Measures Act incorporates schedules for metric equivalents, and those relating to the pound will therefore require revision.

The physical reproductions of the yard and pound values, known as "reference standards", are calibrated and certified by the national research council. From these "local standards" are calibrated and certified for the use of the weights and measures laboratory and field inspection staff. The amendment is a technical one, and does not affect the practical administration of the Weights and Measures Act.

(Translation):

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the minister will allow me to say a few words in French in connection with the metric system about which I asked a question a few moments ago because there was brought to my attention a recommendation submitted at the convention of the Canadian Association of Geographers in May 1958, which favoured the adoption of the metric system by geographical and geological organizations in Canada. I would like to make a few brief remarks in connection with that recommendation and read the resolution without, I am sure, in the least delaying the passing of this bill.

According to my information:

The metric system has the incomparable advantage, from the scientific and practical points of view, to be the only one based on the decimal system of which all geometrical, electrical, calorific, mechanical, optical and mass units as well as their sub-units logically derive from one another and are interrelated on the aforesaid basis by decimal multiples and sub-multiples.

Hence, because of its very clarity, consistency and efficiency, the metric system has, since its creation in 1801, rapidly become the most popular system of measurement in the world. It is now applied in the whole of Europe (except for the British Isles); in all countries of Central and South America (except for a few islands, or English and American zones); in most of the more important Asiatic countries, among which Japan since April 1951, India since June 1957, the Philippines, Indonesia, Indochina, without mentioning China, which is about to decide to adopt it; in all French, Spanish, Portuguese, Belgian and independent territories of Africa, save the English colonies.

As a matter of fact, it is significant in this respect that former English colonies like India and the Sudan, Palestine (Israel and Jordan) should have officially adopted the metric system as soon as they became independent.

Thus, not only is the metric system in current use by more than 1½ billion people, that is more than 60 per cent of the entire world population of 2½ billion people, but it is also gaining ground every year. Even in countries traditionally attached to the English system, the metric system has become practically the only one in use and recognized by most scientific branches such as medicine and pharmacology; botany, zoology, paleontology and crystallography; astrophysics and globe physics, mineralogy, geology, oceanography and glaciology,—as an example in this field, the Journal of Glaciology of London has adopted the metric system as the only official one in its pages,—meteorology,—temperature readings by radio observation are given the world over in centigrade degrees. Finally, in the military field, in May 1957, the American army decided to adopt the metric system to be on a par with most of the great armies of the world.

Finally is it necessary to emphasize that all measurements related to research work carried out under the international geophysical year programme will be published by all nations without exception in the metric system only.

In view, on the one hand of the superiority of the metric system in that it is the only system whose units in every class or category and in their relationships are all based on decimals and, on the other hand, of all the mentioned facts concerning its more and more exclusive use and establishing it as the only scientific system of measurement which is truly universal, it is suggested that all members of the Canadian Association of Geographers as well as all scientific bodies represented there, accept the principle of henceforth submitting in the metric system all measurements involved in their work or at least of writing them down together with their English system equivalents.

1. To provide for wider circulation and immediate understanding in international scientific circles, of works published in Canada, thus avoiding tiresome measurement adjustments to readers of such works.

2. In order that, on a long term basis, the use of the metric system in sciences may provide a desirable transition before the final and general extension of the metric system throughout Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to emphasize this resolution, or rather this recommendation which was unanimously adopted in 1958, not only to bring the matter to the minister's attention, but also to ask him, as I was saying, whether it would not be desirable to consider going over to the metric system in Canada. Of course, after reading the above resolution which, as we all realize, is quite technical, I shall not attempt to discuss its pros and cons. All I ask of the minister is that, in view of the fact that so many countries in the world are considering adopting this system, would it not be wise for us, in Canada, at least to consider the matter and to determine, as is claimed in this resolution passed in 1958 by the convention of the Canadian Association of Geographers, whether we should act upon this recommendation?

I therefore ask the minister, before we are through with his bill, to kindly let us have his views on this proposal.

Mr. L. J. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago I suggested to the House of Commons that it should consider the possibility of adopting the metric system nationally. I find that the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) has seized upon my idea. At any rate, the suggestions I then made when we were discussing research on a resolution introduced by a member on the government side still holds good.

The metric system is in force today in a great number of countries. In fact, 60 per cent of the world population are using the metric system. I submit that the use of the metric system at the national level would help promote our trade.

At this stage of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would like for a few moments, to show the advantages incidental to the use of the metric system in the economic field. In the first place, it would promote and develop trade with the countries using the metric system. The exports towards these countries represent 20 per cent of the total value of the Canadian exports.

Second, if we adopted the metric system the existing confusion between the different definition of the Canadian and American land and gallon would disappear. Besides, it should be noted that should we adopt the metric system our trade with the United States or Great Britain would not be affected since this system of measurement is legal in both countries, even though it is not yet compulsory nor official.

United States: MS (optional) an Act passed on July 28, 1866 adhesion to the agreement on the meter in 1875. Great Britain: (optional)—an Act passed on August 26, 1897 adhesion to the agreement on the meter in 1884.

In the scientific field, the metric system would make Canadian scientific works accessible to scientific groups in the whole world.

The metric system has always been used in educational institutions, universities, research laboratories, and even, I think, in the national research council.

I am surprised to find that the hon. member for Laurier is now supporting the suggestion I put forward recently, because during many years he served as a minister of the crown, and in that capacity he certainly had an opportunity to influence his distinguished colleagues towards the adoption of the metric system by his government.

All I ask at this stage is that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) consider extending the use of the metric system on a national basis. It is not a matter of making undue haste, but I am merely promoting the idea. I am sure the minister will be pleased to consider the suggestions I have just put forward.

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the hon. member?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I would not like the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) to get a false impression from the remarks I made a moment ago. I would not want the hon. member to believe for one moment that I have been borrowing one of his ideas. If it is his idea, let him take full credit for it. My only purpose in rising—

(Text):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order. Is the hon. member for Laurier rising on a point of order or a qeustion of privilege?

Mr. Chevrier: I am not rising on either, Mr. Speaker. I am rising to deal with the matter which is now before the house and to give an explanation of certain remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. However, if the Chair thinks I am out of order I believe I can make these remarks on second reading of the bill. I thought I could save time by making them now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): These remarks are being made on second reading of the bill. If the hon. member is making them by way of explanation the Chair will grant the privilege of making a brief explanation.

Mr. Chevrier: That is the purpose of my remarks.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I only wanted to point out to the house that I had not the least intention to take the credit that another member deserved in regard to the discussion of the adoption of the metric system. I wished only to draw the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) to the possibility of studying the adoption of the metric system.

I do not want to hurt in any way the feelings of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, but I must tell him that it is not a new idea, for it has been submitted on many occasions—

Mr. Johnson: For many centuries.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not know if the idea goes back many centuries, but it has been suggested quite a long time ago.

In regard to the occasions that I could have had myself to discuss that matter when I was a member of the cabinet, may I say to the hon. member that, if I understand the matter correctly, its adoption requires an international agreement. In my opinion, Canada would have to study the adoption of that system and enter into an agreement with the other countries, as the bill now before us has been adopted following some agreement.

I wanted simply to reassure the hon. member. Instead of being his competitor in so far as the adoption of that system is concerned, I will support wholeheartedly, in so far as I understand the bill now before us, any measure the purpose of which would be not only to study that system, but also to promote its adoption in this country, and this perhaps after we have entered into agreements with the other countries that are interested in it.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to hear the hon. member for Laurier speak in that manner—

(Text):

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order. The hon. member has already spoken once in this debate. The Chair erred in allowing the hon. member for Laurier to continue at great length for a second time, and I would ask hon. members to refrain from further carrying on that particular discussion.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I have a small point which has struck me. We are in a somewhat fortunate position in having this measure piloted through the house by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, because I understand he was formerly a teacher of mathematics. I have listened to the argument of the hon. member for Laurier suggesting that this government look into the question of an international agreement for the use of the metric system in Canada. Before second reading passes I am sure the minister with his knowledge will be only too pleased to inform us lesser lights in the house of the scientific reasons for the advantage in using the metric system in Canada, the commercial value of using the metric system and, shall I say, the economic arguments against its adoption at this stage.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): I would inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate on second reading.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the remarks of the various hon. members on this bill and have taken note of the emphasis placed on the importance of attempting to get universal adoption of the metric system. I have heard about this ever since I first started school and learned that there were such things as metres and grams.

The hon. member for Kootenay West has misjudged my background. I am no mathematician of note at all. In fact I had some difficulty with mathematics in my college years. Prior to that I was successful, but it got rather involved at the college level and I find it a bit involved at this particular level at which Dr. Howlett is very proficient. I think we can rest assured that our people in the national research council will pursue the objective which is in the minds of hon. members. I note that another meeting on the international level is to be held in Paris in October, 1960, where Dr. Howlett will have some suggestions with regard to a new method of measurement based on the wave length of a particular light.

Mr. McIlraith: Wave length of light as a unit of measurement?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, using that as a unit of measurement. From what has been done already in these international conferences, I think public opinion will be formed favourable to the universal adoption of the metric system, but it is a long, slow process and has been going on throughout my lifetime.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this particular bill is simply suggesting an amendment which is consequential upon the one which we passed earlier.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. McCleave in the chair.

On clause 1.

Mr. Broome: I would just like to spend one and a half minutes on this measure. I have listened with a lot of interest and my remarks may be a little bit out of order, but I hope you will show me some leniency, Mr. Chairman. There is one industry in Canada which is entirely on the metric system, as the same industry is in the United States and the United Kingdom, and that is the industry which manufactures ball bearings, thrust bearings, needle bearings, and so on. I believe the optical industry is also very much on the metric system. But it is much easier for an undeveloped country to change to the metric system than it is for a country which is well industrialized, because we have a background of machinery, equipment, measuring apparatus, customs, and so on, set up which would make it very difficult to change to the metric system even though it is perhaps advisable. I think there ought to be a lot of study put into the subject, and the growth toward the metric system will be by industrial application and not any over-all legal measure.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to develop an argument as to the merits of the metric system at this point, but I think the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm did not fully understand some aspects of the matter, according to his remarks in relation to the speech made by the hon. member for Laurier. It is perfectly legal to use the metric system in Canada if anyone wants to, but the difficulty does not arise out of the definitions of the units of length and mass. The difficulty is in the field of commercial relationships which put this country with the United States and the United Kingdom, which in the main do not use the metric system. There is a problem there which involves agreement with those countries with which we have such a high volume of trade. It is not just a simple matter of deciding what we would want for internal use in this country, but of deciding on the implications in relation to those countries with which we do a great volume of commercial trade and have a great exchange in a wide range of products.

For instance, the volume of trade with the United States is very large, and much machinery and equipment is bought from the United States where the metric system is not used. The same is true of the United Kingdom. So it is a matter of seeking to work out some international agreement, and not something where, if one wishes to criticize the former government, one can say, "Why was this not achieved?" It is not within the exclusive jurisdiction of the government to achieve it and I could not, even if I wished to, criticize this government for not having achieved that result, assuming we decided it was wholly a desirable objective. It is not quite as simple as that. That is all I wanted to say about that point, but I thought in fairness I should draw that to the attention of the committee.

There is a very interesting little sidelight to this Weights and Measures Act which may be of interest to hon. members. In the 1873 legislation there were standards which are referred to in schedule IV of the 1951 Weights and Measures Act. One copy was with the minister of inland revenue, as he was then called, and a parliamentary copy was left with the Speaker of the other place, the Speaker of the Senate. The 1951 act relieved the Speaker of the obligation of retaining the parliamentary copy of the bronze bar and the platinum-iridium weights which were described in the Weights and Measures Act of 1873, and now puts them in the custody of the national research council where I presume they remain, and I assume the minister would not wish to have them placed elsewhere at this time. It is interesting to note that such a duty was placed in those years on the Speaker of the Senate, a responsibility which we now regard as a matter of important scientific precision.

Mr. Peters: I suggest to the minister that he give some consideration to including in a measure of this nature a provision with respect to the sizes of various things. I am particularly concerned about the sizes of clothes and shoes. We speak of getting things down to measurements as definite as those outlined in this bill, yet one can walk into a store to buy a pair of shoes size 10 and be given size 9 or size 11 or anything else. Manufacturers of children's clothes are notorious in this respect. For instance, a pair of child's over-alls, size 6—

Mr. Churchill: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): I think the hon. member has made his point, but of course he is out of order and I would ask him to refer to something more strictly related to the Weights and Measures Act.

Mr. Peters: I assume that these sizes are measurements of some description and that they must relate in some remote way to this particular consideration which we are discussing—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): The hon. member is continuing in the same vein, and I must ask him to change the topic or resume his seat.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to pursue this question of the metric system to any extent because, strictly speaking, it is not germane to the bill, although it can be discussed under the bill. I wish merely to ask whether the minister is aware of the resolution which was passed in 1958 by the Canadian association of geographers recommending that consideration, at least, be given to the adoption of the metric system, and to inquire whether the government has given this recommendation any consideration.

Mr. Churchill: My attention has been drawn to that resolution, but I am not at the moment prepared to state that we are recommending any action based on it.

Mr. Chevrier: Would it not be a matter for the government to decide rather than the research council?

Mr. Churchill: I should like to consult with the national research council before answering that question.

(Translation):

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, I just want to refer to an item published in the Montreal paper Le Devoir, of May 22, 1959, which says the following:

Canada isolated by its obsolete system of measurement.

Ottawa.—Canada and the United States will eventually be isolated if they fail to adopt the metric system and retain their obsolete system of measurement. That is what professor L. E. Howlett, of the national research council maintained yesterday before the Senate committee on banking and commerce. For the past ten years, stressed professor Howlett, we have seen an astonishing number of conversions to the metric system, especially in India and in continental China.

Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) read some notes. I would have liked to know their source or rather by whom they were written. The hon. member for Laurier has drawn practically all his notes from the La Revue canadienne de géographie volume XII, numbers 3 and 4 of July and December 1958 respectively. He practically read the whole of a recommendation that the geographical and geological organizations of Canada adopt the metric system, which was submitted to the convention of the Canadian Association of Geographers by Dr. Michel Brochu, of the University of Paris.

I would have liked the hon. member for Laurier to tell us that he was reading notes written by Dr. Michel Brochu which were published by La Revue canadienne de géographie.

(Text):

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Order. We are getting away from the main point of the discussion in committee. Perhaps I should read the clause under discussion:

Item 2 of schedule II to the Weights and Measures Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(2) The standard unit of weight for Canada is the pound—

And so on. I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the clause.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On the title.

Mr. Peters: Before this measure passes I should like to ask the minister whether this matter of sizes is not related to this consideration of weights and measures.

Mr. Churchill: It is a part of measurement, yes, but it is not remotely related to this particular alteration which is before us today. And I might point out to the hon. member that if we ranged as widely as he would like to on every bill brought before the House of Commons we would never finish the business of the house. His questions can quite properly be asked when the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce relating to this particular matter are before the committee.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EXPORT CREDITS INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENT TO DELETE REFERENCE TO GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA, TO EXTEND APPLICATION OF ACT, ETC.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-22 to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I have a statement to make which will last about 12 minutes. If you would permit me to continue past one o'clock I should be able to complete it.

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to enable the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, when authorized by the governor in council, to provide direct guarantees to lenders for export transactions and to buy, sell and make loans on guaranteed export paper. I think it might be helpful if I were to review briefly how the corporation operates, what it does, and what its experience has been. The corporation's main function is to insure Canadian exporters against non-payment by foreign buyers of goods and services. It in effect insures the foreign account receivable. The corporation is also authorized to insure sales of Canadian-produced goods by foreign subsidiaries of Canadian companies, and goods shipped on consignment or for exhibition purposes.

This insurance is provided by the government because there are no private commercial concerns offering similar protection. In all other countries where export credits insurance is available a similar service is provided by the government or with government backing. The corporation insures against risks of non-payment by foreign buyers.

These risks are by no means inconsiderable. The corporation insures both consumer goods sold on short credit terms extending to 30, 60 and 90 days, and also capital goods where payments may be spread over a number of years. One of the basic principles of insurance is that there be a broad spread of risk. Accordingly the corporation generally requires its policyholders who export consumer goods to insure all their export sales made during a twelve-month period, excluding sales made to the United States of America or sales made against irrevocable letters of credit. In the case of capital goods an individual policy is issued to cover the specific contract of sale.

The provision of export credits insurance in no way subsidizes the exporter, for he pays an appropriate premium for the insurance protection and still has to compete in the markets of the world on the basis of quality, price, credit terms and services rendered. In considering applications for insurance the board of directors of the corporation must exercise reasonable prudence and cannot take on liabilities in any one foreign country which may be too high in relation to the corporation's capital, which is $20 million, or in relation to the credit standing of the importer or the importing country. However, where the board of directors is of the opinion that the insurance would impose on the corporation a liability for a term or an amount in excess of that which the corporation would normally undertake in relation to any one contract, exporter, commodity or country, and the transaction is deemed to be in the national interest, the governor in council may authorize the corporation to insure under section 21 of the act.

The recently tabled annual report of the corporation gives a clear and detailed statistical summary of the corporation's operations and experience. Since the first policy was issued in 1945 export sales of $680 million have been insured, including $215 million authorized under section 21. Claims of $9.6 million have been paid and recoveries of $6.6 million have been obtained. Net claims and operating expenses to December 31, 1958, totalled $4.2 million. Premiums of $4.3 million have been received, so that over the past 14 years the corporation has operated on an almost exactly break-even basis with a surplus on operations of only $136,000. The interest on invested capital, which amounted to $3.6 million, makes up the bulk of the underwriting reserve which now stands at $3.7 million.

One of the problems involved in export trade is that of financing. An exporter of general commodities who sells his goods on short credit terms extending to perhaps 90 days as a rule has no difficulty arranging financing. Financing for such exports is readily available from the chartered banks. With the backing of an export credits insurance policy an exporter can often arrange for an increase in his line of credit or for accommodation on more favourable terms, since he can assign to his bankers the proceeds of any loss payable under his policy. The bank knows that if a foreign bill is not met by the buyer the corporation will have to pay under the policy.

In the case of capital goods, however, particularly where sales to underdeveloped countries are concerned, financing is more of a problem. Manufacturers of heavy equipment selling to domestic buyers in Canada are accustomed to receiving payment in cash on delivery, with the buyer obtaining his funds in the capital market or from financial institutions. In less developed countries it is frequently impossible for the buyer to finance domestically his imports of capital goods, because the local financial institutions and capital market are themselves underdeveloped and because many of these countries suffer from a chronic shortage of foreign exchange. Sales may be possible only if the supplier offers credit. For heavy equipment the credit period required often runs to a matter of years. The need for credit for the foreign buyers and the willingness of competing suppliers to grant extended credit terms obliges the Canadian exporter to sell on similar terms if he hopes to win orders.

With the backing of export credits insurance the Canadian chartered banks have generally found it possible to finance the capital goods business of Canadian exporters. However, it is reported that on some occasions chartered banks have found it difficult to provide the financing required by Canadian exporters, partly because of other commitments on the part of the banks, partly because of the size of the loans, or the terms required. In most countries of the world which are exporters of capital goods there are government facilities in addition to export credits insurance to assist in capital goods financing. Assistance provided by these government institutions includes the provision of either unconditional guarantees or rediscount facilities, or a combination of both.

It is now proposed that the Export Credits Insurance Act be amended to provide similar facilities to Canadian exporters of capital goods. Accordingly the proposed amendments would empower the government to authorize the export credits insurance corporation to give direct guarantees to lenders covering export transactions, and to buy and sell guaranteed instruments, and to lend money on the security of these guaranteed instruments in a manner similar to the arrangements provided by section 11 of the National Housing Act.

The corporation will administer the new facilities, acting as an agent of the government of Canada and directed by instruction of the governor in council, in the same manner as it now operates under section 21 of the act.

The new facilities will help to provide Canadian exporters of capital goods with export credits on terms broadly similar to those available to exporters in other countries. In this connection, the government is keeping in touch with the export credit terms being offered elsewhere through its missions abroad, and more particularly through the membership of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation in the Berne union. The union is an organization composed of credit insurers representing most of the major capital goods exporting countries. It provides a forum in which the export credits insurance practices of member countries can be reviewed and kept in line with one another.

The house will be interested to know that at the recent 16th annual general meeting of the Berne union held in Amsterdam on June 12 of this year, Mr. H. T. Aitken, who is the head of our export credits insurance corporation, was elected president of the Berne union, which is a compliment to him and an honour to Canada.

The direct guarantees proposed under the amendment will be applicable both to those transactions which are insurable by the corporation under section 13 or by the corporation upon instruction of the governor in council under section 21. The guarantees will be applicable to export paper issued in connection with contracts involving the export of goods or services for amounts of not less than $250,000, approximately, and involving payment periods of at least two years. Guarantees will be unconditional and cover the financed portion of the export contract, normally not more than 80 per cent of the contract price. The guarantees will be effective only after delivery of the goods by the exporter and acceptance of the goods by the buyer.

These guarantees may be provided in the currency of the contract of sale. Sales of capital goods, particularly to Latin American countries, are as a rule in United States dollars. It is felt that the provision of guarantees in that currency would assist the exporter very materially in his financing arrangements.

Generally these transactions would be covered during the predelivery period by an export credits insurance policy, which policy would become superseded by the guarantee after delivery of the goods by the exporter and acceptance by the buyer. An important feature of the guarantee provision is that it should permit exporters to obtain non-recourse financing from lenders. This arrangement in turn should make it possible for exporters to finance a larger volume of business. In providing unconditional guarantees the corporation will be taking on added risks. An appropriate fee will be charged to cover these added risks.

It is proposed that the guarantees may be extended to all lenders, not only commercial banks. Further, it is proposed that the corporation be empowered to endorse the guaranteed export paper in order to enhance its negotiability.

In addition to the guarantees the proposed amendment would permit the corporation, when authorized by the governor in council, to purchase instruments guaranteed by it, lend money to the holder of a guaranteed instrument upon the security thereof, and sell a guaranteed instrument to any person. It is felt that the provision of such authority will assist in making funds more readily available to Canadian exporters of heavy equipment.

Under section 21 of the present act the liability of the corporation under contracts of insurance issued and outstanding at any time is limited to $200 million. The proposed amendment does not involve any change in this sum. The aggregate of the liability of the corporation under insurance policies issued under section 21 and of all the guarantees issued under the proposed amendments is not to exceed the limit of $200 million presently authorized. It is expected that a greater volume of export business will be facilitated by the new provisions, but individual guaranteed transactions will not increase total liabilities outstanding since when a guarantee becomes effective, an insurance policy is replaced.

Finally, as is the case under the present act, all orders in council made under the proposed amendment would be laid before parliament.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): There is just one question I should like to ask the minister before he takes his seat. I understood him to say that the liability under the contracts of insurance provided under section 21 and the liability of importers under the guaranteed instruments shall remain the same; that is to say, shall remain the same gross. I understood him earlier in his remarks to say that the bill provided for the crown or the corporation as agent of the crown buying and selling the guaranteed paper. There is no limit on the buying and selling, as I understand it.

Mr. Churchill: No; no limit has been set on that.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, the Export Credits Insurance Act, which it is proposed to amend by the bill now before us for second reading, is undoubtedly one of the most important acts we have in force affecting our trade; and bearing in mind the importance of our foreign trade in the general prosperity of the country it is indeed a most important matter for all Canadians. The bill seeks to add to the act a wholly new principle. The act, as hon. members know, provides for the insurance of contracts for payment with respect to the export of goods from this country. There are certain other subsidiary items like services and so on that may also be insured.

The bill before the house provides for the crown through the corporation to buy and sell guaranteed instruments and to guarantee instruments used in the export of products from Canada. There is, of course, a great need for helping the export industry to finance its business. That is undoubtedly a great need in the export trade field today and one which should be met. So we start with a very important piece of legislation being amended and an important step being taken to meet a need that in my opinion is urgent in our commercial world today.

But before discussing the bill in detail I want to raise a preliminary matter that I think should be raised. Under the act it is provided that the limit of liability of the crown is $200 million with respect to the insurance contracts provided for in the act. Under the bill provision is made for doing three things. The first is to guarantee the payment of an instrument given by an importer to an exporter. This is the guarantee factor. The second is the purchase of guaranteed instruments, and the third is the sale of guaranteed instruments.

I have two points I wish to raise. One is that while under the act there is a ceiling limite of $200 million with respect to the relevant clause of the act which provides for insurance by the corporation with the approval of the governor in council, the purpose of the guarantee is a wholly new purpose, and under the liability which is being created by clause 5 of the bill now before us in what will be section 21B of the new act the liability of the importers under all outstanding guaranteed instruments is limited so that the total liability shall not at any time exceed $200 million.

My first point is that this is a wholly new purpose for which possible liability may be incurred or a charge may be made on public funds. The second point is that the bill provides for three separate purposes. The first is a guarantee of instruments, and there is a limit which is the same as the limit under the insurance provisions in the existing act. In addition, however, there is the necessary buying and selling of the guaranteed paper and that buying and selling operation has no limit whatever. It is possible over a period of years to have bought paper to the amount of hundreds of millions of dollars. In other words the limitation of $200 million in the bill is only a limitation on the outstanding guaranteed instruments, but there is no limitation whatever on the losses in the buying and selling or the amount of the buying and selling. It would be possible over a period of years, depending on how quickly guaranteed instruments are replaced, to buy say $1 billion worth of paper, and it is theoretically possible to have a loss of $1 billion. I use that theoretical illustration to make my point. I do not suggest for a minute that there is a probability of that happening at all, but I wanted to make that point.

For these two reasons I am at a loss to understand why the bill was not preceded by a resolution and introduced in the House of Commons rather than being introduced in the other place. In that connection I think I can content myself with reading section 54 of the British North America Act, which is in these words:

> 54. It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address, or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that house by message of the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address, or bill is proposed.

The significance, of course, of having a resolution is that there is an opportunity for a further committee stage. My point is that the bill provides for the appropriation of a part of the public revenue to a purpose that has not been first recommended to the house by a message from the Governor General. Second, if it is held that bill does not provide for expenditure for a new purpose, then my further point is that there is an increased liability created by the bill. I thought I should properly raise that preliminary point so that our rights in this important constitutional matter would be preserved and not eroded through any oversight.

Dealing with the substance of the bill itself, I think it is well for us to recall a little of the history of the legislation on this subject. In 1944 the Export Credits Insurance Act was first passed by parliament, having been introduced by the previous government. The bill as it then stood provided for the creation of the corporation which was to engage in insuring exports, with certain limitations on the risks. In addition the bill contained a very interesting feature in that under certain circumstances, upon the recommendation of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance, the corporation could make direct loans to countries to which we might export goods.

In 1945 there was an amendment which provided for an increase in the lending provision whereby the amount the Canadian government could lend foreign governments for the purpose of buying exports from this country was increased to $750 million. This amount of money was lent to various countries, and I think the farsightedness of the government of that day in this treatment of our export trade certainly benefited Canada greatly. It was a remarkably successful policy.

Perhaps the best indication of just how sucessful this 1944-45 legislation was can be partially found in the fact that our total export trade in 1946 was about $4,266 million and by 1956 it had increased to about $10,574 million. This type of farsighted legislation was a help to exporters and at the same time helped other countries which were devastated in the war to re-establish their currencies so they could buy these exports. This policy certainly paid off for this country, if I may use such a phrase.

This act was amended from year to year. It was amended in 1946 to extend the risks that could be insured. It was amended in 1948 to permit the government to have the corporation, with the approval of the governor in council, make loans that were otherwise beyond the amount that the corporation would normally lend to any one exporter or to any one country. This provision was helpful and increased the development of the corporation. Then in 1954 there was a further amendment. One of the main things that amendment did was to increase the capital. In 1957 there was a rather useful amendment which extended the coverage so that in addition to insuring commodities and capital goods, coverage could be provided for engineering services, goods sent out of the country for exhibition purposes and goods sent out of the country on consignment. In 1958 the present government further amended the bill to increase the amount of insurance the corporation could have outstanding at any one time. This amount was increased from $100 million to $200 million.

In his remarks this morning the minister, as I recall it, did not deal particularly with that phase of the matter. In view of the reasons he gave one year ago for asking for the increase in the liability the corporation could incur, and in view of the fact that he has come back so soon thereafter in effect to reduce the amount the corporation will have available for insurance purposes, I am wondering if the minister, when he closes this debate would clarify that point. In other words, this has been a very good piece of legislation, a very successful piece of legislation; yet the minister is in effect, by this bill, asking that the volume of business the corporation can do be reduced; that is in so far as the insurance aspect is concerned.

Mr. Benidickson: Because of the new purposes.

Mr. McIlraith: Because of the new purposes for which the gross amount may be spent. I ask the minister, therefore, if he would develop that point in his closing remarks at this stage of the legislation.

There are some other aspects of the bill to which I think the attention of the house should be drawn. Up to this point the scheme of the direction of the corporation has been by a statutory requirement that the Minister of Finance, the deputy minister of trade and commerce and the governor of the Bank of Canada be directors of the company and that four additional directors serve with them. I notice that this bill provides that the governor of the Bank of Canada be not included as a director of the corporation. The minister did not deal with that very important change. The corporation has been well directed and well run, and I for one am apprehensive as to the significance of the removal of the governor of the Bank of Canada from the board of directors of the corporation. I would hope the minister would clarify the reason for that change before we are asked to approve the principle.

There is another aspect of the bill before us. The minister carefully set out the need of exporters for financing in their operations; that is, as export trade has become more competitive there is a need for exporters to be able to give longer term credit to purchasers and this makes it difficult to finance their operations. I am in accord with his expression of the need in trade circles for that kind of assistance. This amendment puts the Export Credits Insurance Corporation into the business of buying, selling and guaranteeing the export paper, if I may use that term.

Now, we recently had before this house legislation setting up in Canada a corporation for the purpose of financing exports, discounting export paper if you will. I thought that legislation was particularly significant in our trade development, and very important. I should like to know whether the minister intends that this crown corporation should compete in the field of buying export paper with the export finance corporation recently set up by private legislation.

Then there is another aspect of this matter that concerns me. If I heard the minister correctly before the luncheon adjournment, I believe he said it was the intention to use the guarantee provisions of this bill only in cases where the amount of the transaction exceeded $250,000 and the term of the guarantee exceeded two years, I think I heard him correctly on that point.

That raises an interesting point. If we are to develop trade it is our total trade which must be developed. A very important factor there is not only the big exporters but the smaller manufacturing exporters in particular, because the expansion must come in that area as well as in the area referred to by the minister. In dealing with the minister's estimates a few days ago I raised a matter in connection with that point and asked him to examine the possibility of taking measures that would assist exporters, particularly the smaller exporters, in the very large potential market in the United States. I am sorry to see him limit the new legislation to what I might describe in general terms as big business. It seems to me that the need for financing is just as great in the smaller industrial business in Canada as it is in the big industrial business and if you are to legislate on this particular subject we should provide for all our manufacturers and exporters the benefit of the assistance or facilities we are providing. That distinction made by the minister seemed to be quite unrealistic.

There is one other criticism I have of this measure. I have spoken in rather enthusiastic terms of the present act, the Export Credits Insurance Act. Indeed, some members would think I had been very laudatory of the farsightedness of the former government in bringing it in, and I have spoken of the great benefits it has brought to this country. I for one am sorry to see the minister now come forward with legislation which will divert that corporation from its main purpose of insuring the exports of this country. It seems to me that the corporation has functioned well. There is such a need for continuation of the insurance of export credits that it is unfortunate that this legislation has provided for what in effect is an entirely new business namely the guaranteeing of export paper, or the actual buying and selling of the export instruments being done through this corporation. I would have thought if the crown were to engage in that business it should have done it by a separate corporation, because it is a separate function altogether.

Mr. Benidickson: Like the export-import bank of the United States.

Mr. McIlraith: That is really embarking upon an operation similar to that of the export-import bank of the United States referred to by my colleague from Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), and it is another field altogether. As a matter of fact, I am not sure whether the corporation should be wholly a crown corporation or whether the crown has explored the possibility of bringing more private enterprise into this field. However, I am in complete accord with the need for action in this field at this time.

I do hope the minister has considered that point thoroughly, and if he has that he will explain more fully to the house why he chose this approach to the problem rather than making provision by separate legislation for a separate corporation, because it is really a new field. It is an international commercial banking operation in which the minister is now engaging.

There is another problem about the bill which is before us. I do not know to what extent I may refer to proceedings in the other place, but when this bill was before a committee in the other place it became apparent from the explanations given that what was intended, although the bill does not provide this, was mainly the guaranteeing of export credit paper, and that this would facilitate the exporters' financing of that paper once it was guaranteed. While there is no explanation as to how that was to be facilitated, it is self-evident that it will facilitate it to some extent; but in a period of tight money—I hope not to get into further argument with the Minister of Finance on this particular aspect of it and using that term in the sense that the commercial banks, by reason of bond holdings and for other reasons have not large sums of money available for lending purposes—it is difficult to see how the mere guaranteeing of the paper will particularly assist the exporter to finance through the banks.

Therefore I think if the guarantee aspect of the proposal is to be successful the minister ought to explain to us a little more fully how it is to be successful, because in a tight money period it is not necessarily the security of the loan which is the problem with the commercial banks, but the availability of funds to loan.

A second point in that connection is the long term of the guarantee. The Canadian banks, which are both commercial banks and savings banks combined, have always sought to keep very large portions of their funds in short term securities or loans. They have been very careful about that and have done a very good job over the years. This legislation provides only for the guaranteeing of long term paper. If that is so, then this measure is not going to help the exporters finance through the banks. That again leads us to the question, in what way, then, is a long term export paper guarantee going to help the exporter to finance?

Then there is the whole operation of the buying and selling of the paper. Notwithstanding what was said in the committee in the other place, where the whole emphasis was laid on the guaranteeing of the paper rather than on the matter of buying and selling the paper, I am still of the opinion that the corporation is going to find itself in the position of buying and selling large quantities of these guaranteed instruments. I noticed that in his remarks this morning the minister said relatively little about the buying and selling of such paper but a great deal about the guaranteeing of it. If the corporation is to engage in this commercial banking operation of buying and selling such paper, then surely if that is to become the main purpose of the legislation it is another operation altogether from the insuring of risks.

Those are questions which are outstanding in my mind, Mr. Speaker, which I hope the minister will deal with at some length. While he will see that I have been critical of the bill, I am wholly in accord with the purpose sought to be served by the bill and the minister's assessment of the need for some sort of assistance to exporters.

Before I conclude my remarks I must just add one further thing which I think ought to be said. I appreciate very much the minister acknowledging the honour which has been done to Canada by the election of the president of our Export Credits Insurance Corporation to be head of the Berne union. This is an acknowledgment of the splendid services of that officer, and it is also a courtesy and an honour to this country that I am happy to join in acknowledging.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, we are pleased that this bill has been introduced, because not only does it seek to continue the Export Credits Insurance Act but it also provides amendments for the purpose of expanding the activities of that corporation.

Canada at this time is facing serious difficulties in the export of a great many commodities. We realize that we are facing difficulties in the export of lead and zinc, copper, wheat and oil, although the difficulties in that direction seem to have been lessening in recent days because of actions taken by the United States government. Nevertheless, with regard to a great many commodities Canada is finding export sales increasingly difficult to obtain.

We are all aware that the Soviet union is engaged in a growing trade offensive, but that country does not have to rely in any sense upon private institutions to make commercial transactions in the commodities available for export. Rather, the Soviet union is able to enter the market by means of long term contracts and by means of credits at very low rates of interest which enable her to undercut markets which might otherwise be those of Canada or of some other western nations. Private enterprise in the ordinary sense of those words is unable to compete with this growing expansion in world trade on the part of the Soviet union.

We see extraordinary statements made from time to time by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and by leading businessmen in this country advocating an expansion of public credit to enable corporations to develop their business in the export field. As a matter of fact, the measure now before us is a good socialist measure. It provides a public corporation to undertake business which private enterprise is either unwilling or unable to engage in. Those who wish to put forward their private enterprise views will say, of course, that this is merely a measure to assist ordinary business establishments. Be that as it may, it is an expansion of the area of government activity. It is necessary according to the government and it is necessary according to the official opposition, and we in this group believe that the Export Credits Insurance Act has been of value to Canada in the past and that with these amendments it will be of greater value in the years ahead.

There are a number of clauses to which one might refer at some length in the course of detailed study, but I do notice that there has been some change in the board of directors. Now the bill states:

> There shall be a corporation to be known as Export Credits Insurance Corporation, consisting of those persons as members who for the time being are the deputy minister of trade and commerce and the deputy minister of finance.

The old section read as follows:

> There shall be a corporation to be known as Export Credits Insurance Corporation, consisting of those persons as members who for the time being are the deputy minister of trade and commerce, the deputy minister of finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada.

So by this amendment the government is dropping as a member of the board of directors the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: Why?

Mr. Argue: It will be very interesting to know why he is being dropped. Is it because he does not see eye to eye with the government in regard to the purpose of this measure? Is it because of some difference with the Minister of Trade and Commerce as to the policy which is being followed? Or is it, perhaps, that he is too busy, that he is overworked, that he has more things to do than he is able to do? I ask this question because we had this same gentleman before another committee in his capacity as a member of the committee having to do with investment funds of the unemployment insurance commission.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether the position of an official, his engagement or his views, have anything to do with the principle of this bill. It might be asked, furthermore, that the hon. member is referring to proceedings in a committee which has not yet reported, and that is a second question; but the reason I intervened was to ask the hon. member to justify his reference to an official as a matter which is involved in the principle of the bill before us.

Mr. Argue: But this bill provides that this official is to be dropped from the board of directors. He has been a member of the board, and now he is being dropped.

Mr. Benidickson: It was statutory before.

Mr. Argue: It was statutory before, and I am now asking for an explanation. The change is made in the first clause of this bill, section 3 of the existing act.

Mr. Speaker: I think a discussion of that kind would be more appropriate in committee. It is an incident of the bill. I do not want to prevent the hon. member from discussing a matter which he feels relevant, but that could be done in committee. After all, he is discussing a detail of one clause.

Mr. Argue: I understood your point to be that there is really no reference to this gentleman in this bill and that his private opinion expressed in some other place has no bearing on it. But I was merely seeking to find out why this gentleman was being dropped from the board, and I was wondering whether it is because he is too busy. We know, or we have reason to believe, that most of his investment activities in connection with the unemployment insurance fund at least were done by telephone, and if he is too busy to engage in the work of this corporation that is a perfectly good and sound reason for dumping him from the board of directors in this case.

In any event we are pleased to see this legislation being continued, and we are glad to see it is being extended. We think the expansion of this legislation is very necessary, because unless Canada is exceedingly aggressive in the export field a great danger to our economy is likely to develop. Perhaps before the passage of this measure I should ask the minister whether or not its provisions will facilitate the extension of credit in regard to the sale of Canadian commodities, and I refer in particular to Canadian wheat. I have in my hand a Canadian Press report of May 20 which states that a $28 million sale of Canadian wheat to Poland is being financed by West Germany because proper credit facilities are not available in Canada. At a time when the international market for wheat is exceedingly competitive, when it is difficult to obtain sales, even with the provision of credit, it seems a rather startling piece of information that a $28 million sale of Canadian wheat to Poland must be financed in Germany because no such financing is available in this country.

This measure can be of help to our nation, and we hope that with the passage of this amendment it will be used to the maximum.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to speak at length in connection with this measure because the views of this party were very well expressed by the hon. member for Ottawa West.

This amendment represents an extension of the field of government participation from insurance to finance to encourage our exports, and I am sure all hon. members of the house would approve of that objective. I share with the hon. member for Ottawa West curiosity as to how this function can be reconciled with the initiation of private enterprise in this field, as evinced by legislation which we have had before us during the current session. In addition, if this is likely to be an impressive field I share with the hon. member a desire to question the minister as to why we are including in an insurance act this additional function which seems to be so closely related to the export-import bank function of our neighbour to the south.

[Mr. Argue.]

That raises a question as to why, if this is to be an impressive function, this bill does not in any way increase the total financial liability under the act, which was set at a maximum of $200 million. If the government is to go into a new field, and if this new field is to accomplish anything, surely it cannot be accomplished solely by endorsing a certain amount of paper without requiring over a period of operation an actual requirement for financial resources. No request has been made for an increase in financial resources.

I note from the annual report that the liabilities under section 21 of the act were $51 million and those under section 13 were $84 million as at December 31, 1958. I do not think the minister brought us up to date as to the current position with respect to liabilities particularly under section 21, and I wish he would do so.

This bill was introduced in the other place. The banking and commerce committee of the other place examined Mr. A. W. Thomas, assistant general manager of the Export Credits Insurance Corporation, who in his initial statement to that body on Wednesday, June 10, 1959, as reported at page 7 of the evidence of the committee, said:

—the substance of the bill is in this matter of guarantee. The responsibility is going to be taken by the government and not by the corporation, for we are an insurance corporation.

I believe that highlights the suggestion of the hon. member for Ottawa West that if the statute we are now amending is essentially related to insurance, there is some merit in thinking about the possibility of separating the two functions. That would not be done here and I do not think we propose to divide the house on that point, but I feel that the minister should consider the advantages of there being two acts providing for a separation of functions, particularly when the assistant general manager of the company asserts that decisions with respect to matters of this kind are going to be government decisions rather than decisions of the corporation itself.

Another question that has concerned me in connection with the new sphere of activity suggested under this bill is related to our knowledge that in the insurance realm we have had coinsurance. On the same page of the proceedings of the banking and commerce committee of the other place Mr. Thomas said:

The policy of insurance—

That has hitherto been the function of the corporation.

—is subjected to terms and conditions and to a co-insurance which is normally—

I want to emphasize the word "normally". I continue:

—not in excess of 85 per cent of any loss which might be suffered by the exporter—

I was curious about the word "normal". Have there been policies of insurance undertaken by the corporation where the co-insurance by the exporter was less than 15 per cent? In addition I would ask the minister to tell us today or on a subsequent occasion when we are debating the clauses of the bill how guarantees are going to fit into the traditional experience of co-insurance. With respect to endorsing a promissory note, for instance, does the minister conceive that he can endorse or guarantee that paper on a percentage basis rather than in entirety as to the face value of the paper guaranteed? I think there is great merit in retaining an interest on the part of the exporter in repayment and the proper eventual success of the transaction. I am wondering whether or not under this form of financing the corporation is likely to get into the position of being 100 per cent interested, without a co-interest on the part of the exporter himself.

We have some knowledge, of course, as to the competitive position that Canada is in which necessitates and makes desirable legislation of this kind. In the matter of down payments, what is the likely requirement in the view of the minister in this respect? I understand that with respect to insurance facilities in the United States a down payment there is required where the cover will not exceed 60 per cent. What is the minister's advice to his corporation in this respect? In so far as rates are concerned, is the minister contemplating that rates of insurance will continue to be standard without differentiation with respect to individual transactions? I believe there is now something in the nature of a trade union among government export insurers, and the firm convention provides for a maximum term of loan contracts of five years. There are some countries at least that are competitors of ours which do not belong to this association, notably Italy, and there are some others.

What is the possibility of getting competitors of this kind into the Berne organization? Notwithstanding the Berne convention and agreements I believe that in the United States, by virtue of the export-import bank, an extremely important competitor there has an opportunity to assist exports by means of development loans. I think this avoids the Berne agreement to the extent that these development loans could be for a term of as long as 20 years. Does that not appeal to the minister as an additional reason for perhaps separating the financing and putting that in a separate statute, such as is the case in the United States, rather than including it in a statute that is basically an export credit insurance act?

The minister, of course, will be very well aware of the fact that Germany has been extremely aggressive in this field and through its reconstruction loan corporation is a competitor. I question whether it is desirable that we be in the Berne agreement with respect to credit insurance and have terms that might be related to insurance in some way interpreted by our friendly competitors in other countries as being bound as a result of that statute, whereas they are really finance matters which these other countries have handled by separate statutes and separate organizations, notably the Export-Import bank of the United States.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I just want to ask two or three questions on these amendments. They seem to come under two categories; first, to make a change in the management of the corporation; and second, to increase the powers of the corporation. Under these amendments the corporation will be assuming greater liability in respect of each individual exporter. My understanding is that the corporation will guarantee the exporter unconditionally for the full amount of his account. That has not been true heretofore. As was stated by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River previously we had co-insurance where the exporter carried 15 per cent of the loss, if any. Will this co-insurance apply in the future? My understanding is that the corporation will insure unconditionally up to 100 per cent of the amount.

There is one other question that comes to my mind. I wonder whether the corporation is utilized by exporters in shipping to the United States? No reference has been made to that matter. When the matter was debated previously two years ago, I think, some reference was made to making use of this corporation for exporting to the United States, but at that time it was said that no use was being made of this corporation in that respect. I should like the minister to comment on that matter.

The hon. member for Ottawa West referred to the fact that small businesses did not have the same advantage in making use of the export credit corporation. I might say that I have had larger businesses come to me and say they had difficulty in getting the services of this corporation to handle smaller orders. This happens to be a large company that was shipping products costing under $100,000 to Brazil, and it was hard for them to get the services of the corporation to look after this comparatively small order.

Mr. Benidickson: Was that on long term credit?

Mr. McMillan: On long term credit. I should like to ask the minister to make some comment in connection with that matter.

As to the change in management, I think if the governor of the Bank of Canada continued to be on the board of directors of this corporation, in so far as he might have business with the corporation through his position with the bank, he might have a dual capacity. I assume that is the reason the government is changing the board of directors. I should like the minister to comment on that matter.

Mr. Benidickson: The central bank in France does the rediscount.

Mr. McMillan: Yes. I thought it would probably be better to ask these questions at this point and to have the minister answer them now.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate. I should also, if I may interrupt the minister, ask him to deal with the preliminary point which was made and which, if it is a valid point of order, would be fatal to the passage of this bill. I refer to the point that was made by the hon. member for Ottawa West to the effect that this bill is authorizing the expenditure of new money. If it is, it comes under standing order 61. As a motion for public aid or a charge upon the people which can only be introduced by a resolution. It also comes under standing order 63, which is an extremely important consideration to this house and which reads as follows:

63. All aids and supplies granted to Her Majesty by the parliament of Canada, are the sole gift of the House of Commons, and all bills for granting such aids and supplies ought to begin with the house, as it is the undoubted right of the house to direct, limit, and appoint in all such bills, the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations and qualifications of such grants, which are not alterable by the Senate.

The point having been raised, I feel that the minister should deal with it first so the house can assure itself that its privileges are not being eroded.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, on the first point raised by the hon. member for Ottawa West may I say that I think it is based on a misunderstanding, perhaps owing to a reply I gave to a question he asked me just at one o'clock. I misunderstood his question.

He asked me whether there was any limitation on the amount of guaranteed export paper, if you can use that term, which might be bought and I said no. I thought his reference was as to whether there was any specified amount within the over-all or overriding limitation of $200 million which would be appropriated or set aside for that particular purpose. But as he indicated in the course of his remarks, the proposed amendment under section 21B states as follows:

21B. (1) The aggregate of
(a) the liability of the corporation under contracts of insurance entered into under section 21 and outstanding, and
(b) the liability of the importers under all outstanding guaranteed instruments, shall not at any time exceed two hundred million dollars, . . .

Therefore there has been no increase and there is no increase in financial obligation in any other portion of the bill. I had this looked at when we were considering the introduction of the measure and our conclusion was that a resolution would not be required in the House of Commons because no extra financial obligation was imposed upon the crown. These limits continue to be maintained. The situation was different two years ago when I introduced an amendment raising the total amount available from $100 million to $200 million. Therefore I think that the point of order was raised under a misunderstanding due perhaps to the answer I gave just at one o'clock.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister permit a question? In the opinion of the minister does this new function involve a fairly substantial increase in employment of staff for the new function?

Mr. Churchill: No, not at all. That again is something we looked at and the present staff will be able to handle the business which will arise under this new arrangement if approved by the House of Commons.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a question? Did the amendment he referred to a moment ago contemplate the introduction of a resolution?

Mr. Churchill: When we raised the amount from $100 million to $200 million I moved on December 4, 1957, as found at page 1867 of Hansard, that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution. The resolution was considered on that day and subsequently the bill came up for second reading.

Mr. Chevrier: Does it not follow that having done that on a previous occasion a resolution is required now when the minister brings in this bill having a different purpose, even though it does not increase the amount?

Mr. Churchill: That would be a matter for Mr. Speaker to determine. I do not see it that way at all. My understanding is that a new and entirely different increase in expenditure must be involved. May's Parliamentary Practice, 16th edition, page 754, says that the charge must be new and distinct. Here there is no new and distinct charge suggested.

Mr. Speaker: May I say that as I understood the hon. member for Ottawa West he was not contending that the guaranteeing liability might exceed the $200 million now authorized but that the power to purchase guaranteed instruments was not limited to the $200 million which had been authorized. As I recall what was said, that seems to me to be the only point which requires an answer. I am not concerned so much about additional staff or the question of the change in character of the purposes for which the money already voted may be used. But if the legislation as it is to be amended would permit the corporation to incur expenditures through the purchase of obligations which would exceed the authorized limit of $200 million then there would in effect be authority to spend new money and that might raise the question of order.

Mr. McIlraith: That was one of the two points I raised. You see, the present act provides for insuring export credits. That is the purpose of the act. The new bill provides for guaranteeing, buying and selling instruments. Instruments are a different thing altogether from what is insured. "Instrument" is defined in the bill as a promissory note, bill of exchange and so on. It is discount paper. It is a wholly new operation distinct from the business of insurance of contracts for the payment for export commodities and capital goods. Therefore my first point is that the procedure is not in accordance with section 54 of the British North America Act because the purpose of the bill is wholly new. The bill undoubtedly creates a charge because guaranteeing up to $200 million is admittedly a charge, so even if the total liability is not increased the purpose is wholly new. That was the first point.

The second point was a little different.

Mr. Speaker: It is the second point that concerns me. I think the first point can be and has been answered by the reference to May. The general purpose of the appropriation of $200 million is the facilitation of export trade, in the old bill by insurance and in the new bill by insurance plus the guaranteeing of instruments. Therefore I think that point is perhaps not worth pursuing, subject to what authorities the hon. member may cite, but the second point is one on which I should like to be satisfied, namely that the buying of instruments is also limited to the $200 million.

Mr. McIlraith: I have stated my first point and I am not going to press it unduly at the moment. But Your Honour can see how far we could go astray by permitting the introduction of a wholly new purpose in an amending bill. If you had an act respecting housing, then instead of introducing new legislation the government could change the purpose and build railroads with the amount of money voted for housing. I will not develop that argument further but I thought it should be raised.

My second point is that the total liability that can be a charge on the public funds at any one time under section 21 of the existing act is $200 million. That is the maximum amount of liability outstanding at any one time. The act uses the expression, "shall not at any time exceed $200 million". The new legislation provides for the corporation engaging in three new activities that are different from insurance. As I submitted in my previous argument, they are wholly different in purpose. They are the guaranteeing of promissory notes, bills of exchange and other negotiable instruments, the buying of such instruments and the selling of such instruments. The limit of liability in the new bill will be found at the bottom of page 2 where it says that the liability of the importers under all outstanding guaranteed instruments—that is just the liability of the guarantees outstanding at any one time—shall not, together with the existing liability under the act, exceed $200 million so that the amount is the same $200 million. However there is no limitation whatever under the buying provision.

Let me take an example of what could be done under the bill in order to illustrate my point. Assume that the bill is passed and next month we guarantee paper to the extent of $200 million. They can then buy all the guaranteed negotiable instruments. They can buy and sell; they can incur a loss, but the continuing guarantee stays at $200 million, that is clear. It is limited. However, in the buying and selling they can buy guaranteed paper and incur a loss on it by selling, which loss would be a charge on the taxpayer. This buying and selling operation is a trading operation and it is not limited to the $200 million.

If we could reduce an example to an absurdity in order to illustrate the point, Mr. Speaker, I would say they could buy $200 million of guaranteed paper and next month sell it for $190 million. Then they could come right back and guarantee $200 million worth of paper, so that the charge on the treasury would then become $210 million at the end of the month.

Mr. Speaker: If I might interrupt, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. I think he has overlooked one factor, and if so I should like to be clear about it because it may save time. The instruments that may be purchased are instruments guaranteed by the corporation. If that is so, then the amount of the guarantee of any instrument, that is a debt of any importer which has been guaranteed, is already charged against the $200 million. If the corporation then buys that instrument it is not adding anything to the liabilities of the corporation, but is presumably replacing its liability for the guarantee of the debt. However, there is no change in the obligation of the corporation, and the corporation cannot go beyond the $200 million limit.

Mr. McIlraith: They can sell the instrument and take a loss; it is a trading operation. They are really going into commercial discount banking operations. The only thing that is limited is the amount they can guarantee, but in any trading operation they can be taking very severe losses, regularly. This is the significant point that concerns us, the gross charge on the treasury can far exceed the $200 million on guaranteed instruments and that $200 million is the limit in the act.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I could hear the minister on this point.

Mr. Churchill: I answered the first question earlier, and I did deal with the second one. My hon. friends cannot have it both ways. The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) was arguing just a few minutes ago that if we were going to do more business we would have to increase the financial resources of the corporation.

Mr. Benidickson: But I expect that you would use a resolution to do so.

Mr. Churchill: The wording of section 21B of the act definitely limits the liability under contracts and guarantees. I have already read the section which says:

> The aggregate of
> (a) the liability of the corporation under contracts of insurance entered into under section 21 and outstanding, and
> (b) the liability of the importers under all outstanding guaranteed instruments, > shall not at any time exceed two hundred million dollars—

Now, all of this was considered, Mr. Speaker, before the bill was introduced and it is because no authority is granted the corporation to exceed that ceiling that we decided no resolution was required.

[Mr. McIlraith.]

Mr. Speaker: I am inclined to think that the minister's advice was sound. It is always difficult to know with these bills which authorize complicated transactions, whether or not new money is involved. I think that the argument is really concluded by section 21B which defines how the $200 million already authorized by parliament can be applied in the future. It can be applied to existing purposes of the corporation, that is the liability of the corporation under contracts of insurance entered into under section 21 and —not or—the liability of importers under all outstanding guaranteed instruments. In effect, therefore, this bill divides the $200 million already authorized between the old purpose and the new purpose and to that extent it cuts down the amount available for insurance and makes some part of the $200 million available to guarantee the liability of importers.

Now, let us look at the guarantee provisions. The corporation may purchase guaranteed instruments under subsection 2 of section 21A, and if you look at what a guaranteed instrument is you will find it means an instrument the payment of which is guaranteed by the corporation under this section. What the corporation, in effect, is doing is purchasing its own guarantee, and to that extent it does not increase the liability of the corporation which is already limited to $200 million because the instrument which it has guaranteed is an instrument of liability of some importer. It is that liability of the importers which is included in the $200 million which is involved in this purchase.

Mr. McIlraith: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My purpose in referring to the matter lies in the importance of the bill and not in any desire to delay the passage of the bill in any way. It was rather a point that I thought should be raised because of its importance and this was the sole purpose I had in mind.

There is another rather interesting point at which the house should look when any such bill is presented in the future, and that is the fact that there is no limitation on the price at which these negotiable instruments can be purchased. It may be two cents on the dollar.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the minister would like to speak now?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I fully appreciate the points raised by my hon. friends opposite. I am well aware of the fact that they favour the Export Credits Insurance Corporation because they had something to do with its origin. They have been impressed, as I am sure all the rest of us have been with the success of this corporation over the ensuing years. I have already explained what we intend to do. Perhaps I should not, at this stage, answer some of the questions which were raised because obviously they could be better answered in the committee stage. However, generally, I can say this on some points raised by those who spoke: There was no question about— I use the phrase of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) now— dropping the head of the Bank of Canada. My understanding was that the pressure of business precluded him from giving the close attention to this organization he desired to give it. I judge he knows best the time that is available to him and so we saw no reason to raise any serious objections to that.

The directors of the corporation have carried on very successfully and although the head of the bank will not be present in the future, you still have the deputy minister of finance attending directors' meetings.

This is a new departure under the present terms of the act but it is allied in some measure to part 2 of the original act which lapsed some years ago. When the act was passed in 1944 there was a part 2 which authorized the making of rehabilitation loans to foreign governments and that authority expired in 1947. So although this suggestion we are putting forward now is not exactly the same as that nevertheless we thought in view of that experience with the act we could introduce this other feature now of guaranteeing export paper without having to create a new corporation or set up a separate act for this purpose.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister permit a question at this stage? As regards long term credit, who does the minister contemplate will be the original lenders, the commercial banks?

Mr. Churchill: The chartered banks.

The hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. McIlraith) suggested that by this proposed amendment we were, as he put it, diverting the corporation from its main purpose of insuring. That does not necessarily follow. The insurance work of the corporation may continue to be the larger part of its work. We will know better a year from now as the experiment is carried forward, but the intention was not to change, alter or diminish the activities of the corporation, which in the past have been very successful insurance activities. We were not able to go as far as the Export-Import bank of the United States. That question was looked into very carefully. As has been pointed out on more than one occasion, we have not the capital for export that the United States has. We are an importer of capital. The Export-Import bank has been able to export capital on very long terms which are at the moment beyond the capacity of our country. So having examined the activities of the Export-Import bank of the United States, we decided that at this stage in Canada's development we could not enter that field. We felt that this other plan would in the interval provide additional facilities to our exporters that they do not now have at their disposal.

Nor did we consider that we would be in competition, as I think someone suggested, with the export finance corporation recently set up. We may be dealing in different fields. The representations which have been made to us over the last two years have indicated that there is a field here for the guarantee of export paper that has not been adequately covered in the past. All sorts of investigations have been carried out. Consultations have been held with leading businessmen of this country, and we feel that by introducing this measure we have taken a step in the right direction. I think that with a year's experience behind us we may discover that perhaps more capital or more backing for the Export Credits Insurance Corporation is required. As suggested by the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson), it depends how our export business develops. We are in a highly competitive world and other countries are supporting their exporters beyond the field of just insurance, and consequently we want to do that too.

The hon. member for Assiniboia gave an instance to the house of the difficulties faced. He used the example of wheat, where he mentioned that a proposed sale of $28 million of wheat to Poland on a long term basis was being financed by West Germany. That is not the first instance which has occurred along that line, where the Export Credits Insurance corporation has been prepared to insure a sale of Canadian products abroad but the financing was not able to be done in Canada; the financing had to be done from, say, New York, or in this instance, West Germany, or perhaps Switzerland. Now our hope is that Canadian finances may be available under this guarantee plan so that Canadian exporters may take full advantage of the opportunities that come to their notice.

I listened with interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) who talked about the question of co-insurance and wondered whether some great change was being made there. That matter was dealt with when it was up before the banking and commerce committee of the Senate, and the hon. member for Welland read out the answer given by the head of the Export Credit Insurance Corporation. At the present time, under the insurance plan 15 per cent is carried by the exporter and 85 per cent by the corporation. But after the operation has reached a much more advanced stage—that is, after the goods have been delivered by the exporter and accepted by the buyer—then the guarantees become operative and it is at that stage that the guarantee reaches 100 per cent.

A question was asked with regard to our trade with the United States and whether the corporation afforded facilities to our exporters to deal with the United States. That has not been necessary in the past. The first instance was brought to our attention just recently when I announced the sale of certain aircraft to the United States under the export credits insurance arrangement based on section 21 of the present act. But most of our transactions in the past with the United States have not required the assistance of this corporation.

Those, I think, Mr. Speaker, are the main points which were raised by my hon. friends. Other matters if unanswered, or other questions which may arise in their minds, might be dealt with at the committee stage.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. MacEwan in the chair.

On clause 1—Export Credits Insurance Corporation.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, this stage gives us a further opportunity to question the minister. We do appreciate the answers he has given so far to such questions as were asked on second reading; but naturally when one is restricted in that debate one, if dissatisfied as to the completeness of the answer, must take advantage at this stage to ask a few additional questions. I am very concerned about this question of whether this bill is really going to change the situation. We have evidence given before the Senate committee which considered this matter that in the opinion of the officers of the corporation this is merely a matter of a guarantee, and I think that is confirmed by the fact that additional financial liability is not sought in this measure. On page 8 of the minutes of the banking and commerce committee of the Senate, the assistant general manager of the corporation said this:

> The intent is not to finance the export transaction. The exporter would still have to arrange his own financing with any lender who would lend him the money he requires.

It is not my impression that banks, particularly during a period of tight money when they have more requests for money on short term than they can satisfy, are likely by reason of this guarantee to do anything different from what they did in the past to aid exporters.

Mr. Muir, the president of the Royal Bank of Canada, had something to say about this on the occasion of the last annual meeting of the bank. In January, 1958, he said this:

> What he requires is the discount of paper maturing over a period of years or a term loan for a similar period secured by that paper. During a period of tight money, the chartered banks do not have available in any quantity funds for this purpose.

In addition I ask the minister in so far as credit desirability in the hands of the chartered banks is concerned, what is there additional to the guarantee which was not in the existing legislation, which was an insurance, except for the possible difference that the guarantee may be at the rate of 100 per cent, and the evidence is that the insurance has had a co-insurance feature under which the exporter was liable to the extent of 15 per cent. These questions have to be answered. I said something yesterday about window dressing. I want to be assured that measure has some substance. If the intention is not to put up any money but to guarantee money which is put up by some other lender, then I ask: who is the other lender? The banks say that in a period of tight money they cannot lend for long terms because they cannot at the moment fulfil the demands of short term borrowers who are the people they look to first. In other words, is this another blank cartridge, a way of avoiding a problem which everybody recognizes, namely that we are facing worldwide competition with regard to financing long term credit for exports?

In his reply before we reached the committee stage the minister suggested that this matter of the guarantee became effective after the goods were delivered. Let us be practical. I suggest to the minister that this is utter nonsense. If the manufacturer, or seller, or exporter is contemplating a sale which he has not commenced, is there anyone in this committee who thinks that it is not prior to the delivery of the goods that he makes arrangements about the ultimate success of the transaction, including credit? Of course, it is not after the goods are delivered that we come to the question of a guarantee. Before any deal is made whatsoever the seller and the foreign buyer are each going to know what the arrangement is, not only whether or not they are going to get insurance under the legislation we have had in effect for some years but also whether or not they are going to get a guarantee. I say it is fatuous to assert that this question of guarantee comes up only after the goods have been delivered.

The next question I wish to reiterate in the hope of something more definite from the minister by way of an answer, is this: the minister has indicated that the governor of the Bank of Canada is no longer to be a member of the board of this corporation and he has told the committee this was due to the fact that the governor had intimated that he did not have time in which to fulfil this obligation. But I want the minister to be more positive in this respect. Will he assure the committee that the governor of the Bank of Canada has not shown in any way any distaste for this particular legislation and that his desire to be relieved of his responsibilities in this connection is entirely due to obligations elsewhere and not to any distaste with respect to the amendments before us today.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River is wondering whether this measure is going to be effective at all, and suggests there is no money available for this purpose—

Mr. Benidickson: The bankers say there is not. I quoted an eminent banker as saying there is no money available for this purpose.

Mr. Churchill: Yet much of this was discussed with banks during the last year or so, and the bankers association in consultation with our officials have assured us that they are satisfied that the banks will be able to provide credit when there are guarantees by the government. This is a question of having to wait and see what will happen, but if we have this legislation before us, if it is passed, and the corporation has the authority to guarantee these advances, the exporter is in a position to approach his bankers and discuss the matter with them. At the present time he is not in that favourable position because he has no guarantee available. I suggest it is speculation on the part of the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River to say that nothing can happen under this legislation. We are prepared to wait and see.

Mr. Benidickson: I did not say that. I said I was sceptical. I want you to encourage me.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. gentleman is a sceptic but we shall prove to him that he is wrong before 12 months are out. With regard to the other point he made, he suggested there was something fatuous—I think that was what he said—with regard to the procedure which I outlined briefly—

Mr. Benidickson: Your statement as to the procedure.

Mr. Churchill: I made that statement this morning and perhaps the wording might have been altered.

Mr. Benidickson: I was referring to what you said this afternoon.

Mr. Churchill: In the first instance, the policy of insurance will be available to the exporter during the time he is getting his goods ready to ship and the guarantee becomes applicable after the goods are accepted by the buyer. One can use the word "accepted" or the word "delivered". The hon. gentleman understands the use of the terms. But naturally—and I think this would be understood—when the exporter is arranging his deal he would ordinarily request a guarantee from the Export Credits Insurance Corporation at the time he was telling them about his prospect and asking for insurance on his proposed transaction, and the corporation, having examined all the factors in the case, as they do now with regard to insurance, would indicate to the exporter whether or not they would be prepared to guarantee the deal. I think that covers the point which was raised. Was there a third question my hon. friend raised or have I covered all points?

Mr. Benidickson: There was another question with which the minister has not dealt. I outlined in quoting the president of the largest commercial bank in this country that banks find difficulty in lending for long periods of time and particularly in a period of tight money. I asked him what was more attractive and more likely to induce these banks to change their attitude in this respect by reason of this legislation which refers to a guarantee in contrast to an insurance coverage to the extent of 85 per cent in the event of possible loss to the original vendor in Canada under the existing legislation? What is more attractive in this legislation to a commercial bank to dissolve the objections I quoted Mr. Muir as outlining as reasons why the commercial banks are not interested in financing four or five year term loans for exporters?

Mr. Churchill: I think the answer to that is that the guarantee makes it more attractive and the fact that the corporation is empowered to buy back under certain circumstances with regard to these guaranteed loans. Therefore the chartered banks would consider that any doubts in their mind would be dispelled because of the possibility of selling to the corporation that loan they had made. That seems to me to give the attractiveness about which my hon. friend is somewhat worried and I believe it represents a slightly better condition than that which prevails at the present time.

Mr. Benidickson: It occurs to me that it would be only a very small bit better unless my original suggestion has some validity and that is that the new guarantee may take the original vendor completely off the hook. In other words, the government would assume 100 per cent liability in contrast to the previous insurance liability which was limited to a co-insurance in the relationship of 85 per cent government and 15 per cent to the original vendor.

Mr. Churchill: There is one matter that should be kept in mind. Although there is 100 per cent liability under the guarantee period that applies in instances where the purchaser has accepted the goods. Under the insurance arrangements a loss might be incurred or a transaction might break down before the goods have been accepted.

Mr. Benidickson: Has it some relationship to the down payment which I referred to in my remarks on second reading? Will they be subject to regulations? Will there be a protection in the matter of down payments just as I indicated was the situation in the United States where the maximum liability is really only 60 per cent in relation to the invoice price?

Mr. Churchill: The experience over the past has been that there has been a minimum of 20 to 25 per cent cash in hand before the goods are shipped.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister in his remarks has indicated the need for some assistance to exporters at this time because of the developing competition particularly in the fields of financing and credit for exports and everyone agrees with the need. The question now is that of getting the best possible bill to meet that need. Our criticism of the bill is directed to that purpose and does not apply to any question of the need for assistance to exporters.

When we were talking about the guarantees under the bill the minister indicated that the banks as a source of financing would be guaranteed payment. In his preparation of this bill has the minister had in mind any sources of financing other than the commercial banks?

Mr. Churchill: I was perhaps a little careless in my phraseology on that point. Throughout our discussions I intended to convey the thought that any lender is considered to be suitable as far as this proposed amendment is concerned.

Mr. McIlraith: The banks being allegedly short of funds for commercial loans now, they will become even shorter if they start buying long term government guaranteed discount paper. They are already in some difficulty because they hold so many government bonds of terms longer than those in which their funds are usually tied up. That is possibly one difficulty. However, I do not suppose there is too much point in stressing the difficulties we may foresee. However, I do not think the minister should assume that this provides an easy solution for all the problems in this field.

The minister came before the house last year with amending legislation to the Export Credits Insurance Act to increase the amount of liability under section 21 of the act from $100 million to $200 million. The effect of this new bill is to reduce the liability that can be available for insurance under that section. Could the minister enlighten us as to why, in the light of the remarks he made last year on the point, he now feels there is no need for the authority for insurance under that section for the increased amount of $200 million?

Mr. Churchill: I do not quite follow the hon. gentleman in his question. We still commence with the insurance principle and then follow that up with a guarantee. This will not take anything away from the activities of the corporation under section 21 as they have been carried out in the past.

Mr. McIlraith: As I understand it the insurance will have ended at the time the guarantee takes over, is that not correct?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, that is quite true. The insurance ends when the guarantee commences, but, vice versa, in some of these instances there would be no insurance unless we were prepared to guarantee.

Mr. McIlraith: What I am coming to is this. Dealing only with section 21 of the act, the minister is now authorized to insure under that section to the extent of $200 million of insurance contracts outstanding at any one time. The gross liability now being provided is only $200 million for both the insurance contracts and the guaranteed negotiable instruments. In other words, to the extent that you have guaranteed negotiable instruments you have reduced the amount available for insurance purposes under this section. When the guarantee operation comes into effect the insurance contract has terminated. If you use up $100 million for the guarantee on your negotiable instruments then you have only $100 million available for the insurance provision under section 21. If the minister's argument a year ago was correct and if we needed to increase the amount to $200 million, we are in effect now reducing the amount.

Mr. Churchill: I do not see the matter in quite that way.

Mr. McIlraith: That is the point I wish to have clarified.

Mr. Churchill: If the guarantee was not established, the insurance would continue. The one replaces the other. There is no change in the total sum. There is no reduction in the amount of money available for insurance. Let us consider a concrete example. Aircraft are being exported to another country under an insurance policy. As time elapses and the terms are suitable, the guarantee is applied rather than the insurance. That is the only difference. The amount of money is the same.

Mr. McIlraith: I think I have not succeeded in elucidating my point. Under the existing law, when exporters are not able to finance their exports or are having difficulty in doing so—or else we would not have had this legislation—we authorize the insurance of export credits up to the amount of $200 million. Now we are seeking to help the exporters still more to obtain contracts they cannot at present obtain because they cannot meet the long term credit financing arrangements given by competitors in other countries. We are therefore seeking to enlarge the export business by this measure. If we have provided for that additional business by way of guaranteeing long term credit or long term negotiable instruments, then surely that reduces the amount available for the export insurance features of the existing act.

Mr. Churchill: We looked at it in this way. We thought it would make it easier for the exporter to get the money required to finance the sale of his goods abroad. It is additional to the insurance factor which has been extremely helpful up to the present time. But this provision goes one step beyond that and is an inducement to the lender to give assistance to exporters.

Mr. McIlraith: It will undoubtedly assist the exporter. I have some hopes of the bill doing a good deal to help him. However, I still think that the net effect of it is to reduce the funds available for the insurance features of the act as it now exists. In any event, perhaps I could come at the point in another way. There may not be a need over the present limit under section 21 of the act. It may be that the amount authorized under that section is larger than was actually needed. Perhaps we can come at that point in another way. Would the minister give to me the total amount of insurance policies outstanding for general commodities, outstanding for capital goods policies and outstanding under section 21, if he has it available in that form, or in whatever form he has it available for the latest period?

Mr. Benidickson: Since the annual report.

Mr. Churchill: We will have the answers in just a minute. Under section 21 the total outstanding is $42,798,873. Yesterday two policies were issued in a total amount of $50 million, raising that total under section 21 to $92,798,873.

Mr. Benidickson: One of those policies was an aircraft policy, was it?

Mr. Churchill: Both were aircraft policies.

Mr. McIlraith: Were those aircraft policies additional to the aircraft policies covered by the orders in council of June 11, 1959 covering the purchases by the Flying Tiger Line, Inc., and Seaboard and Western Airlines, Inc. from Canadair Limited?

Mr. Churchill: The same ones as mentioned in those orders in council.

Mr. McIlraith: That means that there is only $108 million available for the additional insurance under section 21 and for the guaranteeing and buying of paper?

Mr. Churchill: That is right.

On clause 3—Board of directors.

Mr. McIlraith: The present set-up of directors under the present legislation is that in addition to the deputy minister of finance, the deputy minister of trade and commerce and the governor of the Bank of Canada, there shall be four other directors. The new legislation provides that the deputy minister of finance and the deputy minister of trade and commerce shall be directors and that there shall be five other directors. Those four other directors were all public servants; that is to say, they were either the president of the corporation or associate deputy minister of trade and commerce and so on. What I want to ask the minister is this. Does the minister contemplate replacing the governor of the Bank of Canada by a civil servant or does he propose to replace him by a director appointed from outside the public service of Canada?

Mr. Churchill: That matter has not been given consideration. My thought at the moment is that we would more than likely continue the present practice of having senior civil servants as members of the board of directors. The present chairman is Mr. John H. English, deputy minister of trade and commerce; Mr. K. W. Taylor, deputy minister of finance; Mr. L. C. Audette, chairman of the Canadian Maritime Commission; Mr. A. F. W. Plumptre, assistant deputy minister of finance; Mr. J. A. Roberts, associate deputy minister of trade and commerce; and Mr. H. T. Aitken, who is president and general manager. I think the vacancy would be filled from among experienced civil servants.

Mr. McIlraith: May I point out that at the very time the minister is authorizing the corporation to engage in wholly new operations which are by their nature commercial banking operations, he is removing from the board of directors the only banking authority we have on it. I would ask him to bear that point in mind. I realize that there would be no point in my going further in this matter. I express to him the hope that he would seek to acknowledge the need for experience in the commercial banking field on the board of directors.

Clause 4 agreed to.

On clause 5—Definitions.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to ask the minister about the buying and selling of instruments under clause 5. What does he contemplate as the extent to which the corporation will be expected to engage in the buying and selling of instruments?

Mr. Churchill: The privilege is there and it is a case of looking toward the future. The present thinking of the corporation is that we will not be buying, and there it rests. Experience will show whether or not that is a correct forecast.

Mr. McIlraith: Under the form of the bill the buying and selling of guaranteed instruments is in exactly the same position as the right to guarantee. I take it from what the minister has said today and from the evidence given before the banking and commerce committee in the other place that it is the intention of the minister that under the new legislation the corporation will be engaged primarily in the guaranteeing part of the operation as opposed to the buying part.

Mr. Churchill: That is quite correct. My hon. friend has summarized it very accurately.

Mr. McIlraith: There is one question here that I think should be clarified. It is interesting that the provision of the right to buy and sell this type of paper, for which there is great need, should be brought before the house by the government shortly after parliament has granted a charter to a private corporation by special act to engage in the buying and selling of this type of paper. If it is a fair question, I should like to ask the minister if at the time the bill was brought forward in the first instance he knew about the private legislation on this subject or had it been brought forward at that time?

Mr. Churchill: I was not aware that a privvate bill was coming forward when steps were taken leading up to the bill now before the house. As a matter of fact, this matter goes back quite some time. I raised this problem with the officials of the department early in the fall of 1957. The hon. member for Greenwood, Minister without Portfolio, spent a great deal of time working on the problem and consulting with experienced people in the business world. In the early conversations we had he expressed the hope to me that something would be done by private financial institutions or private individuals along the line we are now suggesting. Subsequently as the matter carried on month after month, I reached the conclusion and he concurred that there was no assurance that a corporation would be set up under private auspices and therefore we should go ahead with the proposal now before the committee. The direct answer to my hon. friend's question is that at the time we laid the foundation for this bill and commenced drafting it we were not aware that the other measure was going to come before the house.

Mr. McIlraith: I think the minister has dealt satisfactorily with the point that was troubling me and has made it quite clear that it is not the intention of the government to enter unduly into direct competition with the private corporation set up in this field. He has indicated that while technically he has the right to do so it is not what he contemplated in bringing the bill forward.

I wish to pursue one other point for a moment. The minister indicated that it was proposed to guarantee instruments of more than $250,000 in amount and two years in duration. I assume that the amount is set by regulation under the act and I would ask him to consider reducing it. My information is that there is a volume of business available in Canada for small manufacturers by way of increased exports and that these small manufacturers who do not have the financial resources who may need assistance in order to make a start in the export field.

I have in mind particularly export to the United States. These firms are so small in size that they just do not have the financial resources to enter into the export market. I think there is a field for expansion there which should be examined very carefully. I know that there has been practically no need for the insurance provisions of the act to be used for exports to the United States. I am aware of that, but it seems to me there is this other new field where there is a good possibility of expanding our exports and I would hope that as time goes on and experience is gained with this legislation the minister will bear that in mind and consider reducing the amount of $250,000 if the circumstances warrant.

Mr. Churchill: I appreciate the hon. member's interest in this matter and his very reasonable suggestion. It will be borne in mind. Up to the present time the experience of the corporation is that there has not been too much difficulty with amounts under the one I mentioned in the course of my remarks or in the case of terms less than two years. There has not been too much difficulty in getting the banks to assist and exporters to the United States can get credit insurance from private insurance corporations. Nevertheless, the enlargement of our exports to the United States is a matter of prime importance and the corporation will take note of these remarks today and if it is necessary to modify the suggestion I made I am sure it could be modified.

Mr. McIlraith: I have one more point in connection with the minister's reply. I know of one exporter to the United States who is paying a rate exceeding 13 per cent to discount insured export instruments. It is a very real and practical problem. If something can be done to get that class of exporter into the export business in a larger way it would be a very important step and guarantees under this legislation could be very helpful.

I have one other point I should like to raise. The very last part of the bill deals with the requirement for tabling orders in council made under sections 21 and 21A. As was pointed out by the minister, it provides that orders in council made while parliament is in session shall be laid before parliament during such session. In other words, orders in council passed at the commencement of a session need not be tabled until the last day in order to comply with the legislation. I am not asking for an amendment of that clause, but the minister rather neatly pointed up this difficulty for me some days ago when I asked for the orders in council in connection with the sale of grain to Poland. Would the minister consider having the practice adopted by the corporation of tabling these orders in council as soon after they are passed as is practicable?

Mr. Churchill: I think that might well be adopted as a practice by the corporation. There is no need for any delay in tabling them, and the information is important and quite valuable and is an indication of the extent of our export business.

Mr. Benidickson: I was interested, Mr. Chairman, in the remarks of the minister in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Ottawa West just a few minutes ago. The minister related some of the background preparation for this bill and referred to conversations he had or the assistance he had from the Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Greenwood, concerning the possibility of enlarging export trade and the relationship of the timing with the development of a private corporation doing some rediscounting in this field. I may say that after reading the speech delivered at the annual meeting of the Royal Bank, I think it was in 1956, by Mr. Muir, I drew to the attention of some senior officials of government his opinion as to the desirability of something of this nature. I have already indicated to the committee that I am rather sceptical that the commercial banks are likely to be very important primary lenders in this field, and I am concerned about the actual results we will shortly see flowing from this legislation if, in the opinion of the corporation and in accordance with the evidence officials gave before the banking and commerce committee of the Senate, they are really looking forward to being merely guarantors of the lending that is done by other sources.

My question is this: Is this new private corporation, which was incorporated at this session a lender that would find it possible to obtain guarantees under the terms of this legislation?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, that is quite right; it could be a lender and it could ask for a guarantee from export credits insurance.

CRIMINAL CODE

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-58, to amend the Criminal Code.

(Translation):

Mr. Raymond Eudes (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, this bill involves 37 variously significant amendments to the Criminal Code.

At this stage of our discussions, I shall be satisfied to comment, as briefly as possible, on amendments to the chapters of the Criminal Code under the headings "Offensive weapons" and "Offences tending to corrupt morals".

Section 5 of this bill amends section 82 of the Criminal Code, dealing with the possession of weapons, assimilating the imitation thereof to the genuine offensive weapon. That amendment will I am sure, receive unanimous endorsement in this house.

In recent years, more and more thefts have been committed by bandits who, in order to frighten or overpower their victims, used nothing more than an imitation firearm. This imitation weapon achieves the same result as would a real one. It is therefore logical to consider that the possession of an imitation weapon constitutes an offence identical to the possession of a real one. That is precisely the purpose of section 5 which, we hope, will help remedy a situation which, in the field of crime is becoming quite alarming.

As for sections 6, 7 and 8 of this bill, they amend sections 90, 91 and 94 in the same chapter of the Criminal Code and their purpose is to impose further restrictions on the use of firearms. Indeed the growing use of firearms is causing general anxiety.

In La Presse for April 21 last, Hon. Justice Wilfrid Lazure, president of the Queen's Bench Court, is quoted as saying:

There should be a law prohibiting the sale and use of revolvers in this country. During my 20 years on the bench, I have found, as everybody has, that 75 per cent of crimes are caused by firearms.

Prisoners at the bar state that they never had the intention of using their gun; yet they always do.

This solemn statement from so qualified an authority cannot fail to impress the legislator or the public.

A reporter from the Montreal Gazette wrote on June 1st:

(Text):

Police officers in a position to know estimate that upwards of 2,000 Montreal hoodlums are habitually armed with concealed weapons; and each one of them constitutes a threat to innocent bystanders, a fact proven by the fatal wounding of a young man in St. Henry last week. The identity of nearly all these hoodlums is known; but efforts to disarm them are made futile by the fact only minor penalties are called for in the law covering concealed weapons unless they are actually used in the commission of a crime, when the penalty is more severe. For each shooting incident which finds its way into a police report, there are several which are unreported, according to detectives who know of such shootings but who can't make a case on them because no one will talk. More teeth in the law covering concealed weapons would be most welcome to police, who could then make things tough for armed hoodlums, a thing they can't do under present laws.

(Translation):

Yet, that impressive number of firearms does not take into account thousands of others belonging to citizens of good repute.

Is it actually necessary that so many people should legally be in possession of a firearm? Those firearms which the law allows people to possess are too frequently, in fact, the cause of fatal accidents and deplorable crimes.

How many crimes would have been avoided if people who committed them had not been in possession, even legally, of a firearm?

How is it that, in spite of the minute precautions with which law-makers have surrounded the manufacture, sale, use and exchange of firearms, any self-respecting bandit manages to get one, and often several, of those dangerous objects?

Either the law is not stringent enough, or it is not adequately enforced.

The proposed amendments embodied in sections 6 and 7 of the bill are an improvement on the present legislation which will henceforth extend to persons who lend a firearm or are engaged in the business of repairing firearms.

Let us hope those amendments will help reduce the number of arms which, somehow come into the possession of people who should not have them.

One should not, however, overlook the necessity, for the sake of public safety, of a frequent review of the situation in that field as well as the enforcement of the law in all its rigour.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to make a few remarks on sections 11, 12 and 13 of bill C-58 amending the Criminal Code under the chapter entitled "Offences tending to corrupt morals".

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member would consider dealing with these specific items in committee? I appreciate the bill proposes a number of unrelated amendments and there is no general idea to discuss. If the hon. member wishes to group clauses together he may do so, but it seems to me we would have more orderly discussion of the amendments if the clauses were discussed as they are called in committee when there can be debate on each particular item as it comes up.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I draw your attention to the fact that the hon. member has been selected to be the spokesman for the opposition, and it did appear to us at the time that if he made a statement on the first clause the minister would not disagree with that course, because it will save a great deal of time later on.

Mr. Speaker: I am not objecting to the course followed. I think the hon. member is endeavouring to deal with the bill as it should be dealt with on second reading, I simply asked the hon. member if he might deal with it the other way.

Mr. Fulton: May I just say a word, Mr. Speaker? I particularly do not want to appear discourteous to hon. members, in that I have not made a statement on second reading. I did not do it for the very reason Your Honour mentioned, namely because it seems impossible to isolate the principle of this bill to be debated on second reading because it consists of a number of detailed amendments to various sections of the Criminal Code. I wanted to make that explanation to let the house know that that is the reason why I did not make a statement.

However, having said that, I have no objection at all if any hon. member wishes to discuss matters general on clause 1; but I would ask hon. members to endeavour not to get into discussion on details because I think we can wait until we discuss specific clauses.

Mr. Eudes: May I continue in a general way, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Yes.

(Translation):

Mr. Eudes: In the last ten years especially, the public has been aroused by the ravages caused, at all population levels, by obscenity.

Groups of investigators and workers have cropped up all over the world to fight literature, entertainment shows, newspapers, in short all vehicles of human thought which, under the pretext of educating or entertaining, do in fact corrupt or deprave society. However, these problems raised by obscenity are nothing new.

For centuries, every government, and particularly Christian governments, have been concerned with this problem and have tried to cope with it. Recently, in 1951, the international union for the protection of public morality was established in Paris. This union, which now includes 74 organizations from 17 different countries, steadily strives to coordinate efforts made in the various countries to protect public morality.

Its first international convention, held at Cologne in May 1955, was attended by 250 delegates from all parts of the world, who studied the problem of children and young people against the background of public immorality.

The second convention, which dealt with "public opinion and public morality", was held last July at Freiburg, in Switzerland.

It will be seen that everywhere public opinion is concerned with the serious problems raised by obscenity and immorality.

Our own responsibility, as lawmakers, is mainly to seek more efficient legislation to prevent and stop the circulation of obscene matter. Legislation, indeed, is necessary to insure the preservation of morality.

It would, however, be foolish to assume that the state can check immorality through legislation alone.

This objective can be reached only with the active co-operation of individuals. Insuring an atmosphere of healthy morality within the community is indeed a primary responsibility of the individual, through the priority of natural law. If every individual watched his own morals, the problem of obscenity would not arise.

For several years in Canada, a commendable campaign has been going on, in every section of the community and in every part of the country, to increase the efficiency of present legislation in the field of obscenity.

The lack of a clear definition of the word "obscene" in our legislation is an obstacle to legal action, because decisions are thus left to the often hesitant interpretation of a court or jury.

However, it is quite a task to work out a legal definition of the term obscenity.

Obscenity is that which offends modesty; and modesty is a feeling of honest shame, caused by apprehension of what can cause offence to sexual decency.

How can we derive from these two concepts a definition of obscenity which would be all at once precise, useful and practical for judges, juries and law enforcement officers?

Then, too, the subjective and relative character inherent in the concept of obscenity makes the definition extremely difficult. What one person considers as obscene might not seem so to someone else. To determine the obscenity of a certain production, for instance, one must examine the character, the education, the background and experience of the person who is reached by it. Thus do opinions about the obscenity of a certain thing vary from one court to the other, from one country to another.

Then too, one must guard against giving of the word obscene a definition so comprehensive that it would stifle the creation and diffusion of artistic production.

Private Bills

In spite of the technical difficulty of that definition of obscenity, legislators in general have striven to enact the best possible legislation to fight obscenity and check immorality.

A quick survey of legislation in other countries will enlighten us on the meaning they ascribe to the word obscene and the importance they attach to problems arising out of obscenity.

Since 1868, in England, the courts have faithfully abided in their judgments relating to trials on charges of obscenity, by the standard established by Judge Cockburn in the famous case of The Queen v. Hicklin, and I quote:

> The matter alleged obscene must tend to deprave and corrupt those whose mind is amenable to such immoral influences and into whose hands such a publication may fall.

That criterion makes it possible to condemn a publication without considering it as a whole, so long as a single passage of that publication tends to deprave and corrupt. That criterion requires—in legal parlance—as an essential element of the offence of obscenity, the tendency to deprave and corrupt.

Some moralists have had no hesitation in calling it obsolete, antisocial and ill founded. Indeed, how many timeless masterpieces born of the human mind, and expressing man's position and problems in relation to the absolute, would escape condemnation if that criterion were applied to the letter?

Shakespeare and Racine, for instance, and the Bible itself, would be cast aside.

Interest in this matter has created a reaction among English lawmakers. On November 18, 1958 after three years of unsuccessful attempts, the member for Birmingham, Stechford, Mr. Roy Jenkins, introduced in the House of Commons, in London:

(Text):

> A Bill to amend the law relating to the publication of obsene matter; to provide for the protection of literature; and to strengthen the law concerning pornography.

Mr. Speaker: Will this be a convenient place for the hon. member to break his address?

Mr. Eudes: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private and public bills, the former having precedence, pursuant to section 3 of standing order 15.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, filling in this afternoon for the hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton), I understand that one member who sponsors item No. 74 on the order paper, the second reading of Bill S-28, wishes to join the company who are going to greet Her Majesty in a short while, and I wonder if with the unanimous consent of the house that item could be called first.

Mr. Speaker: The suggestion is that item No. 74 be taken ahead of all others?

Mr. McCleave: Yes, Your Honour. The other items are items for committee.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house agreeable to the suggested course?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

STANDARD TRUST COMPANY

Mr. B. C. Thompson (Northumberland) moved the second reading of Bill S-28 to incorporate Standard Trust Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for their indulgence and I wish to explain briefly the objects and effects of this bill. The bill is drafted along the normal lines described in the Trust Companies Act and the object is to incorporate those persons who are named in clause 1 as a corporation under the name of the Standard Trust Company to carry on the business of a trust company.

All the petitioners have had extensive business experience and are, in my view, well qualified to direct and manage a company of this kind. I might briefly refer to the names and occupations of each petitioner for the benefit of the house. First, is Mr. Stephen B. Roman, president of a number of mining companies which own and operate properties in the province of Ontario. He resides on a large farm adjacent to Unionville, Ontario. Bertram E. Willoughby, the second sponsor, resides in Toronto. He is a well known real estate agent in that city, and is an officer and director of a number of mining companies. Wilbur C. Cochrane also resides at Toronto. He is president of Cochrane Dunlop Hardware Company Limited, a well known wholesale hardware firm doing business throughout Ontario, as well as being a director of a number of companies. Harry A. Willis is a solicitor residing at Belfountain, Ontario. He carries on his law practice in the city of Toronto, and is a senior member of the well known legal firm of Willis and Dingwall. He is a member of the board of governors of McMaster University and a director of a number of companies doing business in Ontario. Murray Axmith is an executive and a chartered accountant, and a director and officer of a number of companies in Ontario; he resides in the township of Etobicoke. Wesley G. Thompson is a large farmer and the owner and operator of a feed mill in western Ontario. He is a former member of the legislative assembly of the province of Ontario, and for a period of three years served as minister of lands and forests for the province of Ontario. Mr. Thompson resides at Ridgetown in south western Ontario. George G. Rodanz resides at Stouffville, Ontario. He is a large farmer and is a director of the royal agricultural winter fair and the Canadian national exhibition, as well as being past president of the Ontario hereford association. John Bull, the last named sponsor is a large farmer and breeder of purebred Jersey cattle. He resides at Brampton, Ontario.

Hon. members will note that it is provided in clause 3 that the capital stock of the company shall be $3 million which may be increased to $5 million. In clause 4 it is provided that $500,000 must be subscribed before the provisional directors can call a general meeting of shareholders for the purpose of organizing the company. Clause 5 provides that the company shall not commence business until at least $1 million of the capital stock has been subscribed, and at least $1 million paid thereon. These provisions all come well within the terms of the Trust Companies Act.

I understand that the name "Standard Trust Company" is satisfactory to the officials of the federal department of insurance and also to the officials of the Department of the Secretary of State but should it occur at any stage of the proceedings that the name does not meet with the approval of those concerned, the petitioners are willing to have the name changed. In closing, I might add that it is provided in clause 7 of the bill that the company shall have all the powers, privileges and immunities and shall be subject to all the limitations, liabilities and provisions conferred by the Trust Companies Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

THE FREE METHODIST CHURCH IN CANADA

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax) (for Mr. Morton) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. S-27 to incorporate the Free Methodist Church in Canada.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. MacEwan in the chair.

On clause 1—Merger and Incorporation.

Mr. McCleave: Again, if I may be allowed a brief word of comment, I am substituting for another member who has been in Toronto on the occasion of the visit of Her Majesty the Queen. I have some familiarity with the legal aspect of this bill in the sense that it came before the committee over which I have the honour to preside as chairman and at that time we had the advantage of the appearance before us of the reverend gentlemen representing the two churches involved in this merger, as well as parliamentary counsel. Perhaps it would be of interest to the committee if I noted very briefly that the terms set forth in this bill are similar to those in the bill which incorporated the United Church of Canada over a quarter of a century ago which have been used as a precedent whenever two large congregations or two churches with a large number of members are merged into one.

The interesting provisions in the bill are those which provide for the protection of certain congregations which may not wish to go along with the union. We went very carefully in committee into this question of the protection of any dissentients, and that is the point I wanted to mention to the committee this afternoon.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I have a reason for asking that separate consideration be given to this particular group of divorce bills which appears at page 12 of the routine proceedings and orders of the day. Hon. members who read the numbers of the bills will see that they go all the way from No. 19 to No. 291. Some time ago on the debate on divorce bills I had occasion to mention that a dozen or so bills were being held back by the committee for special consideration. Perhaps the committee may be interested at this time in having a special report as to why this unusual course was adopted.

The other day, I think for the first time in the memory of anyone who is in parliament in the chamber at either this end or the other end of the building, there was a joint meeting of committee members who are charged with the difficult task of looking after the divorce petitions which come before parliament. While this meeting was an informal one in the sense that it was held without the sanction of either chamber it was none the less a highly important one in my opinion and I think perhaps hon. members of this committee will agree with me when I relate to them the kind of discussion we held and the results that were achieved.

So that I may be perfectly in order, Mr. Chairman, I can assure you that what we did discuss was based in each case on points that arose during consideration of the cases that are now being considered by the committee. Unless I am specifically asked to I should not like to single out these special cases by name but I do promise and assure you, sir, that I will not deviate from the practice of dealing strictly with points that arose in the consideration of bills that are on the order paper this afternoon.

It was the purpose of the meeting to have both groups get to know each other better and to assist in appreciating the problems that arise in the first instance at trial, and of course the trials for the most part are conducted by the divorce committee of the other place. A secondary purpose was to give hon. gentlemen of that committee from the other place some appreciation of the problems that we as members of parliament have when we read the record of proceedings over there and have to make our own decision as to whether or not to grant divorce to the petitioners.

In some of these cases the problem that confronts us could be placed under the general category of an incomplete record. That is to say that some of our members felt there were not enough questions and answers on the record of proceedings of the other place to give us a complete story so that we would be justified in recommending that a divorce be granted. For example, in five or six of the cases that are before us this afternoon hon. members felt that the petitioners had not specifically negatived the three C's in divorce practice; that is, collusion, condonation and connivance. This particular groups of cases was discussed with hon. gentlemen of the other place. We attempted to understand their problems in conducting the trial. They have a great number of them during the course of the year. They could see our point that if the records are incomplete it renders it difficult to reach a judicial decision on our part at this end of the hallway.

In another case we considered, the point of major concern was that of the inference that is to be drawn when certain parties are found together. The case that gave the committee of this house the most concern involved a man who appeared to be so intoxicated that he hardly knew what he was doing and there were grave doubts that he could do anything at all. We discussed the question of the inference that could be drawn from finding a man in such a condition even though he was found in the compromising position of being with a woman in a hotel room. There was a useful discussion on the law concerning the inference that is to be drawn from evidence.

Another point brought before hon. gentlemen of the other place on which we had the advantage of an exchange of views concerned the burden of evidence that must be produced by a party seeking relief in parliament from a marriage that has broken up. This particular case involved two parties where a husband and the wife of another man had misconducted themselves in a motel. About the only evidence that they had done so came from the mouths of these parties themselves. Our committee was concerned that there was no independent evidence to lend a little more veracity to their statement. The question of obtaining independent evidence in some of these cases was explored.

Another point we discussed with hon. gentlemen of the other place concerned the legal definition of connivance. One case involved a husband who had watched his wife enter a cabin by the beach with another man and while under ordinary circumstances this would undoubtedly constitute some form of connivance it was pointed out that here the husband had some ground for suspecting his wife over previous months and that in effect he was merely closing the trap that brought him the final evidence he needed for his divorce.

One very basic point that was raised in the discussions, and hon. gentlemen of the other place have agreed to consider it in examining their divorce rules, was the fact of domicile. As I pointed out some time ago, Mr. Chairman, years ago a person could not come before parliament by private petition if he or she had a remedy in some other way. If you construe this in reference to divorce practice a person should not come before parliament and burden us with his problems if there is a remedy available in the provincial courts. As everybody knows there are only two provinces where such a remedy is not available in the courts and these are the provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland. It is interesting to point out that 342 of the 345 cases that came before us, properly came before us. Once in a while we encounter a case where it appears that the action should have been brought in Ontario or New Brunswick—those are the two provinces bordering on Quebec—or some other province where the husband might have acquired legal domicile. These cases give us a great deal of concern. We thought that the divorce committee of the other place might have relaxed the gate somewhat and let in some of the doubtful cases but we were informed that their practice is to look at the petition and if a doubt about domicile is raised they make it a rule to suggest to the party that he proceed in a provincial court.

This is done before the party expends the sum of money that is necessary for a parliamentary divorce which, as hon. members know, involves the filing of $200 for the privilege of appearing in parliament and also involves other expenses ranging upwards of $1,000 for the employing of lawyers and detectives. As I say, some of these cases—two of them, in fact—concerned the point of domicile. It was the first time that our committee had been aware of that particular practice that was carried out by the divorce committee in the other place to see that there was a proper screening. As a result, we came away a great deal happier on that point alone.

Finally, there are two points I wish to mention. Several times during the year we have had difficulty when we found out that there were prior legal proceedings which affected the marriage but which were not disclosed to parliament either in the petition or in the evidence that was taken in the other place. In some provinces it is the practice to require that such information be set forth in the petition. In other provinces it is apparently not the practice to do so. After considerable discussion the hon. gentlemen on the committee of the other place agreed that they would look into this matter and possibly amend the divorce rules so that the parties in Quebec would be perfectly sure of what they were required to disclose in bringing their petitions before parliament.

The final case in point concerned a case which was contested in the Senate but which was not contested on our side, in which there was some evidence by the wife that she had been beguiled into an affair with the co-respondent on the suggestion of the husband, that is that the wife had taken directions from her husband to go out and commit an offence which in effect was adultery. This ordinarily would not have given the committee concern because the senators in the other place had heard the evidence and had made a finding after listening to the words of the wife and weighing all the evidence. But we were concerned and worried about this case because a child was involved. We therefore took the rather unusual course of simply holding up discussion in our committee until we could talk to the gentlemen of the other place who had seen the witnesses and had observed the demeanour, mien and conduct of the parties. We were reassured by them that they had made their finding only after the most anxious considerations and that they truly believed that the woman was telling a put-up story in making the defence that she made. With that information the committee was able to reach a decision.

To sum the matter up briefly, we went over a great number of points that had bothered us during the past two years during which I and other members of the committee have been seized of this rather difficult bit of business. We have taken up some points with these people and they have found out our problems and we have found out their problems. I think certain changes will be made in the rules of the other place so that in this business, dismal as it is—because it must come before parliament and cannot go elsewhere—the practice will be made a better practice.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT REQUIRING RETURNS SHOWING INCOME OF POLITICAL PARTIES

The house resumed, from Friday, March 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. Howard for the second reading of Bill No. C-17, to amend the Canada Elections Act (election expenses).

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, in resuming debate on this bill I should like to make the point that from a personal point of view I have gone into the question of election expenses in considerable detail and I feel that this bill would serve a useful purpose. One of the things that rather shocks one in examining a present list of expenses, as they are set out in the returns made to the chief returning officer, is the tremendous variation in the totals of election expenses. The variations are so great that one cannot doubt that many of the returns are not a completely true picture of the election expenses. I can think of certain constituencies where one can only laugh at the returns that are given in so far as election expense totals are concerned. If this aspect of the election expenses is laughable,—as I think most hon. members will admit that it is—I think it is perhaps the most honest part of election expenses and election campaigns. The real intent of this bill is to get at the much larger expenses that are undertaken by the parties during the campaign, especially the expenses of the national organizations. I totalled all the expenses returned by the Conservative candidates and if you can believe the returns, which I suggest you cannot—I do not mean that as a reflection on the Conservative candidates; it is a reflection on all candidates—the total for Conservative candidates is pretty close to $3 million. In the last campaign the Liberal candidates had less money and their total was around $2 million. Those martyrs who fought for the C.C.F. declared total expenses of approximately $600,000.

I must confess I was disappointed that so many candidates, including C.C.F. candidates, had not submitted election expense returns. I think this is another indication of the fact that they do not take the whole matter of election expenses seriously enough. The hon. member who introduced the bill had the intention of both the British Columbia legislation and the British legislation in mind where there are very definite limits, especially in Great Britain, on the amount of money that candidates and organizations can spend, and one gathers from the British press that there are no breaches, that this is honoured by the parties concerned.

It seems to me that one of the things that a true declaration of election expenses would reveal would be the basis of support of the political parties. I have been intrigued that several of our newspapers have become very concerned over the fact that no one really knows what are the sources of party funds. It was interesting that in the last Ontario provincial election Premier Frost, when queried on this point, took the same stand as Right Hon. Mackenzie King took years ago, that after all this was not something in which he had any interest. I believe Mr. Frost's words were that he, in relation to the raising of money to support his party, was something like a clergyman in a church. One point I felt like putting before Mr. Frost and which I think should have been put to Mackenzie King is that in a church they do pass the plate and usually at the end of the year they give an indication of where the money comes from.

Recently several newspapers, including that majestic morning paper in Toronto, have become concerned about the fact that our political parties, primarily the Conservative and Liberal parties from their point of view, do not have a broad enough financial base, and they have been campaigning for the Conservative and Liberal parties to set about securing for themselves a genuine base in terms of money in their membership and not to count upon the aid of large corporations which, as these papers have pointed out, could properly be considered as the kind of influence or commitment that it is not good to have in a democracy. We all observed with a great deal of humour, I think, except perhaps some of those involved, the situation of the Liberal party in the last provincial election in Ontario as to expenses when it was revealed that they were broke. They made much out of this fact saying that it was an indication that they were really a grass roots party because the corporations were no longer coming through and backing them.

If a political party must count upon secret donations of various kinds I think the thought will always remain in the minds of many people that there are possibilities of undue influence. I should like to say that in checking over all the expenses turned in in the last federal election I was much impressed with the returns from the province of British Columbia where there are certainly many indications not only from the totals of expenses but from the collection lists turned in by the candidates of all parties that they do try to treat the matter pretty fairly. One member from Vancouver who is in the chamber looked over these returns with me and I think we both agreed that there was a much greater tendency toward honesty in the reporting of such things in British Columbia. I think this sort of thing should permeate the whole political structure of Canada in every province.

I know I went into one constituency in Ontario and pointed out to some people at a public meeting that the elected member of parliament from that constituency, a very famous one by the way, had only declared total expenses amounting to $3,400. That caused the best laugh I have ever drawn at any political meeting. They were in an uproar at the very idea of this man ever carrying on a campaign for the meagre sum of $3,400.

This is another indication of the general disrepute in which politicians and political parties tend to place themselves as long as they do not and are not prepared to give a clear and honest accounting of their election expenses and the sources of their funds. It is for that reason I should like to suggest to hon. members that they could well support this bill. Certainly it is one that could stand reference to the standing committee which is considering this act and planning to consider it in the future.

I certainly believe too that we should have a further expression of views by other members to indicate whether they agree with this idea. The question of putting more morality or, let us say, more honesty into political campaigning revolves to quite an extent around the whole question of money. There are many myths abroad in the land about where the money comes from and why people donate money, and I think this would tend to clear them up.

I would particularly like to point out to my Conservative friends that, with the volume of support they have enjoyed in the past two elections, they should have no fears or hesitation about their ability both to raise the money to fight a campaign without keeping the sources secret and also to keep within the limitations of that money and to account for the spending of it honestly. In northwestern Ontario I have never heard any serious accusations flying back and forth between the parties about election money being used in a dishonest way. I wish I could say the same for other parts of the country. Yet at the same time I would hesitate to speak about other parts of the country. I might draw to the attention of some hon. members of the house who may not have noticed it that in 1956 two gentlemen of the clergy in Quebec came forward with a pamphlet that was very widely reprinted which indicated that in the province of Quebec there was certain electoral corruption and one manifestation of this electoral corruption was the use of election funds to bribe people to vote in a certain way and to indulge in that practice that I do not quite understand—

Mr. Ricard: What about St. Paul's riding?

Mr. Fisher: These gentlemen are raising issues on which I am not informed.

Mr. Ricard: Do not speak about them then.

Mr. Fisher: I am just referring to the fact that two worthy gentlemen of the clergy raised this matter, indicating that it was a serious problem in another part of the country. I certainly would not want to interpret what they said but I do feel that the very fact that they said it and that it has caused considerable discussion in that part of the country is a very good reason for members of the house to give serious consideration to this bill.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my first reaction is to refute the suggestion made on the floor of the house by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher). As a member of the house I do not like the aspersions he has cast on the part of the country from which I come. I do not feel that political morality in the province I happen to represent is in general any worse or better than in the rest of the country.

Mr. Fisher: On a point of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Grafftey: I remind the hon. member for Port Arthur that I have the floor.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order. I would ask both gentlemen to resume their seats. The hon. member for Port Arthur is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fisher: I did not, Mr. Speaker, accuse anybody or make any particular charges. I referred to the issues that had been raised by two other hon. gentlemen, and I certainly feel the hon. gentleman should recall his words charging me with casting these aspersions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): I think the matter that the hon. gentlemen are discussing is more a matter of debate. I do not believe the words used by the hon. member are serious enough to justify the Chair requesting him to withdraw those words. They were strong words, perhaps, but not of the kind I feel the Chair should ask for withdrawal.

Mr. Grafftey: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Before entering into the merits of this particular bill I want to make quite clear the stand I should take, according to my point of view, after a remark of that nature.

Before, as I say, dealing with the merits of this particular bill I feel we should, once more, read the explanatory note. It reads:

> The purpose of this bill is to provide that the central committee of political parties in Canada shall be required to file a return with the chief electoral officer showing the source—

I underline that word "source".

> —and amounts of campaign fund contributions and to provide that such returns shall be laid before parliament.

I can only say, Mr. Speaker, that this is the second time within the space of approximately a week that hon. members have had the opportunity of debating legislation introduced by members opposite concerning our electoral system. I should like at this time to make exactly the same remark as I made during last week's debate on absentee voting, namely that we are dealing with a very important aspect of our political life, our electoral laws. I feel that since we are doing that and since this particular matter relates in general to our electoral laws the matter should be taken seriously by all hon. members of the house. As I said before, and as I repeat now, our electoral laws—I hope I do not say this with too much self-satisfaction—within our parliamentary system are second to none within the western world.

I was very interested in noting that the hon. member for Port Arthur mentioned morality in discussing this particular bill, because I feel that is one thing which lies at the basis of this whole discussion. Often in this federal parliament we legislate on criminal law as such; often, Mr. Speaker, we legislate on what we might term administrative law; often I doubt the ability of a central, federal House of Commons to legislate on those matters which we might call morality per se. It is at this point I fundamentally differ with members of the C.C.F. party. I feel that every law involving morality should have a sanction, and if there is a sanction for this particular piece of legislation, I happen to think it only exists in their cynicism, in their forebodings and in their imagination.

The simple question I ask myself, as perhaps many other members do, is this: Why introduce this legislation? What has gone wrong in the past in so far as election expenses are concerned, in particular or in general, that they feel this legislation would rectify? Oh, we have heard inferences from this self-styled quasi-intellectual from Port Arthur, but not one particular complaint or general complaint has been made to give cause for the introduction of this legislation. I say it is typical of hon. members opposite that they try to see the worst in human nature. They look down at what they feel is the low estate of man, while I feel that our party, as well as many other parties in this house, have a little more faith in human nature. I put forward very generally, therefore, the very brief argument that on matters of semi-morality it is very difficult to legislate, especially after hearing the remarks of hon. members opposite and I, for one, fail to see any particular sanction for such a law.

I can say this right now. I well remember during the last session of this house when the hon. member for Port Arthur was discussing the radio bill he said, in a holier than thou spirit, that the C.C.F. party was going into the next election with increased money muscles. We all know that they intend, or they want, to get this money by deducting union dues from the pockets of labourers who never had, or do or will support their movement, but at the same time this is the whole concept to which they are referring in this debate.

The hon. member who has just spoken stated that in the United Kingdom and in many of the provinces election expenses are limited. The fact is that such is not the case in Canada. Speaking for myself, Mr. Speaker, and I believe I can speak for many hon. members in this house, I appoint an agent to conduct my election campaign and look after election expenses. Therefore, unlike the hon. member for Port Arthur, I am relatively ignorant, as members of parliament should be, concerning my election expenses because agents are appointed, as we all know, in each and every constituency to handle that very matter. However, I believe that people all across the country realize, as do companies, that elections do cost money. The Liberals, in their sour grapes attitude not so long ago, criticized our very efficient advertising during the last two elections. I, for one, have no apologies to make about that very good advertising put forward by the Progressive Conservative party. We promised to take our message to the people, to bring government back to the people, and we did that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): I point out to the hon. member that the principle of the bill involves the public filing of election expenses and campaign fund contributions.

Mr. Grafftey: I realize that, Your Honour, but I do feel the principle of the bill involves indirectly what members opposite choose to call aspects of morality, and I feel I have to draw on this background material in order to come to the point. I realize that election donations, per se, given by companies are not deductible for taxation purposes as are bona fide charitable donations, and the donor of a charitable donation is allowed to remain anonymous. I believe we could apply the same standard of public morality to those individuals who want to give to political parties. I can say, that if I were able or I took the trouble to look at the list of people who made donations in my own constituency I would find that they were not people who had any axe to grind. They were people who donated to our party because they felt it was the best party in the interests of the nation and they gave that money with no strings attached.

So I say to hon. members opposite, with all the inferences they have drawn from a bill of this nature, what is to be gained? What is the purpose of the bill? I sound as if I am going round and round the point, but that is the point they brought up by inference, that they are putting this legislation on the floor of the house because of a moral consideration. But they hedge around this question. There are some people who unashamedly realize that elections cost a lot of money and they give to both parties. They are public spirited people who are realistic and realize in this day and age, with a small population and lengthy communications from coast to coast, that television, direct mail, motor transport, loud speakers and all these things which I do not need to repeat because all hon. members know they cost a lot of money. Certain people realize this and choose in the interest of their country and their party to donate. I fail to understand why hon. members opposite wish to attach what I call so many moral connotations to this legislation.

This is not a peculiar reaction, or perhaps I should say action, on the part of the C.C.F. party. I can only say that if this is the reason they are proposing this legislation, I am sorry they have this attitude, because if ever—and I underline "if ever"—they get all the union dues they wish to get from unwilling labour I hope they do not think labour's attitude is a narrow one because it is not, because the labour attitude I have always run up against is one which recognizes the national interest as well as labour's interest. But you would never know that by listening to hon. members opposite.

I also heard, both in the corridors and outside this house, that the C.C.F. are most interested in this bill. If they are that interested, Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but wonder why not one of them is in the house at the present time. At any rate, I commend them for the bill they brought before this house last week. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I cannot say the same about either the draftsmanship or the spirit of the particular piece of legislation which we are considering at this present time.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this bill I find myself in a certain amount of sympathy with both previous speakers. When the mover of this bill in his opening statement made the statement, that the publishing of the funds of political parties would make known the elements of society, if any, which are attempting to subvert political parties, I think he did himself and the bill an injustice. We all know that we require funds to operate political parties. We know also that the party system is the heart and core of our parliamentary system, and if it were not for the fact that public spirited companies and individuals did contribute funds, political parties would waste away.

On the other hand, there is a certain amount of sympathy for those with limited campaign funds opposing a candidate with a tremendous amount of money for campaigning purposes. I was interested in what the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) said when the bill was debated last time, when he pointed out that in the United Kingdom expenditures are limited to so much per voter in each riding plus a flat sum allowed for the national campaign. It seems to me that that is aiming at the essence of the problem. It is some sort of yardstick which determines the amount of money that a candidate or a party should spend on a campaign.

As far as the bill itself is concerned, I think it would have been on much better ground if it had concentrated on that philosophy of control of expenses rather than what has been put in the bill, because I believe the bill is unworkable. We all know that political parties have staffs who operate all year, not just during election times, and undoubtedly political parties are gathering funds all the time because they have these continuing expenses. One point which gives me the most difficulty, I think, is to know who contributes funds to political parties. I know in my own election campaign that at the conclusion of voting day I was not even allowed to buy coffee for my workers. My agent said that treating was not allowed under the elections act. Personally, I do not want to know who contributes to my election campaign. I think if one does know then perhaps involuntarily one feels under an obligation. I think that secrecy in this matter is to be desired. I think also that control is to be desired as well in the amount of funds which can be expended. I think the bill itself is not a moral bill but in effect an immoral bill in that respect.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): The hour for private public bills having expired, the house will now revert to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fulton for the second reading of Bill No. C-58, to amend the Criminal Code.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8.05 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): The hon. member for Port Arthur—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. member who was speaking when the house adjourned at five o'clock is on his way down to the chamber. Could the hon. member for Port Arthur defer for a moment or two?

Mr. Fisher: Certainly.

(Translation):

Mr. Raymond Eudes (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) for letting me have the floor.

When the house suspended the consideration of Bill C-58 at five o'clock, I was referring to a piece of legislation that was introduced in the House of Commons in London, on November 18, 1958, by Mr. Roy Jenkins, the member for Birmingham, Stechford. This bill received third reading on April 24, 1959.

The first section of this bill defines obscenity as follows:

(Text):

For the purposes of this act an article shall be deemed to be obscene if its effect is, if taken as a whole, such as to tend to deprave and corrupt persons who are likely, having regard to all relevant circumstances, to read, see or hear the matter contained or embodied in it.

(Translation):

The definition of obscenity as contained in this new act requires, as opposed to the Cockburn criterion, that in order to be considered obscene a publication must be considered as a whole.

This definition does however maintain as the essential element of the the offence, the tendency to deprave and to corrupt.

In the United States, for more than half a century, the courts have relied on the Cockburn criterion to decide upon the obscenity of a publication.

Numerous studies on this matter have been published by jurists, moralists, theologians, often criticizing the narrow-mindedness upon which the Cockburn criterion is based.

In 1934, in the case initiated by the United States government concerning a book entitled "Ulysses" Judge Hand said in his decision:

Are not obscene publications—

(Text):

—where the presentation when viewed objectively is sincere and the erotic matter is not introduced to promote lust and does not furnish the dominant note in the publication. The question in each case is whether the publication, taken as a whole, has a libidinous effect.

(Translation):

American courts, in their decisions on obscenity trials, are now guided by this Hand formula, more liberal in its outlook and more in keeping with the concept of individual freedom than the Cockburn criterion.

Let us bear in mind that in the Hand formula there are two essential requirements for a publication to be labelled as obscene: the consideration of the work as a whole, and the libidinous impulses it arouses.

The New Hampshire State has given this definition of obscenity:

> Whatever tends, in its main theme or a large part of it, to impair, corrupt or deprave the moral behaviour of any person who sees it or reads it.

In France are considered as obscene publications of any kind involving a hazard for public morality on account of their obscene, indecent, lewd, licentious, pornographic character or involving detailed recitals of real or imaginary crimes, horror stories where there is a prevalence of sadistic cruelty and sexual perversion.

That definition widens the field of matter that may be considered obscene and also contains two essential elements: the character of the publication and the harm that it might do to public morals.

In Italy, publications which offend the modesty, reserve and restraint which must stand at the basis of sexual relations and publications relating lewd actions or sexual relations in terms such as to provoke excitement or emotion in people lacking modesty and disgust in others.

Before ruling any publication obscene, the Italian court also considers the author's intent.

The Italian concept has the advantage of considering the subjective character of obscenity.

This brief study shows the interest that legislators and lawyers in every country attach to that problem and also reveal how difficult it is to come to a clear definition of the term "obscenity".

That clear definition does not exist in our Criminal Code.

Section 150 which deals with the matter contains a single definition, in subsection 7, that of the term "crime comic", a definition which seems to have remained a dead letter, for never have we seen as many stories of crime, in newspapers and everywhere in our cities, as there are now.

I would suggest that this definition be amended so as to include crime films. How many of the films shown in cinemas and on T.V. are nothing but the glorification of crime, filling our young people with the ambition to become, some day, that strong man who despises established law and imposes his own rules at the point of a gun. How many are the young criminals today who owe their objectionable calling to those films which should be banished.

On the whole, section 150 does not give any intrinsic definition of the term "obscenity". It merely lists actions which the law considers offences tending to corrupt morals.

The amendment proposed in section 11 of bill C-58, suggests a definition of the word "obscene" by adding an 8th subsection to section 150, worded as follows:

> For the purposes of this act, any publication a dominant characteristic of which is the undue exploitation of sex, or of sex and any one or more of the following subjects, namely, crime, horror, cruelty and violence, shall be deemed to be obscene."

As a result of the words "dominant characteristic", that definition is at variance with the Cockburn criterion.

Henceforth, to be deemed obscene, the publication will have to be judged as a whole. Obscenity in an isolated passage of a publication will no longer be sufficient to describe it as obscene.

That definition is therefore closer to the Hand formula.

So as to assess it better, let us anticipate its effects. It will probably enlarge the field of obscenity.

What will its effects be, however, if it is strictly applied?

The summary survey I made earlier of relevant legislation in a few other countries which, no less than ourselves, have been concerned with this problem, shows that in order to determine the obscenity of a publication, the examination must bear both on its character and on its possible effects.

The definition now being submitted to us does consider the nature of the publication as a whole, but completely disregards its effects.

So far, however, jurisprudence established by our courts has always required, for a publication to be deemed obscene, that it be such as to corrupt or deprave morals. Yet the definition contained in section 11 completely ignores that requirement. Is this a practical and desirable omission? Time and experience will decide.

From now on, it will be enough for a publication to be considered obscene, that its dominant characteristic be the undue exploitation of sexual matters, regardless of whether the publication might deprave or corrupt a person considered as normal. That definition would bar—as an instance that comes readily to my mind—Racine's immortal masterpiece: "Britannicus".

Let us consider now the difficulties of interpretation which will follow upon that definition. Just how can the predominant characteristic of a work be determined?

Where could we draw the line between what is undue exploitation of sexual matters and that which is not? Will that amendment contribute efficiently to check immorality? Is it the practical definition the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) has been promising to us for more than a year and, in particular, in the resounding speech he made on June 15, 1958 at St. Joseph's Oratory on Mount Royal?

How will that definition help the judge, the jury, the law enforcement officer and allow them to decide if this or that publication or entertainment or play is obscene?

As in the past, the judge or the jury will have to ponder at length before ruling a publication obscene because on their lone judgment will fall the difficult task of determining the predominant characteristic of the publication and drawing the line between what constitute undue exploitation of sexual matters and what does not.

In short, we are no further ahead in our fight against obscenity, if indeed an explicit definition of the word "obscene" is an essential weapon in this fight.

It seems that the Minister of Justice, in introducing this bill to the house, was anxious to keep the promises made in his many speeches when, echoing the leagues and committees dedicated to the fight against immorality, he alarmed the population about the havoc wrought by obscene literature, especially among young people.

His department, he said repeatedly, considers that fight against obscenity from four different angles:

(1) first, a practical definition of obscenity;

(2) seizure of all obscene matter, without formal charges, so as to get an order from a court for the confiscation of such matter;

(3) prohibition of the special conditional sales or, in other words, of the compulsory mass sale of publications in order to force the buyer to accept delivery of certain obscene publications;

(4) finally, to make the law stricter for the printers of obscene matters.

Clause 12 of this bill adds to the criminal code sections 150 (a) and 150 (b), covering the second and third aspects considered by the Minister of Justice in the fight against obscenity, and I think the minister is to be commended in this regard.

Bill C-58, however, makes no amendment to the present act with regard to printers.

Under subsection (1) of section 150, in the present act, everyone commits an offence who:

(a) makes, prints, publishes, distributes, circulates, or has in his possession for the purpose of publication, distribution or circulation any obscene written matter, picture, model, phonograph record or other thing whatsoever, or

(b) makes, prints, publishes, distributes, sells or has in his possession for the purpose of publication, distribution or circulation, a crime comic.

I do not know what the Minister of Justice had in mind when he thought of making the act stricter for printers. In any event, the bill now before us makes absolutely no change to this section 150 in regard to printers.

As regards section 11 of this bill, which defines obscenity, I will only say that the Minister of Justice, in undertaking an extremely difficult task, overestimated his capabilities.

On the whole, however, while the minister has failed to give us the clear, precise and practical definition of obscenity he led us to expect, I think this bill should receive the support of the house, subject to certain amendments to be put forward when the matter reaches the committee stage.

(Text):

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should begin these remarks by bringing to the attention of the house a resolution passed at the annual meeting of the Canadian Library Association as reported in the Edmonton Journal of Friday, June 26, 1959. The article reads in part:

The Canadian Library Association Thursday passed a resolution asking the Canadian Minister of Justice to delay action on a proposed bill to amend the definition of obscene literature and regulations of its sale and distribution.

The association asked for the delay so that interested groups might have the opportunity to study the amendments and present their views to parliament.

The resolution stated the association was in accord with the intention of the amendment but feared the definition of obscenity may serve to impede freedom of expression and free access to works of value and literary merit. Control of undesirable literature should require that judgment be based on the merits of a work as a whole.

I think the last part of the sentence "of the merits of a work as a whole" underlines the worry that the librarians have in this regard, which I suggest is of interest in dealing with this particular matter.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, with reluctance I raise a point of order. I wonder whether my hon. friend would not have his purpose well served if we discussed the matter, which I understand he wants discussed, on the amending clause itself. I recognize that earlier it was suggested we have some general discussion on the provisions of the bill with Your Honour in the chair. If, as I understand it now my hon. friend from Port Arthur wishes to discuss exclusively the provision relating to obscenity. I suggest that we might be well served if we went into committee and discussed it on the clause when I can deal in detail with the provisions of the clause and the arguments for and against.

Mr. Fisher: I will refrain from going into detail. I just wanted to put a general case as to why people who are involved in books and traffic in books are so worried about this particular question of a definition.

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) was good enough last year when I put the question to him to give me an over-all list of all the books that had been rejected by the customs department. There are two aspects to the censorship problem, if you want to look at it—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I again suggest to you that if my hon. friend wants to discuss this problem I am prepared to engage in a general debate on this problem on the clause in question. I am not going to try to narrow it there, but I do suggest that if we are going to debate this question of obscenity and the pros and cons of censorship, and so on, which this clause is designed to obviate —that is, censorship—then I think we should wait until we get to the clause.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): The Chair was about to raise a question as to whether the Minister of Justice was raising a point of order or making request to the member which could or could not be heeded. I take it the Minister of Justice is asking for a ruling on the point of order as to whether the hon. member should proceed on the lines upon which he has started. If that is so, and the Minister of Justice indicates that, a ruling will have to be made.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Speaker. If no other hon. member wishes to speak on the provisions of the bill in general and my hon. friend wishes to narrow it down to the provisions of the clause which provides a definition of obscenity, then I suggest we should wait until we get to the clause itself.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, perhaps you will remember the ruling that was made by Mr. Speaker on an earlier occasion this afternoon when the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Eudes) was speaking.

Mr. Fulton: He did speak on other matters as well.

Mr. Chevrier: He was speaking on other matters and the point was taken that perhaps he might deal with the clauses seriatim, and I suggested that because the hon. member was speaking for the opposition it would be unfortunate if he were not allowed to make his general remarks on the first clause, and I suppose that argument applies to the hon. member for Port Arthur as well.

Mr. Fulton: As I understand it, he wishes to deal only with the question of obscenity. I wish to accommodate the house. If no other hon. member wishes to speak on the bill generally and the desire now is to debate this clause on obscenity I think the house would be better served if we waited until we got to that clause in committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order. It strikes me that the Minister of Justice has answered the point of order himself, but he does make a point in the nature of a request. The Chair cannot rule that discussion on the particular matter of obscenity is out of order. There are a great many clauses in the bill. It appears that the debate is going to be confined to the particular one dealing with obscene matters, and any discussion on that falls into the line of general principles on the second reading when debate is in order. I would ask hon. members to try to refrain from getting into specific details until the bill is considered in committee.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, the reasons for the minister introducing the bill are, I believe, general ones. If I might just refer to the problem of keeping of pornographic or obscene books out of the hands of Canadians centres on two points. One is publishing outside of Canada and the other is publishing inside of Canada. We publish very little in Canada. As a matter of fact, it is almost impossible to find any books that could be defined as obscene that are published in Canada. The main worry is the books that come from outside. Therefore, as I said earlier, the minister provided me with a list of those books that had been ruled out by the customs department under tariff item 1201. This item reads:

> Books, printed paper, drawings, paintings, prints, photographs or representations of any kind of a treasonable or seditious, or of an immoral or indecent character.

What I am trying to suggest is that the main problem in terms of literature is that we have another definition that we operate on, namely this definition in the tariff item of immoral and indecent literature that seeks to say, first of all, what books on Canadian library shelves should come from outside of Canada. This is one of the greatest areas of difficulty. We did have an interesting case in connection with "Peyton Place" a few years ago. We had a very complicated situation in connection with "Lolita" which was banned originally by the department before the present minister took over. I have never been able to figure out where the shift was made, but with the present minister "Lolita" was allowed in. I think the explanation is that the Olympia Press in Paris which originally published "Lolita" in French has a notorious reputation and almost any book that is published by that firm is banned automatically. I think that is why "Lolita" suffered. I think the present people in the customs department probably recognized the literary merit of the book when it was published in English.

Mr. Brunsden: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? Has he read "Lolita"? If so, what is his impression of it?

Mr. Fisher: I have; I think it is irrelevant.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Order.

Mr. Fulton: It is a fair question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): Let us try to continue the discussion on general lines and not engage on a discussion of works of literary merit.

Mr. Fisher: As a librarian, Mr. Speaker, I have always taken the view that we must be very careful in what we censor. I think almost any librarian always goes by Milton's "Areopagitica" the words from which are very strongly against the imposition of any kind against the liberty of any man to express in a written way his feelings, thoughts and ideas.

Because of the nature of the list which I got from the Minister of National Revenue when I was in Paris last fall with the NATO group I was able at the end to spend a day down in the bookstores on the Seine going through and checking those books that were barred by this tariff item, and I had to agree that almost every one of them was of such a kind that I certainly would not want to see them in Canada. I must say quite frankly that this was a bit of a shock to me. I had not realized that I was so inexperienced in so far as such books were concerned.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): And in a good many other things.

Mr. Fisher: There were many books that filthy and that bad. On that particular day I was in conversation with an author in one of the stores who explained to me that this particular press, the Olympia Press, that puts out most of those books, had recently had a court case in connection with "Lolita". He told me the basic defence that this firm had put up for choosing to publish "Lolita" was I thought, most intriguing.

The first point in the defence was that after all these books were printed in English and could have no effect upon French morality. The second point was that they were sold to Englishmen and Americans, brought in good foreign exchange and were thus of commercial value to France. The third argument, which of course was usually the key one, was that some of these books had literary merit. If as a result of the change in the act we get a definition that is going to impede—

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I must ask you for a ruling. My hon. friend is now discussing the effect that would be produced if the clause in question carries. Indeed, as I have suggested before, his discussion relates exclusively to one particular clause of the bill. As I say, when we reach the clause I will not attempt in any way, or ask the chairman in any way, to narrow or confine the debate. We can have a full debate on that question then but the bill itself relates to a very great number of questions having no connection with obscenity and I do not want to indulge at the second reading stage in a debate confined exclusively to the question of the definition of obscenity. I do ask Your Honour for a ruling because I am satisfied that the debate will be well served and the interests of the house will be better served if we wait for this discussion until we get to the clause in question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): I thought the Chair had made it abundantly clear before that the Minister of Justice had made a request to members and that it is the opinion of the Chair that members can, if they wish, disregard that request although it would undoubtedly add to the expediency with which we can deal with this matter. Members are entitled to discuss particular parts of the bill on the basis of principle following the rules that pertain to debates on second reading. However, I must ask the hon. member who has taken his seat to bring his remarks closer to the principles that are set forth even when dealing with a particular part of the amendments to the Criminal Code. Questions of foreign trade and other extraneous matters seem to be creeping into his remarks.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member was about to discuss the effect of the change and we will not be able to discuss the effect of the change until we get to the clause.

Mr. Howard: Why not?

Mr. Fulton: Because it is out of order to discuss the provisions of a clause on second reading, and that is what my hon. friend is doing. He is talking about the changes that will be made by a particular provision of the bill. Mr. Speaker, I do not usually raise and press points of order but I do refer Your Honour—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fulton: No, not at this stage.

Mr. Chevrier: You are wrong again.

Mr. Fulton: I do refer Your Honour to the well understood rule that on second reading members must debate the principle of the bill and not the details. I suggest to you that my hon. friend, in discussing as he has the effect of one particular clause of the bill is entirely out of order on second reading. Otherwise—there are 37 clauses in the bill—we could have 37 separate debates on second reading and that would become absurd. We can have full debate and discussion in committee on this clause because, of course, I do not make the rules of the house and I could not stop it if I wanted to, and I do not want to stop it. I want a full debate but I want it relevant to the clause in question when I can give the answers. I do suggest to Your Honour that we should not have 37 separates debates on second reading.

Mr. Chevrier: May I speak to the point of order and say this in reply to what the Minister of Justice has just said? While it is true that on second reading the discussion must pertain to the principle of the bill, I ask the minister to state where there is any principle involved in these amendments to the Criminal Code. There are several amendments to the Criminal Code and they are entirely different in their nature and aspect, and if you want to adhere to the principle of the bill then you cannot do that. That rule of procedure cannot be put into effect at this time, and that is why the ruling you have made is quite correct and in order. It seems to me that the hon. member who has the floor or any other hon. members on this side of the house who desire to speak on any of these clauses have the right to do so now.

Mr. Fulton: That is quite wrong and that is exactly why on a bill of this type amending the Criminal Code there is a very limited debate on second reading and the debate is confined to the clauses.

Mr. Chevrier: What is the principle?

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend will remember that when bills amending the Criminal Code have been before the house on any occasion he wishes to mention there has been a very limited debate on second reading and the discussion has been almost exclusively confined to the debate on the particular clauses in committee. I realize perfectly well that you cannot distil a principle out of a bill of this sort and that is why I think it is quite out of order for an hon. member to discuss the details of a clause as the hon. member for Port Arthur will be bound to do. I do not have in front of me the advisers of the government with all the details of the questions that my hon. friend will raise, to which I should like to give answers and to which I am prepared to answer. It is a waste of the time of the house to try to have this debate on second reading. I am not trying to stop debate on the clause or on the merits of the situation which my hon. friend wants to discuss. All I say is, let us have it at the right time when we can have the debate with the best profit to all members who are here.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. McCleave): In looking over Bill No. C-58 I notice there are at least two sections and an addition to another section which deal with the matter of obscenity. I also notice that the procedure to be adopted is based upon a separate act of the British parliament. It seems to me that what we have here is a number of changes in the Criminal Code and that in dealing with obscenity something of relatively large scope is being introduced into the Criminal Code by way of amendment. I therefore have allowed the hon. member to continue. I would ask that his remarks be relevant to the bill and in general terms. The Minister of Justice is right that in dealing with these particular clauses we are dealing with them in general on the basis of principle rather than in the detail that is customary in committee.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, the reason I want to speak is that I feel there is a principle involved here and I certainly gathered from the remarks the minister has made that he feels there is a principle involved.

Mr. Fulton: There are 37 separate principles.

Mr. Lennard: What is the matter? Are you going to be away next week?

Mr. Fisher: I am no more likely to be away than the hon. member.

Mr. Lennard: Oh, I probably will and I am asking the hon. member.

Mr. Howard: It will not make any difference whether or not you are.

Mr. Fraser: That is a stupid remark.

Mr. Lennard: From a stupid person.

Mr. Fisher: Censorship is something which changes with the times. I noticed in the remarks the minister has made in a couple of his public addresses that he is very much aware of that. In the speech he made to the Quebec union of municipalities on May 17 he emphasized that this is a problem that has been created by the modern situation, increased transportation facilities, increased wealth, cheaper methods of manufacturing, which are some of the by-products of progress. But despite the creation by modern times of this particular problem modern times have also created a different attitude toward some of the classic examples of books that have been ruled as obscene in the past. I should like to point out to the minister, if it has not been done already, that at one time a book of Shaw's, "Mrs. Warren's Profession", dealing as it does with prostitution, was under the pale in England. If you want other examples you can easily find them in a play such as Ibsen's "Ghosts", a theme of which is venereal disease. It is examples like this used by advocates of censorship that have created in the world of librarians and literary figures a distrust of any changes that have to do with the idea of obscenity. I do not want to belabour the particular point except to tell the minister that there is very deep concern amongst people who deal with books about the consequences of this change the minister is introducing. When we can deal with the details of this particular clause, I should like to point out some of the reasons for my statement based on the wording.

In conclusion of my remarks, which I think are on the principle involved in this amendment, I should like to read from a statement that was made before the tariff board by Frank A. Underhill on January 29, 1958. This appeared in the Canadian Library Association bulletin for July, 1958, the same bulletin or at least the same magazine which, on another date, featured a statement by the minister, as well as other people, on this censorship or obscenity problem. At one point, Mr. Underhill said this:

> The point that I am trying to make is that modern literary artists, in their concentration on sex, violence and societies in decay, are not just exploting these themes for the sake of vulgar notoriety and best-seller profits. They are trying, seriously and intensely, to say something significant about the condition of man in our day. They are impressed chiefly by his inability to discipline his unruly passions and his almost infinite capacity for evil. If they look on the black side, and present painful or repulsive pictures of human beings in action, can anyone blame them who has been sensitive to the experience of our age?

This points up the problem involved in so far as the literature of our time is concerned. I know that principally this particular change has to do with another kind of book altogether, another kind of literature, and I am sure that the minister is going to receive general commendation from most people in the nation for trying to make this change. However, in so far as one can examine the general principle that is involved in this particular change, it comes down to the attempt he has made to define obscenity, I must suggest that in that particular regard I have certain qualms about the definition. The hon. member who spoke before me indicated that his group was going to move certain amendments in conection with that, and I should like to say that we are going to have amendments, or at least one amendment, to it.

In concluding my remarks on the principle of the bill, I would say we are glad the minister did not decide to try to set up some kind of censorship board. I know that was a demand because I was reviewing the evidence given before the Senate committee in 1952 and 1953 and I found the suggestion came up there. I read also the minister's evidence before that committee and I find his views then are generally consistent with the statement that he has made. At that time he was against the general idea of a censorship board, and he was against all the problems that are inherent in defining obcenity. This group, as a whole approves of the idea of keeping the matter of determining obscenity in the courts rather than giving it to a censorship board. It is not so sure that this particular change is going to make the task of the judges any easier. It regrets that some way has not been found, in the change that has been made, to take some of the onus from the customs officials.

Last year we were given an indication by the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) that he hoped the department would get out from under this particular chore. There is no indication that these changes are going to do that, except in a sort of delayed reaction fashion, in that there may be rulings coming out of the courts which will give enlightenment and advice to the customs officials. Of course some enlightenment and advice could have come from the tariff board if anyone had bothered to take any appeals to it. However, this was never done.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would say that I may have given the minister the impression by talking on his bill at this stage that I was impeding its progress. I am sure if he intends to bring it in and push it through, it is going to go through and become law. We will see just how it is going to work. After the experience which some of us in this house had this afternoon in viewing with a certain amount of consternation a piece of legislation we passed last year after the minister's assurance that everything—

Mr. Fulton: This minister?

Mr. Fisher: No, another minister—was going to be fine, we are going to be a little more sceptical about such assurances this session. I am sure the intention is excellent and we hope it will have an effect upon the kind of literature at which the minister is aiming. Certainly, however, when the minister is making his explanation I wish he would consider pointing out very clearly to us how it is going to do that, and how the principles with which the librarians are concerned are not going to be affected by these alterations?

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wonder if I might make one very brief comment with respect to the bill before us, and upon what I consider to be a failure in the bill itself. I thought that the minister, with the assistance and guidance of the officials in his department, would have been able to come up with a provision in this particular bill that would give statutory clarification to some of the confusion in the act with regard to bingo games. I doubt if there is anything that is more confusing than what is in the minds of those who operate bingo games, the R.C.M. Police who are expected to enforce these sections in areas where they have jurisdiction, and the police court and stipendiary magistrates when cases of infraction of the Criminal Code as it relates to bingo games come before them.

I have discussed this question with a stipendiary magistrate, with an officer in the R.C.M. Police and a lawyer to determine what the rules are in so far as bingo games are concerned. Not one of them could give me a clear idea, and I would appreciate it if the minister would get some clarification of that section relating to bingo games.

Mr. Fulton: Is that all?

Mr. Howard: That is all.

Mr. Leon Crestohl (Cartier): I wanted to make some observations on the bill because I find that the amendments do carry some novelty. I find, for example, that the amendments propose something new in the Criminal Code and that is setting up a system of paying penalties on the instalment plan.

Mr. Fulton: That is not new.

Mr. Crestohl: It is not new, but the amendment is creating it in a form that will make it new. Certainly, it becomes novel. Of course, the courts have latitude now to allow a penalty to be paid with some delay. But to legislate directly a section in the code that will allow the payment of penalties on the instalment plan I think could encourage crime because offenders will know that they might not have to go to jail if delays are allowed under the amendment to pay those penalties. I do not want to go into detail at the present time in discussing the bill in its general form; we will be able to do that when we reach the particular clauses.

I also find in the bill a clause which introduces again something new, and that is a clause dealing with offences committed on aircraft. When we reach that clause I imagine we will be able to discuss it in more detail, but I wonder whether the minister would explain before we finally get to the bill itself the origin of this clause and the question of jurisdiction in regard to it. The bill goes into some detail, but I think there could be very many improvements to the measure.

I also think that clauses 9 and 10 of the bill, which deal with some shifting of the burden of proof in offences where the male is not more to blame than the female, are very helpful and can be useful; but since there is a change in principle, would the minister be good enough to give the house the benefit of the reasoning of his officials or of the minister himself and what it was that motivated these changes in basic principles in our criminal law? It would be helpful to us when we come to the clauses if the minister would be good enough to tell the house the background of some of these innovations.

I do not want at the present time to go into the countless arguments which the minister must have already received and no doubt will continue to receive in defining "obscenity". I would prefer to leave my observations on that to when we reach the clause. Some of the definitions are very serious, but some of them can be very amusing. We were discussing a short while ago how the minister proposed to interpret the difference between an undue exploitation of sex and a due exploitation of sex. I would like to know which is which, when it is a due exploitation and when it is an undue exploitation. If the minister before we get into the clauses of the bill would give the house the benefit of some of the background to these innovations we would be most grateful.

(Translation):

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, we are now discussing a bill which touches upon many sections of the Criminal Code. I wonder how we could discuss the principle of a bill with such a variety of topics. I wonder why we do not have a separate bill for each of the proposed amendments to the Criminal Code? The Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) might as well ask us to amend the Revised Statutes of Canada.

In my opinion, to streamline the procedure, he should have introduced a bill for each of the individual amendments instead of introducing a bill which touches upon so many subject matters of the Criminal Code.

I do not believe the minister wants to prevent us from discussing the principle of this bill which he is introducing and, when discussing it, we will not be able, during the consideration of the part which has to do with obscenity, to refrain from talking about drunkenness, for instance, and other subjects. The bill as submitted to the house contains sections dealing among other things, with offensive weapons. I fail to see how offensive weapons have anything to do with obscene literature.

I see here, for instance, that there is a new procedure concerning the accused, because of the publication of evidence brought up at the preliminary investigation. Incidentally, this is a very good thing. I also note that under this amendment, the magistrate may order that the decision rendered with regard to the publication of evidence be modified. Then, I wonder, Mr. Chairman, how we could deal with the principle of the bill—

An hon. Member: Do so.

Mr. Denis: But I shall simply point out to the minister—

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Yes, in committee.

Mr. Denis: I shall point out to the minister that if we intend to criticize, or approve certain things, I hope that the Minister of Justice will be kind enough to take notes, so that when the various sections are submitted to the committee, he will be better able to answer our objections. In this way, I think, all those who want to go on leave or get in touch with their families again, could do so sooner. When the sections are called in committee, the minister will have found the answers, which will simplify discussion.

Mr. Fulton: Precisely.

Mr. Denis: I shall not deal with all amendments to the Criminal Code. I shall, for instance, only mention firearms and permits. Under section 8, I read:

> A permit in Form 42, 43 or 45 may be issued by a local registrar of firearms.

That is all right. But you give more latitude to those who issue permits. However, I have no objection to that. As a matter of fact, this will help those who are responsible for giving out those licences. This means, in other words, that we can obtain those permits more easily.

[Mr. Denis.]

But, it is not those who issue the permits who are dangerous: it is those to whom those firearms are given. If the minister had wished to afford better protection to society, instead of amending the Criminal Code in such a way as to know whether or not such and such a person is entitled to issue permits, in accordance with forms 42, 43 or 45, he should have required a more detailed inquiry about those to whom permits are granted. At present, under the existing legislation, permits may be granted for the possession of firearms to protect one's life or property.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am not allowed to answer the hon. member now, but I can assure him that I shall answer him when the house is in committee.

Mr. Denis: Quite so; what I want is an answer. But before the house goes into committee, I am directing questions to the minister in order that he may give me satisfactory answers.

A firearm permit may be obtained to protect one's life or property, but it is a matter of knowing how, or for what reason, one must protect one's life and what is the value of the property one has to protect, before being entitled to an offensive weapon.

Anyone may obtain a firearm, in accordance with subclause (a) of section 94. But I would suggest to the hon. minister that the danger does not lie with those who issue the permits but rather with those who obtain them. I am convinced that there is some lack of control, that the investigation made is not adequate; I am convinced that there is lack of consistency towards those who are really in need of protection.

For instance, I have in my possession a hunting gun. I have had it for the last 20 years perhaps.

Mr. Rodrigue Bourdages (Laval): You do not know how to shoot.

Mr. Denis: Never mind, in the next elections, there will be so many Conservatives that even if I am a poor shot, I will surely hit a few.

So I would respectfully say to the hon. minister that the threat is not from those who issue licences, but those who are issued licences. An investigation must also be conducted to discover whether a person has made improper use of a firearm. Personally, I have not made improper use of my firearm because I have wounded none of the hon. members opposite. However, there is a limit.

An hon. Member: Words are more dangerous.

Mr. Denis: I therefore ask the hon. minister to conduct a more thorough investigation when a person applies for a licence to own a firearm. Before a person is licensed to own a firearm, care should be taken to ascertain what use is to be made of the firearm.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot discuss the principle of the bill without going into all those things.

However, allow me to revert to the subject of obscene literature. The hon. Minister of Justice was quite prepared to improve this act.

An hon. Member: He still is.

Mr. Denis: I recognize, with the hon. member for Laval, that the minister still has good intentions, but that does not prove that he has improved it. He is still prepared to improve it, but he is actually making no improvement.

But, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. minister was sitting on the opposition side, he claimed that should he some day be a member of the cabinet, he would improve the act to such an extent that it would be impossible for Canadian citizens to be contaminated by such obscene things. But, what did the minister do? He merely changed the clause which includes the definition of the word "obscenity".

In fact, Mr. Speaker, obscenity as defined by the hon. Minister of Justice is a source of income for the lawyers because it is more complicated than if we had no definition at all. Interpretations have been offered by hundreds depending on what such and such persons think about such and such things regarding the obscene literature and also depending on the various provinces where he lives.

Section 11 of the bill now before us reads as follows:

Section 150 of the said act is amended by adding thereto, immediately after subsection (7) thereof, the following subsection—

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. At this stage, a member should not discuss a particular clause in the bill—

Mr. Denis:

For the purposes of this act, any publication— (Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry I cannot hear both members at the same time.

Mr. Fulton: My point, Mr. Speaker, as I have said before to no avail, is that it is out of order to refer to the detailed provisions of the bill on second reading and I have let the hon. member go on just to prove how absurd he is. He is now trying to discuss on second reading the detailed provisions of the bill and, as I have said all along, I am prepared to discuss details when we are in committee and I have my officers here and can answer the questions which the hon. gentleman asks.

They are all trying to get up now, and that shows exactly how out of order they are and how absurd this whole farce is, and I suggest that while the House of Commons is a friendly chamber it is really time we stopped wasting time and got down to details.

Mr. Chevrier: I, too, rise on a point of order and I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is not in order for the minister to refer to the hon. member who has just been speaking by saying how absurd he is. After all, the minister rose on a point of order—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. gentleman reminded me the other day that two points of order cannot be discussed at the same time. The point of order is whether the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) is in order in discussing the definition of obscenity in detail.

Mr. Chevrier: And I suggest it is, because Your Honour decided earlier in the course of the afternoon that there is no principle contained in the course of the various clauses before the house and so it is impossible to discuss the principle of the bill per se. For that reason the hon. member, as have various other members during the course of this debate, has discussed several clauses seriatim having been allowed to do so previously by the Chair. I suggest that he be permitted to continue. May I add for the benefit of the Minister of Justice, that if he thinks he is going to help the passage of this bill by nonsensical points of order such as he has raised, he is mistaken.

Mr. Speaker: There is no doubt in my mind that some things have been and are out of order. The hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) has indicated his difficulty in discussing the principle of this bill because it deals with a number of unrelated amendments. The same difficulty arose for the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Eudes). I think one can discuss the principle that relates to the application of the law against obscenity on second reading, but I do not think it is in order to discuss the detail of the definition and the wording of the clause. That can more properly be done in committee. The hon. member for Hochelaga dealt with the two or three clauses that related to obscenity together, and tried to indicate a general approach to the problem, as he did in connection with the problem of firearms, and I think that can be done, but when it comes to an exact definition I think the hon. member might leave that to the committee stage where he will have ample opportunity.

Mr. Denis: I think I can do that, but before continuing in accordance with your ruling I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether, when he used the expression "absurd", he was referring to the hon. member for St. Denis or to his own bill?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member need not take offence at a statement of that kind. I have heard much worse than that in the house without objection.

Mr. Denis: I will continue in French, if I may, because we have this new simultaneous translation and before it gets lost I think I will use it.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, the reason why I read clause 11 is that the hon. minister boasts of having added something by including a definition in which he uses but 5, 6 or 7 words, but he has not given a specific definition. For instance, the matter of principle is very important and the minister talks about:

—sex and any one of more of the following subjects, namely, crime, horror, cruelty and violence.

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, how could we interpret that section? For instance, what is the definition of cruelty, of violence, of horror? Is it correlative, when it deals with obscene matter?

For instance, Mr. Speaker, if my hon. friend from St. Hyacinthe-Bagot (Mr. Ricard) is not satisfied with me, while on the other hand, I am not satisfied with him, and if a discussion arises between us, and if, after that, I give him a thrashing that looks like horror, does that prove that the assault I make on my hon. friend, even if he deserves it, comes under the act?

In any event, Mr. Speaker, I respectfully submit that the definition mentioned in section 11 is far from being satisfactory. It is vague, imperfect and indefinite. Besides, it includes other words that need to be defined and that the minister does not define.

Furthermore, I will not rely only on my own opinion—

Mr. Bourdages: On the opinion of Mr. Lamontagne?

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, I think I have recognized the voice of my hon. friend from Laval (Mr. Bourdages) and I am sure he will not rise in this house, except to make interruptions, and even at that, he keeps seated when he makes them. Therefore, I would ask him, as a Conservative member, who wishes to help the Minister of Justice, to prepare something on that matter so that we could know if he is satisfied with the definition of obscene literature, or what improvements he could bring about. Or does he want, on the contrary, to keep that rather vague definition, so that he may benefit by the act as it existed before?

In any event—

An hon. Member: He is not to blame; he is not blue yet.

Mr. Denis: I read in the Gazette of June 17, 1959, that the members of the clergy have held an important meeting during which they have stated:

(Text):

Proposed federal legislation defining obscenity in relation to literature was attacked today by three clergymen here for the eleventh annual summer school of religion as indefinite and unnecessary.

This is what they think about the definition of obscenity.

Dr. James T. Cleland of Duke University was further quoted as saying:

Besides, the legislation proposed leaves the matter wide open by its wording. The lawyers will have a field day with it.

(Translation):

Not that I have any grudge against my fellow lawyers but while the minister meant to clarify the act he only succeeded in making it more complicated, especially if I am to believe the statements made by those members of the clergy.

In conclusion, I should say that when the Minister of Justice came to Montreal, he listed all the improvements and all the amendments, four in number, he wished to make to the Criminal Code. Here is the report published in the Montreal Gazette of June 18, 1958 and I quote:

(Text):

The first is a "practical" definition of the word obscene for article 150 of the Criminal Code.

(Translation):

Then, as I already mentioned, Mr. Speaker, this definition lends itself to an infinite variety of interpretations, with all due deference to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Pigeon) who instead of making faces should rather look after his tobacco in St. Thomas and see to it that the premier of Quebec let his farmers have the benefit of crop insurance legislation.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Order. Our rules of procedure call for a discussion of the bill before the house.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: Mr. Speaker, you can not imagine how difficult it is to speak in this house when one is the target of a member who is making faces. I do not know if he is grinning on account of the amendment—

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that the hon. member proceed with a discussion of the bill.

(Translation):

Mr. Denis: I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and above all—

(Text):

Finally, Mr. Fulton said, "We are considering the possibility of including the printers of obscene publications in prosecutions, much more than is done today."

(Translation):

Here is the cause of all the trouble. To prevent the publication and distribution of these obscene books, the minister should have appealed to printers and publishers.

Yet, there is nothing in the present act likely to prevent printers and publishers from keeping on printing, publishing and distributing those immoral books either to wholesalers or to any other corporation in charge of their sale or distribution. I recognize that the minister wishes to find a solution to this problem. According to some press reports, it is a step in the right direction, and as was reported in another paper:

(Text):

"Better half a loaf than no loaf at all".

(Translation):

Therefore we will not object to this motion, but I would request the minister to take note of our remarks so that next year, if he still be the Minister of Justice, he will be able to profit by the remarks made by the members of the opposition. It is claimed that the government does not receive suggestions from the opposition. The trouble is that we offer too many of them and they do not know which one to take to be helpful to the population. They do not want the Liberals or the opposition to have the credit for the only pieces of legislation which can help the people.

Well, when the time comes to discuss this measure in committee, as was suggested by the minister—and by the way I thank Mr. Speaker, who was kind enough to let me make these few observations, a fact which enabled me to give to the minister a preview of the arguments which we will put forward when we study this bill in committee. I hope the minister will be better informed and in a better position to reply to the various questions directed to him by members of the opposition. And if, next year, if not this one, a better definition of the word obscenity is found, and if a better protection in regard to the possession of firearms is achieved, the whole country will be satisfied, even if the Conservative party should be given all the credit for that.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I must advise the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as I have said on a number of occasions in the course of this—shall I call it debate—on second reading I shall be prepared to answer in detail and seriously any questions which have been raised when we reach the clauses in committee.

I have observed that most of the discussion thus far in this debate on second reading has been related to the provisions of the bill which deal with the definition of obscenity. I make no criticism of the fact, but I could not fail to note that the matter was treated with some levity, particularly by the hon. members of the Liberal party from the province of Quebec. I am not, of course, suggesting that the definition we have achieved is perfect. It is the best definition that we could achieve; it is an attempt to deal seriously with a serious subject. I think the house will be interested to note, and I think the country will be interested to note, and I think the province of Quebec particularly will be interested to note that members of the Liberal party from the province of Quebec treated this whole thing, with one exception, in an atmosphere of levity. As I say, I make no criticism of that. The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Eudes) dealt with the matter seriously. The other members of his party from the province of Quebec, where I am aware that this matter is regarded with a great deal of seriousness, dealt with it as a subject deserving nothing but laughter.

Mr. Chevrier: That is not so, and you know it. All the minister has been doing is raising points of order.

Mr. Fulton: What I say hits my hon. friends a little hard but they recognize that their attitude towards this bill tonight has not done them credit, and that, of course, is a matter of which I am quite sure their compatriots will take notice. As I say, I make no criticism. Perhaps my hon. friends do not think the definition is very good. I shall be interested in hearing what they have to say in committee. My whole purpose in this debate has been to advance the bill along into committee so that we might hear what constructive suggestions my hon. friends have to offer, because certainly their attitude so far has been far from constructive. I think, Mr. Speaker, that there is really nothing more I need to say. I am quite certain that the house and the people of the country beyond the house will note the attitude of my hon. friends of the Liberal party toward a serious subject and a serious attempt to deal with a serious subject.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. McCleave in the chair.

On clause 1—Magistrate.

Mr. Eudes: Mr. Chairman, by provincial statute in the province of Quebec a recorder in most cases I believe is now termed a municipal judge and the recorder courts as municipal courts. I am wondering whether the definition proposed by this clause of this bill amending paragraph 22 of section 2 of the Criminal Code should not also include the words "municipal judge" in order to meet the effect of the proposed amendment. This would also include those who are given authority or jurisdiction under section 225 of the Criminal Code which is being amended by clause 16 of this bill.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I am not aware that there is any problem with respect to provincial judges. The amendment is designed to deal exclusively with the problem that arises in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory. I do not think any problem of this nature has been brought to my attention with respect to provincial magistrates or judges.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, if I read the clause aright it says that paragraph (22) of section 2 of the Criminal Code is repealed and the following substituted therefor. Line eight does have reference to a recorder. Right now in the province of Quebec there is no such thing as a recorder. Those who used to be known years ago as recorders are no longer recorders; they are municipal judges. Therefore I think the minister should take advantage of the repealing of the old section to include municipal judges.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, on that point it may be that the word "recorder" is out of date. However, the only purpose of the amendment was to take care of a situation in the territories. We were not looking at it from the point of view of bringing up to date the provision with respect to any provincial arrangements that may exist. I would rather look at it in detail and at leisure, if I may put it that way, and see if we should remove the word "recorder". It is not creating any difficulty that I am aware of, and I would prefer just to leave it for the time being.

Mr. Roberge: I agree with that but right now a recorder does not exist in the province of Quebec. Therefore, a municipal judge would not have the authority of a magistrate as contemplated in this clause. That is the point the hon. member for Hochelaga is trying to make.

Mr. Fulton: If I understand my hon. friend and the hon. member for Hochelaga aright, the suggestion is that the municipal judge should be included in the definition. On that point I would prefer to look at this, as I say, and to study it carefully and to hear the opinion of and any recommendations from the provincial attorney general.

Mr. Roberge: Would it be possible to include this recommendation in any amendment that may be made in the other place?

Mr. Fulton: If we have time we shall certainly draw the remarks of the hon. member to the attention of the provincial authorities and if there is time and we have a recommendation accordingly we would be prepared to recommend an amendment in the other place.

Mr. Roberge: I might suggest that no time would be lost because the prime minister from Quebec is also the attorney general. He will be here on Monday along with the assistant minister of finance, so that no time will be lost.

Mr. Fulton: I imagine that the mind of the attorney general of Quebec will be occupied with other problems because he will be coming here in another capacity. If we have an opportunity we will bring this to his attention and have a discussion.

Mr. Roberge: Maybe at luncheon time.

Mr. Fulton: As I say, his mind will still be occupied with other matters.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2.

(Translation):

Mr. Eudes: Section 2 of this new bill gives the pilot in command of an aircraft registered in Canada, while the aircraft is in flight, the same authority as a peace officer.

I wonder if it would not be desirable to extend the same powers, in similar circumstances, to the captain or commander of a ship at sea. Section 44 of the Criminal Code authorizes the captain, or master or officer in command of a vessel on a voyage to use force for the purpose of maintaining good order and discipline on the vessel. That suggestion, as far as I am concerned, would seem to complete the powers already granted to the captain of a ship, by the Criminal Code.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: This amendment, I think, will be better understood when read in conjunction with the proposed amendment contained in clause 3. The object of both clause 2 and clause 3 is to fill a gap which it is felt exists now in the criminal law of Canada with respect to jurisdiction over crimes committed on aircraft. It is my understanding that a committee of the international civil aviation organization is studying the whole question of crimes committed on aircraft with a view to recommending a code or provision which might be adopted by all the countries which are subscribers to that organization. If these recommendations are accepted then there will be uniform measures in all the countries which subscribe, but in the meantime there is a gap in our legislation. It is to plug that gap on a unilateral basis, it is admitted, but none the less to plug a gap which we feel might be a serious one that we are acting now unilaterally in accordance with these suggested amendments.

Mr. Roberge: I should like to address myself to clause 2. As the minister has said, clause 3 is related to this matter also.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Perhaps it would be convenient if clauses 2 and 3 were called together.

Mr. Roberge: I was going to suggest that.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

On clause 3—Offences committed on aircraft.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, I know you will not mind if I speak in French. I have been speaking English for the last three weeks.

Mr. Denis: You do not have to ask permission.

(Translation):

Mr. Roberge: Under section 2 of this bill, the intention is to add a new sub-paragraph, sub-paragraph (e), which would give the powers of a peace officer to a pilot flying an aircraft of Canadian registry according to the regulations made under the aeronautics Act, when the plane is in flight.

Now a problem arises,—I think the minister has perhaps answered this question in part: is the pilot in question a Canadian citizen or a foreigner? It is possible that an airplane of Canadian registry be flown by an airman who is not a Canadian citizen? It can also happen that a non-Canadian airplane be flown by an airman who is a Canadian citizen or a foreigner.

I shall now go on to section 3 of this bill. I find that offences or infringements of the Criminal Code may be committed by everyone who violates the provisions of the Criminal Code on an aircraft registered in Canada under the regulations, ... while the aircraft is in flight, and according to subsection (b) of section 5a, on any aircraft, while the aircraft is in flight, and this flight is to be terminated in Canada. If that person commits a criminal offence listed in the present Criminal Code—and I understand that by this new section 5a the territorial jurisdiction of magistrates or justices of peace, or of judges of the sessions of the peace is to be extended—the new provisions will apply.

I tried to sum up the two sections in a few words and found one possibility, or rather 16 possibilities, according to whether it is a Canadian aircraft starting in Canada to go elsewhere, or a Canadian aircraft starting elsewhere to come to Canada; or whether it is a non-Canadian aircraft flying from Canada to go elsewhere; or else a non-Canadian aircraft flying from elsewhere to come here; or whether it is the case of a Canadian citizen on board such an aircraft; or else a foreign aircraft coming over here or going elsewhere.

Therefore, I have discovered 16 possibilities. Those possibilities differ depending on whether the pilot is a Canadian or not. Now, I believe, that those various cases which I have just submitted to the committee are so much different cases, and several of those are not provided under this legislation. It may be, however, that those various cases are provided under international agreements, under the international aviation rules, but there is nothing in the bill to say so.

The first case that occurs to me—and I am still referring to clauses 2 and 3 under discussion—involves a Canadian citizen who boards a Canadian aircraft flying out of Canada and is piloted by a Canadian. If he commits an offence, he is subject to arrest because the pilot is a Canadian and it is a Canadian aircraft. However, where can he be brought to court? Here we have a Canadian in a Canadian craft, piloted by a Canadian, flying to a foreign land; he commits an offence on the plane. Will he be held in the foreign airport? Will he be held in custody inside the aircraft upon arrival in the foreign port? Will he be brought back to Canada, or will he be allowed to escape into this foreign country and seek asylum?

There is the second case—I hope the committee will bear with me, because I have 16—

Mr. Fortin: We will make a special code for that, it is worth the trouble.

Mr. Roberge: If the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) wants to have a special case, he might perhaps go to Montmagny-L'Islet where special elections are being held.

I understand that this bill—I shall get away from the subject matter, because I know I can talk law without the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm understanding a word. But when the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm talks tobacco, I keep mum.

The second case refers to a Canadian citizen on board a Canadian aircraft, flying from Canada, but piloted—and the case may occur—by a non-Canadian pilot. Unless this proposed legislation, makes of a non-Canadian pilot an officer of the peace, that pilot will not be able to arrest the Canadian citizen, i.e. the Canadian passenger who is on board and who is committing an offence against the Criminal Code. Then, an offence is committed, but the pilot may not have the culprit arrested except, as I said, if he is an officer of the peace. And as he starts in Canada to go elsewhere, he cannot be brought to court either.

In the third case, which is perhaps the same as that of my friend from Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, he is, no doubt, a Canadian citizen who may be a passenger on a Canadian aircraft. The passenger starts from Europe or elsewhere to come back to this country and the plane will have a Canadian pilot. If the passenger commits some offence—I think he will not do so, but I am told that he possibly may, I don't know—but if he were to commit some offence, he could be arrested, because the pilot would be a Canadian and peace officer. He also may be indicted because he would land in Canada.

Then, there is the fourth case, that of a Canadian citizen on a Canadian aircraft coming to Canada, but piloted by a non-Canadian. In that case, the pilot, not being a Canadian, cannot, I imagine, be a peace officer because Canada probably is not authorized to name anyone a peace officer who is not a Canadian citizen.

So an offence will be committed; there will be no way of arresting the accused, yet a trial may be held. How can such a thing happen? I think the Minister of Justice should give us an explanation on this point.

Turning to the fifth case—bear with me, Mr. Chairman, I have 16—this involves a Canadian citizen travelling on an aircraft not registered in Canada—"any aircraft", it says, from any country other than Canada—and flying out of Canada with a Canadian pilot in charge. Such a situation can arise, because during the war, Canadian flyers were seen piloting British or other foreign planes. Such pilots had not yet been naturalized in the countries concerned; they still retained their Canadian citizenship.

Consequently, according to the bill now introduced and following the study I made of it, there would not be any offence and, of course, the Canadian pilot would not be empowered to arrest a person who for instance would make an assault against another passenger. Moreover, there could not be any judicial proceedings.

The sixth case I want to bring to the attention of the house is perhaps a bit similar. There again, it has to do with a Canadian citizen who is travelling aboard an aircraft which is not of Canadian registry but which would be, this time, flown by a pilot who is not a Canadian citizen. Then there would not be any offence, since this airplane leaves this country for another country, and the pilot, not being a Canadian citizen, would not be empowered to arrest the individual who would commit an offence. Consequently, there would not be any trial either.

The seventh case has to do with a Canadian citizen who is traveling aboard a Canadian aircraft on its way to Canada. Subclause (b), of section 5a, provides for a similar case but the airplane is flown by a Canadian pilot. Then, there would be an offence; the Canadian pilot being a peace officer, could arrest the delinquent and, being in Canada, a trial could be held of course—under the new section—where the plane landed. And for the information of the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Fortin) paragraph 4 of section 5a provides that the plane is stopped when it stops.

Mr. Chairman, the eighth case on which I want to bring the attention of the house concerns a Canadian citizen—I know that the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet is never able to stop—

An hon. Member: It is like the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman I have at least up to ten o'clock.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the hon. member will allow me to answer him immediately, because I am sure he has forgotten the main point, namely that the pilot must be in charge of a Canadian registered aircraft. If the aircraft is not under Canadian registration, the pilot has no authority under the bill now before us.

(Text):

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, if I look at clause 2 of the bill—

An hon. Member: Look at clause 3.

Mr. Roberge: I shall look at clause 3 later, but clause 2 of the bill says that a pilot in command of an aircraft registered in Canada is a peace officer—

Mr. Fulton: He is the only one who has the power to arrest anyone on his aircraft.

Mr. Roberge: But the bill does not say whether the pilot is a Canadian citizen or a foreign citizen.

Mr. Fulton: No, that is true, but the aircraft requires to be registered in Canada before the pilot has this authority. His authority is that of a peace officer, and all he has is the authority of arrest. I suggest that if any Canadian citizen wishes to board an aircraft registered in Canada, then he must be prepared to submit himself to the authority of the pilot with respect to events taking place on that aircraft. The pilot has no power to try or dispose of the case; his only authority is that of arrest for an offence. I see nothing derogatory of Canadian sovereignty. If a Canadian voluntarily boards an aircraft which is registered in Canada, then he submits himself to the authority of the pilot of that aircraft, only with respect to events taking place on that aircraft and only with respect to the power of arrest and not the power of disposing of the case.

Mr. Roberge: I agree with that, Mr. Chairman. The pilot, whether or not he is a Canadian, has no power to try the offender but just the power of arrest. The point about which I am concerned, and that is why I am putting all these cases before the committee, is that our legislation as proposed is going to give a non-Canadian the power of arrest of a Canadian aboard not only a Canadian aircraft but any aircraft.

Mr. Fortin: What is wrong with that?

Mr. Fulton: My hon. friend should recall also that the law of the sea, which is accepted by all nations, gives the skipper of a vessel the immediate power of arrest and confinement over any passenger on his ship. With respect to aircraft, therefore, we are not doing anything more than is done now in connection with the law of the sea, but we are confining this power to aircraft registered in Canada.

Mr. Roberge: I should like to put some more of these cases before the committee, and these cases are non-Canadian. I should like to do so in French.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, the case I want to point out now concerns particularly a non-Canadian citizen leaving Canada aboard a Canadian aircraft flown by a Canadian pilot. If this Canadian citizen should commit an offence, he might be put under arrest but he cannot be brought before the court for trial because he is outside Canada, unless the minister tells us that the international regulations provide that the alleged criminal may be kept under custody aboard the aircraft, near the aircraft or in the air terminal of the country he is visiting.

Mr. Fortin: It is exactly the same thing as under the maritime law.

Mr. Pigeon: I do not think he is a competent lawyer.

Mr. Roberge: The tenth case concerns a non-Canadian citizen flying from Canada aboard a Canadian aircraft which is under the command of a foreign pilot. That citizen may commit an offence and the Minister of Justice just told me that the foreign pilot would be authorized to put that non-Canadian citizen under arrest. However, I do not think any trial would be possible since the aircraft will land in a foreign country, unless the minister informs the committee that under certain international agreements that citizen who committed the offence may be taken into custody and brought back to Canada or be tried in a country other than that where the offence was committed.

Then there is the eleventh case—I urge the hon. members to be patient, I have 16 of these cases, and I have reached the eleventh. There are 5 left and I realize that we have 5 more minutes to go yet.

Mr. Fulton: Hurry up! What are the other five?

(Text):

Mr. Roberge: I am sure that the minister will be very interested to know, and I would like to go on.

(Translation):

The 11th case has to do with a non-Canadian citizen aboard a Canadian aircraft coming to Canada and piloted by a Canadian pilot. If an offence is committed, the pilot will have the power to arrest the offender and the trial might take place, because the aircraft is coming to Canada. In such a case there is no problem.

The 12th case is somewhat different; but the minister has just told us that the foreign pilot will have the powers of a peace officer. An offence is committed by a non-Canadian citizen aboard a Canadian aircraft coming to Canada under a foreign pilot. In such a case, an arrest could be made and a trial could take place in Canada.

The 13th case is a little different—

An hon. Member: That of Montreal-St. Denis.

Mr. Roberge: It concerns a non-Canadian citizen aboard an aircraft which is not registered in Canada, but which leaves Canada for a foreign country, under a Canadian pilot. There is no offence there, but if it were a Canadian or a non-Canadian violating the provisions of the Criminal Code, there would be an offence—

Mr. Fortin: It is a foreign aircraft.

Mr. Roberge: In such a case there could be neither an arrest nor a trial.

The 14th case—it is not that of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm —has to do with a non-Canadian citizen aboard a foreign aircraft leaving Canada and piloted by a foreign pilot. There again, there could be neither an offence nor an arrest, nor a trial. That situation is not a problem.

The 15th case—

An hon. Member: Montreal-St. Denis.

Mr. Denis: Carrier pigeon.

Mr. Roberge: Mr. Chairman, there are only three minutes to go, and I have two more cases to submit to the Minister of Justice. The 15th case concerns a non-Canadian citizen aboard an aircraft not registered in Canada but flying into Canada and piloted by a Canadian. If he commits a criminal offence he can be arrested because the pilot is a Canadian, and he can be put on trial.

According to what the minister said, the sixteenth case is no problem either. It is the last one. I think, with some imagination, we might go up to question No. 64 but this would keep us here till after ten o'clock.

The 16th case deals with a non-Canadian citizen travelling in an aircraft not registered in Canada, or registered in Canada but flown by a foreign pilot. The minister tells us that the foreign pilot could not escape the law. If the passenger were to commit some offence, he could not only be arrested but also be brought to trial.

Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Justice had some fun, and so did I. I wanted to give this illustration because, according to my understanding, there seems to be in the bill before us—

Mr. Pigeon (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): What do you mean by "understanding"?

Mr. Roberge: The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm is asking me what I mean by "understanding." I mean intelligence, and intelligence means comprehension; I therefore mean "to understand something".

I have tried to understand that section 3 of the bill, but I realized that there were certain gaps, the main one being, in my opinion, the following: a Canadian citizen or a non-Canadian commits an offence on board a Canadian aircraft or a non-Canadian aircraft, but on board an aircraft flying from Canada, to go elsewhere—this is so complicated that it is hard to understand!

An hon. Member: There is no possible "understanding".

Mr. Roberge: He commits such an offence while flying from Canada to go elsewhere. I wonder how—especially if the offence is committed on board a Canadian aircraft or on board an aircraft whose pilot is not a Canadian, such person could be brought before the courts when he is not in Canada, at the airport, or will not come back to Canada anyway.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I regret indeed that the hon. gentleman has so completely misunderstood the effect of this legislation, because the 16 cases to which he made reference are 16 complete non sequiturs. They do not arise out of the legislation which we have proposed here, and not one of them has any bearing on the discussion which should be before the committee.

The simple intent and effect of this legislation is to fill a gap in the present law by providing that the pilot in command of an aircraft registered under regulations made pursuant to the Aeronautics Act, which is a Canadian statute, while that aircraft is in flight shall have the power of a peace officer with respect to any crimes committed on the aircraft of which that pilot is in charge. The effect of that clause is precisely the same as the present law with respect to the situation on vessels at sea. The party of my hon. friend was in power for 22 years while the maritime law has had those provisions, and I never heard them suggest that there was any derogation of Canadian sovereignty as a result of those provisions. They were not prepared—whether by reason of ineptitude or laziness I do not know—to take the necessary action to make the same situation prevail with respect to aircraft. We are now filling the hole that my hon. friends left for 22 years.

Clause 3 of the bill is to the effect that any offence committed on an aircraft in flight, which flight terminates in Canada, shall be triable in a Canadian court. We are merely conferring a jurisdiction now lacking upon Canadian courts to try persons committing offences under the law of Canada on aircraft, the flight of which aircraft terminates in Canada. It will be noted that we are not asserting any jurisdiction over persons who are not citizens of Canada with respect to their trials unless the attorney general of Canada authorizes the prosecution. So that is the simple effect of the legislation, and it makes nonsense of the 16 cases put up by my hon. friend, and I will not comment upon his motives for putting up these 16 cases. I will simply say that these cases, raised out of order, have no relation to the provisions of the legislation. The legislation is good legislation requested by responsible aviation associations in Canada including the Canadian pilots association, and the opposition of the hon. gentleman is, to me, incomprehensible.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall the clause carry?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): The hon. minister has just been grounded.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader of the house what the business is for tomorrow and perhaps for Friday and Monday as well?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we will continue with consideration of the amendments to the Criminal Code and then take item 10, an act to amend the Prisons and Reformatories Act; then item 16, second reading of the bill to amend the Maritime Coal Production Assistant Act—I understand the resolution went through this afternoon—then item No. 2 and item No. 11 which deal with agreements between the government of Canada and the governments of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in respect to Indian reserves. The house is sitting only tomorrow morning, so we probably will not be able to do very much business. On Thursday we will commence the estimates of the Department of National Defence and continue with those and the estimates of the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. Chevrier: After item No. 2, did the minister add another one?

An hon. Member: No. 5.

Mr. Green: It is No. 5 on my list and No. 11 on the order paper.

It being six minutes past ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, July 1, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

DOMINION DAY

92ND ANNIVERSARY OF CONFEDERATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, not only is this the 92nd anniversary of confederation but it is the first of Canada's birthdays on which we have been honoured by the presence in Ottawa of the monarch. I am sure that hon. members would wish on this occasion to express the pride of all Canadians in having Her Majesty the Queen and Prince Philip here on Canadian soil joining with us in the celebration of Dominion day. Before the hour is out Her Majesty will be transmitting her message to her Canadian subjects, thereby once more expressing something of the relationship between Canada and the other nations of the commonwealth.

On this day as we look back on the history of our country and her great traditions, we as fellow Canadians will not lose sight of the fact, I am sure, that in Canada's newest province, Newfoundland, this is Memorial day as well, in memory of that gallant battalion of Newfoundlanders who, almost decimated, gave their all for the things in which they and we believe. So on this day I think Canadians as a whole will honour our past and its achievements such as I have mentioned in connection with Memorial day in Newfoundland, will gain strength from the present and dedicate ourselves to the future.

In that spirit, sir, I suggest that hon. members could do no better than follow the course of the past and sing God Save the Queen and O Canada.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): On behalf of our party, Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to associate ourselves with what the Prime Minister has said. This is our national day; it is our 92nd birthday, which in itself is an indication that Canada is no longer one of the younger countries of the world but, even in terms of years, is approaching maturity. It is a very happy coincidence —perhaps "coincidence" is not exactly the right word to use—it is a happy circumstance, Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister has mentioned, that our Queen, the Queen of Canada, is celebrating our national day with us on Canadian soil and that shortly she will be addressing the Canadian people.

The Prime Minister referred to the fact that this is also Memorial day in Newfoundland, the anniversary of that tragic day in Newfoundland's history, that tragic and glorious July 1, 1916, a date many of us will not forget. This reminds us that if Canada has achieved the position in the world that I think we have achieved, it is due in large part to the sacrifices of Canadians in bygone days in peace and in war, of which this was one of the most tragic and the most glorious.

The presence of the Queen and Prince Philip in our midst at this time is an indication, one of which I think we should be happy and proud, that while we are a developing country our roots are deep in the traditions and in the past of our mother country, the United Kingdom and, indeed, of our mother country of France. Because our roots are deep it is assurance, indeed it is reassurance, that we will proceed forward to that glorious destiny which is bound to be ours in Canada if any country has any destiny of any kind in this uncertain world.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me on behalf of the C.C.F. party to join with the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition in saying how pleased we are that Her Majesty and Prince Philip are able to be with us today when we are celebrating Canada's 92nd anniversary. We note also, as has already been said, that this day is commemorated because it is Memorial day in the province of Newfoundland.

In its 92 years as a nation our country has made great progress. Our nation has been founded on two main cultures. Our nation has shown an example to the world in tolerance and understanding and in proving that people of different languages and diverse cultures can live and work together in a democratic framework to build a nation of which every citizen is proud. We look across the world today with the feeling that although we are not, either by way of population or economic strength, the mightiest of the nations, yet by peaceful example, by peaceful co-operation with other nations, by an example of tolerance at home, we can be first among the leaders of the nations of the world.

Whereupon the members of the house rose and sang

God Save the Queen and
O Canada

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ANNOUNCEMENT OF AFTERNOON HOLIDAY FOR STAFF

Mr. Speaker: May I report to the house that as we are not sitting this afternoon I have taken the liberty of making an arrangement which I hope will commend itself to the house as being in the spirit of the day, namely that the services of the house that are not required this afternoon will be dispensed with. The chiefs of staff have been advised to free all staff not needed to carry on essential services at one o'clock.

4. (a) It is estimated that $3,459,883.00 may be paid in 1959/60 in connection with a 20 megawatt thermal plant at Trenton.

(b) It is estimated that $5,632,953.00 may be paid in 1959/60 in connection with the East Saint John plant.

THERMO POWER PLANT, EAST SAINT JOHN, N.B.

Question No. 108—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Is work presently underway for the construction of a thermo power plant at East Saint John, New Brunswick?
2. If so: (a) what is the estimated cost of the proposed plant? (b) has a specific agreement been signed with the federal government as required under the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act? (c) if such an agreement has not been signed, what is the reason for the delay?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): The answer to the first question is yes.

The answer to the second question, part (a) is $10 million.

The answer to part (b) is that a master agreement is in force between Canada and New Brunswick pursuant to the Atlantic Provinces Power Development Act but no subsidiary agreement has been signed regarding the East Saint John thermal plant.

The answer to part (c) is, as I indicated to the house on May 19, 1959, that the province of New Brunswick has set up a royal commission to consider policy on the costs and operation of this plant. When the commission's report is received the province will undoubtedly consider its future course of action as regards an agreement with the federal government.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—NATURAL RESOURCE PROCESSING

Question No. 97—Mr. Pickersgill:

1. Have any special fiscal considerations been offered by the government to encourage private enterprises to locate in the Atlantic provinces to encourage the processing of natural resources?
2. If so, what are those considerations?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that this question be made an order for return.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the question is a very simple one, and it does not appear to me that it needs to be buried as so many starred questions have been buried already during this session.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The reason is that the answer will require information from more than one department, so I made the proposal in order to facilitate the furnishing of complete information, on the assumption that that was what the hon. gentleman sought.

Mr. Pickersgill: I might draw Your Honour's attention to the fact this question has already been on the order paper for 30 days.

Mr. Speaker: Order for return.

FEDERAL BROADCASTS, CJON, ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

STATEMENT RESPECTING CONFERENCE ON FISCAL MATTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister of Finance in a position to answer the questions asked the other day in connection with the conference of provincial treasurers which opens next Monday in Ottawa?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have now seen the questions which were asked on Monday and Tuesday by the Leader of the Opposition in this respect while I was in Toronto in attendance on Her Majesty. So far as Monday's question is concerned, which asked if an invitation had been extended by the government to the premiers of the provinces to attend the conference, I may say that the answer is in the negative. This conference was designed as one of a financial nature, and the invitation was extended to the provincial treasurers or provincial ministers of finance. Of course no attempt was made to draw any limits or make any suggestions as to those whom the provincial treasurer or minister of finance might wish to have associated with him in the delegation representing the province.

There are three provinces in which the provincial treasurer or minister of finance is also the premier. They are British Columbia, Manitoba and Nova Scotia. In these three cases the premier of the province will be attending in his capacity as provincial treasurer. We have also received from the treasurer of Prince Edward Island an intimation that the premier of that province will also be attending the conference with him. I have not had any communication from the province of Quebec in this respect, although references were made in a debate in the house several weeks ago to a newspaper report indicating that the prime minister of Quebec would be attending the conference along with the minister of finance of that province.

The question on Tuesday asked me to make some statement concerning the agenda to be brought before the conference. We prepared in the Department of Finance some weeks ago a quite comprehensive list of proposed subjects which included all those which had been suggested by any of the provinces in the course of the communications which had passed between Ottawa and the capitals of the provinces or which had been discussed in the course of the visit made to all the provincial capitals by the director of the dominion-provincial relations division of the Department of Finance.

This document, which was of a confidential nature, was submitted to all the provincial treasurers or provincial ministers of finance for their approval. I may say that we have had communications from a majority of the provincial treasurers in the meantime approving the proposed list of topics. I think we have not yet heard from quite all but have heard from the majority of them.

Subject to the decision of the conference itself when it assembles next Monday, this list of proposed subjects will form the basis of discussion at the conference and in the further meeting to follow. It will involve on the part of the conference itself decisions with regard to priorities, selection, arrangement and then the reference to the meeting of the continuing committee of officials as the conference of ministers may decide.

Mr. Pearson: Did I understand the minister to say that no official communication had been received by him that the premier of Quebec would be attending?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not believe there has been any official communication on that subject. There had not been any, to my knowledge, up to the time I left for Toronto at the end of last week.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Can the Minister of Finance say whether any of the conference proceedings will be open to the public, as is usual on occasions when heads of government meet at such conferences; and in view of the strong statement made by Premier Roblin last week that he thought there should be held at the earliest possible moment a dominion-provincial conference at the usual level, is the hon. gentleman in a position to say, after his two-day absence from this house which undoubtedly has given him an opportunity for relaxation, whether there will be such a conference before the end of this calendar year in order to fulfil the promises made by the Prime Minister and the government?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, all promises made by the government have been fulfilled, and the government is continuing in the same worthy spirit to carry forward the work which is being done to repair the damage caused to dominion-provincial relations by our predecessors. While the task which has been handed on to us is not an easy one, we think we shall in time repair the damage that was done before we were entrusted with this responsibility.

I was asked whether these meetings would be open to the public. Again, this is a matter for decision of the conference itself. It is my understanding, and indeed this has been confirmed by the view of a considerable number of ministers who will be attending the conference, that having regard to the nature of the conference it ought to proceed in camera.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question supplementary to those which have been asked by my colleagues. Would the Prime Minister consider setting aside a day for the purpose of discussing some of the matters that might be presented before the provincial treasurers and ministers of finance in order to enable us in Ottawa to know in general what views the Minister of Finance will express on behalf of the government of Canada?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I notice that the hon. gentleman is reading from Hansard, and I seem to recollect that the answer given at the time was that there was no necessity of that being done. Nothing was done to achieve the suggestion contained in the question, and having regard to the amount of discussion which has already taken place on this subject—ten days during this session, the Minister of Finance points out—I am sure that every view that could possibly be canvassed has been canvassed to date.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the Prime Minister mean by that reply that he now thinks Mr. St. Laurent was right in his answer at that time?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going to enter into controversy with a right hon. gentleman who is no longer a member of the house.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the Minister of Finance a question arising out of the answer he gave to the Leader of the Opposition. In that answer he said there was no hard and fast agenda which had been submitted, but that on the other hand there was a comprehensive report which had been prepared by the Minister of Finance. Has that comprehensive report been sent out to those who are attending the conference and, second is federal aid to universities one of the subjects referred to?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): The document to which I referred in my earlier statement this morning went out to all the provincial treasurers some weeks ago, and their comments were invited as to whether they thought it would furnish an acceptable agenda for the conference. The contents of the document were confidential, and the document has not been released from that category.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister indicate whether, if most of the provincial governments have indicated their acceptance of this proposed agenda, those which have done so include the government of the province of Quebec?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have not seen the communications, if any, which have come in within the last two days, and of course the government offices are closed today, so my answer must not be taken as being complete up to this moment. I do not think the province of Quebec has yet made any comment on the scope of the proposed list of topics.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of the fact that some provincial premiers have indicated formally or in some way their intention of attending this conference, may I ask the minister if he draws any special conclusion from the fact that the premier of Quebec, announcing his decision to come, has not advised the government of his intention to do so?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I do not think I would draw any conclusion from that except that the present government does not question the right of any provincial government to make its own selection. It may not be easy for the hon. gentleman to realize that the present federal government does not attempt to dictate to the provinces in any shape or form.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just to the C.B.C.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I can only ask hon. gentlemen opposite to realize that within the last two years times have changed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): In view of the very illuminating reply we have just received and the assurance that this government does not dictate to the provinces, may I ask the Minister of Finance if that means that hereafter there will no longer be telegrams sent advising the provinces what the government proposed to do in the matter of dominion-provincial relations, without consulting the provinces?

Mr. Speaker: The questions are taking on the attributes of the debate which was suggested earlier, and might be concluded at this point unless the Minister of Finance feels it necessary to reply to the last contribution.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I think that ought to be answered.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I am happy to answer the question asked by the hon. gentleman. The government will take advantage of the usual channels of communication in order to communicate to the provinces the good news of the more generous treatment they are receiving on the part of the present government.

[Later:]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the statement made by the Minister of Finance about the more generous treatment being given to the provinces could the Prime Minister say how soon the usual channels of communication to this house will be used by the government to indicate to the house the nature of the legislation with respect to the implementing of the terms of union?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, amidst all that verbiage it is rather difficult to understand the hon. member's point—

Mr. Pickersgill: I was only seeking to repeat the words of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —but making due allowance for the unnecessary and unattractive adornment may I say that the same question has been asked before. The legislation will be proceeded with some time during the present session, and as soon as possible.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Has consideration been given to inviting representatives of the municipalities to the forthcoming federal-provincial conference? I ask this because of their vital interest.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, this is a meeting of provincial treasurers and provincial ministers of finance with the federal Minister of Finance. So far as I am aware no municipal representatives are associated with the delegations representing any of the provinces.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

REQUEST FOR MAINTENANCE OF HISTORICAL RECORD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, as an aged but sentimental rebel I wish to direct to the Secretary of State an appropriate question for this historic day.

In view of the report in the Ottawa Citizen of June 23 that Mr. Pearson, the architect of the present parliament buildings, died before he could complete a book giving an account of the historic features of our parliament buildings, and that there is only one man living who shares his knowledge, retired Sergeant Thomas L. Closs, formerly of the House of Commons protective staff; and in view of the importance of preserving this historical knowledge of such great interest to all Canadians, and because of the inexorable passing of time, would the minister consider taking immediate action to have Mr. Closs's knowledge of the historic features of our parliament buildings recorded for posterity?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): I wish to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his question. Unfortunately, today being a holiday, it is impossible for me to contact the proper departmental officials to give the hon. member the information he requires but as soon as possible I shall answer his question.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED MEETING OF FOREIGN MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he can give us any information about the report that there is to be a meeting of NATO foreign ministers before the reconvening of the conference at Geneva; and if so, can he assure the house that any such meeting will include all the NATO members and not only a few of them?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at the present time we have no indication that there will be such a meeting. The Leader of the Opposition will have noticed that statements were made after the recent meeting between the presidents of France and Italy to the effect that these two nations wish to have a meeting of the foreign ministers of the four nations, United States, United Kingdom, France and Italy. In this connection I should like to stress that, as I said on June 22, the Canadian government attaches great importance to the consultations on this question of the Geneva conference which have been taking place in the NATO council and are still continuing. It is in these consultations that Canada is particularly interested.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

PRINTING BUREAU CONTRACTS, QUEBEC—ATLAS OF CANADAA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Secretary of State if he hopes to answer my questions in the very near future?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

ST. JOHNS, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO PURCHASE OF PROPERTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, but in his absence I wish to direct my question to the Solicitor General.

(Translation):

Has the Minister of Transport received a request from the city of St. Johns (Quebec) for the lease of a site south of Central Vermont railway bridge, at St. Johns?

I would also like to ask a supplementary question. Has the Minister of Transport been requested by the junior chamber of commerce of St. Johns that this site be leased to the city of St. Johns rather than to private interests?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Solicitor General): I shall make the necessary inquiry into this matter, Mr. Speaker, and shall give an answer tomorrow.

BRIDGES

CHAMPLAIN BRIDGE, MONTREAL—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerard Loiselle (St. Ann): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport or, in his absence, to the acting minister.

Could the minister indicate why all construction work has been suspended on the Champlain bridge, which is a necessity not only for the western part of the city of Montreal, but also for the people on the south shore? If there are serious reasons for this, could he state them?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have no comment on that today, but I shall take the question as notice.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

COMBINES ACT AMENDMENT—SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT OF CONSIDERATION UNTIL NEXT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Justice if he is now in a position to answer the questions which were addressed to the Prime Minister the other day in connection with the procedure to be followed in relation to the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I am not in a position to give a definite answer, but I expect to be in a position to do so early next week. I have not yet concluded discussions with my colleagues.

CRIMINAL CODE

The house resumed, from Tuesday, June 30, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-58, to amend the Criminal Code—Mr. Fulton—Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

On clauses 2 and 3.

The Chairman: We were considering clauses 2 and 3 simultaneously. Shall these clauses carry?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, last night when we were dealing with these clauses it seems to me that a certain amount of misunderstanding arose as to the nature and effect of these provisions and as to why they have been included in the bill. I thought therefore a short statement from me at this time might be helpful. I should therefore like to advise the committee as to the background situation and what it is that we hope to accomplish by these provisions.

These clauses deal in an interim way with some of the many problems in relation to crimes committed on aircraft, which are the subject matter of study by international lawyers, as well as municipal lawyers.

Under the authority of the international civil aviation organization, international lawyers from many countries are grappling with the problem of working out rules of private international law which may be adopted by all the nations so there will be some country adopting jurisdiction and accepting responsibility in every case, and so there will be no overlapping of claims and unseemly clashes as between the legal systems of different nations.

This great project which has, as I have said, been tackled in an organized way by international lawyers from many countries will, apparently, take a long time to conclude. There are many problems to be solved and many possible principles that might be adopted for their solution. These are all being explored on a systematic basis and the result will, I am confident, provide all nations with a sound and proper basis for its domestic legislation.

In the meantime there are certain gaps in the provisions of our law in connection with crimes committed on aircraft which cannot be ignored. These include, first, the fact that our law does not recognize criminal law running with an aircraft over the high seas; and second, the determination of the situs of a crime so as to determine substantive law and jurisdiction is virtually impossible, so as to leave the culprit free from prosecution.

The result is that so far as our law is concerned, one man could deliberately and with malice aforethought kill another on an aircraft over the Atlantic and, on landing in Canada, boast of his deed with impunity. This is a situation which in my view cannot be allowed to continue.

The Canadian Bar Association recognized the situation and asked that appropriate steps be taken. We in the Department of Justice, after studying the matter, concluded that it could be dealt with on an interim basis in the manner set out in clause 3. We worked out a project which we referred to the criminal law section of the uniformity of laws conference. That body made some suggestions which we have adopted in clause 3. We have also made subsequent modifications as a result of our own studies.

What we are proposing in clause 3 may not solve all the problems, and it is admittedly not the fruit of the application of generally accepted principles of private international law. There is none as yet. I do think, however, that it fills in a practical way the most obvious gaps in our law without creating intolerable problems of proof and unbearable burdens of expense.

With reference to clause 2, the international lawyers to whom I have referred are also studying the legal position of the aircraft commander; that is, the whole problem of what duties and powers should be attached to his position. In the meantime, until international agreement is reached as to what those duties and powers should be, it seems clear that the law should, so far as Canada is concerned at least, confer on him the minimum status necessary to enable him to cope in a practical way with the problems he is liable to encounter while in flight. This is in line with the recommendations of the Canadian pilots' association, which had asked that the authority of a pilot should be defined.

The criminal law section of the uniformity of laws conference was consulted on this problem also, and made the recommendation that the commander of an aircraft should have the powers of a peace officer during a flight. Clause 2 is designed to implement that recommendation.

Finally, I wish to repeat for emphasis that these two proposals are put forward as interim, stop gap measures on the understanding that as soon as the nations have agreed on uniform rules to deal with these and other problems, we shall then give the most careful consideration to adopting such rules as part of the domestic law of Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I think the committee will welcome the statement the minister has made this morning, arising perhaps out of the discussion which took place last night. It is unfortunate that the minister did not see fit to make a similar statement earlier in the debate, which perhaps would have avoided some of the apparent misunderstanding which did take place.

There are a number of questions which come to my mind, arising not only out of the statement the minister has made but also out of the two clauses which are now before the committee. In the first place, a point was made by the minister and by certain hon. members yesterday that the position here is like that of a ship, and the question which immediately comes to my mind is this. There are many ships in which the master has the powers which are given to the pilot here, but the ship is not registered in Canada. There are many ships operating between our shores and foreign lands which are not of Canadian registry, and therefore it seems to me there is a distinction to be established between a ship and an aircraft which, apparently from the definition, must be one which is registered in Canada. Therefore I ask the minister immediately what is meant by the words:

On an aircraft registered in Canada under regulations made under the Aeronautics Act—

That has not been made clear from the discussion which took place last evening and again in the statement which the minister made earlier. I welcome the statement from the minister that much of this is brought about because of recommendations or decisions made by ICAO, the international civil aviation organization. That is clearly different from the attitude taken by the minister last night.

Mr. Fulton: Not at all; I said that last night.

Mr. Chevrier: But the minister also said that we had been in office for 22 years and we had not done a thing with reference to this matter. In other words we were lazy in not bringing this forward; we were inept, and the like, thereby injecting a purely political note in a matter which is not at all political, but a matter which should be dealt with on its merits and I propose to deal with it on its merits now and not from any political aspect at all. After all, I think if we had been in office the first thing we would have done following a recommendation of ICAO would have been to ask a committee of this house to bring a matter of this importance into operation by way of legislation.

Then the minister says that this is an interim, stop gap measure. I invite him to define that a little more clearly. I realize there is no law which is more uncertain than that of aviation, and that is simply because of the fact that there is little or no jurisprudence on that matter in this country. That being the case, it is not surprising that there should be a number of gaps in the Canadian law having to do with aviation. Therefore it strikes me, sir, that we should get from the minister an explanation of what is meant by:

On an aircraft registered in Canada under regulations made under the Aeronautics Act—

Also why does he make a distinction between a ship and an aircraft, because evidently the aircraft must be one registered in Canada, according to the amending clause; whereas the ship need not be one registered in Canada although the master of the vessel, to use the minister's words or paraphrasing them, will have the same powers as the pilot of the aircraft. Then perhaps he might go a little bit further into the question of the stop gap, interim measure. How long is it expected that this will be an interim measure until legislation which can apply to all countries becomes operative?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps there is a small misunderstanding between myself and the hon. member which I shall clarify now. Clauses 2 and 3 of this legislation are not something which has been recommended to us by ICAO. The fact is that ICAO is studying, through committees of lawyers, this whole problem of international aviation law, and we are participating as members in that study. But it is obvious that it will be some considerable time before these studies result in recommendations from ICAO to its member nations. We have felt that in the meantime, to plug these very substantial and far-reaching gaps, we should act to amend our own domestic law.

It was in that sense that I used the words that this was an interim or stop gap measure, because it would be our intention, as soon as we have the recommendations from ICAO, to study it and if, as I anticipate would be the case normally, we find them appropriate, then we shall recommend to parliament the adoption of such portions as are applicable to Canada and they will become then, if parliament agrees, the law of Canada and this present provision will be repealed.

Therefore the answer to the question as to what will be the duration of this stop gap or interim legislation must be, I think, at least until such time as we receive recommendations from the international organization and are in a position to recommend them to parliament in substitution of or in addition to what we are asking parliament to enact here.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister a question before he passes on to another subject. If ICAO does make recommendations having to do with matters of this kind, or other matters affecting aviation generally, must there not be an international agreement by all members of ICAO before it can become law?

Mr. Fulton: I understand it could be done in either one of two ways, either by having ICAO make a recommendation to the member nations but those nations to adopt the recommendation on their own; or, alternatively, by following the procedure of trying to work out an international convention to which the member nations would subscribe; and if we subscribed then, of course, the rules of this convention would become part of our law.

Mr. Chevrier: May I have the answer to the other question?

Mr. Fulton: The other question was why is it that we are confining clause 2 to aircraft registered in Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: What is the meaning of the phrase, "on an aircraft registered in Canada under regulations made under the Aeronautics Act"?

Mr. Fulton: I think, Mr. Chairman, it is that the provisions regarding registration of aircraft in Canada are contained in these regulations under the Aeronautics Act. We wanted to describe or refer to the type of aircraft to which this clause would be applicable and we therefore made reference to the statute under which the regulations governing registration are made. The reason we have confined it to aircraft registered in Canada is really that this is an interim measure, and we felt that during this interim period we should not seek to extend Canadian law to any aircraft not registered in Canada. We felt that to make a general extension would perhaps be asserting a degree of Canadian sovereignty that does not in fact exist, whereas we are quite confident that we are on sound ground in extending this to aircraft registered in Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask another question. I perhaps knew this at one time but I do not at the moment. Under the regulations passed under the Aeronautics Act is there provision for the registration of foreign aircraft in this country?

Mr. Fulton: I am not thoroughly familiar with these matters; therefore my answers may be a little inaccurate. If I find they are I will try to correct them as I go along. I find that part 2 of the regulations in paragraph 200 provides that no person shall fly an aircraft in Canada unless it is registered under this part or under the laws of a contracting state or a state that is a party to an agreement entered into with Canada relating to interstate flying.

Paragraph 204 of the regulations lays down the conditions that must be complied with before an aircraft can be registered under these regulations. It provides in the main that it cannot be registered unless it is a state aircraft or is owned exclusively by a person qualified to be the registered owner of a Canadian aircraft; that there is in force a certificate of airworthiness, and various other provisions as to the conditions that must be complied with before registration can be effected.

To answer my hon. friend's question, I think the operative words are that no person shall fly an aircraft in Canada unless it is registered under this part or under the laws of a contracting state which is a party to an agreement with Canada.

Mr. Chevrier: I understand that it is not an easy matter to bring in legislation of this kind and be familiar with all of the regulations under the Aeronautics Act. I am not going to press the minister unduly but I wonder whether he can tell me whether aircraft, the property of the government of France or of the government of the United Kingdom, flying into Dorval and thence to other places in Canada, if they have the right under an air agreement, are required to be registered in Canada under these regulations from which the minister has just read.

Mr. Fulton: The answer, I think, is that it is not necessary under those circumstances for the aircraft to be registered in Canada, because under the provisions of subparagraph (b) of paragraph 200 of the regulations it is not required to be registered here if it is registered under the laws of a contracting state or a state that is a party to an agreement entered into with Canada. Therefore if the government of France and the government of Canada have an agreement giving Air France flying rights in Canada and the aircraft of Air France are registered in France, they would not have to be registered in Canada under the appropriate provisions of the regulations.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): I have one point on which I should like some information from the minister. It has to do with the definition of "in flight" in clause 3. As the minister is probably well aware, Scandinavian Air lines has the privilege of landing at the Winnipeg airport only for the purpose of refueling. It has no privileges with respect to embarking or disembarking passengers. Aircraft from Sweden land at Winnipeg for refueling only and their terminal point is Los Angeles.

Two or three years ago we had a case involving a Canadian citizen who got off the aircraft in Winnipeg and refused to get back on in order to proceed to Los Angeles and then come back to Winnipeg. The police were called and the fact of the matter is that the passenger did go back on the airplane and complete the flight.

At that time it was a matter of interest to the members of the Manitoba bar as to what legal right the police or anyone else had to compel a Canadian citizen on Canadian soil to go back on the aircraft. As a matter of fact it was the opinion of many legal men in Manitoba at that time that there was no provision under the Criminal Code or anywhere else that could be utilized to compel a Canadian citizen to leave Canadian soil. What I am wondering is whether or not—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): I would ask the hon. member how he relates —would the hon. member take his seat—that particular matter to this clause which deals with offences committed in flight. As I understand the Winnipeg case to which he has referred, it was a matter of the man being off the aircraft, and as far as the Chair knows there was no question of an offence being committed in flight.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): That is just the point, and I would ask you to bear with me for a moment. The clause defining "in flight" states that an aircraft shall be deemed to be in flight from the moment it first moves under its own power for the purpose of taking off until the moment it comes to rest at the end of its flight, and when it so comes to rest that flight shall be deemed to have terminated. If the fact that the aircraft only lands at Winnipeg for refueling means that its flight is not so terminated and does not terminate until the aircraft lands in Los Angeles, then clauses 2 and 3 are applicable to the rights of the pilot of the aircraft, and clause 3 would apply to anything a person might do while the aircraft was at the city of Winnipeg.

I should like the minister's opinion with regard to what the word "terminate" means and where the end of the flight of this aircraft would be. If the termination point is Los Angeles and the end of the flight is Los Angeles then clauses 2 and 3 might cover the case I have just cited, and may I say that I think a similar case will come up again within the next few years.

Mr. Fulton: I think the hon. member is using the word "flight" where he should be using the word "schedule". Los Angeles is the termination of the schedule, but it is my view that the wording of this clause makes it sufficiently clear that if the aircraft comes to rest in Winnipeg then its flight, for the purposes of this clause, is terminated in Winnipeg, and that therefore an offence committed on that aircraft while in flight to Winnipeg could be dealt with under this clause. But of course that has no relation to the situation that my hon. friend referred to in introducing his remarks. There was no question of an offence having been committed on that occasion.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have a question I should like to ask the minister in relation to his reply. I remember this case quite well. The minister was in charge of the Department of Immigration and Citizenship at that time, as he will no doubt recall.

Mr. Fulton: That case has nothing to do with the bill.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am going to suggest to the minister that unless we have absolute assurance that the flight terminated in Winnipeg then it does have relationship to this bill, because this man was a passenger on a flight which terminated, in the ordinary sense of the word, in Los Angeles. He got off and went into the airport building.

Mr. Fulton: That case had nothing to do with the clause we are now discussing.

Mr. Pickersgill: If the minister has something to say perhaps he might rise and raise a point of order and not just mumble from his seat.

Mr. Fulton: Very well; I will respond to that courteous invitation by raising the point of order that the situation in Winnipeg which is now being discussed has no relationship to this clause because there was no question there of any offence having been committed, and we are not seeking under this bill to change the laws applicable to the situation my hon. friend is discussing.

Mr. Pickersgill: I might point out that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was allowed to discuss this matter, and I am relating it directly to the word "terminate" which is in the legislation itself. I believe the ordinary person—I am not a lawyer—would think a flight ending at Los Angeles terminated at Los Angeles and although the aircraft was not in the air, that while he was on that aircraft it was in flight. I do not know on what basis this man could have been detained, unless it was by order of the pilot because the pilot had asked to have him apprehended.

I should like to ask the minister whether it would be possible for the pilot of such an aircraft, when passengers are not allowed to land although they are Canadian citizens and have a right under the citizenship act to come into Canada without let or hindrance from anybody, in any circumstances to detain a Canadian citizen and prevent him from landing in Canada at one of these refueling places.

Mr. Fulton: It does not seem to me to be very realistic to suggest that if an aircraft is at rest on the ground anyone would say the aircraft is in flight. It seems to me it follows automatically from the point of view of logic and common sense, as well as the ordinary definition of words, that an aircraft is not in flight if it is at rest on the ground at Winnipeg. I think my hon. friend would agree with that interpretation. The key words are found in section 5a (1) (a) of the act:

> —everyone who
> (a) on an aircraft registered in Canada under regulations made under the Aeronautics Act, while the aircraft is in flight, or > (b) on any aircraft, while the aircraft is in flight if the flight terminated in Canada—

As I say, the aircraft is certainly not in flight if the aircraft is sitting on the ground stationary at the airport at Winnipeg or anywhere else.

Mr. Pickersgill: But would the minister look at subsection 4, the last few words?

Mr. Fulton: Yes; the aircraft would be deemed to be in flight from the moment it first moved under its own power for the purpose of taking off until the moment it came to rest at the end of its flight. It seems to me the courts, and we drew this section accordingly, would say that if it stops at Winnipeg it would have come to rest.

Mr. Pickersgill: But "at the end of its flight"; those are the words that bother me.

Mr. Fulton: We are not talking about the end of the trip for which it is scheduled; we are talking about the flight. Since we have said that when it comes to rest on the ground it shall not be deemed to be in flight, putting the two together the courts will have a clear indication of what parliament intended.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister is satisfied that even if a pilot had the power we are seeking to give him here he could not arrest a Canadian citizen once the aircraft had come down at a Canadian airport, even though that air line had no authority to land passengers in Canada?

Mr. Fulton: Yes; he could not arrest him unless there had been an offence committed by that Canadian citizen while the aircraft was in flight on its way to Winnipeg, and he could not arrest him after the flight came to an end, after the passengers got off the aircraft. It is my view that the pilot could not follow him out of the aircraft on to the airport and place him under arrest.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could he arrest him in the aircraft—

The Chairman: The hon. member for Nickel Belt.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am continuing a discussion with the minister, Mr. Chairman. I was asking, could the pilot arrest him in the aircraft after the aircraft came to rest? My point is that the aircraft—

The Chairman: Order; the hon. member for Nickel Belt got up before the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, and I gave him the floor.

Mr. Godin: I should like to hear a continuation of the argument put forward by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, since my question of the minister is related to the same subject. I hope the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will not lose track of the argument he was putting forward to the minister. It seems to me that this section brings to light problems which could become grave. I am just wondering at this time if the minister has any opinion on the meaning of the word "rest" in subsection 4 of section 5A of the act? This subsection indicates precisely that as soon as the aircraft is in motion the flight begins and therefore the authority of the pilot to arrest a person begins, but the word "rest" as used in that section I would think is open to several interpretations.

Suppose a plane left Germany and came to rest in Canada. It could be argued that if a crime were committed at the time the aircraft touched Canadian soil but before it stopped, the crime was committed on Canadian soil and therefore the pilot had power of arrest and the case could be prosecuted in Canada.

Possibly the minister could enlighten the committee by indicating what the position would be under Canadian law if a crime were committed after a foreign plane had stopped in Winnipeg and before it got in motion again. Let us assume the plane is stopped for 20 minutes for refueling purposes, and a theft is committed in a German aircraft or whatever aircraft it may be; what is the position? Who has authority? Is it only a Canadian constable in Winnipeg who can make the arrest while the aircraft is stopped for 20 minutes? Is the pilot authorized to make the arrest while a foreign aircraft is stopped in Canada? Suppose an Italian person committed a theft while the plane was stopped for 20 minutes; could the pilot make the arrest?

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: I am afraid there are a number of questions asked and I shall have to separate them in order to answer them. If there is a crime committed while the aircraft is at rest at a Canadian airport for a 20-minute refueling stop, the pilot has no authority to arrest because his authority to arrest is confined to the period while the aircraft is in flight, and "flight" is defined in the act. If there were a crime committed while the aircraft was at rest in Canada there would be no question of jurisdiction, because that would be a crime committed on Canadian soil. All that would happen there would be that the air line officials would get in touch with the nearest peace officer who would arrest the man. Our courts would have jurisdiction to try the case because that would be a crime committed on Canadian soil.

As I understood the hon. member, the next question he asked me was what happens if the crime is committed after the aircraft's wheels have touched the ground and while the aircraft is taxiing up to the airport. This would be covered in two ways. This would be deemed to have occurred while the aircraft is in flight because the aircraft has not come to rest. We have it in flight, according to the definition, and therefore the pilot would have authority to make the arrest, but not to try or dispose of the case; only to make the arrest of the person who committed the crime before the aircraft had come to rest. In addition, it would be my view that this crime would also be a crime committed on Canadian soil and therefore in addition to the power of arrest of the pilot there would be jurisdiction for arrest by Canadian peace officers and jurisdiction of Canadian courts to try the case.

Similarly, if a crime were committed after the aircraft doors were closed and the aircraft had commenced to taxi, prior to its take-off, that by definition would be a crime committed in flight and once again therefore the pilot of the aircraft would have the power of arrest under this section, if it is an aircraft registered in Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I might now put the question I attempted to put to the minister before. If an aircraft arrives at a Canadian airport and comes to rest, and before the doors are opened a Canadian citizen on that aircraft owned by an air line that is not allowed to land passengers in Canada, seeks to get out of the aircraft, has the pilot any power under this legislation to detain him?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Chairman; because the attempt to get out of an aircraft is not an offence of the type that we are dealing with under these two sections. This refers to indictable offences.

Mr. Pickersgill: So that in no way could this legislation give the pilot any power to detain a Canadian citizen within the aircraft because the air line was not allowed to land passengers at that place?

Mr. Fulton: The answer is no, it does not.

Mr. Crestohl: As the minister properly pointed out, this is a new field of law. A new form of legislation is being created, and new jurisprudence will be created. As the minister quite properly indicated, this whole field is now being explored.

I think we should pay very close attention to the definition of the terms that we are now applying. I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who finds a problem in the words "termination of flight". In section (b), for example, of 5a we find the words "while the aircraft is in flight if the flight terminated in Canada". Does the minister not think that instead of the words "terminated in Canada" it might be better to use the words "if it lands in Canada"? You would thereby eliminate the difficulty with regard to "termination of flight". It is en route going from one place to another. If there is a forced landing, for example, you do not say that is the termination of flight in Canada. But if you use language such as "where the aircraft lands in Canada", we do not have to interpret as to whether it is a forced landing or a landing for refueling.

Suppose a pilot has difficulty with a passenger while they are in the air over the Atlantic and he finds that he must get rid of this passenger because he is interfering with the flight. The pilot does not have to wait until he terminates his flight. He should set down at the very first airport he comes to in Canada. He therefore has landed his aircraft. I therefore think it is necessary to have this matter cleared up.

Mr. Fulton: He would therefore terminate his flight. If he put the aircraft down and it came to rest, he would terminate his flight.

Mr. Crestohl: I see no objection to using the language "if he lands in Canada" because the words "terminate his flight" do create some confusion in interpretation. I do not think the minister can give a definition here that a flight is terminated when an aircraft stops after a forced landing.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, yes.

Mr. Crestohl: When the international interpretation of these terms is given I think the minister will find that a flight is terminated when the aircraft goes from one destination to its other destination. Otherwise it is still en route; it is still in flight. Otherwise I see no difficulty in just changing these words to "if the aircraft lands in Canada".

I have another question to ask the minister in connection with subsection 3 of section 5a, which reads as follows:

(3) No proceedings shall be instituted under this section where the accused is not a Canadian citizen—

And so on. I point out to the minister that we have jurisdiction over people in Canada once they are landed here. Even though they are not yet citizens of Canada we have jurisdiction over them. You may have a man travelling on a certificate of identity. He may be, for example, a stateless person and be travelling from Europe and back on a certificate of identity. He is not a citizen, but if he commits an offence in Canada we have jurisdiction over him. Why should we not have jurisdiction over him in the same way that we have jurisdiction over a Canadian citizen in flight?

Mr. Fulton: We have, but we have put in as a precaution that the consent of the Attorney General of Canada must be obtained. We do not say that we have no jurisdiction in section 5A. We are merely saying that it shall not be exercised without the consent of the Attorney General of Canada so questions of dual jurisdiction can be resolved. We are not abandoning jurisdiction.

Mr. Crestohl: I interpreted this legislation as seeking to take jurisdiction over someone over whom we have no jurisdiction in Canada at all. We have jurisdiction over a person who has landed. Supposing in flight there is a foreigner on that plane. We have no jurisdiction over him.

Mr. Fulton: We will have with respect to offences committed on the aircraft if the flight terminates in Canada and if this bill carries.

Mr. Crestohl: Then we have to apply to the Attorney General of Canada for permission to prosecute him, because otherwise we have no jurisdiction over him. But we have jurisdiction over a person who has landed.

Mr. Fulton: That is not correct, Mr. Chairman. If this bill passes we will have jurisdiction over him with respect to trial for an offence he has committed. It is only in order to proceed to trial that you require consent of the Attorney General of Canada if he is not a Canadian citizen; but that does not alter the fact that if the bill carries we will have established jurisdiction to try him for an offence.

The Chairman: Shall clauses 2 and 3 carry?

(Translation):

Mr. Eudes: Mr. Chairman, just a word about section 3 of Bill C-58 which adds to the Criminal Code a new section, i.e. 5a, dealing with offences committed on aircraft while in flight, and with the matter of jurisdiction regarding such an offence.

Now section 419 of the Criminal Code already deals, in the chapter on "special jurisdiction", with the jurisdiction applying in respect of an offence committed on "water between jurisdictions", or during a journey on a ship or in an aircraft while in flight.

It would seem to me more logical that the new section 5a be nearer to section 419, as both deal with closely interconnected matters. I find it hard to understand why the new section 5a is placed between sections 5 and 6.

Section 5 of the Criminal Code deals mainly with the presumed innocence of the accused and with the punishment that can be imposed on those convicted of an offence.

Section 6 of the Criminal Code, chapter 51 of the Statutes of Canada, decrees that the provisions of this legislation apply throughout Canada, with two exceptions.

It therefore seems to me that section 5a would be better placed near section 419. To my mind, this could only improve the sequence of the numerous sections of the Criminal Code, which are surely not too clear already.

(Text):

Mr. Fulton: The reasons the proposed new section is placed where we suggest, namely following the present section 5, are two in number. In the first place my hon. friend will see that the present section 5, subsection 2 of the Criminal Code states as follows:

(2) Subject to this act or any other act of the parliament of Canada, no person shall be convicted in Canada for an offence committed outside of Canada.

We thought it was logical for us to place in the code immediately following that section this new section which shall create jurisdiction to try persons for an offence committed outside of Canada. That seemed to be the logical place to put it.

The second reason is this. If my hon. friend will consider the matter I think he will realize that section 419 deals exclusively with offences committed within Canada, and it is only a question of jurisdiction in effect as between the provinces of Canada in that regard. That is with respect to offences committed within Canada itself. However, the clause we are now discussing deals with offences committed outside of Canada. For both these reasons it seemed that the logical place to put this section would be immediately following section 5 of the code, particularly because of the provision of section 5 (2).

Mr. Aiken: There is one point that troubles me about this definition of "in flight". Perhaps the minister can clear it up for me. In relation to the high seas, the commander or the master of a ship has always had jurisdiction to act. I understand that this is a somewhat parallel situation. What bothers me is this. What jurisdiction will the parliament of Canada have to enact criminal legislation with respect to persons who may be in flight but are still within the confines of a foreign country?

Take the example of an aircraft setting off from Paris on a non-stop flight to Canada. An offence takes place while the aircraft is still within the confines of France. Normally international space between two countries is a void which legislation must cover, and I think it can be covered; but I wonder if there has been any international treaty or understanding as a result of which jurisdiction may be conferred between one point and another even though one of those points may be within the physical confines of another country. It follows that if we attempt to enact criminal legislation applying to aircraft within a foreign country, such other country may attempt to enact similar legislation applying to Canada. This troubles me, and I should like to have the situation clarified.

Mr. Fulton: The difficulty is that there is no international agreement, treaty or convention covering offences or crimes committed on aircraft while aircraft are in flight. That is why we are here taking what is admittedly unilateral action; it is because we realize that there is a gap in our law with the results I described in my statement made the first thing this morning. In order to cover the whole area, we wish to correct this omission. We say that Canada shall have jurisdiction to try a person for an offence committed on an aircraft whose flight terminates in Canada if that offence was committed while the aircraft was in flight, and by the words "in flight" are meant the point when the plane began to move under its own power for the purpose of take-off until it comes to rest.

I agree that if a person committed an offence while the aircraft was still running along the runway for the take-off, say in France, that would be an offence for which the person could be committed for trial in Canada if that aircraft landed in Canada with that person still aboard, even though the offence was actually committed while the aircraft was in touch with the ground in another country. But it is clear that if the pilot of the aircraft, becoming aware of the fact that an offence had been committed, instead of continuing his flight and landing in Canada turned around and had the man arrested and dealt with according to the laws of France, there would be no attempt on the part of Canada to assert any jurisdiction.

We have to make this law as far-reaching as we do in this amendment because of two possibilities; first, that the pilot may not find out that the offence has been committed until he is well on his way, and then decide to continue to Canada. And if we did not take responsibility for jurisdiction there would be nobody able to arrest or try the person concerned when the aircraft landed; he would be able to walk off scot free. That is one reason we have made the law extend so far back as the moment the aircraft begins to be in flight.

The other difficulty is the problem of knowing or establishing exactly where an offence takes place. If it is committed over the Atlantic, or at any time in flight, who is to say whether in fact the aircraft had passed the boundaries of France, or was perhaps crossing over Spain, or whether it had passed the coast of France and was crossing over open sea? For these reasons we extended our jurisdiction right back to the point where the aircraft commenced to move under its own power for the purpose of take-off. The important thing to remember is that if the aircraft returns to the point from which it took off and if the man is arrested and there is a law under which he can be dealt with, Canada would not quarrel with the right of the foreign country to bring him to trial. But we have to take some action along the lines I have indicated.

Mr. Aiken: I have no quarrel with this effort to take unilateral action, because I think in many cases it is necessary to take unilateral action. My only concern with regard to this matter is whether it may become a source of international difficulty if we are to avoid actually determining where an offence took place. I admit that it is difficult, especially if an offence was not discovered until the aircraft was about to land, to determine whether at the time in question the aircraft was over, say, France or over the high seas. What I am worried about is whether there may be consequences to Canadian citizens from this effort to invade the confines of foreign countries with our criminal legislation.

Mr. Fulton: I think I have to admit that there may be complications of the nature described by my hon. friend, but we think the risk of these difficulties is worth while taking. First, we do not think it is a very great risk and, second, we think it is worth while taking in order to block this serious gap. Moreover, I would point out that we have taken steps to minimize the danger of difficulties by the provision made in clause 5a (3), which says:

> No proceedings shall be instituted under this section where the accused is not a Canadian citizen without the consent of the Attorney General of Canada.

Thus if a situation arises where a foreign country wishes to exercise jurisdiction over an offence, and has a law under which the person can be tried, and the person concerned is a citizen of that country, then we can take steps to return him to his own country for the purpose of having his case disposed of there.

Mr. Spencer: I do not wish to delay the passage of this legislation but I do think that when enacted it should be clear and free from doubt. I think there is a good deal to be said for the views expressed by some of the hon. members who have addressed themselves to this clause. As I understand it, the intention is to give the courts of Canada jurisdiction in the case of aircraft which are not registered in Canada under the Aeronautics Act where an offence is committed on such aircraft while in flight, those flights terminating in Canada.

Now if we wish to interpret the words "flight terminated in Canada" I think we should all agree at once that if a flight is not scheduled to terminate in Canada it would not come within the meaning of that clause; because if we look at the schedules of air line flights we will see that the flights are numbered and that flight No. so and so will originate at a certain place and end at a certain place. In between those two places there may be stops. But when you board a plane numbered, say, flight 46, that flight runs from point A to point C, stopping at stop point B, and in my opinion that flight does not end until the plane reaches point C.

As I understood the minister he was of the opinion that the flight was considered to be terminated when the aircraft came to rest, whether at the end of the scheduled flight or not. The intention of subsection 4 seems to be to put an interpretation upon the words "termination of flight" which one might not gather from the ordinary use of those words, and when we come to read this provision we find that the aircraft is in flight from the time it first moves under its own power for the purpose of taking off until the moment it comes to rest.

I point out that what I think leads to doubt and ambiguity is the addition of the words "at the end of its flight". Why not stop after the word "rest"? If we want to make it clear then surely the flight is deemed to terminate when the plane comes to rest. Why complicate it by adding the words "at the end of its flight"? This again raises the question, what is the end of the flight? I believe we create ambiguity in this way. I suggest it would be clear if the words "at the end of its flight" were deleted. If it were to read "—the moment it comes to rest and when it so comes to rest that flight shall be deemed to have terminated" it would be clearer although I do not think the flight would actually have terminated under the ordinary interpretation of the word "flight".

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Essex West has hit the nail on the head, and I should like to support what he has said. Although the minister interprets this in his own way it might be interpreted in another way by the courts. I believe the words "at the end of its flight" should be deleted to remove the ambiguity.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think there is unnecessary concern over these words but we have been considering this since the point was raised, and as it stands at the moment I am inclined to agree that although the meaning would not be clearer it would be no less clear if the words "at the end of its flight" were deleted so the subclause would then read:

> For purposes of this section and paragraph (30) of section 2 an aircraft shall be deemed in flight from the moment the aircraft first moves under its own power for the purpose of taking off until the moment it comes to rest and when it so comes to rest that flight shall be deemed to have terminated.

If the committee would give me a moment I will prepare an amendment accordingly and ask one of my colleagues to move it.

Mr. Crestohl: Would the minister look at paragraph (b) of section 5a where it speaks about the termination of the flight and cover that as well? I was under the impression that when we speak about having jurisdiction we should have jurisdiction over all aircraft that land in Canada. As I said before, there may be a forced landing in Canada. As long as a plane lands here and an offence has been committed I think we should have jurisdiction.

Mr. Fulton: I have now prepared an amendment which I would ask my colleague the Solicitor General to read.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Chairman, I move:

> That subsection 4 of section 5a, as contained in clause 3 of the bill, be amended by deleting the words "at the end of its flight" where they occur in lines 27 and 28 on page 2.

[Mr. Spencer.]

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, I fail to appreciate what we would accomplish by this amendment, because the doubt that will be raised in the judge's mind is based on the fact that the common usage of the word "flight" means something other than a lap in a schedule. We speak of a non-stop flight, a two-stop flight, and a refuelling stop only flight. Of what assistance will this amendment be to a judge who wants to know whether the flight has been terminated if he feels that the flight, as the word is interpreted by common usage, means the flight to Los Angeles, for example? The change we are making gives no guidance to the judge or magistrate as to whether the coming to rest of the aircraft indicates the end of the flight. If as suggested by other hon. members the flight from Germany to Los Angeles is the complete flight, the judge would not consider that the terms of this clause specifically state that the flight has been completed until the airplane has arrived at Los Angeles.

Hon. members may say there is no problem arising out of the use of the word "rest". I say there may be a dispute about the significance of that word in relation to the landing of an aircraft, and especially in reference to a trans-Atlantic flight. When does the airplane actually come to rest? That could be solved by referring to an aircraft coming to a complete stop in Canada. That would solve the problem. We would still use approximately the same words; and if common usage indicates that the end of a flight, as that phrase is used by people who are involved in preparing advertisements and talking about aviation transportation, refers to the aircraft arriving at Los Angeles the meaning would be clear. There is no point in saying that we will strike out the words "at the end of its flight" and leave in the reference to the plane coming to rest. The judge might state that he would not consider that the flight had terminated until the plane arrived in Los Angeles, and that he would attach no significance to a plane coming to rest at a refueling stop in Winnipeg.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I think I can assure the hon. member that the courts will not interpret the Criminal Code by reference to advertising slogans. They will give the words, as the interpretation rules lay down, the ordinary accepted meaning of those words unless there is something in the statute which indicates clearly that the words do not have their ordinary meaning. Therefore I can assure my hon. friends that the judges will look first at subsection 1 of proposed section 5A and they will see that it seeks to establish jurisdiction over everyone who on an aircraft registered in Canada, while the aircraft is in flight, or on any aircraft while the aircraft is in flight if the flight terminated in Canada, commits an offence. Then they will come down to subclause 4 and say, "Now, we find that 'in flight' is defined". How is it defined? It is defined as follows:

For purposes of this section and paragraph (30) of section 2 an aircraft shall be deemed in flight from the moment the aircraft first moves under its own power for the purpose of taking off until the moment it comes to rest—

Now, how anything could be clearer than that I do not know. "Comes to rest" has the ordinary meaning of "stops". An aircraft moving is not at rest; therefore the flight is not terminated until the aircraft comes to rest. And "being in flight" is defined as covering the period from the time the aircraft first moves under its own power for the purpose of taking off until it comes to rest. I see no difficulty with these words at all. I am quite certain that I am on safe ground in assuring my hon. friend that the courts will have no difficulty with these words.

Mr. Godin: Let us take this example. A plane from Mexico comes to Canada on a scheduled flight. The plane has to fly over Kinross, Michigan, and as it passes near Detroit a crime is committed. It stops for fueling in Kinross and it lands at Montreal or at some other Canadian spot. Where is the jurisdiction granted by this code? Let us say that both the accused and the person aggrieved are Canadians and they would like to benefit from this amendment to the Criminal Code; where are the rights of the parties?

Mr. Fulton: The crime is clearly committed in the United States and the United States has jurisdiction. In those circumstances we are not trying to assert that Canada has jurisdiction; we are not making that attempt at all.

Mr. Godin: The United States may not have such a law and they may not have jurisdiction to try the case at Kinross, but still the crime would have been committed and certainly it is the kind of thing that should be covered.

Mr. Fulton: Surely my hon. friend knows that each state has jurisdiction to try persons for crimes committed within its territorial limits. The hon. gentleman has just pointed out to me an example of a crime clearly committed within the United States. The plane stops in the United States after the crime has been committed. We would not attempt to assert any jurisdiction.

Mr. Carter: The use of the word "first" there complicates things because it does not describe what actually happens when a plane takes off. A plane will be drawn up near the airport. It will take on its passengers and then it will move. That is the time it first moves. It will move down the runway and come to rest and wait for orders to take off. From the time it first moves to the time it comes to rest is when it is moving from the passenger terminal down to the runway in preparation for take-off. That is the point. According to this definition—

Mr. Fulton: That is exactly what we intend.

Mr. Carter: Then it would apply only to what happens from the time it first moves, but it is still on the ground from the time it first moves from the terminal down to the runway.

Mr. Fulton: That is correct, and that is what we intended to cover.

Mr. Carter: Not when it is in the air?

Mr. Fulton: Oh, yes, a crime committed while in the air.

Mr. Carter: The flight is terminated. The plane is still on the ground. If you are going to insist on keeping the word "first", then it will apply while the plane is on the ground.

Mr. Fulton: The point my hon. friend raises would not have been of importance had we not agreed to take out the words "at the end of its flight". I think that is why we put those words in; therefore we had drafted better than we realized when we agreed to take them out.

Mr. Chevrier: You had better put them back in.

Mr. Fulton: I suggest that this clause stand until we can reconsider it to see if we find any better or clearer drafting, or if there is any need to take out those words, and I will report back to the house later on.

The Chairman: Clauses 2 and 3 will stand.

On clause 4—Bail.

Mr. Woolliams: I should like to speak on clause 4 because I believe that freedom and liberty are the most important civil rights in our democratic way of life. I thank the minister for bringing in this amendment. I would like to give an illustration of why I think this new clause should be added to the Criminal Code. As the minister knows, there is a distinction between a judicial act and an administrative act. Last fall I had occasion to have some correspondence with the minister about some farmers in Saskatchewan who were charged under the Saskatchewan liquor act. They were arrested on Saturday and refused bail until Monday, on the ground that the R.C.M.P. and the magistrate there held that it was illegal to grant bail on Sunday. Those particular farmers were charged with an offence and found guilty by the magistrate. When the case was taken to the district court to be tried de novo they were acquitted.

There was some ambiguity as to whether bail could be granted in Canada on Sunday. The court of appeal of Nova Scotia has held that since you can arrest a person on Sunday you can lay a charge on Sunday, you can grant a warrant for an arrest on Sunday, and of course the party arrested could be granted bail.

I want once again to thank the minister for bringing in this amendment because now it is certain; we are sure that bail can be granted on Sunday in Canada to those people who may be arrested on Saturday, so they will not be held over until the next Monday.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 10, inclusive, agreed to.

On clause 11—Obscene.

Mr. Chevrier: One o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, may I inquire from the acting leader of the house what the business will be for Thursday, Friday and Saturday. I wonder whether he can indicate what it will be on Monday as well?

Mr. Fulton: I am afraid I am not in a position to do that. My understanding is that the business for Thursday will be estimates, as the house leader indicated.

Mr. Chevrier: Defence and defence production?

Mr. Fulton: I believe that is correct. That still stands, and if there is any change I will see that the hon. gentleman is notified immediately. I am not aware of any change having been made. If, for instance, we are to take legislation tomorrow instead of estimates I will notify my hon. friend and the C.C.F. party at once. I do not think there is any change in that indication.

Mr. Chevrier: The minister cannot give any indication of the business for Monday?

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, no.

At one o'clock the house adjourned, without question put.

ROYAL VISIT

PRINTING OF SPEECHES OF HER MAJESTY AS APPENDIX TO "HANSARD"

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the house, I should like to suggest that the speeches delivered by Her Majesty yesterday, one to the nation by television and the other on the dedication and unveiling of the commonwealth air memorial, be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the will of the house that the speeches of Her Majesty be printed as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

TRADE

URANIUM—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SIGNING OF AGREEMENT WITH JAPAN

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, hon. members will recall that on March 3 of this year the late secretary of state for external affairs informed the house that formal negotiations were about to begin with the government of Japan for a bilateral agreement on the peaceful uses of atomic energy. I am happy to announce that these negotiations have now been successfully concluded, and I accordingly table for the information of the house copies of the agreement, together with certain related documents, all of which were signed earlier this morning by the ambassador of Japan and myself acting on behalf of our respective governments.

The agreement is the fourth of its kind so far concluded by Canada. It will make possible the exchange of technical information and the provision of equipment and materials including uranium. The protocol attached to it stipulates that its provisions shall apply to any source material that may be supplied from Canada to the Japan atomic fuel corporation as authorized by the government of Japan, after the date of signature of the agreement but prior to the entry into force of the agreement itself.

It is the hope and intention of the two governments that this agreement will provide the framework for mutually beneficial cooperation between Canada and Japan in the development of the peaceful uses of atomic energy and the wider utilization of the many benefits which it is capable of bringing to the peoples of both countries.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house will welcome the news of the signing of this agreement, the negotiation of which has been going on with Japan now for a great many months. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is of the greatest possible importance to negotiate agreements of this kind with foreign governments to protect and advance, among other things, the exporting interests of the uranium industry of Canada. It is particularly important because of the fact that the United States has been successful in making bilateral agreements with different countries on terms which are going to make it very difficult for Canadian producers to compete because the United States, as part of the agreement, can supply reactors to the countries concerned of a type which will be tied to the use of uranium from the United States. Therefore that is only one reason why we welcome the news of this particular agreement with such a very important Pacific country as Japan.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, this group, knowing the attitude of the Japanese government and the Japanese people toward the uses of these sources of energy, is very pleased with the minister's announcement. This is a constructive development and will provide a market for Canadian uranium that we can develop in good conscience.

NORTHLAND NAVIGATION COMPANY

INQUIRY AS TO STRIKE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can the Minister of Labour give any further information relative to the strike involving the Northland Navigation Company of Vancouver; and has his attention been drawn to a statement by Mr. Greaves, president of the marine engineers, that the seafarers international union has imported 15 musclemen, commonly known as goons, from the United States to violently influence the situation in Vancouver?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a telegram from Mr. Greaves, the president of the marine engineers. The situation in the dispute between Northland Navigation Company and the national association of marine engineers is as follows. The company obtained a court injunction against picketing being carried on by the national association of marine engineers in pursuance of the strike declared by the marine engineers against the company. The injunction was to be effective until the decision of the Canada labour relations board was given on the application for revocation of certification granted to the national association of marine engineers as bargaining agent of engineers of the company.

It is understood that this application for revocation of certification is sponsored by the seafarers international union. The Canada labour relations board has reserved its decision until it meets on July 7, next week. The international longshoremen's and warehousemen's union has been observing the picket lines of the national association of marine engineers. The company, it is alleged, has employed men supplied by the seafarers international union to load and unload its vessels.

Following the lifting of the picket lines as a result of the court order the international longshoremen's and warehousemen's union members attempted to resume work but were not rehired by the company. They therefore established their own picket lines and the company has obtained an interim injunction that can be appealed within 24 hours.

The company has taken the position that it no longer employs longshoremen, having contracted out such work to another company. The telegram this morning alleges that the seafarers international union has imported persons from the United States to take over longshoremen's operations. These allegations are now being investigated. The charges that are made by Mr. Greaves in the telegram as to the importation of persons from the United States are being investigated by the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a supplementary question of the Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, in the absence of the minister. If as a result of the investigation it is found that importees have been brought in to influence the situation in Vancouver, will they be deported?

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member might reserve that question until it has ceased to have a hypothetical character.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. How is it possible under our law and regulations for 15 goons from the United States to enter Canada to support the illegal activities of the seafarers international union?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): As has been stated by the Minister of Labour, the allegation that there has been such importation is being investigated, and until the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has the facts it is impossible to answer that question.

[Later:]

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the Minister of Transport a belated supplementary question. In view of the fact that the Northland Navigation Company receives an annual subsidy of $294,000 from this government, and in view of the fact that the marine engineers were under the impression that public money was being used to import these goons, would the minister make inquiries as to what is really happening from the company's point of view in this situation in Vancouver?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I think my colleague the Minister of Labour has this matter well in hand, and he is making inquiries.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Transport. Can he inform the house if, in the event of an industrial dispute, the annual subsidy is continued?

Mr. Hees: I think that comes under the heading of a hypothetical question.

Mr. Winch: You know whether or not you are paying it, don't you?

SHIPPING

LAKE HURON—INQUIRY AS TO SINKING OF S.S. "MONROVIA"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Transport of which he has had informal notice. Can the minister give us any information on the collision in lake Huron last week which resulted in the loss of the Liberian ship Monrovia, and can he indicate whether or not this ship carried either a United States or Canadian pilot?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I have not received the details of this collision, Mr. Speaker, but so far as I am aware neither ship had a pilot on board.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

NATIONAL LIBRARY—INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. In view of the great interest of Canadians in the provision of a national library, can the minister say when the construction of a Canadian national library is likely to be commenced?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the buildings to be built in Ottawa which has been under very active consideration. It had been hoped that work could be commenced this year. The hon. member will have noted that there is no item in the estimates for 1959-60 for this particular building. I am sure we are all hopeful that this building can be erected in the very near future.

Mr. Argue: Could I ask the minister whether, by that statement, he means that construction cannot begin this year, or would the minister consider an item in the supplementary estimates?

Mr. Green: I am afraid that construction cannot begin this year. I point out to the hon. member we have been busy building post offices all across Canada, for example one in Radville, in the hon. member's own constituency. We cannot construct all these buildings at once.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister would not agree that there are enough people unemployed in the country to build the national library?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask a supplementary question. Have any steps been taken as yet to demolish the buildings that are now on the site of the proposed national library?

Mr. Green: If I recall correctly, temporary building No. 1 is on at least a portion of the site for the national library and, as the hon. member knows, when the Jackson building was severely damaged last fall it was necessary to move several branches of different departments into temporary building No. 1.

Mr. Pickersgill: It is still being occupied?

Mr. Green: I think so; I have not looked at it recently.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO COMMUNICATION FROM QUEBEC ON CONFERENCE AGENDA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has he yet received from the Quebec government any answer to the agenda or comprehensive report which he sent out to all the heads of delegations in connection with the conference?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. I have made inquiries since yesterday and I am informed that no specific reply has been received in that respect.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

ST. JOHN'S, NFLD.—REQUEST FOR INCREASED HOTEL ACCOMMODATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the inadequate hotel accommodation in St. John's, Newfoundland, will the minister urge the Canadian National Railways to enlarge the Newfoundland hotel at St. John's?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I shall be glad to pass on to the management of the Canadian National Railways the hon. member's suggestion.

PARLIAMENT HILL

INQUIRY AS TO SINGING OF "O CANADA" DURING CEREMONIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State a question concerning the trooping of the colours ceremony which took place yesterday in front of the parliament buildings. I would like to know why neither before nor after the ceremony, the hymn "O Canada" was played?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I was not in charge of this ceremonial, and therefore have no comment to make in the matter.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, could the minister tell me who was in charge, and to whom I could address my request for information?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Courtemanche: Mr. Speaker, I shall consider the question as notice and answer the hon. member tomorrow.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

PRINTING BUREAU CONTRACTS, QUEBEC—ATLAS OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

(Page 5348)

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Does the Secretary of State think he will be in a position to reply to my questions Monday?

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker I am pretty sure that Monday the natural curiosity of the hon. member for Hull will be satisfied.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON WINTER WORK PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour whether, in view of the fact that we are approaching what looks like the end of this session, he is in a position to announce the government's winter works program in preparation for next fall and winter, or is there going to be such a program?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, that remains to be seen.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Labour if he does not think, in view of the importance of this problem, that parliament is entitled to have an answer as to whether or not the government is going to have a winter works program to meet possible unemployment next fall and next winter?

Mr. Starr: When the government, upon reviewing the situation, feels that such a program is necessary, it will announce it to the house if the house is in session at the time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It will be too late.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INQUIRY AS TO SALARY INCREASES THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Does the minister propose to introduce further supplementary estimates which would permit the payment of long and patiently awaited pay increases for federal civil servants?

[Mr. Dupuis.]

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is well acquainted with the procedure in the house. If supplementary estimates are to be introduced they will be introduced in the house for all hon. members to become immediately aware of the fact.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Parliament does not matter, it seems.

Mr. Hellyer: I have a supplementary question. Does the minister feel that the time has arrived when the employees of the government deserve to have an increase which would bring them in line with increases which have been obtained by employees in private industry?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, when the proper time comes for an announcement on this subject or an announcement of policy on this subject, it will certainly be made and there will not be any repetition of what happened under the government of which the hon. member was a member, when the government simply dilly-dallied and did nothing about the problem and left it to their successors.

Mr. Hellyer: We gave the last increase. That was two years ago.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): You left it to your successors to pay for it.

TRANSPORT

ST. JOHNS, QUE.—INQUIRY AS TO PURCHASE OF PROPERTY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General. The hon. gentleman said yesterday that he would reply to my questions today. Is he now in a position to answer them?

(Text):

Hon. Leon Balcer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will take this question as notice.

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, as the Solicitor General is late, and as the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) is here, may I direct my question directly to the Minister of Transport? I should like to know whether the hon. minister has received from the city of St. Johns—and here is the question I asked him yesterday:

Has the Minister of Transport received a request from the city of St. Johns (Quebec), for the lease of a site south of Central Vermont railway bridge, at St. Johns?

I would also like to ask a supplementary question. Has the Minister of Transport been requested by the junior chamber of commerce of St. Johns that this site be leased to the city of St. Johns rather than to private interests?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, since I was not in the house yesterday, I shall take the question as notice and answer it tomorrow.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sevigny in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

214. Departmental administration, $3,380,550.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Chairman, in asking the committee for approval of the 1959-60 estimates of the Department of National Defence, I welcome the opportunity that is given for a debate on defence matters.

I would like first to pay a sincere tribute to the personnel of our armed forces, both regular and reserve. During the past year I have had occasion to visit a number of service establishments at home and overseas. Many members of this committee have also had this opportunity. I am sure I have the concurrence of all in congratulating the personnel of our armed services on the manner in which they are carrying out the tasks which have been assigned to them. As a result of their efforts and those of our allies we have enjoyed during the past 12 months a period of comparative peace; but even in such times there are many occasions which call for acts of outstanding bravery by members of our armed forces. I am sure the house will be interested to know that Her Majesty the Queen while in Canada is awarding two air force crosses, five George medals and one British Empire medal to individuals of the Royal Canadian Navy, the Canadian army and the Royal Canadian Air Force. Her Majesty is also presenting colours to the Royal Canadian Navy and to certain regiments of the Canadian army. In addition, service personnel both regular and reserve have been honoured by participating in the ceremonies taking place across Canada in connection with Her Majesty's tour.

While I realize that in the time at my disposal I cannot cover all facets of defence, it is appropriate now to make some general remarks on our defence thinking. There are a number of factors that must be considered in introducing these estimates. The requirements deemed necessary for defence today will almost certainly be outmoded a few years from now. This, of course, is not solely a Canadian problem; it is a problem facing every country today. In our endeavours to solve it we should be ready and willing to consult with our partners in Europe and on the North American continent.

We must also be prepared to take advantage of our collective agreements so we can provide a better and more lasting peace within our economic limitations. By co-operating with our allies we are able to have an integrated, balanced force among all the allies rather than attempting to have a balanced force within each nation. It has been obvious for some time that no country can stand alone or can plan its defence in isolation.

This is particularly true of Canada. Our geographic position and our varied interests require us to take part in collective defence. Therefore when planning a defence program we have to take into account many considerations, such as the changing threat which is brought about principally by rapid developments in the technological field, particularly in the area of offensive weapons introduced into the armament inventory of a potential enemy, and also the very long time required to develop and produce modern defensive weapons systems and the ever increasing costs of research development and production.

A full appreciation of the concept of modern war which might come without warning requires our forces to be trained, equipped and immediately ready for operations. Gone are the days when a protracted period of time might be devoted to mobilization and the conversion of industry from a peace to a war footing. I have discussed the threat on previous occasions, but as all our preparations are linked with the appreciation of the threat it is perhaps worth while emphasizing some of the aspects of this part of our defence problem.

The evaluation of the threat cannot be completely reliable, since development of ways and means of waging war is of necessity one of the most closely guarded secrets of any country. In fact the record shows that there has been a tendency in the past to underestimate the achievements of the Soviet union in this particular field. They have been particularly successful in concealing their intentions. However, the best assessment that we can make of the type and scale of attack against this continent is roughly as follows.

For the present and in the immediate future the principal attack against North America would be by a relatively small number of long range manned bombers carrying megaton weapons. These might well be augmented by a large number of medium bombers on one-way missions carrying nuclear weapons of varying yields. Russia might not care if she had to jeopardize these one-way mission bombers. In the early 1960's it is expected that the ballistic missiles will have reached a stage of reliability whereby such missiles will replace the bombers as the primary means of delivering nuclear weapons on North America. However, if an attack on this continent is made in the early 1960's it is considered quite probable that a variety of weapons would be used in an effort to saturate the defences and thus deliver a devastating attack.

This kind of attack would include ballistic missiles, both long and short range, land based or from submarines, as well as other nuclear weapons delivered by aircraft. As most of the major strategic targets are situated in the United States it is more than likely that certain targets in Canada would be attacked by bombers, although the primary threat would be from the ICBM's.

It is not possible to say with any degree of accuracy when the ICBM will be available in sufficient numbers to take on all the targets in North America, or when we can completely dispense with the requirement for defence against the bomber. In other words we believe we may have to face a combination of weapons, some delivered as ballistic missiles and others from manned bombers. Thus the possibility of attacks on Canada by manned bombers may extend into the mid-1960's, although the threat, compared to the missile, would be on a diminishing scale.

The next point to mention is the lead time necessary and the risk involved in research and development of modern weapon systems. In giving evidence before a congressional committee this year the United States secretary of defence, Mr. McElroy, said:

> We are living today in an era of extremely rapid advances in science and technology. Some of the programs which appeared to have had great merit only 12 months ago, now, in view of the progress made on more technically advanced projects, no longer have the same importance or urgency.

We know that having started upon certain projects these have had to be cancelled before they were completed because of changed circumstances. From a study of research and development in the production of modern defensive equipment in the United States and the United Kingdom, and from our own limited experience, it is clear that it takes about nine or ten years to develop and produce modern, highly sophisticated defence equipment. The cost of this development and production is becoming astronomical, and there is always the risk that the end product may arrive too late, that new methods have overtaken its development or that the enemy threat has changed considerably.

As an example of the costs and complexity of these development problems it was shown in the evidence produced before the United States congressional committee this year that the Bomarc missile has been under development for over eight years and has cost so far $1.9 billion, while some $3.7 billion has been expended on the Nike-Ajax and the Nike-Hercules missiles.

It is clear that a country the size of Canada cannot embark unilaterally on any of these long range, technical and costly development programs. We must of necessity take advantage of our position in the western alliance and be able to obtain proven equipment from our partners to meet our limited requirements, thus avoiding the exorbitant cost of development and the risk of failing to produce the weapons in time to meet the threat. Thus, we are pursuing a policy of production sharing, the details of which have already been communicated to the house by the Minister of Defence Production.

Earlier I mentioned the changing threat and expressed some doubts as to whether or not we are in a position to forecast accurately this threat either in time or in character. This dilemma is further exaggerated by the trend of future development, which indicates a much more rapid technological advance in the weapons of offence than in the defensive type. It may be said with some degree of certainty that the weapons available in the next few years can produce total destruction, but the defence against these weapons is a different story and that causes us great concern. This is one of the matters to which all members of the alliance must devote a great deal of attention.

As has already been announced, the defence research board is working with the United States authorities in solving some of these problems of defence against ballistic missiles. These are problems in relation to tracking ballistic objects in and beyond the atmosphere. Some progress has been made in the field of detection of missiles, and a comprehensive communications system is being installed to give warning of the approach of the ballistic missiles. These detection stations to which I refer are not located in Canada, although Canada is providing facilities to assist in the communication and passing on of the information. It is expected that by 1961-62 a reliable detection and warning system will be in operation on the North American continent, but this is only one aspect of the problem.

The major question to be answered is how to intercept the ballistic warhead and destroy it before it reaches its target. This is a research and development project of very great technical and financial proportions, as these missiles will be travelling at several thousand miles an hour. The whole question of locating, tracking, intercepting and destroying the missile must be accomplished within the time of flight of the missile which may be as short as 15 or 20 minutes. The United States have given this project first priority and are putting a great deal of effort and money into a program of defence against missile attack, but it appears unlikely that a satisfactory means of intercepting and destroying the missile will be accomplished within the next few years. In consequence, there may be a period between the time when the ICBM is available to a potential enemy and the time when some defence against the ballistic missile is possible.

At present there is no defence against the missile after it has left its launching pad, and several years may elapse before such a defence is operationally practical. Therefore this gap in our joint defence must be considered most carefully in our defence planning and in the steps we are taking to ensure our survival if unfortunately we are forced into war during this interval.

In view of the consequences of nuclear war the world is perhaps approaching the stage when the use of force as an instrument of policy to settle man's differences is no longer valid. It is hoped that some means other than armed conflict will eventually be found to settle international disputes. To this end we have demonstrated our willingness to lend assistance in order to help reduce tension in potentially explosive areas, thereby preventing the exploitation of force as an instrument of policy. Our troops assigned to the United Nations emergency force and to other peace preserving teams are continuing examples of our interest in this direction.

Until general agreement on disarmament is reached, however, we must support the maintenance of an adequate deterrent to war to make it quite apparent to any would-be aggressor that he cannot use force as an instrument of policy without running the risk of devastating retaliation. It is necessary, therefore, for us to maintain our forces both here and abroad as part of the deterrent of the west. It is our fervent hope that these two primary elements of defence policy will succeed and that war will be averted. However, there is an element of miscalculation and misunderstanding that cannot as yet be removed from international relations; therefore it is prudent that these deterrent forces should be so designed that they will be of use to blunt any attack and to assist in survival.

With these observations in mind I would now refer to Canada's defence policy. This policy was set forth in the paper on defence tabled at the end of April. This paper is intended to assist hon. members during these discussions. Anyone who has read it should have a better understanding of our policy and the state of our forces. The paper is not intended to be the instrument through which major new policy is announced. During the year changes in policy and the procurement of new equipment have been communicated to the house as decisions have been reached. The effects of these decisions are reflected in the estimates now before the committee, and are detailed in the report.

The committee will be aware of some of these important decisions, all of which have been announced or referred to in the house during the past year: for example, the cancellation of the Arrow program, adoption of the Bomarc missile and related semi-automatic ground environment: the acquisition of a surface to surface missile for the Canadian army; negotiations for the procurement of nuclear weapons announced by the Prime Minister on February 20 of this year; construction of six additional destroyer escorts; plans for a tanker supply ship to increase the range of the destroyer escorts and thus enable these ships to stay at sea for longer periods of time, and the granting of facilities at four Canadian air fields for SAC refueling aircraft; the tasks assigned to the Canadian army in respect of survival operations and civil defence. Had a policy of withholding this information been followed and the first announcement given in the white paper it would indeed have been a sensational document.

The format of the report is not intended to copy what is known as a British white paper, although the latter does not always announce new policy. It will be recalled that in 1957 a so-called five-year plan was announced by the British government with regard to defence. The details of this plan were, in general, already well known in that country prior to the publication of the white paper. The British report on defence in 1958, however, had the following introductory remark:

> This paper reports the progress made in implementing that policy.

That is, the policy which had been announced a year before. Recently another British white paper announced the details of some major changes and reorganization of the British army. No such changes have taken place here because they are not applicable to our organization.

In the report that I made available in April —and it is the type of report that requires some time to prepare—I endeavoured to set forth our defence policy, to outline how that policy was being carried out, to show the distribution of our forces and to explain briefly the estimates required for this financial year. Amidst all the verbiage that has been uttered since I tabled the report I can find but two or perhaps three points of criticism, and these all affect matters that require major policy decisions. I refer to the re-equipment of the air division in Europe, the defence against the manned bomber at home, and the defence against the ICBM of the future. I have already made mention of the problem of defence against the ICBM and I shall refer later to the defence against the manned bomber.

Hon. members will realize that a decision such as the re-equipment of the air division, involving not only millions of dollars but also our relations with our NATO allies, is not easily arrived at. At the time I tabled the report no such decision had been taken. Now, after the government has had the opportunity of hearing the views expressed by General Norstad, the supreme allied commander, Europe, and having taken into consideration many other factors including costs, I am in a position to announce that the government has decided to re-equip the air division of the R.C.A.F. The U.S.S.R. and its satellites have large, mobile and fully equipped forces deployed along the European border of Russia and in the territory between the Russian border and NATO Europe. These deployed and combat-ready Soviet forces would be capable of launching and sustaining for some time a major ground attack against NATO Europe. To prevent the overrunning of NATO Europe it would be essential to defeat enemy forces launching such an attack.

The mobility of enemy forces and the target information requirements for the effective use of surface to surface missiles, with which the allies are now being armed, clearly indicate a need for aircraft which can penetrate the area between the combat zone and the Russian border for reconnaissance and for strikes on targets of opportunity such as advancing columns of troops.

The NATO military authorities have recognized this deterrent force requirement and have requested Canada to provide a strike reconnaissance aircraft contribution. This contribution requires an aircraft capable of flying at a comparatively low altitude at great speed in order that targets on the ground, either stationary or moving, can be located and attacked. While such action would only be taken after hostile ground forces had commenced operations in western Europe, the presence of these aircraft in Europe would considerably enhance the value of the deterrent. The government, therefore, has decided to re-equip the eight squadrons of the air division, now armed with the F-86 day fighter, with a strike reconnaissance aircraft. The four CF-100 squadrons are continuing in their present role.

The F-86, although in service for a number of years, is still an effective aircraft; but if we are to continue to support NATO a decision had to be made as to the role the air division would play in the years ahead. Some two years will elapse before new aircraft will come into operational service, and by that time the value of the F-86 will have diminished in comparison with other aircraft in operation. Failure to take a decision now, therefore, would jeopardize the effectiveness of the R.C.A.F.'s contribution in the future and undoubtedly would cause serious alarm and harm to the alliance. The decision now taken is in accordance with the recommendations of the supreme allied commander and re-emphasizes the fact that Canada, as a member of the NATO alliance, intends to continue to meet its agreed commitments as we have in the past, despite the heavy costs involved.

Provided the negotiations which are being carried on with the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation can be brought to a satisfactory conclusion in respect to costs, production sharing and other contractual terms, the aircraft selected will be the F-104G, a single seater supersonic aircraft equipped with the J-79 engine. It is an advanced version of the F-104, which is now in service with the United States air force. Members of the committee will be aware that this aircraft was also selected by the Federal Republic of Germany and will come into operation with the air force of the Federal Republic of Germany at about the same time as it will come into operational use with the R.C.A.F. squadrons. In the meantime the German air force is taking into operational use the F-86. While the airframe and engine will be manufactured under licence in Canada, final details of production and costs will be announced by the Minister of Defence Production in due course.

The F-104G was selected as the most suitable after more than 20 types of British, American and European aircraft had been evaluated by the R.C.A.F. Consideration was also given to the possibility of modifying existing Canadian aircraft with a view to converting these aircraft to carry out the new role assigned to the air division. Such aircraft were developed essentially as fighter or interceptor aircraft, and were designed to engage hostile bombers at great heights. The requirements for a strike reconnaissance aircraft do not demand long range and great height, but do call for the ability to fly fast at low altitudes. The two requirements are not compatible, and it was not deemed practical to adapt present aircraft to this new role. Past experience shows that to have attempted to design and build a new aircraft in Canada would have been prohibitive in cost and would have taken much longer to become operational.

I mentioned a few minutes ago that to understand the estimates one must know what our policy and commitments are. For the benefit of those who have not read "Defence 1959", I would quote from that paper:

> Canadian defence policy derives directly from our foreign policy and is designed to ensure national security and the preservation of world peace.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but I have to advise him that his time has expired. Has the minister unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pearkes: I continue with the quotation:

> These objectives are reached through collective arrangements within NATO and the United Nations. While the increased range of offensive weapons equipped with nuclear warheads brings the North American continent within the target area in any future war, it is realized that the defence of this area cannot be considered in isolation. The advantage in collective defence within the framework of an alliance such as NATO is that an integrated balanced force can be provided by each member nation concentrating on the provision of those elements which constitute its particular needs and can be most effectively maintained.
> In order to meet the objectives of the alliance and in support of the United Nations, it is the defence policy of Canada to provide forces for: The defence against an attack on the North American content; the collective defence and deterrent forces of NATO in Europe and the north Atlantic; the United Nations to assist that organization in attaining its peaceful aims.

It should be understood that since the development of offensive weapons has not been matched by comparable advances in defensive technology, effective retaliatory forces are still the best and perhaps only defence. That is part of the concept of NATO.

If the deterrent is to be effective it must contain four basic elements. The free world must have forces in being, fully trained and immediately available for action. They must be so organized as to be able to repel and counter any attack. We must also have the will to build up and maintain those forces and the determination to employ them if circumstances warrant; and the potential enemy must be convinced of the strength of our forces and our willingness to use them if required. Some of the exaggerated statements regarding the obsolescence of some of our equipment have not been helpful in that respect.

While realizing that the main deterrent to war is the retaliatory forces, we must continue to maintain a good defensive posture. For one thing, we must protect the offensive forces, such as the SAC bomber bases, from destruction by a surprise attack. Protection against such an eventuality is one of the principal roles of our air defence forces on the North American continent. The aim of the western alliance is, first of all, to deter the outbreak of war. Should this fail and an attack follow, we must be in a position to defend ourselves and to destroy the enemy's ability to continue to wage war.

I turn now to defence against the manned bomber. Despite the diminishing threat of the manned bomber in the years ahead, to which I have already referred, it has been considered sensible to maintain defences against such a form of attack on this continent. With the development of stand-off bombs launched from manned aircraft, it is imperative that the interception of such aircraft should take place as far distant from the target as possible. To accomplish this and to provide defence in depth, Canadian and United States interceptors would engage enemy bombers as far north as possible.

We are maintaining nine squadrons of CF-100 all-weather interceptors and are making arrangements so that United States interceptors can operate in Canadian air space, and consideration is being given to providing facilities so that United States aircraft may be able to operate from Canadian airfields. Those hostile bombers that succeed in escaping these defences would then be engaged by a series of Bomarc units located close to the Canadian-United States border. In other words, we are concerned with area rather than point defence. The United States are providing some point defences at their key strategic bases, SAC bomber bases, by such missiles as the Nike-Hercules.

As we are participating jointly with the United States in the air defence of North America under NORAD, it is only good sense to equip our air defence forces with similar weapons so as to permit the most effective joint operation. The United States air force, faced with the same requirement for an area air defence missile, are developing the Bomarc as a weapon so as to complement the other elements of the defence system against bomber aircraft; the radar warning system is also being developed, interceptor aircraft and the semi-automatic ground environment.

Two Bomarc B units will be stationed in Canada, one near North Bay, Ontario, and one in northern Quebec, as part of a system protecting the heavily populated areas of both Canada and the United States. The United States air force are now engaged in establishing their portion of the over-all system stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, with interlocking stations. While some changes in quantities have occurred as the system has developed, the first units will soon be operational.

The cost factor in so far as Canada is concerned with regard to the Bomarc program has already been demonstrated. As the result of a cost-sharing agreement with the United States, improvements to the Canadian air defence system—and this includes additional radar sites, gap fillers for the Pinetree system, Bomarc missiles and the SAGE electronic control equipment—amount to some $125 million, of which $20 million is for the Bomarc. This represents Canada's share in the new program, the United States sharing the total cost of the program on an approximate two thirds, one third basis. This compares, as hon. members know, to the estimated cost of $750 million if the Arrow program had been continued until that aircraft was in operation. We are getting comparable defence for considerably less money.

Improvements to the air defence of Canada which have been announced include SAGE, one of whose functions is to provide instructions automatically to the Bomarc missiles and to the interceptors, be those interceptors R.C.A.F. or United States aircraft; the modification of existing radar stations to make them part of the SAGE complex; seven new heavy radar stations and a number of gap filler stations to be added to the Pinetree line. These increase materially the effectiveness of our defences. Each of the seven new heavy radars will be manned by R.C.A.F. personnel. Construction will get under way shortly at Moosonee, Ontario, and Chibougamau, Quebec. Preliminary investigations are being carried out for five western radars. When completed each station will be manned by approximately 250 R.C.A.F. and civilian personnel.

It might be of interest to hon. members to know that since the decision was made that Canada would adopt SAGE, the first unit has begun successful operation in the northeastern United States. The version of the system to be installed in Canada will be a later development; its electronic computers will make use of transistors rather than the less efficient and bulkier vacuum tubes. In order to "harden" the SAGE centres, the Canadian unit will be constructed underground.

The major threat to Canada from the sea continues to be the submarine. The Royal Canadian Navy and the maritime command of the R.C.A.F. are being organized, equipped and developed so that in close co-operation they can cope with the primary task of locating and destroying submarines. Since there is at present no means of destroying a missile once it has been launched, it is most desirable that missile-carrying submarines be kept as far from our shores as possible so that targets ashore are beyond the range of the submarine's weapons. Our ships and marine aircraft are designed and equipped for this purpose.

On each coast a maritime commander has been established who exercises unified operational control over R.C.N. and R.C.A.F. forces in his area of responsibility and maintains direct liaison with adjacent NATO and national commanders.

To improve our anti-submarine capability and to simplify logistic and training problems, the navy has transferred all the new St. Laurent class escorts to the west coast, while the Restigouche class escorts will be stationed in the Atlantic command. Of the original seven Restigouche class escorts, five are now in commission and the remaining two, Columbia and Chaudiere, will be commissioned by the end of this year. These ships, together with the Argus aircraft of the R.C.A.F. maritime command, form an effective hunter-killer anti-submarine team whose effectiveness increases as new and more advanced equipment is introduced.

To replace world war II escorts a construction program for six repeat Restigouche escorts has been commenced. Work has already started on the first of these ships, a second will be laid down this month and the remainder will follow at approximately three month intervals.

Another aspect of the defence of Canada is the survival role to be carried out by all regular and reserve forces not directly involved in operational duties in the event of war. With the advent of the ICBM we do not pretend that we can ensure a complete defence of North America. Therefore the government feels that it is prudent to give more thought and consideration to the passive measures of defence which may have to be adopted should our efforts fail to prevent war. With this in mind the regular and reserve forces have been organized for survival operations. All defence forces which are not actively engaged in repelling the attack will be trained and ready to take active measures to assist survival.

An order in council known as the civil defence order, 1959, has been approved by the governor in council and tabled in the House of Commons. This order has given the Department of National Defence various civil defence powers, duties and functions which will provide for a system of warning the public of attack, determining location of nuclear explosions and fall-out patterns, assessing damage and casualties, re-entry and rescue. The Department of National Defence will be responsible for all re-entry operations in seriously damaged or contaminated areas. The department has also been given the tasks of providing emergency support to provincial and municipal authorities for the maintenance of law and order and the maintenance and operation of emergency communications facilities.

The Canadian army is the designated service responsible for the conduct of survival operations, and will be assisted by such elements of the R.C.N. and R.C.A.F. as can be made available for this task. A director general of survival operations has been appointed to head the army organization which will be responsible for the role which was first referred to in the defence report issued in April.

In the event of attack on Canada, communication with all parts of the country would be essential. In consequence, arrangements are being made to ensure that if the main communication facilities should be interrupted, alternative means will be available.

On September 1 the Department of National Defence will assume full responsibility for the operation of the warning system in Canada. This will involve obtaining the information from the appropriate source and transmitting the warning in the shortest possible time to provincial authorities, probable target areas, military headquarters and installations, and all segments of population likely to be affected. Warning will deal with the threat of direct attack and will also provide information on location of nuclear explosions and resulting radioactive fall-out which may follow such an attack. Detailed studies are now under way aimed at providing the fastest and most effective system within our capability.

The Canadian army has organized a number of mobile support columns within the regular army and the militia. These columns will be based on major units and training establishments in the regular army. In the militia they will be based on groups of units. Each column contains rescue companies and such other elements as will permit them to perform re-entry and rescue tasks, as well as supplying manpower for maintenance of law and order and such other internal operations as may be necessary under conditions of war. Mobile support columns will be grouped into task forces.

Rescue training sets are being issued to these mobile columns. Provision is being made for additional equipment to be provided early in 1960. Requirements for communications equipment for national survival have been established and arrangements for procurement are being made on a priority basis. The requirement for radiation detection equipment has been established. Industry, however, is as yet unable to meet the standards in all cases. Action is being taken on a priority basis to obtain suitable equipment as it becomes available, and it is expected that substantial deliveries will be made this year. Some radiac equipment suitable for training has been issued.

Detailed examination of other items of equipment normally held by the army is being carried out with a view to providing adequate scaling for survival operations for all troops involved.

National survival training was introduced to all components of the Canadian army in 1957. Since then emphasis in training has been placed on rescue and radiation monitoring. To date over 750 armed forces personnel have received survival training at the civil defence college at Arnprior and over 1,000 at the joint atomic, bacteriological and chemical school at Camp Borden. The army commands across Canada have conducted numerous courses to provide instructors in rescue operations. Twelve simulated disaster areas have been constructed for practical training of instructors, and provision is being made for an additional 21.

Army headquarters have prepared and issued training directives and provisional training instructions in all aspects of national survival training. These instructions will soon be incorporated in training manuals in both English and French. There have been numerous exercises conducted by both the regular army and the militia on national survival operations with encouraging results, and there can be no doubt that the forces have embarked on training for their new role with realism and enthusiasm.

In the context of what I have said the importance of research and development is more than ever apparent. In the present military environment and for the future, research has and must continue to have a major role in defence planning. In fact our hope of survival may well rest in the hands of the defence scientist.

The defence research board works in very close co-operation with our major NATO partners, and because of its contributions to the common pool of knowledge obtains much greater benefits than could otherwise accrue. Active projects in upper atmospheric physics, aerophysics and explosive physics are being conducted jointly with the United States in an effort to close the gap between offence and defence in the ICBM era. The Prince Albert radar laboratory is one of the facilities being used jointly by Canada and the United States.

High priority is also being given to problems of anti-submarine warfare, particularly in the field of detection and tracking of submarines. Both the naval and air aspects of this difficult problem are being considered. The Canadian program is closely co-ordinated with the programs of the United Kingdom and the United States. It is of interest to note that the British admiralty has recently adopted a towed sonar developed by the defence research board naval research establishment.

Apart from the major problem of defence against the ICBM and the missile launching submarine, the defence research board is carrying out research in many fields which are of vital importance to defence. Many of the projects are directly allied to air defence, nuclear warfare and survival.

The enormous speed of the ICBM requires split second reaction time, long range detection and tracking. All of this is beyond the manual capacity of the human being. There is a continuing effort to develop fast, long range and automatic devices for detection, tracking and computing. These must be reliable and work at speeds far beyond those at which the human mind is capable of reacting. Operation must often be by remote control by means of electronic devices.

Electronics play a major part in a modern military force. There is a constant seeking to develop more reliable light weight devices to be fitted into aircraft, ships and vehicles to serve a host of purposes which the human has neither the time nor the resources to carry out. The human being himself is not free from development. New techniques of training are designed to develop latent capabilities which improve his efficiency and indeed his chances of survival. New and improved rations which are compact and nourishing, better and simpler methods of preparation, are being developed. Development of the large complex weapon systems of the future is not contemplated, but development of components for such systems is quite within Canadian capabilities on a co-operative basis with our larger partners.

Referring to the estimates directly, it will be recalled that the standing committee on estimates last year recommended a division of the main defence vote. That recommendation is carried out this year and there are now 15 parliamentary votes instead of one main vote, two votes for each service and the defence research board, operation and maintenance, and construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment. Separate votes are also provided for development and mutual aid. This new structure will give parliament tighter control over defence expenditures, as transfer of funds between services will no longer be possible without supplementary estimates being brought before the house.

It might be of interest to hon. members if I furnish a breakdown of this year's estimates according to the major functions. It should be noted that the amounts shown under ACLANT are for naval and maritime forces earmarked for assignment to this NATO command in an emergency. Since these figures represent functional cost estimates, the amounts in some cases do not correspond precisely with amounts shown in the 1959-60 estimates for the particular activity. For example, the figures for reserves and cadets represent estimated total costs of these forces, whereas the estimates provide for direct costs related to personnel of these forces only.

Contributions to NATO: In so far as SHAPE is concerned, we have allocated $150 million or approximately 8.9 per cent of the total defence budget; to ACLANT, $203.5 million or 12.1 per cent; for defence of the Canada-United States region, including all army field forces in Canada, $398.8 million or 23.8 per cent of the defence budget; training forces, $227.7 million or 13.6 per cent; logistics support forces, $338.2 million or 20.2 per cent; command and administration, $102.9 million or 6.1 per cent; reserves and cadets, $53.6 million or 3.2 per cent; research and development, $51.1 million or 3 per cent; search and rescue, $11.4 million or 0.7 per cent; pensions, $58.4 million or 3.5 per cent; mutual aid, $21.8 million or 1.3 per cent; and various unallocated amounts, $62.8 million or 3.6 per cent.

In conclusion, hon. members will have noted that the total estimates this year amount to $1,680,194,006. For a country our size this is a very considerable sum and represents about 5 per cent of the gross national product and 27.3 per cent of total government spending for this fiscal year. Some critics, perhaps outside this house suggest we are spending too much. To do less would mean failure to live up to commitments we have made, and to run the risk of weakening the western alliance and invite disaster. I can assure these critics that every effort is being made on my part and on the part of the officials of the department to ensure that the funds voted are wisely spent and all extravagance removed.

Other critics complain that we are too dependent on our allies and presumably that we should spend even larger sums. To these

I say that we are in a partnership and that our partners fully appreciate our position, our sovereign rights and the efforts we are making. With the high cost of modern equipment we must weigh most carefully the advantages and requirements that can be expected before embarking upon any new enterprise or project. The criterion must be how essential is the new project or piece of equipment to the over-all defence picture. With changes taking place as rapidly as they are there is no time for hasty decisions. I place reliability of equipment before prestige weapons, and I make no apologies if I have taken some time to reach decisions. To be cautious does not mean that one lacks courage.

Still other critics have suggested different methods of spending the funds which are made available. I hope I will always be receptive to new ideas, but as no two critics in this group seem to be able to agree I can but thank them for their help and say that I prefer to rely upon the informed advice of the chiefs of staff, a group of dedicated men in whom I have great confidence.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the committee will have listened with the greatest possible interest to the statement the minister has just made. In expressing my appreciation of that statement I feel I should say at once that I do not believe this statement or indeed the discussion that will follow it is an adequate substitute for the kind of searching examination of our defence policy that could have taken place before a committee to which experts and witnesses could have been summoned, the kind of examination of our defence policy and planning we have not had this session and which I suggest we should have had.

It is difficult if not impossible to think of a more important subject than that which we are discussing this morning so soon after the happy ceremonial military events of yesterday associated with the equally happy occasion of the visit of Her Majesty.

Whatever it may have been in the past, as the minister has indicated in his statement, defence today is survival because war is total destruction. Defence is also to be found not only—or perhaps now not primarily—in arms, but in policy and diplomacy because the only alternative to destruction, which is world war, is peace. Perhaps we should keep clearly in our minds this morning as we begin the discussion of the defence estimates that we are discussing only one form of defence which, as the minister himself pointed out in his statement, is perhaps not even the most important form of defence because, I take it, military defence must now be subsidiary to political defence. It was possible in earlier times to associate defence with victorious war and political achievement, indeed with international security. That possibility has gone.

While I will not be able to agree with everything the minister has said there are some parts of his statement with which I am certainly in entire agreement. I am sure that every hon. member of the committee will subscribe wholeheartedly to the tribute the minister paid at the beginning of his statement to the Canadian armed forces in whose hands we have entrusted our military defence. It is in good hands, because the armed forces of Canada are efficient, devoted and loyal. I join the minister in paying tribute to the work they are doing.

For a short time I had the honour and privilege, as so many hon. members of this committee have had, of being identified with the armed forces of this country; and although my identification was undistinguished and obscure, unlike that of my hon. friend the minister, nevertheless it will always remain one of my proudest memories.

In participating in this discussion I am going to divide my remarks broadly into the following categories, all of which I may not be able to cover in my first intervention. I want to talk first about certain basic developments that have occurred in defence concepts, planning and strategy and indeed in the nature of war itself in the last few years. Then I want to discuss the nature of the threat which faces us, because it is essential to an understanding of the policies that should be adopted. This was discussed by the minister. I wish then to refer to the methods we appear to be adopting to meet, defeat and remove that threat. Finally I hope to discuss what in my view should be Canadian policy in that effort, which policy I agree, and should say so at the very beginning, cannot be dissociated from the policies of our friends and allies. In these matters there can be no isolation for us, and because there can be no isolation for us there can be no neutralism for us.

I may be critical in my remarks of some aspects of policy. I am going to suggest that there are some phases of United States defence policy which are now reflected in Canadian policy perhaps to a greater extent than before in our history which must in my mind arouse anxiety. If I am critical I hope to be critical in a constructive way. I recognize that we in the opposition have not all the facts and information at our disposal. Because of that fact we have to deal responsibly with defence questions and realize that perhaps there is information at the disposal of the government which we do not have. It is possible that the minister will be able to deal with some of the criticisms I make and dispose of some of the questions I raise before the end of this discussion.

Since world war II and indeed, I believe, until 1957, the concept of defence policy, the nature of the threat and the means of encountering it were all based on principles and planning derived from the experience and lessons of world war II, just as we entered world war II with plans based on the experience and lessons of world war I. It seems to be the fate of man, as long as he has been engaged in war, to begin one war in accordance with the methods which may have been successful in the previous one but which are really not appropriate for the war in which he is engaging.

It is quite true that after world war II and even during it atomic weapons had been developed, but their use and method of delivery, I suggest up until about 1957, were an extension of earlier ideas rather than entirely new ideas in themselves; that the picture both for defence and offence was reasonably familiar and followed the general pattern of the last war; that the nature of the defence problem had not changed in essentials, even though it had certainly changed in scale and in scope.

True, the political mechanism of defence through collective security introduced in NATO was new. This is perhaps more political than military. The pooling of strength in an organization like NATO with collective responsibilities discharged by collective action planned and organized in advance was a new concept. If we had had such collective arrangements in 1939 the world might be a far better place today and we might not be participating today in this kind of defence debate. Perhaps it is just as well to remember this amidst the clamour from certain quarters that we should do away with collective security in the alleged interest of easing of tension and facilitating negotiations.

Then, Mr. Chairman, two years or so ago, in the fall of 1957, in my view the whole defence picture changed in a very fundamental way. The first satellite went into orbit from the Soviet union and the intercontinental nuclear balistic missile became a reality. An entirely new dimension of war was introduced at that time; an entirely new problem of defence was created. Perhaps this development may turn out to be even more important in warfare than the invention of gunpowder. Surely therefore, Mr. Chairman, it became of the most obvious and the most vital importance for all western countries, including our own, to re-examine the whole basis of defence policy in the light of this new situation, associated as it was with the frightening growing power and effectiveness of the nuclear weapon, perhaps the ultimate weapon.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, this was the time for the great debate, for a complete re-assessment, agonizing or otherwise. We have had such a debate extending over many, many months in the United States congress, the results of which the minister may have read in the publications that emerged from the committee hearings. I attempted to read them, and they are in hundreds of hundreds of pages by now. We have had that kind of debate at Westminster where the government in the last two white papers on defence has certainly shown its awareness of those changes I have mentioned. In 1957 the United Kingdom government in its white paper on defence said:

> The time had come to revise not merely the size, but the whole character of the defence planning; to make a fresh appreciation of the problem and the new approach to it.

The United Kingdom has done just that, especially in connection with air defence of the island. The white paper also had this to say on page 5:

> It is only now—

This was in 1957.

> It is only now that the future picture is becoming sufficiently clear to enable a comprehensive reshaping of policy to be undertaken with any degree of confidence.

I ask the question, Mr. Chairman; is there any evidence that this comprehensive reshaping of policy is required in Canada and that it is being undertaken? The minister's statement this morning, interesting as it was, does not suggest that any fundamental re-assessment, re-examination or reshaping of that kind is taking place. Now, it may well be that Canada's direct relationship to these defence changes, these defence developments of which I have spoken, does not compare in importance with that of London or of Washington. But we have our part to play in these developments, and that part is one of very real significance, both politically and militarily, even though Canada's contribution to collective defence seems very often to be ignored or merely lumped with the British or American effort.

I think we in this house should know—and I am not at all certain that we have the information from the minister's first statement —what Canada's role is to be in relation to these new situations, these new circumstances. It seems to me that all we know at present is that our role is to be dominated to a greater extent than ever before by Washington. And I say that as one who believes 100 per cent in what the minister has said, namely that we cannot do these things alone; that defence is indeed collective and that there has to be a partnership. But my quarrel with his concept of collective defence—and I shall have a good deal to say about this later—is that we are in danger of replacing the Atlantic concept of collective defence by the North American concept of fortress America.

Discussion of these matters is for us all in Canada the more important because of our collective responsibilities under NATO and, indeed, because of our essential and necessary relationship—and it is a special relationship and must by the facts of geography and economics remain a special relationship—with the United States in continental defence. That relationship has existed for about 20 years, but it has now reached, I believe, the point of almost complete integration.

Well, now, what have we had from the government in the last two years in this house to show its appreciation of these developments? I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we have had very little. Indeed, in this present session we have had a special discussion of one aspect of defence only, made necessary by the cancellation of the CF-105. Up to the present that is all. That is in startling and depressing contrast with the United States where certainly a great debate has been going on.

The committee will recall that more than once this session and last session, inside the house and outside the house, we on this side have argued for the examination of this problem before a committee. We have not been successful in achieving that end, and as a result we have had to get a great many of our facts and the information on which to base our statements and our views from the United States, where they are really much concerned with what has happened and with what should be done about it, and where they are, as I have said, discussing it at great length in congress. A similar situation prevails in London. Here when we have asked questions in the House of Commons, very often prompted by reports in the press on defence policies and defence statements in Washington that have a very important bearing on our own policy, very often when we have asked those questions the minister's reaction has not been, shall I say, very appreciative of our interest, and some of our questions it seems to me he has not taken very seriously. I quote from the Ottawa correspondent of the Globe and Mail of June 13, who said:

> The Canadian defence muddle which has developed largely as a result of Defence Minister Pearkes' olympian refusal to state clearly what the problem is and what is the government's approach—

Then, Mr. Chairman, came the white paper about which the minister spoke a short time ago, from which we expected a serious analysis of some of the problems I have mentioned. We did not get it, I suggest to the minister, in that report. Canada defence policy, in the nuclear world of missiles and outer space, is not found in this white paper which, in its substance and form, follows pretty much the papers of previous years from the Department of National Defence. It does not take sufficiently into consideration the changes that have been taking place.

The minister, however, has stated—he certainly did not do so this morning, when I think he took a far more realistic view of the threat—and this is certainly not to be accepted in lieu of a defence policy, that the west "can knock the stuffing out of the aggressor". That kind of statement, Mr. Chairman, seems to me to be on a par with one that was made some months ago, as reported in the press, by an unnamed general in the Pentagon that "nuclear war will mean universal destruction but I am sure we can win it." I feel that statements and observations of that kind are no substitute for policy. Canada is now in what has been called the classic but uncomfortable position of the buffer state. Let us not become a bluffer state as well.

What, Mr. Chairman, will the aggressor be doing when we are knocking the stuffing out of him? Well, the minister gave us some pretty sobering observations on that point this morning, and I am able to quote them because he was courteous enough to let me have an advance copy of his statement just before he made it. He said:

> In the early 1960's it is expected that ballistic missiles will have reached a stage of reliability whereby such missiles will replace the bomber as the primary means of delivering nuclear weapons on North America.

This is the early 1960's.

> However, if an attack on this continent is made in the early 1960's it is considered quite probable that a variety of weapons would be used in an effort to saturate the defences and, thus, deliver a devastating initial attack.

This is the aggressor whose stuffing we can knock out, and while we are doing that he is going to deliver a devastating initial nuclear attack on us. The statement goes on:

> This kind of an attack would include ballistic missiles, both long and short range, land-based and from submarines, as well as other nuclear weapons delivered by aircraft. As most of the major strategic targets are situated in the United States, it is more than likely that certain targets in Canada would be attacked by bombers although the primary threat would be from ICBM's.

Well, that is a pretty sobering statement of the threat that confronts us, all the more sobering because, as the minister pointed out later in his statement, there is no defence of any kind at the present time against intercontinental missiles. I repeat that there is no defence of any kind. The minister has said previously and he indicated this morning that a defence is being sought against intercontinental missiles, and I think he said in the house—I do not want to do him an injustice —in answer to a question some time ago that this is likely to be secured soon. He was a little more specific on that point when he said that the Nike-Zeus, which is the United States anti-missile missile, would be operational in the near future.

No such claim as that has been made in the United States that I have been able to ascertain. On the other hand, a recognized authority, though I admit one who holds very strong views on one side of the question, Admiral Hayward, has said that the best we can hope for in regard to defence against missiles would be 50 per cent effectiveness by 1965. I certainly hope he is wrong when he says that the best we can hope for is 50 per cent effectiveness by 1965 against intercontinental nuclear ballistic missiles.

What about our defence against bomber attack? The minister has said in the past, and he is right, of course, that some will get through. Some bombers always get through. How many would be needed for destruction?

Another example of what I call the unrealistic approach to the Canadian aspect of the problem, and which I have ventured to call bluffing in some of its manifestations, was the announcement, which has a bearing on defence matters, especially defence against missiles, that Canada will soon be launching a satellite of its own, giving the impression that we are moving into the nuclear outer space field, an impression which has very little basis in reality as we were able to find out from the Prime Minister when we questioned him about it. He admitted at that time that the satellite will be of American construction, that the propulsion will be American, that it will be launched from the United States and that it will have some Canadian instruments inside. There is no doubt that they will be important, but that hardly justifies giving the impression that we were going to launch a satellite which no doubt would be the forerunner of the kind of defence which the United States may be seeking, either by counter-offensive or by direct defensive, against intercontinental ballistic missiles.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Another example is in the way the CF-105 contract was cancelled. Perhaps this would be a good time for me to call it one o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, at one o'clock I had mentioned the cancellation of the CF-105 contract as an indication of the lack of policy on the part of the government. We have had some time now to examine the reasons for that cancellation, and have secured more information on the way the cancellation was brought about. While I do not, on this occasion, propose to go into this matter I cannot forbear from saying that the information we have now received, and which we have had time to examine, increases our worries about the way this matter was handled.

We have had information since the first announcement, for instance, that the actual cost involved in the production of this aircraft varies from the information we received at the beginning. We were told by the Prime Minister on February 23, as recorded on page 1299 of Hansard—he was referring to the advice he had received from the chiefs of staff—that this aircraft would to all intents and purposes be obsolete by the time it became available for squadron service. We know now that the CF-100, which this aircraft was to have replaced and which if the CF-105 was to be obsolete would be even more obsolete, if that expression can be used, is to be retained for our home defence squadrons. We know also something about the Bomarc which is to replace two of the squadrons.

Everything we have learned, Mr. Chairman, confirms and indeed intensifies our criticism of the government on the way in which this matter was handled. This criticism was expressed in very strong terms in an article in Toronto Saturday Night of May 23 by one Robert Jamieson who, I take it, is a Canadian resident but only recently arrived in this country. In this article he states:

Two thirds of the workers on the Arrow came from Britain. It was Canada's business whether she went on with the Arrow, but people in Britain are accustomed to seeing their governments looking at issues in the round and working out broad solutions in the light of all probable consequences before announcing decisions. Does any Canadian seriously suggest this happened when the Arrow was dropped? I believe that the inept handling of this issue will have greater and more lasting effect in the United Kingdom alone in deterring potential immigration than all the now notorious articles in "The People".

I should like to return, Mr. Chairman, and elaborate on a matter with which the minister dealt this morning, the nature of the threat that faces us and, after that, what defence have we against it. The main threat in terms of a major war, though not perhaps the only threat, perhaps at the moment not even the most imminent threat because we may be facing more imminent dangers than a calculated all-out nuclear invasion, but the particular threat upon which so much of our defence has to be based is nothing less than one of total nuclear destruction. I do not want to put on the record of the committee a great deal of evidence to support this, because we know it is true. Nevertheless, perhaps it is just as well to remind ourselves, on this pleasant summer afternoon, that the biggest bomb dropped in world war II carried the equivalent of ten tons of t.n.t.; that was the grand slam bomb. The atom bomb which was dropped on Hiroshima had the equivalent of 15,000 tons of t.n.t.; that is a jump from 10 tons to 15,000 tons. The first hydrogen bomb exploded in 1954 carried the equivalent of 15 millions tons of t.n.t. These figures certainly give us cause to ponder.

One of the most outstanding United States authorities in this field of nuclear development, a man who is not given to emotional statements and a very hard realist in these matters—I am referring to Dr. Teller, who had so much to do with the decision to go ahead with the hydrogen bomb—said not long ago that "50 of these bombs could make the United States uninhabitable".

I do not know on what basis these calculations are made. I know they are made by men with scientific knowledge and, I think, political responsibility. The office of civil and defence mobilization of the United States, before a committee of congress, said the other day it estimated 49 million people of the United States would be killed in a hydrogen bomb attack of the kind of which the Soviet was now capable. General Partridge, who is well informed on these matters, and who incidentally is an officer of Canada as well as the United States because he is commander of the North American air defence command, told a house of representatives subcommittee on defence: "If the enemy launches an all-out attack against us I think we must be prepared to accept casualties in the millions".

Surely this is sufficient evidence that the only potential enemy of this country has the capability for such an attack, and makes all our references to defeating him and knocking the stuffing out of him in a nuclear attack seem rather meaningless. What form would this attack take if it ever were permitted to develop? What is the particular nature of the threat? Again I return to General Partridge's evidence before the United States congressional committee last February and I quote from it. He said this:

> At the present time the Soviets can attack us only with bombers. We do not think they have any operational intercontinental missiles.

This was last February, but only the other day the secretary of defence of the United States amended this statement and gave evidence to the effect that it was the view of the defence department of the United States that the Soviet would have ten of these missiles before the end of this year. That is quite a change from General Partridge's statement of last February. But General Partridge in his earlier statement went on to say this:

> We think that in the future they—

That is the Soviet.

> —will reduce the numbers of bombers in their inventory.

That is something the minister has confirmed in his statement in this house.

> Our national intelligence estimates are that they will improve the quality of those bombers, and that in a few years they will have a supersonic rather than a subsonic bomber force. This means that we must not only maintain the defences against bomber attack which we have today but we must also improve those defences so we can counteract a supersonic attacking force.

In other words, there will be a mix in attack of bomber and missile. According to General Partridge there must therefore be a mix in the defence. But that mix is obviously changing in favour of intercontinental missiles against which, as I ventured to say this morning and as the minister confirmed before I spoke, there is now no defence. Senator Russell who, I think, is the chairman of the senate armed services committee, speaking in Washington a few weeks ago said this:

> If the Russians attacked us tomorrow—

This is contrary to the view usually expressed.

> —it would not be with manned bombers; it would be with missiles.

While the house military appropriations subcommittee report, after a great deal of evidence was taken from a great many experts—and this is the report of May 27, 1959—concluded with this:

> During the early 1960's Russia could have three times as many intercontinental "ballistic missiles in position" as the United States.

That is one aspect of the threat, and it is a sombre enough one. But there is another threat that the minister also mentioned this morning which surely must have an important bearing on western defence policy and on Canadian defence policy, especially naval policy. That is the threat of the submarine, of which the Soviet union now has hundreds of the more modern type and will no doubt soon have nuclear-powered submarines, though I believe there is no evidence that the Soviet possesses any of those at the present time. Admiral Rickover of the United States, who is perhaps as well informed on this question as anybody on this continent, said in his evidence before the house subcommittee, and it is in their report:

> Russian submarines can come near our coasts. They can fire missiles. If their submarines come off our coast they can drop hydrogen or atomic warhead missiles into our cities. One such missile, accurately placed, could destroy a city.

Then he added this:

> The best way we know to destroy these submarines is by other atomic-powered submarines.

I may have a word to say about that matter when I come to what I think should be our Canadian policy in this field. Then the admiral added this paragraph, which certainly has a significance for us. As reported at page 439 of the testimony he said:

> What nuclear power has really done for the polar regions—

He had been talking about the submarine in the polar regions.

> —is to make another large area of the earth insecure and bring it into warlike focus.

This is an area very much the concern of Canada. He added:

> It has been immune from war up to now, but any nation that possesses nuclear submarines can now use that area for warlike operations.

What are the nature and effectiveness of our present defences against this threat which I have outlined and which the minister outlined before me? I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that there has been a good deal of unrealistic talk about this matter, a good deal—if you like—of bluffing. The minister is reported as having said over C.B.C. television on Sunday, June 7, as follows, and I quote from the text of what he is reported to have said:

> The CF-100 was designed for and is capable of meeting the threat which the Russians now have.

I have given some indication of what that threat is. Yet, Mr. Chairman, that statement by the minister has been denied, denied by the minister himself. It was certainly denied by the Prime Minister in the statement I have just read from our debate on the CF-105, that the CF-105 would itself be obsolete before it came into squadron operation. If the CF-105 would be obsolete in those circumstances, how can we accept the view that the CF-100 is capable of meeting the threat the Russians now have? I have just indicated what I think that is.

The minister himself in this house, or perhaps it was before the estimates committee last year and repeated by me when I was quoting him in this chamber, said the CF-100 was capable of engaging the majority of Russian bombers. If the CF-100 is capable only of engaging only the majority of the Russian bombers, how can we consider the CF-100 to be an effective mechanism in the context of the threat I have mentioned? But the minister said this morning—this was something new, and I venture to bring it to the attention of the committee—that while the CF-100 squadrons would be maintained—I have not his exact words before me—facilities would be provided or provision might be made for United States interceptor squadrons to fly from Canadian air fields.

I think this is something the minister will undoubtedly want to deal with when he replies to these questions. Would this mean that men from perhaps the same Canadian bases with Canadian CF-100 planes would be asked to do the same job that the United States squadrons would be expected to do with more modern and more effective machines for that particular kind of work? Having given up the Arrow, and if the CF-100 is obsolete, is our only effective protection in the field of manned interceptors now to be United States interceptor squadrons, some of which will be flying from Canadian air fields?

Certainly I agree with the minister when he says that manned interceptor squadrons are still a necessary element in the mix of defence which the Americans talk about. Certainly the United States at the present time is apparently not giving up its development of the F-108 which is a supersonic long-range fighter; and in startling contast to the CF-100. It shows how amazing has been the development over the last two or three years. The F-108 is a supersonic long-range fighter with a speed in excess of 2,000 miles per hour designed to police the early warning line and to begin the destruction of attacking aircraft long before they reach our shores; that is to say, to begin the destruction of attacking aircraft over Canada.

That is from the testimony of a deputy chief of staff of the United States air force, namely Colonel Andrews, before the house subcommittee on April 10, 1959. This F-108 which is now in the process of development, and according to one of the senior officers of the air force, General Irvine, is as good as the Bomarc. Also he said that present bombers will be replaced in years ahead by air to surface missiles from bombers, which mean that bombers will have to be intercepted farther out than ever if the interception is to be effective. We are told that the F-108 may be able to do this; certainly the CF-100 will not be able to do it. I repeat; are we therefore to have in the future, if we are to maintain this kind of defence, United States squadrons of F-108's flying from Canadian bases as our main protection, or are we to have Bomarcs, or are we to have both on Canadian soil?

That leads me to the consideration of this very important and controversial missile, the Bomarc. What about this ground to air missile on which we seem to be basing our defence now? A year ago, I agree the reports which reached us of the effectiveness of the Bomarc were much more impressive than they seem to be now in the light of all the information which has come from the congressional hearings in Washington. Certainly they are more effective than CF-100 against supersonic bombers, because I doubt if the CF-100 would be effective at all.

Doubts have been raised as to the effectiveness of this missile upon which we in Canada are now counting so much. There is—and perhaps this is not too strong a word—a furious controversy going on in Washington over these missiles. There is a controversy between the use of the Nike-Ajax and the Nike-Hercules which the army has at the moment, and the Bomarc B which is the choice of the air force and which is Canada's choice. But before I go on to discuss those missiles let me emphasize once again that neither of them, the Nike nor the Bomarc, has any value whatever against missiles. The evidence on that is conclusive. I made that statement this morning, Mr. Chairman, and I propose to substantiate it from evidence in Washington where they have the facts on this matter. One of the high officials of the Pentagon, General Partridge, testified before the house of representatives subcommittee, again on February 19, 1959. He was asked by a congressman:

> As of the moment you do not have any defence against ICBM's if Russia should have them and apply them to us at the moment?
> General Partridge: That is correct.

The congressman went on:

> The only way that you could protect yourself under those conditions would be by having a knowledge through intelligence as to when they are going to be fired, and only then, if you had adequate devices to knock them down?
> General Partridge: That is right.

Later in the same hearing General Partridge had this to say:

> The present system of air defence as it exists today has no capability to provide either warning or active defence against an incoming intercontinental ballistic missile.

Then he went on, and the minister echoed this this morning:

> This system must be devised; the warning portion is now being built. The active missile defences, the Nike-Zeus system must be pushed along to completion as rapidly as possible.

Then a congressman asked:

> Is it true since that has not been tried out we do not know what it would do?

General Partridge replied:

> Work is proceeding on the development equipment, research and development equipment, and it will be tested, I believe, at White Sands proving ground.

From this evidence it becomes very clear that it will be some years before these anti-missile missiles can possibly be effective, and they will cost billions, of course far beyond our financial reach if we ever get involved in this field by ourselves. Even then there are some doubts as to the ultimate effectiveness of this anti-missile missile. The assistant secretary of the air force research and development branch, Mr. Horner, testifying again on February 19, said:

> It appears to be much cheaper to launch an ICBM than it is to shoot one down.

Then he was asked by the chairman of the subcommittee:

> As I understand it, you are saying that the Nike-Zeus and other suggested ways of shooting down ballistic missiles would be so expensive that probably the better answer to the threat is the production of more ICBM's by the United States as an additional threat and deterrent against the opponent. Is that correct?

Mr. Horner replied:

> Yes, sir, that is correct.

Then he was asked to give an estimate as to the effectiveness of this missile if they did proceed with it, and Mr. Horner said:

> My reaction to that is that the defence has never been 100 per cent successful. With this tremendous advantage that the offence now has with the advent of thermonuclear weapons and ballistic missiles, it certainly becomes even more difficult to postulate 100 per cent success in defence and interception.

The conclusion of this, Mr. Chairman, and surely it has a bearing on our own policy, is that at present there is no defence against missiles, that it will be some years before any defence against them will be operational, and there is not likely ever to be complete defence against nuclear missiles.

Then what about the other form of defence which, according to some, is the best defence against the more immediate threat? What about missile defence against bombing planes? That brings up, of course, the controversy between the Nike and the Bomarc. The Nike, as the minister pointed out this morning, is an army short range, but operational, ground to air missile for what he called "point defence". The Bomarc is for "area defence"; it has a longer range than the army missile. When we were talking about Bomarcs a year ago we were presumably talking about what is now known as the Mark A, though at that time—the minister will correct me if I am wrong—there was no distinction made in our discussions between one type of Bomarc and another type. We assumed there was only one type.

The Mark A, which we were considering a year ago, has been tested only against subsonic targets, and even at limited range and height those tests were only partially successful and are now to be discontinued because this particular weapon is to be discontinued in favour of what is now called the Mark B, which the minister now says is the only Bomarc weapon we ever had in mind for Canada's weapon. It is a solid fuel booster missile, having solid fuel booster rockets for take-off. It has had one test on May 26 against a subsonic, not a supersonic, target; and the test was, we are told, inconclusive.

I do not know whether the minister has had the opportunity to read the testimony given to the House of Representatives subcommittee on the Bomarc weapon, especially the questions asked about this matter by Representative Flood of Pennsylvania. This is what he said, and it is interesting in light of the conclusions the committee came to later with regard to this weapon. He said:

> The army had Nike-Ajax. They had Nike-Hercules. Immediately the air force had to have something. They couldn't have that going on. Somebody thought up Bomarc. This was in the early days. Colonel, now you have Bomarc A. You took one shot at one drone at . . . feet and it worked. That is all you have done with Bomarc A at that altitude.

Then he went on:

> Here is Bomarc A, the great air force unmanned interceptor. It takes one shot at one pigeon at . . . , it hits, and that is the end of that. You buy it, and we are in procurement. But now you are through buying A's, are you not?

And the colonel to whom he was addressing the question said yes, they had dropped it in favour of Bomarc B. Then Mr. Flood asked:

> How many B's have you tested at 400 miles?

The colonel said:

> I don't know, sir.

Mr. Flood then went on to say:

> So you will scrap A because you have a better one, B, solid fuel, which you have not tested against anything. Yet you are going to buy it because there are a few little gimmicks here and a few little gimmicks there, and you know from experience that since this concerns only the booster solid fuel, and you have had great experience with boosters and solid fuels on aircraft and all that, all these things being equal you are firmly convinced you should stop buying A which is no good anyhow, after $2 billion, and go into B which you know nothing about except as our logic and experience indicates. That is Bomarc B and Bomarc A for over $2 billion.

That was testimony given this spring in Washington. The Senate armed services committee report of May 24, after discussion on the same subject—and no doubt this paragraph is familiar to the minister—had this to say:

> The untried Bomarc will be becoming operational—

At least two years away. I continue:

> —in the air defence picture at a time when the major emphasis should be on anti-missile defence.

All this means is that the value, effectiveness and timing of the Bomarc—the Bomarc B, if you like—is now under serious attack in the United States, and as a result of that attack the administration has agreed on a compromise between Bomarc missiles and Nike missiles and anti-missile missiles, as a result of which the amount to be spent on our weapon, the Bomarc, is to be reduced by $925 million over the next five years.

I am informed that its bases in the United States are to be reduced from 30 to 16. Senator Symington, who is a defence critic in the Senate and who was once secretary for air, said of this compromise:

> It is merely a guarantee of further waste of billions of dollars.

In spite of United States doubts about this weapon the minister confirmed this morning that we are proceeding with Bomarc bases and SAGE installations in Canada, SAGE installations being essential, I take it, for the effective operation of the Bomarc, without waiting to see what finally happens in the United States with regard to this weapon. When we have asked the minister questions about this we have not received very illuminating replies. The minister has indicated that it is necessary to have the bases ready in case the weapon is a success even though, I suggest, we will have the information on this in lots of time to construct the bases, if necessary, before SAGE could be ready for them. SAGE, we are told, is an essential part of the Bomarc system.

The deputy chief of staff of the United States air force, General Irvine, on April 10, 1959, said that Sage would not be finished for four years. I am wondering if it would not have been good policy to have postponed final consideration of this matter and postponed the initiation of the actual construction until the situation in Washington became a little clearer.

The minister said that the development of the Bomarc B in Washington is proceeding according to schedule though he is not quite sure, nor are we, what is the schedule. Why not have waited for a short time until this particular matter was cleared up? Canada has scrapped its own plane, the CF-105, for this unproven United States missile now so bitterly controversial in the United States. Even the minister, though he appeared very confident about the effectiveness and value of this missile in the references he made to it in the house, seems to have had some second thoughts. In a press interview in Winnipeg on June 5—the minister will correct me if this is not an accurate account of what he said—the minister is reported to have stated that the government will await the results of United States tests before a final decision is made on the Bomarc.

Does that mean that no final decision has yet been made? Is that the present situation? If so, is it not a fact that the construction of the bases has begun tying us up closely to the whole Bomarc-SAGE system? It means that we are tied not only to the Bomarc system but to the whole SAGE complex, because SAGE is certainly essential to Bomarc.

As to the main argument advanced in favour of Bomarc, it is perhaps not one which has a broad Canadian appeal. The argument is that it has a longer range than Nike-Hercules or Nike-Ajax and could push the area of effective defence north of the United States border. That apparently is the tactic to be followed by NORAD, as General Partridge made perfectly clear to the house committee on February 19 at page 336 of the evidence, in these words:

> The interceptors which take off for interception purposes are fully armed and ready to fight.

This would apply to missiles too, apparently. I continue:

> We want to start the battle as far out from our targets as we can and put on increasing pressure by increased numbers of interceptors as the battle moves in toward our target areas. If we do not destroy the enemy before he gets to these target areas, we want to apply surface to air missiles against him.

And again on the same day, in terms which apply to the missile and the manned interceptor, General Partridge had this to say:

> We would like very much if it were possible to do so to fight the air battle far out from our targets over uninhabited areas of northern Canada or out at sea—
> We want to engage the attacking forces as far out from the targets as we can and break up the bomber stream, shoot down as many of the enemy airplanes as we can and get to them before they can launch air to surface missiles. Then we would like to take them under fire by Bomarc if this is possible, again offshore or in relatively uninhabited areas of Canada.

I suggest that the effectiveness of this kind of defence, which I think is becoming increasingly dubious at best, will depend on a good alert or early warning system, and this effectiveness should not display itself in a form which would mean that the battle would be fought, if it ever had to be fought, over Canadian populated territory. I agree that it should be pushed, not over the United States border but far north of the Canadian border, if this kind of defence is to be adopted.

If it is going to work at all—and the minister did not have very much to say about this in his statement this morning—we have to have an effective early warning system designed to take care of these new developments. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I understand that the early warning system we now have is adequate protection against bombers provided there is no jamming, and that is quite a proviso. For missiles, there is no early warning system available at all, but billions of dollars are going to be spent to secure one through the ballistic early warning system, in order to achieve how much warning? From 15 to 20 minutes.

About this new development and the accompanying expenditure, a gentleman who is probably the greatest radar authority in the world today, a man to whom the free world should be eternally grateful, Sir Robert Watson-Watt, is very sceptical indeed. As he stated in Washington the other day he is pessimistic about the effectiveness of early warning systems for missiles and the wisdom of spending these billions on them. I am in no position, of course, to judge whether what I am about to read is an accurate and reasoned assessment of the situation, but certainly anything this man says is worthy of attention. A couple of weeks ago he is reported to have said:

> The heavy expenditures you are devoting to SAGE systems; BMEWS in the north, and the Nike-Zeus anti-missile missile, is a rather forlorn effort to jack up radar to levels it won't reach.

Let us hope he is not correct in this. He went on to say that improvements contemplated in the D.E.W. line BMEWS are—and I quote his words—> —at best a very expensive way to get a still inadequate warning.

Our anxieties and preoccupations about this are increased by General Partridge's statement before the house committee—and perhaps the minister could comment on this —when he said:

> The Russians could jam the D.E.W. and mid-Canada lines if they wished to do so.

If this form of continental defence, this system of early warning, interception and destruction has a valid purpose—and let us assume it has a valid purpose—that purpose is not to protect this country or indeed even the populous centres of the United States, because indeed that is not possible. Its valid and primary purpose, the purpose on which it must stand and on which the expenditures must be justified, is to protect the bases from which the deterrent must operate and which would be the primary target of any aggressor.

In fact, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that today our main protection is the deterrent, providing it can operate. So let us not fool ourselves. There is no protection, or very little protection, or almost incidental protection for Canadian soil or for Canadian citizens in this form of defence. The protection is in the deterrent in so far as it is able to keep the peace. If we ever had any doubts in our own minds as to the real purpose of the deterrent and the real validity of early warning interception as a protection for the deterrent, the testimony of General Power, who is the head of the strategic air command, I think, in February before the house subcommittee would remove those doubts. This is what he had to say:

> The real backbone of SAC's deterrent posture is our alert system. As you know, under this system we maintain a certain percentage of the command on the alert 24 hours a day, seven days a week, 365 days a year. Airplanes are loaded with bombs; crews sleep close by. They are tested every day—we can get them rolling in about five minutes, that is, the first airplane starts rolling down the runway in five minutes.
> This is the only force that a potential aggressor knows he will have to reckon with, no matter how cleverly he plans his surprise attack. If that force is big enough, and if it gets the 15 minutes' warning for which it is tailored, and if it can penetrate we think an aggressor will be strongly deterred.
> If we get that warning, we can get these airplanes off the ground; therefore, even though an aggressor launches missiles against the United States—and nothing can stop them today—we will still get the retaliatory force off, that part of it that is on this alert; it will not be destroyed, and the aggressor will have to absorb it.

Well, Mr. Chairman, there is our protection, not interceptors and not missiles in the skies. There is our protection at the present time. That, I suggest, is the purpose, if it has any purpose, of continental air defence and early warning systems.

Now, the United Kingdom is perfectly realistic about this matter, as we would expect, realistic in a way perhaps that we should apply to Canadian defence policy. The United Kingdom, as I understand from reading defence discussions there and white papers, is not now even attempting to defend the island as such or even pretending that it is doing so. The white paper of 1958 had this to say in paragraph 33:

> Fighter command has now the more limited task of protecting the bomber bases.

I ask the question, should Canada adopt the same principle? Perhaps the minister will deal with this when he replies. I ask it as a question and not with any illusion that I know the answer myself. Certainly the United Kingdom now relies primarily on the strategic nuclear deterrent as a defence against all-out attack. Should we rely primarily on that deterrent and make our contribution to the deterrent? This is a view, Mr. Chairman, which is increasingly supported in the United States itself, notably in the evidence given before the house subcommittee on April 20 by a naval officer whom I quoted this morning, Admiral Hayward. He said this:

> We are a member of a free alliance. There are 45 nations allied with us. We swim or sink with this alliance, and if we go to fortress America, and just forget it, we are going to die.

At page 316 he had this to say:

> Since the air defence business of the United States has gotten under way, we have spent $25 billion to defend the United States against the manned bomber.

He was asked "Since what date?", and he replied:

> From about 1949, I would say, when SAGE, D.E.W. line, interceptors, and Bomarc were initiated.

He repeated what he had said earlier at this hearing:

> I do not believe in fortress America. If we go to fortress America, the free alliance is going to die, and the proposal to put billions into these fixed systems for defending the United States I do not buy. I do not agree with it. This is my own personal opinion.
> Mr. Minshall: You think it is another Maginot line?
> Admiral Hayward: I certainly do.
> Mr. Minshall: Would you feel, then, that we should put any more money into the Bomarc system?
> Admiral Hayward: Personally I say no, I would not.

Then, after testimony was heard by the two committees, one in the Senate and the other in the House of Representatives of the United States, and the committees made their reports, the United States administration apparently decided not to go so far as Admiral Hayward suggested, but to divide its money and its resources between territorial defence and the maintenance of a deterrent of overwhelming retaliatory power ready and effective for swift and devastating counter-blow, and known by the potential aggressor to be ready and effective for that blow. A deterrent of this kind is now in existence and has been in existence for a good many years.

This, of course, produces an uneasy stalemate in the world situation which so far as calculated aggression is concerned may remain indefinitely. Therefore peace, the kind of peace—if you can call it that—which we have, rests largely now on what the United Kingdom 1958 defence white paper called the balancing forces of mutual annihilation. As this deterrent is, in my view, so important in the maintenance of peace, surely our contribution to it, our attitude to it, should have a bearing on Canada's defence policy. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, though I am straining the patience of the committee, I should like for a few minutes to examine the nature of this deterrent and what our relation in Canada should be, what can it do, what can it not do, and what contribution should we, as part of our contribution to collective security, make to this deterrent. But in discussing this we should remember that this nuclear deterrent, however powerful it may be, may not prevent direct limited military action. It may not prevent indirect military action. It may not prevent the catastrophe of miscalculation. It will not prevent, however powerful it may be it will not hinder and indeed it may even facilitate economic penetration and political subversion. Therefore it has its limitations.

If the deterrent, however, is our main protection at the present time against all-out war, how much nuclear power is needed to deter? How far do you have to go before deterrent power is sufficient to deter? And if you go further the additional power is not only unnecessary and wasteful, but more weapons on the other side cancel out your own increased power, and both sides are merely wasting money, energy and power itself.

This kind of deterrent by force may, I admit, be absolutely essential at the present time against attack; but its use, if it ever had to be used, is also an assurance of the destruction of yourself as well as the enemy. Therefore if both sides have this power and cannot be prevented from using it in retaliation against an attack, then neither side will dare use it. It becomes sterilized, and paradoxically the objective of defence policy and even defence strategy is to keep it sterilized.

Yet, while we would be afraid to use it because of its results against ourselves, we might slide into such use by the nature of our defence against what might be a limited aggression. We might—and this is one of the major dangers that confront the western alliance today—by the very nature of our collective arrangements convert little wars into big wars. The minister himself in statements he has made has, I think, suggested this when he expressed scepticism about whether it would be possible to start with a minor and limited defence against a limited aggression using, if you like, tactical nuclear weapons in a limited way; whether it would be possible to start these, without going to the ultimate weapon of the hydrogen bomb and all that this implies.

The United States position is certainly all-important in this matter, but that position seems to me to be dangerously ambiguous. The army chief of staff, General Taylor—I think he was army chief of staff until a few weeks ago; I do not think he is now—had this to say to a subcommittee of the Senate on March 11, and I quote from his testimony:

> We must have a real shield of NATO forces on the ground to reassure NATO that indeed we do have some response other than general war to any aggressive action. The most likely way to have a general war is either to back into it, to have a limited operation expand into a bigger operation or perhaps to have a miscalculation of a gross kind on the part of one side or the other.

I suggest those are very wise words indeed. But the President of the United States had this to say at a press conference, I believe, on the very same date, and these are words which certainly rang around the world:

> We are certainly not going to fight a ground war in Europe.

That is, the United States. What is the alternative? An atomic air war of mutual destruction? But the President added at the same press conference:

> I don't know how you could free anything with nuclear weapons.

Yet he had just said only a short time before, "We are not going to fight a ground war in Europe." Well, Mr. Chairman, what voice has Canada in resolving what I can perhaps call the ultimate dilemma? Where do we stand? What is the answer to all this? What can we do to find the right answer?

I believe we have to retain, and I have to say it, the nuclear deterrent now in the hands of the United States—I wish we could do without it—and in part in the hands of the United Kingdom, to be used only after a collective NATO decision except in retaliation to an all-out, massive, sudden assault when there would be no time for consultation, indeed perhaps no time for anything else. To throw away or to urge the United States to throw away the nuclear deterrent does not seem to me to involve any service to peace but, indeed, might be a provocation and temptation to aggression on the part of a state which retained it. If we could do so by international agreement, of course, that would be the perfect solution.

But while I feel we have to retain this horribly devastating nuclear deterrent in the interests of the uneasy stalemate on which peace now rests, I believe also that there should be a shift of emphasis in the west pending an agreed reduction in armaments, a shift of emphasis also in NATO, a shift of emphasis and priority of resources from total war weapons, especially of so-called deterrence, toward conventional weapons, conventional strength and conventional planning. In other words we should accept the total war stalemate while trying to resolve it by negotiation and reduction of armaments. We should give greater priority to improving the strength and mobility of conventional forces. We should make effective, and not merely talk about it, the concept of balanced collective forces and a co-ordinated program of collective development and production of arms which would really reflect interdependence.

The minister said it this morning, and I have said it more than once when I sat on the other side, that collective security in NATO was based on this principle of balanced collective forces. That certainly was the principle adopted many years ago, but surely the time has come when the strategy and the planning of NATO should reflect that principle more effectively than is the case at the present time. If we cannot effectively work out our arrangements in NATO on that principle, then one of these days, and it will be a great tragedy, NATO will weaken and perhaps even collapse.

What about Canada then? Even on the lowest grounds of national self-interest we should do everything we possibly can to keep NATO active, strong and vigorous; because if it should disappear, what about Canada then? Fortress America or neutralism or what? If the deterrent is largely in the hands of the United States, and it is, and in part also in the hands of the United Kingdom, though there is a debate going on there now whether it should be retained, where does NATO come in, NATO which remains the cornerstone in our system of collective defence though it is being subjected these days to increased national, political and military pressures which may impair its effectiveness?

I certainly believe in NATO as strongly as I ever did. I am talking now about the defence side of things. But here again I suggest that its purposes, plans and methods of defence should be re-examined in the light of new developments. I do not know whether that is being done. We know what the purpose of NATO is. The minister has explained it and other ministers have explained it. It is primarily, I think, to prevent an accident, to remove a temptation, to avoid, above all, having to depend entirely on nuclear retaliation. We know what the nature of this shield is. Its principle is integrated balanced forces, which is insufficiently realized partly because of our reliance on nuclear deterrence and partly because of a growing national sensitiveness and pride which makes genuine collective control increasingly difficult.

So the question arises, is the shield really NATO—we talk so much about the NATO shield—or is it the strategic air command, which is no more a part of NATO than is NORAD? What is this NATO shield? It is perhaps now only a subsidiary shield but that would not remove its importance even if that were true. The strength of the shield, we are told, and I have never seen these figures controverted, is 21 divisions and effective air forces. On the question of air forces I should like to ask the minister —I brought this up in the house in a question a few days ago—to tell us in the course of the debate what effect the removal of United States squadrons from France would have on the supply and equipment position, the logistic position, of Canadian squadrons which remained in France.

We have been told that the NATO program is now based on a document adopted in December, 1957, dealing with minimum force needs from 1958 to 1963. Writing in the Financial Post of last February 7, Mr. Michael Barkway quoted high NATO military authorities as saying with regard to the minimum force needs paper:

> For the first time each government now has in front of it a written statement showing precisely what is expected of it. Each can now refer to this annually when it makes up its military budget.

I should like to ask the minister how this program is progressing. Is it up to schedule? I should like to ask him if he can tell us what is Canada's commitment in this five year program. Have we indicated to NATO our acceptance of this five year program and how do we propose to discharge it? Is the Canadian government satisfied with the arms and equipment of its NATO forces?

To return again to the congressional subcommittee, may I point out that General Norstad had this to say on February 19 with respect to the question of the arms and equipment of NATO forces:

> Within the NATO forces we are dependent upon atomic forces. We have no forces that are exclusively conventional or non-nuclear.

"No forces", he said.

> Within the alliance, the forces which we have are based upon the full exploitation of atomic weapons and new delivery means. Without them they could not deal with a serious situation. When or if strategic air forces would be involved is a matter of writing some ground rules and making a tremendous amount of assumptions. It would be a very "iffy" question and a very "iffy" answer on my part.
> I prefer to leave the answer on the basis that if we are to deal with any significant situation we must use atomic weapons, whether they are so-called tactical or strategic. It is very difficult to draw the line.

These are the words of the NATO commander in chief, General Norstad. They apply, presumably, to all the forces under his command.

On March 5 last the commander of the Canadian brigade was visited by a correspondent for the Globe and Mail, and these words were attributed to Brigadier Cameron:

Our defence plans—

Presumably these are Canadian defence plans.

—are based on the nuclear weapon.

But I assume that the Canadian brigade has now no nuclear capability. I have no reason to believe, the minister can correct me if I am wrong, that it has any authority from the government to use such weapons if it possessed them. I would be grateful if the minister would clear up these very important points about the relationship of our Canadian forces in Europe to the use of nuclear weapons which General Norstad, the commander of NATO, says are absolutely essential for the effective operation and defence of these forces.

I apologize again to the committee, and I appreciate its patience, but I should like to close by saying a few words about what I think are some of the principles which should guide Canadian policies on defence at the present time. The minister dealt with some of these this morning. I certainly have no dogmatic view on matters so complex or matters concerning which, as I have already indicated, we in the opposition have not the access—I do not complain about this—to all the information which the minister has. I do not know all the answers, but I should like to get as much information as possible upon which, as a Canadian, I can base my answers to these questions.

In the first place—I believe, I have said this already more than once in my statement—I believe in collective security as strongly as I ever did. But I am worried about collective security becoming more and more continental and less and less Atlantic. I believe this should be the foundation of our policy, as indeed the minister indicated it was in his statement.

I believe in the strongest possible support for a permanent United Nations peace force to carry out United Nations decisions, to police armistice settlements, as he said in his statement this morning, and patrol danger areas to prevent small conflicts deteriorating into large wars.

Pending agreement at the United Nations for such a permanent force, and there are great obstacles there in the way of this development, I see no reason at all against, and many reasons for, following a course by which Canada could negotiate with other middle powers for the organization and equipment of such a force, based on a treaty relationship, which force would be made available to the United Nations on request by an assembly decision. I believe that as an integral part of our defence policy appropriate Canadian forces should be trained and equipped for such international peace preserving service as this.

I believe that for this purpose perhaps we should have a brigade group which would be entirely airborne, air transported with all its equipment in an emergency. Certainly, the R.C.A.F. would have a big new part to play in that kind of development. Furthermore, I think that land and air forces should continue to be made available to NATO as part of a collective, and I hope it will be a genuinely collective effort.

Having said that, I should like to add that in my view NATO strategy and planning must be made effective in a way which gives its members enough strength in Europe to defend western Europe against an aggression without having to rely on every occasion on massive nuclear retaliation by the United States, the effect of which, as I said, would be to convert every limited war into nuclear suicide. I believe Canada should insist—perhaps insist is too strong a word—Canada should do its best to bring about the acceptance of NATO strategy and strength based on a balance of collective forces to which each NATO member makes a fair contribution, and for which each accepts NATO control and authority over its forces through the NATO command. I feel that this control and command should be extended over the whole NATO area. I know, as well as the minister knows, the difficulty in bringing that about, but I believe it is an objective which we should keep pressing to achieve.

I believe Canada's continued participation in NATO forces in Europe should be under continuous examination in the light of the progress made in achieving this objective. As long as our present forces remain in Europe they should know the role that they are to play in an agreed and acceptable strategy, and they must be given the most effective equipment with which to play it. It was for this reason we on this side were gratified to hear the minister say this morning that the government had decided to re-equip the air division. I am not in a position to comment on whether this new equipment is the best that could be obtained. I do not even know exactly what the purpose of the air division will be. The minister outlined it this morning, but certainly it will require a good deal of study. It seemed to me to be an entirely new purpose for the air division, attack support, a very important purpose indeed in the defence of western Europe, a very onerous task for the air force. I think the decision, notwithstanding what the minister has said, should have been made months ago, but it is better to have made it now than to have postponed it further because surely it has become clear to all that the air division, in its present form and with its present equipment, the F-86, was not in a position to discharge effectively the kind of task it would have been called upon to discharge.

This is no reflection on what is perhaps the best body of airmen in Europe. This is a reflection, rather, on the speed of events and it shows how quickly equipment can get out of date. Certainly the air division in Europe is second to none in any air force for skill, courage and determination of its men. It deserves, and I hope it is receiving now, a clear-cut role, which perhaps we can discuss, and the best means of playing that role.

Then, next what should the relationship of Canada be, in my view, to continental air defence? It seems to me that if Canada is to continue to subscribe to the theory of defence in depth against manned bombers, we should not deceive ourselves that this is going to be an effective defence for the Canadian people and Canadian soil. Let us not delude ourselves. This would be Canadian association with a defence deterrent which is a United States deterrent so far as this continent is concerned, except in so far as we are contributing to the early warning system.

If we are to continue to take part in this form of continental defence, surely the Canadian squadrons for that purpose must be re-equipped with the latest planes. It is not fair, it certainly will not be fair in the months ahead to ask them to take their full part in continental air defence armed with CF-100's alongside United States squadrons armed with the latest type of interceptor, eventually perhaps the F-108.

If, on the other hand—although there is no indication of it in the minister's statement this morning—the government should consider leaving this particular form of continental defence to the United States, and giving the R.C.A.F. perhaps another and more Canadian part to play, surely the government should insist that the United States interceptor squadrons be based far enough north to permit contact with the enemy long before he reaches Canadian industrial areas and populated areas.

[Mr. Pearson.]

The minister said this morning, and I agree, that we should continue to take some share of the responsibility for the existing early warning systems while those systems are considered to be effective. However, we should leave the development of B.M.E.W.'s—ballistic missile early warnings—as we should leave the development of anti-missile missiles, to the United States. I gather from the minister this morning that he would not disagree with that statement. I think this development is not in our particular economic sphere.

I would go further, however, and say that whenever the United States desires facilities or rights to operate on Canadian soil for defence purposes which are deemed by the United States government to be essential and not by us to be undesirable though not essential, at least as a Canadian effort; I believe in these circumstances that we should give the United States those rights as part of this partnership about which the minister spoke, as is done in the United Kingdom and as was done in the case of the D.E.W. line. But only in each case after we have worked out an intergovernmental agreement which reserves all Canadian rights of sovereignty and political control.

We were able to do this when we negotiated the D.E.W. line. We discussed at that time the desirability of making this an all Canadian effort and taking full control of it. However, it was decided that that was not a good thing to do in view of the speculative character of the effectiveness of this line. But if the United States felt it was essential we agreed they should be given the right to do it and we would make our contribution to the other line. But the right to go ahead would be governed by a political agreement which was made at that time and which as the minister knows reserves every right of Canadian sovereignty and ultimate control. While I would be the last person—because I believe in collective security—to refuse any member of the Atlantic alliance any facility which they claim to be essential for collective security and require to use on our territory and which we do not wish to do ourselves; while I believe we have no right to refuse that kind of thing in that kind of emergency, nevertheless on every occasion we should make sure that through political arrangements between the two governments on the highest level Canadian rights are safeguarded and protected.

I would go further than that. We should do ourselves all of the things in our country we possibly can and that we think are necessary for continental defence. This is not an easy problem because the United States is a great power with world interests and world responsibilities. The United States cannot allow any sector to go unguarded. They have to participate in every form of defence activity, even though they may have doubts themselves, as they have in connection with the Bomarc. But Canada is not in that position. We have a limited amount—although a big amount—to spend on defence and we have to be particularly careful that we use it to the best advantage. Normally the best way in which to use it is for defence which makes a contribution to genuine collective security. If we feel that certain proposals which are put forward are not in our view desirable for Canadian action then we cannot be a dog in the manger and prevent others from doing them who are our allies if they work for collective security.

So far as the army is concerned, it seems to me that the army should consist—and I put this suggestion forward with some hesitation to an expert in this field—of mobile brigade groups and that there should be sufficient air transport available to pick up an entire brigade group and deliver it anywhere in the world where required, whether it is required as part of a NATO contribution, as an international peace contingent or for other duties specified by the Canadian government from time to time. I think nothing can be much more important now than the equipment of the army for that purpose. If that means cutting down on some other expenditure it should be done. I think the government must now decide, and presumably it is in the midst of negotiation with the United States with a view to coming to a decision on the use of tactical nuclear weapons. The government, especially in view of what General Norstad has said, must decide whether these forces are to be armed with tactical nuclear weapons. If the decision is in the affirmative, surely the government must insist that any such weapons are under Canadian control and operation. It is a position that I think that any self-respecting nation would take. I cannot believe that, when confronted with the necessity for taking that position, the United States would consider it an unreasonable one.

There are some considerations which must be in the minds of the government in coming to a conclusion in this matter, and I hope the conclusion will be reached shortly. Perhaps I might mention one or two of them. The minister will know that tactical nuclear weapons have now been reduced to a point where they can be used by small formations against purely military targets. They are conventional almost in the sense that they are ordinary weapons with nuclear ammunition, but used in almost the same way as if it were ordinary ammunition. Second, if these weapons were not used, NATO forces in Europe would be facing armies which had them and would not hesitate to use them. Unless we can get international agreement on this matter, the resulting military disparity created might well be considered intolerable to NATO morale. If the Canadian forces were deprived of these weapons or were not permitted to use them—this is a consideration which no doubt the government has very much in mind—their morale could hardly be expected to remain very high if they were serving alongside NATO forces which had these tactical nuclear weapons.

The matter is obviously as complex as it is important but it should certainly be given consideration, and I hope the house will have the views of the government on this matter before long. One important factor—and I want to mention this so that what I have said will not be misunderstood—in coming to a decision on this matter surely must be the possibility of abolishing the use of all atomic weapons by international agreement. Whatever decision is reached on this particular matter, I believe that Canada should use to the utmost its influence to discourage nations—and I have mentioned this matter before; it is perhaps a matter for the United Nations—which do not now manufacture atomic weapons from embarking on programs for their production. Nothing could be more disastrous for peace and security in the future than if twenty, thirty, forty or fifty nations in the world were producing nuclear weapons.

As far as naval policy is concerned, I may have a little bit more to say on that matter later. It seems to me that naval policy should be based, if not exclusively, almost exclusively on protection against submarine attacks. If nuclear submarines are required, as Admiral Rickover has stated, as the most effective submarine killers, perhaps Canada should explore the possibilities of a production sharing arrangement with Great Britain or the United States whereby Canada might obtain her requirements in exchange for components or other Canadian defence equipment without the necessity of embarking on an extensive program of development and production which it seems to me, in view of economic circumstances, would be unwise.

The upshot of all this, Mr. Chairman, is that I am advocating a complete re-examination and re-assessment of the defence problem as a means of solving defence problems on the part of the government in the light of the changes that have taken place. I am not now advocating a reduction or a substantial reduction of our defence effort. But I do not think that we are getting the maximum results for the expenditures we are making. I think we are making expenditures on defence, in the light of situations and circumstances which do not any longer exist. I think we should, as I have said, make a complete re-assessment of the nature of our defence effort and our defence expenditures in the light of the fundamental changes in the last two years.

But Canada has to pay its fair share of the collective insurance policy against war. While we might be able to cut—and I think we could do so—defence expenditures, no one on this side of the chamber would advocate doing that at the expense of our security or at the expense of our position in the NATO alliance. I think it is possible to make a more effective contribution for less expenditures because I believe some of our expenditures now are not justifying themselves in the return they make to our security.

Above all, I believe, as I said at the beginning of my statement, that while military defence remains important and while a deterrent has to be maintained, while these millions have to be spent, the only real defence is peace, and everything must be subordinated in this government as in other free governments to the search for peace by negotiation to make the astronomic defence expenditures unnecessary in the long run. The minister said this morning that the world is perhaps approaching the stage when the use of force is no longer valid as an instrument of policy to settle man's differences. The minister might take the word "perhaps" out of that statement. The world certainly has approached that stage, and defence policy cannot surely in these days be based realistically on any other consideration. While military defence remains essential and while military deterrents remain essential, the use of these deterrents and the use of this force as an instrument of policy to settle man's differences has now become intolerable.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, the estimates which are now before us are of the utmost importance to all members of the House of Commons in particular, and of course to the people of Canada in general. May I first of all offer my congratulations to the Leader of the Opposition for the speech he has just concluded. The Leader of the Opposition in his lifetime of service has undoubtedly made a great many and memorable speeches, but personally from what I have read of his speeches or from what I have heard of them, I consider his speech this morning and this afternoon one of the finest of his speeches. It is not only my own but the sincere wish of the group in this corner of the House of Commons that the questions which have been put by the Leader of the Opposition directly or indirectly will be answered directly by the Minister of National Defence at a later time in the course of discussion before the committee.

Mr. Chairman, may I also make it clear at the outset that any remarks which I have to make upon these estimates are not directed personally at the Minister of National Defence, because I know him as a personal friend in this House of Commons, as a personal friend outside the House of Commons, and we came to know each other very well in the last world war when he was a G.O.C. of western command and I had the honour and privilege of being the leader of the opposition in the province of British Columbia.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, this is an important debate and discussion. I did not have the opportunity of serving overseas, but in the past second world war as a member of the armed forces in the militia, as only a two-pip wonder and training officer, many hundreds of men passed through my hands. It was my responsibility in the Irish Fusiliers, Vancouver regiment, second battalion, to teach young Canadians how to kill and stop being killed. Unfortunately perhaps I was not too successful in the latter because many whom I came to know so well are no longer with us because they are buried heroes in Sicily and in Italy. But one who has had that experience, and there are others, in my humble estimation has a very grave responsibility as a member of parliament; that is, to put forward proposals, recommendations and criticisms which we hope will play a part in establishing a Canadian, foreign and defence policy that will make it as certain as one can make it in this world today that never again will Canadians be placed in the position of kill or be killed.

I commend the Minister of National Defence for taking the opportunity of making the presentation in approximately one hour of his analysis of the defence situation in Canada, the defence situation throughout the world, and his view of our own Canadian defence policy. He spoke, most understandably, from a written script. The Leader of the Opposition spoke very well extemporaneously and from a written script. It is most understandable on such important estimates and such an important discussion that there should be very full notes. So, Mr. Chairman, although it is a most unusual procedure for myself, I hope I may be granted the privilege of using extensive notes. May I say it is most unusual for me to have a written script, because I am not speaking for myself personally in the short 30 minutes I am allowed to try to present in as concise a form as possible the findings, which we came to in the last analysis only shortly before eleven o'clock this morning after weeks of study by a special subcommittee of our group, which findings were finally agreed to by all members. I, as the spokesman of this group this afternoon, would like to be absolutely certain that every word and every sentence is in its complete context.

Mr. Chairman, with that introduction I should like to say—I have no inferiority complex about it at all—that because of the major issue involved I rise with some little trepidation to speak on the very serious problem of Canadian defence. I am certain, Mr. Chairman, that the house will appreciate, and in particular those of us who sit in the opposition will appreciate, the very real difficulties which face us in attempting to evaluate all the complexities that are involved in the question of national defence. These difficulties, of course are aggravated as well by the lack of certain information with regard to the details of defence and also because of the lack of proper research facilities on the part of opposition members. Irrespective of that I feel we can fall back in part on an examination of what has transpired in the last few years.

When the Leader of the Opposition spoke I wondered if he had read my speech or if I had read his because I noticed that he also commenced his remarks this afternoon by saying that to understand our present position we had to examine the past. I want to go back over what has transpired in past years in order to present an insight to our present circumstances.

It will be recalled that when world war II ended Canada had at long last achieved the status of an independent though a small power. I am certain all hon. members will agree that there was no longer any doubt whatever that at that time we had at long last outgrown what might be referred to as our colonial childhood. Canada became a free nation, calling no one master, and bound to no other country by any ties stronger than those of sentiment. I am sure that this feeling of independence was pleasing to all Canadians if even though it was somewhat short-lived.

Scarcely had the war ended when the continuing communist drive for world domination became abundantly clear to all who wanted to see. By 1947 the United States was seeking the right to establish air bases throughout the Canadian north. Before very long three courses seemingly were open to us in Canada. The first was neutrality or some variant thereof. The second was an alliance with the United States. The third was an alliance with the U.S.S.R. The latter, of course, was admittedly and obviously rejected by all thinking Canadians as being morally abhorrent. Canada chose a closer alliance with our southern neighbour, perhaps principally for reasons other than defence requirements alone, and soon our defence policy evolved as if by preordination to one closely dependent upon that of the United States. Officers were exchanged between national defence headquarters in Ottawa and the Pentagon in Washington. Canadians were sent in increasing numbers on courses and attachments to United States establishments. The continued United States occupation of three bases in Newfoundland, obtained from England in its direst hour, was accepted by Canadians on Newfoundland's accession, as if permanent occupation of the nation's soil by foreign troops in time of peace was the most natural thing in the world.

This evolving dependence on our stronger neighbour under a Liberal administration has been speeded up considerably under the Conservatives. Today R.C.A.F. officers command the D.E.W. lines sites but it is a United States company which operates the D.E.W. line and, as we know, all information recorded is sent directly to the United States. The D.E.W. line remains essentially a defence installation of another nation on Canadian soil in time of peace. Our jurisdiction is limited to contributing in one way or another to its maintenance.

Shortly after announcing the cancellation of the Arrow CF-105 contract the Conservative government in March of this year stated our new air defence arrangements with the United States. We will operate and maintain the radar lines and air bases, while the U.S.A.F. will man the aircraft required for the air defence of the United States and Canada. As Le Devoir put it, the United States will fly the planes and we will sweep the landing strips. This idea of defence sharing is merely an extension of the arrangements that existed at Fort Churchill which I visited along with others only a few years ago. There was a Canadian command there responsible for housekeeping arrangements only.

At this point I think it is well that I should stress that the United States has shown remarkable restraint with regard to the power vacuum to their north. That country has without a doubt achieved a major degree of military control over Canada which is not inconsistent, I suppose, with its vast control over our economy. We have not yet, however, and I hope we never will, surrender our political position or our political control. The net result has been for United States military demands to be based on what the United States government considers necessary for the defence of that country which, of course, for the United States is exactly as it should be, though I maintain that for Canada it may well mean our becoming a satellite of the United States. If this transpires I have no hesitation in saying that we will have no one to blame except ourselves.

We in Canada are now bound in many devious ways to both United States defence policy and United States foreign policy. It will become increasingly difficult for Canada to act in her own best interests on fundamental issues independent of the policies of the United States. Quite honestly, how could we be independent, because under NORAD, for all practical purposes at least, the R.C.A.F. in Canada is part of the U.S.A.F. This is important. If the United States is engaged in a war, Canada will be in it right from the start. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, we will probably be the battleground, if you can say there is a battleground in modern understanding and terminology. I say without hesitation it will be most difficult to remain unimplicated in any minor peripheral war in which the United States may become involved as a great power.

There are those who may ask—and it would sound as a logical question—is that bad? There are those who would say that surely nothing should be done to weaken the western alliance. There are those who would say that we should be tied very definitely and irrevocably with the United States. But, Mr. Chairman, I would say the answer to that would be, yes if the United States policies are absolutely correct at all times. But any one who is honest knows that the United States policies are not always perfect. There are many of us who have felt very often that they are illogical and indeed upon occasions I have no hesitation in saying that the United States policies have sometimes been dangerous.

Our interests in Canada, Mr. Chairman, are not, nor should they be, identical with those of the United States. Our desire to trade with China against United States objection is merely a small example of what I have in mind. But even if our own Canadian objectives, if our own Canadian interests were identical with those of the United States, we strongly feel that it would be wrong for us to accept such complete United States domination of and responsibility for our foreign and our defence policies.

In passing, may I point out that we do not elect the president and the congress of the United States; we do not have the slightest say in the development of their policies and we certainly have no say in the appointment of the United States secretary of state. For us in Canada to accept United States policy without question and without participating in their foreign relations is as wrong, as far as this group is concerned, as it would have been for the 13 original American colonies to have continued to accept British responsibility for their fate without adequate representation. That spirit of responsibility which reflected itself in a demand for representation which led to the Boston tea party had, according to history, very much to recommend it. I most certainly agree with that kind of spirit and the kind of spirit which I hope, and we all hope in this group, is going to be expressed here in the course of this debate, that is to debate openly and perhaps if necessary with some passion, those matters of the most urgent public importance which have a bearing on the life of every citizen of our country.

We in this group insist that if we wish to retain our status as a sovereign nation, then we must develop and give effect to foreign and defence policies of our own. That, I think, was almost the keynote of the remarks of the Leader of the Opposition. We would like to emphasize it. If we wish to maintain our status as a sovereign nation then we must develop and give effect to foreign and defence policies of our own. We must determine what our true interests are and act accordingly. If in the outcome the United States is forced to make one of those agonizing reappraisals this time with regard to Canada, then so be it. If our Canadian foreign and defence policies are sound, we will be able to ride out any storm and in the end we will have established a new relationship with our southern neighbour, a relationship based on honour and on mutual respect.

We in this group have no hesitation whatsoever in saying that our military policy is designed, or it should be designed, to dispose of our military forces in a manner most likely to carry out the basic aims of our foreign policy. It should not be necessary for me to say that in no way whatsoever should the precepts of defence policy provide the basis of foreign policy. Defence —and this is something, sir, if we cannot get anything else over, we would like to get over—must be the logical extension of our own country's foreign policy, and the basic aim of this country's foreign policy at this point in our history at least must be the national survival in the broadest sense of that term.

The most obvious threat, from all we have heard and all we read, comes from the Soviet union, directly in a military sense, but as time goes on it will be more and more an economic offence which will affect many of the free nations of the world. Another threat coming from the Soviet union takes the form of political action outside its own borders, the threat of communism itself, a way of life, which could affect many countries of the world, and particularly some of the less fortunate peoples living in undeveloped countries. This action, economically, politically and militarily, could directly or indirectly affect our own existence in our own beloved country of Canada.

Added to these threats is the one which probably causes us the most concern at the present time and it arises out of sheer brute strength of the two strongest nations on earth, pitted like two giant gladiators, ready to do battle at the slightest provocation and only inhibited by the knowledge that each is capable of instantaneously destroying the other. To ensure our survival as a free nation, it is essential that our foreign policy, therefore, our defence policy, take account of all the factors that have a bearing on the nature and extent of the threats to which we as a nation may be subjected. It is to be deplored that Canada which might have exerted a positive influence for good in the world has allowed its leadership in the cause of peace, particularly as affecting those nations which could have together formed a wedge between the two strong antagonists, to become subordinated to the demands of short range defence policies.

Many hundreds of millions of dollars have been spent by Canada to build and staff air defence warning lines. Also the United States government has been allowed to build the distant early warning line and to share in the cost of the mid-Canada line, as well as to build and man many air defence installations in Canada. Mr. Chairman, despite what our treaties and agreements with the United States may say, it is inevitable in our nation that all such arrangements in times of peace will in one way or another have the effect of compromising our national policies, compromising our sovereignty, and thus have the effect of binding us to many of the major foreign and military policies of the United States whether we agree with them or not.

In exchange, we have simply the certitude that in any war fought directly between the U.S.S.R. and the U.S.A., Canada will become a radioactive graveyard. Six thermonuclear bombs or missiles would utterly destroy the Canadian nation. Yet our air force and air defence warning lines and the whole paraphernalia of NORAD, for which we have sacrificed our independent status, will not keep out ICBM's—I hope the lights have not gone out because of an ICBM.

Mr. Benidickson: Nobody is running for cover.

Mr. Winch: I am not running for cover and neither are you. I want to say that no matter what happens—you see, I give light—

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You brought the darkness too.

Mr. Winch: That is because you did not wait until the end of the sentence. Nor will all we have keep out a submarine fired missile nor has any competent military man ever attempted to say for a moment that they could even keep out every attacking bomber.

From all we have heard from the Minister of National Defence today, from all we have heard from the Leader of the Opposition and from all we have read we know that if even one thermonuclear weapon did land on a Canadian city there would be a catastrophe on a scale almost impossible to imagine. It therefore follows that our defence warning lines and NORAD would only make sense if they could guarantee that no thermonuclear weapon could get through. This they most definitely cannot do, neither now nor when they were conceived or at any time in the future.

Our close alliance with the United States is not and never was a question of facing the realities of a world containing two giant and hostile powers. The only defence, as we see it, against thermonuclear attack is to have the ability to retaliate in kind and that, of course, means a balance of terror. Our air defence warning lines and NORAD, irrespective of all that has been said or all the wishful thinking that goes on, do not prevent the possibility of a thermonuclear attack on the American continent. Only the United States strategic air command does that. Neither the U.S.S.R. nor the U.S.A. dares attack the other since neither can be sure of destroying the other's thermonuclear capability. If the Minister of National Defence made anything clear in the 39 pages of his text he made it clear that neither the U.S.S.R. nor the U.S.A. dares attack since neither one can be sure of destroying the other's thermonuclear capabilities.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Winch: May I ask permission to continue?

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee give unanimous consent to the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Winch: I appreciate the courtesy of the committee. The Liberals and the Conservatives between them, Mr. Chairman, have spent—I say "spent" but I actually mean "wasted"—close to half a billion dollars on the Arrow, an aircraft which was never necessary. All that the defence of Canada aircraft—I wish to start that again because I should like to make it clear.

Mr. Hellyer: It was clear enough the first time.

Mr. Winch: All that defence of Canada aircraft have to do is to identify hostile aircraft as such. Neither fighter aircraft nor missiles such as the Bomarc or Nike-Hercules can ever hope to shoot down every atomic bomber, and in the thermonuclear age nothing else makes sense. The CF-105 could have been and the CF-100 is and will remain, I am told by military authorities, quite good enough to identify any Russian bomber flying over Canada toward the United States. So long as we retain this capability the U.S.S.R. would not dare to attack the United States across Canada since the U.S.S.R. must destroy all the United States strategic air command or accept the same thermonuclear annihilation that she would like to visit upon the United States.

Mr. Benidickson: That is the deterrent; that is the reason for deterrent expenditure.

Mr. Winch: As long as we can prevent undetected hostile flights over Canadian territory we have satisfied all the requirements of good neighbourliness that the mighty power to the south can reasonably demand. In Canada, Mr. Chairman, we require neither the Bomarc nor nuclear warheads. Neither can we afford the price of these weapons and in addition the cost of a proper defence in keeping with our needs.

It is for these reasons, that we call upon the government to make clear immediately to our friends that we have no need for and will not tolerate the placing of nuclear weapons on Canadian soil. By this firm stand we sincerely and honestly believe, after much study, that Canada can make a decisive contribution to easing, and indeed perhaps reversing, the dangerous trend to worldwide disposition of nuclear weapons.

We in this group were opposed to the setting up of NORAD and we still feel that more would have been gained and less lost if we had extended NATO in such a way as to have provided for whatever additions to air defence that may have been necessary for the defence of North America so as to have applied generally to all NATO countries. We feel also that Canada should exercise far greater control over the distant early warning line, and at the same time we must re-evaluate the whole basis upon which the United States maintains air bases on Canadian soil to the end that we can give back to our foreign policy the flexibility which Canadian security demands.

I have no hesitation, nor has this group, in saying: Let us remain a member of NATO, for any further soviet advance in Europe must be to our disadvantage. But we must insist upon a reappraisal of NATO's basic military policy. NATO cannot hope to defend Europe against a massive atomic attack. That power rests with the retaliatory might of the United States. But we can, with a better balanced and more highly mobile defence force in Europe, defend the area against any soviet non-nuclear attack. This must remain NATO's task. We feel it can be done effectively if the purpose is now made effectively clear. There must of course, also be a willingness to limit NATO's sphere of operations in Europe, provided that a similar concession is forthcoming from Russia at the same time.

We very strongly believe that the western powers should be prepared to consider the negotiation of a neutral belt in central Europe which, on our part, would mean the withdrawal of troops from Germany and, for the soviet, the withdrawal from East Germany and the bordering soviet satellites. I feel very strongly that this combination of policy would enable NATO to defend western Europe in the only situation under which it can offer a defence, namely against a non-nuclear attack. It would prove a desire on our part or it would give an indication on our part of our willingness to negotiate a settlement of the arms race in at least one of the critical areas of the world.

In view of the dangers to which Canada could reasonably be expected to be exposed, and at the same time be realistic in our views as to what Canada could reasonably be expected to do in various circumstances, it seems to us that Canada's main role in the defence of the free world should be in the creation, control and training of an extremely mobile force which could be deployed in any part of the world to fight in any sudden outbreak which held the danger of developing into a full-scale war. We feel that these Canadian forces, along the lines we are suggesting, should be placed at the disposal of the United Nations, when and if required. You may call it a police force, if you like. It was called a police force not so long ago by the Leader of the Opposition.

When we discuss this statement we should like to hear from the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence as to what has happened to all their high-sounding phrases about a United Nations police force. Where was there in the white paper, and where has there been in the excellent speech made by the Minister of National Defence this morning any statement that the reorganization, re-equipping of the Canadian forces would be of the nature for the establishment of such a force? I believe that this would be Canada's finest contribution, a world police force available to, and under the direction of the United Nations. We feel most strongly that in this way Canada's defence efforts would complement those of the United States and, at the same time, leave us free to exert a positive influence throughout the world.

In this regard we feel we should be made as fully informed as possible by our military chiefs regarding the whole problem of war in the future. Certainly, it has not yet been made clear how our disunified and heavily mechanized forces will operate in conditions of nuclear warfare when it can be expected that headquarters communications and supply lines will be disrupted or destroyed. Many very sound arguments have been presented for complete unification of the armed services in the light of modern conditions. I have no hesitation in saying that until authoritative and logical arguments are presented, and they have not yet been presented by the Minister of National Defence, by his chiefs of staff or by the Prime Minister, against unification, then we can only assume that hidebound tradition and vested interests are holding back desired developments in this most necessary field.

Another matter which must cause concern to us, and it was mentioned by the Minister of National Defence, is the present civil defence role of the militia which, quite bluntly, does not seem to make any sense at all. In 1939 no one expected the militia, which was stronger then than it is today, to be ready for war in less than six months. Now, however, in 1959 we expect an inadequately trained militia to be ready literally at a moment's notice to form mobile support columns—I think I am using the term used by the minister this morning—to aid our cities devastated by thermonuclear weapons. Let us be quite clear about this: A thermonuclear war is not at all the most likely form of future war. To prepare only for such a war, that is a thermonuclear war, which certainly appears to be the case, gives us the impossible alternative of defeat in the event of a non-nuclear war being waged. Our regular forces, and more particularly the militia, should be completely trained and equipped for such an eventuality, not only of the possibility of a thermonuclear war which military authorities do not think will take place because of the power of the U.S.S.R. and the power of the U.S.A., but they should be trained for the greater possibility of a non-nuclear war. Having said that, I should hasten to add that even a non-nuclear war waged along modern lines would be most devastating and could see the release of such horrible weapons as are indicated by the phrases "germ warfare" and "chemical warfare".

As I say, we in this group as well as the members of the official opposition, with our limited resources, with what research is available to us, with all the advice in military articles, pamphlets and books, with the help of those now in the armed services and those who have retired who have the fortitude to speak to those who are not in government, have done our best to analyse the situation and put forward the problem, and to suggest what our defence policy should be. On behalf of the C.C.F., therefore, I shall try to condense the items just a little and say that we would recommend our defence policy should very definitely include the following:

1. In Canada there shall be no attempt to either manufacture atomic or other nuclear weapons; to use them or, for that matter, to store them on Canadian soil.

2. That Canada in its policy should devote its major efforts toward the creation of an effective, mobile and integrated force—that means army, navy and air force—capable of either performing in Canada in her own defence or abroad under the direction of the United Nations.

3. That Canada should proceed as quickly as possible to extricate herself from dependence upon foreign defence measures having the effect of making our foreign and defence policies less flexible than they should be.

4. That because of the interest of Canadians in peace; because of the interest of Canadians in defence in the event of aggression; because of the heavy load the taxpayers of our country have to bear in passing the estimates of the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production; and because it should be known to the peoples' representatives how and why the money is being spent, there should be established a permanent defence expenditures committee representative of both houses of parliament of this country.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion may I try to sum up the thinking and the belief of the C.C.F. group in this house, although we represent a minority and what we believe is the feeling of the majority. I am certain that the members of this house will accept the statement—or at least I hope they will do so—that people generally—and by that I mean people throughout the world in general and the people of Canada in particular—want to think in terms of life and of how to improve it and do not want to be obsessed with the fears of a devastating third world war; not to be fed a daily dose of cold war manoeuvrings and taxed to supply even more deadly weapons of aggression or of reprisal. We in this corner of the house have a trust in the people of this country and have a trust in the potential influence of this country, if properly expressed, to say that surely right now they can give a lead to the world in vigorously promoting a required common denominator, namely a demand from this House of Commons, speaking on behalf of the Canadian people, for a permanent ending to nuclear tests, the banning of weapons of mass destruction, and intensified efforts for the promotion of world disarmament.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member who has just taken his seat a question. I refer to what I would regard as the third last portion of his interesting speech. He indicated that he had reluctance to approve, as the Leader of the Opposition had indicated, the extent of integration that might have developed under NORAD. But I took it that he felt that in the matter of co-operation of detection devices he had some approval but that he had no approval for co-operation between this country and the United States with respect to aircraft development for defence purposes. I ask him this question. In the knowledge that detection devices were a joint enterprise, would he say that once the information was obtained in a practical way through the detection devices, it should not be passed on to another country?

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I should say that there is nothing in what I said in a prepared text from which that implication can be taken. That is why I asked the privilege of speaking from a prepared text.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, at the end of world war II there was again amongst people of many nations the feeling that we had won for the world a period of peace and prosperity, of good will and international comradeship. Our dreams were soon shattered with the realization that in the world there were people who did not share our views and peaceful aspirations, people who sought and still seek to impose their ideas on the world at large by any means including military force, if it is expedient for them to do so.

The United Nations, which was launched amidst high hopes and eloquently rounded phrases, was not able to cope with the situation in the real world. Canadians have been and may continue to be proud of the fact that we were amongst the first to recognize that if we were to prevent the Soviet union from further military expansion, we must form a new alliance, a partnership of free nations dedicated to protecting each other from any act of aggression. I think it is a matter of particular pride to those of us in the official opposition that our present leader, along with our then leader, Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent, together were a team in the forefront of the shaping of the concept of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

NATO was born and with it a new concept of collective defence and mutual co-operation. What each of the signatory nations would be unable to do alone, they would be able to do as a group working in concert. From humble beginnings, NATO forces have grown in strength and have become a shield of containment against soviet imperialism. The retaliatory power of the United States strategic air command and the existence of the NATO shield have until the present time been of sufficient strength to deter soviet aggression in Europe. As my leader stated earlier today, there have been many new and far-reaching developments in the world, demanding a re-appraisal of all old concepts and a rethinking of future possibilities. It is toward these infinitely complex problems that we must turn our attention. Today we are being asked to vote $1,680,194,006 as the Canadian contribution toward the collective defence of the western world which, incidentally, is our only defence because it is impossible, as everyone well knows, for Canada to defend itself. This is a considerable amount of money, and we have the responsibility before granting it to Her Majesty to ensure in as far as is possible that the money is being well spent, and that it is in fact going to be translated into an effective contribution. In order to judge it is necessary, of course, to have the fullest possible information. This we have been denied by the government.

I think as an indication of the interest in this subject, we should note that after the speech we have just heard from the defence critic on behalf of the C.C.F. party there is no one from that party who is interested enough to remain in this house to listen as the debate continues. Therefore, I think we can put into better perspective some of the suggestions which they made.

The government has in fact no real defence policy and consequently has lost the confidence of parliament and the Canadian people in defence matters. To try to hide from this parliament and the Canadian people the state of its confusion and lack of policy the government has clamped down what I call a rigid insecurity blackout. The white paper on defence, the first one since the new government has taken office, tells us nothing.

I do not often quote retired General Macklin, but his comment on this subject is quite appropriate. He is reported in the Montreal Gazette of May 18 as having said:

> After you have read it—
>
> The white paper.
> —you will know less about the real state of our defences than the Russians know.

This is a widely held opinion and has been referred to by a number of editorial writers.

Mr. Benidickson: That was the purpose.

Mr. Hellyer: For the first time since world war II Canadian chiefs of staff are not allowed to discuss defence matters—not policy but just background information—with newspaper reporters. What is the government afraid of? Is it possible that the government's decisions do not have the backing of the chiefs of staff? The government also refused to allow General Earle Partridge, commander in chief of NORAD, to give a press conference to Canadian newsmen. Then General Lauris Norstad, the supreme commander of NORAD in Europe, was advised not to have a press conference for Canadian newsmen in Ottawa. Opposition requests that General Norstad remain to brief members of parliament on the actual military situation in Europe, a courtesy which was extended by General Gruenther, who gave members a most interesting and informative briefing off the record, were refused.

Mr. Benidickson: A briefing on two occasions.

Mr. Pearkes: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? I do not think he was here a year ago, but does he recall that General Norstad then did have the opportunity of speaking to all members?

Mr. Hellyer: I was not here then, as the minister well knows, but I was referring to his most recent visit.

Mr. Benidickson: I think my statement was incorrect. I recall the Gruenther visit and the Norstad visit, and that is what I meant when I said two occasions.

Mr. Hellyer: The present government made sure that General Norstad did not, at this time at least, have the opportunity to talk to members of parliament. The Minister of National Defence did not make military personnel available for briefing members of the Senate and Canadian House of Commons who represented Canada at the recent Canadian-United States parliamentary group meeting, even though the United States members of the delegation had the advantage of the fullest possible briefing and several were members of the congressional and senate appropriations committees on defence. It is true the minister himself and the deputy minister did make themselves available, for which members of the delegation were very grateful indeed; but of course the minister and the deputy minister only gave members of the delegation such information as would, they thought, not be embarrassing to the government here and certainly not sufficient to prepare us to deal with and talk intelligently to the members of the United States delegation.

Furthermore, the Minister of National Defence has consistently and repeatedly refused to give serious answers to the questions asked in the House of Commons. He has given the house and the Canadian people the impression that either he himself is not fully informed on defence matters, or that parliament and the Canadian people who are asked to foot the bill have no right to sufficient information to be able to judge the merits of the government's proposals.

This, Mr. Chairman, is an entirely different viewpoint from that held by members of the present government when they were on this side of the house. I should like, if I may, to quote from Hansard of June 21, 1956, page 5275, where the present Postmaster General is reported as follows:

> Second, in this matter of changing our attitude, Mr. Chairman, it would seem the necessity for the wartime attitude that everything connected with national defence, defence expenditure and all varieties of activity in that field should be cloaked in secrecy may have to be altered. I do not think it is quite reasonable to expect the people of this country to continue year after year to willingly vote any amount of money requested by the Department of National Defence unless that department is prepared in peacetime to go further than it has to date in co-operating with this house in laying before it the details of many aspects of its operations.
> It has been pointed out, and rightly so, that there are some things which should not be made public; but let me ask, Mr. Chairman, is there some marvellous capacity residing only with the armed services of this country which makes them the safe repositories of restricted information and renders a small committee of this house a doubtful repository for the same information?

The government may not want parliament and the Canadian people to know, but we have every right to know and it is a crying shame that we have to get all of our information from the proceedings of United States congressional and senate committees and other sources. It is possible, of course, that information supplied by the minister might not be any more accurate or up to date than what we receive from the United States committees; but if he would take this house into his confidence we would be able to judge for ourselves. I urge the minister during the course of this debate, when he will have lots of opportunity by way of answering questions, to raise for us and the people of Canada the insecurity blackout.

We were pleased to have the minister's assurance that Canada would continue to support NATO. As a member of the NATO collective alliance, as well as because of its geographic position and political role, Canada is committed, as set out in paragraph 2 of the white paper, in three major spheres. They are, as the minister told us earlier, first, the defence against an attack on the North American continent; second, the collective defence and deterrent forces of NATO in Europe and the north Atlantic; and, third, the United Nations, to assist that organization in attaining its peaceful aims.

First, the defence against an attack on the North American continent. Knowing that both the great powers in the world, the United States and the U.S.S.R., have stockpiles of atomic and thermonuclear weapons which they can deliver in various ways, including manned bombers and intercontinental ballistic missiles, we are living in an uneasy state of military stalemate.

Western strategy has been based on the concept that as long as we have the capability of retaliating against a Russian attack with a blow of sufficient magnitude as to knock out all of their major cities and industrial centres, that the consequence of any action on the part of the Russians would be so great as to deter them. While the deterrent force will not necessarily prevent limited wars in various trouble spots around the globe, it seems to be a requisite to the prevention of an all-out Russian offensive. There is, of course, no guarantee, and we in the western world have no alternative but to maintain our deterrent strength until a real and enforceable agreement for universal disarmament can be reached.

Canada's role in North American defence has been primarily to assist in the defence of the United States retaliatory power. We are committed to this strategy and geographically we are on the front line of North America. Even if we wished to divorce ourselves from such a policy we could not. While North American defence measures are primarily to protect the deterrent, they do at the same time in an incidental way provide some degree of protection to our civilian population. Put very simply, it is true to say that every bomber knocked down before it reaches the target areas means less destruction and less fallout in the more populated areas. Similarly, if an anti-missile missile is developed, every missile contacted and exploded at high altitudes would mean less destruction and less fallout at ground level.

No one has suggested that there is any such thing as a complete defence. The mighty Goliath with his great armour fell to the well directed stone from David's sling; but while it has always been true that defence is at best only a partial thing, it seems unreasonable to take the attitude that if we cannot save all of our people and all of our cities, there is no point in making any effort to save as large a proportion as possible, provided of course that the effort to this end is not interfering with other and more essential defence effort.

The United States has told us that at the present time the greatest threat to the North American continent is from Russian bombers. Each passing year will see it diminish relative to the increasing importance of intercontinental and other missiles. In protecting the United States retaliatory force, the military chiefs and government of the United States have decided that they will not only have to develop at the greatest possible speed a defence against missiles, but also maintain for the foreseeable future an effective resistance to manned bombers.

Their concept in this regard is called a defence in depth: First, the manned interceptors, in order to knock down as many attacking bombers as possible before they reach their targets or before they are able to launch their air-to-ground missiles, second, an area defence of ground-to-air Bomarc missiles; and finally a spot defence of Nike ground-to-air missiles. Apparently the Canadian government accepts this concept but having accepted it they have made no effort to implement it on a continental basis. We now have the incredible distortion whereby for Canada—now that our CF-100 squadrons are obsolete—the Bomarc is our first line of defence, with United States interceptor squadrons as secondary support. Canada is now faced with three alternatives:

1. To continue with its present policy in which case in the event of war most of the fighting, most of the destruction and a high percentage of the radioactive atomic fall-out would take place over the southern two or three hundred mile strip of Canada where most of our people live.

2. Allowing the United States air force to establish interceptor squadron bases on Canadian soil, or

3. Buying United States interceptors to re-equip R.C.A.F. squadrons.

I maintained at the time the Avro Arrow was cancelled, and still maintain, that it was cancelled without due consideration to the whole consequences of the action and in addition the provision of the Bomarc was, and still is, of questionable value in many ways. The minister has given us such a vague conglomeration of jumbled jargon about the Bomarc that it is difficult to reach conclusions. The minister has not told us that the Bomarc has been successfully tested against a supersonic target. He has said in reply to a question:

> If it had been planned that it would be tested against a supersonic target, that would have been done. If it has not been, the intention is not to have it tested as at this date.

The truth is that when it was first tested against a supersonic target it missed. More recently we learned from the newspapers that it managed to contact jet targets but we still have not been told whether the targets were supersonic or subsonic. This is a question which should be answered. In fact, there are a number of other questions the minister should answer about it. Has it yet learned to track a target at low altitudes or is it still, as was the Bomarc A, ineffective at low altitudes? Can it still be jammed by approaching bombers when it switches from ground control to homing control or has that deficiency, too, been overcome? Is the minister familiar with the British operation Sunbeam and, if so, could he give the committee the benefit of the information he has which was gained by the British during that operation? If the minister cannot answer these questions satisfactorily, he should not be asking us to vote funds for Bomarc installations.

In addition to the defence against manned bombers it is obvious that we are going to have to have a defence against missiles. The United States is spending huge sums in this direction. We hope they will be successful. It is quite right that we should not attempt to duplicate their activities in this field. If they are able to develop an adequate defence weapon, however, it may become desirable for us to consider its use from Canadian bases.

The other area of possible Russian attack is from the sea. If they, the Russians, now have, or if they can or do develop a capability of launching missiles from submarines, we will have to meet the threat. We should be giving serious consideration to this matter now. It is widely held that the only effective defensive against atomic submarines is by other atomic submarines. If so, we should consider how we can best procure what we require.

The second major commitment referred to in the white paper is our NATO commitment in Europe. This has been and, in my opinion remains a most important contribution to collective security. Whereas the Russians are not likely to risk an all-out offensive while we maintain a powerful deterrent, they would not hesitate to indulge in local and limited probing if they thought they could obtain limited objectives without detonating global catastrophe.

Canadian forces in Europe, while small, are effective and well trained. The psychological effect of having them there is invaluable for it helps to bind together the NATO alliance and sets an example to our partners. It is a clear warning to the Russians that we mean business. Any cutback in Canadian effort now could be the beginning of a chain reaction which might have serious and far-reaching consequences. By unswerving loyalty and devotion to principles we have long espoused such a possibility can be avoided.

We were very pleased to hear the minister's announcement that the air division will be re-equipped. The decision should have been made months ago but not later than last December when the minister was in Paris and when he had the opportunity to discuss these matters with the NATO commanders at SHAPE. However, better late than never. Not only are our airmen and army personnel there among the best trained and most effective, but they should have available to them the latest and most modern equipment we are able to provide.

The minister told us that he was going to re-equip eight of the air division squadrons which are presently equipped with the F-86 Sabre. He did not mention what he was going to do with the other four squadrons which are equipped at the present time with CF-100's—

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, I did.

Mr. Hellyer: —except that they should remain as they are at present, I quickly add. Is it possible that the NATO commander earlier had asked the Canadian government to re-equip the other four squadrons with CF-105 Avro Arrows, or if not with Avro Arrows with some such effective, high-altitude, all-weather interceptors?

Let us remember that strength created through NATO continues to be the guardian of peace. Let us remember that our soldiers, sailors and airmen remain the guarantors of our freedom. We have moved a great distance since the alliance was formed in 1949. Although there are military weaknesses and deficiencies, our strength stems from the fact that 15 countries have joined together in a common cause. Our objective should be to ensure that there are sufficient NATO forces in being to be capable of dealing with both nuclear and non-nuclear situations. They need not be massive but they must be strong enough to deal decisively with any attack short of the unmistakable deliberate all-out aggression. If we fail in this objective we face the alternative of accepting defeat on the narrow ground of the enemy's choice or risking a general holocaust.

The third sphere of Canadian participation is its contribution to the United Nations. As mentioned by the leader of the Liberal party in his address this morning and this afternoon, Canada should take the initiative in providing a brigade group as a nucleus for a United Nations permanent force to be made available to the United Nations on a request by decision of the general assembly. If we can learn anything from history, it is that situations have risen, and are likely to rise again, where such a force and such a force only would have the prestige and moral backing to prevent outbreak of hostilities in a troubled area. It is a suggestion which should be borne in mind and supported by the government and the people of Canada.

The question naturally arises, how is Canada with its limited resources going to be able to pay for the cost of participation in these three spheres? Anti-missile missiles, atomic submarines, manned interceptors, air portable brigade groups, these are all expensive. If one examines the figures more closely however, it is obvious that we could do all these things, phased over a period of years, with approximately the same annual expenditure as in the fiscal years between 1955 and 1958.

Canada has always been proud to do its share, even eager to do its share. Our defence expenditures, as a proportion of governmental expenditures, have been declining. Similarly, defence expenditures, as a proportion of the Canadian gross national product, have been getting smaller. There has been a suggestion that we are not able to do as much in the future as we have been doing in the past. This contention, of course, does not hold water if analysed. During the years of our heaviest defence expenditures Canadians enjoyed a high standard of living. We enjoyed relatively full employment and in most of those years the federal government had a budgetary surplus available for reducing Canada's debt. We have not really made any sacrifice.

The question has been asked, "What have we to show for all of the money that has been spent?" The answer is, of course, that in addition to those permanent installations which are still of value and to the defence and technical industry which has been built up, the most important, indeed the only important consideration is that our house is still standing. A person who has paid fire insurance premiums for years without the necessity of a claim does not expect a return of premiums. He rejoices in the fact that he has been spared a holocaust and is happy to have paid the small amount for the security and peace of mind provided.

Actually, when speaking about cost, one remembers that through the inefficient use of our manpower and other resources we have lost through unemployment in the last two years enough total production to have continued with the Avro Arrow program, balanced the national budget and have something left over to assist at home or abroad.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee to give unanimous consent to the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Phillips: Read a little faster, please.

Mr. Hellyer: I appreciate the indulgence of the committee, especially that of my hon. friend.

Mr. McGee: Speak instead of reading.

Mr. Hellyer: I will do that after supper. In the meantime, I invite my hon. friend to rise and participate in the debate. I think that someone on the government side in addition to the minister should show an interest in this important and far-reaching subject.

Mr. Nesbitt: The minister knew what he was talking about.

Mr. Hellyer: We should apply the positive utilization of our resources and not shrink from our responsibilities.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, we can well afford to do as much as we have in the past and without sacrifice. What remains to be done is to work out and insist upon a proper sharing of defence production and responsibility between the several members of the NATO alliance. The case has been well stated in an editorial which appeared in the Globe and Mail on Saturday, November 1, 1958, entitled "Sharing the Work". It states what we all know to be the fact. This country is well able to manufacture most of the new weapons; or at any rate, component parts thereof. All that is needed is United States permission. We must agree with our allies that we shall produce some piece or pieces of military hardware required by them, and produce it in quantity. We will then be in a position to exchange our production for the various other weapons required to equip our forces. In this way we will not only be able to hold our heads high, knowing that we are doing our full share, but we will be able to take comfort from the fact that such arrangement would permit the efficient utilization of productive capacity throughout the alliance—more defence for the same cost.

Defence is not a permanent solution to the world's problems. I cannot close without referring to the statements put forward in good faith by many of our church leaders in this country and by many editorial writers. They have taken the attitude that our contribution is not a significant one and that we should not continue to do as much in defence as we have in the past. Historically, Mr. Chairman, we learn the lesson that people living in a world where moral principles are not applied have to suffer the consequences. It is not too many years since the great depression, a time when we were burning food, when we were pouring milk down the drain, when we were killing little pigs to keep them from becoming a surplus on the market, and this when people were starving and others were going to bed at night hungry. We cannot continue to survive in a world where we do not accept our responsibility toward our fellowmen. We must apply moral principles in a world governed by moral law.

In the meantime, all I am suggesting is that, by our defence efforts in a collective alliance, we can buy time and continue the military stalemate, and with this time, if we take proper advantage of it, we can solve the problems of our own country and of the world in which we live. We can make our own system sufficiently attractive that it will command not only the confidence of our own people but will deserve emulation by others in the uncommitted parts of the world.

We have to learn to overcome the situation of chronic unemployment. We have to produce as much as we can and to make part of our surplus production available to less fortunate peoples in other parts of the world. If we do this, if we apply ourselves to the solution of problems which previously have not had the attention they deserve, then our money spent on defence will in fact have been well spent and the day will come more quickly when by universal agreement we can come together with persons all across the world and write a disarmament agreement which can be enforced and which will ultimately allow a lesser expenditure by people on both sides of the iron curtain. In the meantime, I feel that we must keep our defences strong because only under the shield of strength can our diplomats and we as people interested in solving world problems make the progress necessary to effect lasting world peace.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, the estimates now before the committee represent the largest and most important single item of government expenditure. The minister informed us this morning that they total $1,680 million and represent five per cent of our gross national product and 27.3 per cent of our tax dollar. It is obvious, therefore, that these expenditures are important. They are important not only on account of their magnitude but because they are related to our very survival. Survival implies attack and we must not let these huge expenditures, this great emphasis on military defence, blind us to the fact that there are other threats to our survival just as deadly and perhaps even more dangerous.

This morning my leader referred to political attack, economic attack, psychological warfare, and to those I think we can also add ideological attack because that too, although much confused with the others, is something quite different. Attack by the enemy's armed forces is probably the last resort because he relies mainly on his other forms of attack to attain ultimate victory. He will use his armed forces only if all other forms of attack fail, and perhaps this great effort in military defence may really turn out to be not only the most expensive but perhaps the least effective.

A national defence policy must, therefore, take into account these other threats, and military defence must be developed in conjunction with other measures to ensure economic and ideological defence as well. Military defence, must of necessity be developed within the framework of what we can afford without danger to our economic structure. That amount is a finite sum and so we are posed with the problem of dividing that sum between our NATO commitments and home defence.

The minister told us this morning that we are passing through a transitional stage. Technological progress is advancing at such a rapid rate that conventional weapons, manned aircraft, the bomber and so on, are gradually being phased out and pushbutton weapons such as missiles are gradually being phased in. Under these conditions our economy will not permit us to go into the fields of nuclear weapons, intercontinental ballistic missiles, anti-missile missiles or even ballistic missile early warning systems. For that reason we must depend upon collective security. We must depend for our protection upon the nuclear deterrent of our great neighbour, the United States. We must depend also on the integrated and balanced forces of our NATO allies.

I think, apart from the policy we have at the present time, that the question in people's minds today is, what should the policy be during the transitional stage which will perhaps be with us for the next two or three years during the missile gap? What will it be when the missile age has become completely established? What will be the effect of these different stages upon our defence industry and, above all, how can we get the best for the little we can afford?

I think hon. members will realize that never at any time has there been a total defence. Always the enemy has been able to get through and we must ask ourselves what other defence is worth while if we cannot have a total defence in a nuclear age. If some of the enemy are going to get through, and that enemy is going to deliver atomic warheads, what does it matter if we shoot down 85 or 90 per cent when the other 10 per cent that gets through, in all probability, will be sufficient to destroy us? I think we should be asking ourselves, is the money that we are spending today for ground defence going to be effective? Are we just going through the motions and trying to keep up appearances? If we face the question honestly, is it worth anything at all in terms of defence? I believe that is the fundamental question in the minds of many Canadians today. It is one that deserves an honest answer because there are many things that can be done if our main protection depends upon a nuclear deterrent.

There is a danger, I feel, in the development of a defence psychology, not only in Canada but also in NATO. We know that the best defence is attack. While we are not an aggressive nation, and while NATO is not an aggressive organization, yet there is no reason why we should not take the initiative in as many ways as possible while relying on the nuclear deterrent capacity of our allies.

Coming nearer to home, I think the question in our minds respecting our various armed services is, what will be their particular role? This morning the minister gave us a very clear-cut picture of the role of the navy. The navy's role is anti-submarine operation. We have developed in that field destroyers of which we can be justly proud. At the same time we must realize that technological advance will make these obsolete. Already we have heard that the best anti-submarine weapon is another atomic submarine. I suppose this raises the question, first of all, whether we can afford to develop or purchase nuclear powered submarines, and if so to what extent we should do that.

When we come to the role of the army and of the air force, the picture is not nearly so clear-cut as it is in the case of the navy. We are told that the army's chief role will be to carry out survival operations. I think the term "survival operations" in the minds of many people is associated with the operations of civil defence. I should like to support the suggestion made by my leader this morning that we should have an attack formation, a brigade group of highly mobile paratroopers, fully trained, and which could be moved from any point in Canada to another to deny our land to enemy forces. If we are going to be realistic about this, and if a war does break out, Canada, of course, will be the no man's land. Even the tremendous advance in technological progress has not made the foot soldier obsolete. Even when atomic weapons were used in the last war the infantryman had to come in and take over the subjugated territory.

I cannot envisage any situation, even in the future, where an attack is made in which the enemy forces will not have to be consolidated and in which they will not have to take physical possession of the territory. I think if we are realistic we will realize, too, that Canada is not the prime target. The main objective of the enemy, and there is only one enemy, is our neighbour to the south. In order to take possession of a country of that size the enemy will require some territory in which he can assemble his formations, consolidate his supply lines, and he will require to use that territory as a base of operations to take possession of the country which has been devastated by nuclear attack. Canada is a very suitable country for that with its sparsely scattered population and wide open spaces. Surely we need forces in being to prevent the enemy from getting a foothold in our territory. In my opinion, this is something outside a role which could be included in the term "survival operations". We need, I think, a hard-hitting mobile formation which will be equipped with the best weapons we can give them and which will be effective in preventing any enemy from getting a bridgehead on our soil.

The role of the air force, I think, is going to be very doubtful. I was glad to hear the minister announce this morning that in Europe the air force would be utilized in tactical support of ground troops. Under conditions which I have just mentioned, we would need something like that here in Canada as well. I mentioned earlier that there were other forms of attack, and of course we are well aware of the economic attack. It would be foolish for us to build up defence expenditures which would undermine our economy and cause it to collapse, because that is a prime objective of our potential enemy and one that he hopes to attain. He hopes that it will not be necessary to use armed might at all because by forcing us to spend more and more money on defence equipment and establishments he will eventually ruin our economy and we will fall an easy prey.

There is a psychological attack that is going on at the present time, and it is going to continue until this struggle, which is a global one, is finally resolved one way or the other. This other attack that I am referring to is designed to destroy our will to survive, our will to fight back. On several occasions when the defence estimates have been before the house I have referred to the need for ideological training, not only for the armed services but for all the people of Canada. This is something which is not very costly—it will cost us hardly anything—but it is something which is essential because without it all these other millions of dollars we are spending will have little effect. A few dollars spent or even a few hours put in on ideological training will have the effect of an insurance program to ensure that the moneys we spend on other phases of our defence will not be wasted.

The militia is to be the backbone of our civil defence structure, and the militia is a particularly fine starting place to develop ideological training. That involves not merely religious training. It is not merely a matter of morale. It has been interpreted in some ways that this ideological training is just something to keep up morale. It is much more than that. That is the one phase where we have not begun to match the soviet. They have an economic attack; they have military forces; they have economic forces. They have mobilized all of these. But in addition to these, they have psychological and ideological thrusts which we do not have at all. Until we begin to think in those terms and to take the initiative, we cannot ever hope to match their efforts and they are fully justified in thinking that if they can get us to believe in coexistence long enough so that their other attacks can bear fruit, the ultimate victory will be theirs.

I would ask the minister again to give this matter serious thought. What I have in mind is not just a padre's hour where a soldier or serviceman goes to the padre with some personal problem involving domestic affairs or even morals. It is an understanding and an evaluation of the principles and the values upon which our way of life and our institutions have been developed. It is even more than that. It is a commitment to live them out and that is where we fall short of meeting the communists. They live out their ideals and we do not. Until we match them in that respect most of the money and the effort that we put into other phases of our defence are not going to be fully effective.

Mr. Hellyer: Last September, Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister made an announcement which told Canada that the Avro Arrow interceptor plane would be continued until March 31 next, at which time the programs would be reviewed in the light of events—

Mr. Pallett: That statement is not accurate.

Mr. Hellyer: —existing at that time. Newspaper reports varied in their interpretation of this announcement. Many accepted the Prime Minister's statement as being a warning that the program would in effect be cancelled on March 31. Others took it at face value that the program was to continue and that a re-evaluation would in fact take place as indicated.

During that period of time the Minister of National Defence made repeated efforts to try to sell what appeared to be a remarkable aircraft to some of our NATO allies. In the debate which took place in this house earlier this year, he told us that even after the turn of the year efforts were made to sell to the British, and that it was only in January that the British finally indicated that they had no requirement for it. Similarly he advised the house that only in December did he get a final turn-down from Mr. McElroy, the secretary of defence of the United States. During this period there was unfolding a drama which was interesting to the Canadian people and, which affected directly our defence effort and the lives of thousands of Canadian taxpayers. Then in February, when the Prime Minister entered the house on a Friday morning, without any notice he announced to the house and the people of Canada that notwithstanding his statement that the program would continue until March 31 of this year, it was to be cancelled forthwith.

Mr. Pallett: Get your facts right.

Mr. Hellyer: You can check them later yourself. As I was saying, the announcement was made that the program was to be cancelled forthwith. Telegrams went forth that day from the Minister of Defence Production advising that production of the Avro Arrow aircraft, the Orenda engine and all its components should cease immediately.

In the debate which took place in the house there was, in the statements of the Minister of National Defence and of the Prime Minister, a curious mixture. First they would tell us that the plane had been overtaken by events; that it had been outpaced by the development of missiles, that it would no longer be required in the concept of North American defence. A moment later we would be told that the cost was too great, that it was an expensive aircraft and that because of the huge sums involved the government could not recommend proceeding with it. Never at any time was it clearly and categorically stated whether the decision was in fact strictly a military one or an economic one or a combination of the two.

However, we had a clear indication that manned interceptors would not be required and that they would in fact be replaced in the Canadian defence concept by the Bomarc missile and that we would place our reliance on that missile. Events which have taken place since then certainly lead us to wonder about the rightness of that decision. We have to go back and examine the decision in the light of events which have taken place since then.

At the time the Prime Minister entered the house we stated that we did not have the facts and information on which to judge. Information was not made available to us and we had to accept the word of the Prime Minister and of the Minister of National Defence that it was no longer required. We did, however, object very, very strenuously to the way in which the decision was announced, the fact that it was done brutally, with callousness, and that thousands of people were laid off work without any notice or consideration whatsoever. We complained bitterly to the government which had made a decision of this importance without having planned in advance any alternative. The announcement which was made today to re-equip the air division could have been made at the same time if the government had applied itself to the problems which it had to face, and if it had spent the time last fall giving effective consideration to serious problems instead of half the ministers spending their time circling the globe making friends and influencing people in other countries.

It is necessary for us to look at the evidence which has been made available to us since the announcement on that Friday morning in February. We have to call in witnesses. We do not have direct evidence from our own government. We have to call in witnesses to decide whether in fact the manned interceptor is still required in the concept which this government has no later than today told us it still subscribes to, a concept of protecting the deterrent presently in the hands of the strategic air command of the United States of America. If this government subscribes to the theory of protecting that deterrent, it has also told us it subscribes to the theory espoused by the United States of defence in depth, the North American defence in depth. If it does not subscribe to that theory it would have told us today.

Are manned interceptors required within the United States concept? Yes. Who are the witnesses we call in? Well, we have a wide variety of witnesses. The first witnesss we call is Air Commodore J. A. D. McCurdy. I would like to read a paragraph from the Globe and Mail of May 22, 1959, which is as follows:

> The man who 50 years ago inaugurated powered flight in Canada, Air Commodore J. A. D. McCurdy, today said the manned fighter aircraft will continue for some years to come to have a place in warfare.

Of course, the minister may reply that Air Commodore McCurdy has not been active in military affairs for a number of years and that this is just his expression of personal opinion. Then we have to call other witnesses, and the next witness is General Partridge, retiring commander of the North American Air Defence. He is reported as having said this, as recorded in the Toronto Telegram of May 5, 1959:

> We must not only maintain the defences against bomber attack which we have today but we must also improve those defences so we can counteract a supersonic attacking force.
> We must continue to have an interceptor force capable of intercepting anything which flies in our direction . . .
> Our present intelligence estimates are that . . . in a few years they (the U.S.S.R.) will have a supersonic rather than a subsonic bomber force.

A supersonic bomber force to be met at the first stage of the defence in depth by manned interceptors. By what manned interceptors? The obsolete CF-100?

What other witnesses do we have? We have as witness Air Marshal Slemon. Air Marshal Slemon—he was the only witness who was available to us at the time the decision was announced in this house—is reported as having said at Colorado Springs:

> For as long as we can foresee we must have an effective defence against attack in space—from manned bombers or other weapons travelling in the earth's atmosphere.
> For this purpose we must have both manned interceptor and ground-to-air missiles.
>
> In "fringe areas" of the defence system—and Canada was a fringe area—there was a need for long range interceptors to engage hostile invaders as far from populated areas as possible.

That is Air Marshal Slemon.

Another witness, General Curtis Lemay. This report appears in the Ottawa Citizen of April 22, 1959 where General Lemay is quoted as having said:

> Our ballistic missiles have not yet demonstrated the type of reliability or accuracy which is required to ensure the most effective use of the relatively small yield warheads which they carry.

Later he went on to say:

Even after missiles achieve the reliability and accuracy they now lack, Lemay said, there will always be a requirement for a mixture of manned and unmanned weapon systems.

Another witness we have is Mr. McElroy, the United States secretary of defence. Mr. McElroy told the defence appropriations committee of the United States congress that because the Russians are maintaining an inventory of manned bombers and because they are reported to be building a new supersonic manned bomber, manned interceptors will be required in North American defence for as many years as they can at present foresee, at least for the next five or ten years.

Then a witness from outside this continent, from the British ministry. This is a quotation from an article appearing in the Ottawa Journal of May 22, 1959:

Although missiles are gradually taking over as Britain's chief air weapon, the end of the manned fighter era is nowhere in sight. In fact, say defence ministry spokesmen in London—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock I was discussing the Avro Arrow and the reasons why it had been cancelled. I had brought forward the evidence of a number of experts who all declared that manned interceptors would be required for a number of years to come. The evidence is overwhelming that manned interceptors are in fact a continuing requirement for the protection of the North American deterrent. If that is so, this question immediately arises: Why was the Avro Arrow cancelled?

In response to the question as to whether or not it was a good aircraft, let me again call Air Marshal Slemon as witness. I quote again from the same press conference at Colorado Springs to which I already made reference:

Choosing his words carefully, and with NORAD commander-in-chief General Earle T. Partridge standing at his side, Slemon said that if the CF-105 is put into operation it will be the best interceptor available for air defence of the continent until the U.S. F-108 is in operation five or six years hence.

We have been told a number of times that Canada cannot afford to do everything, yet here is a case where the one thing we were doing was the best in its field. No one has ever told us that it was not the best manned interceptor available to the western world. And yet, when we were out front, when we were pre-eminent in a specific field, at a time when we had the best our government decided to cancel the thing which we had demonstrated we were able to do best.

No satisfactory explanation of the reason for the cancellation of the Arrow has ever been given. As I said, the statements made in the house by the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence were a mixture of military rationalization and a discussion of economic cost. The only conclusion to which we can come is that the Avro Arrow was scrapped because of the impossible financial position into which this government plunged the Canadian economy. The only other reason that has ever been adduced has been that there was some difference of opinion between members of the government or the Prime Minister and some members of the Avro company itself. We sincerely hope, now that heads have rolled, this reason will no longer be valid and that the Avro company will have an opportunity to produce an aircraft to re-equip the air division, and that the innocent victims who are at present not working in the Toronto area will have the opportunity to go back to work and to take their place as productive men and women in the Canadian economy.

What have been the Canadian losses as a result of this cancellation? They have been tremendous. We have seen the disintegration of a great industry which was built up over a decade. We have seen the disintegration of one of the best design teams in the western world. What has happened to it? Many of these scientists and engineers have gone back to the United Kingdom—

Mr. Speakman: Good.

Mr. Hellyer: One of the Conservative members says, "Good". Apparently he does not regret the loss to Canada of the training, experience, knowledge and skill of these people who have contributed so much to the industrial development of this country.

Mr. Speakman: They were interested only in the money they could make.

Mr. Hellyer: My Conservative friend states that they were interested only in the money they could earn.

Mr. Speakman: That is right.

Mr. Hellyer: They came to this country to establish themselves. They believed in this country and thought their talents could be utilized in the building up of this young, dynamic nation which they thought was going somewhere—

Mr. Speakman: It is.

Mr. Hellyer: —in terms of economic development and status among the nations of the world.

Mr. Speakman: It is the best country in the world.

Mr. Hellyer: They hoped to bring up their children in Canada to enjoy its great future. I do not see that they could reasonably be blamed for this. All of our forefathers from the great mother countries came here for precisely that reason. I do not think there is anything wrong with people coming to Canada to join us in the development of this large but yet young country.

We have been told that approximately 2,500 of these people have gone back to the United Kingdom. This represents a capital loss which can only be estimated in the hundreds of millions. We are also told that most of the Canadian born engineers, scientists and technicians who are not still employed at Avro have crossed the border into the United States. This is another great loss to our country. Something more than the Avro Arrow has been killed. The cancellation of it has killed the hopes and aspirations of countless thousands of people—

Mr. Ricard: Can you name one of them? Can you name one who has gone across the border?

Mr. Hellyer: If the hon. member wishes me to give him a list I can give him a list of hundreds.

Mr. Ricard: Let us have it now.

Mr. Hellyer: I shall be pleased to provide it.

Mr. Ricard: Let us have it now.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Hellyer: In addition, the cancellation of this project represented to many thousands of young Canadians the bursting of the bubble, the disintegration of their dreams and visions of a greater and growing Canada.

Mr. Ricard: You have not answered my question.

Mr. Hellyer: They have lost faith in the destiny of this country.

Mr. Ricard: You have not yet answered me.

Mr. Hellyer: I can mention one name for my hon. friend, that of Mr. Floyd—

Mr. Ricard: You said hundreds or thousands.

Mr. Hellyer: But you just asked for one name.

Mr. Ricard: I asked for all of them.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Trinity has the floor. If any hon. member wishes to ask a question, he should rise in his place and request permission of the hon. member who has the floor to do so.

Mr. Hellyer: As I have said, the losses to this country have been most substantial and the greatest of these have been in the fact that people have gone from Canada and people have lost faith in this country. As my leader said earlier today, immigration has been slowed down as a result. As a matter of fact we now need a minister of emigration because half as many people have gone back to the United Kingdom as have come here—

Mr. Speakman: Nonsense.

Mr. Grafftey: Stick to your text.

Mr. Hellyer: Someone says, "Nonsense". That is a plain, unadulterated fact.

Mr. Speakman: Canada will be the greatest country in the world.

Mr. Hellyer: It will be in three years when we have another change in government.

Mr. Ricard: You will not be here to see it.

Mr. Hellyer: After the cancellation was made and the dreams and hopes of thousands of people had been shattered, what happened? Following this, one would have thought the government would want to minimize its losses to the greatest possible extent.

Mr. Speakman: The government had no losses.

Mr. Hellyer: One would have thought the government would want to do everything possible to recover as much of the accumulated skills and knowledge from this project as could be recovered. Was that the case? Let us examine the facts.

At the time of the cancellation there were five aircraft airworthy, or almost airworthy, and a sixth which was to be the first aircraft equipped with Iroquois engines which could have been ready to fly within a matter of a few weeks. What has been the disposal of these aircraft? Were they offered to any of our allies to be made available for testing? This is something the minister should tell us. Did the Canadian government offer to give these planes to any of our NATO allies if they would use them for the accumulated benefit of the western alliance? Were any requests made that they should be made available? Did the Canadian government itself not consider the possibility of any use to which they could be put? What about the radar lines? Could they not have been used to test our radar defences? Could they not have been used in obtaining for us greater knowledge of supersonic flight, metal fatigue and much other scientific information which would have been of great value to us not only in the military field but, later on, in industrial fields as well?

An issue of Aviation Studies published by the S.B.A.C. in England, last fall said of the Arrow:

> Canada owes it to the free world to put into production the Arrow aircraft, the most advanced interceptor in the western world.

But it was not. The royal aeronautical establishment in Great Britain is the centre of design and development in the aircraft industry in Great Britain. It is similar to N.A.S.A. in the United States. We are told that shortly after the Arrow cancellation in February, when it became known that we had no use for the aircraft we had already built and successfully flown, the royal aeronautical establishment requested that these aircraft be made available to it for testing purposes. We would like the minister to tell us whether there was in fact a request that these planes be made available, and whether in fact the Canadian government offered to make them available to the royal aeronautical establishment.

Mr. Pearkes: Do you want the answer now?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, they were, and they refused to take them.

Mr. Hellyer: You offered to make them available to the royal aeronautical establishment at no cost?

Mr. Pearkes: I say they were offered to the royal aeronautical association and they declined to accept them.

Mr. Hellyer: What were the terms upon which they were offered?

Mr. Pearkes: You had better ask the Minister of Defence Production that because, as you know, they are turned over to him for disposal.

Mr. Hellyer: We will be pleased to ask him that when his estimates are before this house in a day or two. What was the ultimate disposal? You would think the Minister of National Defence would know. He is a member of the cabinet which would have to make the decision as to what would have been done with those things, and some of us can hardly believe that the ultimate disposal would have been decided upon if it had not been discussed by cabinet.

What happened? First of all, the production line was cut up with acetylene torches to make sure it could not possibly be revived. Then, after repeated requests of the opposition that No. 6 be completed and test flown to see what its capabilities were, and after being turned down repeatedly we were told that No. 6, too, was cut up with acetylene torches and that a stench like death descended upon the whole Avro aircraft plant. Then, there were the five which were airworthy. We made the suggestion that some useful purpose be found for those; that they be used here in Canada for testing; that they be made available to one of our allies. What happened? Were they? No. They have been cut up, or are in the process of being cut up with the same acetylene torches, and are being cut up for scrap.

This, indeed is a shameful and a sorry thing for a great Canadian project. What a lack of imagination on the part of our government! What a lack of responsibility! First, to kill a great project and then to see that none of the accumulated benefit which was available was salvaged from it. It is little wonder that many thousands of Canadians have, since the date that the Avro Arrow was cancelled, decided that the government acted in haste and without due consideration for the consequences.

Now, we have the sorry thought of the CF-105 being replaced by other interceptors in Canada, either being flown by Canadians or by Americans. We were told at the time of the cancellation that our allies would not buy the Avro Arrow. We suspect the minister went to Washington and said, "You would not like to buy our Avro Arrows, would you?" When we were down there talking to them they laughed at us and said, "Would you expect us to buy a plane which had not been put into squadron service? Would you expect us to make available to our allies in Europe through mutual aid a plane which the Canadian government did not have enough confidence in to go ahead and produce?" There was no answer, no reply which I could give to their inquiry. Just as with the CF-100—we eventually had a market made available to us because it was a successful aircraft and it was available—now we have every confidence that if we had gone ahead with the production of the Avro Arrow we would have been able to sell it to some of our allies.

Mr. Ricard: To whom?

Mr. Hellyer: To one of the NATO countries, in the same way as we made available the CF-100. The hon. member should read his ancient history and get up to date before he starts to make interjections in this house.

Mr. Ricard: Who?

Mr. Hellyer: When the Avro Arrow was cancelled Canada lost its leverage. Since then we have been the weak sister in the NORAD alliance with the United States. We have lost the leverage we had in dealing with them. I was told that if we had gone ahead with the production of the Avro Arrow there was a possibility, depending on what the Russians would have built by way of supersonic bombers, that had the United States been able to buy this aircraft off the shelf they might ultimately have ended up by recommending the discontinuance of the 108 project. I do not know whether this is so, but I doubt whether the minister or the government went into these things fully.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Who told the hon. gentleman that?

Mr. Hellyer: I am not going to tell the hon. member my source of information.

Mr. Ricard: The hon. member cannot prove it.

Mr. Hellyer: He does not tell me his. What is more, I have no faith in his. Some of mine are most reliable.

Mr. Chevrier: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hellyer: We lost our leverage; we became second-class citizens in NORAD when we cancelled this great project. Had we continued our leverage might have enabled us to swap either aircraft or engines with the British for atomic submarines; it might have permitted us to swap Iroquois engines with the French for mirage strike fighters; it might have permitted us to exchange Avro Arrows and/or their engines to the United States for missiles and ultimately anti-missile missiles which we may require; but in one fell swoop we lost our bargaining power, we lost what we had built up, namely the leverage to negotiate with our NATO allies and particularly with the United States.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I think history will record that this was one of the worst decisions ever made by a Canadian government. Economically, they say, we could not afford the cost. The sum of $750 million is the figure that we are told we would have had to pay out.

Mr. Ricard: Is that the opinion of your party?

Mr. Hellyer: In February of this year we had hundreds of thousands of people unemployed in this country. Under those conditions, if we had gone ahead with this project—

Mr. Ricard: Is that the opinion of your party?

[Mr. Ricard.]

Mr. Hellyer: Under those conditions—

Mr. Ricard: Answer or desist.

Mr. Hellyer: —if we had gone ahead with construction of the aircraft it would have generated in additional gross national product over the period of time in which it was in production at least twice that amount. If my hon. friend thinks he can contribute to the debate he should intervene with some sensible remarks after I am finished.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry, I must advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. McGee: Now that he has resumed his seat will the hon. member permit a question? Did the hon. member happen to read the report of the estimates committee of last summer, of which his leader was a leading member, in connection with the decision to cancel the Arrow?

Mr. Hellyer: Of course, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence because it deals with an explanation of policy which I know he will understand. I would be very appreciative if the Minister of National Defence would comment on this. In view of what he had to say this morning in his presentation about the fact that there will not be any defence against the intercontinental ballistic missile, for a number of years to come at any rate, and that there is still a danger and a possibility and the potentiality of an attack by manned bombers of a supersonic nature; in view of the fact he has announced that Canada, having no defence against the ICBM, is going to instal the Bomarc which, if proven, is only a defence against bombers; in view of the fact he has announced that we are going to buy fighter airplanes, to be made partly in Canada, for the re-equipment of our force in Europe; in view of the fact that everything he has said is based on a manned fighter project, then on what basis was the CF-105 cancelled, which was a manned fighter or interceptor? Would the minister be kind enough to tie all these statements together and make one sensible statement out of them?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, Mr. Chairman. A number of questions were raised during the debate this afternoon and perhaps I can answer them briefly. If further information is required I will be happy to give it when we have that information available and the officials are here with their books.

I must first of all express my appreciation to the Leader of the Opposition for the thoughtful and valuable contribution that he made to the discussion. He opened his remarks by referring to the threat and amplified remarks I had made previously regarding the threat. In substance his remarks and mine were similar. We both agreed that for the immediate future the manned bomber was the main threat. We both agreed that it was a diminishing threat and that as the years went by the intercontinental ballistic missile would become more and more the primary threat. He painted, and I must agree with him, a terrifying picture of what might happen if this country were ever attacked with nuclear weapons, either missiles launched from submarines or fired from bombers. Peace, as he said, or words to this effect, is being maintained at the present time by the mutual fear of destruction.

We recognize, and I stated this morning, that at the present time there is no defence against a missile once that missile has been launched. Therefore we must do everything possible to prevent these missiles being launched. Until some more satisfactory arrangement can be made, the aim of the west is to retain a strong force of retaliation so that any would-be aggressor will recognize the fact that if he started a war his fate would be sealed in that our forces of retaliation as they are at the present time are adequate to bring about the total destruction of any would-be aggressor. I believe they have enough sense that they are not going to rush headlong into aggression.

These powers of retaliation have to be effective and Canada recognizes, as the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, that one of our main contributions as far as the air defence of this continent is concerned is that of the security of the forces of retaliation. We are providing that security in two ways; first, by maintaining and improving the warning system which was started a number of years ago and year by year has been strengthened and developed, an adequate warning system against any bombers that the would-be enemy might have at the present time. As I explained this morning, these warning systems are being developed so that shortly they will be able to track and locate missiles which are flying high in the atmosphere, thus giving warning to the forces of retaliation so that they may move from their air bases.

In addition, we are maintaining forces which will be capable of destroying bombers that may be sent in conjunction with any missile attack which is launched. We are providing that by two systems of defence, first, interceptors and the second line, if you like to call it that, being an interlocking chain of Bomarc batteries stretching across the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The Leader of the Opposition suggested that the interceptors should be based as far north as it is possible for them to go so that they may engage hostile bombers in the unsettled part of northern Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: I hope not in Northern Ontario.

Mr. Pearkes: That we would like to do, but the present interceptors have to be controlled, if they are to be really effective, by radar ground environment. A few years ago that was pushed as far north as it was considered practical to do so. The Pinetree line was established. Steps are being taken this year, as I announced this morning, to push some of these major radar stations farther north.

There has been talk about the projected United States air force interceptor, the 108. That will be, if it is finally developed, a very expensive aircraft equipped with its own radar installation and it will be able to operate farther north and independent of the ground radar establishments.

At the present time we have an adequate defence if you take into consideration that portion of the continental defence which is being provided by Canada as well as that portion which is being provided by the United States. It is an adequate defence against the threat of today. That defence will be improved steadily year by year and I believe it will keep pace with the threat that can be expected from Russian bombers for several years to come.

I repeat that the Bomarc and the interceptor are no defence against the missile. We shall have to wait several years yet before there is an adequate defence against the missile once it has been launched. Therefore, we must place the emphasis on the powers of retaliation, principally represented by the bombers of the strategic air command of the United States air force, and it is imperative that we make those bombers of the SAC command as secure as is possible.

The Leader of the Opposition spoke about the fear that we might be developing a fortress America complex as opposed to an Atlantic or NATO complex. This morning I gave some figures regarding the functional division of the estimates for this year. If you will refer to the remarks I made this morning you will see that 21 per cent of the funds requested in those estimates are to be devoted specifically to NATO defence. whereas for the defence of the Canadian-United States region, including all the army field forces in Canada, 23.8 per cent. Now, those figures were arrived at before the decision was reached to re-equip the air division, and as the re-equipment of the air division will cost several hundreds of millions of dollars, you will see that there is not very much need to fear we are adopting a fortress America complex as opposed to supporting our NATO allies.

As I mentioned, the 23.8 per cent which is included for the defence of Canada and the United States regions, includes all the costs connected with the army field forces here in Canada. They consist of three brigade groups, as shown in the white paper; one stationed in eastern Canada, one in central Canada and one in western Canada. These troops are available for any purpose for which they may be required. They are trained to replace and rotate with the brigade group which is now in Europe. They are field forces and are trained as such. If there were a need for them to be sent on any mission to support the United Nations, they are available for that or any other purpose which may be required in connection with defence.

In so far as making these forces airborne is concerned, at present that is beyond the capabilities of our resources. We are strengthening our air transport command, as has been indicated clearly in the white paper. We are going ahead with 12 aircraft of the CC-106 type, some of which will be completed this year. There is a provision made in these estimates for an expenditure of $48 million, as shown in the white paper. There is also, as explained in the white paper, provision for $13 million for the medium transport, the 109, of which 10 are being built this year. In addition to that, although its major role will be that of search and rescue, the new Albatross aircraft also has considerable troop carrying capacity. We should be able to move one battalion, with its equipment, in the very near future.

When it comes to a question of moving a brigade group of approximately 5,000 or more men, with all their equipment, that would run into perhaps 200 aeroplanes and we have not got them at the present time. However, there is no indication that the United Nations are anxious to go ahead and establish a United Nations police force. As hon. members will recall, the Prime Minister himself several years ago, when he was on the other side of this chamber, advocated the formation of a United Nations police force. He has repeated that statement several times since. We are prepared to go ahead and make our contribution to a United Nations police force if and when the United Nations requests us to do so.

There has been a good deal of talk about the Bomarc. The United States is going ahead with Bomarc installations. As I have said, there will be a general interlocking of Bomarc stations along the Canadian-United States border. There has been talk about the discussions that have been going on in the United States before some of their senate and congressional committees regarding the relative values of the Bomarc and the Nike-Ajax and Nike-Hercules. I do not wish to comment on these discussions. The situation in the United States is different from that which exists here. We do not have the same policies of development carried out by one service or another. Our development policy follows different lines, and so we escape a certain degree of interservice rivalry which exists.

Never at any time did the administration in the United States consider the replacement of the Nike-Hercules or Nike-Ajax with the Bomarc or vice versa. Each system is complementary to the other. As I described this morning, the Bomarcs are for area defence, sometimes referred to as perimeter defence, whereas the Nike-Hercules is a defence for a point.

Questions were asked about NATO forces. Are our NATO forces balanced forces? This is the aim and idea of SHAPE, to try to have the forces which are in the air or on the ground in Europe as balanced NATO forces. This is one reason why General Norstad recommended to the Canadian government a change in the role of the Canadian air division, because the national air forces are beginning to play their part in Europe, thus relieving the Canadians of that particular air defence role. He suggested that it might soon be time to re-equip some of the squadrons—those which are now armed—with the F-86 and he would like to see Canada providing a strike-reconnaissance element.

Mr. Benidickson: On that point, Mr. Chairman, may I ask this question. Would the minister say that General Norstad first made his recommendation on his visit to Canada recently?

Mr. Pearkes: No. Those things were discussed in December but no firm decision was reached at that time.

The Leader of the Opposition asked for some comment with regard to the state of the provision of the forces by the different nations and whether they came up to their requirements. He knows perfectly well that the national requirements were set out in the secret paper which is referred to as MC-70. Canada is living up to her agreed commitments. One of the requirements of that paper was that in due course the Canadian air division should be re-armed. We are living up to that commitment. As I announced today, the decision has now been taken.

The hon. member for Trinity was suggesting that this decision could have been reached last December. It would have been a different decision from the one which was reached and announced today if a decision had been reached in December and Canada would not have obtained anything like the deal that she has obtained today. As I said in my remarks, it is sometimes better to be a little bit cautious and not to be in too much of a hurry when you are spending hundreds of millions of dollars of other peoples' money, in this case the taxpayers' money.

Questions were asked about tests which had been carried out with the Bomarc. Tests are being carried out all the time with the Bomarc and with other missiles but those tests are being carried out by an ally of ours, not by Canada. Canada is kept fully advised of the results of those tests but the information naturally is sent as classified information. Although there may be newspaper speculation as to the result of some of these tests, I do not feel that I can be called upon to break the confidence of an ally by stating publicly in this chamber the result of those tests. I have said—and I repeat—that to the best of my knowledge the scheduled development of the Bomarc B is proceeding up to date.

The hon. member for Vancouver East spoke about nuclear power and rather suggested that Canada should not employ nuclear weapons. Of course it is government policy that Canadian troops should be armed as efficiently and as effectively as are troops with which they are co-operating. I do not think the average Canadian would wish to see his country's troops sent into action inferiorly equipped.

On February 20 of this year, during the debate which took place at that time, the Prime Minister announced that as far as our troops in Europe were concerned and as far as our air force and troops in Canada were concerned, we were entering into a series of negotiations with the United States in order to arrange the details of the storing of and equipping our forces with nuclear weapons as and when they would be available and as and when we would have the weapons to launch them. By the time we get the Bomarc and by the time we get the Lacrosse over to the brigade and by the time we get the new aircraft for the air division, I am confident that these programs will be completed. Progress is being made with them and as soon as negotiations are completed an announcement will be made and it will be made in this house if the house is sitting at that time.

Remarks were made by the hon. member for Trinity in connection with another matter. I must point out that he was hardly fair when he stated that General Norstad was not allowed to speak or to have a press conference. General Norstad held two meetings of a public character, one in Montreal and one in Toronto. He was here in Ottawa for a very short time because he had to leave that same night and go to Oslo in Europe. He was rather crowded for time, but he gave up his time in order to consult with the government and give his advice which was invaluable to the government in reaching a decision with regard to this re-arming and re-equipping of the air division.

As for General Partridge, may I say this. General Partridge has been here several times and at no time have any orders been issued by me or by anybody else that he was not to see the press. If there were not opportunities to do so, that cannot be helped. However, I do not remember—and I may be corrected in this respect—that either General Partridge or the press asked for a press conference when he was here last.

No instructions have been issued to the chiefs of staff to say that they must not hold press conferences. There are definite orders —and the same orders have been in effect for years and years—as to how officers will conduct themselves and as to the type of information that they can give in press interviews. Generally it is necessary for them to get clearance from a superior officer or, in the case of chiefs of staff, they usually get clearance from me when they give press interviews or make statements to the press.

The Leader of the Opposition referred to the mix in offensive weapons. There is also a mix in defensive weapons. That is why there are various types of defensive weapons.

The Leader of the Opposition referred to a speech which I am reported to have made in Winnipeg a few weeks ago in which I said we had not yet decided on the Bomarc. What I did say was that if the United States stopped developing the Bomarc we would not proceed with the development on our own, which of course is a perfectly reasonable statement to make because we are not developing it and therefore could not go on developing it.

Mr. Chairman, I think that has cleared up most of the questions which have been asked to date.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the minister for having answered so many of the questions which have been addressed to him, if I can thank him on my own behalf. He has, however, in his reply to these questions raised some additional questions in my own mind. I should also point out that there are I think some detailed questions which were addressed to the minister which he has not dealt with; but I assume there are a great many of these questions of detail concerning the separate services which can be dealt with when we come to the items in the estimates. For instance, Mr. Chairman, we would want to ask a great many questions about the re-equipment of the air division, or part of the air division, in Europe, questions of detail, not so much questions of general policy, and perhaps this may not be the time to ask those questions. As a matter of fact, I think we would like a little time to ponder over the minister's announcement with regard to the re-equipment of this division before we would be in a good position to ask some of the questions we would like to ask.

The minister mentioned one point on which I should like to say a few words. He did not in answering this point deal with what I thought was a very fundamental question going right to the roots of the continental defence policy, namely the validity of this whole concept of Canadian participation in continental air defence as part of a joint United States-Canada effort. At the moment I am not arguing one way or the other whether the partnership, the alliance, or whatever you wish to call it, should devote such a high proportion of its resources to this kind of continental air defence or whether it would not be better to fall back on the deterrent and the protection of the deterrent as the basic concept of defence.

But let us assume that this concept will be carried out by the United States; that is, the spending of great sums of money on the interception of bombers and missiles which may be launched in an attack on this continent, not in the hope—because there is no hope—that they will all be prevented from reaching the continent and dropping their bombs, but in the hope that a high proportion of them presumably can be knocked out of the air as far north as possible. If we assume that this is going to continue to be a major aspect of North American defence—I suggest it is no longer a major aspect of the United Kingdom's defence—is it desirable, and I ask this as a question, that Canada should devote such a large share of its defence expenditure to participation in this North American effort which is, and in the nature of things must be, primarily under the control of the United States?

The minister aroused my curiosity this morning in one part of his statement to which he has not referred tonight, and which I mentioned in my own statement, when he said that in the effort to carry interception as far north as possible United States squadrons may soon be operating off Canadian bases.

Mr. Benidickson: Entirely.

Mr. Pearson: Not entirely.

Mr. Benidickson: No, I am wrong.

Mr. Pearson: There will be United States squadrons presumably operating off Canadian bases. So that means that a new stage in this combined continental defence has been reached where we do not have, as we have had up to the present, a Canadian sector of NORAD with Canadian squadrons operating in Canada and United States squadrons operating in the United States, because up to the present, I take it, there have been no United States interceptor squadrons operating in Canada under NORAD.

Mr. Pearkes: Oh yes. A United States squadron in Labrador is operating under the air defence command of Canada. There have been United States aircraft frequently coming and exercising from Canadian stations. The Canadian sector, as I have pointed out in the past, was only that comprising the area which would be covered by interceptors from the North Bay, St. Hubert and Bagotsville stations.

Mr. Pearson: I appreciate what the minister has said. There have been, of course, United States squadrons operating from leased bases in Labrador and Newfoundland, and there have been United States planes operating by agreement in exercises over Canada. But the minister has taken this development one stage further, and he visualizes the time when more modern United States interceptors than any we have now will be pushed further north to operate off Canadian bases as part of the North American continental air command.

Mr. Pearkes: That is provided for in the NORAD agreement whereby squadrons from either country may operate on the other side of the international boundary on a temporary basis.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I appreciate that too, Mr. Chairman. What I am trying to get at is this. If this development proceeds in the way I suggest it will proceed from what the minister has said, we will then have in this country nine, I think the figure is, squadrons of CF-100's taking their place in this continental air command, squadrons which will be equipped with airplanes which will be less modern in a year or two because they must be considered obsolete even now, for many purposes at least, and we will have Canadian squadrons equipped with these planes operating with United States squadrons in Canada as a part of NORAD. I ask the minister if the government has considered the desirability—I put this forward merely as a question—of withdrawing from that particular participation in that kind of continental defence, and of using our resources to give the R.C.A.F. other jobs, other tasks, other assignments which will be effective and perhaps will be more Canadian?

The minister stated a few moments ago that it was not possible—I think he said it was beyond our resources—at the present time to make one brigade group in this country air transportable, or mobile in that sense, because it would require 200 planes. I ask the minister whether the government has considered the desirability of diverting our air effort from the kind of continental air defence I have been talking about to an air effort which would make Canadian brigade groups completely air transportable with Canadian planes?

I would also like to ask the minister what will be the functions of the CF-100 squadrons which will remain as part of the air division in Europe, as part of NATO air forces, and which will presumably not take on the new role which is being assigned to the present F-86 squadrons? Perhaps the minister would like to deal with that now.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes. They will carry out, as I said this morning, the role they have been carrying out in the past. General Norstad still feels there is a requirement for this particular type of long distance reconnaissance interceptor and he would like to keep the CF-100's for that purpose for the time being.

Mr. Pearson: I take it then that the government is satisfied that the CF-100 is capable of doing this type of work, that there is no necessity for replacing it and that that will be a function of the air division separate from the function of the other squadron?

Mr. Pearkes: That is correct. I cannot agree with the statement made a moment ago by the Leader of the Opposition to the effect that the CF-100 is obsolete because it still has a very useful function to carry out.

Mr. Pearson: I agree that it may be serving a most useful function in certain respects. When I say that it is obsolete I call the minister's attention as justification for that remark to the comment that the Prime Minister made on February 23, which I quoted this morning, when he said that regardless of the advice of the chiefs of staff and their view on this aircraft—that is the CF-105—it would be to all intents and purposes obsolete by the time it became available for squadron service. If the Prime Minister was justified in referring to the CF-105 as obsolete before it would become available for squadron service, that is what I mean when I say that obviously the CF-100 in doing the work the CF-105 was meant to do could hardly be considered as other than obsolete at the present time. There may be other duties it could perform effectively, but as a high level interceptor alongside modern United States interceptors, surely the minister will agree that the CF-100 is obsolete for that particular use against modern supersonic bombers.

Mr. Pearkes: I think the Leader of the Opposition is confusing the threat of today and the threat that was anticipated by the time that the CF-105 would have been available. As I have said on many occasions and as I repeated this morning, we consider that the bomber threat is diminishing and the missile threat is increasing. At the present time the CF-100 is an effective aircraft against the type of bomber attack which we may anticipate at the present time and for the next year or two from now as coming against Canada.

Mr. Pearson: With great respect I do not think I am confusing the threat at all. I know perfectly well that the bomber threat will decrease or is likely to give way to the missile threat as the main threat. I know too that the bomber threat, while it may be reduced in the sense that development of bombers may not be proceeding in the Soviet union as it would have proceeded if the missile developments had not occurred, but I also know from the evidence I have read from the congressional committees, by air force people in the United States is that the quality of the Russian bomber fleet is continually being improved. If the minister was correct when he said a year ago that the CF-100 could successfully engage only the majority of the bombers that might be expected to attack this continent—if the CF-100 could only do that a year ago, not knock down but engage the majority of bombers—surely the CF-100, magnificent as it has been and useful as it may be now for certain purposes, is not the kind of airplane on which we on this continent or indeed Europe should be relying for high level interceptor work. No doubt that is why the two Bomarc squadrons are being introduced into our air defence.

The minister has corrected me in my reference to his remarks in Winnipeg. I gave him textually the press quotation and I am glad to have the correction because obviously if the United States decides not to go ahead with the development of the Bomarc it would be folly for Canada to do that on its own. That is self-evident. The very fact that the minister has to make that kind of statement, that if the United States decides not to go ahead with the Bomarc we will not be able to go ahead on our own, must give one cause to hesitate about the final effectiveness and acceptability of this weapon.

I gave some information about Bomarc tests this morning. The minister said tonight that these tests are classified and he could not confirm or deny what I said about these tests which caused some anxiety about the effectiveness of the weapon. As I understand it the tests have not been very successful. I must say, however, that the information I got was from the reports of the congressional committee. They are public documents. I had no other information. Everything I said was taken from congressional committee reports which have been made available to members of congress and to the general public. There is certainly nothing classified about that kind of information.

A few moments ago the minister dealt with the very important question of the equipping of Canadian forces with nuclear weapons, something about which I asked him some questions earlier in the day. I repeat what General Norstad had to say about this, "Our defence plans are based on the nuclear weapons." The minister commenting on that and on what I said stated that he was sure that the Canadian people would not wish their troops to be sent into action with inferior weapons. I have no doubt that he is quite right in that but I suggest to him that the Canadian people also would not wish their troops to be sent into action with weapons under the control of another government.

The minister has said—and I want to be fair to him on this matter—that negotiations are now under way. As I took down what he said, the purpose of these negotiations with the United States is to make arrangements for the storing and equipping of nuclear weapons for Canadian forces. The minister at page 7 of his annual report had something to say about this:

> While ownership and custody of nuclear weapons required for Canadian defence forces will remain with the United States, their use from Canadian territory or in Canadian air space will depend on conditions previously agreed to by the Canadian government.

Ownership and custody will remain with the United States. Has there been a change since that report was written or is it a fact that the negotiations which are now under way are merely for the storing and equipping of nuclear weapons for Canadian forces and will not affect in any way the control over those weapons by the United States?

Mr. Pearkes: If the hon. gentleman wishes me to answer that point now, I would say that since these negotiations have not been completed it is impossible to give the details to the committee. The practice which has been followed in such other countries as now have nuclear weapons stored by the United States within their boundaries is that the United States retains custody of those weapons until they are released for operation to the country itself. The country then has a veto; the country need not use them. They are avaliable and once they have been, as it were, handed over to the occupying country or the user country, then they are employed under the direction of the government of that country.

Mr. Winch: Would the United States hand them over if the country would not agree to using them? Otherwise there would be no sense to it.

Mr. Pearson: I do not know of anything more important than this particular question. I think we should try to get it absolutely clear. I understand from the white paper that there is no question that the ownership and custody of nulcear weapons required for Canadian defence forces remains in the hands of the United States. The minister has now said that the agreement which it is hoped to negotiate will provide for those weapons which are available to be handed over to Canadian forces at a time and under circumstances agreeable to the Canadian government which may desire to use them at that time. I do not know whether that is an accurate description of the situation, but it seems to me to be a very confused situation indeed.

I ask the minister, if the decision is to use nuclear tactical weapons,—and I am not quarrelling with that decision at the moment—why should we not follow it to its logical conclusion and have the United States government, in the event that an agreement for this can be reached, turn those weapons over for storing, for use by and under the control of the Canadian military authorities. This will require an amendment to congressional legislation. I know, however, that that change has been made in the interests of one country, namely the United Kingdom, and I think there will be no other satisfactory way of dealing with this matter—if the decision is to use tactical atomic weapons—than to have those weapons brought under the complete control of the Canadian government if the Canadian government wishes to allocate them to Canadian forces.

I asked the minister this morning—and he referred to it this evening—some questions about the document, "Minimum Force Needs from 1958 to 1963". I know, of course, this is a top secret document and I naturally do not expect him to tell the committee the details of the implementation of this five-year program; but I had hoped that he would be able to tell us what are Canada's commitments under this five-year program which was agreed to, I believe, in December, 1957. I am more interested in finding that out now than I was an hour ago because the minister said a few moments ago that one of the Canadian commitments in this document was to re-equip the Canadian air division in Europe. I think that is what the minister said. I remind him that this particular program was agreed to in December, 1957. Are we to understand from what the minister has said that in 1957 a decision was taken by his government to re-equip part of the Canadian air division in Europe? If that decision was taken at that time, has it been made known to the Canadian public since that time, because I have no recollection of any such decision having been made public?

Mr. Benidickson: That is the question I raised.

Mr. Pearson: If it was made public and if it was a commitment formally undertaken by the Canadian government in December, 1957, why was it not possible to let the Canadian parliament and the Canadian people know about such an important commitment as the re-equipment of the Canadian air division? If, in fact, that decision was taken in December, 1957, why has it taken from December, 1957 until July, 1959, to implement it?

Mr. Pearkes: Because it was a five-year program. The hon. gentleman realizes that it was a five-year program. This was not all to be done at the time that the MC-70 was first drawn up.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, I realize that. I am commenting on what the minister has said. The decision to re-equip the Canadian air division was made as a commitment when this five-year program was drawn up in December, 1957. I ask the minister whether there are any other commitments in that document which we have not heard about yet? That, Mr. Chairman, I think for the moment exhausts the questions and no doubt exhausts the minister in listening to my questions.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, can the minister not give us any additional information with reference to the Bomarc at all? I think we all appreciate the fact that much of the information regarding it is classified. There has been so much expression of opinion about it in the press; there have been so many questions raised about its low-level capability, about its subject to jamming, about its other deficiencies, that I would like the minister to give us some assurance on these things individually even if he cannot give specific detailed information.

Mr. Pearkes: I think the best assurance I can give the hon. gentleman is that the United States are adopting this as their area defence weapon. As I have said before, they are going ahead with the construction of Bomarc stations across the northern part of the United States. Now unless their administration had confidence in it they would not be going ahead and doing that. From the information I have received, I have stated in the house previously I believe this is the best weapon for our Canadian defence as a ground to air missile.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder whether the minister would tell us if we are to have two squadrons, as was the original impression given this house, or whether it is true, as we later understood it to be, that we are to get two half squadrons?

Mr. Pearkes: There will be two Bomarc squadrons and they will be equipped with 30 missiles in the first instance. Then, when they have been completed, decision will be made according to the threat and according to the requirements as to whether that number should be increased.

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to pose another problem with respect to the Bomarc chain which has been raised by a number of people. Perhaps the minister can set our fears at rest in this regard. Is the Bomarc chain not something like a series of fixed gun emplacements in that they are not mobile, they are fixed, and consequently they are able to deal only with attacking bombers coming within their particular range?

The minister knows that the United States is proposing that its bombers carry, in addition to their other armament, ground-to-air missiles. They will carry live ground-to-air missiles and also drones as a replacement for what they used to call ducks. In the event of an attack on Canada from a formation of Russian bombers coming toward our populated areas and in the event that the Russians released from their attacking force air-to-ground drones at intervals of some several minutes apart, is it not a fact that the Bomarcs would have to be fired because we would not know whether they were drones or live and we could not afford to take a chance, and once 30 drones had been shot in the same direction at the same squadron area all of the Bomarcs would be exhausted, there would be nothing more and there would be a completely open corridor for the entire Russian bomber formation to fly through and beyond which they could deploy in the direction of their various targets?

Mr. Pearkes: In answer to the first question, of course the Bomarcs are fired from a fixed station. They are not mobile. The stations as designed will be interlocking so that the whole of the air space will be covered.

With regard to the second question, because there is possibility of that form of attack which the hon. gentleman was describing, it is one reason why interceptors are being retained in the armament for the defence of the North American continent.

Mr. Hellyer: And particularly the reason why interceptors should be used as far north of the Bomarc line as possible in order to intercept bombers as far away from our populated areas as can be achieved and also to get them before they release their ground-to-air guided missiles; is that correct?

Mr. Pearkes: We would like the interception to take place as far away from populated centres as is possible.

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to ask another question with reference to interceptors. The minister has told us that an agreement is being worked out with the United States whereby they will have the use of our bases. We will presume that there is an attack and there has been positive identification, which of course also presents a very difficult problem because it is sometimes difficult to determine what the identity of an aircraft is from the radar screens. But once there is positive identification is it not the plan that United States squadrons would not engage the enemy except from their own bases at the outset and that they would return for refueling to Canadian bases? Does that not present the problem which I raised earlier today, that in fact most of the fighting, most of the destruction and most of the fall-out would not take place until the attacking bomber force was within two or three hundred miles of the Canadian border and over our most populated areas? Would it not seem more logical, if Canada is going to make these bases available to United States interceptors, that the initial contact should be made at a more northerly point in order that the greater percentage of the destruction and fall-out will be over our sparsely populated areas?

Mr. Pearkes: The hon. member is describing a plan of attack. I do not know where he has obtained his information that United States interceptors must engage the bombers from United States bases first of all.

Mr. Pearson: On that point, I now have the reference which the minister made to this matter this morning, and could I ask him to explain exactly what he had in mind in his statement when he said:

> We are maintaining nine squadrons of CF-100 all-weather interceptors and are making arrangements so that United States interceptors can operate in Canadian air space, and consideration is being given to providing facilities so that United States aircraft may be able to operate from Canadian air fields.

In those remarks did he have in mind some arrangement going beyond the present NORAD agreement?

Mr. Pearkes: Not going beyond the present NORAD agreement but to make the present NORAD agreement workable so that United States interceptors could have facilities for refueling and other facilities that might be required at Canadian airports.

Mr. Hellyer: This afternoon I mentioned the British operation Sunbeam and asked if the minister could give us any information about it. Does he have anything he can tell the house?

Mr. Pearkes: No, Mr. Chairman, I have no information that I can give the house on that exercise.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister the site of the second Bomarc station?

Mr. Pearkes: It is going to be located in northern Quebec in the Mont Laurier area.

Mr. Chevrier: Without breaching any secrets, is the minister in a position to give any more detailed information as to the site? As the minister remembers, many months ago it was announced that it would be in the Mont Laurier area and now the same answer is being given to the question. It has been made quite clear where the Bomarc station is going to be in Ontario. I wondered whether the minister could not give a more definite answer to the question in so far as the Quebec location is concerned.

Mr. Pearkes: I have not announced before that it is going to be in the Mont Laurier area. I know that newspaper correspondents have done so. I think that should be sufficient. It is not a very wide area and until further development has taken place I should not think it is necessary to pinpoint every defensive installation we have.

Mr. Chevrier: I would not want the minister to do so if he does not think he should. If he simply said that he thought it should not be done I would be quite happy to accept that. But the point I make is that the Ontario location has been pinpointed.

Mr. Pearkes: I said today, in the North Bay area.

Mr. Pearson: The minister knows, of course, that the exact location of this Bomarc base has appeared in reports out of Washington, in newspapers, some congressional reports and in magazines.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I should like to bring a matter to the attention of the minister at this time which is rather different from the subject we have been discussing up till now. It concerns not only the Minister of National Defence but also the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The problem I want to bring to the minister's attention is the loss of family allowances by service people on overseas duty. Some time ago I put a question on the order paper which was answered on May 13. The answer as found on page 3638 of Hansard shows that a leading aircraftsman with five children loses $1,584 during his tour of duty and against that he receives by way of income tax saving only $16.

I think the people of Canada want the children of servicemen overseas to get the same benefits as those who remain in Canada, and this is quite a substantial loss in family income. The higher up we go the smaller is the gap. A wing commander with five children, for example, loses $1,584 but he saves $998 in income tax so that this regulation which prevents the payment of family allowances for the children of overseas troops falls hardest on the little man; the lower the rank the greater the loss in income. I should like the minister to bring this matter to the attention of his colleagues and have something done about it.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I would not like the minister to think that we are not interested in the observations he made about civil defence or that we do not desire to make some comments on that matter, but I take it that it will be discussed on the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare. I am in some doubt about this because there seem to be three ministers now responsible for civil defence, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of National Defence and the Prime Minister. I assume that the discussion of this important matter will take place on the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

Mr. Pearkes: Other than the actual role or part which the army will play.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, the committee would expect me to ask a question or two about economy and extravagance, particularly because the minister will recall our discussion in December, 1957 when he first came before the house with his estimates. At that time he was the only minister, I think, who claimed that after taking office he was able to report to the house that he had reduced expenses and had fulfilled the election promises of the government that waste and extravagance had been reversed by the new administration. As I recall it he had a certain figure which I am not going to quote at the moment, but the minister may know it better than I and that figure, as I recall very clearly, represented primarily a claimed reduction in waste and extravagance in the matter of travelling expenses. I wonder if the minister would just explain to us—I think I know the answer—but I want him to explain to the committee that this was the only item out of these millions and millions of dollars of national defence expenditures that he could put at the top of the mast as the place where he, being in charge of the department, had reversed things and found it possible to reduce expenses and first for travelling and removal expenses.

If one looks at the summary of standard objects of expenditure for this year for the minister's department and compares them with last year he will find that there is a very substantial increase in the expenses of the defence department for travel and removal. I can give the figures. Last year the amount of the estimates was $37.2 million and this year the requirement is $44.3 million. I know, if all the members of the public do not know, that the reason is there is a different pattern with respect to the rotation of troops going from this country over to Europe and homeward.

What I want to point out to the committee is that when the rotation was in favour of the minister he claimed this was something in favour of the new administration in achieving economy. But this year when we have this $7 million rise in expenditures he gives the true facts and the true facts are that under the pattern of rotation of troops a greater amount of money has to be spent for moving troops back and forth between this country and Europe than in another year. This is incidental, but it is typical of the type of information we were given in December, 1957. Then we raised questions as to what evidence of waste and extravagance the minister had found and corrected. Perhaps he would have some further information on that point to give us before this item is passed tonight.

I shall pass from that item now. I was concerned to hear the minister make his reference to security and confidence with respect to defence administration in general. I think when he made a reference of that kind he was replying to what had been said this afternoon when certain items were quoted from the United States congressional records of a committee inquiring extensively into defence activities down south. I got the impression from our newspapers that, some of us, have the feeling that some of the information that was given in public at these committee inquiries in the United States was as much a surprise to the officialdom of this country as it was to the general public here. I should like the minister to comment upon that.

Personally, I really feel that we have assumed the role of me-tooism so much lately with respect to the United States in recent times that that challenge and criticism may be very well founded. I should like the minister to assure this committee, not that anything that was said there was a surprise to him personally but was a new piece of information as compared to the information that might have been give to this country by the United States in an official capacity.

I was curious also this morning when the minister indicated the choice of the government, announced only today—again there were a lot of ifs and provisos—of the Lockheed plane, the F-104G. Again I emphasize the provisos and back doors that were left open by the minister, but he indicated that that plane was, I think, a similar plane to the one chosen previously by the West German government. Does the minister recall—I have not got the information here—when the West German government made that decision? In other words, our criticism is that this government has been very dilatory in making decisions of this kind. I recall, too, that one has to be very careful in criticizing the minister or the government in connection with matters of this kind. This morning the minister said that statements with respect to the obsolescence of equipment we have been buying hitherto have been very unhelpful to him and to the government, and to the cause of freedom and traitorous to our position vis-à-vis those we believe might be the potential enemy.

This, of course, is a serious statement and one that we must respect, as I do. On the other hand I must at all times recognize that it is one that can be used in a democratic parliament by one on the government side improperly to protect himself from criticism for delay with respect to taking decisions that might have been taken. I wonder if the minister would tell us about the negotiations with West Germany for our equipment manufactured in Canada, and was he aware at the time when the West German government had decided to take the advanced F-104? Would he give us some indication of the time lapse in between the decision of that government and the decision announced only this morning? With respect to this equipment, the minister indicated that as to the details, as to information respecting production, quantities and the time element on availability of this particular NATO aircraft, we would have to ask the Minister of Defence Production. Fortunately, we understand his estimates will follow very shortly upon those of the minister of defence, and perhaps we can get that information fairly soon.

However, I believe he recognizes that throughout the country there is a recognition that more than a year ago it was known that our F-86 squadrons would either have to rely on the early delivery of our Arrow aircraft for perhaps a different role than was assigned to them, or they would have to have assigned to them aircraft that the minister tells us now the government has decided to assign to them. Regardless of that, however, I say that there was a poor synchronization with respect to those decisions.

Rightly or wrongly I continue to think, as I have thought ever since last fall, that most of these decisions were delayed—and there has been a resulting continuous delay in decision—because so many senior members of the cabinet were not here in Canada at the time when these serious matters had to be decided upon. I do not blame the minister. He was attending to his responsibilities of course. But at a critical time with respect to decisions in the defence department there was an absence on the part of senior members of the cabinet whose decisions would be necessary in matters of this kind. Other governments—and I think particularly of the West German government—were able to reach a decision with respect to their role in NATO and this government has only now reached its decision.

Mr. Pearkes: I am speaking now entirely from memory, but I think the West German government reached a decision about three weeks ago; it was very recently that they did so. The fact that the West German government had accepted this particular aircraft or, shall I say, the fact that another NATO government had accepted this particular aircraft influenced the decision that Canada reached because of the obvious advantages of having similar aircraft used by various NATO countries. We have been talking about the standardization of equipment. This is a case where partial standarization is being accepted. We have come to the conclusion that this is the best aircraft for our purposes.

I am not quite certain whether I understood the hon. member correctly. If he indicated that there was any thought of the Arrow ever having been used by the air division I want to assure him—

Mr. Benidickson: In NATO.

Mr. Pearkes: —that was never contemplated; never to my knowledge.

Mr. Benidickson: Certainly many military commentators of great intelligence have thought that as this was a very advanced aircraft it might very well have a role to play in NATO complementary to the role it would play in North America.

Mr. Pearkes: The difficulty would have been that there was no ground environment in Europe—nor is there today ground environment—which could have made the operation of the CF-105 effective. As I say, it was never contemplated that it would be used there.

Mr. Benidickson: I only say that there was speculation and comment from people who have more knowledge of the possibilities in this area than I have in that respect.

Mr. Pearkes: Really, I do not know how much knowledge the hon. member has on the subject.

Mr. Benidickson: I would not say any more than the Leader of the Opposition said this afternoon, namely that I played only a very modest and obscure part in the air force and recent war effort.

However, I want also to interrogate the minister a little bit further on the matter of this MC-70 of December, 1957 because I think it is relevant to our examination of the expenditures before us and the decision that was announced this morning. I have a feeling that we are very much in the rumble seat now with respect to decisions that are made in the United States. Was it in December 1957 or was it in April recently when General Norstad came to see us, that it was obvious to this government that the role of the Canadian air force in Europe required a change from the F-86 to this new fighter aircraft with a ground role under which they would not only, as the minister said, find their target but destroy it?

Mr. Pearkes: When General Norstad was here he explained in detail the type of role that he would like to give as an assignment to the squadrons of the air division presently armed with the F-86. Prior to that time there had been discussion for some time as to two or three different types of role. General Norstad was here and he made a definite recommendation. It was impossible until he had come here for us to have decided which aircraft should be used, until the actual role had been defined. I think that is fairly obvious. The type of aircraft having then been decided upon, there are several different aircraft of that type. These all had to be evaluated, and a decision has just been reached recently that this aircraft was the one which would suit our requirements better than any of the others. I announced it almost immediately the decision had been made.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister indicated that it was still a most nebulous state of affairs, even before he came to this committee, in that he said there were provisos still unsettled as to price and the opportunity for manufacture in Canada.

Mr. Pearkes: I think when the estimates of the Minister of Defence Production come before the committee he will be able to give the hon. member much more detail about that matter. It is his department that does the purchasing. Naturally, until the final paper has been signed, I would have to put in some provisos.

Mr. Benidickson: We are advancing under the calendar rather far into 1959. Under the normal timetable I think by about September most departments put themselves in a position to indicate to treasury board what their requirements would be for the next fiscal year which I admit starts only on April 1 following. Having regard to the possibility, or the probability I think we can say, of going ahead with this decision announced by the Minister of National Defence that the NATO squadrons that now have the F-86 will be equipped with this new aircraft, surely it is possible of translating the cost into the national budget for defence of next year. Has the minister some indication of what it means in extra cost for next year that would not probably be reduced by some other expenditure that would not be required?

Mr. Pearkes: Of course, we are examining the next year's estimates now. We take into consideration not only next year but the estimates for the next five years. We are hoping that we shall be able to provide for the re-equipment of these squadrons within an estimate of about the same order of magnitude as the present one.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell us whether the F-104 which has been chosen to re-equip the air division has any other role than as a strike aircraft?

Mr. Pearkes: No, that is its main role.

Mr. Hellyer: That is its main role?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes; a strike and reconnaissance role.

Mr. Hellyer: Could it under any circumstances be used to re-equip any of the Canadian interceptor squadrons presently under NATO command if the government were to decide that was something it should propose to do?

Mr. Pearkes: Re-equip any of the other squadrons? That is to say, the four squadrons—

Mr. Hellyer: No, I am talking about the nine squadrons under NORAD, if its capability would be such as to make it a reasonable fighter-interceptor as well.

Mr. Pearkes: I do not think the F-104G could be developed into an interceptor. The requirements are so different. It is a question of high speed at low altitude for strike reconnaissance aircraft, whereas an interceptor wants high speed at a high altitude.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister contemplate any other possibility by which Canada might now, or within the foreseeable future, re-equip any of the nine squadrons stationed in Canada?

Mr. Pearkes: There is no provision made in these estimates for such a contingency.

Mr. Hellyer: There is no provision made in the estimates, but I know how the minister feels, that it is a requirement which should in due course be met, and I also know how he feels about the aircraft industry in Canada; not that it should be just fed contracts for work which is not necessary, but that it should be given essential work and phased in such a way as to keep it operating at the greatest possible efficiency.

May I refer to the minister's own remarks on page 5220 of Hansard for June 20, 1956 where he is reported as saying:

> Of course no warning line is of any value unless it can be backed up by interceptors, and while the white paper would indicate that there are some 21 squadrons available for the defence of Canada, the minister painted a more realistic picture of that force this afternoon when he pointed out that at the present time there are only nine regular squadrons which are equipped with a plane which is efficient for its role at the present time, namely the CF-100.

Then with respect to the aircraft industry in Canada we have a statement from the hon. member for Brandon-Souris where at page 5267 of Hansard for June 21, 1956, he is reported as saying:

> This leads me to make just a brief comment on the importance of the air industry to Canada. Canada is a natural country for the development of a strong air industry. We are a young nation and we are on the verge of tremendous development, particularly in the northern regions. In similar manner air power is just in its infancy. We are on the threshold of tremendous achievements in the air.

Then the present Minister of National Defence is quoted at page 5220 of Hansard for June 20 of 1956 as follows:

> I am not in favour of discontinuing the airplane production industry here. I think it is something we have to develop and maintain. In those periods of changeover from one type of equipment to a more modern type there is always the danger of equipment being turned out which before it leaves the assembly line is obsolescent, and I am afraid that is the case at the present time with the CF-100's which will be turned out. No doubt the CF-100 Mark V, with its greater power, would be of value to combat any enemy bombers coming to this country in the near future, but its period of usefulness must be rapidly passing. The CF-105 will no doubt bridge that period until the time the guided missile is ready and available.
> I have frequently wondered whether we have not rather limited the airplane production industry in asking them to develop a limited number of a type of plane. As has been indicated, there is a great shortage and there is a great need for more transport planes. I believe that the A. V. Roe Company, which has been making the CF-100's, did start a jet transport plane industry which was cancelled at the time of the Korean war.

Further on he says:

> Whether or not it is possible for Canada to dispose of any of these 100's which must be surplus now I do not know, but it would seem desirable to do so.

As the minister knows, subsequently disposal was made in co-operation between Canada and the United States, and planes were made available under mutual aid to one of our NATO allies, Belgium, and it was an exchange which I believe proved to be to the benefit of all participating countries.

My questions are these. Does the minister still feel as fondly toward the aircraft industry as he did in 1956? Second, if he feels that the CF-100 was practically obsolescent in 1956, how does he square his statement, both earlier this session and today, that it is still a useful aircraft and that it is not yet obsolete and should not yet be removed from squadron service?

Mr. Pearkes: Obsolescence of aircraft depends upon the purpose for which it is to be used. The CF-100 was designed as a defence against certain Russian bombers. Now we have no knowledge that the Russians have procured any faster bombers than they had in those years. Therefore the CF-100 is still an effective aircraft.

Mr. Hellyer: It is almost ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman, but before we call it ten o'clock I would like to say to the minister that I did not mean to be unfair in the statement I made earlier about the two generals who had been here and who, according to my information, had not been encouraged to hold press conferences. If I was wrong in my contention I apologize. The allegations that I made were based on information supplied to me by members of the working press, and I accepted the information given to me at face value; but I accept the minister's feelings on the matter.

Mr. Pearkes: Thank you.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: I presume we will go on with the consideration or these estimates tomorrow. Will the house leader indicate what we will do on Saturday, and also as far as he can into the course of next week?

Mr. Green: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Tomorrow we shall continue with the defence estimates and then take those of the Department of Defence Production. Should they be finished before Saturday evening we will go on with the estimates of trade and commerce. On Monday we intend to start with item No. 1 on today's order paper, an act to amend the Criminal Code; then item No. 7, an act to amend Prisons and Reformatories Act. Then we will take item No. 11, amendments to the Maritime Coal Production Assistance Act; then item No. 9, dealing with crop insurance; and then item No. 10, dealing with farm credit.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

SPEECHES BY HER MAJESTY IN OTTAWA, JULY 1, 1959

Unveiling of Commonwealth Air Forces Memorial

Ottawa, July 1, 1959

This memorial has been built to honour the men and women of the air forces of the commonwealth who during the second world war gave their lives in Canada, in the United States of America and in neighbouring lands and seas, and who have no known graves. It is one of five such air force memorials, commemorating in all some 30,000 names. I have already opened two of these—at Runnymede and Malta—and the others are at El Alamein and Singapore.

Their very locations illustrate how wide was the conflict from which hardly any portion of the world was immune, and to which every part of our commonwealth made its contribution.

Some of those commemorated here were killed in active operations, based in Canada—on missions over the Atlantic and Pacific oceans and in the Arctic. But most of them were learning to fly under the empire air training scheme, or ferrying aircraft made in this continent to Europe and North Africa. They were young people with a belief in the future, many of whom, had they lived, would be playing their part in the reshaping of this modern world. Their deaths have increased the burden on us, but the example of their faith and courage will surely help and inspire us.

As those whose names are recorded here came from every part of the commonwealth, so today many of you, their relatives and kinsfolk, have come from all over the world to join with my Canadian people in honouring their memory. You will be looking for the names of sons or husbands or brothers who did not shrink from losing their lives to save our own. I share your pride in them and assure you of the undiminished gratitude of those who survived the conflict and are able to live in freedom because of their self sacrifice. I would also offer you a word of sympathy in your loss, which time can mitigate but never dispel.

Many Canadians were present when I unveiled the Runnymede memorial, on which are recorded the names of 3,000 Canadian airmen. In the great window of the shrine there is engraved a verse from the 139th Psalm:

"If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea;
Even there shall Thy hand lead me, and Thy right hand shall hold me."

Let these words, in which some of those whom we are honouring here may have found encouragement as they climbed up into the skies, help and support you today.

Television Broadcast

Ottawa, July 1, 1959

The last time I spoke to you, from this my home in Ottawa, was when I opened the new parliament two years ago.

This time I want to speak to you about two other great national occasions. The first was the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway in which President Eisenhower and I took part near Montreal last Friday. He represented the American people and I was there as your representative to mark the completion of this joint enterprise which has captured the imagination of the world. Although this was an international undertaking, it is worth remembering that Canada was the moving spirit in getting the project started and that two thirds of the seaway and the work on it is in Canadian territory. This was a truly great national occasion.

The other national occasion is Dominion day which we are celebrating today. If the opening of the seaway is a salute to the future, then Dominion day is a salute to the past. Five hundred years ago there were no Europeans on this continent, today over 17 million Canadians enjoy what is probably one of the highest standards of living anywhere in the world.

During the early history of what is now Canada there was controversy and fighting. Today you have achieved a unity and a sense of common purpose which is a tribute to good sense and tolerance. This did not come about of its own accord. It came about because there have been men in every generation who were not content simply to work for themselves but who worked for the nation as a whole, who sacrificed their own interests for the common good.

Dominion day commemorates the birth of Canada as a nation and the first independent country within the British Empire. So it also marks the beginning of that free association of independent states which is now known as the commonwealth of nations.

(Translation):

Very recently, I was on the very site where Jacques Cartier, in 1534, set foot for the first time on Canadian soil and there erected his great wooden cross. I have been told that the name Gaspe comes from an Indian word meaning "the end of the earth". Undoubtedly, it seemed to the Indians that it was, in fact, the end of the earth, but for Cartier, and those who came after him, it was the start of a new world and a life filled with promises and possibilities.

Today, every Canadian can justifiably be proud of the way in which these possibilities have been realized. In government centres and in industrial areas, I have been able to learn that this marvellous new world, built on work and vision and on the natural resources of our country, still remains, four hundred years later, the heritage of Canadians.

(Text):

That same vision and heritage brought the commonwealth into being with Canada as a founder member. This is no mere sentimental organization but a vigorous association for co-operation and mutual help on the widest scale.

One instance of this is the number of students from India and Pakistan and the West Indies who find places in Canadian universities. This is an admirable plan and I hope that it spreads. There could be no better way to help future generations in all the commonwealth countries to get on together. If any of these students are listening to me, which perhaps they are, I congratulate them on the hard work and enterprise which has brought them here and send them my very good wishes.

After all I have said, I am sure you can understand why this tour has given me and my husband such pleasure and why we are looking forward to the rest of it so much. We would like to see many more of you and far more of this wonderful country but it cannot be done this time. Canada is simply too big. Luckily the television network covers most of the populated parts of the country so I can at least bring this rather more personal message directly into your homes even if I cannot drive through your streets and meet some of your fellow citizens. I hope it will also let you come with me to the different parts of Canada I am going to visit and see some of the spectacles and industrial developments along the route.

This is the holiday season for many of you and a fine summer's day is not just the moment for serious matters but I have spoken of these things because they are very close to my heart. If I have helped you to feel proud of being Canadian, if I have reminded you of the strength which comes from unity, and if I have helped to draw your attention to the bright vision of the years ahead, I shall feel well satisfied because I believe with all conviction that this country can look to a glorious future.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, July 3, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING SCHOLARSHIPS AND FELLOWSHIPS

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the right hon. Prime Minister announced in the house on March 24, a commonwealth education conference is to be held at Oxford from July 15th to the 29th. The Canadian delegation to the conference will be led by Hon. George A. Drew and will include representatives of the university community and officials. The detailed list of delegates is being released to the press later today.

The house will recall that at the commonwealth trade and economic conference in Montreal last September consideration was given to various ways in which the commonwealth could be strengthened through increased co-operation in the field of trade and economic relations generally. One of the problems which received particular attention at that time was how we could help our less developed partners in the commonwealth to carry forward their economic development programs to the point where they would be able to achieve self-sustaining economic growth.

I need not reiterate today the steps taken by the Canadian government at that time to expand our economic and technical assistance to the underdeveloped countries and territories of the commonwealth. I do want to remind the house, however, that it was recognized at Montreal that apart from capital and technical knowledge, education in its broadest sense also had a vital part to play in the process of economic development. It was also recognized that our expanding commonwealth called for a continuing community of experience and values which a wider sharing of educational opportunities and facilities was best able to assure.

It was decided, therefore, at Montreal to bring into being a commonwealth scholarship program under which some thousand scholars would, in due course, have the opportunity of studying in countries other than their own. Canada undertook to be responsible for one-quarter of the total places to be provided under the program, and the United Kingdom for one-half. It was agreed that the detailed formulation of this scholarship program should be left to be worked out at the conference which is being held at Oxford later this month.

It was also decided at Montreal that the mandate of this conference should include a review of existing arrangements for commonwealth co-operation in the educational field. The house will appreciate that this is a very wide and complex mandate and the present intention, therefore, is to concentrate on two matters which are known to be of particular concern to the underdeveloped countries and territories of the commonwealth, the supply and training of teachers, and facilities for technical and scientific education.

May I say, Mr. Speaker, that these are fields in which Canada is prepared to provide a greater measure of assistance within the framework of our existing technical assistance programs. As the house is aware, these now encompass all the less developed areas of the commonwealth, and there is thus no need for Canada to set up new programs for dealing with these problems.

There is perhaps a further word I should say about the Commonwealth scholarship program. In the view of the Canadian government the awards to be made under the program should be such as to attract men and women of high intellectual competence who are able to benefit from a period of study abroad and who may be expected to make a worth-while contribution to the national life of their own countries and to the commonwealth association as such. It is the view of the Canadian government that in such an interchange each commonwealth country has something to give and something to gain. I am glad to be able to assure the house that in this view the government has had the wholehearted support of the Canadian university community.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, when the announcement was made some months ago of the proposal to establish this commonwealth scholarship fund, we welcomed it and we welcome the information the minister has just given as to the implementation of this imaginative and constructive commonwealth idea. In working it out from the Canadian point of view as it concerns exchanges on educational matters, no doubt the government will wish to keep in close touch with the Canadian provincial authorities regarding it. I would also venture to express the hope that in this exchange of scholarships it may be possible to encourage scholars to go not only to the United Kingdom and to Canada but to some of the newer members of the commonwealth which are probably older in civilization and culture than we are, and which have a good deal to give in the way of educational exchanges of which we in the western world are not always aware. I hope this Oxford conference will be able to carry this idea one stage forward. If and when it comes into complete operation it will be a memorial of which the late secretary of state for external affairs who had something to do with initiating this idea, would have been extremely proud.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, we are extremely interested in the announcement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs this morning, for three reasons particularly; first, that commonwealth strength, unity and development are essential for the freedom of the world; second, we endorse wholeheartedly the plan and the proposals. At this point I should like to say that this plan and these proposals are right in line with the policies advocated by this group throughout the years. The advancement of education and understanding throughout the whole commonwealth is a cement that will be of lasting quality.

Mr. Green: In my statement, Mr. Speaker, I mentioned that a list of the delegates would be given to the press later today. I have here a list which I think is complete; there may be one or two others. Perhaps the house would be interested in having the names given this morning. The leader, as I have mentioned, is Hon. George A. Drew, high commissioner for Canada in the United Kingdom. Then there are O. E. Ault, director, economic and technical assistance branch, Department of Trade and Commerce; G. F. Curtis, dean of the faculty of law, University of British Columbia; W. T. R. Flemington, president, Mount Allison University; C. R. Ford, director of vocational training, Department of Labour; Abbe Jacques Garneau, secretaire general et moderateur, Universite Laval; Henri Gaudefroy, directeur, ecole polytechnique, Universite de Montreal; J. W. Holmes, assistant under secretary, Department of External Affairs; L. D. Hudon, Department of Finance; F. C. A. Jeanneret, chancellor, University of Toronto; J. F. Leddy, dean of the college of arts and science, University of Saskatchewan; J. R. Mallory, professor of political science, McGill University; J. B. Marshall, awards officer, national research council; T. H. Matthews, executive secretary, Canadian universities foundation; W. L. Morton, professor of history, University of Manitoba; D. C. Munroe, director of the institute of education, McGill University; G. C. McInnes, Canada house, London; and Lewis Perinbam, general secretary, world university service of Canada.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and it has to do with the announcement he made under motions. The minister indicated the list of Canadians who would constitute our representation. He also indicated that the list was not complete as yet. I wonder whether any consideration could be given by the minister or the government to having a representative of either the Canadian teachers' federation or any one of the provincial teachers' federations on the delegation, since education will be one of the major topics of the conference.

Mr. Green: On checking the list again I find the probability is that it is already complete. There may be one or two additions, but the delegation is to leave within the next two or three days. There would be great difficulty in adding other representatives. However, I shall be glad to take the hon. member's suggestion under consideration.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FRANCE—REPORTED PROTEST AGAINST C.B.C. TELEVISION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether there is any foundation for the report that the premier of France found it necessary to summon the Canadian ambassador in order to protest the appearance of two Algerian rebels on a Canadian Broadcasting Corporation television program. If that report is accurate, would he tell the house what stand was taken by the Canadian representative in respect of this matter?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps I had better take that question as notice.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

GLACE BAY, N.S.—REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO UNEMPLOYED MINERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour arising out of a telegram I have received from William H. Marsh, president of district 26 of the united mine workers, in which he states that 100 working men in the Caledonian mine who are otherwise eligible for unemployment insurance cannot obtain it because they have made less than 24 weekly contributions. In view of the fact that this is one of a series of telegrams from Mr. Marsh complaining about unemployment conditions in this area and lack of unemployment insurance benefits, I wonder whether the minister could say what action, if any, the government is contemplating in this connection.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as far as the Unemployment Insurance Act is concerned it is quite plain, and there is no intention of diverging from the act in this respect.

Mr. Argue: Has the government or any department of the government made a survey of unemployment conditions in this area? Is the government considering any action that might relieve an extremely difficult unemployment situation?

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, speaking for the government I may say that the Department of Labour itself, through the national employment service, is continually in touch with the situation and is doing everything possible to alleviate it in the form of other placements, if that is necessary. However, I think this is a temporary situation. I am not fully aware of nor have I all the particulars, but I will certainly look into the matter to see if there is any way in which help through our national employment service can be extended to these people.

NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION ON LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister which is a follow-up to a very similar question I asked him on May 28. Can the minister say whether any further consideration has been given to the disallowance of the controversial Newfoundland labour legislation, which I suggest is repugnant to our concept of basic human rights and fundamental freedoms?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The matter of disallowance is receiving continuing consideration. I believe under the constitution the period is set within which a decision must be made, and the constitutional requirements in that regard will be met.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask a supplemental question of the Minister of Justice in this regard. Is the minister in a position to indicate to the house the nature of the replies he has sent on behalf of the government to the representations that have been made in regard to this matter of disallowance?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I cannot recall the replies I have sent to all the representations, but my recollection is that in general they have been to the same effect as the statement just made by the Prime Minister.

TRANSPORT

ST. JOHNS, QUE.—STATEMENT RESPECTING PURCHASE OF PROPERTY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): On Wednesday last the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville asked me a question with regard to the lease of a site south of the central Vermont railway station in St. Jean.

A resolution from the city of St. Johns regarding certain lands in the area has just been received in my office, having been apparently dispatched under cover of a letter from the city dated June 26. Neither I nor my officials have as yet had an opportunity to study this matter, but it is receiving immediate attention. I have no record of having received any recent representations from the junior chamber of commerce of St. Johns on this matter.

BRIDGES

CHAMPLAIN BRIDGE, MONTREAL—STATEMENT ON CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Also on Wednesday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. Ann asked me why work was suspended on the Champlain bridge. The answer is that there is no suspension of work on the Champlain bridge. There are at present under way the following works:

The construction of piers between Montreal and Nuns' island.

The extension of the St. Pierre collector outlet.

The placing of fill on Nuns' island.

In addition, a contract has been awarded for the section of the bridge between Nuns' island and the seaway canal, and work thereon should commence shortly. Tenders have been received for the superstructure between Montreal and Nuns' island and it is expected that the contract will be awarded within the next 10 days.

Plans have been completed and tenders for the main span over the seaway canal will be advertised on July 6.

Mr. Dupuis: I thank the minister for his answer.

PARLIAMENT HILL

INQUIRY AS TO SINGING OF "O CANADA" DURING CEREMONIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): I should like to ask the Secretary of State if he has an answer to the question I asked him yesterday about the hymn "O Canada"? He was supposed to answer my question today. Is the answer ready?

(Translation):

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville (Mr. Dupuis) that the Department of the Secretary of State had nothing to do with the ceremonies which took place here the day before yesterday, and I am unable to tell him what department is responsible for the arrangements.

Mr. Dupuis: The Secretary of State, who was present at those ceremonies, must have noticed that "God Save the Queen" was played three times but that "O Canada" was not played either before or after the ceremony.

Mr. Courtemanche: I understand this was done as a tribute to the Queen, as Her Majesty was present on the hill.

Mr. Dupuis: Could the minister answer my question, i.e.: Why was "O Canada" not played at the beginning or at the end of the trooping of the colours?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Is this not the same question the hon. member asked yesterday?

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State says he does not know because he is not responsible. The reason I asked the minister to answer my question is—

Mr. Speaker: I understood the Secretary of State to say that he would provide an answer.

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Dupuis: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but he said he had no answer to give. I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. I would like to know why we did not hear "O Canada" before or after the ceremony of the presentation of the colours.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no answer to give whatsoever. I do not know the circumstance. I do know that at all the functions "God Save the Queen" and "O Canada" either preceded or succeeded the function in question. What may have happened on this occasion, of course, I do not know.

Mr. Dupuis: Could I ask the Minister of National Defence if he has an answer to that question?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Would you mind repeating the question?

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Speaker, I realize that the minister did not hear "O Canada" and did not hear the member for St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville. I would like to ask the minister why we did not hear "O Canada" before or after the ceremony of the presentation of colours the other day in front of the parliament buildings?

Mr. Pearkes: When Her Majesty arrived the royal salute was given, which is laid down as being certain bars of "God Save the Queen". No national anthem as such was played until the conclusion of the ceremony in the evening when "O Canada" was played.

Mr. Dupuis: That is a very poor answer.

FISHERIES

NEW BRUNSWICK—LIFT PERIOD OF MIRAMICHI SALMON SEASON

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Has a final decision been reached in regard to the dates of the lift period of the Miramichi salmon drifting season; and what is the position of the set net fishermen in this connection?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, an order in council has been passed putting back the lift period for drift salmon netters in New Brunswick. I am not certain of the exact dates but I think the lift period will begin the 20th. In any case, it has been put back to a later time to meet a request which was made on behalf of the salmon drift netters in that area by their association, and also in response to representations made to me from other sources, Hon.

Mr. Pichette of the New Brunswick government and probably some others. This, I believe, will meet the situation. There is no change as far as set net fishermen are concerned.

[Later:]

Mr. MacLean (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add to the answer I gave a few moments ago to the question by the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi in order to be more specific. Drift netters are now allowed to continue fishing for salmon until July 20. I think this is what I indicated earlier. From July 20 to August 3 will be the normal summer lift period. Fishing can again be carried out from August 3 to August 15. No change has been made in the summer lift period for shore nets, since those were not damaged to any great extent in the recent storm. Their lift period will, as usual, commence on July 6 and continue to July 20. Fishing may again be carried on from July 20 to August 15.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

PRINCE RUPERT, B.C.—STATEMENT ON CRASH OF CANSO AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, and ask him if he is able to give the house any information regarding the reported crash yesterday of a Canso aircraft at Prince Rupert?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I have just received a report from the Royal Canadian Air Force that a Canso aircraft with a total complement of nine persons aboard was on an authorized mercy flight from Sea Island, Vancouver to Prince Rupert. At Prince Rupert a normal landing was initiated. However, preliminary investigations indicate that the aircraft struck a submerged object which caused it to veer sharply to the left with the result that the front nose section broke off. Immediate assistance was provided from ashore. However, it was not possible to locate Nursing Sister Flying Officer Kerr who had been occupying a seat in the front section of the plane. Latest reports indicate that Flying Officer Kerr is still missing, but all other persons are accounted for.

Mr. Howard: A supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Can I ask the minister whether the airstrip at Prince Rupert presently being constructed is sufficiently complete to allow it to be used for emergency landings?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I will check on the state of construction of that airstrip and let the hon. member know.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

REPORTED CRITICISMS OF PROGRAMS ON FRENCH NETWORK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. According to a press report in the Toronto Star, last winter at least two confidential documents blasting the talks and public affairs branch of the C.B.C.'s French network were prepared by a group of Quebec Conservatives and submitted to the government. My question is this. Has the minister received a letter from Quebec members criticizing the public affairs department of the French network?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): I saw that statement in the newspaper yesterday, and to the best of my recollection I never received such a letter. It may be—and I am checking on this—that it was sent through the office automatically to the C.B.C. because, as I said in another place yesterday, I forward all letters commending or criticizing the broadcasts to the C.B.C., and it is possible that such a communication was received and sent down. I will check on this, but I do not have any knowledge of the letter myself.

Mr. Caron: Would the minister check and give us an answer?

An hon. Member: He just said he would.

Mr. Caron: He said he would check on it but he never said he would give an answer.

May I direct a further question to the Minister of National Revenue? We are told that Rene Levesque was forced to discontinue his very interesting program "Point de Mire". Can the minister give any reason for the discontinuation of this program?

An hon. Member: Look at the date and find out what happened.

Mr. Caron: Perhaps whoever said that would rise in his place and speak and not just sit there.

Mr. Nowlan: I did not hear the name of the program to which the hon. member referred, but whatever it might have been I have no explanation to make and no knowledge of why any change was made.

Mr. Caron: May I direct a question to the Solicitor General.

Inquiries of the Ministry

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Solicitor General a question. Has the program "Point de mire" with Mr. Rene Levesque, been discontinued by order of the C.B.C. or by order of the Conservative members for Quebec?

Hon. Leon Balcer (Solicitor General): Absolutely not, Mr. Speaker!

Mr. Caron: What does the minister mean by "absolutely not"? "Absolutely not" what?

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Solicitor General a question. Can the minister inform this house whether he has received protests from hon. members on the government benches, against certain C.B.C. commentators, more particularly against some commentators on the French network who, according to those hon. representatives, do not always favour government policy?

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure how the hon. member relates his question to the administrative responsibility of the Solicitor General. It seems to me it should have been directed to the minister through whom the C.B.C. reports.

Mr. Robichaud: On the point of order, the Toronto Star yesterday carried an article to the effect that the Solicitor General had received certain representations and that he had transmitted those representations to the C.B.C. management. This is why I addressed my question to the Solicitor General. I wanted to find out whether he had received the representations referred to.

Mr. Balcer: Mr. Speaker, I do not recall having received any representations mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. Robichaud: Will the Solicitor General check and find out whether he has received them?

[Later:]

Mr. Caron: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is there any truth in the rumour that the member for Roberval would like to take the place of Rene Levesque on "Point de Mire"?

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

PROPOSED MERGER OF B.C. LUMBER COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. I sent notice to him earlier. Has the attention of the minister been drawn to a proposed merger of two of Canada's largest integrated timber processing companies, namely MacMillan and Bloedel Limited and Powell River Company Limited? Can the minister indicate whether this proposed merger will be reviewed by the combines investigation branch in order to determine whether the merger or steps leading to it contravene the combines laws?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): My attention has been drawn to the report of the proposed merger and the matter, in accordance with the usual practice, is being looked into by the combines branch. The usual practice to which I refer is that all mergers of companies of this size and nature are automatically inquired into to see if there is cause for formal inquiry.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO COMMUNICATION FROM QUEBEC ON CONFERENCE AGENDA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): May I direct a question to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister received any news from the Quebec government about the agenda which is to be submitted on Monday next?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker. I gave an answer to that question yesterday, and as far as I know there has been no communication received since I answered that question yesterday.

Mr. Caron: I have another question. Since yesterday has there been any official news about the premier of Quebec coming to the conference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, Mr. Speaker, I have no further information on that subject which interests my hon. friend so much.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

STATEMENT ON MAINTENANCE OF HISTORICAL RECORD

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on July 1 the hon. member for Kootenay West asked a question which also contained a request for the maintenance of a historical record in respect of the parliament buildings. I now have an answer from the Department of Public Works, as follows. Collection of information is taking place with respect to the carvings and other historical aspects by the Department of Public Works. In addition, public archives has made a survey of public and other records that are available for such a history, and I am now informed that they will obtain any further information of a historical nature which Sergeant Closs is able to give. The hon. member will recall that he mentioned Sergeant Closs. I wish to thank the hon. member for his very useful suggestion.

NORTHLAND NAVIGATION COMPANY

INQUIRY AS TO STRIKE SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the fact that British Columbia members of the house have received telegrams this morning from the provincial federation of labour relative to the strike in Vancouver involving the Northland Navigation Company, is the minister yet in a position to make a report on the investigation which he told us was under way?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker, I have had no word on the investigation that is going on.

Mr. Winch: As soon as information is available will the minister make a statement to the house?

Mr. Starr: Absolutely.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

214. Departmental administration, $3,380,550.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to follow up a matter which we discussed yesterday, the question of the use by Canadian forces of tactical nuclear weapons, in order to find out if possible exactly where we stand in respect of this vitally important question. It becomes a matter of immediate importance in view of the fact that the R.C.A.F. is soon to be equipped in part with missiles which will have a nuclear capability, and our brigade group in France will presumably be equipped with weapons which have the same capability.

I should like to draw to the minister's attention, if he has not already seen it, an article in the London Times of April 13 by their defence correspondent which is entitled, "Latest Trend in Atomic Weapons". The author of the article is obviously a man who writes with both knowledge and authority. He has this to say in the article in question:

> It is an uneconomic business to make small weapons of this kind—
> Small atomic weapons.
> —since low yields can only be produced by using fissile material as inefficiently as possible.

Perhaps I might interpolate there to say that my information is that not only do low yields require inefficient use of material but, relatively speaking, the lower the yield the greater the fall-out; in other words, the smaller the atomic weapon the dirtier, as the expression is, the weapon. The article goes on to say:

> Why then are the Americans making smaller instead of bigger bangs for a buck? The impulse comes from the military requirement for atomic weapons which can be used in air defence, and at close range on the battlefield—

Then again in the article:

> With the advent of nuclear parity making total war suicidal, public opinion is finding it easier to envisage limited war. The question is, could atomic weapons be used in a limited war without its spiralling into a total nuclear war? Theoretically, it is the way in which atomic weapons are used—tactically, against an enemy's armed forces in the field, or strategically, against his war effort as a whole—that ought to matter, and not the power of the weapons used. But in practice the public and the politicians are likely to find it easier to contemplate the use of small weapons than of big.

I know the dilemma this involves, which we mentioned yesterday. The minister said, and I do not take issue with him, that it would be an intolerable position to send Canadian forces into action not having the most effective arms that can be secured. I am talking now about tactical weapons. But as this writer points out, the danger would be that the use of these tactical weapons on the battlefield might spiral into the final use of the ultimate weapon.

The minister himself, as I mentioned yesterday, has more than once expressed the fear that this would happen. Therefore before you can arm any unit with even the smallest atomic weapon you have to contemplate the possibility of the use of that weapon degenerating into the use of the larger nuclear weapon. This writer concludes his very interesting and important article as follows:

> A most careful balance will therefore have to be kept between atomic and conventional weapons, however attractive the former may seem at first sight. Our aim—

Presumably he means the United Kingdom aim.

> —in equipping our forces with tactical atomic weapons ought to be primarily deterrence: first, to deter an attack from taking place at all, and, secondly to deter an enemy from exploiting his superior numbers, if he does nevertheless attack. The actual use of tactical atomic weapons ought to be considered a last resort, not so much for fear that it might lead to total war as for doubt about the outcome of a limited atomic war.

I think those views should be very much in our mind as we contemplate the policy to be followed by the Canadian government in this matter. Last February 24, I believe, the Prime Minister stated that the government considered that Canada's forces should be provided with modern and efficient weapons. But he went on to say that it was expedient that ownership and custody of nuclear warheads in Canada, and presumably also in Europe, should remain with the United States. This view of the government is confirmed on page 7 of the white paper, and I quoted this yesterday, where it is said that ownership and custody of nuclear weapons required for Canadian defence forces will remain with the United States.

So I should like to have it more clearly stated than has already been done what will be the exact, precise effect of the negotiations which are now being undertaken by the Canadian government with the United States government on the subject of the use of American nuclear weapons by Canadian forces. The commander of the Canadian brigade in Europe, and he was merely echoing what General Norstad had said more than once, said, and I quoted this yesterday:

> Our defence plans are based on the nuclear weapon.

Presumably he is referring to Canadian defence plans in Europe where the Canadian brigade is part of the NATO forces, and if those defence plans are based on the nuclear weapon what is the capability of the brigade in France in respect of those weapons? A correspondent of the Globe and Mail who visited the brigade last March wrote an article from Soest in which he made the statement—perhaps the minister will be able to comment on its accuracy—that there is no such capability now available for the Canadian brigade. That was last March, and I am quoting from this article of March 25 which appeared in the Globe and Mail. It reads:

> They—

That is the brigade.

> —have no nuclear weapons now. Although they will this year receive one-half a battery of Lacrosse 20-mile, ground to ground missiles (a battery contains four launchers of 12 missiles each), they will not have the atomic warheads for them and do not know when they will get them.
>
> Nor do they have the cross-country armoured personnel carriers and the helicopters need for atomic warfare. The army has asked for them but so far the government has declined to say yes or no.

Again, he says:

> The Canadians do not have the atomic weapons to defeat an attack, and there are not enough of them to stop an attack without atomic weapons.

He goes on:

> What the brigade needs, according to its officers, are about 400 bobcats (tracked, armoured personnel carriers), 10 heavy transport helicopters, six light reconnaissance helicopters, about six Otter short take-off aircraft, and miscellaneous electronic equipment such as infrared radar. The cost would be about $5 million.
> More important, perhaps, the brigade needs a political decision on what kind of war it is expected to fight. If it is to have both a nuclear and conventional weapons capability, then its manpower strength must be increased substantially. If it is committed to nuclear war alone, then it must have the warheads on the spot through arrangements either with the United States or Britain.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is of course an extremely important matter, and I hope the minister will be able to clear up this morning the exact position of our forces in regard to the use of nuclear weapons, and the exact position of negotiations with the United States; what those negotiations are expected to accomplish and whether, if those negotiations are successful, the statement made by the government earlier through the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence will have to be modified accordingly. I refer to the statement to the effect that ownership and custody of nuclear warheads in Canada should remain with the United States.

Mr. Pearkes: I think the Leader of the Opposition made a slight slip in referring to the brigade being in France. The brigade is all stationed in Germany.

Now, regarding the position of the supply of nuclear weapons, it was stated by the Prime Minister in the house on February 20 that problems connected with arming the Canadian brigade in Europe with short range nuclear weapons for NATO defence tasks are also being studied. These studies are continuing and are fast reaching a stage when there can be an exchange of notes of this matter. The negotiations have not been completed at the present time, and I do not think it would be helpful to make any firm statement until these negotiations have been completed. When they are completed, I can assure the Leader of the Opposition that if the house is in session a statement will be made in this house.

Mr. Pearson: I realize that the minister cannot, in the midst of negotiations, make an announcement in regard to the details of those negotiations. My question was a little broader than that. Could he inform the committee whether the purpose of those negotiations—that is all I am asking about—is to put Canada on exactly the same basis as the United Kingdom is vis-à-vis the United States in regard to atomic weapons and the exchange of information with the United States regarding atomic weapons?

Mr. Pearkes: The Canadian brigade is under the command of the commander of the NATO forces in Europe. I presume that eventually the Canadian forces will be equipped with atomic weapons under the same terms as the other NATO contingents under SACEUR which may also be equipped with atomic weapons. There may be a difference—I say may be—in connection with nuclear weapons which are stored in the United Kingdom as opposed to those which are readily available in Europe under the control of SACEUR for the troops under their control.

Mr. Pearson: If I may pursue this matter just a little further, the minister has just said it is contemplated that in due course the Canadian brigade will be in the same position as other members of the NATO forces in regard to the possession, use and control of atomic weapons. I would point out that this would mean, if it were to be taken literally, that all the members of NATO with forces in Europe would have to be in the same position as the United Kingdom, which has already made an agreement with the United States putting the United Kingdom in a special position in this matter. I take it that the minister does not mean that.

The fact surely must be that if the United Kingdom now receives atomic weapons from the United States and those atomic weapons are moved to France or Germany by the United Kingdom for use by its NATO contingent, then the weapons are already under the complete control of the United Kingdom government because of the agreement made with the United States. My question was whether the Canadian position would be the same in respect of any such weapons which might be made available to us by the United States. The minister said we would be in the same position as the other NATO governments. Unless we are in the same position as the United Kingdom we will still be in an inferior position in regard to the control of those weapons.

Mr. Pearkes: As I have said, I cannot make any firm statement until the negotiations have been completed. It would be quite foolish, as I am sure the Leader of the Opposition will recognize, for one to make any firm commitment or to give a definite answer to his question until these negotiations have been completed.

Now, I wonder whether the Leader of the Opposition is confusing the agreement so far as the United Kingdom is concerned with those nuclear weapons which are placed in the United Kingdom for use by the forces of the United Kingdom in the United Kingdom, and not those forces which are actually under SACEUR in Europe.

Mr. Pearson: I was not confusing those two things in my own mind, but I am not going to press the minister. He has said they are in the midst of these negotiations and he is unable, while the negotiations are going on, to give the committee information concerning those negotiations in any specific way. I brought this up because of its importance and also because a statement was made in the house—I think it was toward the end of May—that we had already made arrangements with the United States in regard to the exchange of atomic information which put Canada in a special position.

As a matter of fact, looking at that agreement at that time it was clear that Canada was included with West Germany, Turkey and the Netherlands as NATO countries eligible for the information and equipment needed for the training of forces in the use of atomic weapons, but we were not put in the same position as the United Kingdom. I think that was the inference taken from it in some quarters in this country. The minister says it is impossible to tell us at this time whether those negotiations, now going on, will carry this one stage further and put Canada in exactly the same position as the United Kingdom in the use of nuclear weapons of United States manufacture so far as control is concerned. If our forces in Europe are to have atomic weapons it surely is important to know whether our forces are going to have complete control over those weapons. Nothing could be more important than that. If the minister feels he cannot give any further information at this time in respect of this matter because of the negotiations, then I am not going to press him any further this morning.

Mr. Pearkes: I thank the Leader of the Opposition for the remarks he has made and for the concern he feels with regard to who should have control of these weapons. These matters are under very active consideration and are subjects of negotiation with the United States at the present time. The hon. member's views will be borne in mind.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I should like to congratulate the Minister of National Defence for his clear exposé of the war situation and our state of preparedness to meet a possible attack. I want to congratulate him especially on the fact that for the first time since the last war there is a realistic plan for civil defence. I was much impressed by the statement he made yesterday with regard to the national survival training which is being introduced through all components of the Canadian army. As reported at page 5355 of Hansard he went on to say this:

To date over 750 armed forces personnel have received survival training at the civil defence college at Arnprior and over 1,000 at the joint atomic, bacteriological and chemical school at Camp Borden. The army commands across Canada have conducted numerous courses to provide instructors in rescue operations—

Army headquarters have prepared and issued training directives and provisional training instructions in all aspects of national survival training.

This is a departure from the laissez-faire policy of the Liberals. In 1955, on August 31, at an annual conference held in Edmonton, Alberta by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities, experts including Dr. Alvin C. Graves, scientific adviser, Nevada test site operations, Los Alamos scientific laboratory, Los Alamos, New Mexico; Wing Commander Sir John Hodsoll, chief civil defence adviser to NATO at that time; General Charles Foulkes, then chairman, chiefs of staffs committee, Ottawa, Ontario; and Major General F. F. Worthington gave some extremely enlightening addresses. I should just like to read a few paragraphs so as not to take too much of the time of the committee. At page 5 of this volume—and I may say this is from the library of parliament here—of the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities entitled "The New Dimensions of Civil Defence", Dr. Graves states as follows:

People in Canada have a problem which is somewhat different from the problems of the people in the United States. The reason for that is the geometry of the earth and the line-up of the powers of the earth today. The reason is that if an aircraft were despatched to attack the United States under present circumstances we would expect it to come over the north pole of the earth down from the Arctic regions and down through the plains or the mountains or eastern portion of Canada, attack some targets in Canada, attack many targets in the United States. The plan would be to try to shoot as many of these planes down as possible.

I would like to say one thing, though. When those airplanes are shot down they will carry with them the atomic bombs or thermonuclear bombs with which they were despatched. What of these weapons? Will they crash to the ground and do nothing? I cannot answer that question since I do not know the Russian plan, but it is perfectly possible to put a mechanism on an atomic or thermonuclear bomb such that it will detonate when it drops below a certain altitude. It is perfectly possible to provide that it will detonate when it strikes the ground.

I think we would be more than foolish if we did not at least assume that the Russians might do that.

I should now like to quote from Sir John Hodsoll's address at page 6 of the same book:

Can I highlight a few points? First of all, we are going to keep peace in this world today by being strong, and our strength is not only the armed strength but it is also civil defence. If we ever got into a war there would be two fronts, the military and the home front. They both have to be defended, and they have both got to be held.

So I want you again to feel that every single thing you are doing in civil defence; every day your strength in civil defence grows you are adding to the chances of keeping the peace. After all, there is nothing finer on earth to think about than that.

Then at page 7:

So far as NATO plan is concerned, we are working on the assumption that the first thirty days are the vital ones and within this first thirty days the first three or four days may be the most critical. Our whole emphasis must be "Do it Now". If it cannot be done physically then let us have plans and let us have them tested out just as you are testing out at Calgary this question of evacuation.

We in NATO believe most firmly that our main problem is survival during that period, and when I say survival, I mean human survival. You can rebuild a city but you cannot rebuild human life and provided that we can keep our populations alive and, if possible, unwounded during that critical period although there may be frightful disasters so far as material things are concerned, they can be repaired but each NATO country will have survived and if the war is not over by then, we shall have the strength to put that extra bit of punch in which may make all the difference between defeat and victory.

I repeat, that is only going to be done by facing up to it today with the entire determination that no matter what type of bomb it is, we can defeat it, and we can if we face up to it and think about it.

After this warning by those experts I am really scandalized and shocked that the Liberals of that time did not act upon the instructions of the experts. Today I am pleased to congratulate the present government for doing something about this matter.

From listening to the discussion of the minister and the opposition members, all we get is a gloomy and grim picture of the world situation. The threat today is as great as but not greater than it was in 1955, for example, when experts from the United States and Great Britain visited Canada to address the conference of mayors at Edmonton.

To summarize, I think we know that our only defence is the defence of deterrence, because we have not the means to wage a conventional war. Our only defence is the threat of a thermonuclear war.

This can be summarized as a powder keg policy. It is a policy based on fear of total destruction on both sides. Both sides are holding a lighted match over a powder keg. I have no quarrel with our holding the match over the powder keg even though it is a desperate attitude, since it is a deterrent against attack and a necessity to maintain peace; but what I cannot understand is that we should all stand around the powder keg, exposed without protection, when it may be necessary to drop the lighted match into both powder kegs. If we peruse the addresses delivered by the experts on August 31, 1955, it is clearly stated that a well planned and organized civil defence is also a deterrent, and it is a deterrent policy of NATO against thermonuclear war. The struggle to win the war will not be carried on by those who will have perished in a thermonuclear war; it can only be carried on by the survivors after the initial attack.

I believe that the most important and urgent national defence policy is to ensure victory in such a war, and that such a victory can only be assured by providing for human survival. This policy of human survival is paramount, and I am certain the Canadian people are not unwilling to spend the money necessary for the effort. We should do as much for human survival as we do for military defence.

I spoke to two hon. members of this house about this. One said, "It's a waste of money". What are we going to do with our money after a thermonuclear attack? The other one said, "I don't believe in getting into a rabbit hole". I think the wise thing to do is not to expose yourself to danger.

I should like to repeat what a famous Greek once said. I have forgotten his name; I think it was Socrates. Somebody was making a speech on patriotism and courage, and after the speech Socrates approached him and asked him, "What is courage?" He said, "It is to maintain your position". Then he asked, "What if strategy demands you should retire?" He replied, "Well, that is different". So, then, real courage is to keep your head. It is to do the reasonable thing in the face of danger. It is not courageous to waste your life because you may need your life to win the war. I think courage is to do what is reasonable, and I maintain that the reasonable thing for Canada is to do everything possible no matter what the expense, no matter what the effort, no matter what the cost, because it is all part of the deterrent and the strategy to win the next war.

Again may I congratulate the minister for taking a step in the right direction.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, the minister did not make any reference yesterday, either in his initial statement or in his later reply, to the ideological threat which is far more insidious and equally as dangerous as the military threat. Neither did he make any reference to the need for ideological training. I should therefore like to take a minute or two this morning to elaborate on what I said yesterday on this point.

We have been engaged in ideological warfare for the last 40 years, and it seems strange that we should so cheerfully ignore that fact and also ignore the need to do anything about it. We have seen one country after another come under communist domination through ideological warfare without a single shot being fired, and we cheerfully assume that this could not happen to us. This complacency, which is rooted in an attitude of foolish superiority on our part, is playing right into the enemy's hands.

Hon. members who served in the last war will recall that tremendous emphasis was placed on the need to know your enemy. Well, we do not know our enemy as far as ideological warfare is concerned. We do not know his methods or his tactics, and we do not know how to recognize his weapons. We do not know what ideological warfare is. We do not know how to wage it or how to defend ourselves against it. Because we do not know these things we are at a serious disadvantage; the enemy is in a position to use us to attain his objectives, and he often does. On those occasions we unwittingly become a tool in the enemy's hands to further his objectives and bring about our own destruction.

Not only should we be able to understand ideological warfare and recognize the enemy's tactics and weapons, but we should be in a position to develop ideoligical weapons and counter tactics of our own. This is one vital sphere in which, as I pointed out yesterday, we can take the offensive without any appreciable cost to the taxpayers. Furthermore, ideological training will help us to see the true nature of the struggle in which we are engaged. It is a global struggle. We often lose sight of that fact and think only in terms of NATO versus the U.S.S.R., or of the free world versus the communist world. This concentration on military defence and this preoccupation with military preparedness to the exclusion of other threats is exactly what the enemy wants. We cannot make our most effective contribution unless we think in terms of global struggle, global strategy and tactics.

Not only is ideological training necessary to give us the right perspective, but it is necessary also to develop that bedrock unity both within our own nation and among our allies without which effective action is impossible. We are prone to refer to ideological warfare in the most casual manner. Too long have we delayed in taking it seriously, seriously enough to develop our own counter measures, or even to try to understand what ideological warfare is. The Russians place tremendous importance on ideological warfare. It is the primary means by which they plan to take over the world, and we disregard it at our own peril. If we persist in disregarding it much longer it will, in my opinion, be disastrous.

Mr. Lambert: I should like to say a few words at this time in connection with some of the things which were said yesterday by the minister and by the Leader of the Opposition. I myself was very appreciative of the detailed review which the minister made of the present defence situation, and pleased to hear that the government was taking certain positive steps in connection with our defence policy, steps which I think we were expecting. Some people had expected them, unfairly I think, much sooner, not having the knowledge of the facts which the government possesses and not appreciating all the difficulties and implications of such decisions.

However, the purport of my remarks goes to one of the basic concepts of the defence not only of this country but of the whole Atlantic community. The minister indicated yesterday his grave concern about the relative positions of weapons of offence and defence, indicating that in so far as missiles are concerned the ICBM with a nuclear warhead seems at present to have some years' lead over weapons of defence. And he indicated further that perhaps the use of force as an instrument of policy to settle man's differences may no longer be valid.

Yes; I think we may consider that absolute force as an instrument of policy to settle man's differences may no longer be valid, but I have not seen any reference to limited forces using more conventional weapons. I know this is a problem which has been raised by a number of people in the past, but yesterday the Leader of the Opposition referred to effect of nuclear attacks. We have seen statements made by the office of civil defence and mobilization, or civil defence, in the United States that the explosion of 48 nuclear bombs would have a devastating effect on that country. But surely this concept of absolute defence, and this recognition that the offence at the moment has predominance over defence, are known by those who may be opposed to the free world. This is not a one-way street. And in the light of this particular conclusion would it not be possible for us to become involved in some side effort, some limited military action and, once having been committed, find ourselves without the appropriate weapons with which to conduct it effectively?

This applies not only to Canada but also to the United States and to Great Britain with regard to the development of nuclear missile weaponry at the highest level and the elimination of what might be considered conventional weapons, though that, it is true, is a very relative term. If you have invested all your money in elephant guns you are not going to be able to go out and shoot effectively small game; your weapons are of no use to you. I would like to have heard the minister tell us what the thinking is with regard to this particular problem.

The Leader of the Opposition indicated that he felt we had made no reassessment of our defence policy. But surely there has been a change in concept. When the hon. gentleman was a member of the government surely he felt that a change was taking place in defence concept, and this change is reflected in the changes that are taking place in our own defence structure. It will be recalled that prior to the NATO alliance in 1959, and in fact prior to the Korean conflict, our military establishments in this country were of a very limited nature. Since then our increased military requirements in so far as aircraft are concerned, and even perhaps the subsequent cancellation of the Arrow program, have reflected the changes brought about by technological developments. The Leader of the Opposition felt there was some danger that we were developing a concept of "fortress America", as I think he called it, as against the Atlantic concept. But I put this to him. Was not the Atlantic concept, though a much larger area of defence, based upon the situation up to 1949, and would he not agree that in the 10 years which have intervened we have witnessed a marked change?

The hon. gentleman spoke about the position in October 1957, and I am wondering whether that might not have started a stampede in thinking; whether it might have caused too great an emphasis to be placed upon certain types of development. At any rate, these technological changes have brought about this conception of fortress America within the framework of the Atlantic concept. I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me that at the time of the Atlantic concept in 1949 and the years immediately following, the North American continent, in so far as its own defences were concerned, constituted possibly one of the least defended areas in the world. What is relevant is that this fortress America is the result of an evolution within the Atlantic concept, a very necessary one in the light of technological developments. For this reason I feel that his criticism or doubts as expressed yesterday are not as valid as they might have appeared to be.

Yesterday some quotations from newspapers were read with respect to an alleged defence muddle. It seems to me, without getting into personalities or anything of that kind, a lack of understanding of the situation comes about in three ways; first of all, through a lack of knowledge of the facts; second a lack of ability to understand those facts if they are available; and, third, in spite of both ability to understand and the availability of the facts, a refusal to see or understand them.

I am just wondering whether all these allegations of muddle, considering where they may have come from, might not be looked at in that light. Did these people have a comprehension of the situation? If they did, would they write or say the things they did? I am always a little careful—by subscribing or even by referring to them—of appearing to adopt such comments.

I have only one passing reference, or a couple of passing references, to make to our own Canadian situation. There was no indication of our complete defence picture. It may be because of the limitation of the time that the minister could rightly say he was not making a complete review of our defence policy, but there is a question that has bothered me for some time and I trust the minister may be able to answer it. It may have been referred to yesterday. I refer to our own armed forces, particularly our brigade groups. It strikes me that the effective use of our manpower in the field, regardless of its weapons, would require not only mobility but dispersement. Therefore, just how mobile are our land forces in this country today? We have certain transport, be it by road or by rail. As one who lives far removed from the capital I fully realize the limitations of rail transport. Then, road and rail do not take us everywhere in this country. Road and rail do not take us in those areas where it may be necessary to engage the enemy.

This brings us down to air transport. I would be of the opinion that if it is economically possible—and I realize the difficulties in the financial limitations in this regard—we should look to a considerable accentuation of the provision of air transport which could be available for a number of uses. Not only would we keep them relatively fully occupied for training purposes but for other purposes as well, since those brigades would have to get used to moving by air much more than they do now. I recall that at the time of the Suez crisis the reliance on commercial aircraft to supplement military transport aircraft did not show up too well, besides which, reliance on civilian aircraft, commercial aircraft, would mean that civil activity, which would be just as important in many fields, would have to halt if the aircraft were taken away. We know we have to move our technical people around as much as we do our soldiers. I should like to ask the minister whether we could have some indication in this connection at this time.

While I am on the subject of our military personnel, Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted the indulgence of the committee I should like to draw attention to the presence in the gallery of a relatively large number of men of Her Majesty's Royal Canadian Navy. There are 138 officers, chief petty officers and men of Her Majesty's Canadian ship Cornwallis who performed on the lawns in front of the parliament buildings on Dominion day. These officers and men are from a training establishment; they are in the main relatively new to the service, and represent all provinces of Canada. I would certainly congratulate them on the very fine performance on Wednesday evening.

My last point, Mr. Chairman, concerns civil defence. Here I would not say too much because I would be merely repeating the views put forward by the hon. member for St. Boniface. I think it was long overdue that our civil defence be taken over by a force, and an authoritative force, able to set it in motion and see to its training. By saying that I do not wish to criticize or belittle the valiant efforts of so many volunteers in the past who, in the various communities of this country to very greatly varying degrees, gave of their time and effort without pay to the development of civil defence. I think this country owes them a great debt of gratitude for what they have done. Now I would say they have the leadership and the force associated with them to give them greater scope for the utilization of the knowledge they have developed.

There are many other subjects on which I wish to speak today, but in the interest of getting on with these estimates I shall raise my points as the items come up.

Mr. Bourque: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence concerning the Bomarc site. I was wondering whether I could ask him the question on this item. Will the farms on range 4 at Canton Nantel La Macaza be purchased or appropriated for the Bomarc site? If so, in what way will these farms be purchased or expropriated, by superficial measure or by municipal valuation?

Mr. Pearkes: To answer that question, the Bomarc site in northern Quebec, as I stated yesterday, will be in the area of Mont Laurier. I have not given the precise position of that Bomarc site, nor do I think it is advisable to pinpoint those defence positions. After all, they might be considered as targets for enemy action, and I do not see any point in jeopardizing security by mentioning the particular section or point in an area where batteries will be placed. All purchases of lands which are required will be made in the ordinary way through the defence construction department.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two matters to put before the minister, but before I do so I should like to say a word or two by way of comment on the remarks just made by the hon. member for Edmonton West. He spoke very interestingly about the concept of fortress America concerning which I expressed some alarm yesterday and concerning which I still feel some alarm if it should develop in the wrong way. He pointed out that fortress America is essentially a development out of NATO, out of, if you like, the Atlantic fortress idea of 10 years ago which was one of the reasons why we created NATO.

But there is, as I understand it, a fundamental difference between these two things. Fortress western Europe, if I can call it that, was built up for one purpose only, a purely defensive purpose, for the protection of western Europe against an aggressor. Fortress America, which may, if you like, have developed out of the NATO idea, has now become, of course, something else because fortress America is the base from which the retaliatory forces will operate, not all of them but perhaps the major part of them. Fortress America in that sense has become the base for the deterrent.

It is also a fortress in the conventional sense, in the sense I referred to when I mentioned fortress Europe, because it has brought about a tremendous effort to make this continent as secure as possible against an invasion which could only come from the air. It is a problem which is becoming increasingly difficult every year. One of the worries I have about the fortress America concept, apart from the fact that it is perhaps tying us more closely than some of us would like to American defence and strategy, is that these two things sometimes conflict with each other, the fortress America concept in the conventional sense and the fortress America which represents the protection of the deterrent.

In all the hearings that have been held in Washington there is obviously developing a great anxiety as to the division of expenditure and effort on one or the other of these ideas, the development of early warning systems, ballistic missile early warning systems, of anti-missile missiles and the F-108 interceptor to protect the continent, and, the other development involving the deterrent, the construction of intercontinental missiles and the protection of the bases from which they will be used so that the deterrent, which I think we now admit is our most effective defence, cannot be put out of action. I wonder, and I expressed this worry yesterday, whether even the United States with all its power and strength will be able to proceed with the development of these two ideas. No one can read the testimony at the congressional hearings without being frightened by the magnitude of the dual operation of the maintenance of the deterrent and the protection of the continent at the same time.

There is an interrelationship also not only between these two continental ideas but between the fortress America idea in either of its forms and the defence of western Europe. The stronger the deterrent becomes, the more effective it seems to be in preventing an all out assault. And the greater the feeling that it is our major protection and will be used as such, the less incentive there is in Europe to devote as much energy and as much of their resources as is necessary for the protection of western Europe itself by conventional means of defence. So you have, you have an example of it right now, almost a vicious circle. If it is not vicious it certainly is a circle. The stronger the deterrent becomes the less incentive there is for the European members of NATO to develop the kind of conventional defence methods which are required so that we will not have to use the deterrent in a limited war.

Mr. Lambert: In that connection may I pose a simple question? Would you wish to halt all technological development?

Mr. Pearson: I certainly would not.

Mr. Lambert: I think that would be the only way to stop it.

Mr. Pearson: As I tried to point out yesterday, you have to maintain the deterrent in its most effective form. Whether you can do that and at the same time spend so much of your resources on continental defence is something for the governments to decide. I would not halt the development of the deterrent technologically, but I cannot see any point in adding to the deterrent beyond the strength which is necessary to accomplish its purpose. If in fact 50 hydrogen bombs can destroy a continent, there is not much point in adding 10, 15 or 20 in the future.

The point I am trying to make is that it should be possible, in fact it is essential, for the members of NATO to have the feeling that they can defend themselves in western Europe against what might be a limited attack not meant to result in a world war. It is surely essential that the NATO countries in Europe develop a defence against that kind of attack without the deterrent coming into action in the form of nuclear retaliation. The hon. member himself mentioned that one of our difficulties, indeed one of our dangers, is that we have an elephant gun and may not want to use it to shoot small game but may have to use it because we have not a .22.

So we have to have both. We have to maintain the deterrent, but surely we have to concentrate on the kind of European conventional defence which will be strong enough so the deterrent will not have to be used. This dual purpose is the core of our defence problem in the Atlantic community. My worry is that if we spend so much of our energy and resources—by "we" I mean the North American countries—on one aspect, the deterrent, we may discourage the members of NATO from doing what they should do to make the use of that deterrent unnecessary.

The hon. member said something else with which I most heartily agree, and this was also brought up yesterday. He said that we should develop to the greatest possible extent our air transport and make our forces as mobile as possible. That again has a bearing on what I have been talking about, because if we consider it necessary to use a number of our R.C.A.F. squadrons for continental defence—I think the number is nine now—as part of this giant effort, if we have to spend so much money and so much of our air resources on that phase—as the minister pointed out last night, we are not able to develop our air transport to a point where we can move one brigade by air. Here again it is a balancing of priorities. I suggest again that in the reassessment which I still think the government should give to defence policy they should consider whether the priorities in this matter perhaps should be altered.

Mr. Chairman, the member for Edmonton West and the member for St. Boniface both congratulated the government on the progress that has been made in civil defence organization as indicated in the minister's statement. We will have an opportunity to discuss civil defence, as I said last night, when the estimates of the Department of National Health and Welfare come before the committee. Perhaps I should say a word about this in so far as the Department of National Defence is concerned, since it has already been brought up. I did not read into the minister's statement that evidence of great progress which other members on his side have found.

I am not reading from Hansard but from the mimeographed version which I have marked, on page 28 of this statement he said that an order in council, known as civil defence order, 1959, had been approved by the governor in council and tabled in the House of Commons. Presumably this is the basis for the statement that progress has been made in the association of the Department of National Defence with this problem. I wonder whether much more has been done in connection with this matter through that order in council than putting another minister in charge of part of civil defence.

I should like the minister to inform me whether the assignment given the armed forces under this order in council is very greatly different from those responsibilities which they had before it was passed. Then the minister said also:

> On September 1 the Department of National Defence will assume full responsibility for the operation of the warning system in Canada.

Would the minister inform the committee as to what extent that is a change? What was the situation before September 1? I am of the opinion, and he will correct me if I am wrong, that this only represents a partial change over the previous situation.

Then the minister went on to say:

> The Canadian army has organized a number of mobile support columns within the regular army and the militia. These columns will be based on major units and training establishments in the regular army. In the militia they will be based on groups of units. Each column contains rescue companies and such other elements as will permit them to perform re-entry and rescue tasks, as well as supplying manpower for maintenance of law and order and such other internal operations as may be necessary under conditions of war.

This, of course, is an important survival function, because it will be a question of survival if we are ever confronted with this kind of catastrophe. Does this represent any great change over the situation which existed previously? Is there not an important omission—we will come to this when we discuss the other departments—in the establishment of a relationship between these army support columns and the local authorities? Has the minister anything to say on that, the relationship which must be established between the army and the other authorities, municipal and provincial, in respect to the discharge of these functions and responsibilities?

Then the minister went on to say:

> Requirements for communications equipment for national survival have been established and arrangements for procurement are being made on a priority basis. The requirement for radiation detection equipment has been established. Industry, however, is as yet unable to meet the standards in all cases. Action is being taken on a priority basis to obtain suitable equipment as it becomes available—
> Detailed examination of other items of equipment normally held by the army is being carried out with a view to providing adequate scaling for survival operations for all troops involved.

The requirement for these things may have been established, but I would ask the minister what progress has been made in the provision of equipment in the last year or so. All he had to say in his statement yesterday was that the requirement had been established, but I gather from his own statement that very little progress has been made in the provision of the equipment in question.

Then he also said:

> Army headquarters have prepared and issued training directives and provisional training instructions in all aspects of national survival training.

It is my recollection that this was done some time ago, even before the present government took office. So, while this statement is perhaps encouraging in that it does show there have been some changes made in regard to civil defence, I do not think it represents the kind of progress which should result in the warm congratulations the minister has received from that side of the house.

Mr. Lambert: It is progress in thinking, surely.

Mr. Pearson: We will see what is involved in this thinking when we have a discussion on this matter. I am suggesting one of the things which might not be progress; that we have now three ministers in the government directly concerned with civil defence and that the relationship between those three may constitute a difficulty, that is between the Prime Minister, the Minister of National Health and Welfare and the Minister of National Defence. It may also constitute a difficulty in the relationship between the federal government and municipal and provincial authorities who are certainly directly concerned with this problem. However, as I have said, Mr. Chairman, we will have a more far-reaching debate on this matter when we consider the estimates of the other department.

There is one other question I want to ask the minister, and it concerns the report of the committee on estimates last year on the Department of National Defence. This report, which I thought I had before me, received a good deal of praise because it made recommendations in regard to the Department of National Defence. Yesterday the minister mentioned that one of these recommendations had been implemented in the form in which the department's budget was being presented to parliament this year. I would point out now that there were a great many other recommendations, and I should like him to inform the committee, if he will, to what extent those other recommendations have been carried out or to what extent it is proposed to carry them out in the department.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

[Mr. Pearson.]

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, this might be an opportune time to answer some of the numerous questions which were posed to me during this morning's debate. Various members referred to civil defence, and I should like to thank those who have spoken on this subject. I do not think I need say any more than that the government is taking this matter seriously. We realize that there is likely to be a gap between the time the intercontinental missile is available to a potential enemy and the time an effective defence against the launched missile will be available. Therefore during that interim period we feel that it is necessary to provide all the passive defence that we can provide in order to help our nation survive under the nuclear bombardment should all our efforts to deter the enemy from going to war have failed.

Some progress is being made. As you will recall, earlier this spring the announcement was made that the army would take over greater responsibilities. Since that time an intensive study has been made of the requirements. The organization of the army in Canada has been pressed ahead, and additional training has been given.

Questions were asked with regard to the warning system which will, after September 1, be the responsibility of the army. The army, will have additional personnel they can make available in order to improve the warning system which has been in existence in the past. Additional communication links will be established over and above those which have been set up under the Department of National Health and Welfare and the civil defence organization. It will be necessary to man some of these centres permanently for 24 hours during the day because there exist these possibilities of attack without any warning, and we cannot rely on one system of communication. There will have to be duplicate systems.

A question was asked with regard to the steps which are being taken for liaison between the army commands and the provinces. It will be recalled that the Prime Minister made announcements earlier this year in connection with the arrangements which were being made for the future allocation of duties in the field of civil defence. As I think all hon. members are fully aware, there has been set up here in Ottawa a central authority consisting of a committee of officials, military officers and others to work out all the details. There will be permanent representatives of that committee in provincial capitals for liaison between the different elements of government. The military commanders have already been instructed to establish the closest possible contact with the provincial ministers who are connected with civil defence. Hence I think there is an improvement there which will lead to still better and tighter arrangements.

The next question asked was with regard to limited warfare. I should like to stress the point that we have in Canada three brigades organized into brigade groups, as I said yesterday; one brigade in the Atlantic area, one brigade in central Canada and one in western Canada. They have not only infantry battalions but all the supporting arms including armour. They are regular troops who could be used at any time for any purpose which the government might decide was in the interests of the defence of Canada or the maintenance of our commitments to NATO and the United States.

Reference was made to the question of the mobility of those troops. I pointed out yesterday that we are increasing the facilities of our air transport command. Additional heavy transports are under order. Those are known as the CC-106. We have on order 10 new medium transports. Then I pointed out how the SA-16-B—that is the Albatross—which is to be used primarily for the purpose of search and rescue and mercy operations can on very short notice be used for the transfer of supplies and personnel.

I am not pretending in any way that we have enough military transport to move one brigade to any part of the world at any time, but we do have enough military transport to move a portion of that brigade, perhaps one battalion, not with their full equipment but with adequate equipment, to take part in a peace-preserving mission to which Canada might be asked by the United Nations to make a contribution. If more troops than that were required we would have to do what has been done in the past; that is, either call upon commercial companies to supply the additional transport or call upon our allies to supply the transport required.

It is hardly a requirement for us to have a large number of air transport vehicles standing by for such an emergency. We can call upon the commercial companies, which can make transport available as they have done in the past, if an emergency arises. While we support wholeheartedly the suggestion of a United Nations police force, the contribution of one full brigade from a country the size of Canada would seem to be rather out of proportion to the requirement which might be needed, unless some of the major countries, such as the United States and the United Kingdom, and so forth, were not taking part in such an operation, in which case I think there would be more transport available.

Questions were asked regarding the mobility of the brigade group in Europe. The brigade group in Europe have a definite role; that is, to try to blunt the attack which might take place through western Europe if Russian forces marched, and to channel those advancing columns into areas where they would be vulnerable to attack by air forces. It will be noted that we are strengthening those attack elements of the air forces in France and Germany by re-equipping our air division there.

I am not minimizing the importance of mobility, but at the moment we have not got a universal personnel armoured vehicle. However, money is provided in these estimates for the further development of the Canadian research vehicle which is generally known as the Bobcat, and if the tests which have been carried out and which have been promising and which will be continued this year are up to expectation, then consideration will be given to the equipping of the brigade with this vehicle.

But while the vehicle has been shown—I think some hon. members have already seen the tests, which appear on the surface to be eminently satisfactory—it must be remembered that those tests were not carried out with armour steel. The tests this year are to try out the adaptability of that vehicle when equipped with armour plate. There were some little difficulties found in the construction of the vehicle as it was tried out last year and this spring which have to be rectified before we can embark on full production and decide that it is necessary to equip the brigade with this vehicle.

In order to make up for that seeming loss of mobility—and I say "seeming loss of mobility" because all the units of the brigade are fully equipped with their total complement of vehicles—this spring we sent over some 200 heavy transports in addition to the normal unit transports, and these additional vehicles will be used for the movement of personnel and equipment as and when required. We are also examining very carefully whether there should be an addition to the number of helicopters which are now available to the army. The army has a few helicopters, but one of the difficulties in that respect is to align the requirements of the three services so that we can get one type, or at most two types, of helicopter to meet the varying requirements of the different services. I hope we are making progress in that respect, and there is a limited amount of money provided in these estimates for further research. We are particularly anxious that if we increase the number of helicopters there should be a strong Canadian content in the helicopter which is decided upon.

Questions were asked about ideological warfare. I would like to assure the hon. member that this is not being neglected, and that as far as our regular forces are concerned they do receive instruction in this matter. Perhaps it would be more appropriate to refer to the activities of the defence research board in this respect as being anti-ideological warfare; that is to say, they are concerning themselves with steps which can be taken to make our soldiers immune from attacks by the enemy under this heading. Furthermore, consideration is given to this aspect of training at the various training establishments, commencing at the Royal Military College, staff colleges and so forth. I want to assure the hon. member that we are not entirely neglecting that aspect, which I appreciate is a serious one. Remember that the main effect of attacks under that heading would be directed against the civilian population, and of course that comes under the question of education and is rather out of the field covered by these estimates.

The Leader of the Opposition asked for information as to the steps which are being taken in connection with the implementation of the recommendations of the estimates committee a year ago. The first one related to the policy concerning the CF-105 program, and in the final sentence of their recommendation the committee expressed its concern at the government entering into any such weapon program of this magnitude without first negotiating for some cost-sharing agreement by the NATO member countries and the United States of America under the NORAD agreement.

We have not entered into any more contracts of this nature unless one considers—and it is not of the same magnitude—the re-equipping of the air division; and as has already been stated, the Minister of Defence Production will be able to explain the steps which are being taken in connection with the sharing of production in this respect with our NATO partners. Also, in the development of the air defence of Canada we have entered into a cost sharing and production sharing agreement with the United States.

As to the necessity of maintaining separate provost and padre services and separate medical services, definite progress has been made toward the unification of the medical services and the padre services. As to the provost corps, further steps have been taken to integrate the general services particularly with respect to detention barracks, but it is not considered advisable—and I think I said this last year—that personnel of one service should be apprehended or interfered with on the streets by personnel of a different force.

The next question concerned civil defence. That has been covered. The committee wished to impress upon the government the urgency of a review of the civil defence program, and asked that this should proceed without delay. That has been done and the results have been forthcoming. As to the co-ordination of the service colleges and university training, a director of the R.O.T.P. program has been appointed, and there is a high degree of co-ordination there.

With regard to service personnel generally, establishment committees are carrying out a thorough examination of all personnel who are employed in these various branches and every effort is being made to eliminate any unnecessary overhead.

As far as the recommendation regarding the main estimates is concerned, that is being carried through. As I announced yesterday, the estimates are presented in the blue book. They are developed under different headings, and as soon as we have finished this general debate and passed this first item we will be able to go on to a detailed examination of the various forces, such as the army, the navy, the air force, the defence research board and so forth, following the listing of the parliamentary votes as given in the blue book.

I have answered as many of the questions as I remember. I hope I have covered the subject fully; I do not want to deny information which it is possible for me to give any hon. member. I trust I have covered the points which were raised this morning.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, we are prepared to allow the first item to carry on the minister's assurance that there will be no attempt to limit the discussion on the other items of the defence estimates as we proceed.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I think the item should carry without an undertaking as broad as the one mentioned. I think on the first item of each of the forces' estimates there could be a fairly broad discussion within the realm of the force in question, but to agree that every item should be discussed on a broad general basis would not, I think, be possible.

Mr. Pearson: All we want on this side of the house is an assurance that if the first item carries and we come, say, to the air force, we shall not be restricted to dealing merely with administrative details of the air force, but would be able to talk about air force policy; we should not like the chairman to say we should have done that under item 1.

Mr. Pearkes: That would be agreeable.

Mr. Denis: There is an expropriation which has taken place at la commune St. Antoine de la Baie du Febvre, county of Nicolet-Yamaska. This piece of land has been expropriated for defence purposes, and I wonder if the minister could tell me under what item it comes in order that I may raise a question about it.

Mr. Pearkes: That would come under vote 216.

Item agreed to.

Inspection services—

215. Operation and maintenance, $6,967,225.

Mr. Hellyer: I note this item has been decreased by $120,000. Could the minister tell us the main functions carried out under this vote?

Mr. Pearkes: Inspectors are appointed to every project which is being carried out, be it construction, be it the development of weapons, be it the provision of clothing and equipment or be it vehicles. The Department of National Defence lays down the specifications in all these cases and those specifications are then handed on to the Department of Defence Production who procure, by letting contracts or other means, the articles which are required.

In order to make certain that the articles being produced meet the specifications laid down by the Department of National Defence and the service concerned, inspectors remain on the various projects. The increase is due to the general raise in salaries which has been authorized for civil servants.

An hon. Member: Decrease.

Mr. Pearkes: I beg your pardon. There has been that increase in so far as the salaries of the personnel are concerned, but the overall decrease is due to a reduction in requirements.

Mr. Hellyer: On Wednesday, May 27, 1959 the minister informed me in reply to a question that on May 1 there were 47 defence personnel and 50 civil employees of the Department of National Defence still employed at Avro Aircraft Limited and Orenda Engines. Will the minister tell me to which contracts these people were assigned and whether there has been any reduction in their number since May 1?

Mr. Pearkes: I wonder if the hon. gentleman will reserve that question until we come to the air force. I think I should then be in a better position to deal with it. The air force officer with the papers would be able to give me detailed information. If the hon. member will reserve his question until then I will give him a full answer.

Mr. Hellyer: I will be glad to do that, but I presume the money comes from this vote.

Mr. Pearkes: No, it comes out of the air force vote for that particular service.

Item agreed to.

216. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $563,400.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, I realize that the minister has very many serious problems to consider at this time. However, I should like to speak briefly on a subject which is of a more peaceful nature, and it is in connection with Canada's national war museum. I brought this subject up at the time of the discussion of the estimates of the Department of Public Works and the minister agreed that we should have a new building for the museum but said I would have to bring it up at the time of the discussion of the estimates of the Department of National Defence.

I find that this building is a very popular place for visitors to Ottawa to go and see. There are some priceless pictures and pieces of equipment there from the first war, the second war and also campaigns even beyond that. If we believe it is necessary that we should have a war museum, then I think we would agree that we should have a much better building than the one we have at the present time.

Mr. Pearkes: I shall be very pleased to bring the recommendation to the attention of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, who looks after all museums. The funds for the maintenance of this museum come under the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I shall be pleased to bring the recommendation to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Pickersgill: Who has the jurisdictional responsibility for the war museum now?

Mr. Pearkes: The Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

Mr. Pickersgill: Under what statute? Perhaps the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources can tell us under what statute he has that jurisdiction?

Mr. Pearkes: There is no statute. That is where the administration lies. All museums come under that department.

Mr. Pickersgill: Since what date has that been the case?

Mr. Pearkes: The war museum was transferred in 1957.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, as long as we get the right party in the end that is quite all right, but I might repeat that the Minister of Public Works referred me to the Minister of National Defence. However, the minister has agreed to bring it to the attention of the proper people. All I can say is that I am quite interested in it and I hope that consideration will be given in the very near future to providing either a new building or more space for those weapons and relics of past wars.

Mr. Meunier: Can the minister tell us what was paid for land bought by way of expropriation in the province of Quebec for the needs of the army?

Mr. Pearkes: Would the hon. member bring that matter up under the army estimates, when the representatives of the army are here with their books and will be able to supply the detailed information he requires?

Mr. Denis: I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence under what item we should inquire about the expropriation of land in Nicolet-Yamaska county?

Mr. Pearkes: That is correct; this is the item dealing with that. I did not realize it referred to the same property.

Mr. Denis: We have seen in the papers that this expropriation has been completed by the present government at a certain price. We should like to have some explanation as to the appraisal made during the time of the previous government. What was the municipal estimate or appraisal and what was the price paid for the land. We read in the newspapers that the amount was $400,000. We should like to know if that is the net price or whether interest is included in that amount. How many appraisals were made by the government? I think it was studied in 1951. This piece of land has been expropriated for army testing purposes.

Mr. Pearkes: The land is purchased by the Department of Transport acting as our agent in that respect, and the deal is finalized by the Department of Justice. At the moment I have not the actual amount of money which is allocated for this in the estimates; I am having it looked up. In 1958-59 the sum of $430,000 was made available for the purchase of this land.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. Denis: Was the land called la commune St. Antoine de la Baie du Febvre? Was it a piece of land that nobody could cultivate because it was too poor?

Mr. Pearkes: The first part is right.

Mr. Denis: And it is flooded most of the year?

Mr. Pearkes: It was a piece of property known as a commune.

Mr. Denis: Is the minister in a position to tell the committee what was the municipal appraisal of this commune?

Mr. Pearkes: I could not tell the hon. member what the municipal appraisal was in that respect.

Mr. Denis: From which department can I get this information?

Mr. Pearkes: I will see whether we can get it through the Department of Transport who, as I said earlier, are the agents for purchasing property for the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Denis: I hope there is no misunderstanding between the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Transport. The minister could get in touch with him very easily. I am asking the question because a few weeks ago the hon. member for Papineau asked a question about the piece of land which had been purchased by the present government. We all saw in the newspaper a picture of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, and we wondered whether the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys had anything to do with this expropriation or the handing over of the cheque. We do not know whether it was money that came out of the taxpayers or out of the minister's own pocket. He said he had settled an expropriation matter which had been pending for five or six years, which expropriation the previous government did not settle.

Of course we would like to know what offer was made by the previous government and what is the exact amount which has been paid by the present government. I would like to know, having regard to the previous appraisal, whether the present government paid three or four times the value of this land. Of course you can always settle a matter very quickly when you pay four or five times the value of the property. It is easy to settle any kind of matter; you can do it in a few hours and maybe in a few minutes or even quicker than money can be collected for the Minister of Finance when he asks for a loan if you pay three or four times the value.

I would be very much interested in having a breakdown of this $430,000 which was paid on this expropriation, because I am aware that the exchequer court still exists even while the present government is in power. When the government appraiser does not satisfy the owner the only thing to do is go to the Exchequer Court of Canada and get an appraisal that is binding on the two parties unless the judgment of the court is appealed. I know, for instance, that one piece of land has been expropriated for the very same purpose near the land we have been talking about. This land belonged to an efficient farmer and was cultivated, whereas the other piece of land is almost sterile and of no use because for the biggest part of the year it is flooded and for the balance of the year it is only a place to put cows or sheep. If you had a good horse or a good cow you would not send it there, because there is a mixture of animals and people can only send poor horses or cows there. However, I am told that during the last year nobody wanted to send any cattle there so the land is almost negligible in value as far as the soil is concerned.

I see that we have paid $400,000 for 4,000 acres, which means a price of $100 per acre, yet in the case of 20 other sales in the same area involving good land with barns, sheds and everything else needed for farming, the average price is much below $75 per acre for good, cultivated land. How is it that the new government has paid $100 per acre for a piece of land that is of no use at all for farming? I should like to know if the previous government was as generous as the present one in expropriating such lands.

Mr. Pearkes: I will be very pleased to take up this matter with the Minister of Transport. I appreciate the hon. member's interest, and as the funds come out of the Department of National Defence I am naturally anxious to see that there has been no unnecessary expenditure of money. As soon as I can get in touch with the Minister of Transport I will endeavour to get the information for the hon. member, and I will see that he is fully informed on the matter.

Mr. Denis: Possibly we could suspend this item until we get the information. I have asked only a few questions, but there are many others I should like to ask the minister regarding this item. I know he will be glad to give the information to us.

Mr. Pearkes: I am prepared to let it stand for the time being and I will get the information.

The Deputy Chairman: Is the committee agreeable to letting item 216 stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Item stands.

Royal Canadian Navy—

217. Operation and maintenance, $192,550,000.

Mr. Winch: I should like to say a few words on this item. By way of introduction may I point out that if my information is correct, and I think it is, the only time a shell ever landed on Canadian territory in the last two wars was in British Columbia, when the present Minister of National Defence was G.O.C. of the western command. At that time a Japanese submarine fired at a lighthouse on the British Columbia coast. The shot missed the target, but it did land on the British Columbia coast. I am certain that the then G.O.C. will recall that the only shot ever to land on Canadian soil was from a Japanese submarine which missed its target. I want to mention that because I think it is a most interesting little anecdote and perhaps not too well known.

That leads me to the subject of submarines. In recent days we have read in the newspapers two reports of submarines off the Atlantic coast and also of a submarine off the British Columbia coast. I cannot and will not ask what occurred, but I do know that our maritime defence force in British Columbia went into action to find out if there was a submarine off our coast and why.

This leads me to what I want to say more particularly by way of complementing what I said yesterday. I believe all of us would like to hear more from the minister about the department's policy as to the development of defensive measures against the possibility of missile attack from a submarine source. My knowledge is limited, though I hope it is fairly good, and I believe the minister and his predecessors have been working toward the development of methods to meet what must be considered a major problem, an attack on the Atlantic or Pacific coast of Canada by submarines of an aggressive nation using the missile.

The minister informed us both yesterday and today that there are now two detachments. This means that all ships of the St. Laurent class are now on the British Columbia coast and that all ships of the Restigouche class are on the Atlantic coast. I should like to ask the minister if all ships of the St. Laurent class which he says are now on the British Columbia coast, and those of the Restigouche class which are now on the Atlantic coast, are completely equipped as submarine hunters. If so, are they completely equipped with the most modern equipment, not only to search for submarines but also to counteract a missile when discharged or to possibly alter the course of a missile after it leaves the submarine?

This is important, so long as it does not disclose a security measure, and I should like to know just how well equipped they are. How far does their equipment go? Is it only for detection, or are they able to counteract the missile once it has left the submarine?

I may say, Mr. Chairman, that I am very proud and grateful for this type of development in our naval service. In view of the minister's statement, and in view of the hundreds of millions of dollars that were spent, I should like to know whether or not we might be able to save a few hundred million on other aspects of defence which I think are useless, and add to the naval service which I think can make a real contribution to this country, to North America and NATO.

Mr. Pearkes: I remember the episode to which the hon. gentleman referred when certain shells were fired near Estevan point on the west coast of Vancouver island. This episode is rather vivid in my memory. As a result of that, we are doing all we can to protect the shores of this country, both the Atlantic and the Pacific, from similar attacks. The submarine menace has increased considerably since world war II. The hon. member is quite correct when he says there are some submarines which can, at the present time, fire missiles from their decks. We may expect further development along those lines in the next few years.

As I said yesterday, and I regret that I have to repeat it, because I think it is important, at the present time there is no defence against the missile once it has been launched, whether it be launched from a submarine or from a land pad. We are, therefore, increasing the ability of our naval escorts to hunt out and destroy hostile submarines as far away from our coasts as possible. That may mean hundreds of miles from our coasts. It means that we have to have large ships, larger than the old destroyers of a few years ago. They have to be seaworthy and they have to be able to remain on patrol for days at a time. This is one reason why we are spending the money to get a tanker this year, so as to enable our ships to remain on patrol longer and replenish them while they are there.

The hon. gentleman asked about the equipment. Well, I cannot and should not give details regarding the range or even the number of weapons our ships are carrying. Let me say this without any qualifications at all, that I believe our ships are equipped with the very best type of sonar detection devices that are procurable in any country in the world. I feel it is rather significant that the Royal navy, in the last few months, has made arrangements to buy from Canada some of the sonar equipment we have developed.

These are the means of detection by surface vessels. They are supplemented by similar equipment which is carried on the Argus marine aircraft on the Atlantic coast and the Neptune marine reconnaissance aircraft on the Pacific coast. All our ships are armed with the 43 torpedo, and torpedoes now have a homing warhead and are far more effective than they were at the time of the second world war.

In addition these ships carry batteries either of the Squid or Limbo mortar, which are able to fire mortars and depth charges in a pattern so they may destroy the submarine once it has been found. The problem is to keep our ships afloat as long as possible, and to prevent hostile submarines from coming within range of our shore targets. We have to strike a reasonable balance between the requirements of the navy, the army and the air force. This year roughly 18 per cent of the total expenditure is for the naval service.

Mr. Winch: May I follow that up? I am no expert on these matters but I believe the minister, in his last statement, has brought out the important phase of this problem. He gave the figures for the percentage spent on the navy, the percentage spent on the army and the percentage spent on the air force. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, there is the absolute key as to why we have not a defence policy. It is not a matter of what percentage has been spent for the navy, what percentage has been spent for the air force or the army. For what is the money being spent, not in so far as each of the three services is concerned but in so far as a national defence policy is concerned?

I believe the minister said 18 per cent was being spent on the navy. The fact that 18 per cent is being spent on the navy does not mean a confounded thing. What does mean everything is, what is our defence policy? What is the part the navy plays in it?

Speaking for myself, quite bluntly, I believe that you could save a good deal of money which I think is being wasted now in many expenditures and could perhaps do more on the navy front in the type of ship protection or anti-submarine protection. It is not a matter of percentage; it is a matter of protection. I should like to add this. I have asked the question and I received the answer no. I want to say that in my estimation you could save a great deal of money on many of the expenditures under your defence estimates and could perhaps spend it to a good deal more advantage under this vote for the Royal Canadian Navy on the type of work known as anti-submarine protection, than it is being spent at the present moment.

Mr. Pearson: It seems to me that the minister has been responsible for a masterpiece of understatement when he informed the committee that if in the future there should be a naval attack on Canada it would not be similar to that of the Japanese submarine which fired one shell at a lighthouse and managed to hit the British Columbia coast.

Mr. Winch: It missed it.

Mr. Pearson: Yes; it missed the lighthouse and hit the coast. We know something about the nature and the scale of what a submarine attack would constitute in the future from what we have read about the success of the United States in developing a nuclear powered submarine. The very magnitude of the achievement of the United States in this field and the claims that have been made by the United States for that achievement in respect of this nuclear powered submarine must cause us to worry about the threat to our security from that kind of attack from an unfriendly power. We are indeed terribly vulnerable to attack by sea at the present moment.

The minister mentioned the fact that there was now a submarine from the decks of which missiles could be fired. There is one submarine which I believe can fire nuclear missiles of the Polaris type not from the deck but from well below the surface of the sea. Although I am certainly not an expert in these matters, I suppose that constitutes an entirely new problem in security. I understand that this submarine and other atomic powered submarines can remain submerged for long peroids of time and that it is extremely difficult or perhaps impossible to detect them through the ordinary methods of detection. I know that those methods have improved greatly since world war II. I know that the minister cannot give us the details with regard to that matter, but from the point of view of national security surely it is important to know whether sonar and something called NORAD are reasonably effective in relation to the kind of naval threat to which we are exposed at the present time.

I am informed that that threat has not yet taken the form of atomic submarines possessed by the Soviet union. I know, as does the minister, that the Soviet union has many hundreds—perhaps more than four hundred—of modern ocean-going submarines; and in the course of time, if not at present, they will have a submarine which would be the counterpart of the Nautilus. We are therefore faced with the possibility of a form of attack on this continent and on the continent of Europe which might be more difficult to detect and to counteract than an attack even from the air. I therefore wonder whether our methods of defence or our methods of detection are effective against this kind of threat or whether we are spending our money on a form of naval protection which was certainly effective a few years ago but which may not be effective in terms of present circumstances.

This, of course, is another aspect of the general dilemma that we face. As I ventured to say yesterday, the United States, a great power, cannot afford to take any chances and is obliged to secure every sector of the defence front whereas a country like Canada, which must be more careful in the allocation of its smaller defence expenditures, must give consideration to this matter in a way which is not done by a great power. I therefore ask the minister—and I have no desire to ask him to go into details because I know that would not be proper—whether he can give us a reasonable assurance that these methods of detection and destruction of submarines which I have mentioned are effective enough to warrant the continued expenditure of extremely large sums of money for the construction of ships which would be the vehicles for this detection apparatus.

I was reading—indeed I mentioned it yesterday—the testimony of Admiral Rickover. In emphasizing the character of this particular menace he has said that the best way of destroying the new type of submarine was through another submarine. We are not likely to become involved in that kind of protection and destruction unless we can work out some kind of arrangement on an exchange basis which would make it unnecessary for us to spend the amount of money which is required for that kind of submarine. If in fact that is the way to destroy submarines in the future through other submarines, can we be sure that the money we are now spending on our anti-submarine warfare is being effectively spent?

Mr. Pearkes: I should not like in any way to minimize the problem which has been presented by the Leader of the Opposition. It is a real problem and one which is causing our naval staff the most serious consideration. It is the one problem upon which the Royal Canadian Navy is now concentrating. It is the major role of the Canadian navy to protect our shores against submarines, and for that purpose all their efforts are being devoted to improving the type of equipment, the training and the efficiency of our ships and our aircraft and the crews which man them. We are getting a great deal of co-operation from the Royal Navy and from the navy of the United States in that they make available to us submarines which can be used as targets for our craft to train upon. We are continually carrying out exercises with the Royal Navy, the navy of the United States and other SACLANT powers in the Atlantic, in the Pacific, in the Mediterranean and in the Carribbean and an intensified effort is being made to have our equipment and our personnel brought up to the highest possible state. In addition to that our defence research board has naval anti-submarine stations established, and there is a tremendous effort being made by the defence scientists in order to improve our means of detection.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister give us any indication of what the useful life of our destroyer escorts might be?

Mr. Pearkes: It is usually estimated that 20 years is the life of a naval vessel.

Mr. Hellyer: Twenty years is the normal life of a naval vessel. In view of the rapid development of the trend there seems to be toward submarines and anti-submarine submarines has the minister any estimate of the number of years it will be before these destroyer escorts will become obsolescent as submarine destroyers?

Mr. Pearkes: Of course, the means of detecting and destroying the submarine which are carried on these destroyer escorts can be changed as new inventions and new technological information becomes available. There is no reason at all why it should be considered that the weapons or the means of detection remain static. The ship itself should have a life of approximately 20 years, but even if new means of powering the ship were introduced, it does not mean that the whole ship becomes obsolescent, because those changes can be introduced if necessary.

Mr. Hellyer: Has the minister given active consideration to the possibility of the Canadian navy acquiring anti-submarine submarines at some time in the future?

Mr. Pearkes: I have mentioned in the house, I think, before that we have teams of naval experts and scientists who have been, and still are, investigating the developments which are taking place in submarine construction both in the United Kingdom and in the United States. I am not in a position at the present time to make the statement that we are or are not going to go into the anti-submarine submarine role. We have to gain a great deal more experience before we can venture into such a role. I do not want to be stampeded into doing that just in order that we may have what has been referred to as a prestige weapon. It has not yet been proven that the submarine is the best answer to the submarine, because the range of the weapon carried by the submarine does not reach anything like the same distance as the detection devices on the submarine. Until there is an improvement along those lines it would be unwise for Canada to commit herself one way or the other.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister give the house any approximation of when the British will launch their first atomic powered submarine?

Mr. Pearkes: I cannot give any information about another country. They are not included in these estimates. We are providing no money to assist the British to build submarines.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell the committee how many Wrens we have in the naval service at the present time?

Mr. Pearkes: We have 25 Wren officers and 113 other ranks. There are 55 women in the medical branch, making a total of 80 officers and 113 other rank Wrens.

Mr. Hellyer: Has there been any extension or contraction in the number of trades filled by the Wrens and the nursing sisters?

Mr. Pearkes: There has been no material increase in the number of Wrens over the last few years?

Mr. Hellyer: Not the number of personnel, the number of trades which they fill. I want to know the number of functions.

Mr. Pearkes: There has been no material change.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the minister's statement as to the number of commissioned officers in the Wrens and the number of other ranks. Could he explain why there is such a large proportion of commissioned officers?

Mr. Pearkes: All the medical personnel in the Wrens are commissioned officers. They are nursing sisters, and nursing sisters are commissioned.

Mr. Hellyer: Recently there were some changes announced in the training policy of the Royal Canadian Navy. I wonder if the minister would be good enough to elaborate on the announcement?

Mr. Pearkes: The changes were introduced in order to have a general service in all ranks of the navy. Instead of having certain classified officers, such as an engineer officer, whose opportunities for promotion were very limited, they now all go in on a general list. The same principles apply to the seamen in the navy. It has been under experiment for about six months now and the reports I have received are very favourable.

Mr. Hellyer: Does the navy still operate two basic training schools at Cornwallis and Iberville and if so, will the minister explain the functions of each?

Mr. Pearkes: Iberville is a preliminary training establishment for French-speaking men who wish to join the Royal Canadian Navy. It is located in the city of Quebec, and the idea is to enable lads from the province of Quebec who are not fluent in English to have the opportunity of improving their English before they join general training establishments. The general training establishment for all ranks is Cornwallis in Nova Scotia, and the general technical training school is at Esquimalt in British Columbia.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could I ask the minister if any special efforts are being made to encourage Newfoundlanders to go into the navy?

Mr. Pearkes: I am very happy to say that no special arrangements are necessary because we are getting a splendid entry of Newfoundlanders into the navy. As the hon. gentleman knows, Newfoundland has a very long tradition of naval heroism and service both in the royal navy and now in the Royal Canadian Navy, and we welcome Newfoundlanders into the Royal Canadian Navy most wholeheartedly.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say what naval establishments there are in operation in Newfoundland at the present time?

Mr. Pearkes: There is the station known as Avalon in St. John's and Cabot is the reserve training establishment there. Further refuelling facilities are being provided in St. John's harbour so that it can be regarded as an alternative place in the event of hostilities breaking out and would enable Canadian naval vessels which are on patrol in the northern Atlantic to refuel and replenish their supplies in St. John's harbour.

Mr. Pickersgill: There are no establishments anywhere except in St. John's?

Mr. Pearkes: No Canadian naval establishments. There is, of course, Argentia, the United States base.

Mr. Pearson: I wonder if the minister could explain this increase in travelling and removal expenditures amounting to almost $200,000, the increase in telephone, telegram and other communication services amounting to something over $100,000 and the increase in the cost of publication of departmental reports of about $70,000.

Mr. Pearkes: As far as transportation is concerned, I think that reflects the general increase in all transportation charges. As the hon. gentleman knows, there has been a steady increase in freight rates—passenger service and so forth—going on all the time. The main increase is due to increased freight rates in connection with the movement of naval personnel.

Mr. Hellyer: How many schools are operated for children of naval personnel?

Mr. Pearkes: I could not say offhand. I think there are two schools operated at Esquimalt, about three in the Halifax area and one at Shearwater. I could not say exactly.

Mr. Hellyer: And these only operate in areas where provincial schools are not available?

Mr. Pearkes: That is correct. They operate at stations where it is not possible to send the dependant children to provincial schools. We should prefer to be out of the education business, but it is a service we must provide for our dependants.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister tell the committee what facilities the government has for training technical personnel and where these facilities are located?

Mr. Pearkes: As I mentioned earlier, the technical training program is carried out at Esquimalt and only last year a fine new technical training school was opened in the dockyard there. It is extremely well equipped, and that is where most of the technical training is carried on.

Mr. Hellyer: How many apprentices have enrolled there and what are some of the trades they learn?

Mr. Pearkes: If the hon. gentleman would read the white paper he would find all that information contained on page 37 where the actual numbers trained, and so on, are given.

Mr. Hellyer: I am sorry. I must have overlooked it.

Item agreed to.

218. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment, $94,942,000.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister would give us a breakdown of the major expenditures under this item and the purpose of each major expenditure?

Mr. Pearkes: I have some figures here for major construction at sites. At Halifax, according to this year's estimates, it will amount to some $1,795,000; at Dartmouth, for the naval air station, $2,660,000; at Cornwallis $1,345,000; at Sydney, Nova Scotia, $575,000. There are other smaller expenditures, but at St. John's Newfoundland there is an expenditure of $270,000; on the west coast there is an expenditure of $1,985,000 at Esquimalt, and for the various naval radio stations the sum of $330,000.

Mr. Hellyer: I am sorry that inadvertantly we let item 217 pass without asking about aircraft, and I wonder if the minister would be willing to give us some information as to the type of aircraft doing service in the navy, what the proposed expenditure for the fiscal year is and, finally, what naval air reserve squadrons are still operating, if any.

Mr. Pearkes: The two main types of aircraft are the Banshees and Trackers. Both of these are aircraft which operate from the carrier Bonaventure, but in the case of the Tracker, it does operate from the shore. The Banshees are essentially fighter aircraft with the role of driving off hostile aircraft which might be attacking our own aircraft or even the carrier itself. The Trackers are reconnaissance aircraft to assist the Argus in locating hostile craft. We also have for intercommunication purposes a limited number of helicopters which can be used for transporting personnel from one ship to another. They are capable of landing on our destroyers. I have myself landed on one of the destroyer escorts from a helicopter. They are also invaluable in reconnaissance and anti-submarine work.

Mr. Hellyer: I did not gather which planes are still being delivered or will be delivered during the coming year.

Mr. Pearkes: The delivery of Trackers has not yet been completed and if I remember accurately we have some 100 of these to be delivered; I am sorry that would be the total, with what we have to date. And in this year's estimates it is shown that $21,570,000 is provided for the Tracker aircraft.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister could tell us what the advertising budget was, or would he prefer to deal with it first once for the three services?

Mr. Pearkes: They are broken down between the services. Last year we reduced the amount of advertising by one-third. That advertising is used for recruiting purposes.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister give us the expenditure last year on advertisements placed in other than English or French language papers?

Mr. Pearkes: The hon. member means foreign languages—ethnic group languages—is that the term? I do not think I have that information with me. We do engage in a certain amount of advertising in the languages which are used by people who have not been in this country very long and who might be interested. Advertisements are placed in the different papers by agencies with the general principle of getting the greatest value for the amount of money expended.

Mr. Hellyer: Does that apply to the other services, too?

Mr. Pearkes: That applies to all the services. I believe all the services carry on an advertising program to a limited extent, and some of it is done on a tri-service basis in the papers of the ethnic groups.

Mr. Pearson: There is an amount in this item of $29 million for the procurement of ships. How much of it is in terms of ships themselves? What ships are involved?

Mr. Pearkes: With respect to destroyer escorts, in the original program of 14 ships there is still $8 million provided in this year's estimates for that: in the destroyer escorts' new program, that is the repeat Restigouche, the first of which was laid down in Vickers yards early this year, and the second of which is to be laid down this month, there is the sum of $15 million. That embraces all the preliminary work, plan making and that sort of thing, for those ships. There is $2 million for the tanker to which I have referred already. There is $1 million for mechanical equipment for existing ships and for miscellaneous which includes drawings, gear testings, and so forth, $3,280,000.

Mr. Pearson: The minister mentioned a figure of $2 million for a tanker which was, of course, included in his annual report. I gather the purpose of this expenditure is to construct a tanker so that our anti-submarine vessels can remain for a longer time at sea; but since our naval strength in the Atlantic is so closely integrated with that of the United States under NATO command, would it not have been possible to accomplish the same purpose by the utilization of United States tanker strength—and there must be a very considerable amount of that—which could have been made available to Canadian naval vessels without going to the expense of building a naval tanker of our own at a cost of $2 million.

Mr. Pearkes: Under the general nature of the plans these ships on the Atlantic, as the hon. gentleman knows, come under the operational command of SACLANT in the event of hostilities breaking out. First, each nation provides its own logistic support. It is quite possible, in the event of hostilities breaking out, there might be a pooling of the support.

The plan of program at the present time is that each nation should supply its own logistic support.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, in May, I think it was, I asked a question with reference to the sale by the Department of National Defence of a parcel of land for the purpose of building a shopping centre. The minister replied that it had been sold without tenders being called. The reference may be found in Hansard of May 6, 1959. The minister told us that 4.8 acres had been sold for $8,500. In reply to a later question of mine he informed the house that tenders were not called. The answer further said that the reason for this most unusual way of doing business was that a contract had been let with the purchaser for the construction of a shopping centre according to the specifications set by the Department of National Defence. I wonder whether the minister will explain the details of this transaction, what the specifications for the shopping centre are and the present state of the project?

Mr. Pearkes: The answer that I gave on the occasion that the hon. gentleman referred to was that in September, 1958 the company came forward with a proposal to erect a shopping centre on this particular parcel of land, and that was after many years, or some considerable time, of endeavours to try and get a shopping centre built in this area for the convenience of the personnel there.

Mr. Hellyer: I know the minister does not want to be unfair. Previous efforts had been made to have a shopping centre built on leased land.

Mr. Pearkes: That is right. Efforts had been made by the previous government and every effort had been made to provide this facility but without success, I am afraid. This was the first opportunity which looked promising and since there had not been anybody else coming forward to offer to build this structure, the arrangements were made with this particular company and sale was recommended of the land on the understanding that it would be used solely for the development of a shopping centre for the benefit of the naval personnel in that area.

Mr. Hellyer: What is the state of the development at the present time?

Mr. Pearkes: I am afraid the progress has not been very satisfactory and I do not think the actual building is started even now.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the minister aware that the company to which it was sold has filed notice of bankruptcy?

Mr. Pearkes: I have been so informed.

Mr. Hellyer: Has the land been deeded to that company by the Minister of National Defence or is title still held by the crown?

Mr. Pearkes: I am informed that the crown is fully protected in this case.

Mr. Hellyer: If the crown is protected, it still has title to the land and it will be able to make some other arrangement for the construction of a shopping centre on that site.

Mr. Pearkes: We hope to review the whole situation and hope that it will be possible yet to make arrangements for the construction of a shopping centre on that site because it is urgently needed.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister care to inquire into the situation and give us a report as soon as he can as to the present state of affairs and as to how soon those arrangements can be made to let someone else undertake the project if they are willing to do so?

Mr. Pearkes: I am afraid I have no more information other than what I have given the hon. gentleman. We will keep this matter under very careful advisement and I hope that a satisfactory solution will be reached in the not too distant future. Beyond that I cannot go.

Item agreed to.

Canadian army—

219. Operation and maintenance, $357,913,000.

Mr. Winch: On this item having to do with operation and maintenance of the Canadian army, I should like to say first of all perhaps I made a mistake when I said the government has no defence policy. They must have some policy or they would not have this estimate. Perhaps I should change what I said and say that Canada has no defence.

As I said yesterday, I was most interested in the remarks of the Minister of National Defence on the introduction of his estimates. I was perhaps more interested in the answers he gave last night to the questions raised by the Leader of the Opposition, myself and others. Because of his answers I believe we are entitled to ask the Minister of National Defence under this vote—not only entitled to ask but we should ask—what is the defence of Canada as far as the armed services are concerned?

From everything we heard yesterday and today from the Minister of National Defence our defence is that we are not going to face a war between 1960 and 1965. We are going to spend hundreds of millions and billions of dollars on all forms of offensive and defensive weapons, but everything that the government is now planning and doing is based upon production in 1961, 1962 and 1965. What the situation will be then we do not know. If we go back over the last few years we know that we have always faced the threat of war. I am going to be quite honest. If war is going to come there will not be six months, one year or five years notice of a war.

What intrigues me under this vote is the mobility of our Canadian army. Two years ago in an emergency the mobility of the Canadian forces was such that the R.C.A.F. could not move 133 militia personnel from St. John's to Petawawa. They could not do it in an emergency. What was the emergency? The men would not go on a certain type of plane and because they would not go on a certain type of plane the R.C.A.F. could not move these 133 men from St. John's to Petawawa as equipment was not available.

I think I heard the minister correctly last night and I think I have read what he said correctly. Dealing with the active armed forces in Canada, he said that we could not move one battalion with all its equipment in an emergency. What is a battalion? A battalion consists of not more than 1,000 men. So after $1½ billion and $2 billion a year over the years having been spent by this government and the previous government, right now in 1959 the Minister of National Defence says that in this day of possible spark war and fast moving emergency we cannot move one battalion with its equipment by air. We cannot move a battalion of 1,000 men.

Again, if I heard the minister correctly and read what he said correctly the minister said last night in reply to the Leader of the Opposition that it would take a long time and over $300 million before we would be able to make a brigade immediately mobile in Canada. With all the money, all the hundreds of millions and billions of dollars that have been spent by the Canadian taxpayers, do you, sir, understand why I now direct a question to the Minister of National Defence when he stands up in the House of Commons and says that not until the end of this year or until the beginning of 1960 can we even move a battalion of 1,000 men in Canada, with their equipment, and that not even consideration has been given to the possibility of moving a brigade?

Yes, Mr. Chairman, the minister can look up because I heard what he said last night and as I could not believe his statement I read it again this morning in Hansard. He said that it will be the end of this year before the R.C.A.F. will be able to move a battalion with its equipment. Am I wrong? No. For what have we been spending these hundreds of millions and billions of dollars when we will not be able before the end of this year or the beginning of next to move 1,000 men of the armed forces with their equipment?

Mr. Pearkes: I wonder whether the hon. gentleman would give me the page from which he is quoting?

Mr. Winch: I do not have it right in front of me at the moment. I will produce it. I know it is there. The minister said a battalion and a battalion is 1,000 men. A battalion is 1,000 men, is it not? The minister also made a statement about the cost of moving a brigade with all its equipment.

But the most important thing to me at least is the matter of a Canadian mobile force available to the United Nations as a police force. I want to say to the Minister of National Defence that I was most disappointed, in fact almost heartbroken, with what he had to say last night in that there has been no request made for Canada to do this. How long would it take Canada to answer a request if it ever came? The answer there is clear. The only time a request was ever made to Canada was when a speech was made about the Middle East situation by the man who is now the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition at the time he was secretary of state for external affairs, and for which he got the Nobel prize.

What happened then? On the request being made to Canada, Canada made an immediate answer but how fast could we get the police force into the Middle East? With all the hundreds of millions of dollars that have been spent, do you know what we had to do in order to be able to send a battalion into the Middle East? We could not move them by air; we could not move them by ship. We had to spend thousands of dollars to dismantle an aircraft carrier and convert it into a troop ship to get this force to the Middle East. This took six weeks; that is right, and you all know it.

This was an example of our efficiency. This was an example of our preparation for an emergency. We had to take the Magnificent—I think that was the name of the ship—strip it and convert our only aircraft carrier into a troop ship. It took us six weeks to answer a request of the United Nations to send a force to the Middle East. Then, of course, we had to re-equip the aircraft carrier, that is convert it from a troop carrier to an aircraft carrier and then return it to the country from which we borrowed it.

This is a matter of record. What is our position now, as outlined by the minister? I should like to say to the Minister of National Defence that the greatest contribution Canada could make would be not to wait until the United Nations has to call upon us as a result of a local war, and then be delayed because we have no air transport, until we have to change an aircraft carrier; our job I feel is to have a force, equipped and mobile, that can answer immediately an appeal by the United Nations. I have no hesitation at all in saying that from the record of Canada and from the statement concerning the condition of our armed forces and their mobility as given by the Minister of National Defence, there should be a transfer of hundreds of millions of dollars, which is proposed to be spent on something that cannot be of any assistance to Canada at all, to something that would make the Canadian military forces completely mobile and completely equipped. They would then be able to answer immediately a call from the United Nations and be in a position to make a contribution to a world police force in order to maintain world peace.

Mr. Pearkes: I should like to have the opportunity of referring the hon. gentleman to page 5392 of Hansard from which he will see quite clearly that I made no such statement that we could not move a battalion. I was referring to a brigade, and a brigade is somewhere around 5,500 troops, while a battalion is less than 1,000 troops. It is a question of being able to lift a battalion, with all their equipment at one time.

Mr. Winch: That is what I said, a battalion with all its equipment.

Mr. Pearkes: As soon as the new aircraft are delivered, and that should be this year, we should be able to move without any difficulty a whole battalion with its equipment at one airlift.

Mr. Winch: I am sorry to interrupt but I said that you said until we get that equipment we could not move a battalion with all its equipment. We cannot now move a battalion with all its equipment with our present air force.

Mr. Pearkes: I think it might be of some interest to the hon. gentleman, since he was talking about the Middle East, to give some idea—

Mr. Winch: Am I correct in my statement? I said we could not move a whole battalion with all its equipment.

Mr. Pearkes: Does the hon. member mind if I finish this statement? In order to give him some idea of the amount of transportation which is carried out in that area by transport command I would say that last year transport command flew, outbound from Canada to Egypt, 1,645 passengers and cargo amounting to 469,769 pounds. In addition to that there is continual transport going on of personnel and material between Canada and Langar in the United Kingdom and to our forces in Europe. Most of the personnel from our forces in Europe, who are single men, are transported in the aircraft of transport command. There is a like movement of personnel and material across Canada, to say nothing of the airlift of supplies to NATO and to the Arctic which is carried out by transport command.

All these aircraft could be made available in an emergency in order to move a specified force to any part of the world. We have not got, and I am not pretending to say we have, enough transport in the R.C.A.F. to be able to move a brigade although we could now, if we cancelled other operations, move a battalion. I pointed out, as mentioned in the white paper, how we are increasing transport command because I have recognized the desirability of having additional transport to supplement the Dakotas and North Stars that we have. We are getting these new 106's, which are heavy transports; the new 109 medium transport and the new Albatross SA-16B, and that is going to materially improve our ability for transporting troops.

When an emergency arises you have to take emergency measures. A few years ago when a sudden emergency came upon the government of the day a decision was made to use this ship of the Royal Canadian Navy to transport personnel to the Near East. This was an emergency move. There were not the ordinary transport vessels available at the time and probably the most economical way of loading these troops was to send them via the aircraft carrier because they could put on the decks of the aircraft carrier the vehicles they needed.

Mr. Winch: This is getting somewhat ridiculous and I hope I am not the one to make it worse. We have been listening now for two days to the story of the Minister of National Defence about the potentialities of a new war, about how it will strike without notice, how we are obliged to rely on our D.E.W. line and how it is only a worry of the United States. But if this war is going to come just like that—and I snap my fingers—without notice and nobody knows when it may come, whether tomorrow or ten years from now; and in view of the fact that the minister himself is saying that is the reason he is asking for all these hundreds of millions of dollars, just how much sense does he think he makes in what he has just now said? If it occurs tomorrow, Mr. Chairman, he could not move one thousand men with their equipment from Ottawa to Vancouver or from Vancouver to Ottawa. Am I right or wrong?

Mr. Pearkes: You are wrong.

Mr. Winch: He could not move one thousand men immediately.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, it is ridiculous for the hon. gentleman to be making statements like that—

Mr. Winch: It is not.

Mr. Pearkes: —which I am obliged to deny all the time because they are completely inaccurate.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I could read exactly what the minister said as reported at page 5392 of Hansard of yesterday. He said:

> We should be able to move one battalion, with its equipment, in the very near future.

I presume that means that we cannot move one battalion with its equipment now.

Mr. Winch: That is exactly what I said.

Mr. Pearkes: To any place in the world, although those words are not in there. We can move them from here to Vancouver and we can move them by calling upon aircraft to move those troops. Is it not sensible to encourage commerical aircraft to carry on with their ordinary work? There is no need to have a large number of transport planes tied up when there are commercial planes available in the event of an emergency.

Mr. Winch: The minister does not deny the words he used to the effect that he hoped to be able in the near future to move a battalion. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. Hellyer: According to the figures I have here, no funds at all are allotted for tanks and armoured fighting vehicles. Can the minister give us any indication as to when new armoured equipment might be required for our troops overseas or at home?

Mr. Pearkes: There is no requirement for any new heavy armoured vehicles for overseas at the present time. A brigade group with its armoured components is equipped with Centurion tanks and with the Ferret armoured cars. I do not know of any more suitable weapons than those for the type of work that they are carrying on.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I believe a most important point has been raised in view of the quotation from Hansard by the Leader of the Opposition and the answer of the Minister of National Defence in which for the first time he said that the plan for moving is tied in with the acquisition of commercial aircraft in order to be able to move troops in an emergency. This is the first time I have heard this phase raised. Will the minister now—and I think it is a matter of the utmost importance—tell us what is the direct arrangement or what is the tie-in between his department, the army, the air force and all commercial airlines whereby in an emergency they can be called in for the transportation of troops and equipment? The minister just made it clear now that he is in the position that he hopes to be able to move a battalion. But now we hope we will do it by the use and co-operation of commercial airlines. What now is the tie-in between the army, the navy and the commercial airlines so that in an emergency they immediately come under the army or the R.C.A.F.?

Mr. Pearkes: The hon. gentleman suggests that for the first time arrangements are being made for commercial transport to move personnel and supplies of the armed forces; but that is not correct. During the Korean war C.P.A. were moving them continually—

Mr. Winch: I mean in an emergency.

Mr. Pearkes: —and also during the construction of the D.E.W. line; and in the supplying each year of the northern stations commercial planes are used. We can make agreements any time with the commercial companies to hire planes or charter them or, if necessary, we could requisition them. As far as the air force transport command is concerned, we have two squadrons of what are known as the Flying Boxcars which take heavy equipment and are able to carry out a great deal of supply work; and there is a tremendous amount of supply work going on for our northern stations.

In addition to that, we have the long range North Star aircraft carrying out every week flights from Canada to Europe in order to supply the personnel that are there. We have those facilities. At any time in the case of an emergency civilian aircraft could be brought in if we did not have enough of our own transport. But in addition to all of that, we are augmenting our transport command this year by the type of aircraft that I have mentioned half a dozen times during this debate. The first of those new aircraft will be available this year, in which case we will be able to move a complete battalion, with all its equipment, without interfering with any of the other services. We could move them today if we were prepared to suspend some of the other operations which we are normally carrying out and we would suspend those operations in an emergency if we had to make every R.C.A.F. plane available.

Mr. Winch: Then I was correct. You cannot yet move a complete battalion on your own without any suspension of other operations.

Mr. Pearkes: I just said that we can move a whole battalion if we suspended other normal operations which consist in the movement of personnel overseas and the replenishing of the brigade which is now in Europe and the air division which is there. Those are normal operations which go on. But we have not—and I do not think we should have —a large number of aircraft standing by just in the eventuality that the United Nations might find themselves suddenly plunged into some situation demanding that Canada send a brigade somewhere in the world. It is a contingency which is not likely to develop overnight.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I have a report from the Ottawa Journal to the effect that the parliamentary secretary presumptive to the Minister of Finance has criticized the government for granting Major General Plow nine months' leave with pay so that he could qualify for a higher army pension and become lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia. Is the hon. minister aware of this pension being granted to Major General Plow, and has he any comment to make, because after all it is a criticism coming from a member who is pretty close to the government. He was last year and I suppose he will be next year.

Mr. Pearkes: The position of lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia became vacant last year, I think it was, and the gentleman who was selected to become the new lieutenant governor, and I might say it was a very popular selection, was Major General Plow, who was at that time in command of the Atlantic area and who was very well known in Nova Scotia. He was granted permission to retire from the army before he had reached the normal retirement age to assume his important position as lieutenant governor of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Denis: Was this pension granted to the major general according to the rules and regulations and the ordinary pension benefits of the armed services? Second, if this criticism by the former parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance means he does not approve of the granting of the pension, are his chances to be again nominated as parliamentary assistant reduced or increased?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Perhaps the hon. gentleman would like to read the text of the committee report and not the press report.

Mr. Denis: It is worse. If you read it it is worse.

Mr. Pearkes: I understand the Auditor General did make some comments in connection with this point.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister give us some information as to the mechanical and armament equipment which is included in the appropriation?

Mr. Pearkes: Is this item 220?

Mr. Hellyer: No, 219.

Mr. Pearkes: This covers mechanically propelled vehicles, mobile engineering equipment, warehouse material, handling equipment and spare parts and accessories for all components of the Canadian army. The estimates for epuipment under this item are based on the anticipated deliveries of various items, such as trucks, buses, station wagons, vehicle kits, mechanically-propelled equipment and requirements for the northwest highway system which the army has to maintain. In most cases expenditures in 1959-60 will be largely in respect to contracts carried forward from previous years.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if I could ask the minister if he would tell us if there is any proposal to do any paving of the northwest highway?

Mr. Pearkes: That will come under the other vote, but I can answer the question now. The first 50 miles are being paved and work will be completed this year. It was started a year ago and runs from Dawson Creek up to Fort St. John. The contract has been let for another 35 miles to be paved this year, and I expect the work will be completed next year. That will cover the heavily travelled part of the highway where there is a fairly heavy population of farmers and people connected with the oil wells in that district. It was considered desirable to pave this highway in order to reduce maintenance costs. In addition to that we have made arrangements with the province of British Columbia that when this highway is paved they will take over the responsibility for maintaining it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The cost of the paving is being borne entirely by the federal government?

Mr. Pearkes: The cost of the paving is being borne by the Department of National Defence, because it was considered essential to do it in order to keep down the ever-increasing cost of maintaining a gravel road.

Mr. Pickersgill: But it will become to all intents and purposes a part of the provincial highway system once this is done?

Mr. Pearkes: The province of British Columbia will take over that portion of the highway which is paved.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does the minister consider this a good bargain from the federal standpoint?

Mr. Pearkes: I certainly do, because the maintenance cost is pretty high on that part of the route.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think the decision was made by the previous government.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, on this item I would like to say a few words about the militia. I noticed yesterday when the minister was giving his introductory speech that he mentioned that the reserves and the cadets would cost $53.6 million. I notice in looking at the estimates that as far as the militia is concerned the vote is about $16,600,000. If that is correct, that is just better than 1 per cent of the total expenditure on defence, which I think is very little indeed.

Mr. Pearkes: May I explain that now? That refers to the pay and allowances. Transportation of the militia, maintenance of their buildings and maintenance of their clothing all comes under the general administration of the army. Where it is shown separately as a militia vote it covers pay and allowances only.

Mr. Herridge: I thank the minister for his explanation; I could not reconcile the two figures. I would just like to say that our militia in Canada, in which I have taken considerable interest throughout the years, as many other Canadians have, is our citizen army composed of people willing to give their time and services, people who are carrying on their every day occupations. I know of a good number of people in the district which I have the honour to represent who have given their time and services throughout the years in serving in the militia, I think in many cases without sufficient recognition from those in charge of the regular army, and with very little recognition in many cases on the part of a great many of our people. Personally I consider this a very important part of our defence services.

I would say that the first duty would be home defence. I understand now it will be extended to include a considerable portion of civil defence, and I am sure the reserve army may be used in emergencies and disasters of other types. I think a good many people fail to realize the important part that our militia plays in the defence forces of Canada, and I am just rising to say that I think we should recognize that fact more generally than we do. I know some people who have carried on throughout the years in face of apparently very little official support and a somewhat looking-down-the-nose attitude on the part of regular army senior officials. At least, that is the impression I have had on a number of occasions.

These people do provide a corps of trained and disciplined local people which could be used for the purposes I have mentioned and as such they are an essential part of our defence force. In my opinion, their services should receive greater consideration. I have been impressed throughout the years by the loyalty of these people who have been asked to carry on a most uninteresting form of training program. I know that in my own district for some years we had anti-aircraft batteries. I do not think the guns were even complete; I think the breach blocks are missing. Just imagine asking young men to come two nights a week to study the operations of a gun which they never fire and which was, I am told, incomplete, and to go through this procedure week after week in addition to a certain amount of other minimum training.

I am very pleased to note that in our district this situation has changed. I understand that the regiment there has light artillery, if I am correctly informed, and that the training syllabus has improved. But I suggest that consideration should be given to making the training course more interesting to the local people, both officers and other ranks, who are interested in serving in the militia. In the district I represent the local officers commanding have done something on their own initiative to correct the situation by carrying out some experimental summer manoeuvers; some trips into the mountains, some reconnaissance work, and activities of that sort. I found, after talking to some of the young men who had taken part in these manoeuvers that they appreciated what had been done and showed considerable increased interest. Also, since this change in the type of militia training has taken place there had been an increase in the number of enlistments, and that flows naturally from providing a more interesting training program in which young people can participate.

I do urge that greater support should be given to the militia, and greater recognition of the services which they have performed. I think the syllabus should provide for an increased number of outdoor manoeuvers. In my opinion the local militia should have a thorough knowledge of the geography of the district in which they reside and for some considerable distance around. I believe that some 50 years ago when the Rocky Mountain Rangers were training, the training syllabus was on that basis. They went on marches in the forest, they did some rough and ready bridge construction, blazed trails through the forest and things of that sort. I suggest that the training syllabus could be made much more interesting by the incorporation of more outdoor manoeuvers enabling people to get to know the geography of the country well, its valleys, mountains, unexplored areas, and so on.

I suggest, also, that there should be more physical training in the program; interesting physical training, not just forming fours in a squad inside an armoury. And I further recommend that a great deal more could be done with respect to map and compass reading, which is a very useful study for any young man and one very necessary to travellers in a country such as ours. I make these few suggestions as a result of a continuing interest in and observation of the activities of the militia units in our district for a number of years. My dad belonged to the Rocky Mountain Rangers.

My final point is this: is the local unit now a successor to the original 54th Kootenay Battalion which was an outgrowth of the Rocky Mountain Rangers? I think it is very worth while to perpetuate the names of the units which have served this country so well overseas. With these few remarks, coming from an amateur and a backwoodsmen and a peasant farmer, I ask the minister, in all sincerity, to be good enough to look into this question about the 54th Kootenay Battalion.

Mr. Pearkes: I should like to extend my thanks, first of all, to the hon. gentleman for his remarks and for his continued interest in the militia. And I should like to extend these thanks beyond the hon. member who has just spoken to the very large number of members in this house who do take a keen interest in their own militia units. I believe in those units maintaining their territorial and local connections and the traditions of the units which have preceded them in each particular area. We are making a practice of passing on the battle honours which have been gained by their predecessors operating perhaps under a different name and perhaps with different equipment but, nevertheless, units drawn from a distinct area with all the proud traditions of people who have served in that area before.

Mr. Hellyer: I, too, should like to pay tribute to the wonderful work which has been done by the militia throughout the years. As you know, Toronto has been the bulwark of many of the most famous and most illustrious regiments of this great land. Just this week we had a ceremony in front of the exhibition grounds in that city in which the 48th Highlanders of Canada trooped the colour resplendant in their scarlet uniforms, putting on a show which was magnificent and outstanding in every respect. I think they deserve the honour of a tribute from all who had the pleasure of witnessing both their parades at home and of being grateful for their services overseas during two world wars. Like other Toronto units, they have distinguished themselves on the field of battle and won for themselves many battle honours.

I think it would be unfortunate if this great reserve stream of potential strength were to be diluted or materially diminished. We have been proud of the fact that during two world wars these units provided the nucleus of officers and men around which our armies grew to the proportions necessary to ensure victory, and although it is true that in the concept of modern nuclear warfare it would be impossible to get them battle-trained and ready, as troops must be, to participate from the outset it is not beyond possibility that they could be used again in an encounter of a limited or local nature. Indeed, the suggestion has been made that the militia in this country could be strengthened and trained to a point where, in the light of the air portability which the minister told us he intended to provide, they could be transported anywhere in the world at very short notice. This prospect would give them incentive and encouragement to carry on and I hope the minister will do everything in his power to encourage a continuation of the wonderful contributions they have made throughout the years.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall this item carry?

Some hon. Members: Five o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: It being five o'clock, pursuant to standing order 15 I do now leave the chair.

PRIVATE BILLS

Mr. John B. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether we might take private bills and then, I believe, we probably could obtain the consent of the whole house to forgo the rest of the private members' hour and return to the discussion of the estimates.

Mr. Speaker: Shall we dispose of one private bill and then get the will of the house on the other matter?

(Translation):

DESJARDINS MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY

Mr. Noel Dorion (Bellechasse) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-29 to incorporate the Desjardins Life Insurance Company.

He said: The essential purpose of this bill is to grant a federal charter to a company already registered under the provincial laws of Quebec and to give it the name of L'Assurance-Vie Desjardins or Desjardins Mutual Life Assurance Company. That is the object and the purpose of the legislation before us, as clearly implied in section 10.

Of course, this being a private bill, its second reading would not necessarily mean that the house would approve its principle; it would simply allow us to refer this legislation to the standing committee on banking and commerce where hon. members may obtain from the sponsors and their solicitors any information required to enlighten them and to help them form an opinion on the scope and effect of the bill. This rule, Mr. Speaker, will dispense me with going into all the details and making a long speech.

I would however fail in my duty if I were to leave it at that and not take this opportunity of saying a few words about the eminently beneficial work carried out by this mutual company whose wish it has been to include in its designation the very name of its founder, Mr. Alphonse Desjardins.

Mr. Desjardins who, from 1892 to 1917, was editor of Debates at the Quebec Legislature, and then, from 1917 to 1921, parliamentary reporter in this very house, was a pioneer of the co-operative movement in Quebec and in Canada as a whole.

It was following a debate on an act directed against usury that he conceived the idea of taking practical steps to fight the ravages of usury by developing a system of "caisses populaires" (credit unions).

In a most fascinating small pamphlet, which is a sort of tribute to the vision which characterized Desjardins, the hon. Senator Vaillancourt, his successor and one of the sponsors of this bill, writes in detail about the singularly difficult start of that institution which, today, extends its benefits not only to the territory of Quebec, but also to many places in Ontario, New Brunswick, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and New York state.

In brief, what Mr. Desjardins wanted, what he tried to promote and what he obtained by his forceful courage and perseverance, was to develop in his associates a spirit of mutual help by applying the co-operative formula, the only one by which it is possible to fight efficiently against the danger of monopolies and powerful financial interests. He thus succeeded, by the organic bonds of a co-operative institution, in developing popular thrift and to organize it so as to satisfy the people's need for credit. Indeed, the "caisse populaire" (credit union) has been defined as an association of people who save money in a spirit of mutual trust for the purpose of enjoying personal credit at low cost.

To this institution were gradually added various services designed to ensure the security of mutualists and their families, and this led in 1948 to the founding, through a statute of the province of Quebec, of the Desjardins Life Insurance Company, of which the proposed company is to be nothing more than an extension. This new company will enable it to extend protection not only to mutualist members of credit unions in the provinces where the provincial company can legally operate, but also to those of other provinces where a federal charter is required to carry out insurance operations.

Mr. Speaker, this concludes my rather awkward summary of the background, purpose and effect of the bill now before the house. In approving this bill, my hon. colleagues will not only be rendering a service to the community, but will also be working for the good of Canada. There could be no better conclusion to my remarks than this quotation from a speech delivered at Quebec in 1908, by Mr. Desjardins himself, in which he emphasized the educational value of his works:

> You want to help your fellow man? I can only commend you for it. I think in promoting the virtue of thrift, in favouring its expansion, in setting up new institutions to channel the savings and make them profit, and at the same time in fighting improvidence, extravagance, luxury and perhaps intemperance, as well as many other costly habits which absorb a frightful proportion of our daily earnings, indeed in fighting usury, you can be of tremendous help to your fellow beings, and who knows, you may be helping yourselves.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house to forgo the remainder of this hour and return to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to unanimous agreement the house will now assume the business which was interrupted at five o'clock.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Canadian army—

219. Operation and maintenance, $357,913,000.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister whether in the organization of the army there is any provision made or any expenditures of any kind allocated for a possible expeditionary force?

Mr. Pearkes: No, Mr. Chairman, there is no special allocation of funds for what one might call an expeditionary force in the usual meaning of that term. We do, I think, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, maintain one battalion in a higher state of readiness than others so that it might be able to meet any emergency which might develop.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I know that. I was wondering whether there was any provision made, and I am not suggesting that there should be; I think it would be a waste of money to provide for a division or a corps organization overseas.

Mr. Pearkes: None at all. We do not picture that as being a likely type of employment of the Canadian armed forces.

Mr. Hellyer: With reference to the militia, I wonder whether the minister can tell us what relation the changes proposed this year have to the Kennedy report, and whether he still maintains the opinion which he held a couple of years ago with respect to the Kennedy report and its implementation?

Mr. Pearkes: Which Kennedy report is the hon. member referring to?

Mr. Pickersgill: General Howard Kennedy.

Mr. Pearkes: The one which dealt with the re-organization of the militia three or four years ago? That has been reviewed and some of the recommendations have been implemented. As to others, changed conditions have altered the requirements which were then advanced in the report.

Mr. Nielsen: May I ask the minister one or two questions concerning the northwest highway system? First, it is my understanding that responsibility for the highway now rests with the Department of National Defence through international agreement with the United States. I am wondering whether, if and when the highway is transferred to British Columbia upon completion of the paving, the transfer will be subject to the terms of the agreement with the United States.

The second question concerns my fear that once the road becomes the property of British Columbia it may be that it will become subject also to any tolls and taxes which may be levied on other provincial roads. This, of course, is very important to those engaged in mining operations in the Yukon, particularly marginal operations, and should such tolls be imposed it may very well mean the difference between a marginal mine coming into production or closing down.

The third question I wish to ask the minister concerns continuing responsibility for the maintenance and operation of the northwest highway system. Is it the intention of the government to leave this responsibility with the Department of National Defence rather than transferring it to any other government department or agency?

The fourth question concerns the installations of the Department of National Defence in the city of Whitehorse. As the minister is fully aware, there is a rapidly growing problem in the city in finding adequate space for enlarging residential and commercial construction. A large part of the city of Whitehorse is, of course, taken up by national defence installations and the sooner the army finds an alternative acceptable to themselves the sooner the city of Whitehorse will have this land available which is very necessary to orderly expansion and proper town planning. Can the minister indicate what the future plans of the department are in this connection?

Mr. Pearkes: In answer to the first question, the international agreement will be maintained. Consideration will be given to the hon. gentleman's remarks regarding tolls and when the agreement is drawn up with the British Columbia government that matter will receive consideration. It is the intention of the government at least for the present to leave the administration of the highway system in the hands of the Department of National Defence. With regard to the installations at Whitehorse, a review is now taking place with respect to a reorganization of the administration and of the buildings which are required in order to meet modern conditions, which have changed so much in the last few years. I hope that it will be possible within the next few months to complete the reorganization of the administration of this system and to firm up plans for the accommodation which is required.

Mr. Nielsen: I thank the minister for his answers to my questions. May I conclude by saying that I would not want to leave the impression that the residents of Whitehorse do not wish to continue to see the army there. We are very grateful for the addition they have made to the economy of Whitehorse. I am sure there is alternative available land close by which would be eminently suitable. I hope that these alternatives will be considered in the reorganization of the administration of which the minister speaks.

Mr. Winch: On the same question may I say that I honestly believe that the Alaska highway should be part of the British Columbia highway system and I think that eventually it will be. I do not think I need to add this word of warning but nevertheless I should like to do so. If there should be any consideration of turning the Alaska highway over to the British Columbia highway system, and I hope that will eventually come, and if the same government is in power that we have today, then for heaven's sake do not close your eyes because if you do there will be a toll on the highway.

Mr. Pickersgill: Can the minister tell the committee in a very summary fashion what army establishments there are in the province of Newfoundland, where they are situated and what accommodation they have?

Mr. Pearkes: The main army installation in Newfoundland is at St. John's which is the headquarters for the area. For the moment I have forgotten the name of the park in which it is located. I am sure the hon. gentleman can remember. That is the headquarters of the Newfoundland area. The Newfoundland area embraces the whole of the province of Newfoundland and is a subordinate command to the Atlantic command stationed in Halifax.

There are a number of militia units in Newfoundland of which, of course, the Royal Newfoundland Regiment is the historic regiment of the province. It has various companies stationed in the different centres of Newfoundland where they are provided with such accommodation as may be readily available. There are also a few artillery batteries, a field regiment and some engineers in the province. I think that is a general description of the situation.

Mr. Pickersgill: I am interested in a little more than a general description of the accommodation. Can the minister tell me precisely in what places in Newfoundland the army has accommodation and what the general nature of the accommodation is in each of those places?

Mr. Pearkes: I will get that very shortly.

Mr. Nielsen: I rise simply to disagree with the hon. member for Vancouver East when he suggests that the Alaska highway should logically become part of the highway system of British Columbia. We in the Yukon like to think that eventually we will achieve provincial status and we anticipate that at that time we will be fully capable of looking after the road ourselves, although that may be many years in the future. Until that time I feel that the responsibility should remain with the federal government as it is now.

Mr. Winch: I thought you were going to join British Columbia.

Mr. Nielsen: Never.

Mr. Winch: Perhaps we ought to join the Yukon.

Mr. Pearson: A few weeks ago the minister favoured the external affairs committee of the other place with his views on some aspects of defence policy. He must have been affected by the serenity that prevails there because I thought that his views were extraordinarily optimistic. I would ask him to comment for our benefit on this statement, found in the Globe and Mail of May 29:

> —NATO members have a moral responsibility to live up to their commitments unless they are freed by the other members.

We have accepted certain military commitments, certain army commitments as well as air force commitments, to NATO. I wonder whether the minister means by that statement that the only way, in his view, in which we could alter this commitment would be by a decision of the NATO council, because while I am not disputing the validity of that view—if a collective security system is going to work, it has to be collective enough that decisions cannot be normally permitted if they interfere with the collective action which is required—certainly all other members of NATO have not displayed that high standard of collective responsibility and respect for national commitments which the minister suggests in this report should be shown by Canada. I wonder if he would like to comment upon it because it is an important matter in case we wish to modify our commitments under NATO in the future so that we could take on other commitments in the collective interest besides NATO, perhaps on this continent?

Mr. Pearkes: As the Leader of the Opposition well knows, the discussions at the various meetings of the NATO council are carried out in camera and the press is not present. The council of the group of ministers issues a press release at the conclusion of these meetings. I think the best answer I can give him is to quote from the release which was made in April of this year. I am only quoting part of it:

> The ministers—

Here, that refers to the ministers of defence of the NATO countries.

—heard full and valuable reports by the military committee, the standing group and the supreme allied commanders on the present state of the forces of the alliance, on the progressive introduction of the most modern weapons and equipment and on the forces needed for NATO defence in the years ahead. They also heard progress reports on projects initiated by the heads of government in December. On the basis of those reports, a most useful discussion took place between the ministers and the NATO military authorities.

Then, they went on to say that they confirmed their support of the basic NATO strategy for the preservation of peace and for the defence of member countries. This defensive strategy continues to be founded on the concept of a strong deterrent comprising the shield, with its conventional and nuclear elements, and the nuclear retaliatory forces. In other words, the requirements that the military commanders felt were necessary were explained to the ministers of defence, and these general proposals were confirmed by the meeting of the heads of government previously. Now, having these general proposals and general requirements confirmed by the heads of government, it seems to me it would not be quite honourable for a country to alter those agreed requirements without informing the other members of the alliance.

This is what I meant in the remarks that I made to the committee of the other place. I had no script, and I cannot remember exactly the words that I used. I did not quote, as I have quoted here, but I thought there might be a question on this subject so I had this final press release brought down this afternoon.

Mr. Pearson: I am glad to have the minister's explanation of this particular report which goes considerably further than he has gone today in his considered statement of the nature of our obligations as a NATO member in respect of the commitment we have accepted. The statement in the press which I have just read says that there must be agreement before a national commitment can be altered. The minister has now said that it would not be honourable, and I agree with him, to alter a commitment of this kind without informing the other members of the council, presumably so that there could be a discussion. As a matter of fact, this is how it has been done in the case of the United Kingdom when they wished to alter the commitment which they had accepted. There was a discussion in the appropriate NATO organ, but that is not the procedure that has always been adopted in all cases in NATO.

However, the minister is also reported as having said in this meeting in the other place that any Russian attack in Europe could be forced to pause by the NATO shield forces which would use tactical nuclear weapons. I should like to ask him this question, whether he feels that our brigade group equipment in Europe is of a type now which would permit us to play our part in that operation, if it ever had to be undertaken? I am thinking particularly of the Lacrosse surface-to-surface missile of which the minister has spoken and which he says is shortly to be made available to the brigade. Has there been any progress in actually making that missile, which I believe can be used conventionally or in a nuclear way, available to the troops, and is there any other equipment which is required by the brigade to carry out this undertaking which is not now available to the brigade?

Mr. Pearkes: There is money provided in the estimates for the initial procurement of this Lacrosse weapon. It is still undergoing tests, and it is expected that these will have been completed by this September. Our position in connection with the requirements of this Lacrosse is unchanged. We believe it will materially strengthen the powers of resistance of the brigade which is now in Europe.

As other more advanced equipment becomes available I hope we shall take advantage of that and we intend to keep that brigade fully equipped and operational. I have referred already this afternoon to the tests which are being carried out in connection with the personnel carrier, which would be armoured, and I hope that those prove successful.

Mr. Pearson: When the minister says that any Russian attack in Europe could be forced to pause by the NATO shield forces, which would use tactical nuclear weapons, he is referring, I take it, to such weapons in the hands, not of the Canadian brigade at the present time but other components of the shield forces, particularly the United States?

Mr. Pearkes: That is correct; we have no nuclear weapons at the present time.

Mr. Hellyer: Is there any additional equipment which the minister feels the brigade group should have within the next one, two or three years in order to make it more effective in its NATO shield role?

Mr. Pearkes: The brigade is well equipped. If there is any new equipment developed, I hope we will be in a position to acquire it and to place it at the disposal of the brigade. I cannot think at the moment of any equipment which is readily available today which the brigade needs in order to carry out its role, and which it has not got at the present time.

Mr. Pearson: Can the minister tell the committee whether there are non-Canadian personnel on the strength of the brigade group in Germany? If so, roughly what proportion of the total strength would be represented by them?

Mr. Pearkes: As to being on the strength of the brigade group, may I say that there are some liaison officers attached to the brigade group. They are very few in number. Would the Leader of the Opposition be referring to civilian personnel who are employed? There are a number of German civilians employed and there might be a few men who have enlisted into the Canadian forces and who have not Canadian citizenship. No doubt he will remember that some Dutch bandsmen were engaged on certain special terms a few years ago. There might be some of those.

Mr. Pearson: Yes, Mr. Chairman, that is what I was thinking of. I read a report the other day which surprised me because it showed that a relatively high percentage of the United States NATO forces in Germany were non-Americans, were Germans. I wondered whether there were many German civilians on duty working with the brigade group and how many Germans had been enlisted into the Canadian brigade group who are not now Canadian citizens.

Mr. Pearkes: I do not think we are enlisting any men of German nationality into the brigade in Germany, nor do we send over with the brigade any Germans who have not become Canadian citizens. I do not think there are very many, if any, who are non-Canadian citizens other than those who have been specially enlisted as bandsmen.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it not true that there are a considerable number of immigrants—I do not know how large the number is—who have enlisted in the Canadian army here in Canada, who have not yet become Canadian citizens and who have been dispatched overseas in the ordinary course of their service? As the minister will probably recall, when he was in the opposition and I was still a member of the government I sponsored certain amendments to the Citizenship Act to make special provision for cases of persons of that sort counting their service overseas as a residence in Canada for the purpose of getting citizenship. While most of those amendments related to the wives of servicemen acquired while they were over there, there was also provision for what I am told were not actually isolated cases but a certain number of cases of immigrants to Canada who had enlisted in the forces and who had in fact gone overseas.

Mr. Pearkes: Those are the type to which I have been referring. They consist mainly of a few bandsmen who have been enlisted. There are some immigrants to Canada who have enlisted here in the services and have perhaps returned to Europe with their units but they would not include—and care has been exercised that they do not include—any immigrants or any enlisted men of German nationality.

Mr. Pickersgill: But there might well be persons of other European nationality?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes; of course there are very few.

Mr. Pickersgill: And perhaps there are British subjects who are not Canadian citizens.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall vote 219 carry?

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the minister as yet obtained the information he was going to give me? I have one or two questions I wish to base on it.

Mr. Pearkes: About what?

Mr. Pickersgill: About the accommodations in Newfoundland.

Mr. Pearkes: That information has not come over from national defence headquarters as yet. We shall have to check on the matter. I shall be pleased to give it to my hon. friend.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps I could ask one or two questions now. It might perhaps facilitate matters.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister will recall that when we were still in office property was acquired in Newfoundland in St. John's on which an armoury was to be built. Has any further progress been made in respect of this armoury? As the minister will realize, ten years and more have now elapsed since Newfoundland became a province of Canada. There has never been an armoury in what is now one of the larger cities of Canada. I cannot imagine that there is any other provincial capital that does not have an armoury. It seems to me that this is something that might reasonably be done even though perhaps, by a strict counting of heads, a stronger case might conceivably be made for some other place.

I know I discussed this matter with the minister's predecessor shortly before he ceased to occupy the position now occupied by the minister and I, not for the first time, pressed this argument fairly strongly upon him. He acquired the land and he gave me every reason to hope that if the public had favoured us a little bit more in 1957 the armoury would have been started by this time. I hope the minister—whose party were quite successful in the city of St. John's as he will recall—has been receiving similar representations from his colleague in the cabinet from Newfoundland, and that his colleague will be successful in giving quarters to the Newfoundland regiment which I am sure the minister thinks they have every right to have.

Then it has been drawn to my attention that facilities ought to be provided by the department in Gander for the militia. Gander is not precisely in my constituency. It is five miles away. It is in the constituency of my friend the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador who intended to make this appeal himself. However, he understood that we were not going to be on the estimates between five o'clock and six o'clock and he is carrying out another engagement at the moment. In making this appeal with respect to Gander I am speaking on his behalf even more than on my own, although in my constituency there are people who would be interested in having these facilities provided in Gander.

As the minister knows, Gander is a growing community. It is a community in which, by the nature of its population, it seems to me it would be a great encouragement if something of this sort could be provided. I observe that my friend the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo has just taken his seat in the chamber. I am sure he would say something in support of this appeal because I know he has some knowledge of the need for good accommodation for the militia in Newfoundland, both at St. John's and at Gander.

Mr. Pearkes: I have visited both the units referred to in St. John's and in Gander. I regret to say that in the estimates this year there is no item for an armoury at either place. At St. John's they train in the area in a drill hall there and have other accommodation provided which, while it may not be considered ideal, is adequate for the moment. In Gander they are occupying temporary quarters provided, I think, by the Department of Transport.

Mr. Carter: May I ask the minister this question? Has land not already been acquired in St. John's for an armoury?

Mr. Pearkes: I believe land has been acquired in St. John's but in this year's estimates there is no provision for the construction of the building.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to say just a word on that matter. The minister will, of course, have been in the house from time to time when we have had discussions about the state of employment and he will undoubtedly be aware of the rather markedly heavier incidence of unemployment in the Atlantic provinces—particularly in the province of Newfoundland—than in other parts of the country. I was hoping that perhaps the minister might get a certain amount of sympathy from some of his colleagues if he took this aspect of things into account as well as the purely military aspect in relation particularly to the situation in St. John's and Gander.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I would like to add my words of support to what my colleague from Bonavista-Twillingate has said respecting the need for an armoury at St. John's. We have the Newfoundland regiment, which is a very proud regiment with a very old tradition, and it does not have proper accommodation for its requirements. Newfoundland is the only province in Canada, I believe, which has not been provided with an armoury and proper facilities.

With respect to the employment picture, I have just looked at one of our latest papers in the reading room and there was an article to the effect that we still have 40,000 people out of work. Approximately 10 per cent of our population is still out of work, and here we are well advanced into 1959. That points to the need for a works program particularly during the winter months, and I do hope the minister will be able to persuade his colleagues that this would be a very worthy project to undertake this winter.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, there was one other question I forgot to put with regard to Newfoundland. Could the minister say whether there are any army establishments in any part of Labrador?

Mr. Pearkes: I do not think there are any army establishments owned by the Department of National Defence there, but there may be some rented buildings.

Mr. Pickersgill: The R.C.A.F. is the only part of the forces at Goose Bay?

Mr. Pearkes: That is correct.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister tell us if the Toronto University avenue armouries, the long time and proud home of the great Toronto regiments and units, has been disposed of?

Mr. Pearkes: Arrangements have been made with the city of Toronto for those armouries to be vacated by December, 1960. Other armouries will be constructed to accommodate the units, the idea being to move those units from the central part of Toronto and to disperse them into the suburbs and residential areas of Toronto so that they will be available for recruiting purposes, training purposes and also more likely to be out of a target area and therefore more conveniently situated in the event of its being necessary for those units to carry out survival operations.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell us what the terms of the sale were?

Mr. Pearkes: I think the price was $2 million.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister could say if just one new armoury will be constructed, or does he plan to build more than one?

Mr. Pearkes: It is intended to have more than one medium sized armoury.

Mr. McGee: I wonder if the minister could tell the committee if any final decision has been reached as to the location of the proposed armoury in the Scarborough area?

Mr. Pearkes: A property for the armoury in North York has been expropriated and an option has been obtained for another site in Toronto. Efforts are being made to find a suitable site in Scarborough.

Mr. Hellyer: I understand from what the minister said that the sale of the University avenue armoury was an outright sale and did not include, as was the proposal of the previous government, the transfer to the Department of National Defence by the metropolitan corporation of the sites necessary for the new armouries?

Mr. Pearkes: The agreement, as far as I can remember, was an outright sale and the city of Toronto has been co-operating in every way to help us acquire the other sites.

Mr. Hellyer: Are these proposed new armouries the standard variety, or are they larger than the standard variety?

Mr. Pearkes: There are several standard sizes of armouries. These will be armouries to accommodate two major units, and there is a standard armoury for that type of requirement.

Mr. Hellyer: How many units are there in Toronto altogether?

Mr. Pearkes: I could not tell you how many units there are in Toronto altogether because there are quite a number of comparatively small units of a technical nature.

Mr. Hellyer: Is it the intention that a number of units will use the same armouries? That is to say, more than two?

Mr. Pearkes: The idea is that two major units will utilize the new armouries. Each new armoury, that is. It may be necessary to have some small unit attached to one of the major units.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. Hellyer: I think the minister realizes that there are considerably more units in Toronto than would be accommodated by this proposal. Is it the intention that the messes will be joint messes for all units using the particular armoury, or will the units have their own messes as they do at present?

Mr. Pearkes: I think the standard plans provide for one general mess room which can be used by any unit using the armoury, with anterooms for each particular unit.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister could tell us how the army installations at Gagetown are coming along, whether they are complete yet, or what units remain to be built there?

Mr. Pearkes: I think the installations for the units are very nearly complete. There is still work to be done on the married quarters. There is not a full accommodation for the married personnel.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister say what is the position with regard to the rest of the townsite? What units are installed there and what remains to be done?

Mr. Pearkes: There are no units in the actual townsite. That is purely for dependants and civilian personnel. There are no units outside of the camp area.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister could tell us whether an armouries has been provided for at Kitchener?

Mr. Pearkes: No there is no provision for an armoury in Kitchener in these estimates. I am afraid we have got comparatively little money available for the construction of new armouries anywhere in Canada. We have to work from a strict priority list.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister tell us what new units, including those for married personnel, have been built at Petawawa in the last year, and what are contemplated in the forthcoming year?

Mr. Pearkes: I think the only new unit which has been stationed in Petawawa was a new armoured unit which is known as the Fort Garry Horse.

Mr. Hellyer: That is not quite what I meant, Mr. Chairman. In addition to the Fort Garry Horse, what other units are stationed there, and perhaps the minister could answer the other question in regard to building construction?

Mr. Pearkes: I think if the hon. gentleman refers again to the white paper he will find the major units which are stationed at Petawawa camp. I have not a copy of the white paper here but I am quite certain it is included there.

Mr. Pearkes: All that information is given on page 35 of the white paper.

Item agreed to.

220. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment, $90,940,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: On this vote I should like to ask the minister what construction, if any, the army is carrying on in the province of Newfoundland, or proposes to carry on in the present fiscal year.

Mr. Pearkes: I am advised that there is no major armoury construction planned this year for Newfoundland.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is there any minor construction planned this year?

Mr. Pearkes: There is some minor repair and maintenance work in order to keep the existing buildings in a state of repair.

Mr. Pickersgill: I take it the minister does not yet have in his possession the list of buildings for which I asked on the previous item.

Mr. Pearkes: It has not yet come over.

Mr. Herridge: As the minister knows, there is a modern and very satisfactory armoury at Trail and an old one at Nelson which, with certain additions could, in my opinion and that of others, be made very suitable for further use. I do, however, wish to bring to the attention of the minister something which has become a standing joke in the city of Nelson. I think that in the last ten years some 15 engineer officers or architects of the department have visited Nelson, in each case spending two or three days in the hotel, supposed to be investigating the possibility of extending the armoury, or renovating it or improving it. But I think that in all that time about $5,000 has been spent on putting in a new roof. I am bringing this to the attention of the minister because I hope he will look into this matter which has become the subject of caustic comment by local people with regard to the efficiency of the Department of National Defence. These officers and architects spend two or three days in a hotel there periodically; but nothing ever seems to happen as a result of their visits.

Several prominent citizens in the city with whom I have spoken have brought up this question, and I promised to direct it to the attention of the minister because we think this state of affairs should be stopped. I am given to understand that at very little expenditure an addition to the south side of the present armoury could be made, with the result that the building would be suitable and usable for a number of years to come. I might add that this unit has carried on in the face of great difficulties in previous years and—I am speaking carefully—in the face of even less recognition than is usual. This is presenting a problem to the local officer commanding and to the other officers and men and I should like the minister to look into this question to see what can be done to improve and extend the building there. I imagine that a modest expenditure would be enough to provide satisfactory quarters for the men who have been carrying on throughout the years.

Mr. Pearkes: I shall be very pleased to look into that matter.

Now with regard to the acquisition of a rifle range in Newfoundland there is a figure here of $1,500.

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the minister could tell the committee what the total expenditure in the Atlantic provinces will be or what it is expected to be this year and what the comparable figure was for last year.

Mr. Pearkes: I have not that information readily available. I will get it, and let the hon. member know.

Mr. Hellyer: The increase in this vote, from $45,745,000 last year to $90,940,000 this year is a very sizeable one, almost 100 per cent, so I think the minister might be good enough to give us a list of all the major projects and what their purpose is in each case.

Mr. Pearkes: In Calgary, the expenditure is $3,271,000; in Edmonton, $1,895,000 and at Wainwright, $422,000. Those are the expenditures in Alberta. In British Columbia, at Chilliwack, there is an expenditure of $1,886,000; in Vancouver, $90,000; in Victoria, $290,000. In Manitoba there is an expenditure at Shilo, which is a military training command, of $1,611,000; and at Winnipeg, $110,000. At camp Gagetown the expenditure amounted to $2,970,000. Expenditure in Nova Scotia is $361,000; in Barriefield, Ontario, $2,630,000; at camp Borden, $4,320,000; at Cobourg, the ordnance depot, $965,000.

Other places in which there is considerable expenditure include Kingston with $2,421,000 in connection with the Barriefield camp, a tri-service hospital and extensions to the Royal Military College; in Ottawa, $2,200,000 mainly for the new tri-service hospital here, and Petawawa, $8,350,000, which covers new quarters for dependants. In Montreal there is a small expenditure of $160,000; at Val Cartier, $3,353,000, and in Saskatoon, $300,000.

These are main items. Outside of these there is the northwest highway system, with a total amount of $1,465,000, the reasons for which I referred to earlier.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee met at 8 p.m.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I think we should have a little information in regard to these expenditures for construction. There is a large amount of $3 million at Calgary. What is it for?

Mr. Pearkes: With reference to these votes, I might just add that the increase is very largely due to the fact that the special account from which $49,871,000 was provided in the 1958-59 estimates was, as the hon. gentleman knows, liquidated last year and therefore any amount spent on army equipment is included there.

With regard to the questions asked concerning the armouries in Newfoundland, there are army-owned armouries at Corner Brook, which is a militia armoury on a parcel of land of 1.36 acres. At Grand Falls there is another militia armoury on 1.2 acres of leased land and at St. John's the department owns 10½ acres of land which is being purchased for a possible site for an armoury. At Buckmaster's field the accommodation used by the militia and by the regular army is in a portion of the camp and the whole camp is naval property. At St. John's there are three buildings owned by the Department of Justice and now lent to the Department of National Defence for TMQ's and a manning depot at Kenna's hill; also, in St. John's at 431 Water street there is a Department of Public Works building which is used as a recruiting office. The army leases at St. John's Memorial University lecture rooms for the officers' training corps there and on Bell island St. Kevin's hall, which provides accommodation for the militia. The total amount of money which is being spent under these items in the Atlantic provinces, which is what the hon. member asker for, is $3,345,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is, in the current estimates?

Mr. Pearkes: That is in the current estimates.

Mr. Pickersgill: I asked the minister what the comparable figure was for last year?

Mr. Pearkes: The comparable figure for last year was $8 million.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. Pickersgill: I asked the minister about Gander? In that list I did not notice that there was any accommodation of any kind at Gander.

Mr. Pearkes: I understand that accommodation is being used for their training there which belongs either to the Department of Transport or to the old R.C.A.F. station there.

With regard to Calgary, the items there are, at Sarcee camp, development of a tank hangar, REME workshops; these were made necessary in order to provide accommodation for the armoured unit at Sarcee camp where the new barracks was started some years ago and is now nearing completion. Paving there is standard, drill hall, combined officers' mess and quarters for the miniature range and some 200 married quarters. These are the main items as far as Calgary is concerned, with the exception of a sergeants' mess and lecture training building at Currie.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister give us the same information with reference to camp Borden and camp Petawawa.

Mr. Pearkes: At camp Borden there is a 40-vehicle garage, command medical equipment depot, 26-vehicle garage for the royal Canadian army medical school. There is a 500-man mess building for the army service corps school. There are officers' quarters for the R.C.A.M.C. school and officers' quarters for the R.C.A.S. school which is there. Another big item is junior ranks club and their lecture and training building and the sergeants' mess for the school of infantry.

Mr. Hellyer: This is all in camp Borden?

Mr. Pearkes: Those are the main items. In addition there is a 160 married quarters. Those are for camp Borden. Do you want Petawawa as well?

Mr. Hellyer: Yes.

Mr. Pearkes: At Petawawa there is development of roads and sewers; central medical and dental equipment depot. This is an important building in which the storage of general supplies in the event of emergency are retained. A lot of that is civil defence equipment. There is a small garage. Those are the main ones which are included in this year's items. There are some more. A big one is a sewerage treatment plant, which is necessary there, running into $1,300,000. That is all provided for in these estimates.

Mr. Granger: I would like to express the hope to the minister that at Gander he would find it possible to include in his estimates a sum to cover the construction of an armoury, or a drill hall, which is badly needed there, and which would serve a useful purpose I am sure.

Mr. Pearkes: I will take that under advisement and look into it personally and see what can be done.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just one further question; I have looked at the figure. The figure covers the acquisition of major equipment as well as buildings, works and lands. The total figure is nearly $91 million. I think the minister gave a figure for the four Atlantic provinces of something under $3 million. The minister will recall that at the time of the 1957 election the candidates supporting the present government made great representations in the Atlantic provinces about how large a diversion of expenditures they were going to make to the Atlantic provinces, and I wondered if I heard aright that of the $90 million only $3 million is being spent in the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, but there is a considerable amount being spent for the other services, the navy and the air force. I am afraid that this time the army in the Atlantic provinces is not getting as much as it did last year but I think you will find that on balance the Atlantic provinces are getting a very fair share of the construction.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister can tell us, since I was not bright enough to think of the question, how much the navy is spending in Newfoundland.

Mr. Pearkes: I am afraid that the books have been taken away but I will look that up and let the hon. member know privately.

Mr. Pickersgill: That will be quite satisfactory.

Mr. McFarlane: Mr. Chairman, I see that we are spending approximately $90 million for construction throughout the Dominion of Canada. I should like to make a plea this evening for the construction of armouries especially in our smaller centres. Two years ago we were advised that the construction of an armoury at Kimberley, British Columbia, had been approved in principle early in 1956. In spite of the publicity given at that time, funds were never made available nor has a vote been approved by treasury board. To all intents and purposes this item was dropped. No allocation of money was made by the previous government either in 1956 or in the April budget of 1957.

We are spending many millions in the larger centres of Canada and forgetting that the backbone of the country lies in our smaller centres. We had with us at this morning's session representation from the navy, and a good many of these boys come from the smaller centres of Canada. I think we should do something to encourage both the army and the navy boys in their work. Savings in travelling expenses alone could be diverted to writing off the cost of construction of armouries in the various smaller centres of Canada.

Therefore I should like to ask the minister again to give some consideration to the construction of an armoury in Kimberley. We have in the unit there a very active group of men. At the present time they have inadequate hall space which is rented periodically to carry out a program of training. I should like to read an extract from a letter to indicate what they are up against in this area. It reads as follows:

> As for us in Kimberley, we continue to struggle along trying to run a unit of approximately 100 men in the rented lower half of the Oddfellows hall. We continue to hire half of a civilian garage to house our vehicles, and rent rooms in the adjoining public school for training space on parade nights. The total bill to the public for all this is, I know, much more than would be the case in a more efficient plant. We do our best but the training suffers and the administrative headaches are too numerous to mention.

Administration alone has become really a problem in itself. At the present time this unit has very little in the way of facilities and equipment to carry on its work. It has been suggested that the unit should travel a distance of 40 miles in order to carry out a parade two nights a week. I think that during the cold winter months a good many men are going to forego parade if they have to travel that distance, especially over icy roads.

We depend on the trained units of our country to take over in time of need. I think we should encourage these smaller units to continue and in my opinion the only way we can do so is by building armouries in our smaller centres. Of the $90 million expenditure this year I think, speaking specifically of the cost with respect to Kimberley, that we would require approximately $200,000 to $250,000, which is a very small percentage of the entire vote. I also think that we should decentralize our forces. At the present time the bulk of our spending is being done in the larger centres of Canada, and I think it is very essential to support these units in the smaller urban and rural areas.

I would respectfully request the minister to reconsider the present policy and to support the active units with adequate facilities, particularly in the interior of British Columbia where they are badly needed.

Mr. Pearkes: I thank the hon. member for bringing the needs of Kimberley to my attention. At lot of armouries are required across the country and we have to put them on a strict priority basis having in mind our other requirements. I would call his attention to the fact that there is not $90 million allocated for this purpose. The amount for the construction of buildings and works is only $49,950,000. The balance is for the purchase of various equipment.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): I should like to ask the minister what is the thinking of himself and his advisers at the present time in connection with the armouries and defence headquarters in Ottawa? There are so many stories from time to time in the newspapers as to the location of the defence headquarters that I should think that by this time the minister, who is very aggressive, would have something to say. He might indicate to me whether land has been purchased, if it has been decided where the headquarters will be and also whether it is planned to provide Ottawa with a suitable armoury. I am sure that the new members of the house have seen the location of our armouries on Cartier square and realize that they are hardly suitable for the capital and must be moved somewhere else in the near future. I would invite the minister to bring us up to date on this subject.

Mr. Pearkes: With respect to a new building for national defence headquarters, there is no money provided for that purpose in these estimates.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Or for land?

Mr. Pearkes: We will continue to make use of the present building. As far as an armoury is concerned, there are a number of rented buildings as well as the main armoury on Cartier square, and I have to inform the hon. member that there are other places even more badly off than Ottawa for want of armouries.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Would the minister inform me if any land has been purchased for the headquarters yet?

Mr. Pearkes: No, no land has been purchased for headquarters.

Mr. Henderson: I should like to draw the minister's attention to the fact that we need an armoury badly at Dawson Creek. I have mentioned this before. The boys drill down in the cellar of an old school. We have a very good corps there. I have brought this matter to the minister's attention before and I bring it to his attention again tonight and ask him to give it some consideration.

Mr. Pearkes: In order to cut the debate short on this particular subject, may I thank practically every member in the house for having at some time or another during this session brought the needs of his militia unit in respect of new armouries to my attention.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Inspection services—

216. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $563,400.

Mr. Pearkes: The hon. member for St. Denis asked for information regarding certain land at Nicolet. I am informed that the commune at Nicolet consisted of 3,497 arpents and was purchased by the Department of Transport for $400,000 under authority of treasury board dated July 28, 1958. The value of the land was determined by specialists employed by the Department of Transport, and the negotiations were carried out by that department. There are no funds allocated in these estimates for the purchase of that land as the deal was concluded and funds provided in last year's estimates.

Mr. Denis: Can the minister inform me as to the amount of the municipal assessment on this land?

Mr. Pearkes: I am afraid I would not have that because, as I said earlier, the Department of Transport acts as agent in purchasing all land. I hate to have to say it, but I am afraid the hon. member will have to ask the Minister of Transport that question. I suggest that he put the question in the order paper, and then he will be able to get an answer.

Mr. Denis: There is something unusual in that answer given by the minister because the estimates of the Department of Transport have been passed. This expenditure belongs to the Department of National Defence, to which minister we are talking. It becomes almost impossible for us to get the information we require. It is a very important question and involves a large amount of money, nearly half a million dollars. We should like to know how it is that an additional appraisal was made by this government when the previous government had already appraised the land and had made an offer which was far less than the amount paid by this government.

I am not saying this new government was extravagant. I know we have been accused in the past of being extravagant, but there is a big margin of difference between what the previous government offered for this land and what this government paid for it. We should like to know why it was necessary to have this land appraised again. I should like to know how much was paid for this new appraisal. I should like to know if the new appraisal was made by an independent person, as happened a little while ago. We should like to know how much the government paid for this appraisal because if the owners were not satisfied with the offer made by the previous government they could, as is the usual practice, go to the exchequer court.

As a matter of fact, I have in my hand a report of an investigation made by a corporation which, I suggest, was hired by the department in connection with other pieces of land in Nicolet-Yamaska, and the owner, not being satisfied with the appraisal, went to the exchequer court. This is the usual way in which to appeal from a decision of the government. I am making this observation about this item because a few weeks ago in this house we had a minister of the crown who was very pleased to inform the country that an expropriation proceeding which had lasted for years had been settled quickly by the present government. However, this matter was settled quickly by the present government by means of a large increase in the amount the taxpayers had to pay.

The Minister of National Defence is telling me that all the information I require can be obtained from the Minister of Transport whose estimates have been passed. What other means is left to the opposition for getting this information? I am not suggesting that there is anything wrong in the price paid, but I should like to know when it was paid. It might have been paid in January or February, but I want to know because the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys said that it was only by accident that he was there and was photographed holding the cheque. It appeared as though he was paying the money from his own pocket. If the money was sent out nearly a month before, I would come to the conclusion that this accident was purely accidental! I wonder how this accident happened 10 days or 15 days later, if this amount of money was in Nicolet-Yamaska before.

As the minister knows, this expropriation matter concerns 265 owners. I know personally that during the last electoral campaign the Conservatives told these owners they would get much more for them; they would be as generous as could be, as they usually say, if they were returned to power. We might look at the results from two polls in this area. In poll No. 43 the minister received 85 votes, while our candidate got only 12. In poll No. 44 the minister received 181 votes, while our candidate had only 23. No wonder the present government was so generous after the election. At least there is one commitment made which was kept by the present government, but it was a commitment which resulted, in my humble opinion, in the taxpayers being detrimentally affected.

Of course, I can talk as long as I like because the minister has told me he does not know anything about it. I should like some minister in this house to give me this information because the matter is very important to this committee. I should like to know what the amount of the municipal assessment was because, according to the report of a case in the exchequer court, the municipal assessment represents about one-third of the real value of the property.

The Deputy Chairman: Order; I think perhaps the hon. member is discussing a matter that was in last year's estimates, if I am following him correctly. If that is the case, I think it would be a matter for the public accounts committee.

Mr. Pickersgill: On the point of order you have raised, Mr. Chairman, I may say I was going to raise a point of order when my hon. friend finished because we are discussing the estimates of the Minister of National Defence and surely it is a very unusual doctrine to be told the minister cannot explain things; that we have to go to some other minister who merely acted as his agent in spending the money for which this minister is the trustee and is responsible to this committee. I suggest it is the duty of the minister to give us this information and not tell the hon. member he has to go to some other minister for it, in whose estimates the item does not appear.

In so far as the question of whether or not this was in last year's estimates, I have never heard it suggested before that we could not compare the expenditures of one year with those of another. Indeed, they are put in the blue book in that way, one year compared with another. If I recall what the hon. member for St. Denis said, this famous presentation of the cheque, this accidental presentation of the cheque by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys took place in the month of April, so it would appear that, unless the cheque was held back for a while, this payment was made in this fiscal year. Therefore even on the narrow ground which Your Honour has raised I submit that my hon. friend is in order.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sure that we ought to be able to allow the hon. member to make a comparison with other estimates; that is quite true; but we cannot debate other estimates. Otherwise we could go back and debate estimates that have been before the house since goodness knows when. That is why I was asking the hon. member to make a comparison but not to debate the item that was in the estimates the previous year.

Mr. Meunier: Who was the appraiser in connection with this expropriation?

Mr. Pearkes: I have not that information. My department does not carry out the task of appraisal. When land is required for the Department of National Defence that is done through the Department of Transport. I am afraid I have not that information here. We shall have to go to the Department of Transport to get those details.

Mr. Pearson: How can we ask the Minister of Transport to account for money which was spent on behalf of the Department of National Defence whose estimates we are now considering?

Mr. Pearkes: As I have said, the Department of Transport are the agents. They would know how much money was paid to the appraisers. I would not know how much money they paid to the appraisers. I would not know the names of the appraisers.

Mr. Denis: I suppose there is no misunderstanding between the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Transport. But we should like to know whether this last appraisal made by the present government was binding on the parties—and by that I mean the government and the owners—and whether it was supposed to be accepted in advance by the two parties. I know that last week or two weeks ago something of the kind happened. Of course there was some misunderstanding. We should like to know whether here again we are confronted by some other misunderstandings between members of parliament and ministers of the crown. I wonder whether it would not be to the advantage and in the interests of this committee and of the country to have the Minister of Transport come here and give us some information as to the municipal assessment, why another appraisal has been made, what was the price paid and what was the amount offered by the previous government. I think this information would be extremely welcome and that it would be to the advantage of both parties.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I think an extremely important question of principle has arisen here. The minister is here not to account for the money he has not yet spent in the year 1959-60 but to ask this house to vote money for the year 1959-60. The basis on which we have always in the past, in my experience both as an observer of this house and as a member in this house, voted money for the current year was on the basis of the way in which the minister spent the money in the previous year and in previous years. If the Minister of National Defence will cast his mind back to the days when he sat over here on this side of the chamber and when my friend Mr. Claxton and my friend Mr. Campney were piloting their estimates through the committee, I am sure he will remember that he did not confine his inquiries to the prospective expenditures for the year in question. My recollection of those debates—and it is very vivid—is that most of them had relation to expenditures that had already been made. The payment was apparently made, according to this newspaper publicity, in the month of April which is in the current fiscal year, but whether in fact the money left the treasury before March 31 seems to me to be quite irrelevant. It seems to me that it would be the greatest abridgement of the practices of the committee if that consideration were allowed to stand in the way of an inquiry into a matter of this kind.

The other point I think is equally important, namely that if one department of government uses another department of government as its agent but the money is under the custody of the first department, then it is the duty of the minister of the department that is spending the money to make the explanations to us, not that of one of his colleagues. If he wants to invite his colleague to come and sit beside him, rise in his place and help him to make the explanation, that is perfectly all right. I am sure my hon. friend would be delighted to have the Minister of Transport here—he is a member of this house—so that he could ask him these questions. He might like to know, for example, whether Mr. Clare was the appraiser. There are a great variety of questions that it might be possible to ask about this case. I suggest that we are entitled to have from the Minister of National Defence the information which my friend the hon. member for St. Denis is seeking. Perhaps the minister would agree to allow this item to stand in order to get this information.

Mr. Brooks: If this is a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word on it. I think it is a ridiculous situation where the hon. member asks one minister to comment on an item which is in another minister's department.

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Brooks: That is exactly the situation.

Mr. Pearson: No.

Mr. Brooks: If these hon. members who are asking these questions had been on the job when the estimates of the Minister of Transport were before this committee they could have obtained the answer at that time.

Then as to the other point, may I say this. They are asking this committee to consider estimates which were for 1958-59, not for 1959-60. On both points, as far as the minister is concerned, they are asking for information from the wrong minister. They are also asking it for the wrong year. If anything could be more ridiculous I do not know what it could be.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps I may be permitted to say a word on this point. The minister has said that we are asking this question of the wrong minister. If we had asked the Minister of Transport when his estimates were before the committee, this item could not have been included in those estimates because it had nothing to do with them. But if we had known about it and if we had asked him, the Minister of Transport at once, of course, would have said: "This is not my affair; I was merely acting as agent for the Department of National Defence. I cannot give you the information." We are considering the defence estimates and we are asking the minister to explain this transaction which occurred during last year so that we can relate the explanation to the amount he is asking this year for the purchase of land. Surely nothing could be more reasonable than that procedure. Perhaps this matter and this item could be allowed to stand until the minister has had a chance to talk to the Minister of Transport and to get the information for us tomorrow. These departmental estimates will certainly be before us tomorrow.

Mr. Denis: I am sorry to see that the present government is using the method of proscription in order not to speak about a matter which happened last year. If they have nothing to hide, why do they not answer these questions? The first report we had about this transaction appeared in the newspaper on April 15, 1959.

Mr. Brooks: The item was in last year's estimates.

Mr. Denis: We did not inquire about it. The matter is more confused. The report involves another department. Let me read from the report.

(Translation):

The picture was printed in Le Nouvelliste for Wednesday, April 15, 1959, alongside the following remark:

> The community business has been settled. An amount of $400,000 was paid to the owners of the lots the federal government had appropriated for the use of the defence production department.

I note that while the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. O'Hurley) is now in his seat, he did not find it necessary to rise and say whether his department had anything to do with this. All we are told is that the matter concerns a department whose minister is now absent.

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, we are told that this item in the estimates of the Department of National Defence comes under the Department of Transport. I think we are entitled to some information on this matter.

It is even stated in the report that this land is unsuited for agriculture, and subject to spring floods. It would therefore be interesting to know why this government has paid more than was offered by the former government. Indeed, we must not forget—and I ask the minister and this government not to forget—the speeches made in the past by our hon. friends opposite, in which they spoke of extravagance and unwarranted expenditures. However, those people have been in power and sitting in this parliament for only two years, and already we are able to point to cases of extravagance practically every day.

So it is worth investigating whether this government is actually thrifty.

Mr. O'Hurley: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis) has mentioned my name during the discussion and I must tell him that if he relies on newspaper clippings, it will take him far! The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) has said that the matter concerns the Department of Transport. So, I take the minister's word for it and I have nothing to say about reports published in papers like, for instance, Le Nouvelliste. Besides, I must add that I had nothing to do with the transaction.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, I take the word of the Minister of Defence Production. I read the reports as they appear in the newspapers. There might be times when newspapers are wrong, but there are times too when they are not wrong. Moreover, I might point out that when the report was first printed in the papers, no minister or member rose in this house to deny it.

Perhaps the Minister of Defence Production and the Minister of National Defence could consult with the Minister of Transport who, as they say, was responsible for this transaction, so that we may get the information we have been seeking on this matter.

(Text):

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I realize the importance of the answer to this question by the member, but as the information will have to be obtained from two or possibly three departments of the government it is quite impossible for me to give an answer tonight. I have not got the information and it will take some time to get it; but I will promise that the information will be obtained and that the hon. member will be supplied with that information at the earliest possible opportunity.

Mr. Denis: Mr. Chairman, we are insisting on this information because these questions were asked early this afternoon and the hon. minister was good enough to tell us that he would get the proper information and give it to us. Early this afternoon we asked those questions, and as a matter of fact that is the reason why this item stands, because we are almost at the end of the estimates of national defence and vote 216 has been suspended.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): There was no question asked about the assessment this afternoon.

Mr. Denis: Yes. The hon. member may have been out for a while.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, may I make the suggestion that the minister agree to let the item stand again—

Mr. Denis: No.

Mr. Pickersgill: —and then we can get on with the other estimates of the department, because when he supplies my hon. friend with the information he might wish to exercise his right to make some comment about it.

Mr. Pearkes: I can give the hon. member the assurance that if he wishes to make some comment on it when the information is provided there will be opportunity to do so. But as this is going to take several days in order to get this information—

Mr. Pearson: Several days?

Mr. Pearkes: It may take more than that. There are two or three departments involved. New questions have been asked this evening which were not asked this afternoon. I got what information I could in the meantime and I trust this item will be carried.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we have made a perfectly reasonable request, and I am sure I can speak for my hon. friends in saying that we would give an undertaking to the minister that if he is agreeable to letting the item stand we will not discuss anything except this transaction when the information is provided. But we feel we have to safeguard our rights as members of parliament.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Denis: On division.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, this item deals with construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment. It is a large item. Would the minister break it down and tell us how much of this item is for the acquisition of land and give us particulars about that?

Mr. Pearkes: This is the breakdown on construction or acquisition of buildings and works, etc. With regard to purchase of land, no money is provided for the purchase of land. Construction of major projects, $78,300. Construction of minor projects, $19,500. Major equipment procurement, $465,600; making a total of $563,400.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the minister has just said that there is no amount in this estimate for the purchase of land. I think he said there was no amount for the purchase of land.

Mr. Pearkes: No amount in these estimates for the purchase of land.

Mr. Pearson: There is shown in the estimates, however, a decrease in this particular item of $431,786 as compared with the preceding year, when the amount was $995,186. Could the minister tell us how much of this decrease is due to the fact that there is no amount spent for land this year? How much was spent for land last year?

Mr. Pearkes: The amount spent for land last year was $430,000.

Mr. Pearson: Can the minister give us details as to where that was spent?

Mr. Pearkes: No; I have not those details here at the moment.

Mr. Caron: We are in no hurry.

Mr. Winch: It seems rather a small item though.

Mr. McPhillips: There is nothing too small for that bunch over there.

Mr. Pearson: We want to know where the taxpayers' money is going.

Mr. McPhillips: If you read the estimates last year you would know where it was spent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member for Victoria would like to assist the minister. I am sure he would make an admirable assistant!

Mr. Pearkes: That is the figure for last year's estimates but I have not got before me the breakdown of last year's expenditures.

Mr. Pearson: Do I understand the minister to say that he has not that information available now?

Mr. Pearkes: I say we have not the breakdown of $430,000 which was spent last year.

Mr. Pickersgill: Surely the minister can tell us how much was spent last year on land and where it was?

Mr. Pearkes: Whether all that amount of money was spent I do not know. That was the amount which was provided in last year's estimates for the acquisition of land. I am told that amount was spent.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say whether the particular transaction to which—

Mr. Pearkes: It was not spent entirely on this one piece of property but on a large number of properties, I am told.

Mr. Pearson: But did the amount include this particular transaction about which we have been trying to get information from the minister?

Mr. Pearkes: It did include the cost of the land, which is known as the commune St. Antoine de la Baie du Febvre.

Mr. Pearson: Could the minister tell us the amount which was included for that purpose?

Mr. Pearkes: I am told $400,000.

Mr. Pearson: Well, Mr. Chairman, we have been able to ascertain the amount was $400,000, but we are unable to get any more information out of the minister in regard to this matter. He says this is a matter for the Department of Transport, and we can do our best to get the information from the Minister of Transport who will, undoubtedly, tell us it is a matter for the minister of defence. But as the minister feels it is not possible for him to give us any more information, and as he is unwilling to allow this item to stand until tomorrow for the consideration of this one point, perhaps in these circumstances we will have to let the record show what has happened and go on to the next item.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Air Force—

221. Operation and maintenance, $546,991,000.

Mr. Winch: On this vote I should like to ask a pertinent question of the Minister of National Defence. In view of the minister's analysis of the situation in Europe and the government's decision that our squadrons in Europe now have to be equipped with new planes which it intends to purchase from the United States and which will not become available until between two and two and a half years, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence, irrespective of the situation in Europe and the equipment of the R.C.A.F. in Europe, if he would give us his analysis of our position in Canada in the event of a war of aggression and our position under NORAD with special reference to what will be the equipment of our R.C.A.F. squadrons in Canada.

Mr. Pearkes: The nine squadrons employed on the air defence of Canada are equipped with CF-100's.

Mr. Winch: Is there a differentiation made by the minister in his understanding of the air defence policy as between Canadians in Europe and Canadians in Canada? It is my understanding from the statements made by the minister yesterday and today that it is felt necessary that the R.C.A.F. in Europe should be equipped with more modern equipment than CF-100's or Sabre jets, that they must have the finest equipment available. Is it the minister's position and his statement of policy on behalf of the government that although we must now spend some $300 million for the equipping of the R.C.A.F. under NATO command in Europe with the latest possible fighters, that in Canada our squadrons—I believe it is nine—

Mr. Pearkes: Nine.

Mr. Winch: The CF-100 is all right for Canada. Do I understand that is the position?

Mr. Pearkes: There are four squadrons with the air division in Europe which are equipped and still remain equipped for the time being with the CF-100. There is no plan to change the type of equipment which those four squadrons with the air division have. In Canada, the nine squadrons are equipped with the same all-weather long-distance reconnaissance aircraft, the CF-100, and the defence of Canada, or the air defence of this continent, would be reinforced by the acquisition of the Bomarc batteries to reinforce the nine squadrons of CF-100.

Mr. Winch: Now we are getting it. Our squadrons in Canada will be reinforced by Bomarcs. But in view of the fact that the majority of the money is going to be spent because of the possibility that the two giants, the U.S.S.R. to our north and the United States in the south, may come into conflict, what is the actual situation of our fighter force in Canada to be? I understand from the minister that it is going to be equipped with CF-100's, is it not?

Mr. Pearkes: The nine air defence squadrons in Canada are equipped with CF-100's.

Mr. Winch: And there is to be no change?

Mr. Pearkes: There is no change contemplated in these estimates.

Mr. Winch: I think, sir, you have now made one of the most astounding and misunderstandable statements ever made by a minister of national defence.

Mr. Pearson: I can understand the hon. member's preoccupation with the fact that CF-100 squadrons will be operating in Canada indefinitely at a time when the capability of a possible attacker is such that one can have no assurance that the CF-100, good plane as it is and skilfully operated as it always is, will be able to carry out effectively a job which could have been done a few years ago. If we have worries on that score they are, surely, understandable. These preoccupations are increased, I think, by the references which the minister made yesterday to the possibility of United States interceptor squadrons operating from Canadian airfields and pushing interception as far north as possible which, if we are going into this kind of thing, is certainly desirable. The minister said yesterday that provision had been made for this kind of co-operation in the NORAD agreement. I have been looking at the NORAD agreement, but the only provision I can find to cover this kind of activity of United States squadrons operating on Canadian soil is the article which reads:

No permanent changes of station may be made without the approval of the higher national authority concerned. Temporary reinforcements from one area to another—

That is, one area on either side of the border, or across the border, presumably, including the crossing of the international boundary.

—to meet operational requirements will be within the authority of commanders having operational control.

That kind of movement is authorized under this agreement if it is to meet operational requirements. With respect, I suggest to the minister that this particular clause would not cover the kind of procedure I have in mind and to which I thought he referred yesterday—the stationing of United States interceptor squadrons at Canadian airfields as part of a joint force.

Mr. Pearkes: The permanent stationing could, as the hon. gentleman has just read out, only be carried out by agreement between the two governments, but the temporary operation of squadrons of the United States air force from Canadian airfields could be authorized by the commanders in question.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister if there are negotiations under way now which would permit that kind of permanent stationing on Canadian soil?

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. Pearkes: There are no such negotiations under way for the permanent stationing of any United States squadrons in Canada.

Mr. MacLean (Winnipeg North Centre): There is one matter on which I feel compelled to make some comment and I think it would be best done under this item. It is with regard to the separate school problem that has existed over the past year among air force personnel situated at Stevenson's field in the city of St. James. I, myself, and I know the hon. member for St. Boniface, have received a good many representations on this matter and no doubt the minister has received as many, and possibly more. I do not know what may be done with regard to immediately solving the situation. As the minister well knows, before last year the personnel situated at Stevenson's field were granted equal privileges with regard to educational opportunities for their children. In Manitoba we have a separate school system. It is my understanding that Quebec and Manitoba are perhaps the only provinces with such a system. However, the system in Manitoba differs from that in Quebec in that, although the separate school system is recognized, no public funds are authorized for the provision of such a separate system.

Up until last year the minister's department paid for the education of these children regardless of which school they wished to attend. Then at the beginning of last year an agreement was entered into by the Department of Finance with the city of St. James under which an over-all sum was paid to the city of St. James, but the city of St. James had the onus of providing the educational facilities for the children of the air force personnel situated at this air field. However, the city of St. James is not compelled to provide separate schools as such, and it is my understanding that there are no other schools in St. James apart from the Protestant public schools.

The minister may wonder how I come into this picture. I am in this picture because the main parish school which is situated in St. Edward's parish is in my constituency. The children of the Catholic air force personnel at Stevenson's field went in the main to this parish school and Monsignor MacInerney of St. Edward's parish brought this to my attention. I have talked to the air force personnel out there. I realize, of course, in part this is a constitutional issue with the minister because education comes under the domain of the provinces. This is a situation in which perhaps he can do little since the agreement has been signed.

However, I understand the present situation is simply this. The air force personnel situated out there are still sending their children in the main to St. Edward's parish school; that is, those of the Catholic denomination and are paying for this out of their own pockets; whereas, only a few blocks away we have Fort Osborne barracks, which is in the city of Winnipeg, which has no agreement with the government but the government is subsidizing the children of the army personnel there. Of course, the personnel out at Stevenson's field say to me, "Is this right; is this fair, is there not discrimination?" This is a difficult argument to refute.

I know there is no onus upon the city of St. James to provide those facilities and it is money out of the pockets of the air force personnel situated at Stevenson's field. I am wondering whether the minister might at this time make another complete review of the present situation. It is my feeling that this is perhaps a unique situation. I may be wrong in this but I do not know of any other province that has a separate school arrangement legalized by statute. If it is a unique situation, then perhaps it deserves a unique solution. However, if it is not possible to go all the way with regard to countermanding or amending the agreement, perhaps something may be done with regard to aiding these service personnel by perhaps providing transportation. Perhaps they could use one of the department's buses to take the children to school and to bring them home.

I have been out at the field and have noticed buses standing idle during the day time. Perhaps this may be only a small matter, but the suggestions I have made would do a great deal to alleviate the situation. I would be interested in hearing the minister's remarks on this matter.

Mr. Pearkes: I shall be very pleased to look into the matter. I will take it up with the air officer commanding in Winnipeg. I thank the hon. member for the suggestion he has advanced.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I believe this is the vote under which we can ask the Minister of National Defence to enlarge on what he had to say on this particular item in his opening remarks on the air defence of Canada, because I understand that the purchase and the allocation of Bomarc are part of the R.C.A.F. defence. I fully realize that on a security basis there may be a lot of information the minister cannot give us. I do feel that the members of the House of Commons who are 265 representatives of the millions who occupy Canada require a more comprehensive knowledge from the minister on the change which has been made in the cancellation of the CF-105, and the fact that we got the information only a few weeks ago that the R.C.A.F. in Canada will continue to be manned with the CF-100. The major defence, therefore, is going to rely on the air force installation of the Bomarc. As far as the members of the House of Commons know from all the statements made by the minister or the Prime Minister, there are two installations authorized, one in Ontario and one in Quebec.

The minister made it very clear this afternoon that he was not in a position to tell us of the actual results of the tests of the Bomarc. Therefore, we can understand that we have to go on what we can read in our own Canadian papers, in the papers of the United States and in the congressional record. In recent weeks we have read in the congressional record of a debate in the United States on the value of the Bomarc and also we have read the official record of the cutting of the estimates to a very great extent having to do with Bomarc, but I do not know whether it was experimentation or development. However, in view of the fact that the Minister of National Defence has not made any announcement in the House of Commons that he on behalf of the government is making any change on account of this, it therefore means, I take it, that as far as the government is concerned they are proceeding with their arrangements with the United States authorities on the Bomarc as a defence for Canada and United States.

That being so, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he can give us information as far as he possibly can. If anyone is to be taken into his confidence by the minister, it should be the members of the House of Commons. Since there was the cancellation of the CF-105 and his own statement that our own R.C.A.F. is only going to have the CF-100, and in view of his own statement and that of the Prime Minister going back to February of this year and continuing that we have to have something that will meet the supersonic missile, not the ICBM, will the Minister of National Defence—in view of the fact that he is only now prepared to give as authorized the establishment in Canada of two Bomarc launching stations, one in Ontario and one in Quebec—give the information as to what is the defence from Ontario to the Pacific coast?

I have had the privilege of having a talk with the Minister of National Defence. I do not think I am breaking any confidence when I say that outside of the two establishments in Canada there is now in existence or will be established a Bomarc line south of the Canadian border from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Whether the establishments are now in existence I do not know and I am not going to ask. As a member of the House of Commons, a Canadian citizen and a citizen of British Columbia I want to ask the minister how the defence policy of the government, with its reliance on Bomarc installations in the United States, even if they are close to the Canadian border, is protection for Canadian cities, towns and villages running up to the Arctic circle?

I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence if he is prepared to say, without violating security, that a Bomarc line on the United States side of the border from Ontario to British Columbia can, in the case of any invasion, protect the northern part of Vancouver island, Prince Rupert, Terrace, Lethbridge, Regina, Peace River, Saskatoon or whatever you will. So far the Minister of National Defence, with the exception of saying that there will be Bomarc installations at two locations, one in Ontario and one in Quebec, has not told us what the protection will be in the other parts of Canada.

I know, and I am not breaking any confidence because I have seen it in half a dozen magazines, that there is a Bomarc line just below the 49th parallel, but how does that tie in with the protection of our country? I say that Canada is more than Quebec and Ontario. I accord all honour to Quebec and Ontario but as a member from British Columbia I am very much interested in that province and I know that the Minister of National Defence is too. It is pretty hard for a member of the opposition to speak on this matter but I do want to say that I do not think the minister has taken the house into his confidence as much as he should have. He has not given us as clear a picture as we should have as to defence policies and the protection of Canada if aggression takes place.

I hope, and this is all I will have to say about the matter, that the minister will perhaps be able to open up his mind and his heart a little bit more and give us a little more information so that we will have a better understanding of what is actually taking place in Canada in order to try to alleviate the misunderstanding as to why there are Bomarc installations in eastern Canada but nothing in central and western Canada, the misunderstanding as to why the most modern is for NATO and the obsolete for Canada. I should like him to explain if he can that under government policy we are not just the defence area of the United States and, in the event of war, the graveyard.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, in my opening remarks yesterday I did my best to explain briefly and as concisely as I could the policy regarding the defence of Canada. Canada is a member of the western alliance. The overriding concept of that alliance is to prevent war. We believe that by having powerful forces of retaliation, and I do not attempt to say that this is a good solution for all time, we will make it quite obvious to any potential enemy that it is not worth while starting a war because the power of the west will strike back and will be so devastating in its effect on that country.

In order to have that power of retaliation effective it must be kept secure and in order to keep the power of retaliation secure and also to provide a degree of protection to our own population and the cities of Canada we have established first of all an extensive warning line stretching from the Atlantic ocean across the north of Canada to the Pacific, and that line is duplicated by other lines closer to the populated areas. They will give warning not only to our cities to take measures of protection but, more important, to get the SAC bombers off their bases.

The potential enemy realizes that and realizes that his chances of really carrying out a sudden attack on the SAC bases at the present time, thereby destroying the power of retaliation before the bombers can get off their bases, are extremely remote. Then also as part of the deterrent we have various, shall I say, zones of defence as far north as it is possible for the interceptors of the R.C.A.F. to go, working in conjunction with United States air force interceptors under the command of NORAD. As I said before, those bombers that get through that zone of interception will then come within the range of the Bomarc stations which consist of a series of interlocking stations, two in Canada and the balance in the United States close to the border of Canada but all interlocking so that the whole of the air space from the Atlantic to the Pacific within their range is covered.

In order to make that more effective, and in order to provide the control which is necessary for the interceptors and Bomarcs, we established additional radar stations, pushing them farther north so it will become possible for the interceptors to operate farther north than they can today. We are introducing gap fillers between the stations of the Pinetree line so some aircraft, trying to dodge the radar screen and sneak in at low level, will be picked up.

We are linking all this up with certain communication centres known as the SAGE environment which is an automatic system of transporting information received and translating it again into instructions to the aircraft or the missile so that they may be effective.

That is a brief description of the air defence of Canada. I hope that the hon. member will note this outline I have given and will link that with what I said in my opening remarks. Then, I trust he will be able to get a picture of what we are trying to accomplish. The west's defence is based on the power of retaliation. The retaliation forces must be secure, and we are in a partnership in the defence of this North American continent, including the cities of Canada, the cities of the United States and the SAC bomber bases, with our allies, the United States. Their aircraft will be available to protect the cities of Canada against bomber attack.

The hon. member talks of two Bomarc bases. Yes, there are two in Canada, but from the west of North Bay to the Pacific the centres of population in that Bomarc zone will be covered as soon as these Bomarc batteries are in place in the United States. However, one must remember that they come under the command of NORAD and we have a Canadian officer as deputy commander of that force. These Bomarcs and these interceptors, whether they are based in Canada or based in the United States, will be directly under the command of the commander in chief of NORAD for the protection of everything that there is on this continent.

Mr. Winch: I have a question on the same phase of the discussion. The Bomarc is not a system of retaliation, the Bomarc is a system of defence.

Mr. Pearkes: Bomarc is for defence; it has nothing to do with retaliation at all except that it is a protection for the forces of retaliation.

Mr. Winch: That is what I said; Bomarc is not a weapon of retaliation, but Bomarc is a system of defence. So far as we know from the Prime Minister and the minister, Bomarc, as a system of defence, is only now being authorized, paid for and installed in two sections of Canada. I listened very carefully to what the minister had to say, but if it is not breaking security I should like to ask this question because your government is placing the emphasis on Bomarc: Is there a protection for the third city of Canada by Bomarc the same as there will be for Ottawa from North Bay? I think we are entitled to know the answer to that.

Mr. Pearkes: I have said there will be a general interlocking of Bomarc stations from the Atlantic to the Pacific which will be capable of engaging hostile bombers before they enter the air space over the heavily populated parts of Canada. If my hon. friend is thinking of the city of Vancouver from which he comes, there will be a Bomarc station which will be capable of doing exactly that task and providing that protection about which he is so concerned.

Mr. McGee: Coming down from the airy heights of armchair strategy to a matter concerning an individual member of the Royal Canadian Air Force, I should like to put in the form of a rather lengthy question the case of an individual which has been brought to my attention. I would prefer, for the moment, not to disclose his name or circumstances, for obvious reasons.

This young man, 19 years of age, joined the Royal Canadian Air Force in a certain trade capacity. Since his enlistment he has married and has had a child. He is faced with the usual situation which confronts a young married couple with a child. According to the information which I have it is suggested that it is air force policy that if the individual cannot demonstrate his ability to look after his family they release him, at least this is one of the reasons which would contribute to his release. Apparently, according to my information, a member of the R.C.A.F. must reach 21 years of age before he can receive a married allowance. The representations made to me take cognizance of the fact that this is, perhaps, a reasonable attitude for the air force to adopt in general, but raises the countering argument that this particular individual happens to be dedicated and is most interested in a career in the Royal Canadian Air Force. I must say this is an attitude I can understand having shared at one time that same point of view.

This young man graduated at the head of his class following his training period. In fact, it has been brought to my attention that there are others who desire to be released, but for other reasons I will grant you. My question to the minister is, is it a matter of policy in the air force—I must confine myself to that particular service at this time—that 19-year-olds who have married and assumed certain responsibilities at the same time incur disabilities as a result of that particular situation?

Mr. Pearkes: If the hon. gentleman will let me know the name of this man privately, I will see what can be done for him. But as a matter of principle we do not encourage service men to marry under 21 years of age.

Mr. McGee: While I can appreciate the decision of the department and the particular service in not encouraging marriage and the acquisition of dependents, surely it is a fact that people under the statutory age of 21 in ever increasing numbers in other areas of our society do in fact marry and do in fact have children. I am wondering whether the minister might give some indication as to whether this particular general policy—and I assume it is a general policy—might be the subject of some review and reconsideration.

Mr. Regnier: Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the plea made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre with regard to the education of the children of the personnel located at the R.C.A.F. station at St. James. In 1957 the Canadian government was providing for the education of the Roman Catholic children using the English or the French language. But in 1958 an agreement was made with the city of St. James providing for the education of the personnel at the station. However, the children desiring to attend separate schools were overlooked. Since this is a right of all Canadians to be educated at schools to which they want to go, in the province of Manitoba separate schools are legal. As a matter of fact, the constitution of the province of Manitoba is the same as the constitution of the province of Quebec. In 1870 when the constitution was drafted the Roman Catholics of Manitoba were in the majority, and this constitution was made in order to protect the minority of the future. Now it is the Roman Catholics who are in the minority. I believe that the federal government should see that the children of the personnel at the R.C.A.F. station have the same rights as those in the army. Right across the river from there the children of the personnel stationed at Fort Osborne, for example, are provided for at the expense of the government. Our troops in West Germany are provided for at considerable expense. Teachers are sent from Canada to Germany to teach both in the separate schools and in the public schools. I think this is an irritating matter that is not conducive to Canadian national unity. It is not a serious matter. It is not a matter of much expense. I should like the minister really to look into this matter.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the minister yesterday announced that eight squadrons of the air division in Europe were to be re-equipped with the F-104. Those of us on this side of the house indicated our satisfaction that a decision had finally been made even though we were advised last night that the commitment had been made in December, 1957 and the government had had all of these intervening months in which to consider the matter. We were glad the decision had been made because if the air division is to be retained in Europe, it must be well equipped. Our satisfaction at the fact that a decision had been made is lessened by the nature of that decision because of what we have learned of the characteristics of the F-104.

The minister told us last night that it was primarily a strike fighter and that it had no other role. Yet upon examination we find that the F-104 was designed to be an air superiority fighter, the last of the air superiority day fighters. It holds the world speed and altitude records. To be able to do this, in order to provide this capability, air frame stability was sacrificed in the design.

We are advised that there are certain manoeuvres that the plane cannot do, that it is subject to stick "judders" when approaching manoeuvre limits, thereby warning the pilot that the plane is nearing the point where there will be loss of control. We further understand that the F-104 was grounded two years ago by the United States air force because of trouble with afterburner controls and power trim settings, although these difficulties have presumably been overcome. We further understand that the fatality rate of F-104 planes and pilots in the U.S.A.F. is unusually high. The accident rate is about double that of other U.S.A.F. fighters.

It is true that the F-104 used by the U.S.A.F. is not the Mark G contemplated for our air division but the G differs from the others mainly in electronic equipment, there being no change in the air frame or engine.

Why did the government not choose either the Grumman F-11-F Super Tiger or the Republic F-105 Thunderchief? Both of these aircraft were designed specifically for the strike role and both are very stable weapon platforms. The characteristics of the Thunderchief as outlined to the U.S. house appropriations committee are as follows:

> The F-105 is manufactured by Republic Aviation at Farmingdale, N.Y. It is powered by one J-75 turbojet engine, manufactured by Pratt & Whitney, United Aircraft Corp, Hartford, Conn.
> It is an all-weather tactical fighter. It is being procured to modernize our tactical fighter force. It will provide partial modernization of forces equipped with F-100's which do not have the performance needed in the 1960 time period to enable it to compete favourably with first-line aircraft of other nations.
>
> The principal characteristics of the F-105 are:
> 1. It can fly at supersonic speeds.
>
> 2. It has an accurate, self-contained navigation system that is independent of vulnerable, ground-based aids to navigation.
> 3. It is equipped with a radar system which makes it possible to attack ground targets under all weather conditions.
>
> 4. The F-105 can deliver a wide variety of conventional munitions should the situation demand.
> The F-105 is a jack-of-all-trades, capable of gaining air superiority or attacking ground targets with nuclear or conventional weapons. It will also be equipped with one M-61 20 mm. cannon.

We are informed that Republic offered to let Canada make all the sheet metal airframe parts, including skins, after-fuselage structure and parts of the wings for its United States air force contract, thereby giving this country an additional production sharing order. Furthermore, the Republic 105 has been engineered in such a way that it would be able to use the Iroquois engine, and it is understood that Republic offered to consider using the Iroquois engine for its United States air force contract. This would have been a matter for agreement between the United States and Canadian governments. If such an arrangement had been reached the Canadian plus the U.S.A.F. orders would have been sufficient to make the Iroquois competitive for other installations. In any event, it would likely have been cheaper, if you consider the cancellation costs connected with the Iroquois, to have put it into production rather than tooling up for another engine. The Iroquois engine would have increased the power and effectiveness of the Thunderchief, an already outstanding strike aircraft.

What about the J-79 engine in the F-104, the plane the Canadian government has chosen for our air division? Congressman Andrews of Alabama had the following questions to ask:

Mr. Andrews: How often do you overhaul an engine? At certain periods?

General Hewitt: At certain periods, sir. We have different life expectancies on engines running all the way from 100 hours between overhauls to approximately 1,200 hours, for one of the engines that we now use, the J-47 in the B-47.

Mr. Andrews: What is the one which has 100 hours' life expectancy?

General Hewitt: The one which has 100-hour expectancy, right now, perhaps a little less, sir, is the J-79 which is in the F-104 aircraft. I can recall the time when the J-47 in the B-47 aircraft also had a life expectancy of 100 hours. As we find out the faults and the weaknesses of these engines, sir, by modification we can extend their life expectancy.

We have a complete chart here, sir, if it would be of any interest to you, which shows the life expectancy of each one of the types of engines we are now using.

Would you not know, Mr. Chairman, that of all the engines in all the fighter planes of the United States air force the Canadian government would choose the one which is the least satisfactory?

As regards armaments, it is reported that the F-105 rocket payload is approximately five times that of the F-104. In addition, it has an internal bomb bay which gives it a capability of delivering nuclear or conventional weapons. The F-104 does not have an internal bomb bay. The F-105 is the only plane available which can launch a bomb when flying twice the speed of sound. It has been flying for nearly two years and unlike the F-104 has yet to kill a pilot. It has been estimated by a United States research team that one Republic 105 Thunderchief is capable of doing the work of two F-104's. On this basis the F-105 system if bought in its entirety would cost less than the F-104 because it would take fewer planes to do the job.

The Republic F-105 also has an all-weather fighter capability and could be used to supplement the Bomarc if Canada is to remain in this particular field of continental defence. It could be stationed at bases such as Comox, Cold Lake, Churchill and Bagotville, for example, and could make contact with the enemy far over the north. To provide this capability would merely require minor modifications in the electronic system.

The Grumman F-11-F is also an outstanding aircraft. Its electronic capabilities are similar to the F-104. It was designed for the United States navy as a strike aircraft. It, too, is very stable, an excellent weapon platform. United States confidence in the Republic 105 Thunderchief is demonstrated by the fact that it is presently in United States air force squadron use and there is a production order which will continue until 1963. The United States air force, which developed all these planes and which is in the best position to evaluate them, chose not the F-104 but the Republic F-105 Thunderchief for its strike fighter squadrons. United States confidence in the F-104 is demonstrated by the fact that it does not plan to replace this plane in squadron service as the inventory is depleted. The very high attrition rate will accelerate this phasing out.

The plane chosen by the government of Canada to re-equip our air division is, Mr. Chairman, to put it bluntly, no ruddy good for the strike role. The air frame is unstable. The engine is not reliable enough. It was not designed for the job. There are infinitely better aircraft available for the strike reconnaissance role. This, Mr. Chairman, is just one further example of this government's incredibly bad judgment in defence matters.

Mr. McGee: I wonder if the hon. member would table the document from which he was reading?

Mr. Winch: I would like to ask the Minister of National Defence if he would give an indication of something which I admit I do not know, and that is with regard to matters which have an effect on the air force and its equipment, its equipment in Canada and its equipment overseas. Would the minister mind explaining just how a decision is reached amongst the air staff, himself, the government, NATO and the general staff? What is the arrangement whereby these things are discussed and decisions reached, and who makes the final decision?

In other words, I would like to know, not just for my own information, but I think I can speak, although I have not got the right to because I cannot—well, I will say it—on behalf of high ranking officers of the R.C.A.F. who have been in a position where they have been stultified, stupefied, not knowing what to do because they had no authority to do it. I knew, even up to two weeks ago—if you ask me to name the R.C.A.F. man you could crucify me because I am not giving his name—that the R.C.A.F. to my knowledge were sitting wondering and waiting for what was to be done, what was going to be the decision? They were wondering what was going to happen to our squadrons in Europe and what was going to happen here in Canada. I have never been called a liar in my life and no one is going to call me one now, but I say that that is something which is inside the armed forces, Mr. Minister of National Defence, whether you like it or not. It is a position of complete indecision because there is no unification. There is no chain of authority and there is no chain of decision.

I should like the Minister of National Defence to stand up in this committee right now and tell us what is the chain of consultation, what is the chain of decision, what is the chain of authority; who makes the final, authoritative decisions on policy, on planes, on equipment and on the armed forces. I use the occasion of this vote to ask that question. I am going to say to the Minister of National Defence, that he will make the greatest contribution to the morale of the armed services and to the brass hats of the army if he will announce where authority lies, where decision lies, where the responsibility lies. It is repetitious, but I am going to repeat that if the minister would get rid of the confusion which I know existed up until last week by laying down something which will be on record in Hansard as to where the authority lies, he will have done more than any previous minister of national defence has done toward building up the esprit de corps and morale of the armed forces. But, particularly, I ask him the question: what is the chain of consultation and command; who makes the decisions relative to policy and equipment and aircraft for the R.C.A.F. under vote No. 221?

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, the chain of command for the R.C.A.F. and the other national armed forces is described in the charts at the end of the white paper.

[Mr. Winch.]

Mr. Winch: That doesn't mean a thing.

Mr. Pearkes: Simply because you cannot understand plain English. These charts show exactly the commands of the R.C.A.F. It is all explained in this paper. The chief of the air staff is the senior officer of the R.C.A.F. He is advised by an air council. He makes his recommendations, if they concern the administration of the air force, to me directly, and if they raise questions of defence policy they go to the chiefs of staff committee who then make their recommendation to the Minister of National Defence. If it is within his powers, he makes the decision himself, but otherwise he refers it to the cabinet.

Mr. Winch: Can I ask the Minister of National Defence who was the general officer commanding western command and who is one of the best known of the generals of Canada and who has now been Minister of National Defence for two years, if he honestly believes that the white paper contains the answer to these questions, because if so he is far more naive than I ever thought he would be.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall this vote carry?

Mr. Pearson: No. It is a long time since the government or the department has had to make a more important decision in the field of military equipment than the one they have made in respect to the reinforcement of a major part of the Canadian air force which is now to continue its service overseas under NATO. That requirement indicates that the division is going to be given a new role, that of strike fighter, and no more important role could be conferred on a division than this. And therefore, Mr. Chairman, it is surely of the greatest importance that we should get all the information we possibly can in respect to this decision which was made to re-equip the division with a particular plane concerning which we have doubts in comparison to other planes which were designed for the same purpose.

So we on this side hope that the minister will be able to deal tomorrow with some of the questions which have been raised by my hon. friend from Trinity in expressing doubt as to the suitability of this particular aircraft in comparison with others, and we shall have other questions to ask the minister on that point. More particularly, we should like to hear from the minister the reasons why this particular plane was chosen, the procedure which was followed, the examination and the tests which were given to other planes, and information on all those matters which must have been in the minds of the government before they took this important decision. Perhaps the minister will be able to satisfy our legitimate concern on this matter when the committee resumes tomorrow.

Mr. Pearkes: Just briefly, tonight, I might say that as I stated in my opening remarks yesterday a large number of different types of aircraft were examined—British, American and European—by teams of technical officers from the R.C.A.F. and the Department of Defence Production, and when all the considerations had been evaluated and examined, including the suitability of the different types of aircraft to carry out the role which had been assigned to them, availability, cost, the sharing of production and all those considerations, both military and economic, those matters were then considered by the chiefs of staff committee. They were studied by myself. They were considered by the cabinet defence committee and finally by the cabinet itself, and the final decision was reached when all the evidence had been obtained that this was the most suitable aircraft to meet all the requirements.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister one more question before the committee adjourns. Is it a fact that the United States has re-equipped its own tactical squadrons in Europe with Republic F-105 fighters?

Mr. Pearkes: I understand that some squadrons of the U.S.A.F. are being equipped with the Republic F-105.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if the leader of the house has anything to add to what he said last night about future business.

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Speaker. The business will be as I outlined it then.

Mr. Pearson: Is the leader of the house able to tell us what we will be doing next Tuesday? I think he indicated what the business will be on Monday. Can he go one day further?

Mr. Green: If we finish with the legislative items which I mentioned last night, then we will go on with any other items on the order paper on Tuesday with the exception of item No. 2, which is consideration of the amendments made by the Senate to the Income Tax Act, item No. 4 dealing with the Canada Shipping Act, item No. 6 dealing with the Combines Investigation Act and the Criminal Code. Any of the others might be called. We would arrange with the opposition parties if there should be any change in this order.

At 10.04 p.m. the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

The house met at 11 a.m.

UNEMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE

QUEBEC—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SIGNING OF AGREEMENT

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have pleasure in announcing to the house that earlier this week, on July 1, I signed on behalf of the government of Canada an agreement with the government of the province of Quebec under the provisions of the Unemployment Assistance Act. Hon. Paul Sauve, minister of social welfare and of youth of the government of the province of Quebec, has signed the agreement on behalf of that government. With the completion of this agreement the Unemployment Assistance Act is now in effect in all 10 provinces of Canada.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO ATTENDANCE OF PREMIER OF QUEBEC AND COMMENTS ON AGENDA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. May I ask him if he has been officially advised that the premier of Quebec will attend the conference on Monday?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have had no official advice. I do not know if the Minister of Finance, who has been looking after this matter, has received any communication. If there was one it would naturally be to him.

Mr. Chevrier: I would have directed my question to the Minister of Finance in the first place, but because of his absence I directed it to the Prime Minister. Here is the Minister of Finance now, and perhaps I could direct the question to him.

In the absence of the minister I was asking the Prime Minister, and perhaps the minister will take it as directed to him, whether or not he has now been officially advised that the premier of Quebec will attend the conference on Monday?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the minister whether he has received any comments from the government of Quebec on the proposed agenda for the conference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I understand not, Mr. Speaker; that will be reserved, presumably, for the conference on Monday.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a further question. Is it still the intention of the federal government that the meeting will be nothing more than a study group or seminar and that no important decisions will be taken to modify the present fiscal arrangements?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): That question, put in that form, completely misrepresents the scope, purpose and effect of this conference. This, Mr. Speaker, in the view of the government is a very important conference, and the importance which the government attaches to it is reflected in the preparations that have been made for it and in the broad and comprehensive scope of the matters that are to come before it.

As I have endeavoured to indicate on previous occasions, one of the difficulties that have beset the plenary dominion-provincial conferences in the past has been that each side, the dominion government on the one hand and the provinces on the other, has come to the conference with preconceived ideas and positions. There has not been a comprehensive study of the whole tax structure of this country so far as it affects both the dominion and the provinces.

This has been badly needed and it has been badly needed not simply on the basis of a dominion study but on the basis of a co-operative study. We have a federal system in this country under which provincial governments are sovereign. They have their rights; they have their powers, and they have heavy responsibilities. The federal government has its powers, its rights and its heavy responsibilities as well. The view of the government has been that if we are going to do anything effective on a long-term basis in this country to help governments at all levels to work effectively together in relation to fiscal problems, there must be a comprehensive study, and it must be undertaken on a co-operative basis.

It is our hope, Mr. Speaker, that at this conference we will be able to bring about something that has not been effectively done before in the realm of dominion-provincial fiscal relations in this country; in other words, a comprehensive co-operative study of those common problems with a view to achieving long range comprehensive understandings and arrangements in regard to them.

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): A supplementary question. Will such a study at this conference include the possibility of providing a winter works program for the coming winter to take care of unemployment, or will such a contingency be beyond the scope of this conference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, that type of study is one falling within the sphere of the labour departments of the federal and provincial governments. It is not strictly a matter pertaining to fiscal problems between the various levels of government, but there are many questions associated with common undertakings on the part of the various levels of government that obviously do relate to the fiscal problems within dominion-provincial relations.

Mr. Argue: I take it the minister's answer is that no particular study of the unemployment question will be dealt with?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): No, I did not say that. I was asked by the hon. member a specific question in regard to a winter works program, as I took it, for next winter. A similar question was asked yesterday of my colleague the Minister of Labour, and he dealt with it. If my hon. friend is asking me about a particular program for next winter I cannot say to him categorically that it will be studied at this particular conference. But in regard to fiscal relations, fiscal problems, as between the levels of government, certainly there is no desire on the part of the federal government to curb or restrict the extent of discussion. I do, Mr. Speaker, wish to emphasize the comprehensive nature of the studies that we are prepared to undertake jointly with the provinces in this field, because we do attach the greatest importance to it.

Mr. Argue: In view of the comprehensive nature of the conference to which the minister has referred, is he able to inform the house whether all the premiers will be in attendance at this conference?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): I have already informed the house, Mr. Speaker, as to the number of premiers who will be attending. We have been informed that there will be five premiers in attendance at the conference, three of whom are treasurers of their own provinces, and two who are coming with the provincial treasurers of their provinces.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the important and comprehensive character of this conference, as emphasized by the minister, does he not feel that we would have been justified in setting aside a day or two days to discuss these special problems before the conference was held?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, if any subject has been discussed in this House of Commons until it is worn threadbare it must surely be the subject of dominion-provincial fiscal relations at this present session. It was initiated by the opposition in an amendment to a supply motion back on February 9. If I am correct in my calculation, no fewer than 10 days of the present session have been devoted to a discussion of this problem in all its various forms. What would have been accomplished by one more day of debate on it I do not quite understand; but I do point out to the hon. gentleman that the subjects, as I mentioned previously, that were submitted to the provinces for their approval, as subjects coming within the scope of review and discussion at the conference, were confidential. Until the conference releases that list from that restriction it is still a confidential document. I hope it will be possible early in the conference to make that comprehensive list available to the public, but we would have to have the permission of the provinces to release it.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Has the minister forgotten that on most of the days he referred to he kept raising points of order to prevent any discussion of the conference?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, I do recall raising points of order where those points of order were fully justified.

[Later:]

Mr. Frank McGee (York-Scarborough): I wonder if the Minister of Finance would tell us whether any other members of the government besides himself will be attending the dominion-provincial conference next week?

Mr. Fleming (Eglinton): Perhaps that question should more properly be directed to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I may say that in the preparations which naturally have taken place leading to the convening of such a conference, and with respect to the various matters which will come before this conference, the Department of National Revenue must necessarily participate to a considerable extent, and in the circumstances the representation on the part of the federal government at the ministerial level will include both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Revenue.

ROYAL VISIT

INSTRUCTIONS TO MOUNTED POLICE ON LAW ENFORCEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, prompted by a number of persons who are quite concerned I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister's attention been drawn to an item in the Montreal Star of June 26 which quotes an R.C.M.P. officer as saying:

> We couldn't push them around as if they were a street mob, as a lot of them were very influential people.

The officer made that remark when replying to a question with respect to certain disturbances at a recent public function. In view of the disturbing implications of such a statement, would the minister assure the house that the R.C.M.P. have instructions to enforce the law on all occasions, regardless of the pomposity, prestige or pocketbooks of the persons concerned?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, my attention was drawn to a reported remark attributed to a member of the R.C.M. Police to the effect that the hon. gentleman has outlined in his question. I have not been able to ascertain that such remark ever was made by a member of the R.C.M. Police, and I would be very surprised indeed if it was, because I think the record of the way in which the police have handled their responsibilities in connection with the royal tour, under circumstances which are not always easy, indicates quite clearly that special efforts are being made to do their job with due regard for their responsibilities under the law to Her Majesty and to the public who may be interested in seeing the Queen on the occasion of her tour.

REQUESTED DELAY IN DEPARTURE FROM HALIFAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): I have a question for the minister in charge of the royal tour arrangements. Could consideration be given to delaying the departure of the royal couple from Halifax harbour on the Britannia so that instead of departing late Saturday night they could receive a royal send-off on Sunday morning by several hundred boats, hundreds of church bells and tens of thousands of people—in short, so that we in that area could de-Joyce properly?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): The program of the royal tour has been firm for some time. I will be glad to look into the suggestion made by the hon. member and see if that could be done, though I am afraid it could not, because as I say the arrangements were worked out with the Queen some time ago. But I will look into the matter.

AGRICULTURE

CROP INSURANCE AND FARM CREDIT—REQUEST FOR DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, arising out of a very strong press release issued by the Saskatchewan minister of agriculture, Hon. I. C. Nollet, in which he says it is imperative that a federal-provincial conference, including representatives of farm organizations, should be convened immediately before final approval is given to the legislation covering crop insurance and agricultural credit. Is the Minister of Agriculture prepared to call such a conference so the views of the provinces and the farm organizations may be obtained before this legislation is finally dealt with?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen this press release to which the hon. member has referred. I have seen a press release which quotes the minister of agriculture of Manitoba as saying that he is very well satisfied indeed with this legislation. As far as calling a conference is concerned, the result, as the hon. member knows, would be that this legislation would not be implemented at this session of parliament. I think it is essential that the crop insurance plan and the improved credit plan which are covered by the two bills should be implemented and put into effect as soon as possible.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, since the present crop season is well under way, could the minister explain how a delay of a few weeks, or even some months, could affect the implementation of the crop insurance scheme?

As a further question I would ask whether in view of the minister's answer he is prepared to have this legislation go before the agriculture committee in order that witnesses from the provinces and farm organizations may be called before the committee to comment, in the instance of crop insurance, on legislation which is really in the provincial field?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, as far as this latter question is concerned, the hon. member asked the same question when the legislation was under consideration and I have nothing to add to what I said at that time.

Mr. Argue: Will the minister inform me now when he will be prepared to say whether this important legislation will be referred to the committee on agriculture, or is he just stalling?

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

REPORTED WASTAGE OF WATER IN INTERNATIONAL SECTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Will the minister comment on the statement made by the president of the New York state power authority, Robert Moses, to the effect that many millions of gallons of water which could be used for the development of power are going to waste in the international section of the river because of lack of decision by an international body of which Canada is a member?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I would not want to comment on the reported statement by a civil servant of another country regarding an important matter of this kind, but I can say that this matter is being discussed between representatives of the province of Ontario and the federal government at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: Will the minister be in a position to make a statement with regard to those discussions?

Mr. Hees: I will, when the discussions have been completed.

PARLIAMENT HILL

REPORTED FAILURE OF MOUNTED POLICE TO STAND AT ATTENTION FOR NATIONAL ANTHEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Yvon Dupuis (St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a question. Can he tell us why, at the conclusion of carillon recitals from the peace tower of the parliament buildings of Canada, R.C.M.P. officers fail to stand at attention at the playing of "God Save the Queen" and "O Canada" to the consternation of listeners present on the hill?

[Mr. Argue.]

(Text):

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware that what has been stated by the hon. member has taken place, but I will make inquiries and if there is anything which requires to be drawn to the attention of the police authorities I will be glad to see that it is done.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—CHANGES RESULTING FROM PROCLAMATION OF FEDERAL ACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. R. Granger (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the proclamation in Newfoundland of the Meat and Canned Foods Act as related to fish and shell fish, and the Fish Inspection Act, as announced by the minister yesterday, may I ask what changes are likely to result in fish handling and processing in the province of Newfoundland?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): I will be glad to take this question as notice and answer it later.

NATIONAL PARKS

TERRA NOVA—INQUIRY AS TO CHANGE IN EMPLOYMENT PROCEDURES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources if he has received a letter from the minister of mines and resources of Newfoundland regarding the difficulty being experienced by the people in Canning's Cove in the operation of the preference in employment in Terra Nova national park. If so, has the minister made any reply?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): No, Mr. Speaker. I might say to the hon. member that since he contacted me a couple of weeks ago I have been in touch with the superintendent in the park. Additional employment has taken place. There were a number of men hired there, but additional men were taken on to bring the staff up to full complement. It was not a large number, but I think this will help a little.

Mr. Pickersgill: I appreciate what the minister has said.

HIGHWAYS

MANITOBA—INQUIRY AS TO FEDERAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister a question totally unrelated to the one I put to him a moment ago. On June 10 I asked the minister whether an agreement had yet been concluded with the government of Manitoba for federal assistance for a large highway program which I believe would start at Gypsumville and go north to the Hudson bay railway, or somewhere in that area, between the lakes. I wonder if any progress has been made.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the two governments have agreed on the roads in question, involving a distance of some 800 or 900 miles. The province is already working on certain of the roads, but an agreement has not yet been signed.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is this part of the roads to resources program in Manitoba?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does that, then, limit the federal contribution to $1,500,000 a year?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the federal contribution is up to a maximum of $1,500,000 a year and a total contribution of up to one-half of $15 million over the period of the contract.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct another question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources arising out of the question raised by my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River. Have any agreements under the roads to resources program been signed with any of the provincial governments?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Yes, Mr. Speaker; one.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has an agreement been signed with the province of Newfoundland?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): No, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

FRANCE—STATEMENT ON REPORTED PROTEST AGAINST C.B.C. TELEVISION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Leader of the Opposition asked me whether there was any foundation for the report that the premier of France found it necessary to summon the Canadian ambassador in order to protest the appearance of two Algerian rebels on a Canadian Broadcasting Corporation television program. The hon. member requested, if the report were accurate, that I tell the house what stand was taken by the Canadian representative in respect of this matter.

The only publication that I have been able to find containing a report of this kind consisted of a letter published in the Globe and Mail, written by someone who obviously is not very friendly to France. The facts are that there was no such thing as the premier of France finding it necessary to summon the Canadian ambassador before him. There were protests made to the Canadian ambassador in Paris and also made in Ottawa by the French ambassador to Canada. In each case it was explained that the C.B.C. has an independent status in this country, so it is not just a matter of course that programs of this kind could be stopped by the government.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. It is a fact then, is it not, that no action was taken by the government in respect of the request for these two Algerians to appear on the C.B.C.?

Mr. Green: The protests were drawn to the attention of the Minister of National Revenue, who reports to parliament for the C.B.C. Apparently protests of this kind have been made on earlier occasions by different countries.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Revenue whether he took any action in this matter?

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): As I explained in another place, before the parliamentary committee, —and I brought in the name of the official— I received a telephone call from Mr. Norman Robertson, the Under-Secretary of State, who in the absence of his minister that day called me personally and said that the two protests —I believe that was the word he used—one in Paris and one of which he knew personally made by the French ambassador here had been brought to the department. He was passing this information on to me for such action as I thought was proper under the circumstances.

As a result I called the C.B.C. office and contacted Mr. Bushnell, the acting president, directly. I told him the message I had received from the Under-Secretary of State and advised him that he should take such action as the corporation saw fit in view of the nature of these protests.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

ONTARIO—INQUIRY AS TO PURCHASE OF GASOLINE FOR SCOOTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Azellus Denis (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Postmaster General a question? Is the minister aware that there is a gasoline price war on in Ontario, and that gasoline prices are down 16 cents a gallon? If so, does he intend to take advantage of this situation to lay in a supply of gas for use in his American "scooters"?

(Text):

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, to one of the most remarkable questions that has ever been asked in this house, I can only say no.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

INQUIRY AS TO COMPLIANCE WITH ORDERS OF THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the Secretary of State if he would, on Monday or Tuesday, indicate to the house which orders of the house have not yet been complied with and how soon we may expect them to be complied with, in view of the nearness of the end of the session.

Hon. Henri Courtemanche (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I will do that with pleasure.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Royal Canadian Air Force—

221. Operation and maintenance, $546,991,000.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, just before the house rose last night the Leader of the Opposition asked for some information regarding the procedures which had been followed to enable the government to reach a decision as to the plane which would be selected to re-equip certain squadrons of the air division of the R.C.A.F. in Europe. I explained briefly last night the procedure and the methods which had been followed. I should like to repeat that today and elaborate a little so as to give the Leader of the Opposition all the information I have at my disposal.

It will be recalled that the F-86 had been in operation in Europe for some time, and it was therefore becoming obvious that sooner or later this aircraft would have to be replaced. About a year and a half ago a committee of experts in the R.C.A.F. was set up to investigate the various alternative planes which were then in existence or which were even on the drawing boards at that time.

That committee of experts has been carrying out examinations ever since that date. It has been a continuous exercise in which every possible endeavour has been made to ascertain the most suitable aircraft to be employed by the air force. Of course a final decision could not be reached until early this year, when the exact role which the air force would be required to carry out in Europe became clearer.

The committee of experts repeatedly reported to the chief of the air staff, who kept personally conversant with every examination and test made. The chief of the air staff kept me informed periodically as these examinations and evaluations were continued. He also kept the chiefs of staff committee informed of their progress.

Gradually certain types of aircraft were eliminated by the R.C.A.F. because they did not meet the operational requirements which were set out. All examinations made by the R.C.A.F. experts were based purely on military and operational grounds. As the R.C.A.F. was reaching a conclusion, meetings of the chiefs of staff were held almost daily on this matter so there could be combined recommendations made by the chiefs of staff committee.

Subsequently those recommendations were submitted to the cabinet defence committee. When they were submitted to the cabinet defence committee, and in fact before they had been submitted, the closest touch was maintained with the officials of the Department of Defence Production; and while the recommendations from my department were based entirely on military and operational grounds, the Department of Defence Production officials also took into consideration the various matters connected with the production of these types of aircraft, the way in which they could be produced here in Canada, and went into details regarding costs, etc., of the different types which were under examination. Finally, after the cabinet defence committee was prepared to make a recommendation to cabinet as a whole, the matter was considered by cabinet as a whole.

It might be of some interest to hon. members opposite to know some of the types of aircraft which were examined. I will just mention a few of them. Actually nearly 20 or more types of aircraft were given an examination of some kind or another, but some of the principal ones which were given an exhaustive examination were the F-102 Convair, the F11-1F Super Tiger Grumman, the Blackburn NA-39 and the Blackburn 109, the Northrop 156, the McDonnell F-4H and the McDonnell F-101C, the Lockheed 104, the French Mirage made by Marcel Dassault, the Republic 105, the A-IIIJ North American and the CF-100 and F-86 to see whether they could be converted to the role.

Among the criteria which were set out in order to enable a just assessment to be made was suitability to the role which was given to us when General Norstad visited Ottawa a few weeks ago. Of course the serviceability of the aircraft had to be given high consideration, and the availability; when could this aircraft come into service? Then on the economic side, the cost and the amount of work which might be provided in Canada had to be considered. Could these planes be manufactured under licence or would they have to be bought outright? There was the question of production sharing, how much work could be carried out in Canada on other projects which were being carried out by some of these companies. Would they share the production with our own industry in making parts for some of the aircraft which might be used by the United States air force or by civilian operations?

In fact I can say that the decision was based on military, operational and economic grounds. A question was asked yesterday, could not a larger type of aircraft—mind you, the size of the aircraft governs the cost—have been used in fewer numbers than a smaller aircraft which would, for each copy, cost less than a larger one? It was emphatically stated that from the military and operational requirements point of view those requirements could not be met with a fewer number of aircraft. In fact, for a strike reconnaissance role rather small aircraft are preferred.

I believe this gives some indication of the extended and exhaustive studies which were made. Yesterday we were told we should have reached this decision months ago. Why was this decision not taken last December? No sooner had we been accused of being dilatory in that respect than we were told we had selected the wrong aircraft. I can assure hon. members that this government does not apologize for having taken considerable time to make a thorough examination so as to be certain that the taxpayers' money was being spent to the best advantage. As a result of this prolonged examination the cabinet did come to the conclusion that they would re-equip the air division with the Lockheed 104G, the "G" being the mark of that particular series or family of aircraft. I am satisfied that the taxpayers' money is being spent to the best advantage by the purchase of this particular aircraft.

This is a proven aricraft. It is supersonic. It is a small aircraft with a very high performance. It can also be refueled in the air, so it could be deployed in Europe or in any other part of the world in order to carry out its strike reconnaissance role. There are various types of this family of aircraft already in operation. They are in operation with the United States air force on this continent, in Europe, in Turkey and in the Far East. I emphasize the fact that they are in operation in Europe and the commander in chief of the European forces, General Norstad, has expressed satisfaction with this type of aircraft, and has indicated to this government that the re-equipment of the air division squadrons with the "G" variety of the 104 will be entirely acceptable to him.

The other day in speaking here I mentioned that it has been noted that the Federal Republic of Germany is also re-equipping its squadrons, which today are equipped with the same aircraft as our squadrons, the F-86, with this F-104G for a strike reconnaissance role. As a matter of fact we have been in close consultation with the Germans for a number of months on this matter. We have had teams of the R.C.A.F. in Europe in order to find out how the independent assessment made by the Germans was progressing, and which aircraft they were going to accept. It would be interesting, I think, to hon. members to learn that as late as March 31 a contract was signed between the government of the Federal Republic of Germany and the company concerned for the acquisition of a number of these aircraft. Even more recently, only last week, we had officers of the R.C.A.F. in Paris conferring with their German colleagues, and the latter expressed satisfaction that the German air force had in this particular aircraft.

Now, of course, the advocates of other types of aircraft will naturally belittle the type which has been successful. An unsuccesful competitor will naturally feel disappointed that he has not received an order. I might say that for months I have been subjected, as have the officers of the R.C.A.F. and the Minister of Defence Production, to daily visits from the representatives of these various companies. They have enlarged upon the benefits of their own particular aircraft. I have at all times endeavoured to take a detached point of view in order not to be prejudiced in favour of one or the other type of aircraft. I have listened patiently to all their representations. These have been recorded; they have been examined again and again by the officials of my department and the officials of the Department of Defence Production.

I must say some of the statements made by the hon. member for Trinity yesterday were exactly the same as some of the statements which have been made in my office. But we had the facilities for testing the accuracy of those statements, and they have been tested.

Mr. Hellyer: It is too bad you did not use them.

Mr. Pearkes: I am quite certain that no matter what plane this government had selected for re-equipping this air division, because of the variety of excellent planes I have already mentioned today the opposition would have chosen some other one. It would not have mattered in the least what plane we would have taken, they would have chosen some other plane—

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege—

Mr. Pearkes: —and would have bedevilled us.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I understand the hon. member is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Hellyer: That is quite correct, Mr. Chairman. The statement the minister has just made is without any foundation whatsoever.

Mr. Drysdale: What is your question of privilege?

Mr. Hellyer: There are other planes which this government could have chosen.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member is just making a contradiction. That is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the minister made the allegation that no matter what plane the government chose we would have said they should have chosen some other. That is not so. It is a reflection on the integrity of the opposition, and it should not be allowed to stand on the record.

The Deputy Chairman: Will the hon. member please take his seat. It is a question of argument, not a question of privilege, in my opinion.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I made that statement. It is a statement of fact. Naturally the opposition would have done that; they would have chosen some other plane and advocated, just exactly as the representatives of the various companies advocated, the strong points of the other one. You can take your choice. These are all good planes. They have certain characteristics which are or are not capable of meeting the military requirements or the economic requirements. These have, as I say, been thoroughly examined and tested during the past few months.

We have also considered how quickly pilots who were accustomed to operating the F-86 could be trained to operate a new plane which was acceptable. That has been shown, and our pilots have already flown the F-104, not the 104-G but the other models of this aircraft. They have already flown it and they have demonstrated their ability to change very quickly from flying the Sabre jet, the F-86, to flying the 104.

With respect to some of the utterly erroneous, exaggerated and irresponsible statements made by the hon. member for Trinity, I would like to call attention to some of these facts. He says this aircraft was grounded two years ago. Has not practically every aircraft which is in operation today been grounded at some time or other? I recall that the Comet II was grounded a number of years ago for a very long period. Is the hon. member going to stand up and say that the Comet IV of today, which is regarded as the best aircraft of its type anywhere in the world, because a previous mark or type of that aircraft was grounded a few years ago, is of no ruddy use?

Mr. Hellyer: I did not say that.

Mr. Pearkes: I know you did not; you said that about the other plane, but for exactly the same reason—

Mr. Hellyer: I said that the faults had now likely been corrected.

Mr. Pearkes: Of course you did.

Mr. Hellyer: Of course I did.

Mr. Pearkes: But you said, as one of the reasons that the 104-G was no ruddy use, that it had been grounded two years ago.

Mr. Hellyer: I did not say it was one of the reasons.

Mr. Pearkes: Then the hon. member went on discussing at considerable length the qualities of the original 104. The original 104 was designed, as he said correctly, for the purpose of aerial combat. It attained great distinction in being able to fly at great height, and was regarded as one of the superior aircraft of that period for its particular mission at that time. But that is not the plane we are getting. We are getting the advanced edition of that particular family of aircraft, one which is having special characteristics introduced into its framework and over-all picture in order that it can carry out the attack reconnaissance plan.

The hon. member did say that the faults which had been discovered during the period of development and in the early operational stages have now been corrected. We are taking advantage of the fact that this aircraft has been proved. We are not in the position of having to pay large sums of money for the development of this aircraft, or to wait for a number of years until it has been thoroughly tested. It is a tested and proven aircraft, stable in frame and absolutely operational, sound for the role for which it is designed.

Then the hon. member referred to the fatality rate and the accident rate. In my office I heard the same figures quoted that the hon. member mentioned, and then I call attention to the fact that fatality and accident rates are never released by any government. We never release any fatality percentages or rates, nor does the United States. These were figures which were given—

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether he has read the hearings before the congressional defence committee on this particular point of fatality rates?

Mr. Pearkes: These fatality rates, as I say, are not released officially.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the minister saying that the Americans do not under any circumstances release fatality rates?

Mr. Pearkes: I am saying that the Americans do not release officially the fatality rates or accident rates as between different types of aircraft.

Mr. Hellyer: You do not release them.

Mr. Pearkes: The figures may be expressed by individual officers, but there is no official statement on that matter.

Mr. Hellyer: Pretty official from the men who fly them.

Mr. Pearkes: It may be pretty official in the hon. member's eyes. Judging by the utterly irresponsible statements the hon. member was making yesterday I think he would believe that anything which is in print is official in that regard.

Mr. Hellyer: We will see who is irresponsible.

Mr. Pearson: We will give you the rates.

Mr. Pearkes: I can say without any fear of contradiction by anybody who has the facts that the accident rate, even in the early days of the first 104, was not abnormal. You cannot fly aircraft without having casualties; there are bound to be casualties, but it is quite wrong to suggest that this aircraft is not airworthy and has any higher accident rate than other aircraft. Therefore I repeat, the statements which were made last night were inaccurate, they were misleading and were stated without any real sense of responsibility. They are purely hearsay evidence by prejudiced personnel.

In closing, I do not think I can do better than refer to a very well-known book, which I am sure all hon. members here have read. I refer to "Pilgrim's Progress". It may be remembered that when Mr. Valiant for Truth was nearly reaching the celestial city he met three men, one of whose name was Wildhead, who approached him and endeavoured to persuade him not to proceed by telling him of the terrible dangers and difficulties which he exaggerated, and he urged him to turn back. Then you will probably recall that Mr. Valiant for Truth remarked about this adventure in these words:

> Who so beset him round
> With dismal stories,
> Do but themselves confound.

I think the dismal stories which were advanced last night by the hon. member for Trinity have utterly confounded him in the eyes of all those who know what they are talking about.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the minister no doubt thinks that by his quotation from "Pilgrim's Progress" he has knocked the stuffing out of our case, that perhaps some questioning in regard to this decision of the government is required. We on this side do not question the detachment or the desire of the minister to make the right decision, and we do not question his right to insist that this was the right decision and was the best plane; that the other planes were inferior and this was the right one. Therefore I should think he would want to show us the same consideration when we do question the possibility of this being the right decision. It is our duty and it is our right to criticize him, and I hope we can do so without the minister imputing motives to us of the kind he has already suggested.

We will have a good many questions to ask the minister, and by his replies he may be able to show that this is undoubtedly the best plane, the most economical plane and the best in every way; but we are going to ask him these questions and we will expect the detailed information in reply to those questions which will, at least in his view, confirm the decision he has made.

Before we begin to ask these questions of detail regarding capability, performance and all that kind of thing, I would like to make some more general observations and ask him some more general questions which will provide the foundation, I hope, for the subsequent questions. I would ask the minister if he could explain in some detail, because it is a very important matter, the nature of the new role that is now being undertaken by part of the Canadian air division attached to the NATO forces in Europe. It is a new role; it is bound to be a difficult role, a role of responsibility. Perhaps it is a new departure in our participation in NATO military activity in Europe, and I think the committee would like to know something about it.

The minister has called it a strike reconnaissance role. He has also, I think, referred to it, or it has been referred to, as a strike attack role. We would like to know exactly what this change involves as far as the remaining squadrons—I think four CF-100 squadrons, although I may be wrong in that figure—are concerned. The minister said last night that they will continue the role they have been performing in Europe. Perhaps the minister will explain to us how they will be able to carry out that role in the future. They will no doubt be functionally detached from the new squadrons and will be carrying out the old role in new conditions of capability of attack. But we are more interested at the moment in the picture of the new strike attack or new strike reconnaissance role and what it involves for the R.C.A.F.

We are also interested, as I know the committee will be, in the conditions under which this new NATO role will have to be carried out. I understand, and the minister will correct me if I am wrong, that the headquarters of six of the twelve R.C.A.F. squadrons are located in France; the others are in Germany. I believe it is the case, and again the minister will correct me if I am wrong, that France has not seen fit to integrate her own air forces with the NATO forces under NATO command. Also, France in the exercise of her sovereign rights has not found it possible to facilitate certain plans of the United States as part of European NATO forces for the storage and use of nuclear weapons which the United States consider to be an indispensable part of the NATO forces and which indeed, as was pointed out yesterday, General Norstad has said is the capability on which all NATO planning and tactics are now based.

As a result of this stand taken at the present time by France—perhaps France may reverse her decision—the United States air forces contemplate leaving the NATO air fields in France for other sites where these difficulties will not be encountered. Therefore the minister might tell the committee in some greater detail than he did when I asked him a question about this the other day what will happen if the United States feels it must make that decision. I suppose the result would be that the only foreign squadrons—by "foreign" I mean non-French squadrons—left in France would be those of the R.C.A.F. I believe it is also true that at the present time the Canadian air units depend for their logistics and their supply on the United States military pipe line. They get their ammunition, their aviation fuel and their rations through that United States pipe line.

Therefore I ask, because I think the question is particularly pertinent at this time when we are contemplating the re-equipment of Canadian air squadrons in France, how these squadrons could be maintained economically if all this was cut off, quite apart from the fact, although this is not strictly relevant to this particular question but perhaps I might mention it, that this whole system of NATO infrastructure will be very seriously affected, communications, the oil pipe line and all the rest of it, if the United States squadrons feel that they have to leave France. Surely this is an important thing to know before we discuss in detail the nature of the decision reached by the government to re-equip these squadrons, and perhaps the minister would be good enough at this time to deal with these two somewhat background subjects.

Mr. Pearkes: First of all, dealing with the new role, it is that of strike reconnaissance. I explained in some detail when I was speaking the day before yesterday what that role was. I pointed out how the Russian ground troops are in considerable numbers along the Russian border and in satellite countries. If the Russians started a war those troops would very likely move through to overrun the countries of western Europe.

It is desirable in the first place to have reconnaissance aircraft which are fast and able to get information as to the movement of columns so those columns can be engaged either by those aircraft or by other means at the disposal of the commander; for instance, by missiles such as the Lacrosse which we will have in our own brigades in the not far distant future. I think that is a fairly obvious role. It is necessary to have this reconnaissance work carried out; and it is essential, now that the means of engaging aircraft have been made more effective, that these planes be small and fast.

In addition there might be targets of opportunity. One might find that there would be a moving column of armoured fighting vehicles. It would be difficult to attack such a column with missiles because it would be moving; it would be much easier to use missiles against ground and stationary targets such as airfields. So in addition to the reconnaissance role which would be performed by this aircraft it would also have the power to attack targets of opportunity as they arose.

If we were to go one step further and take a longer view, this is all part of the contribution to the deterrent which makes it quite obvious to the Russians that it is not worth while launching their attack through western Europe because we have the means of locating and attacking their columns if they advance; and if we are equipped with the latest weapons of attack, the destruction to advancing columns might be very, very heavy. So it is as part of our western deterrent, part of our endeavour to preserve the peace, that we are equipping these aircraft and having them prepared for this new role.

Mr. Pearson: Before the minister leaves that point, may I ask him whether it is part of his argument—and I think he has just said this; perhaps he would elaborate on it—that missiles are less effective against moving targets than this type of strike reconnaissance plane?

Mr. Pearkes: I think my words were that it might be more difficult for missiles to attack a moving target. Obviously there is more flexibility with aircraft than there is with a missile in its present state of development, when it is designed as a ground to ground weapon.

Regarding the maintenance of the squadrons which are in France, it is perfectly correct that at the present time we have the headquarters of the air division and six squadrons located on French soil. The other six squadrons are located on German soil. There are alternate air fields selected for these squadrons so that in a period of operations or in an emergency these squadrons could be moved to a different air field. It would not be a very difficult matter if it were found necessary, in the hypothetical situation which the Leader of the Opposition presented, to move the six squadrons which are in France to German air fields and double up there or occupy other alternate fields; or it might be necessary to move them somewhere else.

So far as we know at the present time however, it would be the intention of the Americans to maintain their pipe line to their French bases. The bases will probably remain, and there are other aircraft of the United States air force in France which would not be equipped with nuclear weapons. So that at the present time, while we are looking into the various possibilities and thinking about this matter, no firm decision has been reached as to what would be necessary, and it is not necessary to make a firm decision until we know exactly what course will be taken by the French government and by the United States.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps I might complete that part of my question by saying I devoutly hope, as I am sure the minister does, that this contingency will never arise and that the French and United States governments may be able to solve their difficulties with regard to this important problem of the control of NATO atomic weapons. But I assume that if the difficulty does arise and the United States has to make arrangements to take most of its squadrons out of France, the Canadian squadrons could if necessary, be moved to other air fields; or, if they were kept in France, they would still be on a United States pipe line even though it might be a little more difficult and expensive than the present arrangement.

Mr. Pearkes: That is correct. No decision has been reached, nor could it be reached, to move them at the present time. I think it would be most undesirable to move them now, because I share the hope expressed by the Leader of the Opposition that the two governments principally concerned will be able to reach a satisfactory agreement.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister would be good enough to let the committee know whether the Lockheed F-104 was in fact the plane he recommended as his selection to the cabinet defence committee.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I cannot disclose, and I do not intend to disclose, the discussions which took place in the cabinet defence committee, and I am not going to say whether I recommended it or whether anybody else recommended another plane. The matter was thoroughly discussed, and on military, operational and economic grounds the selection was made. It was a cabinet decision. Naturally all members of the cabinet thoroughly endorsed that decision.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether the chiefs of staff recommended more than one plane to the cabinet defence committee.

Mr. Pearkes: The chiefs of staff made an appraisal of the value of several planes, and the pros and cons were considered by them with respect to each of the different types and they made a recommendation.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister tell us if in that evaluation the chiefs of staff gave a priority on the basis of their rating?

Mr. Pearkes: I think it is a time-honoured policy which has been followed by this and the preceding government that the recommendations of the servants of the government are not disclosed in public. I do not think it is right to ask me to say whether the chiefs of staff recommended this or that plane. If I were to say today that the chiefs of staff did recommend a certain plane it may be that at some future time the government would have to take a decision which was not entirely compatible with the recommendations of the chiefs of staff. The opposition would then say, "Well, you did say that the chiefs of staff made this recommendation," and we might be in a difficult position. I say that the military and economic information was placed before the cabinet and that the decision of the government was based on military and economic grounds.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I did not ask the minister to tell me which plane the chiefs of staff committee recommended. I merely asked if they had given a priority, one over the other, on the basis of their evaluation. It may be a time-honoured custom not to make public the recommendations of governmental advisors, and that is probably an excellent principle which has long been held, but it is an equally time-honoured and a most important proviso that ministers of the crown, when asking for sums of money from the public purse in such astronomical amounts as $1.7 billion, should give this committee enough information on which to make an intelligent decision. That the minister is not doing.

Mr. Pearkes: I am quite prepared to go this far. I can tell the committee that the chiefs of staff did make a firm recommendation for a certain plane.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the minister has laid down a principle to which I certainly take no exception; that civil servants, whether they are military or civil, should not be brought into parliamentary discussions as justification for any action of the government one way or the other. That is a principle which has not been invariably observed in the last year or so. I would mention to the minister that earlier in this session the Prime Minister quoted a recommendation, or an approval or decision, of the chiefs of staff as justification for certain actions being taken by the government.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister would give the committee for its information the number of hours that each of the following planes was flown by R.C.A.F. pilots for evaluation purposes. Perhaps the minister would like to make a note of the planes:

French Mirage
Grumman Super Tiger F-11-F
Blackburn NA-39
Northrop 156-F (or any other mark)
Lockheed F-104G
Republic F-105

Mr. Pearkes: Obviously, Mr. Chairman, I would not have that information readily available, and it will have to be acquired.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the minister said that one consideration—and I am sure it was an important one in the minds of the government in this decision—was the availability of the aircraft in question. Can he inform the committee whether other aircraft under consideration were equally available as the one that was quoted?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, Mr. Chairman, some could have been purchased outright.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister could tell us the maximum climbing incidence for the F-104?

Mr. Pearkes: These are technical details which are considered classified regarding aircraft, and it is unreasonable to expect me to disclose here in public all the technical details regarding aircraft we are acquiring in order, if necessary, to fight the battle for the defence of Canada and of the west. Surely if we give all these technical details to a potential enemy his task is simplified. I do not think I should be called upon to answer such questions.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I understand that the NATO military authorities had what I could perhaps call a competition, though that may not be exactly the right word, to decide on a suitable strike fighter for NATO use in what was, I think, a most praiseworthy effort to agree that there should be one plane for this purpose only, and that as a result of this examination or competition, or whatever you wish to call it, the NATO military authorities chose a Fiat designed strike fighter as the best developed yet for this purpose.

I believe the minister said this plane was considered. If it was, would he tell us what efforts were made to test its capabilities and why, when it was considered by NATO as the best strike fighter designed for that purpose, it was not possible to go along with that decision? There were United States planes considered by NATO at that time when agreement was sought to be reached in NATO concerning the best strike fighter available for NATO use.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, Mr. Chairman, efforts have been made over many years to standardize the various types of equipment which are used by our NATO partners. No one can claim that those efforts have been very successful. There are conflicts between the different nations, making it extremely difficult for one type of equipment to be accepted by all nations.

The type of aircraft to which the Leader of the Opposition referred was the G-91. That was an aircraft for the direct support of troops. It had a role different from that which is being given to the squadrons of the R.C.A.F. in their strike reconnaissance. It was designed for direct tactical support of ground troops.

Mr. Pearson: Perhaps this is a matter of semantics, but this plane is always referred to as a strike fighter. We talk about the present F-104 as a strike fighter and reconnaissance plane. I take it then that the roles of these two planes are quite different in the NATO organization?

Mr. Pearkes: That is my understanding. They have two different roles.

Mr. Pearson: In order to confirm the statement I made earlier I wish to say this. When the minister said we should not ask him whether the chiefs of staff recommended this or that, or whether they made recommendations, I recall that on February 23, 1959, in discussing the CF-105 the Prime Minister quoted the advice of the chiefs of staff and their view that this aircraft to all intents would be obsolete by the time it became available for squadron services as the reason for the government making the decision it did.

Mr. Pearkes: If the Prime Minister thinks it is advisable in certain particular cases to make such a statement, that is his prerogative.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the Minister of National Defence, in commenting on my remarks last night, has reflected on my motives and my integrity in putting them forward. I attempted to raise a question of privilege, but without success. I state now categorically that I have no motive whatsoever in putting them forward except to see that Canadian taxpayers shall get the best value for their dollars, and that if R.C.A.F. airmen are going to be stationed in Europe to help protect us in a hostile world they shall have the best possible equipment available.

The minister started his rebuttal by saying that all the information was at his disposal, and that he had a committee of experts of the Royal Canadian Air Force who had been working for months on the problem of selecting a new plane to re-equip the air division. He later went on to list some of the major choices among the 20 that were evaluated by the Royal Canadian Air Force. Yet when we asked him this morning how many hours each of these planes was flown by R.C.A.F. pilots he is not able to give that information off the cuff and does not have it in the records before him.

I wonder whether he has any other information on the evaluation which he can give us. Surely there is something not classified that he can tell the committee which at least would be partially reassuring to us. He told us that early this year it became clear what role the R.C.A.F. air division would be called upon to play, and apparently at that time the R.C.A.F. experts were able to weed out from the long list of planes they had been examining all those which were not designed or fitted for the strike reconnaissance role, and from that time forward all they had to do was concentrate on those planes which were particularly suited, through design or modification, as strike reconnaissance aircraft.

He told us that the chief of the air staff was kept fully informed by the evaluation teams. We are sure that is the case, and we would expect that the minister would be kept fully informed by the chief of the air staff. What we have not received any assurance on whatsoever is that either the advice of the chief of the air staff or the advice of the minister was taken by the government.

He told us that the R.C.A.F. evaluation was based on purely military and operational grounds, as of course it would be, and that a recommendation was finally made to cabinet defence committee. But, of course, that is classified information. We cannot find out what was the recommendation of the chiefs of staff committee. We have no indication whatsoever whether it was the first priority, second, third, fifth or sixth. Finally the minister told us that recommendations were made by the cabinet defence committee to the cabinet. Perhaps the minister would tell the committee if it is true that the decision was just made on Wednesday, the day before this debate began, or whether it was taken earlier.

We are informed that the Department of Defence Production went into the details of production, cost sharing, etc. When Right Hon. C. D. Howe was minister of defence production he always took the view that when the Royal Canadian Air Force or the Department of National Defence set the specifications for the equipment they required and told defence production which piece of military equipment they wanted, then the only role of defence production was to go out and get it. As a matter of fact, once Right Hon. C. D. Howe told the house facetiously that if the Department of National Defence put in a request for a gold plated piano he would have no recourse but to go out and buy it. Yet we are told today and expected to believe that the Department of National Defence went to the Department of Defence Production hat in hand and said, "We would like an airplane. Here is a whole list of airplanes. Which one would you like to buy for us?" How can that be called a military decision? How can that be called a decision based on the interests of the fighting men in Europe who have the responsibility of protecting life and limb for Canadians and all the people of the western world?

Then we are told by the minister that this plane is suited for the role, that its serviceability was a high consideration and also its availability. Let us consider some of the facets of this plane. Let us consider its suitability for the role. I told the committee last night that this plane was designed as a high altitude air superiority fighter, and the minister has not denied that fact this morning.

Mr. Pearkes: That was the original type, not the plane we are getting now. The plane we are getting now was never designed for that purpose.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder whether the minister would tell us exactly what the differences are between the original type and the type we are going to get. The minister and the committee should well know that you cannot have a plane which is designed to fill properly these two roles, high altitude air superiority fighting and low altitude reconnaissance and strike fighting.

Mr. Pearkes: I have said that.

Mr. Hellyer: You cannot design a high speed truck for highway use which is any good to you in the mud. Similarly you cannot take a mudder, put it on the highway and expect to get any speed out of it. It is precisely the same thing with aircraft. You cannot design an aircraft which works equally well at high altitudes and low altitudes. Certainly the R.C.A.F. knows that, certainly the defence department knows that, but perhaps the cabinet and cabinet defence committee do not know it.

Mr. Pearkes: What utter nonsence you are talking. There are two planes.

Mr. Hellyer: Just wait until I am finished you can answer then. This aircraft has one of the smallest wing areas and one of the smallest and thinnest wings of any aircraft in use today. What is the United States evaluation of it. The United States put in an order for 700 planes and later reduced it to 300. The United States are using them at the present time, but the only reason they are using them is that they have got them. If they had to order again they would not order them.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): How do you know? Substantiate these things.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister has made no effort to give us any information which would substantiate the government's decision.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: I am trying to give you some facts and you will not even listen. This plane, as I told the committee last night, has an engine which at the present time is the least reliable among the planes of the United States air force inventory. Consider this, Mr. Chairman. At high altitudes, of course, it does not make any difference, and the Lockheed Corporation boasts that the engine is almost powerful enough to pick the plane up without wings and hurtle it into the air. After you get to 50,000 or 60,000 feet, where it was designed to operate, what difference does it make whether your engine conks out when you can press a button, out you will go, your parachute will open and you will drift silently and gently down to somewhere? Consider, however, the strike reconnaissance role of an aircraft hurtling through the air at low altitudes of a few hundred or a few thousand feet when the engine ceases to function. The pilot has no time whatever to do any thinking. This aircraft, which has very small and very thin wings, under those circumstances will just plummet to the ground like a dead pigeon.

An hon. Member: Just like your argument.

Mr. Hellyer: It is among the most impractical of all aircraft to operate at low altitudes where there is high air density.

Then the minister went on to talk about the economic side. Before we leave the evaluation of this aircraft, I may say that we took from what the minister told us this morning that it had been considered by the R.C.A.F. experts all along. Let us check back on some of the records available. First of all, Mr. Chairman, here is a clipping dated May 20 of this year. It is from the Globe and Mail and was written by their Ottawa bureau. It is talking about the new role of the R.C.A.F. in Europe as a strike attack force. It says:

> Latest entry for consideration by the government as the aircraft with which to re-equip Canada's air division overseas is the French Mirage mark III—a single seater, delta-winged jet which flies at twice the speed of sound and can work as an interceptor or strike attack aircraft.

The article goes on to talk about the Dassault Company which manufactures this plane. Later in the same article there is this statement:

> Other aircraft being considered by the government include the British Blackburn NA-39, the Grumman Super Tiger and the Northrop 156. This latter aircraft, cheapest of the group, is not highly regarded by the R.C.A.F. which also has suggested the Blackburn is too slow for post-1960 conditions.

This is May 20, and there is no mention whatever of the Lockheed 104 as a possibility for the Royal Canadian Air Force.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No mention in that particular press story.

Mr. Hellyer: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): No mention in that particular press story.

Mr. Hellyer: That is right.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): You are basing your argument on newspaper stories.

Mr. Hellyer: Not on that story alone and certainly not to the extent the Prime Minister did in connection with Avro, when he used a whole series of press clippings; government by press clipping. In an article on May 14 headed "New Fighter for Avro", in the Toronto Daily Star, we find this:

> A new plan for joint production by the A. V. Roe Company of a U.S. designed strike-attack interceptor—the Republic F-159D—to re-equip U.S. and Canadian fighter squadrons in Europe has been put before the Canadian government.

The article goes on to talk about the possibility of production sharing for that aircraft, but makes no mention whatever of the F-104. They never heard of it for this role. Then the following night the Toronto evening Telegram, the government's chosen mouthpiece in Toronto, which has its own direct pipe line to the cabinet, in an editorial entitled "Planes for NATO Force"—

Mr. Pearkes: I must correct that statement, Mr. Chairman. No newspaper in Canada has its own pipe line to the Canadian cabinet.

Mr. Pearson: How naive do you think we are?

Mr. Hellyer: I do not think that interjection deserves any comment. This newspaper, which as I said is the government's organ in the city of Toronto had this to say in talking about the air division:

> The choice, if made, could be between a British jet plane, the Blackburn NA-39, and an American plane, the Republic Thunderchief 105-D. Inclusion of the Thunderchief represents a new factor in the R.C.A.F.'s and the government's problem.

There is no mention whatever of the F-104 as a possibility. Another article which was a bit earlier, March 4, in the Toronto Star, says:

> The new hope for Avro stems from the decision by R.C.A.F. planners that the U.S. Grumman Super Tiger, a 1,500 mile per hour ground attack plane, is the best plane to replace the aging Sabres now used by eight of the twelve R.C.A.F. squadrons in the air division in Europe.
>
> The R.C.A.F. recommendation in favour of the Super Tiger is now before the federal cabinet and there is a strong possibility the government may approve it.

Further along the article also says:

> At Bethpage, Long Island, a spokesman for the Grumman Aircraft Engineering Company said today in an interview that his firm expects to hear of a Canadian decision within a month.

This, Mr. Chairman, was on March 4 that he expected a government decision within a month, yet the decision was just announced this week choosing an aircraft which had not been mentioned during all these months. It would not be possible that the aircraft could have been considered during all these months or it would have been included in the newspaper stories because these newsmen have access, through all sorts of channels, to information that even the members of the house do not have.

Mr. Pearkes: I stated categorically that this aircraft had been under examination for a year and a half.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister has just compounded confusion by saying that this plane had been under consideration for a year and a half, yet he told us a few minutes ago that it was not until the end of last year that he knew what the role of the R.C.A.F. fighter division would be. If it was considered for a year and a half, it was considered as a day air superiority fighter and naturally would have been under consideration in that regard, but not as a strike reconnaissance plane. This is the reason it is not mentioned in any of these articles which have appeared in the press from time to time.

Here is an article which appeared on May 14, 1959 in the Globe and Mail, a newspaper which is not usually unfriendly to Conservative governments. The article refers to a visit here by General Norstad, the supreme commander in Europe of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. There is mention of a luncheon in Toronto and then of the decisions which the government would have to make. It says these are:

1. Whether to equip the Canadian brigade group in Europe with nuclear weapons.
2. Whether to change the role of the R.C.A.F. squadrons in Europe from interception to that of strike attack and tactical ground support. This would mean re-equipping most or all of the 12 squadrons with between 200 and 300 new strike attack aircraft, at a cost ranging between $200 million and $400 million.

Of the two issues, the future of the air division in Europe is considered the more pressing largely because a negative decision on the part of the government would virtually put the R.C.A.F. out of business in a few years time.

The article goes on to say:

R.C.A.F. evaluation teams have been visiting aircraft plants in the United States and Britain since last fall in a search for an aircraft to replace the Sabre in Europe. Recommendations were submitted to the government about two months ago, listing at least three aircraft in order of R.C.A.F. preference:

1. The Grumman F11F, or Super Tiger, to be produced by the Grumman Aircraft Company at Long Island, N.Y. This is a low-level attack aircraft, originally designed for aircraft carrier use, which could be modified to carry the radar needed for high level interception work as well.
2. The Blackburn NA-39, a naval aircraft built by the Blackburn and General Aircraft Company in Yorkshire, England. R.C.A.F. reservations about this aeroplane are understood to be that it is somewhat slower than its competitors.
3. The Northrop N-156F, built by the Northrop International Aircraft Company at Hawthorne, California. Its main advantage appears to be its cost—about $1 million complete against just under $2 million for the Super Tiger.

All three aircraft, it is understood, could be built in Canada under licence—

Then later in the article we find this:

Another proposal, however, developed only last month as a result of negotiations between Avro and the Republic Aircraft Corporation at Farmingdale, New York.

The proposal, as laid before defence minister Pearkes, defence production minister O'Hurley and Prime Minister Diefenbaker, was that if Canada would order Republic's new strike attack interceptor, the F-105D Thunderchief, for the air division in Europe, Republic would supply Avro with certain tooling at nominal cost, would agree to Avro making most of the airplane at Malton, and would also buy Avro-produced components for Republic's production of Thunderchiefs for U.S. air force requirements.

The article continues, Mr. Chairman, but there is no mention whatever of the F-104 Lockheed day fighter and air superiority fighter. It is not until just recently, Mr. Chairman, that we have any mention of the Lockheed at all; not until June 23, 1959 when the lobbying starts on parliament hill, that we hear of the Lockheed 104. In late June, months after other possibilities had been mentioned frequently—and I have here an article from the Ottawa Journal written by Dave McIntosh, entitled "U.S. Plane Builders Converge on 'hill'"—the real lobby begins. The article states:

The firms include Lockheed, Grumman, McDonnell, Northrop, Republic and the Convair division of General Dynamics.

Far from all these top-wheels in the aircraft business get to see a cabinet minister.

If they are extremely lucky—and this requires careful sounding out in advance through junior officials—they get in to see Prime Minister Diefenbaker.

At the same time, Mr. Chairman, members of parliament and the Canadian people begin to get in on the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation lobby. My, Mr. Chairman, you will never know the pressure that was put up by that corporation. They have sent to members of parliament copies of advertisements they have run in Canadian periodicals for the purpose of influencing both government members and the public at large. Here is a picture of the F-104 with its dainty gossamer wings, and below it are some statements about it which are not factual; they are misleading in many respects.

Mr. Morton: Will the hon. member permit a question? Can he tell us to which members of parliament these advertisements were sent?

Mr. Hellyer: I do not know.

Mr. Morton: I have not seen any.

Mr. Hellyer: I got one with a note asking me to phone them if I had any questions.

Mr. Pearson: They sent them out by the hundreds.

An hon. Member: Did you ask for them?

Mr. Hellyer: I did not ask anyone, they were quite gratuituous.

Mr. Pallett: The member for Trinity is the only one who received them.

Mr. Hellyer: In its own flowery description of this aircraft it says:

Lockheed's all-weather, multi-mission Starfighter is the world's outstanding fighter plane. Holder of the world's speed, altitude and seven time-to-climb records, the F-104 was recently purchased by West Germany for their own—and NATO's—use as a fighter-bomber, interceptor, superiority fighter, and advanced reconnaissance plane.

Now, Mr. Chairman, anybody reading this who knows anything about airplanes would stop and say, "This advertisement should be taken out of the paper" on the basis of the proposed new legislation having to do with misleading advertising. The advertisement goes on:

In addition to increased range and flexibility, the F-104 can be deployed to any combat area in the world within twenty-four hours. It is capable of delivering a wide variety of weapons, day or night, in any kind of weather.

That, Mr. Chairman, of course is misleading as well.

I continue:

> Despite this the F-104 is the most economical fighter plane currently available for U.S. defence needs, in terms of initial purchase price and maintenance and operating costs.

How can a plane which has to have its engines changed more often than every 100 hours be the most economical fighter plane to maintain? It just does not make any sense at all. In the minister's own words of a few moments ago, it is nonsense.

The advertisement continues:

> Never before has a single airplane done so many things so well. The F-104's performance and versatility are unmatched by any other operational aircraft, either flying today or programmed for the 1960-65 time period.

If you read the evidence before the United States house appropriations committee, Mr. Chairman, you know this statement is not in accordance with the facts, and I hope the cabinet defence committee did not make its evaluation from reading this advertisement.

> Never before has a single airplane done so many things so well.

This is repudiated categorically by the evidence before the United States appropriation committee.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Will the hon. member permit a question? Has he had consultation with those other aircraft firms?

Mr. Hellyer: I shall mention that in just a few moments if the hon. member will contain his soul in patience. I hold in my hand another very classy looking advertisement. This deal, Mr. Chairman, may not have benefited the Canadian taxpayer directly. It may not benefit the R.C.A.F., it may not keep our NATO forces as strong as they should be, but it has been a bit of a bonanza for the newspaper publishers. This advertisement shows a Starfighter flying high with German markings.

Mr. Hanbidge: Are you going to put that in as Exhibit A?

Mr. Hellyer: This is Exhibit B. The next advertisement, Mr. Chairman, is even more subtle. Here Lockheed had their public relations people right on their toes. This lobby was grinding out its effort to secure the Canadian order. It is a picture of the F-104 against the background of a crown, in three different poses, appealing to our sympathy for royalty. How clever; how timely; how subtle can an aircraft lobby be? Then we were told by the minister about the selection by the federal German republic. I hold in my hand a page from the Lockheed Star, the official publication of the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation. It says:

> Plans, patience, performance sell Germans.

An hon. Member: What is the date?

Mr. Hellyer: I do not know. There does not seem to be a date on it. If you read this through, Mr. Chairman—and I would suggest that the minister should—you will have some very serious doubts about the way in which the F-104 was evaluated for the German air force. You will see that the impression that was given was that of a prestige weapon. I read this:

> What impressed the Germans most about our fighter?

One executive of the company asked another. The reply was:

> "Low time to mach 2," is Colman's quick reply.

Then, Mr. Chairman, there is something else which is very interesting. The minister told us today we picked this plane because it has been adapted for some new role as a strike fighter, yet here it says:

> Out of talks grew a new idea. The Germans didn't want an of-the-shelf airplane. They wanted an improved model, with more all-weather capabilities, more electronics.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. It is one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, at one o'clock I was discussing the choice of the F-104 by the West German government, and I was quoting from the Lockheed Star, the paper of the Lockheed aircraft plant, where it describes some of the tests and evaluations made by the German officers before recommending acquisition of the F-104. I would like to quote, if I may, a few paragraphs from it which will give the committee some indication of what characteristics the West German government were looking for. It says:

> This visit earned a return from the Germans in December. We were ready then with our biggest weapon—the F-104 itself—and a set of U.S.A.F. clearances that gave the Germans their first chance to fly a Mach 2 airplane with wings so small they almost doubted it would do all the things we claimed for it.
> "And this was the turning point," says Colman. "We took drastic steps this trip that paid off big."

Later, Mr. Chairman, it says:

A pair of F-104's was ferried to Edwards. First on the agenda was a flight and landing demonstration by company pilots.

Grumman was first. The F-11F dropped down in typical carrier-landing fashion. The fighter stopped in an impressively short distance. But a wheel locked and a tire blew in the process, taking the edge off the performance.

And Lou Schalk did even better with the Starfighter. He made a gentle landing, not even using the drag chute, and pulled up neatly with a 455-foot shorter roll.

Then Col. Albert Werner flew the F-104; Maj. Walter Krupinski the F-11F. Object was to race to 50,000 feet.

Col. Werner took the F-104 to 35,000, accelerated to 1122 mph, and nosed up to 50,000 feet. He completed his mission—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to advise the hon. member that his time has expired. Shall the item carry?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister just one or two questions. The first is as to whether this particular plane, the F-104G, was recommended to him by these technical and military advisers as the plane most suitable for discharging the new role of the air division in Europe? Perhaps the minister would deal with that question first.

Mr. Pearkes: I think the hon. Leader of the Opposition gave the answer this morning when he said that it was not the policy of the government to express or to declare anything about the advice they receive from their military or civilian chiefs.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I said that that principle which the minister has enunciated is a reasonable one, but I also pointed out to the minister that when we were dealing with a situation which is partly responsible for the position we face today the Prime Minister gave a decision made by the government based on technical information which he had received from the chiefs of staff as justification for that decision. Therefore I thought it quite fitting in similar circumstances to ask the minister whether the technical and military advisers of the government—I am not mentioning them by name or position—had recommended this plane as the most suitable to the minister for the function which it was to perform. If the minister cannot answer that question, and certainly the Prime Minister answered it or volunteered an answer to it, would the minister tell us whether he has recommended this plane to the cabinet as the most suitable plane for the role in which it is to function?

Mr. Pearkes: The cabinet was given all the information possible regarding this and other planes, and in view of the information that they received the cabinet made the decision to re-equip the air division with this aircraft.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the minister made quite a point this morning out of the fact that the plane he suggested we were talking about, the F-104, was not the same as the plane which has been accepted by the government for re-equipping the air division, the F-104G. He gave the impression that the F-104G is a different type of plane, that something had been done to it which made it more suitable to discharge its function than the F-104, and that our criticisms of the F-104 and the criticisms we levelled generally were based on the F-104 and did not apply to the F-104G. This is a very important point because if in fact the F-104G is something new and was tested as such—that is to say, as an F-104G—surely the committee should know what are the changes which have removed the disability under which the earlier version, the F-104, operated. Perhaps the minister could tell us what these changes are to the F-104G which have made it a more suitable plane for the purposes we have in mind?

Mr. Pearkes: There have been very material changes made in the F-104 as originally designed, developed and produced. In the new version of the F-104, which is the F-104G, those technical changes were made in order to make this plane capable of flying at high speed at low altitude, and to provide additional safety to the pilot flying this aircraft at low altitudes.

Mr. Pearson: When the minister said, as he did this morning, that this plane along with others was tested by R.C.A.F. and other Canadian pilots before the decision was made, can he give the committee an assurance that it is the most modern version of the plane, the F-104G, which was actually flown and tested by Canadian pilots with the changes which he has just mentioned?

Mr. Pearkes: No. The R.C.A.F. pilots who flew the F-104 were flying an earlier version of the F-104 than the G. The G is the modified version that can carry out the low flight role which is required of it by the air division.

Mr. Pearson: Is the committee to understand that the model F-104G which is the version of the plane considered suitable for the role which is now to be entrusted to the Canadian air division has not been flown or tested by Canadian pilots?

Mr. Pearkes: That is correct. It has not been flown by Canadian pilots.

Mr. Hellyer: If I may resume where I left off—

Colonel Werner took the F-104 to 35,000, accelerated to 1,122 mph and nosed up to 50,000 feet. He completed his mission in 4 minutes, 57 seconds. No call from Major Krupinski. After 6 minutes, officials called him.

"Wo sind Sie, Krupinski?" he was asked.

"I am still at thirty five thousand, trying to accelerate past one point three," came the reply.

The next day, the late Jake Holliman provided the clincher. With a navy simulated mirror-type landing aid, he touched down in the first of hundreds of prevision spot landing demonstration that he later did almost daily for observers.

The Germans came away convinced.

Later on the article says:

Out of talks grew a new idea. The Germans didn't want an off-the-shelf airplane. They wanted an improved model, with more all weather capabilities, more electronics.

And here we have just received confirmation from the minister that what the Germans want is a redesigned F-104. After all we have heard about this country not being in a position to develop a new weapon system we embark on another program of redesigning which will enable an aircraft not designed to do strike reconnaissance work to do the job which it was not designed to do.

The important thing about strike reconnaissance is not its ability to get to 50,000 feet fast. I should like to quote from Aviation Week of June 29 in further illustration of the German requirements in this matter:

General Brohon, who said it was impossible for France to expend the capital outlay needed to do the job, also called on the U.S. to provide his division in particular, and France in general, with an effective replacement aircraft to carry out the division's primary mission—reconnaissance. He would like most, he said, to see a reconnaissance version of the Lockheed F-104 developed by the U.S. and supplied to him under mutual security funds. Without such a replacement for the Republic RF-84F aircraft within the next two years, he added, his division would represent a "waste of human capital" rather than an effective combat force.

There are some other interesting observations in this magazine. For example:

Paris—Spectacular demonstration by the Swedish Saab Draken and some inspired flying by French and British acrobatic teams saved this 23rd international aeronautical salon from being just another air show.

Then it goes on:

Biggest disappointment was the Lockheed F-104B demonstration, flown by Lt. Col. James Jabara. The plane made only a takeoff, a single flyby and a landing.

The minister went on to talk about availability, and subsequently he told the committee in reply to a question by the Leader of the Opposition that other aircraft were equally available. And then he gave us the same kind of mixed assurance as we were given earlier when the Avro Arrow decision was made. He said the decision was based on a combination of factors—on cost, on what work would be done in Canada, on the military value, on the degree to which Canadians could participate in production-sharing, and so on. We know these are important, Mr. Chairman, but surely if we can afford to do anything at all in defence matters we should do it well. As the minister said, other production-sharing arrangements were available to us. If I may, I should like to quote from the Toronto Telegram dated May 14, which reads as follows:

Ottawa (Special)—The federal government's choice of an aircraft to replace the F-86 Sabres for the Canadian air division abroad is between the Blackburn NA-39 and Republic's new strike attack interceptor, the 105-D Thunderchief . . . The choice has been narrowed to the Blackburn or Republic planes because the advantages of Canadian production of either of these are overwhelming as compared to others.

The article goes on to say:

Should the Blackburn aircraft be chosen Prime Minister John Diefenbaker could then implement in a dramatic way his "Commonwealth policy" expressed so forcibly last fall in his Albert Hall speech in London.

And the article ends as follows:

In meetings between the Prime Minister and Mundy Peel, president of the Republic Corporation, and John S. D. Tory, Q.C., vice-president of A. V. Roe Canada Limited, the Republic Corporation undertook that Canadian-made parts would be included in the American plane for the U.S. Air Force squadrons.

The planes for Canadian use would be the same as to air-frame but would be powered by the Canadian Iroquois engine.

The Prime Minister has repeatedly urged the necessity for Canadian participation in U.S. armament production and this latter proposal would allow him to implement this policy as well as reactivate the Orenda and Avro plants at Malton.

This decision, based on the grounds of military effectiveness, of production sharing and of cost, has, we feel, unfortunately placed military considerations in an inferior position. And then the minister in reply to my assertion last evening that a smaller number of other types of aircraft would do the job of the F-104, said: Emphatically no; we need more aircraft for the strike role. In reply to that, if engines need replacing every 100 hours, half the aircraft will be in the hangars and not available when required. Canadian airmen like to fly; they like to get in enough practice to become efficient in the handling of their aircraft, and they are bound to put in these hours of practice regularly if they are to be able to fly their aircraft confidently at low altitudes and concentrate on the fire power that these planes carry. Surely, when this state of efficiency has to be attained you cannot afford to have half your aircraft in the hangars. What good would they be, moreover, in the event of a sudden attack?

And so we were told this morning that as a result of prolonged examination the cabinet came to a conclusion and selected the F-104G; yet we have been told this afternoon that the F-104G has not been test flown or evaluated by the R.C.A.F. We have not been told, and I ask the minister this question, if the F-104G is a plane in being or whether it is just a plane on paper.

The minister told us that he was satisfied that the taxpayers' money was being spent properly. He went on to tell us that the F-104 had a very high performance and that it was a stable aircraft. Of course, it is a stable aircraft at high altitudes where it was designed to fly. Of course, it can do ordinary manoeuvres satisfactorily. But I asked the minister a few additional questions with reference to it. I asked him this morning what its maximum climbing incidence was and he said he could not tell me because the information is classified. I understand, however—and obviously I do not have this information from personal knowledge but from sources which I believe to be reliable —that if the F-104 has to climb too sharply the pilots cannot retain control of the aircraft. This characteristic is most essential in a strike reconnaissance plane. There are all sorts of possibilities where you have to have almost unlimited manoeuvreability and particularly the ability to make a very sharp ascent and reverse.

Let me read from Aircraft, Canada's aero trade magazine, issue of June, 1959, about another aircraft and how it works. This article is entitled "Thunderchief Testing", and reads as follows:

> Officials have revealed that the Mach 2 Republic F-105 Thunderchief is completing 18 months of tests of a new bomb-releasing method. The tests, conducted at the U.S.A.F. Air Proving Ground Center Eglin AFB, Florida, ranged from tree-top level to 40,000 feet.
>
> The new method is in answer to the problem of getting a bomb clear of a bomb bay when the vehicle is travelling at speeds up to Mach 2. At these speeds, if a bomb were merely released as was done in world war II bombers, the bomb would either be forced back up into the bomb bay or else would roll back along the underside of the fuselage doing damage to the aircraft structure.
> To prevent this from happening, Republic has designed a pneumatic device which fires the bomb out with 30,000 pounds of force. To test the system initially, a special rig was constructed duplicating a full-scale bomb bay system. More than 100 "bombing runs" were made while elaborate electronic and recording equipment made minute evaluations of each ejection.

One of the features which I should have thought would be essential for strike reconnaissance is the ability of the plane to deliver satisfactorily a bomb load either of a conventional or nuclear type. It is obvious that when one of these bombs is being released, and particularly those of the nuclear variety, the pilot of the aircraft has to get his plane away from the scene very quickly in order to avoid being blown up with the explosion. This requires a very strategic manoeuvre and puts great stress on the aircraft. If the F-104 is not designed to do that and is not designed to be able to perform the skip bombing operation, it is not satisfactory for the R.C.A.F. as a strike reconnaissance plane.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): What about a delayed action fuse?

Mr. Lambert: He has never heard of that.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): No one put that in his notes.

Mr. Hellyer: Some hon. gentlemen who are making interjections were asking this morning about the propaganda which had been distributed by the Lockheed Aircraft Corporation, copies of which I understand all hon. members have received.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Hellyer: All those to whom I have spoken in the last hour received copies.

Mr. Benidickson: It went into the waste baskets of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. Hellyer: I can only conclude that either hon. gentlemen opposite did not take time to read their mail or else the Lockheed corporation considered that only members of the opposition should receive it in the realization that government supporters are mere ciphers.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Where did you get the other information? You have not answered that yet.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister went on to tell us that the R.C.A.F. teams had been in Europe finding out how the German evaluation of the F-104 was coming along. Why in Europe? Why would the R.C.A.F. teams go to Germany to evaluate the F-104 when the Germans have not even commenced production of this aircraft yet. There are no airplanes to evaluate. What possible information could the R.C.A.F. experts get by going to Europe when there is no flying aircraft? The minister then went on to say that it was only natural that the unsuccessful aircraft companies would be disappointed and would try to belittle the successful contender. This was an inference that some aircraft company or companies had some connection, directly or indirectly, with the charges we have made. Let me state categorically that they have not.

Mr. Horner (Jasper-Edson): Where did you get your information?

Mr. Hellyer: I have not discussed the matter of the re-equipping of the air division overseas with any member of any aircraft company nor with any servant, propagandist or employee, directly or indirectly, of any aircraft company.

Mr. McGee: What about the fellow who wrote your speech?

Mr. Hellyer: I wrote it myself which is more than the hon. gentleman can say about his remarks. It may not be good but at least I am trying. I got my information from sources which I believe to be thoroughly reliable.

Mr. Lambert: The Toronto Star?

Mr. Hellyer: I think that the sources of my information are just as reliable as those available to the minister even though, as he says, he has the facilities for checking the accuracy of the facts; but he then comes into the committee and explains that unfortunately he cannot give the facts to us. We suspect that the reason for this is that some of the facts would confirm the statements we have made in this committee.

With reference to what I said last night about the fatality rate of the F-104, I got that information directly from Washington from a person who has first hand knowledge of the information and who is in a position to know and know accurately.

Mr. Pearson: It happens to be a United States aircraft.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister said this morning that R.C.A.F. pilots have flown the F-104 and that it was an easy transition from the F-86 to the F-104. It would be, of course, because they are similar aircraft. They are both day fighters designed for the same type of high level interception. We were told that we were taking advantage of the testing that had been done by others and that we would not have to do the development. Despite this, we were told just a few minutes ago that in fact the version the R.C.A.F. expects to buy has not been tested nor evaluated by us. Surely this means we will become involved in a period of redevelopment and redesign, a period of indecision in which we will not know for sure whether or not the new mark G will be a successful aircraft. In any event we on this side of the chamber believe that no redevelopment or redesign of that aircraft short of a complete redesign—in other words, a new aircraft—would fit it properly for the role of strike reconnaissance which the R.C.A.F. division overseas has now been assigned.

In conclusion I wish to repeat what I have said before, that those of us who sit on this side of the chamber have a responsibility too. We are here to serve the Canadian public as are members on the government side. We try to do our job and our job is made more difficult by the fact that we do not have employees of the state to dig out facts and do our research for us. Consequently we have to work, as those of you who have sat on this side know, even more diligently than some members on the government side.

All the information we have been putting forward in respect of this plane has been put forward sincerely. It has not been the result of representations on behalf of anyone having anything to do directly or indirectly with the aircraft industry. Surely the minister could have shown us the consideration this morning of accepting as sincere the remarks that we put forward. When he was on this side of the house he put forward some very startling and peculiar ideas indeed and at that time we did not accuse him of being irresponsible. Irresponsible, Mr. Chairman? All I can say is that with respect to all the charges I put forward last night, namely that this aircraft was not designed for the strike role, that its engine is not satisfactory and that the casualty rate is high, the minister has shielded himself behind the veil of official secrecy while at the same time branding me by innuendo as being utterly irresponsible.

I feel that this is not fair and I know that on reflection the minister will realize that those of us on this side of the house have a responsibility to do our best to protect the taxpayers who elect us and to make sure that our fighting men overseas have the best equipment available from a military standpoint and that that consideration should be paramount unless there is some other very serious objection. We will continue to do this, and I assure the committee again that if we had felt this aircraft was a proper choice we would have applauded the government for making the decision, however tardy it was. However, I repeat, as I have said before, that we feel that the decision was ill-considered, that it was made hastily even though tardily just in time to have some bit of factual information to put before the committee when it began its deliberations on Thursday.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to repeat at any length the arguments already advanced by me in support of the decision reached by the government but there are one or two points which have arisen during the speeches made by the hon. member for Trinity. He is accusing the government of having made a hasty decision.

He says that nobody knew anything about the Lockheed or ever had any idea that we would consider the Lockheed aircraft until there was pressure put on the government or on the air force within the last month by a so-called high pressure advertising campaign. I should like to quote Hansard of March 2 when I made a speech on these matters. As found near the bottom of page 1515 I said:

> Another problem we have before us is the possibility of having to replace the Sabres of our air division, the F-86.

Then I went on at some length to indicate some of the aircraft which were being inspected, and about half-way down the first column on page 1516 I used these words:

> On the 14th and 16th of January yet another team went to the Lockheed aircraft company at Burbank, California.

I think that shows that this was not something which was suddenly thought up by the government in response to pressure exerted during the last month.

Then I must say just a word as to the engine, about which the hon. member has grave doubts. This is a comparatively new engine with high performance characteristics particularly well suited to the air division requirements. The engine is being installed in the new B-58 Hustler bomber, in the McDonnell F-4H all-weather interceptor and in the Convair 880 jet airliner and other new aircraft. I have no doubt at all of the excellence and reliability of this engine.

Reference was made to the fact that the engine has to be overhauled every 100 hours. That is a situation which applies to almost every new aircraft engine. By the time the engine is placed in the 104G's and made available to the R.C.A.F. I am assured that it will be able to run three or four times that many hours without being tested.

The only other point I want to refer to has to do with the conclusion the hon. member drew, and these were his words, that "military requirements held an inferior position to other considerations." I want to make it crystal clear that I deny that emphatically and I wish to say that the aircraft meets all the requirements which are laid down for the aircraft to carry out the role assigned to the squadrons in Europe.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the minister has just told us that an air force team went to Burbank, California, in January of this year and that he had so advised the house on an earlier occasion. This is just one more instance of the minister taking things out of one context and putting them into an entirely different context. I remember very clearly this statement at the time we were criticizing the manner in which the CF-105 Avro Arrow had been cancelled. The argument was not going as well for the government as it should have even though they had a lot of press clippings which supported them. The minister rose and in reply to a question as to what had been done to try to find work for the people at Avro and Orenda who had been thrown out of their jobs so abruptly he read off a list of about 20 different places that R.C.A.F. and other service teams had visited from time to time in the previous few months. He gave the impression at that time that these visits had been made for the purpose of trying to find something else of military value, before the cancellation of the Arrow was announced, which could be manufactured by the employees at Avro and Orenda. Yet in reply to a question which I put on the order paper the minister told the house that on not one occasion of these many was an employee, an executive or any other person representing Avro invited to go along in order that they might discuss with the officials of these various companies their capabilities and the things that they were best able to do.

It is completely obvious that these trips were not made for the specific purpose of trying to find something for the employees of Avro and Orenda to do before that abrupt cancellation was made and it is obvious today that this statement has been picked out of context to try to demonstrate that the government was then considering the Lockheed F-104 as a strike fighter when in fact the list he then read included a number of places which had not developed strike fighters and consideration was being given to planes and equipment of all types. Can you blame us, Mr. Chairman, for questioning the information which is given to us in the house and for demanding that we be given proper information and real facts on which to base our judgment before voting these huge amounts of money?

(Translation):

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to stray a moment from the field of missiles, of plain or supersonic aircraft, to deal with a matter which is of particular interest, not only to my constituency of St. Jean, but also to the province of Quebec and to all of Canada, since it concerns the navy, the army and the air force, that is the Royal Military College of St. Jean.

I should like to draw the minister's attention to the fact that last year, on the occasion of this vote, I asked the minister if he could not find some way to let the Royal Military College of St. Jean give students there the opportunity of completing their course in St. Jean, instead of being forced to go to Kingston for that purpose.

I want to say to the minister that we, in St. Jean and in the province of Quebec in particular, are proud of the Royal Military College which with the Canadian military colleges of Kingston and Royal Roads has completed the trio of such institutions in Canada.

In 1952, the Liberal government gave the province of Quebec a bilingual royal military college, at the opening of which, in 1952, the commander at the time, Colonel Lahaie, who has earned quite a wide reputation in our province, stated that he hoped and that he was sure that five years after the opening of the college, that is in 1957, we could have in St. Jean a military college which would allow its students to take the same course as that given at Kingston.

Well, Mr. Chairman, this is 1959 and the Royal Military College of St. Jean still does not provide a complete course. I must say to the Minister of National Defence that, at the present time, I rise not only on behalf of the taxpayers, voters and citizens of the province of Quebec, but in my own name—and, since he is president of the Royal Military College, I am a little ill at ease in reminding him that he is the chairman of a college where students cannot take a course of studies or training.

Mr. Chairman, we have at the Royal Military College of St. Jean all the qualified staff we need to allow Canadians who attend the college to complete their course. I think it is unfair that French-speaking Canadians who start their training at the Royal Military College of St. Jean, and who stay on for three years, be forced, often after getting top marks among the cadets, to go to Kingston to complete their education in English. And there, quite often, because of their lack of knowledge of the English language, they fall to the bottom of the class of cadets who complete their studies at Kingston.

Mr. Chairman, since the Canadian government has provided a royal military college for the city of St. Jean, and the province of Quebec, I think this government must by all means enable students who attend this college to take their full training there.

May I point out to the Minister of National Defence the statement made in this house in 1952 as recorded on page 3941 of Hansard, by the Hon. Brooke Claxton, then Minister of National Defence, in which he indicated that the intention was to place the St. Jean military college on an equal footing with R.M.C. in Kingston.

Mr. Chairman, what is keeping this government from carrying out the intentions of the former government?

We have at St. Jean every facility to teach the full curriculum to our cadets. In the first place, we have a first rate president, in the person of the Minister of National Defence. We have an excellent commander, in the person of Group Captain Archambault, who is to be commended for doing an exceptionally fine job. We have, as director of studies, Colonel Charles A. Chabot, a man of outstanding reputation. We also have Squadron Leader Lanthier, a Kingston graduate, not to mention our devoted secretary general, Mr. Denis Dion, and all the distinguished professors devoted to the training of the cadets.

We have everything at St. Jean: a splendid site, the best of teachers and the best of college presidents. In fact, the only thing we lack is an opportunity for the cadets to complete their studies. I should be grateful, therefore, if the Minister of National Defence, who is president of our military college, would answer my request and tell us why we, in St. Jean, should not expect to see our royal military college at long last offer a complete course of studies, just as R.M.C. at Kingston.

I also ask the minister to tell us why Canadian citizens of French culture attending the royal military college at St. Jean are being forced to go to Kingston for the last two years of the course. Such students may find themselves at the bottom of the class when placed in an English environment, after leading their class at St. Jean.

When a bilingual military college was to be established at St. Jean, it was to be in the best interest of this country. I am convinced that the Minister of National Defence will not let this opportunity slip by to give the Royal Military College of St. Jean a complete study course so that the graduates of that college could be in the same category as the English speaking cadets in Kingston.

I shall not insist upon the matter, because I know how the Minister of National Defence is interested in anything having to do with the military college of St. Jean. I became aware of that interest during the visit he made there last year at the graduation ceremony. I also realized it this year when he came, accompanied by the hon. Solicitor

General (Mr. Balcer), and if the teachers of that military college really have all the qualifications and abilities which the minister has recognized, we only need a quick decision by the minister. I would like us to be assured, as from next September, that those cadets who are now under the impression that they have to go to Kingston to complete their studies, will learn the great news that they will be able to continue their course in St. Jean, where they began their studies.

Before concluding these remarks, Mr. Chairman, I would like to add a few words. Quite recently, the minister informed me that it had been decided to demolish two buildings on the college grounds, which had been designated as surplus. At this stage, Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out to the minister that the two buildings he mentioned are historical sites in St. Jean. They are the remains of old Fort St. Jean and, to my mind, it would be in very bad taste to destroy them.

I am pleased to remind the house that the first fort at St. Jean was built in 1666; it was replaced by a second one in 1748, by a third in 1778 and by a fourth in 1839. The present fort, as well as the buildings which it is proposed to destroy, go back to 1839. I wanted to draw the minister's attention to that matter.

In my opinion, it would be unfortunate to demolish those historic buildings, even if it is proposed to replace them by more modern ones. Historic buildings going back to 1839 cannot, in my opinion, be replaced in 1959. It would be really unfortunate if the minister should decide to remove those buildings which have stood there for more than 120 years.

I know the minister will have a serious investigation made about the matter, and I can assure him that the great majority of the resident students of the Royal Military College of St. Jean, and of the people of St. Jean, that is 99 per cent of them, are opposed to the destruction of those buildings, as well as the whole population of the province of Quebec, and of Canada as a whole.

Mr. Chairman, I now close my remarks. However, I should like the Minister of National Defence to tell us why he has refused for so long to give the province of Quebec, and most particularly the Royal Military College of St. Jean, a course of study as complete as the one now being given at Kingston.

(Text):

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I should like to take the minister's mind back from the College St. Jean to the F-104. I do not apologize to the committee for having something more to say about this matter, because, as has been pointed out, it represents a very large expenditure of the taxpayer's money, some $200 million or more; but more important than that, of course, is that it will be equipment for the R.C.A.F. in a new and difficult role which it may be asked to undertake for NATO and for Canada at a time when NATO tactics, and indeed NATO equipment, are in a state of flux. Therefore, we naturally on this side are worried about the implications of this decision. I would like to ask the minister one or two more questions, and I think they will be new questions. It is, of course, a fact—and I do not think the minister has disputed this—that the F-104 A, B, C, D, E, or F, has been developed in the United States as a high altitude, high speed aircraft. It has the world's speed record, and it was designed originally at least, the minister will agree I am sure, for a purpose not directly related to that which it will be performing with the R.C.A.F.

Mr. Hellyer: Not even indirectly related.

Mr. Pearson: If that is a fact, it was bound to arouse our anxiety and indeed our suspicion that this might not be the aircraft best equipped for the purpose we have in mind. We ask ourselves, how can this type of aircraft be suited for the strike fighter, strike reconnaissance role, at low altitudes, and the minister has replied that we are now considering the F-104G. The impression he has left in our minds is that this is a new model designed for this purpose to remove the deficiencies of the earlier models; but he has told us at the same time that this re-designed or this remodelled F-104F, the F-104G, has not been tested in the air by any Canadian pilot. Now, our worries about this plane have been increased by the evidence that we have been able to secure. Last night I asked the minister whether it was a fact that the United States—and this is a United States plane—has equipped its own tactical squadrons in Europe with Republic F-105 fighters, and the minister said in reply that some squadrons of the U.S.A.F. are being equipped with Republic F-105 planes. I would like to secure from him, if I can, information as to whether these replacements in Europe by the F-105 are replacements of the F-104.

The fact is, and the minister has not denied this, that the United States air force had already decided at the very time they were deciding to purchase these planes to reduce its own commitments for purchasing this plane from, I think, 700 to 300 or 400. This is being done by the United States government, which should know a good deal about this plane, at a time also when it has signed new contracts, I think up until 1963, for the purchase of the F-105.

In connection with the testing of these planes, the minister said that the F-104G has not been tested in the air. I woud like to ask him whether the Grumman Super Tiger or the Republic F-105—I will just mention these two planes—has been tested or flown by the R.C.A.F.? When? For how many hours? Were they actually tested in the air in the form in which they were offered to the R.C.A.F., in the form in which they would be used by the R.C.A.F. if they had been purchased? In other words were those other types tested by the R.C.A.F.? Were they flown by the R.C.A.F.? When, and for how many hours?

I know there are economic considerations involved in this, Mr. Chairman, and the minister has indeed indicated that. I wonder whether he could give the committee any information about the unit prices for the F-104G. We remember in the debate on the CF-105, that in connection with prices we had a great deal of difficulty in getting the exact information on this point. The Prime Minister told us last February that the price of the CF-105, on an order of 100, was $7,810,000, and we learned from the Minister of Defence Production a couple of months later that, far from it being $7,810,000, it was $3,750,000. Perhaps the minister will give us some specific and definite information about the cost of these particular planes which it has been decided to buy from the United States.

I should also like to ask him whether any aviation company, apart from the Lockheed company, whose plane it has been decided to buy, whose planes were under consideration, including the Republic company, had expressed a willingness to use the Iroquois engine not only in their own aircraft for use in the R.C.A.F. but also for their own aircraft produced for use in the air force of the United States, because surely that would have been an important consideration in the mind of the government if in fact that proposal and that suggestion had been made.

Then I would also like to ask the minister whether this F-104G, this new model, improved version, which has not been tested by any Canadian flyer, has any all-weather or night flying capabilities?

When the question of the equipment of the United States air force was under discussion by the subcommittee of the committee on appropriations of the house of representatives this spring—and I am quoting from page 536 of the evidence—the president of a company called Electronics Communications, Incorporated, who was a vice-president of Westinghouse company before that, and who is a great expert in this field, was asked by the chairman of the committee: "What about the 104F?" They were discussing various types of planes, and Representative Flood went on to say, "Which has been slowed down, too"? He was referring to the cut in the order, and Mr. Godsey, who was the witness, said:

> Sir, I have very little faith in a weapon or weapons system with limited capability. If you cannot use it at night or in bad weather then you have left yourself wide open to attack in those periods when you can do nothing.

Perhaps the minister will give us the information as to whether there is any all-weather night flying capability of this model, the F-104G?

Then finally, at this stage, can the minister give us any indication of where this plane is to be manufactured in Canada and under what conditions? The minister mentioned this morning that the company would be given—I do not know what the proper expression is—a production fee for manufacturing this plane in Canada. Can the minister indicate how much money will be involved in this production fee to be given by the manufacturer for the privilege of manufacturing this plane for the common defence to the United States company which is the producer of the plane in the United States?

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, the minister might be good enough to deal with those particular questions.

Mr. Pearkes: Perhaps I could help the Leader of the Opposition if I told him the various types of the F-104 which have been developed. The first, the F-104A, was an interceptor. The second one, known as the F-104B, was an interceptor with a dual seat, a trainer.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister repeat that, please?

Mr. Pearkes: The F-104B was a dual trainer. The F-104C was a tactical fighter and bomber with special bombing equipment. The F-104D was the same as the F-104C but with dual flight so that it could be used as a trainer. The F-104E and the future G, the more sophisticated editions of the C type, have both navigational and bombing equipment. That will answer the question regarding the ability of this aircraft as an all-weather aircraft, in that it has navigational equipment.

Mr. Pearson: Before the minister leaves that point, might I ask a supplementary question.

Which of these particular models, if any, were tested by R.C.A.F. or Canadian flyers, and for how long?

Mr. Pearkes: The 104C was the type which was tested by our pilots. The Leader of the Opposition asked questions about the cutback in the 105 as far as the United States air force was concerned.

Mr. Pearson: The cutback was in the 104.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, I am sorry; I said 105. That is in the fighter version of the 104 because there is not the same requirement for the fighter version of the 104 and the cutback is principally in that version.

A question was asked about the 105, and I made the statement yesterday in answer to the Leader of the Opposition's question that I understood that some squadrons of the United States air force are being equipped with the Republic F-105. That is correct. Some of the squadrons of the United States air force in Europe are being equipped with the 105. There are also squadrons being equipped with the 104. The 105 is a much larger aircraft, and being larger it is also more expensive and more sophisticated and has a slightly different role from that of the 104. It is a larger aircraft capable of greater distance reconnaissance, having more navigational instruments and greater power. It is, as I say, a more expensive aircraft, and therefore in the inventory of the NATO forces there would be a requirement for both the larger type of reconnaissance aircraft and the smaller type, and we are contributing the smaller type, the 104. Had we selected the Republic it would either have cost us a great deal more money to have supplied the same number of aircraft, or it would have made it necessary for us to reduce the number of aircraft in spending the same amount of money and no reduction in the number of aircraft would have been acceptable to the commander of the forces in Europe.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I asked the minister some other questions. I do not know whether he has forgotten them, but has he any figures for the cost of the plane, or where it is to be manufactured?

Mr. Pearkes: I think when it comes to the question of cost and the actual contracts which are being made, those remarks should be addressed to the Minister of Defence Production. His estimates follow as soon as these estimates are finished.

Mr. Benidickson: With respect to the relationship between the Department of National Defence and the Department of Defence Production, I would take it that the defence department will indicate to the Department of Defence Production its requirement in the matter of delivery. The minister in his original speech, when introducing his estimates on page 5352 of Hansard for July 2, said:

> Some two years will elapse before new aircraft will come into operational service, and by that time the value of the F-86 will have diminished in comparison with other aircraft in operation. Failure to take a decision now, therefore, would peopardize the effectiveness of the R.C.A.F.'s contribution in the future and undoubtedly would cause serious alarm and harm to the alliance.

I think that language is something all can understand, but I thought the phrase "some two years will elapse" under the circumstances, when necessity and obsolescence is emphasized, was rather woolly, shall I say. Can the minister indicate whether or not in his requisition to the defence production department he indicated the minimum time that he would like to have this aircraft available for operational purposes? The minister indicated that he thought Canadian aircraft would be operational about the same time as those selected by the Federal Republic of West Germany, which of course is under licence proposing to manufacture this plane in Germany itself.

Another thing with respect to the timetable impresses me. We were told that the government made a commitment at the annual meeting at NATO of defence ministers, finance ministers and foreign affairs ministers, in December, 1957. It was agreed that one of the Canadian commitments was to re-equip the Canadian air division in Europe. That is more than 18 months ago and the minister uses the phrases "some two years will elapse". The phrase in the document that is referred to is the minimum force needs from 1958 to 1963. Surely they were not contemplating when they used the words "minimum force" something that seems to lack a definite timetable to the extent this program does. They did not mean that we would get delivery at the end of the five-year period or after the five-year period, and I wonder if the minister has real confidence that these squadrons would be actually operational on the basis of his present plans, even before expiry of this five-year period, which was referred to as something that Canada agreed to in December 1957.

Mr. Pearkes: Naturally, we should like to get these aircraft as soon as possible. I think we might set approximately two years from the time the contract has been signed; it will take from 18 months to 24 months to have this complete and, after that, start to issue them to the squadrons so that they can come into operational use.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister said that licensing arrangements had not been completed with the Lockheed company. Does he know whether the authorities of West Germany have already completed their licensing arrangements to manufacture?

Mr. Pearkes: I understand that the contract has been signed on March 31 of this year, but that some of the first of the aircraft will be constructed in the United States and sent to West Germany and the balance will be completed in West Germany.

Mr. Pearson: I think I understood the minister to say that it would take between 18 months and two years for the first planes to be delivered. Will there be any provision in the contract for an alteration of the terms, if required to be changed because of changing conditions with regard to NATO arrangements in Europe? We are now entering upon a large scale commitment which will extend over a period of 18 months to three years or more. Conditions change swiftly. Would the government be committed to all the terms of this contract if the conditions of Canadian participation in NATO affairs in Europe change?

Mr. Pearkes: As the hon. gentleman knows, the terms of the contract are worked out by the Department of Defence Production. That question should be directed to my colleague.

Mr. Benidickson: I was about to point out to my colleague the Leader of the Opposition the actual phrasing of the minister's estimate as to the timing as reported at page 5352 of Hansard. He said there: "some two years will elapse before any aircraft will come into operational service." We recall from our inquiries last year in the estimates committee that there is a marked time lag between the arrival of the first aircraft off the production line and the moment when training and testing has been completed; a very long time lag before it can be said that an aircraft comes into operational service. Last year, as I recall it, the minister used the phrase "squadron operational service". I do not know whether he had in mind the same type of availability as he did when he used those words last year.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, I think that in from 18 to 24 months these aircraft should be with the squadrons in Germany.

Mr. Pearson: A few moments ago I asked the minister a question which he overlooked in the replies he made to other questions. I asked him particularly regarding the testing of some of the other planes which were under consideration and I mentioned particularly the Grumman Super Tiger and the F-105. Were they tested by Canadian pilots in the form in which they would have been used if a decision had been made to purchase them?

Mr. Pearkes: I cannot say they were actually tested in the form in which they would have been delivered to the R.C.A.F. had a decision been made to adopt that particular type of aircraft, because it might have been necessary to have had some improvements or changes made, but I can assure the Leader of the Opposition that a most thorough examination was made of many of these different types of aircraft, and it was only after the most prolonged and careful consideration that a decision was reached. I cannot say more than that. I have said it before, and I repeat it, and will repeat it again and again.

Mr. Hellyer: I asked the minister this morning if he could give us the number of hours during which each of the various types of aircraft had been flown by R.C.A.F. pilots during the course of the evaluation. I wonder if the minister has that information available now?

Mr. Pearkes: No, I have not got that information here.

Mr. Hellyer: The Leader of the Opposition has just asked a question in an endeavour to ascertain whether these aircraft were flown as they would have been delivered to the R.C.A.F. May I put the question differently. Were the Grumman Super Tiger and the Republic F-105 both test-flown by R.C.A.F. pilots?

Mr. Pearkes: I cannot say definitely that the latest types of those aircraft were, but the most careful evaluation of their capabilities was made.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister give us any assurance that any types of those aircraft were flown?

Mr. Pearkes: I am told that it is very definite that the Super Tiger was flown by Canadian pilots.

Mr. Hellyer: Was the Republic 105 also flown by Canadian pilots?

Mr. Pearkes: That, I could not say.

Mr. Hellyer: Can the minister give us this all-out, unequivocal assurance that these planes were properly evaluated in every respect when in fact they have not all been flown by R.C.A.F. pilots? It is precisely this lack of information which makes us aware of the fact that we cannot really rely absolutely on the decisions which the government makes. We cannot rely on the meagre facts which are made available to us, and we have to ask questions in order to find out the situation. We were assured that a complete and thorough evaluation was made, and the only thoroughly satisfactory method by which a plane can be evaluated has not been used in the case of at least one of these aircraft. How can the government or the department rely on an examination which has not included an on-the-spot evaluation by a pilot in its own air force or in its own employ—someone they trust implicitedly. Surely the minister could give us some information which would set our minds at rest that more exploratory work has been done than he has asserted this afternoon.

Mr. Pearson: A few minutes ago the minister said that every step was taken to insure that the decision which was made by the government was the right decision, and now he tells us that one of the planes under construction, the F-105, was not, as far as he knows, even test flown by any R.C.A.F. pilot.

Mr. Pearkes: There are many ways of obtaining information about aircraft other than by actually flying them, and if some of the other qualifications do not meet the requirements, is there any necessity to go to the extent of flying the aircraft? Very complete information is available from all United States officials.

Mr. Pearson: Are we to infer from that that the government or its officers or technicians looked at the F-105 and decided that it was of such a type and quality that it was not even thought desirable to bother about test flying it for this particular work?

Mr. Pearkes: The experts of the R.C.A.F. made a thorough examination of the capabilities of the Republic 105, and that aircraft was not selected after the evaluation placed upon it by the R.C.A.F. As I pointed out earlier this afternoon, the reconnaissance features of the 105 are different from the requirements which were given to us for the plane to re-equip the squadrons in Europe.

Mr. Pearson: I think it is becoming clear where we stand at least in respect to these two particular planes. The F-105 was examined and tested and as a result of that examination it was considered not worthwhile testing in the air by Canadian pilots for the purpose it was meant to perform. The F-104 was examined, I think the minister said that it was the F-104C, an earlier version, and it was decided, after the examination, it would be test flown in the air by Canadian pilots. That was done. Presumably it was decided as a result of this and the other investigation that that particular plane would require changes. Presumably those changes have been made in a version, the F-104G. On the basis of flying an earlier version it was declared not satisfactory because the changes had to be made. It was then decided to spend $200 million producing a changed version which has not been flown or tested at all.

Mr. Pearkes: Of course, the decision was not made merely on the basis of the flying of the aircraft. All the capabilities of that aircraft were available to the experts when they carried out the evaluation. Such decisions are reached on the sum total of the considerations. I have confidence in the ability of our air force personnel to make a recommendation in this respect. I have confidence in the advice that they give us.

Mr. Pearson: I have the greatest possible confidence in and respect for the advice the minister would get from his Canadian advisers because I know there are no more highly qualified advisers for any minister of defence in any country, but I would have more confidence in the wisdom of the government in making this official decision if these advisers had had a chance to fly the plane which was decided on by the government as the one suitable for re-equipping the Canadian air division and on which we are going to spend $200 million.

I quite agree with the minister that flying is not the only way of testing a plane and that there are many other considerations that have to be examined before the plane is taken into the air, but I cannot believe it would be wise to make a final decision with all that is involved in terms of money and in terms of service to the R.C.A.F. without having the model it was decided to produce flown by the R.C.A.F. personnel.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the minister could tell us when the F-104G was first flown?

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I have said several times that the F-104G has not been flown.

Mr. Hellyer: The F-104G has not been flown. In other words, the minister is asking us to buy a pig in a poke?

Mr. Pearkes: Do not be so stupid.

Mr. Dupuis: Mr. Chairman, I should like to have an answer from my hon. friend about the College Militaire Royal de St. Jean. I know that the minister is the president of that college and I know how he loves the institution. I am surprised that he did not give me an answer to the question I asked him a few moments ago.

Mr. Pearkes: I shall be very pleased to give the hon. member an answer. Another hon. gentleman rose before I had an opportunity to reply.

The policy as far as the service colleges are concerned is that there are three colleges which give the first two years of the course, the Royal Military College at Kingston, the College Militaire Royal de St. Jean and the Royal Roads at Esquimalt in British Columbia. The first two years of the course may be taken at any one of those three colleges but because of the additional facilities particularly in the nature of laboratories and equipment for engineering study, and in the extra staff that is maintained at the Royal Military College, the last two years of the college course are given at the Royal Military College.

In order to make quite certain that French speaking boys are thoroughly acquainted with the English language they may take an extra year at the College Militaire making three years. There is one year which you might call a pre-college year in which they have the opportunity of becoming completely bilingual. I am very proud of the work which is being done at the College Militaire at St. Jean. Everything the hon. member has said regarding the efficacy of that college I heartily endorse. The present policy is that the cadets complete the last two years of their four-year course at Kingston for the reasons I have given, the additional equipment, the extra staff and the fact that they are now able to obtain a college degree at Kingston.

Mr. Dupuis: The minister knows perfectly well that French Canadians can speak English with considerable fluency. I cannot speak English very well myself and when I wish to be persuasive and completely understood, I speak French because I feel I speak better and more convincingly in French. It is the same for the cadets who go to the College Militaire. They might be good in English and they like English—I may even say they love it—but when there is an examination to pass, even with their love of the English language, they are placed at a disadvantage in relation to the English speaking persons who write the examination.

In order to be completely understood, I will now speak French to the minister to prove to the minister that we French speaking Canadians are better in our own language than in English.

(Translation):

I would point out to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) that, while it is true that there are preliminary courses given at Royal Roads, just as there are at St. Jean, which have to be completed at Kingston, students at Royal Roads, being English-speaking, are not up against the same language difficulties as the French-speaking students attending the St. Jean Royal Military College. A French-speaking student can like English and be able to speak it well enough to be understood, but if he is transplanted into another college where absolutely everything is done entirely in English, he is automatically placed at a disadvantage in relation to his English-speaking fellows.

The very aim of the Liberal party, in setting up a bilingual college, was to remedy this situation of inferiority in which French-speaking students attending R.M.C. at Kingston found themselves.

I am sure that the minister understands my point perfectly. He understands it so well that every year, when he comes to visit our military college in St. Jean, every year as he said just now, he marvels at the good work that is done there and every year the case I am now submitting to you is submitted to him from several quarters.

We have at the Royal Military College of St. Jean the required teaching staff to allow the students to finish their course. We have all departments there, that is: English, chemistry, military studies, French, history, geography, economics, mathematics, philosophy, physics, military instruction, sports and physical culture—all this without even mentioning the basic course in the general program, engineering. All that is found at St. Jean, but the minister persists in his refusal to authorize the Royal Military College of St. Jean to give those students an opportunity to complete their course in the same institution. It is inadmissible and unacceptable that French speaking students be submitted to such discrimination.

I am proud that the powerful Minister of National Defence is head of that college. But it is the first time, Mr. Chairman, that a college president shows so little interest in the advancement of his institution. I trust he will reconsider the things I just said and that he will put an end to such discrimination against our people.

I also hope that he may rise and tell us, before the next election: "As Conservative Minister of National Defence, I have continued the work begun by the Liberal party". I would like to keep my remarks above politics, but I have to remind the minister that the Hon. Brooke Claxton, then minister of national defence, and Colonel Lahaie said that they wanted to put the Royal Military College of St. Jean within five years on the same footing as the Royal Military College of Kingston. Five years later that is in 1957, the Conservative government came into power. Putting political considerations aside, I ask the present Minister of National Defence to pursue what was started so efficiently under Liberal rule.

I am convinced that the Minister of National Defence very much appreciates what is done at St. Jean and that he likes to come and visit us. But he would be quite embarrassed if he were to come back to St. Jean for the graduation ceremony and tell certain people: "Well, as Minister of National Defence I have not taken upon myself to give you what you are rightly asking for and I cannot allow those students to continue their course here." For, when those students go to Kingston to finish their course they never succeed as well, because their language is French. Teachers at the St. Jean Military College are just as capable as those at Kingston, and there is no valid reason why this state of affairs should continue. It is unthinkable that the Minister of National Defence and the present government should deny the students at the St. Jean Royal Military College an opportunity to complete their studies there.

I know the minister is perfectly aware that this is detrimental to our people. I shall therefore be surprised and disappointed if he does not change his present attitude in the near future.

(Text):

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, this morning the Leader of the Opposition asked the minister what was to be the ultimate role of the other four squadrons in the air division and what plans the department had for replacing their equipment. The minister has not answered that question. We feel he should answer it and give us some indication at least of what the department's thinking is. It is not enough just to have one isolated decision made available to us. We should have some indication of what the department's policy in defence matters really is.

Mr. Pearkes: I said they were continuing in their present role.

Mr. Hellyer: But for how long? The plane is obsolescent now by the minister's own statements. Surely he does not plan to leave them there indefinitely. That is something I am sure he could not contemplate.

Mr. Pearkes: They will continue in their present role as long as SACEUR has a requirement for them.

Mr. Pearson: Will there be a division now in function between the two parts of the air division, one being the strike fighter reconnaissance role and the other continuing the present role? Will that mean a division in the chain of command inside the division? Will the four CF-100 squadrons be in a different tactical air force from the other eight squadrons?

Mr. Pearkes: No. There is one squadron of CF-100's with each of the four wings, two in Germany and two in France, and under present plans there is no intention of changing that distribution.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, I think we now have as clear a picture as we are likely to get of the role and activities of the R.C.A.F. I can only express my great anxiety over the decision which has been made to re-equip our air division in Europe, a decision which has been made after a good deal of consideration no doubt by the government over many months, a decision which seems to have been based not on any actual flying test of the plane that has been picked by Canadian pilots, although there are a good many test pilots with a lot of experience who would have been available apart from the R.C.A.F., but based on considerations which do not require, so the minister says, that kind of test.

Anyway, the minister says that the decision has been made and we must all hope that this particular plane, whatever doubts we may have about its suitability for this role, will turn out to be a suitable plane for the important and responsible new role that the R.C.A.F. is being asked to perform in Europe. I take it that it will not begin the performance of that role for a good many months because the minister has said it will be about 18 months before the first planes are delivered to the squadrons in Europe. Presumably during that period of 18 months or more these squadrons will continue to carry on as efficiently as they always do, with the F-86.

In the future, however, they will have a new function to perform while, on the other hand, the CF-100 squadron will carry on, the minister has said, the function which they have been performing over the years in Europe with efficiency and distinction, as a result of which the Canadian air division, I think, now has the reputation in the NATO forces of being as efficient, as effective and as well trained as any air unit in all of the NATO forces. Nevertheless, it must be quite clear to everyone that the CF-100, while not entirely obsolescent, is becoming less effective as the months go by in the face of the air menace which the NATO forces will have to counter in Europe if there ever is an outbreak of war.

Then, Mr. Chairman, there will be the nine CF-100 squadrons in Canada integrated into the North American air defence command and playing their part as manned interceptors with United States squadrons under NORAD which are or will soon be equipped with planes more modern and more effective than the CF-100 is at the present time. I have already stated my view that the government should be giving a most searching examination to the possibility of a new role for the R.C.A.F. on this continent. It has been suggested in some press quarters that in making the proposal to the government for this kind of re-examination I have been advocating the drastic reduction of the R.C.A.F. The minister will know that it not what I said, even in the question which I asked him. What I do advocate is an examination in order to see if there should not be a drastic reorientation or reorganization of the role of the R.C.A.F. in the defence of Canada, in the defence of the alliance and in the defence of peace.

I have no illusion about the importance of the R.C.A.F. in any form of defence because it is bound to be of the very greatest importance and I think it would be very silly on the part of anyone who believes in collective defence, who believes, as I do, in Canada playing its full part in collective defence and paying its full share of the collective insurance premium, to think that the R.C.A.F. will not have a very important role to perform. But I have suggested that perhaps that role, under new conditions, will have to be altered in the future and that perhaps there are other ways in which the R.C.A.F. could operate effectively, and perhaps in a more Canadian way. I mentioned that we could make our armed units more mobile and air-transportable, but that this would take a good deal of reorganization of the R.C.A.F.

The minister replied to that suggestion yesterday by saying he felt that it would be unwise at this time to use the resources of the R.C.A.F. for that particular purpose, beyond that which it performs now. I am not an expert in tactics or strategy, and if that is the considered view of the minister and his advisers that it would be unwise to make that change at this time, that is how it has to stand. But I do believe that this particular role of continental air defence, operated as it is being operated now by CF-100's, is going to make a less and less important contribution to collective defence in the months and years to come. I do not see how, if we are going to continue to play that role, we can avoid the decision of re-equipping the nine Canadian squadrons of the R.C.A.F. in Canada, because the minister has confirmed the information we have received from many other quarters that in the course of time the bomber will be less and less effective and the missile will be more and more effective. None of these aircraft, even the F-108 which may be in operation a few years from now, will be of the slightest use against missiles. This being the case, perhaps we should be looking ahead for a new role for the R.C.A.F. in common defence.

This was all I had in mind when I mentioned this matter. I have expressed the hope that the government would give that kind of re-examination of defence policy and defence planning, and not prolong indefinitely the kind of operation which has been performed with distinction and efficiency by the R.C.A.F. in the past, but which may not be a realistic participation in Atlantic defence much longer. I would have thought, I thought and I still think, that if we could have had a committee to go into this whole question of the role, not only of the R.C.A.F. but the other armed forces in the common defence, to which we could have called witnesses, we would have been in a better position to make the right kind of defence decisions in this parliament than we are now. I think we have had a vindication of that view this afternoon in the kind of discussion we have had about the $200 million to be expended for airplanes for the air division overseas.

However, Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure that whatever role the government may give the R.C.A.F., whether or not it is the most effective role in the present circumstances —and we have some doubts about that—it is bound to be an important role and it is bound to be carried out with efficiency and devotion.

Mr. Hellyer: Before we carry this item, Mr. Chairman, there are a few further questions we have to ask. On the first item, I think it was, I asked the minister about the R.C.A.F. and civilian employees at Avro and Orenda. He said the question would be answered when the air force officials were in front of him.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes. As stated in Hansard for May 27, there were 50 Department of National Defence civilians and 47 service personnel at Avro and Orenda. They were employed as follows: Against the Arrow contract, 37 civilians and 12 service personnel; against the CF-100 contract, 13 civilians and 35 service personnel. As of June 30, the position is as follows: Against the Arrow contract, 20 civilians and no service personnel; against the CF-100 contract, 13 civilians and 35 service personnel. The D.N.D. civilian employees still at Avro and Orenda against the Arrow contract are being reassigned as fast as their work relative to the termination of the contract is completed and new employment can be found for them.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister could tell us which air force division the radar defences on the British Columbia coast come under.

Mr. Pearkes: All the radar defences are under the air defence command with headquarters at St. Hubert.

Mr. Hellyer: Do we have any combat operations centres in Canada which are not manned primarily by Canadians?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes; there are a number of radar stations which are not manned by Canadians and there are the squadrons on the Labrador coast which are made up of United States personnel.

Mr. Hellyer: Could the minister tell us if there was a combat control station on the British Columbia coast which was recently taken over by the United States because we did not have satisfactory equipment for handling the signals coming in from our radar stations, and were not able to process the signals quickly enough for the NORAD command? Consequently, we had to allow the United States to take over that station because of the equipment not being replaced?

Mr. Pearkes: So far as I know, there has been no change made.

Mr. Pearson: I suppose this is the item upon which we ask any questions we may have to ask on the early warning systems. I should like to ask the minister one or two questions on this very important part of our continental defence system, because however we may feel about the relative importance of continental defence as a protection for communities and areas, and as a protection of the bases from which the deterrent can operate, the fact remains that either of these two aspects of continental defence will be ineffective unless we have an efficient early warning system. This has been the reason for spending the millions and millions of dollars that have been spent by both countries on the three lines, the Distant Early Warning line, the Pinetree line and the Mid-Canada line, the expense of which has been shared between the two countries.

We know now that while these lines are, I think, reasonably effective in giving warning of an attack by bomber aircraft—reasonably effective because it is idle to think they will ever be 100 per cent effective, they are mechanical after all—which was the original purpose otherwise they would not have been built, they are not of any value at all in respect of giving warning against attack by intercontinental ballistic missiles. The government of the United States, therefore, proposes to spend billions of dollars on a ballistic missile early warning system, in spite of the fact that growing bodies of expert and political opinion in the United States are questioning the wisdom of these astronomical expenditures. Even if they are successful, they will only give about 15 minutes, though that 15 minutes may be very important. I gathered from the minister's remarks yesterday and the day before that Canada is not going to participate directly in these expenditures, and I think if that is the decision it is a very wise decision. We do not know where it is going to lead us in terms of expenditure and in terms of mechanical results.

However, I am worried also about a growing body of technical criticism against the effectiveness of this whole continental effort, because it is continental, whether we participate in it in one form or another. As I mentioned in the statement I made the other day, criticism has been made of this effort by a man who, the minister will agree, is as great an expert in the field of radar as anyone alive, namely Sir Robert Watson-Watt, who is the man perhaps as responsible for the victory in the Battle of Britain as any other single individual because of what he did in the 1930's to make radar detection possible. He has been saying in the United States and in Canada that we are wasting our money and wasting our effort in attempting to secure an early warning system that will be effective in any real sense against the new methods of attack. He is quoted in the press of May 27, 1959 as saying:

> —that the present radar defence system is "far advanced toward obsolescence". The British radar expert also contended in this article that the new extension of the DEW line, the ballistic missile early warning system (BMEWS) which uses three stations each with a five thousand mile radar sweep to give a 15-minute warning against ballistic missiles, is "at best, a very expensive way to get a still inadequate warning".

I wonder whether the minister can give us some information which will be a little more reassuring as to the value and effectiveness of all the work that has gone on and is likely to go on in this vitally important field of early warning.

Mr. Pearkes: I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that this is a vitally important field, and we must endeavour to obtain those early warnings both for the protection of our own people and for the protection of the retaliatory forces in the United States.

The DEW line and the other systems were never designed to be effective against a missile; they were designed to be effective against the bomber. Innumerable tests have been carried out on these lines and they have proved extraordinarily effective in locating the type of target which we believe the Russians would be able to use against this continent in the form of manned bombers. Improvements have been and are continually being made in the actual instruments which are being used on the DEW line. The DEW line has been extended out into the ocean now linking up with the similar warning systems in Europe. I think I can say definitely that a very high degree of reliability can be placed in our DEW line and warning system in giving information about the approach of hostile bombers.

With regard to detection stations which are being erected by the United States—not in Canada—Canada is not making any direct contributions toward those. We are having research work done in order to detect objects which are in the atmosphere, and the results of the experiments and research work which are carried out are passed on to the United States; but there is no direct expenditure in these estimates toward the construction or the maintenance of the BMEWS systems.

Mr. Pearson: I am glad to get that information from the minister, but, it is reassuring only to the point where it confirms that we shall have some warning against bombers if they ever were loosed against this continent; perhaps enough warning to scatter to the hills. But against missiles, in spite of all the work that may be done in the future, the best we can really hope for is about 15 minutes. That will mean much from the point of view of getting a retaliatory force into the air. It will not give much comfort to the 200 million people on this continent that they have 15 minutes to escape destruction and grope for survival while the retaliatory force is on the way to the enemy and putting the 200 million people in that country in the same position. That is about the best we can hope for if we ever allow this sort of thing to happen.

Can the minister give us some information about the actual administration and operation of the DEW line? He said that it is now under the operational control of the R.C.A.F. Can he tell us how many R.C.A.F. officers there are in the DEW line and what they are controlling? It has been suggested—among others, by the Prime Minister—that the situation in the DEW line in regard to protection of Canadian sovereignty is much better than it was a couple of years ago. Has the minister any information on this point? It is my own view, and it is confirmed by the information I have been able to receive in answers to questions on the orders of the day, that there is no change whatever in the last two and a half years in the legal and jurisdictional position of control of the DEW line, and that the rights of sovereignty which were reserved for Canada in the original agreement—and they are there in black and white—have been sufficient during the years to ensure that our sovereignty is respected. Perhaps the minister can give me some information about operational control of the DEW line.

Mr. Pearkes: There are four main centres in Canada of the DEW line as well as a number of satellite installations to those four centres. Satellite installations are mainly automatic. The information obtained either from the main station or from the satellite stations is filtered through into an operational room at these four main centres. Until January 1 of this year the United States air force officers had the operational control of those control rooms; they were in charge of those rooms. As the information came in, it was filtered through to them, and they made the decision as to what information would be passed back to NORAD or to the air defence command of Canada. Since January 1 the R.C.A.F. officers have taken over those control rooms, and there is a United States liaison officer only at the control rooms. Our sovereignty is respected in full in those Arctic stations.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether he feels a bigger role could be played by the R.C.A.F. in the Arctic areas in the field of reconnaissance, supply, and all that kind of thing, or is the R.C.A.F. doing everything that the government feels should be done now.

Mr. Pearkes: The R.C.A.F. and the Department of Transport are principally responsible for the supply of all the Arctic stations. They are doing the major portion of that. Some civilian companies do supply some of the DEW line stations. Of course, the DEW line is operated and maintained under contract. It is the Federal Electric Company which operates that line, and the contract is with the U.S. air force, and they are paying the contractor. Under the agreement, Canada can take over the running of that line at any time Canada feels it is desirable to do so.

Mr. Pearson: It costs $65 million a year.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, the Leader of the Opposition has mentioned the difficulty of developing a warning system which will give us any warning of intercontinental ballistic missiles. If, however, a warning system can be developed which would give us a few minutes, there is the very urgent and important matter of developing a defence against those missiles. Of course, it is commonly recognized that the western world must develop an anti-missile missile, and the United States is engaged in that development work at the present time.

There is another possibility, however, and I have here a clipping from the Ottawa Citizen of March 19, 1959, with reference to three high level explosions which were performed by the United States some time last summer with the idea that an electric shield or radioactive shield would be formed around the earth's atmosphere. I realize this would be highly classified information, but I wonder if the minister could tell us anything at all which would indicate if these tests show any promise of a military application in the defence against intercontinental ballistic missiles?

Mr. Pearkes: I am sure the hon. member knows it would be quite impossible for me to disclose the results of tests which were carried out by an ally in another country.

Mr. Hellyer: My next question will be directly referring to the Royal Canadian Air Force, Mr. Chairman, and the minister will have a clear conscience in dealing with it as fully as he sees fit. Can the minister tell us if the hazard or jump pay for the Royal Canadian Air Force has been eliminated?

Mr. Pearkes: I do not know whether that is the case or not, but I will get the information shortly.

Mr. Benidickson: After that reference to the jump pay I wonder if I might get back to the question of the new role of the R.C.A.F. in Europe and our NATO relationship. Presumably our new equipment would be such that if the French persist in their decision about changing the agreement with the United States with respect to atomic warheads being under their own direction and storage, it would inevitably involve a transfer of the Canadian squadrons out of France. If that is so, would the cost of re-establishing bases for Canada be at the cost of Canada, or would that be within the general infrastructure of NATO itself?

Mr. Pearkes: I think I answered that question earlier when I pointed out that there are alternative bases in France and Germany, and that if it is necessary as a result of international developments for the squadrons of the R.C.A.F. to move out of France, there are places where they can go to. But they are not equipped with nuclear weapons at the present time and will still be supplied through the United States pipe line.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister if he could give me a list of the R.C.A.F. establishments in the province of Newfoundland?

Mr. Pearkes: May I refer the hon. gentleman to the white paper wherein he will find all that information.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister give us the details about what the R.C.A.F. has at Gander?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes. At Gander there is an aircraft control and warning unit with a ground observer corps detachment, and an R.C.A.F. movement bureau.

Mr. Granger: I wonder if I could call the minister's attention to the fact that the huge airport at Gander seems to be used very little by the R.C.A.F., to the extent that I believe they have very limited facilities and very limited equipment there. In view of the general belief that in the event of hostilities submarines will play a very important part, Gander's geographical position, which places it east into the Atlantic for several hundred miles—I would say, closer than any other airport—must make it an ideal place to base the R.C.A.F. spotter planes. At the same time I would like to mention that Gander, despite its huge runways and other facilities, does not have a large hangar capable of servicing a modern jet aircraft.

Mr. Pearkes: I thank the hon. member for bringing that information to my attention, and we will look into it further.

Mr. Hellyer: I have two or three more questions—

Mr. Pearkes: Might I reply to the question about risk pay. There has been no discontinuance of this for air crew nor jump pay for para-rescue personnel.

Mr. Hellyer: I would like to ask the minister if I understood him correctly earlier when he told the committee that no F-104G had been test flown? May we draw the conclusion that no F-104G has not in fact been produced in its entirety as yet?

Mr. Pearkes: I understand that the F-104G has not been flown yet. There are certain improvements and strengthening to the wings which are being carried out. The F-104G is an improved version of the F-104C which has been flown frequently and thoroughly tested.

Mr. Hellyer: Is the minister satisfied, however, that it will be thoroughly stable on the basis of the wing modification which he is talking about but which has not yet been tested in actual flight?

Mr. Pearkes: I am assured by the technical staff of the R.C.A.F. that there will be a stable platform so far as the F-104G is concerned.

Mr. Hellyer: Were we also correct in assuming that the R.C.A.F. did not consider the possibility of using the F-105 Thunderchief?

Mr. Pearkes: The R.C.A.F. carried out a thorough investigation on the F-105 Thunderchief, but for the reasons I have already given this aircraft was not selected for the re-equipment of the air division.

Mr. Peters: I would like to ask the minister how the developments are coming along in the matter of getting an international agreement, or even a continental agreement, on calibrations for bullets and other types of weapons, in particular between the United States and Canada, and if there has been any agreement on that matter?

Mr. Pearkes: I think the hon. gentleman is referring to the standardization which I have already referred to in this debate. There is an effort by the NATO council to get as great a degree of standardization as we can. I am pleased to say we have a Canadian officer who is acting as chairman of that standardization committee of the NATO forces. Some progress is being made, particularly in the field of small arms, but I cannot be too enthusiastic about it and I cannot say that everybody is adopting the same weapons for all the branches of their national forces, because they are not doing so. The national interests clash in this respect, and to achieve standardization is difficult.

Mr. Peters: With regard to the plane we are buying from the United States, for instance, the Lockheed, will that be equipped with cannons and other weapons which will be interchangeable with those used by the United States air force?

Mr. Pearkes: They will be interchangeable with those of United States air force squadrons armed with the same equipment, in exactly the same way as they will be interchangeable with those of German squadrons equipped with this particular type of aircraft. This was one of the considerations which caused the government to decide on the 104.

Mr. Peters: May I ask the minister if in the case of the Garand rifle the bore is of a Canadian calibre or not? I understand that the service is being re-equipped with this type of weapon.

Mr. Pearkes: It is not the Garand rifle; it is the FN rifle, which is made in Canada and which is equipped with ammunition made in Canada. Certain of our allies use that calibre. It is really based on a Belgian rifle.

Mr. Peters: Does it use .303 ammunition?

Mr. Pearkes: It does not use .303 ammunition; it uses ammunition of another calibre.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister could tell us what is the authorized strength of the R.C.A.F.?

Mr. Pearkes: Fifty one thousand.

Mr. Peters: I should like to ask a question with regard to this matter of Bomarc missile bases and the establishment of these bases. Is Canada giving any consideration to relocating these particular bases so that the point of contact will no longer be over the major cities of western Canada? I think it is well understood that the United States have most of the Bomarc bases on their territory, and the only two which are situated in Canada are parallel with the United States bases. Geographically, Canada dips down below that parallel, so we have two of the bases in Canada on roughly the same parallel as the United States, which leaves us in the position that if there should be an attack, Canadian cities, rather than being protected, are going to be near the points of contact; if the range is to be 200 miles, the cities of Winnipeg, Regina and Vancouver would be among those exposed. In these circumstances, has some consideration been given to recommending to the United States that they should use a missile with a much longer range or that the sites of these bases should be changed so that the point of contact would not be over major Canadian cities? It seems to me it is going to be of little comfort to the people who are living in these cities if they know that the point of contact is somewhere over their heads and that instead of being defended, the fallout alone would probably be sufficient to eliminate them in the event of attack.

Mr. Pearkes: The range of the Bomarc B, the type of Bomarc missile which will be fired from the stations along the Canadian border, will have a range very considerably greater than the one mentioned by the hon. member and will give protection to all the major cities of Canada.

Mr. Hellyer: I wonder if the minister would tell us if there are any trades and professions in the R.C.A.F. which are not up to strength —doctors, engineers, and so on.

Mr. Pearkes: No, I am informed that the R.C.A.F. is well up to strength in all its branches.

Mr. Hellyer: Was the total ceiling for the three forces increased in the last two years and, if so, to what extent?

Mr. Pearkes: No, there has been no change since 1955.

Mr. Hellyer: Am I correct in thinking that the ceiling limit was 120,000?

Mr. Pearkes: That is correct, without cadets and apprentices.

Mr. Hellyer: And your figure of 120,800 at the end of December of last year included cadets?

Mr. Pearkes: That is right.

Mr. Peters: Can I ask the Minister of Defence what happens to the CF-105 now? What are we going to do with it? Does it become a museum piece, or can we get some value out of the planes that we built?

Mr. Pearkes: That aircraft has been declared surplus by the Department of National Defence and is now for disposal by the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation which is administered by the Department of Defence Production. The responsible minister will be able to inform the hon. member as to the disposal which is being made of this aircraft when his estimates come before this committee.

Mr. Pearson: That reminds me about a question which I did raise earlier with regard to the possible use of the Iroquois engine in any of these planes that were under consideration. I think the question was whether in connection with any of the other planes which were under consideration it was indicated that they might use the Iroquois engines, and I believe it was said that one of them could use this engine not only in its Canadian but also in its United States production.

Mr. Pearkes: The possibility of completing the development of the Iroquois and the possible use of this engine in some other aircraft was considered, but the Iroquois has not been completed to the stage when a firm decision could be made to use that engine within the time limit required.

Mr. Hellyer: Earlier the Leader of the Opposition asked the minister about the cost of the new plane and its engine, and the minister referred us to the Minister of Defence Production. With deference, I do not think we should be asked to turn our attention to a minister who is not responsible for the appropriation but who is merely responsible for the actual contractual arrangements and the purchase of the aircraft. This air force appropriation includes any expenditures which will be required for the aircraft, its engine and its armament and I think we have the right to expect the minister to tell us what these proposed expenditures are.

Mr. Pearkes: Five million dollars are provided in these estimates for expenditures this year connected with the requirements of the air division. The total contract is being worked out by the Department of Defence Production and the minister from whom the hon. member should obtain the information which he is seeking is the Minister of Defence Production.

Mr. Hellyer: I do not agree. There is a later item of $1 which gives the Department of National Defence the right to make forward commitments. Surely we should know what the forward commitments are. We should not be asked to sign a blank cheque which is what the minister is proposing at the present time.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister indicated that the state of development of the Iroquois engine was not such that it could be considered for use in the program that has been outlined with respect to the purchase of this new aircraft. I take it from his remarks that the development work has not ceased. What is in the estimates with regard to the Iroquois engine?

Mr. Pearkes: There is no item in this estimate for the further development of the Iroquois engine.

Mr. Benidickson: The work ceased at the same time the stoppage of the aircraft occurred?

Mr. Pearkes: It has ceased unless the company is carrying on itself.

Mr. Hellyer: In the white paper there is mention of certain expenditures with regard to the Avro Arrow and its components amounting to $50 million or $60 million. What are those sums for?

Mr. Pearkes: Charges for cancelling the contract.

Mr. Peters: Across the country there are large numbers of what we used to call emergency landing fields with which nothing has been done for some time. These come under the jurisdiction of this department. These used to accommodate the landing of Tiger Moths and even planes of the size of Norsemen and Ansons. The weeds are growing profusely in these fields. Is it the intention of the department to turn these back to the municipalities from which they were purchased? These fields are grass runways used as emergency fields supplementary to other major fields.

Mr. Pearkes: I think the hon. member is referring to fields which were used by the Department of Transport or the Department of National Defence during the war and have since been declared surplus, some of which have been taken over by the Department of Transport and others of which have been declared surplus and are no longer considered operational.

Mr. Benidickson: Reference has been made by the minister to an item in the over-all estimates of $50 million-odd that is available for expenses resulting from the cancellation of the Avro Arrow aircraft. These estimates were prepared last fall and were tabled in the house in January. How would the government at that time have any idea that it would require $50 million-odd for the purpose of the cancellation of this contract?

Mr. Pearkes: When it was announced that the development of the Arrow would not be proceeded with it was decided that this provision would be made in the estimates to carry on after March, when it was decided to go on until such time as the supplementary estimates could be put through. The decision turned out not to be to continue, and that money may be used to cover cancellation charges.

Mr. Hellyer: There is something that worries me about all of these estimates and that is the disproportion between expenditures for equipment and other expenditures. The expenditures for equipment this year are a lower percentage of the total estimates than they have been in previous years. In a day of technological advance, at a time when every manufacturing organization is increasing the ratio of capital to manpower, we find that the Department of National Defence is following a reverse pattern and spending more money on overhead expenditures and less money on equipment. Surely if the department is going to maintain all these people, telling us that they are necessary to continue with our share of the defence of the western world, they should be equipped. We are not at all satisfied that the ratio of equipment being supplied to our men is getting smaller and that the other expenditures are getting larger. We call this to the minister's attention and feel that if he is going to return next year and ask for this much money he should have established a better proportion between the expenditures on equipment and other expenditures.

Item agreed to.

222. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment, $249,313,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister two questions. How much of this total sum is being spent in Newfoundland and how much in the Atlantic provinces?

Mr. Pearkes: As far as construction in Newfoundland is concerned there is an expenditure of $465 million for station development at Gander. Oh, I am sorry. I should have said $465,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: I was becoming interested at this point.

Mr. Pearkes: The figures are as follows:

Location	Amount	Purpose
Torbay	$ 290,000	Station development.
Gander	465,000	Station development.
Goose Bay	473,000	Station development.
Goose Bay	100,000	Houses and schools.

At Gander a drill hall and recreational hall have recently been converted to a combined mess and quarters for the airmen.

Mr. Pickersgill: I asked for the global expenditures, not just construction. I suppose there is nothing else but construction in Newfoundland but I assume in the Atlantic provinces generally that there are some other expenditures besides construction.

Mr. Pearkes: Construction in the Atlantic provinces as a whole amounts to $13,979,000.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister give the amount of the total vote, not just construction? This includes land and major equipment. I am interested in the total expenditures in the Atlantic provinces.

Mr. Pearkes: I am afraid we do not keep our books in that way, so far as the procurement of equipment is concerned.

Mr. Dumas: Can the minister tell the committee if his department has received a request from the town of Val d'Or asking that it contribute to the cost of paving that part of the road from the subdivided part of the town of Val d'Or to the military airport and the air force establishment?

Mr. Pearkes: We have had such a request, I believe, and the matter is under consideration at the present time.

Mr. Dumas: Is there any amount provided in the estimates for this work?

Mr. Pearkes: No, Mr. Chairman, there is no special item included in the estimates for that.

Mr. Dumas: In view of the fact that the road is used extensively by the R.C.A.F. I should like the minister to give further consideration to the matter and recommend that his department participate in at least some of the cost of paving the road to the airport.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, this item for construction or the acquisition of buildings, works, land and major equipment is in the amount of $249,313,000. Last year's estimate for the corresponding item was in the amount of $317,605,000. When I look at the details of the estimates on page 314 of the blue book I find under the item "major procurement of equipment" that aircraft and engines comprise some $164,817,000 while last year's estimate under this heading amounted to $246,929,000. In other words, the total decrease in the amount asked for in the estimate appears to be taken up in the one subheading, aircraft and engines, and it represents some $82 million in that one subheading alone. I presume that a great part of that reduction results from the cancellation of the Arrow contract. I wish to ask the minister this question. Does the procurement of the Lockheed aircraft which we have been discussing earlier today envisage any added expenditure over and above that forecast in these estimates?

Mr. Pearkes: No, it is not the intention to put in any supplementary estimate for any further expenditure connected with the F-104. The expenditures envisaged this year are included in these estimates.

Mr. McIlraith: In this item.

Mr. Pearkes: In this item.

Mr. Benidickson: On this very point, following my last question and the question of the hon. member for Ottawa West, the amount asked for in the blue book of estimates tabled in January was about $165 million. How much of that was for aircraft and engines with respect to the CF-105?

Mr. Pearkes: The total amount for fighter aircraft was $46,750,000.

Mr. Benidickson: I may be confused on terms, but the minister referred to appropriations for fighter aircraft. My question was directed specifically to appropriations for the CF-105 which we more normally call an interceptor aircraft.

Mr. Pearkes: I am told that for this fighter aircraft $45 million is shown in there for cancelling the 105.

Mr. Benidickson: That was not my question. I want to know the total amount anticipated to be spent on the Arrow aircraft, which is part of the $165 million.

Mr. Pearkes: Forty-five million dollars.

Mr. Pickersgill: When that item was brought before us in January there had been no cancellation of the contract. Can the minister tell us what that was for when it was put there?

[Mr. Dumas.]

Mr. Pearkes: I understand that less than 10 months ago—I am sorry that the hon. gentleman was not here—

Mr. Pickersgill: I have been here all the time but I did not understand.

Mr. Pearkes: I am sorry if his attention was otherwise directed. The amount of money was made available either to continue with the development of that aircraft after March and before the estimates could be dealt with or for the charges which would be incurred because the contract was cancelled.

Mr. Benidickson: I understand that but I want to follow that up with this question. This estimate was presumably submitted to treasury board in December and was submitted to the House of Commons in January of 1959. It would have had regard to the Prime Minister's statement of September when he said that the cabinet was giving consideration to the question of continuing or discontinuing the Arrow program. But the decision to cancel the Arrow program was actually reached six weeks prior to the estimated time of decision given by the Prime Minister in September. As I understand it, he intended to make the announcement at the end of March and he made it about the middle of February.

Mr. Pickersgill: February 20.

Mr. Benidickson: Can the minister give us a brief summary of what utilization has been made of this $45 million? How much of it was spent on the normal progress of development of the aircraft and the engine up to the time of cancellation, how much has been spent for cancellation charges and how much additional does the minister expect he will still have to pay with respect to cancellation obligations?

Mr. Pearkes: This amount of money would have been spent had the development of the Arrow gone ahead after April 1. Because the aircraft was cancelled on February 20 none of this money was spent between then and March 31. This money is available to meet charges involved in cancelling the contract, and as far as I know at the present time it is adequate to cover expected charges for cancellation.

Mr. Benidickson: We are now more than three months into the current fiscal year. Has the minister any information as to how much of this $45 million has already been disbursed for cancellation obligations?

Mr. Pearkes: We do not know the exact amount because the process is still going on and the bills will be received through the Department of Defence Production.

Mr. Benidickson: Negotiation in this respect is under the Minister of Defence Production?

Mr. Pearkes: That is correct.

Mr. McIlraith: I want to ask the minister if this is not to some extent misleading in that in this part of the estimates we are dealing with expenditures for the procurement of equipment for the Department of National Defence. I always had the impression that expenses with respect to the termination of contracts appear in an item in the estimates of the Department of Defence Production. Is that not correct?

Mr. Pearkes: I understand that is not correct. The amount for the cancelling of this aircraft is included under this item.

Mr. McIlraith: Then what has the item for termination of contracts under the other department covered in past years? What I want clarified is the change in accounting methods.

Mr. Pearkes: I am told that there is no change from the methods used previously and that as far as the Department of National Defence is concerned, which has to pay the bills for cancelling contracts, the money is always provided under the estimates of the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I recall meetings of treasury board to which I was invited when estimates were being presented. Each department came forward with many big black books containing complete details so that if any questions arose at treasury board concerning the general items that appear in the blue book of estimates they could be answered. I recall also that the same books are usually brought by the minister to the house for the same purpose of giving explanations in detail of individual items in answer to questions asked in committee of supply.

I wonder if the minister would be able to give the committee the information that would be in that book explaining the $45 million item. There would be a text alongside the request for $45 million indicating what its purpose was and the likelihood of being able to spend it, and so on. Has the minister now, as is the usual practice, got these sheets in front of him, and can he read to the committee what the explanation was and indicate if an explanation was requested at the treasury board meeting?

Mr. Pearkes: There is no further information that I have available, other than what I have already given. There is the $45 million for this purpose and there was a million and a half which was included to wind up the CF-100 program. This accounts for the balance of the item, in addition to the amount which I stated a few minutes ago as being available for the procurement of an aircraft to replace our F-86.

Mr. Pickersgill: As the minister knows, I was a member of treasury board for several years, and what I would really be interested in knowing is what explanation was given to treasury board as to why $45 million rather than $50 million or $60 million, was needed? Evidently the fate of this aircraft was uncertain, as was indicated last September, and how did the department arrive at the $45 million, what was the basis of their calculation last December, before they knew what they were going to do?

Mr. Pearkes: There was $5 million on development and $45 million in the other respect. This was arrived at on the basis of experience as an estimate of what the charges might be. It was purely an estimate at that time. There was some information available as to what might be the charges, and this preliminary sum was in either for the purpose of carrying on until a supplementary estimate could be presented or until the cancellation charges were made. It would appear at the present time it was a fairly accurate estimate.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister talks as though in December there was an estimate on the basis of the contract being cancelled, and that is the point I am trying to settle. In December the country did not know and parliament did not know and, according to the best evidence that we have been given, the government did not know whether it was going ahead with this plane or whether it was going to cancel it. The explanation the minister gives seems to indicate that the minister knew in December it was going to be cancelled.

Mr. Pearkes: Surely, I have explained several times it was a provision made for either alternative, to cancel or to continue; that was the basis upon which this amount was estimated.

Mr. Hellyer: Before the item carries, Mr. Chairman, the minister referred the other day to runway extensions for Canadian air bases to make them more suitable for temporary or other use by the United States air force fighter squadrons. I wonder if he could tell us if there is any money included in this vote for extension of runways to facilitate their use by United States air force fighter squadrons?

Mr. Pearkes: There is no money in these estimates for any special extension of runways. There is the usual money available for the maintenance of runways.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask the minister whether there has been any increase in United States air force activity in Canada since his estimates were last before the committee?

Mr. Pearkes: There has been no change or practically no change in the number of United States personnel stationed in Canada. However, as was announced late last year or early this year, facilities are being provided for refueling bases at four airfields for the SAC bombers. The money is being spent by the United States to extend the runways at these four bases so that United States refueling tankers could be placed there, if necessary, in order to refuel these SAC bombers.

Item agreed to.

Defence research and development—
Defence research board—

223. Operation and maintenance, $21,924,603.

Mr. Hellyer: I think the minister should explain to the committee what the present projects of the defence research board are, and why he feels it advisable to reduce the amount of money available to the defence research board for their scientific projects.

Mr. Pearkes: There has been no reduction in the amount of money made available to the defence research board for research purposes. You will notice, on the other hand, there has been an increase of $1,659,087. There has been a reduction in development, and the money is not being required for development because the Arrow was cancelled.

Mr. Hellyer: It is true the total amount of money available to the defence research board for development and scientific projects has been reduced, according to page 51 of the white paper, from 4.7 per cent of the total defence expenditure in 1958-59 to 3 per cent in 1959-60.

Mr. Pearkes: That is correct, and that is reflected in the blue book on page 43 where, for the research side of the defence research board, there is shown an increase, but there has been a corresponding decrease in so far as development is concerned because the development of the CF-105 is not being continued.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, since we have now begun to discuss these things together, and it is very difficult to separate them, the minister has mentioned that the reduction of $34 million in development—I think that is the figure—is due to the decision not to proceed with the CF-105. Does that account for the whole of this decrease in development?

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. Pearkes: That is correct; there is no decrease in development shown except for the CF-105.

Item agreed to.

225. Development, $21,565,000.

Mr. Hellyer: The minister did not reply to the question I asked him about some of the major developments which are being carried on by the defence research board. Could he give the committee some information about the things which they are doing and about the future possibilities which may develop from them?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes. I did not reply to that because I had given it in considerable detail in my opening remarks the day before yesterday.

Mr. Hellyer: I listened very carefully, but I did not hear very much.

Mr. Pearkes: Would the hon. member like me to read this again?

Mr. Hellyer: Give some additional information.

Mr. Pearkes: This covers the main features, plus what is in the white paper. This covers the major developments. So far as research is concerned, the most important projects are those connected with upper atmospheric physics, aerophysics and explosive physics. This research is being conducted jointly with the United States. That is the development of the technique of locating and tracking objects in the upper atmosphere. Other important branches of the research work deal with the detection of submarines, and is a big effort made by the defence research board with their special stations for development of underwater detection in Nova Scotia, Halifax, Shelburne and at Esquimalt in British Columbia. High priority is given to that particular work.

Mr. Hellyer: I could not hear too clearly, Mr. Chairman. Did the minister indicate how the board was coming along with the development of the satellite which we had been told would be launched sometime in the future.

Mr. Pearkes: The government of Canada and the defence research board are working closely with the United States in the provision of certain instruments in connection with a satellite which is to be launched in the future.

Item agreed to.

226. Services and facilities supplied to the Department of National Defence by the Department of Transport, $3,412,659.

Mr. Herridge: Will the minister explain to the committee what type of services and facilities are provided by the Department of Transport to the Department of National Defence under this item?

Mr. Pearkes: Entirely meteorological services, reporting on the weather conditions which, of course, are of utmost importance for our R.C.A.F. planes.

Item agreed to.

Mutual aid—

227. Contributions to infrastructure and military costs of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the transfer of defence equipment and supplies and the provision of services and facilities for defence purposes in accordance with section 3 of The Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, not exceeding a total of $90,000,000 including the present value of defence equipment or supplies or the cost of services made available by the Canadian forces estimated in the amount of $68,150,000 and provided by appropriations for those forces in the current and former years in respect of which, notwithstanding subsection (3) of section 3 of the said act, no amount shall be charged to this appropriation or paid into a special account;

Provided by this vote, $21,850,000.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, this is a figure for mutual aid. It shows a decrease of $1,000,000. The figure is now $21,850,000. The minister will recall that a few years ago mutual aid was one of the most important contributions we made to collective defence under NATO. The amount used to be $150 million to $200 million or so in those days. It is now to $21 million. Can the minister give us a breakdown of this $21 million so we will know how it is being spent?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes. Of course, there are three main reasons why there is a considerable reduction. First of all, the forces of our European allies are being built up and are being equipped by their own efforts, and are in a better state of preparedness than they were a few years ago.

The second consideration is that a few years ago we had large surpluses of arms and equipment of various types which we could readily make available to our allies. Now the majority of those surpluses has already been disposed of and the equipment which we now make available to our allies has either to be refitted or even purchased. Since we have urgent need of equipment ourselves, we cannot very well be making equipment and buying equipment to give to our allies.

The third reason for the reduction is the cessation of the training of NATO pilots.

I have here a breakdown which has been prepared in these books. The amount for mutual aid this year is $350,000 as against $1,500,000 last year; that is, the procurement of new equipment to give away to our allies. The transfer of equipment from service stocks last year was $98 million. As I said, that source is rapidly drying up, and we are giving away $60,114,000 this year. NATO air training; the training of the air crews from our NATO partners has dropped by $1 million, from $9 million to $8 million. Then, the contributions to infra-structure—that is, the overhead expenses connected with NATO installations in Europe, of which we pay a percentage—remains at the same $21,500,000.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has shown that the figure for mutual aid by way of transfer of stocks or new equipment to NATO countries, and by way of air training and contributions to infrastructure, comes to $90 million. Then there is a reduction of $68 million—I am now looking at page 317 of the estimates book—and he gets the amount provided by this vote of $21 million. I wish he would explain to me by what process of budgeting that amount of $90 million is reduced to $21,850,000 in this particular vote.

Mr. Pearkes: I am informed that the provision for the air crew training is in the service vote concerned, and the transfer of equipment is also in the vote of the particular service. Therefore, you get the figure that I have already given.

Mr. Pearson: That means that our mutual aid appropriation this year, in one vote or another in these estimates, is not $21 million but $90 million.

Mr. Pearkes: That is correct. The total for mutual aid is $90 million and it is made up in the ratio that I gave, namely $350,000 for procurement; transfer of stocks, $60 million odd; air crew training, $8 million; infrastructure, $21 million, all of which adds up to the $90 million.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, dealing with the $60 million just mentioned by the minister, I see in the details "aircraft and engines, $50 million". Under what item of the estimates is that to be found?

Mr. Pearkes: Transfer of equipment from service stocks amounts to $60,144,000. The principal items are aircraft and engines, $51 million. These include seventeen of the tracker aircraft with spares; ten CF-100 aircraft with initial spares; a quantity of aerial engines and spares and supports for the F-86's which are the aircraft which had been previously transferred to Greece and Turkey. There is an item for armament equipment, $6,844,000; ammunition and bombs, $1,700,000.

Mr. McIlraith: I thank the minister for the information but that was not quite my question. My question was concerning the item of $51 million which he has just indicated for aircraft and engines. In what item of the estimates is it to be found?

Mr. Pearkes: This is equipment which, of course, has already been bought and paid for which we are giving away. There is no item in these estimates to procure that additional equipment; it is equipment which is already held by the R.C.A.F. which is considered surplus to requirement, and therefore we can give it away valued at the amount which is quoted.

Mr. McIlraith: Thank you; that is the point I wanted to have cleared up.

Mr. Pearkes: I am sorry I did not quite gather the question.

Mr. Pearson: Before the item is carried, Mr. Chairman, there is an amount of some millions of dollars for the Canadian contribution to infrastructure. I know something of the difficulties surrounding infrastructure of NATO, and I wonder if the minister could give us some indication of how this is working out? We are spending a good deal of money on this and on NATO military headquarters, and we are doing it at a time when I should think the whole infrastructure concept is pretty shaky in the light of the attitude of the government of France toward participation in NATO. I wonder if the minister could say something about that?

Mr. Pearkes: I believe Canada pays about 6 per cent of the total budget. The budget is prepared by the military commanders and submitted to the NATO council, and it is approved annually at meetings in Paris which usually take place, as the hon. Leader of the Opposition knows, sometime in December. A good deal of the construction work has been completed, and much of this now is maintenance work. That embraces all kinds of establishments which are maintained, barracks and so forth, in the various countries. I saw recently that development is going on in Sardinia where for example they have a NATO bombing range. The expenditures are supervised by the council of the NATO countries. The accommodation we are provided with is being well maintained. The troops both in Germany and in France are comfortably located, and I think I should say that we are now receiving satisfaction from the amount of money which is being spent under this general heading of infrastructure.

The amount which we pay, as I say, is approximately 6 per cent of the total amount, and this is an estimate of what is likely to be incurred during the year. It is the same amount as was made available for this purpose last year. I am not quite in a position to say whether all that amount was spent last year or not, but it was approximately the right amount.

Mr. Pearson: I thank the minister for that information. I gather from the amount that the total infrastructure budget of NATO and of the NATO military budget is well above $400 million a year now, which is a considerable amount, and our 6 per cent comes to about $21 million, which I think is a reasonable percentage, and I have no complaint about that. I was wondering whether all the NATO members are maintaining their infrastructure payments according to the percentages laid down, and whether recent developments—I am thinking now about the French withdrawal of some of its forces from NATO, and the possible withdrawal of United States air squadrons from France—will affect the infrastructure concept and the working out of infrastructure in any way? We are spending $400 million a year for facilities which are meant to be at the service of NATO in whatever country they are constructed, and I hope there will be nothing permitted to interfere with that concept.

Mr. Pearkes: I am sure that concept is a correct one and that the council will watch very carefully the expenditure of these moneys.

Item agreed to.

National Defence General—

228. To authorize, notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, and subject to allotment by the treasury board, total commitments of $2,902,205,282 for the purposes of the foregoing votes relating to national defence, regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,267,298,584 will come due for payment in future years), $1.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, this is a basket item. When we had the administration item up, I waited patiently yesterday morning until one o'clock, and then, being a little late getting back at 2.30, I saw the item had been carried, so may I raise a question which I intended to raise at that time if I had found my turn. The minister will recall that when he was on this side of the house he had a great deal to say about waste and extravagance, and one of the items he used to note invariably I would like to illustrate. On June 20, 1956, page 5221 of Hansard, the present Minister of National Defence, who was then the critic in the opposition on defence matters, said:

The minister made reference to the considerable number of civilians who are employed in the armed forces. One of course readily recognizes the fact that there are large numbers of civilians employed in the various ordnance depots and the dockyards on both coasts. The minister said 55,000 civilians are employed.

Then this is the point which interests me particularly. The minister has now been in charge of the department for two years and his views in 1956, expressed on the same page of Hansard, with respect to national defence headquarters were as follows:

I come now to the question of national defence headquarters. From time to time over a great many years we have questioned the size of the staff at national defence headquarters. We have wondered if it is excessively large. Time and time again we have called attention to the number of officers and men and the number of civilians who are employed there.

I draw my hon. friend's attention to page 45 of the white paper which he tabled in April. He will note there that in each of the two years during which he has been in charge of the department the table indicates that there has been a substantial increase in the civilian strength at national defence headquarters. I wonder if he has actually reviewed this situation in the light of the views he formerly held, and if he could tell me why it is that this increase seems to go on year by year, the very matter he used to complain about when he was criticizing it on this side of the house.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, I will be quite honest; I still wonder. The numbers still seem to increase.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, the minister will recall in days of yore how his colleagues, particularly the Minister of Finance who I wish were present, used to inveigh against this horrible practice of dollar items. He used to say it was a contravention of every good parliamentary practice, a flouting of the rights of the people and of the privileges of parliament, and so on. He made long speeches about the iniquity of a dollar item, and perhaps the minister will explain the virtue of this particular item.

Mr. Pearkes: I am sure that as a member of the previous administration the hon. Leader of the Opposition is very familiar with the purpose of these dollar items. The reason is that it is a commitment authority, and in defence planning the construction of new equipment, be it aircraft, ships, guns, or the building of certain projects, has to be projected for two, three, four or more years, and one cannot really embark on this general program unless there is some assurance given that under normal circumstances it will be continued.

I might say that the purpose of this vote is to authorize the same system of administrative commitment as in previous years, and it has been going on now for a good many years. In the past this has been done by the wording of a single defence vote, but now that these estimates have been divided up on the recommendation of the parliamentary committee another procedure has to be adopted. The same policy is now being accomplished by this special item, the effect of which is to put a limit on the total commitments that may be entered into without certifying, in accordance with section 30 of the Financial Administration Act, that funds are available to meet those commitments. With the increasing number of items which require to be dealt with, this system of certification has proved to be somewhat cumbersome and unsatisfactory.

Mr. Herridge: I was waiting for this little tidbit to come up, and I quite agree with what the minister had to say. I do not know very much about aeroplanes but I do recognize inconsistencies. Would the minister not agree that to continue this is somewhat inconsistent in view of the attitude taken by many of his colleagues when in opposition?

Mr. Pearson: Would the minister agree that this is as wise and sensible a parliamentary practice as it was in the past?

Mr. Pearkes: As far as this department is concerned I feel it is a wise and prudent procedure.

Mr. Pickersgill: The minister said he was still wondering about the size of the headquarters staff. Has he thought of getting any advice—and I use the word advisedly—from the Minister of National Revenue?

Mr. Pearkes: Really, that has nothing to do with this particular item. We have establishment committees which inspect and go over the establishments with a fine-tooth comb.

Mr. McIlraith: The minister has explained that this item is the authority to make commitments for expenditures in the future. What concerns me, in the light of that explanation, is how he justifies the expenditure under item 222 which is an item for the acquisition of major equipment—the part that is relevant. How can he justify using funds voted by parliament under the designation "acquisition of major equipment" for the termination of the Arrow contract? I raised that question earlier on item 222, and I raise it in connection with the practice which was formerly used in the reconstruction and supply departments and in the Department of Defence Production for providing for liquidation of contracts by votes under those departments. I am mystified as to how the minister can find authority under item 222 for the termination of a contract rather than for the procurement of equipment. I am referring, of course, to $45 million for the termination of the Arrow contract. It seems to me that it should either come under this item 228 which we are now discussing or that the former practice should have been followed. After the minister gave me the answer he did a few minutes ago I took the opportunity to go out, rather hastily to the library, and I find it is a great number of years since there was any expenditure of anything like this size in respect of the termination of a contract. I think the year 1947-48 was the last year in which an item exceeded $30 million. But the item was carried under the reconstruction and supply department and the defence production department until the year ended March 31, 1953, the last occasion I was able to find it, though my inquiries were, as the minister will appreciate, naturally somewhat hurried.

Mr. Pearkes: I am told by the official present that this is the practice which has been followed in recent years though, of course, such a large amount has not been required on the cancellation of an important contract for a considerable time.

Mr. McIlraith: Perhaps there is no point in my pursuing the matter further. I could draw the minister's attention to some of the items in various years and he would certainly find the item to do with liquidation of contracts under the estimates of other departments. It may be that there was a change in the practice some years ago. I am content to leave the subject, with the request that the minister should pursue the point further.

Mr. Hellyer: I should like to ask the minister if he prefers this new method of putting these votes into the estimates and whether he has any comment to make on the possibility that by dividing them between the three services might accentuate the rivalry between the different branches of the armed forces. I know that we in Canada have been most fortunate in that there has been a very co-operative attitude between chiefs of staff, who have considered themselves to be representative of the Canadian armed services as a whole as well as being representative of their own services.

Does the minister think there is any possibility that adopting this new method of putting these votes into the estimates will tend to reduce this co-operative attitude or to encourage in any way a struggle within the Canadian armed forces to obtain a larger proportion of the total appropriation in any particular vote? I know this is a real problem. Under the old system we had flexibility, and the ability to transfer money from one service to the other if the need of any one service became more urgent in the course of a year. I hope we will not emulate Washington in this regard and I hope the new system will not encourage any rivalry whatsoever, but that whatever system we do adopt finally will be the one most likely to further the conception of a unified Canadian defence force.

Mr. Pearkes: I am sure this will not cause any rivalry between the forces. The forces knew exactly, before, how much money would be available to them. What this will do is to give parliament a tighter control over expenditure and it will improve the administration in the forces because no longer will there be any pool of money left over at the end which could be easily transferred from one force to another. It will mean that much better estimating will be done at the beginning by the various forces. I should like to commend the committee on its recommendation, which I welcome in this respect, and that is why it has been introduced.

Mr. Hellyer: I was merely putting my comment forward as a question, and if the minister is satisfied I think we can accept his assurances on this point.

Item agreed to.

General services—

229. Grants to military associations, institutes and others as detailed in the estimates, $259,175.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, this item covers rifle associations, military service associations, military united service institutes and others. Would the minister inform the committee what is the requirement in each case before these organizations can become qualified for grants, and what check is made to make certain that these organizations warrant grants. What standard is used in making these grants? How is it decided who shall receive them and who shall not?

Mr. Pearkes: There have been no additions made to the grants in these estimates. In fact, most of the grants to these various organizations have been the same for a great many years. All of these associations have to report their financial standing to national defence headquarters at the end of each year. They are checked regarding their particular activity not only by national defence headquarters but by the various commands in which they are situated.

With respect to associations as rifle associations, I think it quite obvious what their objectives are. As far as service associations are concerned they are groups of representatives from all parts of Canada for the particular arm of the service or the particular force. They meet together periodically and submit recommendations representing, let us say, the militia, or the infantry of the militia or the artillery or the air cadets, whatever the case may be.

The grants to the service institutions are grants which are made to enable those clubs consisting of retired and serving officers, both in the regular and auxiliary and reserve forces, to keep in touch with military developments by means of holding periodical lectures and by inviting distinguished visitors they may like to invite to speak to them on military matters. There is no change in that.

Mr. Herridge: They all report annually to your department and so you know they are functioning properly?

Mr. Pearkes: They all report to the department. Their books are audited and general supervision of their activities is carried out by the respective commands.

Mr. Benidickson: My question is somewhat similar to that of the hon. member for Kootenay West. I am thinking of grants to the united services institutes. The amount of the grants vary. Do these vary in accordance with a fixed scale of contribution based on paid up membership?

Mr. Pearkes: That is more or less correct. It is based on activities and more or less on the paid up memberships.

Mr. Benidickson: I notice here an unusual feature compared to some other grants to associations made by other departments. It is not too common to make a grant to, shall we say, an organization in one particular city and at the same time make a grant to a provincial organization. That is not frequently done in some of our patterns of grants.

I notice there are grants to individual cities and towns and as far as I can see in the case of Alberta there is just one institute, the institute of Alberta. There are no cities or towns in Manitoba, except one, called the institute of Manitoba, which received a grant. There is another one in Alberta which just came to my attention. I refer to Edmonton. I was wrong in my previous statement.

Mr. Pearkes: The institute of Alberta is an old established institute which has its headquarters in the city of Calgary. There is a separate united services club in Edmonton. Both receive grants.

Item agreed to.

230. Grants to the town of Oromocto, subject to the approval of treasury board, for municipal services including the maintenance and operation of schools and to promote the development of the town, $1,656,000.

Mr. Hellyer: Would the minister tell us where Oromocto is?

Mr. Pearkes: Oromocto is the dependants' town at Gagetown. It is where all the dependants of personnel and the married service personnel live. It is set up under a special agreement that was reached a few years ago. They have a town council. They are encouraged to organize their own services and grants are made by the government in order to maintain this small town for the purpose of looking after the dependants of our service people.

Mr. Hellyer: I thank the minister for that information. Earlier I asked what construction projects were yet to be completed at the townsite and he told us that the Department of National Defence had no project at the townsite and no relationship to them.

Mr. Herridge: Can the minister tell us the derivation of this rather unusual name?

Mr. Pearkes: I understand it is a local Indian name but that answer is given to many unusual names and I would not be entirely certain that it is correct.

Mr. Regier: This is the only item where I have noticed payments for the education of the dependants of service men listed. I realize this is listed in a number of places but it is not so named. I wish the minister could explain the great discrepancy between the statement made by the Auditor General and the information contained in a sessional paper. When appearing before the standing committee on public accounts the Auditor General indicated on page 58 of the minutes of Wednesday, April 8, that it cost about $11 million a year to pay for the education of the dependants of service personnel. In a report made by order of this house, sessional paper 222, the answer given is that the net operating cost for the calendar year 1958 was $6,279,473. There is a considerable difference there. The Auditor General said it cost about $11 million a year and the minister's office supplied a return showing the cost to be only $6 million.

Mr. Pearkes: That I am looking into with a view to seeing how the discrepancy arises. I am afraid I have not that information today. I am told that the main difference is between the operating cost and the over-all capital costs.

Mr. Regier: The Auditor General was asked about it at the same meeting and indicated there were practically no capital costs in that year and practically no new buildings erected.

Mr. Pearkes: We are going back into the records of that year and are trying to check up to see where the difference is and how it is accounted for.

Mr. Regier: I do not wish to hold up the estimates. I shall only express the hope that the minister will either advise me by means of a letter, or otherwise. If not, we may have to take this up again a year later.

Mr. Pearkes: I thank the hon. member for his courtesy. I shall be pleased to report to him as soon as I have the information.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I inquire what the business is for Monday? While we have had some indications of it already, I wonder whether the house leader would repeat it so that we will have it in the same Hansard. At the same time may I ask him to give all of the business for next week if he can.

Mr. Green: Last night I outlined the legislative program for Monday and Tuesday. For the rest of the week we will be considering estimates. Members should be prepared to take up any of the following departments: defence production, veterans affairs, external affairs, northern affairs, mines and technical surveys, trade and commerce, post office and fisheries.

I point out that we have now concluded consideration of the estimates of seven departments. Those of seven more have been considered in standing committees of the house which, as there are a total of 21, only leaves seven. Two of the 21 are very minor estimates, legislation and privy council, so I am very hopeful that the house can finish its work by two weeks from today.

Mr. Chevrier: I hope the minister's prediction comes true but none the less may I ask if any specific day has been assigned to the estimates of the Department of External Affairs?

Mr. Green: We are hoping to open the discussion of external affairs estimates on Thursday.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on June 25.

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

CAPE BRETON HIGHLANDERS—PRESENTATION OF REGIMENTAL COLOURS

Question No. 295—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Will Her Majesty, Queen Elizabeth, present regimental colours to the Canadian army unit formerly known as the Cape Breton highlanders, during her coming visit to Canada?

2. If so, where and when will this presentation be made?

Answer by: Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister):

1 and 2. When the itinerary for Her Majesty was drawn up it was realized that there would not be time in many places to carry out the functions and ceremonies requested by many civilian and service agencies and units. Some 10 or more regiments requested the honour of presentation of colours by Her Majesty.

During the royal visit to South Africa of His Majesty King George V a precedent had been set by the presentation of colours to several regiments at one parade. This year several regiments were asked to participate by sending colour parties to certain localities where time and the program for Her Majesty permitted the presentation ceremony to be conducted. One of these occasions was the presentation held on parliament hill on July 1.

In the case of the second battalion Nova Scotia highlanders (Cape Breton) the regiment was asked to send a colour party to one of the localities where presentation was to be made and the offer was declined because they wished to have the ceremony take place when all ranks and relatives could be present.

On the authority of His Excellency the Governor General the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, General B. C. Plow, presented colours to the regiment. A special message from Her Majesty was sent from Buckingham Palace to be read at the parade.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, July 6, 1959

The house met at 11 a.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

Twenty-first report of standing committee on miscellaneous private bills—Mr. McCleave.

Third report of standing committee on mines, forests and waters—Mr. Murphy.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE SENATE REPRESENTATION FOR YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-69, to amend the British North America Act, 1867-1952, with respect to representation in the Senate.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I should explain that my purpose in introducing the bill at this late point in the session is so that members of this house and of the other place will have an opportunity to study the implications which are raised in it. The purpose of the bill simply is to provide for representation in the Senate of Canada by one member for Yukon and one for the Northwest Territories.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

FINANCE

MEASURE TO PROVIDE ADDITIONAL GRANTS TO NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. Howard C. Green (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution, which has been recommended to the house by His Excellency:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to provide for the payment of additional grants to the province of Newfoundland.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—INQUIRY AS TO REPORTED MEETING OF FOREIGN MINISTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether any progress has been made toward the holding of a North Atlantic council meeting of foreign ministers before the reconvening of the foreign ministers' conference at Geneva later, I think, this week.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there will be such a meeting.

NORTHLAND NAVIGATION COMPANY

REPORTED PARTICIPATION IN STRIKE BY OUTSIDERS—SUPPLIES TO COMMUNITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the study now been completed or an examination made into people coming from outside Canada to join the strike in Vancouver? If so, has the minister any report to make?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, an investigation has been carried out by officials of my department in Vancouver, but we are unable to find any of the alleged imports from the United States operating in the Vancouver area. I might say that on receipt of protests from the president of N.A.M.E. and the secretary treasurer of the British Columbia labour council we were on the lookout at points of entry, but as far as we know these people are not in the country. Of course if we could have some proof that they are here we could probably take some steps.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a supplementary question. In a telephone call yesterday from Vancouver some names were given to me. If I could supply those names would the minister then be in a position to take some action? I could leave the house now and obtain the information.

Mrs. Fairclough: I have already given instructions to our office in Vancouver to consult with the persons I previously named, and if they can supply the names and locations of the alleged United States citizens who are participating in this strike we will take steps to see they are removed.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Labour a question in connection with this matter, involving a labour dispute at the Northland Navigation Company. Can the minister say whether he has made any inquiries to determine if supplies to any communities have been interrupted owing to this dispute? This is a matter, I understand, that involves certification by the federal Department of Labour, and I would be very grateful if the minister could answer my question.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as far as supplies are concerned I am afraid I cannot give any information to the hon. member; I have not made inquiries in this respect. However, I did dispatch a telegram during the latter part of last week asking both parties to meet with the labour department representative in Vancouver, and they are meeting this morning.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

REPORTED U.S. LEGISLATION RESPECTING STUDY OF DE-ICING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hazen Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport arising out a report that a bill introduced in the United States Senate by Senator Alexander Wiley provides for a major study of de-icing on the St. Lawrence seaway. My question is this. What is the attitude of the Canadian government toward this far-reaching study, and what is the attitude of the St. Lawrence seaway authority?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not been advised of any such study.

Mr. Argue: I wonder if the minister would check with the seaway authority and see if they have been approached in this matter. If so, would he made a report to the house?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

TRANSPORT

BELLE ISLE-NEWFOUNDLAND—INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF FERRY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. R. Tucker (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, will the minister please inform the house when he expects that the Belle Isle-Newfoundland ferry will begin operation?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker; in the fall of 1960.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MONTREAL—REPORTED OPENING OF U.S. PUBLIC HEALTH STATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, with my usual concern for the health and welfare and the sovereign rights of Canada, I wish to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question. In view of a news item in the Gazette of June 25 to the effect that the United States public health service has opened a quarantine station in Montreal to check communicable diseases, would the minister inform the house by what authority this station is established, and if Canadian citizens are required to submit to examination by a United States public health official?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question, and for his concern for the health of the people of Canada. May I simply say at this moment that the article has been brought to my attention, but I have not had time as yet to look into the matter really closely. I would therefore like to reply tomorrow.

FLOODS

MANITOBA—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN RED RIVER CONTROL PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, on July 2 an order for return was complied with asking for any communications received since February 1 by the Prime Minister or any member of the federal government from the premier or any member of the government of Manitoba, and any replies thereto, on the subject of federal assistance for flood control on the Red river. The last communication is dated March 20. There are communications from the minister of northern affairs and also from the Prime Minister in this return. I should like to ask the minister of northern affairs if there have been any developments in this matter since March 20.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): We have been in conversation with the government of Manitoba on one or two occasions and the premier is in town now, attending the fiscal conference. There will be meetings with the Prime Minister and myself, and possibly with others, in connection with this matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is there any agreement under negotiation at the present time?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): The matter has not reached the agreement stage. We are still discussing the various aspects of the program.

OLD AGE SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT BY DR. ROBERT CLARK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I wonder if I could ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare, now that this session is nearing an end, whether he is able to say what are the intentions of the government with regard to the Clark report on old age pensions, and if not would he indicate what is happening to that report.

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): A very close study is being given to the report at this time.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Can we conclude that the government does not intend to bring in any legislation this session based on that report?

Mr. Monteith (Perth): That is correct.

AIRPORTS

PRINCE RUPERT, B.C.—CONDITION OF RUNWAY UNDER CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): On Friday last, the hon. member for Skeena asked me a question regarding the new Prince Rupert airstrip. The runway at the new Prince Rupert airport is now suitable for use by light to medium aircraft up to at least DC-3 size; but since the construction work is not yet completed and the contractor still has equipment on the field, use of the runway is only possible on the basis of special advance arrangements to ensure that the contractor's equipment does not interfere with safe use of the runway.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. A. Hardie (Mackenzie River): I wish to address a question to the Secretary of State, or in his absence to the acting minister. When may I expect an answer to the question made an order for return approximately three months ago relating to travel abroad by members of the government?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Acting Secretary of State): It is my understanding that this information, which has to be compiled by several departments of government, will be available shortly, but I will make special inquiries.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): A supplementary question. On Saturday I asked the Secretary of State if he would tell us the progress which has been made in dealing with all the returns either today or tomorrow. Can the hon. lady assure us that this information will be given tomorrow?

Mrs. Fairclough: I can assure the hon. member that I will ask the Secretary of State about it.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Secretary of State said it would be done.

(Translation):

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State (Mr. Courtemanche), being absent, may I direct a question to the acting minister? Since the Secretary of State had promised to reply to my question today, would the Acting Secretary of State be in a position to do so?

(Text):

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry but I did not realize that the question was addressed to me.

Mr. Caron: In the absence of the Secretary of State, who promised that my questions would be answered today, would it be possible to table the answer today?

Mrs. Fairclough: I shall inquire, Mr. Speaker, as soon as orders of the day have been concluded.

SHIPPING

LAKE HURON—INQUIRY AS TO SINKING OF S.S. "MONROVIA"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister tell us whether his department had a representative at the coastguard hearing in Detroit last Thursday dealing with the collision between the Monrovia and the Royaltor?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I will make inquiries.

Mr. Fisher: A supplementary question. Could the minister bring us up to date on the situation in so far as pilotage is concerned, and the negotiations with the United States with regard to the Canada Shipping Act changes?

Mr. Hees: There has been no change since the hon. member asked me about this on the last occasion.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO PUBLIC SESSIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Can the acting Prime Minister tell me whether there is any reason why any member of parliament should not attend the meetings with the provincial governments now being held within the precincts of parliament?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I realize that the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate has a very deep curiosity concerning not only this matter but many others. I presume that if the meetings were open to the general public he would be able to attend.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister say whether the meetings are open to the general public, as all previous meetings have been at the commencement, or whether this is a closed session?

Mr. Green: I think the hon. member is just pulling my leg. He obviously has the answer and is just asking this question to be facetious.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a question of privilege, I have not, of course, the capacity for reading minds that the acting Prime Minister has, but in fact I am not in possession of this information and I am seeking information about something which is taking place within the precincts of parliament.

Mr. Green: I might point out that the duty of the hon. member, at least while this house is sitting, is with us in the commons chamber.

Mr. Pickersgill: Does that not also apply to the Minister of Finance?

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the acting Prime Minister. Notwithstanding his last observation, does the minister recall that the Minister of Finance, when asked this question the other day as to whether or not the initial proceedings of the conference would be open to the public, said he was not at that time in a position to give a definite reply? In view of the importance of this matter may I ask the acting Prime Minister if it is a fact that certain phases of the proceedings will be open to the public?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I do not have that information.

[Mr. Hees.]

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—STATEMENT ON CHANGES RESULTING FROM PROCLAMATION OF FEDERAL ACTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador asked me the following question:

In view of the proclamation in Newfoundland of the Meat and Canned Foods Act as related to fish and shellfish, and the Fish Inspection Act, as announced by the minister yesterday, may I ask what changes are likely to result in fish handling and processing in the province of Newfoundland?

I should like to say in reply that for the time being it is not proposed that there will be any amendments to existing regulations in Newfoundland which deal with the grades, classes and sizes of salted, pickled, dried, canned and fresh and frozen fish and shellfish. The present Newfoundland regulations are being consolidated into separate schedules to either the fish inspection regulations or the canned fish and shellfish and cannery inspection regulations.

STATEMENT ON REPORTED CRITICISMS OF PROGRAMS ON FRENCH NETWORK

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Leon Balcer (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, last Friday the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) asked me the following question:

Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Solicitor General a question. Can the minister inform this house whether he has received protests from hon. members on the government benches, against certain C.B.C. commentators, more particularly against some commentators of the French network who, according to those honourable representatives, do not always favour government policy?

Following a remark on your part, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Gloucester added:

(Text):

The hon. member continued in English:

On the point of order, the Toronto Star yesterday carried an article to the effect that the Solicitor General had received certain representations and that he had transmitted those representations to the C.B.C. management. This is why I addressed my question to the Solicitor General. I wanted to find out whether he had received the representations referred to.

The hon. gentleman then carried on:

Will the Solicitor General check and find out whether he has received them?

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, my answer is as follows: I have not received any representations from government members against certain programs or against certain C.B.C. commentators, as mentioned in the Toronto Star item referred to.

(Text):

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, could I ask the minister a supplementary question. Is the minister aware that any such representations were made?

Mr. Balcer: No, Mr. Speaker.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

COMBINES ACT AMENDMENT—SUGGESTED POSTPONEMENT OF CONSIDERATION UNTIL NEXT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Justice if he is in a position to inform the house of the procedure to be followed with respect to the amendment to the Combines Investigation Act?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I expect to be able to give a definite statement tomorrow.

HIGHWAYS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF PARTICIPATION IN ROADS TO RESOURCES PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, who told us the other day that one of the provincial governments had signed an agreement respecting the roads to resources program, which government that was?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): British Columbia, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister explain why it is not possible to conclude agreements with any of the other provinces, and in particular with the government of Newfoundland?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the government of Newfoundland and the government of Canada are working out this road program. There are no differences between us at all. We are going ahead with the program. When the program has reached the stage of final decision on the whole program I shall present it to my colleagues. We shall then decide whether we shall sign it. There is no trouble with any of those programs at all. We do have to negotiate back and forth on the legal terms. As long as the general agreement is signed there is no time being lost on the program.

Mr. Pickersgill: I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. Does the minister's reply mean that money is being committed, money that would have to be voted by this parliament, in advance of any agreements?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): There is money voted in the estimates for this purpose, but the payments will have to be made by the regular procedure followed by the government. I believe in one case there was an advance made to one government.

CRIMINAL CODE

The house resumed, from Wednesday, July 1, consideration in committee of Bill No. C-58, to amend the Criminal Code—Mr. Fulton—Mr. McCleave in the chair.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): When the house rose on Wednesday, July 1, we were considering clause 11.

On clause 11—Obscene.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. McCleave): Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, in view of the widespread interest in this provision I think it might be helpful if at this stage I give a short statement as to the object and effects of the clause.

The object of this clause is to make a statutory extension of the definition of obscenity so as to make it perfectly clear that the law of obscenity does apply to a certain type of objectionable material that now appears on the newsstands of Canada and is being sold to the young people of our country with impunity.

We believe we have produced a definition which will be capable of application with speed and certainty, by providing a series of simple objective tests in addition to the somewhat vague subjective test which was the only one formerly available. The tests will be: does the publication complained of deal with sex, or sex and one or more of the other subjects named? If so, is this a dominant characteristic? Again, if so, does it exploit these subjects in an undue manner?

We have been careful in working out this definition not to produce a net so wide that it sweeps in borderline cases or cases about which there may be genuine differences of opinion. In our efforts we have deliberately stopped short of any attempt to outlaw publications concerning which there may be any contention that they have genuine literary, artistic or scientific merit. These works remain to be dealt with under the Hicklin definition, which is not superseded by the new statutory definition.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I should put on the record again at this point the Hicklin definition as laid down by Chief Justice Cockburn in the case of Rex. v. Hicklin in 1868, as follows:

—I think the test of obscenity is this, whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall.

As I have said, it will be appreciated that this is entirely a subjective definition. It will be observed that while the test in the new proposed definition is in the main objective it does, however, contain two terms which require in part a subjective assessment. The first of these is that the characteristic complained of must be a dominant characteristic. As I say, we believe this will cover, without question, the kind of muck on the newsstands against which our main efforts in this definition are directed. But these words will clearly exclude from the definition books otherwise meritorious but containing the occasional passage which, if torn from the context, might be considered objectionable. In other words, in applying our proposed definition the courts must look at the whole work, not just at an isolated passage or passages.

The second requirement is that the manner of dealing with the named subjects must constitute an undue exploitation of them. Here again it will be clear that, for instance, medical textbooks or other books—including novels—in which such subjects are dealt with in an honest fashion are not put in jeopardy by this definition. There must be an undue exploitation. The word "undue" is one with which the courts are familiar as meaning generally something going beyond what men of good will and common sense would normally tolerate. I do not think we need to fear that this is a harsh or unduly restrictive test.

Then I should like to ask hon. members to consider this clause in the light of the new procedure which we are also providing if the bill is approved, for dealing with such obscene publications. The new procedure is what is described as a procedure in rem. It gives a quick and objective method of dealing with the question of whether or not a publication is obscene. I have said that our definition is, in its main nature, objective and so, I believe, will be the new procedure, particularly by reason of the fact that it will not be necessary to lay a charge.

The new procedure provides a quick and relatively simple method of getting the issue before the court, on its merits, of whether or not a particular publication is obscene. In order to do that you do not have to lay a charge against anybody and therefore it is, as I said, an objective method of having this question disposed of. The new procedure is closely akin to the procedure which has been in effect in the United Kingdom since 1857 and is a procedure, it might be of interest to the committee to know, that the United Kingdom is retaining substantially unaltered in its new obscene publications bill which was introduced into its parliament this year.

I would suggest to hon. members that it is significant that in the United Kingdom, with its well known determination to preserve civil liberties and the liberties of the subject and to avoid anything which might set up, in normal peacetime, government censorship unduly restricting the rights of free expression, they have had since 1857 and are continuing in the bill they have introduced this year this procedure which we are seeking to introduce for the first time. I do not believe we need to be fearful that here in Canada, by providing this objective test and this objective method of procedure, we are doing anything unduly restrictive of freedom of speech, properly understood.

Here, Mr. Chairman, in the definition we have before us and the new procedure which we are recommending to parliament we have made a serious attempt to meet a problem which is very real and urgent in Canada. I can assure hon. members that anyone who may have had occasion to inspect the sort of material taken from Canadian newsstands, where it is being sold with impunity, which has come into the possession of my department, largely as the result of unsolicited correspondence, would agree when I say that it is high time we devised a method of dealing with this type of publication.

I can assure the house further that it is apparent from the discussions I have had with the law enforcement officers of Canada that they feel the present law is not clearly adequate to deal with this type of trash. It is for that reason that we seek an extension of the definition of obscenity, and by the provision of a new method of procedure we hope to enable our law enforcement officers to deal quickly, fairly and objectively with this type of publication.

I should perhaps in conclusion express my appreciation to hon. members who have spoken on this matter before, and who have given me and my departmental officials the benefit of their views and advice. I do not wish to single out any one member particularly, but I think in fairness I should refer to the very constructive speech made last session by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, who placed upon the record some extremely helpful suggestions as to the approach we might follow in working out a new definition of obscenity and in working out methods of dealing with the problem. I found his remarks extremely constructive and most helpful.

Mr. Crestohl: I have just one question. Can the minister tell us whether the United Kingdom rule embraces this show cause system.

Mr. Fulton: Yes, Mr. Chairman, it does.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, I had practically decided not to take part in this debate and to entrust to lawyers the responsibility of amending the Criminal Code. But, after having read that part of the speech made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), as recorded on page 5319 of Hansard of June 30, I began to wonder whether I should not take part in this debate at the present time.

Here is what the Minister of Justice said at the time:

I have observed that most of the discussion thus far in this debate on second reading has been related to the provisions of the bill which deal with the definition of obscenity. I make no criticism of the fact, but I could not fail to note that the matter was treated with some levity, particularly by the hon. members of the Liberal party from the province of Quebec. I am not, of course, suggesting that the definition we have achieved is perfect. It is the best definition that we could achieve; it is an attempt to deal seriously with a serious subject. I think the house will be interested to note, and I think the country will be interested to note, and I think the province of Quebec particularly will be interested to note that members of the Liberal party from the province of Quebec treated this whole thing, with one exception, in an atmosphere of levity. As I say, I make no criticism of that. The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Eudes) dealt with the matter seriously. The other members of his party from the province of Quebec, where I am aware that this matter is regarded with a great deal of seriousness, dealt with it as a subject deserving nothing but laughter.

Later on, the Minister of Justice added:

What I say hits my honourable friends a little hard but they recognize that their attitude towards this bill to-night has not done them credit—

And later on, he added again:

My whole purpose in this debate has been to advance the bill along into committee so that we might hear what constructive suggestions my hon. friends have to offer, because certainly their attitude so far has been far from constructive.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that attitude on the part of the Minister of Justice is rather that of a person who would have had us believe that the government had intended to cure all the evil and who, realizing that, having done so little, he must resort to attacks against those who had taken the floor.

I agree with him that the hon. member for Hochelaga made a very serious and documented speech, a speech which deserves to attract general attention. I agree that the hon. member for St. Denis (Mr. Denis), who is a jovial person by nature, has made, in reference to firearms, some rather amusing remarks, but when he referred to obscenity, he did so with the same seriousness shown by the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice has no reason to claim that the Liberals of the province of Quebec lack any seriousness when a question of morals or manners is involved; and it is in that connection, our duty to point out to him the defects of his own bill.

Besides, we are not the only people who find his bill, although slightly an improvement, falling short of a full victory against obscenity.

On June 17, the Protestant clergy, meeting in London, as reported in the following article, stated:

(Text):

Proposed federal legislation defining obscenity in relation to literature was attacked today by three clergymen here for the eleventh annual summer school of religion as indefinite and unnecessary.

In an interview at the University of Western Ontario, Dr. James T. Cleland of Duke University, N.C., Rev. W. B. J. Martin of the Scottish Congregational College, Edinburgh, and Rev. D. R. Fraser of Byron, Unitarian Minister in London, agreed a wrong tack was being taken.

(Translation):

And here are the very words used by Dr. Cleland further down in that article:

(Text):

"Besides," Dr. Cleland said, "the legislation proposed leaves the matter wide open by its wording. The lawyers will have a field day with it."

(Translation):

And still farther down, he went on to say:

(Text):

The clergymen pointed to the words "dominant" and "undue exploitation" as providing ready made loopholes.

(Translation):

As the minister can see, we are not the only ones to criticize his attitude and, besides, we have good reasons for criticizing, because the minister himself had promised a great deal more than he is giving us now.

There is no doubt that all the members of this house deplore the fact that so many obscene publications are being offered for sale; all of them would like these obscene publications to disappear. But, when the minister addressed the Sacred Heart League, in Montreal, he proposed four changes. First, as is reported in the Gazette of June 14, 1958, here is what the minister said:

(Text):

The first is a "practical" definition of the word obscene for article 150 of the Criminal Code.

(Translation):

That is just where we take issue with the minister. That definition he gave, which includes the words "dominant characteristics" constitutes the dominant part of his bill. Those words are not sufficient to ensure the elimination of those things. We believe that all they do is to enable defence counsels to find easier ways to secure acquittals of the person charged.

Besides, I have talked with some religious authorities and I even had correspondence about that matter. I recalled having answered a letter about this from Mgr. J. N. Gelineau, vicar general of the Ottawa diocese, on June 24, 1959. Here is what I wrote to him:

Monsignor,

I have received your letter dated June 22, as well as the article which appeared in last night's Le Droit.

As I was telling you, the major difficulty in finding a complete definition for the word obscenity is that Protestant elements who believe in free will, are convinced, probably with sincerity, that it would interfere with freedom of conscience. It is for that reason that the definition that is given in the amendment to Sections 150, 8 and 150A, far from improving the situation, makes it worse, since it says:

"(8) For the purposes of this Act, any publication the dominant characteristic of which is the undue exploitation of sex—"

Dominant characteristic may include many things that the judges might consider insufficient to be reproved.

Let me cite an instance that will probably never occur. If, in advertising the comfort of an hotel, a pamphlet showed a man and a woman, in indecent attire, sharing the same bed, the judge might say that this was not the main characteristic of the pamphlet. Yet, the said hotel would appeal to people's evil instincts.

As a matter of fact, section 150A confers the whole responsibility upon the judge who will decide whether the publication or illustrated story is to be classified as obscene or not. Everything is therefore left to the discretion of the judge who may, sincerely or not, have opinions very different from those of Catholic religious authorities.

All I see in this act is a chance for lawyers to win their defence cases more easily.

I am sorry to say that I do not entirely agree with Father Gay who seems to think that the bill is a considerable progress in the fight against obscene magazines.

I do not want to blame Hon. E. Davie Fulton, Minister of Justice, too severely because I know he was working under extremely difficult conditions. What I am condemning, however, is leading the population to believe that a remedy is being provided, whereas nothing of the kind is being done.

Mr. Chairman, that is how we have dealt with the problem from the start. And the Minister of Justice said that we were considering it lightly. We are not dealing lightly with this matter. On the contrary, we are aware of its difficulties.

I remember a banquet where the Minister of Justice was the guest speaker and dealt with the matter of obscenity and of the amendments he proposed to introduce. I also remember having told him that evening that he would run into extraordinary difficulties because attempts have been made for the past two thousand years to establish a concrete definition of obscenity, and it has not been done yet, because there often is only a very small margin between art and obscenity. I have personally had occasion to see things which would appear obscene to some people, but not so to others, depending on the state of mind of the person who sees or examines or studies those things.

As a matter of fact, some works may be considered obscene by some people and not so by others. When art is mixed with the question of obscenity, the problem becomes more difficult. It is recognized that the dividing line between art and obscenity is sometimes difficult to appreciate. My reproach to the minister is that he has provided an incomplete definition. The minister wanted people all over the country to believe that he was going to make such radical changes that the Criminal Code would scarcely be recognizable with regard to obscenity and obscene publications in this country.

When addressing the Sacred Heart leagues, in the second part of his speech, he dealt with the following:

(Text):

The second: The possibility of summonsing dealers, as in Britain, to declare why a court directive ordering the destruction of obscene literature should not be carried out.

(Translation):

The minister did that.

He also said:

(Text):

Third, the department is studying ways of preventing publishers from forcing dealers to take all or none of their publications, "a practice common in these days."

(Translation):

Again I commend the minister for including this in section 12, paragraph 150A of the bill now before us. However, it is with respect to the fourth part that the minister has been particularly remiss in fulfilling his promises.

(Text):

Finally, Fulton said, "we are considering the possibility of including the printers of obscene publications in prosecutions, much more than is done today."

Cardinal Leger, in a 5000-word speech, said—

The printing is bad, but it is not of importance.

(Translation):

The important part is this: the Minister of Justice had promised to find a way to cause the arrest of the printer of such literature, and to take him to court, so as to prevent publication of such obscene works. It was not the first time that the Minister of Justice came out in favour of taking court action against printers or publishers. In fact, in 1955, as recorded on page 5275 of Hansard, the Minister of Justice, who was then sitting on this side of the house, made the following statement:

> —a prosecution should also be required against the printer and publisher if the printer and publisher are in Canada, or against the initial distributor if it be one of those publications which is brought into Canada having been printed in the United States and then distributed in Canada in its finished form.

A little farther down, the minister added:

> —and the person most responsible for the offence —that is, the man who first put it into circulation— would be bound to be proceeded against.

Still a little further down, the minister went on to say, and I quote from page 5276 of Hansard:

> Another line of attack on the problem, which has been suggested before and rejected but which I would ask the minister to consider again, is that it might be provided that the penalties against printers and publishers, or against those who first put this offensive material into circulation, should be made specific.

Still farther down, the minister had this to say:

> They wrote a specific clause into their legislation prohibiting the importation of the plates from which these things are printed. I recommend to the minister that he and the department should give very earnest consideration to whether it would not be desirable to incorporate a similar provision in our Criminal Code.

And the minister went on to say:

> I know you cannot increase an unlimited fine, but I was suggesting a minimum fine or a minimum penalty for printers and publishers.

It is in that respect that we are blaming the minister. He had promised us the moon; now it is just a case of the elephant bringing forth a mouse. There have been claims that this constitutes a great improvement. Well, Mr. Chairman, I think if it is an improvement, it is no more than $\frac{1}{8}$, or at most $\frac{1}{4}$ of what it should be. We do recognize that section 12, paragraph 150A contains something new. The provisions of this section make it easier to resort to court action and seizure in the case of obscene literature. Apart from that, I think the minister has tried to build up his political capital by running around the country, and particularly the province of Quebec, to give the impression that, after he had tried to define the word obscenity and had amended the Criminal Code accordingly, everything would be fine.

So, by casting aspersions on Liberal members from Quebec he has attempted, up to a point, to have Canada, and more particularly the province of Quebec, believe that Liberal members are less interested than he in improving the country's morals.

Mr. Chairman, I say to the minister that he should not indulge in petty politics and make speeches such as the one he made on June 30 last. On the contrary, he should show some statesmanship and really try to improve conditions.

We recognize that it is no easy task to define obscenity in a truly concrete and perfect way, because we know the situation is extremely difficult; it has been going on for years, and the minister is not the only one responsible in the matter. However, there should be no petty politics about such an important matter. I therefore ask the minister at this time not to be silly and use words such as those he used on June 30 last when addressing Liberal members who are just as interested as he is in raising Canada's moral standards. We hope the minister will stop making political hay with this question, and will tackle the problem in statesmanlike fashion.

Mr. Pigeon: Mr. Chairman, like all right-minded Canadians, I am happy to commend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) for the bill he is submitting today as a means of fighting obscenity, one of the worst forms of degradation that individuals and nations can fall into.

I know that the minister has always been interested in this subject and has closely studied this infinitely delicate and serious problem of obscene literature. He took up this cause many years ago, and today, as Minister of Justice, he wants to give this country legislation that will clean up the newsstands, thus helping society by preventing the sale of evil literature on a national scale.

It is one of those bills which almost automatically call for unanimity. All of us want to bring about the necessary changes.

According to section 150 of the Canadian criminal code, obscenity is a crime leading to severe punishment. But, experts in the field —law enforcement officers, lawyers, judges, social workers—are all agreed that the language of the law is not sufficiently explicit. Then there is always the difficulty attending the onus of the proof, which takes time and money. In fact, obscene publications or shows are only one of the many facets of public immorality which is so brazenly flaunted nowadays.

It is not a new problem, even though it seems to be a characteristic vice of so-called advanced civilizations. We are therefore not facing a new difficulty, a by-product of the last war or of scientific progress. But this very progress, the wonders of printing, radio and television, are helping scatter the accursed seed and spread havoc. So, as the allied chiefs used to say during the last war, desperate ills call for desperate remedies. And that remedy is the remoralization of individuals and peoples. Quid leges sine moribus? Yes: what good would laws be without morals? But, men being what they are, we must use drastic measures and cause the iron hand of the law to weigh against all offenders. That is what the government, through the Minister of Justice, is doing today.

According to those who specialize in such delicate problems, we need a clearer definition of obscenity. I think that, under the circumstances, the Minister of Justice is introducing a bill which, though it may not be perfect—there is nothing perfect in this world—represents a great improvement over what we had in the past. I know that the Minister of Justice has drawn upon the many briefs submitted to him, by Catholics, Protestants and Jewish groups as well as all other religious denominations in this country, and I also know that he did not ignore suggestions made to him by Rev. Father Gay who has made a searching study of the matter and suggested a new wording for section 150 of the Criminal Code. Anybody wishing to obtain fuller information with regard to the new wording of that section, need only refer to the newspaper Le Droit of February 23, 1959, which says:

> Diocesan press service planned.
> A definition of obscenity.
> Definition of obscenity submitted by Reverend Father Gay.

However, what really counts is the training of individual conscience and of people's minds. I shall take the liberty of reporting a fact that is perhaps little known but significant. Some time ago, when the Montreal police decided to clean up shows in night clubs, the chief of police called in night club owners and representatives of their employees and told them in substance: "In future, dancing girls will have to conform to the following rules: they must always wear such and such garments; and they must actually dance, and refrain from speaking to patrons. If they can't do that, let them get off the stage and go wash the dishes."

And do you know, Mr. Chairman, that many of those club owners, employees and even dancers commended the chief of police for doing his utmost to raise the standards of entertainment? Even people directly concerned feel there is nothing to be gained in immorality, and detective lieutenant Lucien Quintal, who is in charge of the squad responsible for keeping watch on the decency of shows and publications, has very much less trouble now. Why? Because the police have decided, not to discuss the quality of shows, but to close those which are not up to standards set and adopted both by the police and the show promoters.

Mr. Chairman, we should do the same thing about obscenity. Untold harm is being done to our young people by books and publications, magazines, films, photographs, etc.

Obscenity, violence, unbridled passions, glorification of crime and criminals, those are the many problems leading some of our people to prison. We talk about the rehabilitation of criminals, but it would be much better if we prevented them from becoming criminals. All the pompous terms used by self-styled artists and art critics, the obscure and ambiguous vocabulary of so-called psychiatrists often have but a single carefully disguised purpose: allow immorality to display itself under its more pernicious and degrading forms. That is what we have to fight against.

The problem of immorality and obscene publications is not new, Mr. Chairman, and it is not peculiar to this country either. The Canadian authorities have realized its gravity for a long time, together with other national leaders. As evidence of that, may I refer to the protocols signed in Paris on May 4, 1910, on the repression of the distribution of obscene publications, an agreement which was amended at Lake Success on May 4, 1949, and which has been in force in our country since then.

You will also recall the convention for the repression of the distribution and traffic of obscene publications, signed in Geneva on September 12, 1923, which was amended by a protocol at Lake Success on November 12, 1947, and signed by Canada on November 24 of the same year, at which date it went into force in our country.

If we find it worthwhile to sign international agreements directed against demoralization and obscenity, we should at least be consistent and apply, within our own borders, the provisions to which we are pledged by those protocols and agreements.

We are committing the serious mistake of believing that the fight against obscenity or immorality is the doing of a mere handful of bilious and scrupulous minds. On the contrary, the Minister of Justice has received testimonies of encouragement from all quarters in Canada, from workers, professionals, students and even from the clergy. Whether we are Catholics, Protestants or Jews, we are not alone. Cardinals and other bishops are not alone, the protestant hierarchy, the rabbis, the most prominent members of the clergy want to see the end of this plague gnawing at the heart of our society.

But it is the responsibility of hon. members of the house to provide the police and the courts with the weapons that they will use efficiently in their fight against that filthy monster which is popular immorality. Most of us here have dependents and we do not want our sons and daughters to be sullied by that infamous literature and those disgusting shows. It is our responsibility to act, and that responsibility is sacred before God and before man.

Mr. Chairman, before closing my remarks, I should like to commend the Knights of Columbus of the province of Quebec who have espoused the fight against obscene literature. Particularly in the diocese of Joliette, at the request of His Excellent Mgr. Papineau, a committee has been formed to fight against obscene literature. That committee, whose action extends over the whole diocese, includes diocesan associations like the Knights of Columbus, the Knights of Champlain and the service clubs of Joliette. They have joined together in waging war against evil literature and in protecting our young people. I want to point out the important work that is being done in that field by the Knights of Columbus of Joliette, Council No. 1468, as well as by Knights of Columbus councils at Ste. Helene de Valois, Montcalm, St. Lin des Laurentides, and L'Assomption. All have done and are still doing much in the fight against obscene literature.

Mr. Chairman, may I once again congratulate the Minister of Justice for rising to his responsibilities, for amending the code in order to rid the nation of evil literature. Of course, there will be criticism of what he is doing, but nothing is perfect in this world, not even this bill. This legislation is not perfect but, even if it were, there would always be someone to try and find loopholes in it. Mr. Chairman, this legislation will be of great help to the Protestant, Jewish and Catholic associations, and to all right-minded people of this country by enabling them to fight even more efficiently against evil literature. It gives solid encouragement to law enforcement officers, to judges and to right-minded people across the country to persevere in their attempts to purge Canadian morals.

I commend the Minister of Justice for rising to his responsibility, and for tackling this problem—in fact, he has been at it for many years—and now that he holds the office of Minister of Justice, he is trying to carry out his great desire, that of helping the whole community, in short, to protect the young people of Canada.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: The minister is responsible both for this and for another bit of legislation due to come before the house, each of which introduces, at least in my opinion, something completely new, or a new concept in the question of prosecution and the position of a defendant.

I think I can make the point by reading something the minister elaborated in his speech to the Quebec union of municipalities on May 17, 1958. I might point out that what I read also makes nonsense of the suggestion that the minister is not prepared to have any consultations now or to hear any other groups in respect to changes in this code. The minister said:

> We have, as I have said before, received some extremely interesting and often very practical suggestions to help us with our problem. A most interesting letter was received from one resident of Ottawa, who gave us his definition of the word obscene:
> "Any literature, any spectacle or other matter which you would not like to see related to your mother, or your wife, or young sister, or your daughter."
>
> The correspondent went on to remark that this was plain language that every man could understand. As you can easily see, however, a definition of this type leaves so much open to opinion that it would not seem, at present, to be the practical solution to the law.
> Another very excellent suggestion is that the code should prohibit the publication and distribution of material—

And note these words—which the minister said over a year ago; because, as a matter of fact, these are familiar words:

> —the dominant characteristic of which is the undue exploitation of sex, crime, immorality, horror, cruelty or violence, or any one or more of such subjects. This type of definition would appear to be very close to the solution to deal with the type of publication I have referred to a minute ago.

Let me interject here that the minister was very close to the solution last May. Why did he have to wait so long to bring it in and deny one group that wanted to make representations the opportunity of doing so?

Mr. Fulton: I am not aware that I have denied any group the opportunity of making representations. I have heard from a large number of groups. I am quite certain I have indicated to anyone who has written to me that I would be glad to hear from them.

Mr. Fisher: I am referring to representations before a committee. I regret that this legislation could not have gone before a committee.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, that is quite different.

Mr. Fisher: The minister went on to say:

> Then, too, as of recent date, the unique suggestion has come in England recently. There, a policeman or law enforcement officer may seize publications from a newsstand; if he considers them harmful, he can take them to the court. The court then summons the vendor—

This is the key point. I continue:

> —and unless he can establish the innocence of the reading material, it is destroyed. If the material is not considered by the court to be obscene the material is then restored to the vendor. This is, perhaps, the most far-reaching method that I have heard of to date, and does place the traditional onus on the defendant rather than on the crown to prove whether or not a publication is obscene.

Does the minister admit that he has gone along with this and is changing the traditional onus which has rested on the crown and placing it on the defendant? I would certainly judge that to be the case from reading clause 12, which states:

> 12. The said act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 150 thereof, the following sections:
> "150a. (1) A judge who is satisfied by information upon oath that there are reasonable grounds for believing that any publication, copies of which are kept for sale or distribution in premises within the jurisdiction of the court, is obscene or a crime comic, shall issue a warrant under his hand authorizing seizure of the copies.

Apparently this places the traditional onus on the defendant rather than on the crown to prove whether or not a publication is obscene. I suggest that if the minister had a reservation a year ago he should still have it now.

The Deputy Chairman: May I remind the hon. member that we are on clause 11, not clause 12.

Mr. Fisher: May I draw to your attention the fact that the minister in his statement referred to the procedure, which comes under clause 12.

Mr. Fulton: May I suggest that we consider clauses 11 and 12 together. They are closely related.

[Mr. Fisher.]

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the will of the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fisher: This would be dangerous even if we had only one example, but in other legislation the minister has indicated he is bringing in referring to the Combines Investigation Act the same idea is incorporated, and the defendants are going to have to show that there is something good or worth while about their particular monopoly; then they will get off. I am suggesting that these are two changes of which we should be wary because they introduce, as the minister says, a shift in the traditional onus from the crown to the defendant.

To support my contention that the minister's explanation is most unsatisfactory I will read an excerpt from the Ottawa Citizen of March 6, 1959, which reads:

> More judicial guidance on what constitutes obscene literature would be helpful to the customs and excise department, deputy minister David Sim said Thursday.
> Mr. Sim told the commons estimates committee that he would like to see more appeals to the courts on decisions of the department to ban certain foreign books.
>
> "This way, we would get some direction on this thing," Mr. Sim smiled.
>
> He said that officers of his department and revenue minister Nowlan did not relish their job of acting as censors.
> "No one in his right mind would ask for a job like that," he commented.

In my remarks the other evening I pointed out that the main problem in so far as obscene literature or books are concerned lies with publishing that is done outside of Canada. Very little publishing is done in Canada, and such a minimal fraction of that is likely to be obscene that it is obvious that the main problem in so far as rational adults who read are concerned stems from books published outside of Canada, especially in France and perhaps in England and the United States. Perhaps, however, the minister does not agree with me. What does the legislation do in this regard? I gather not a thing except this one point, and I would imagine this could be a dangerous point and I want an explanation from the minister on it.

Under this bill, as I understand it, if a judge does decide something is obscene then notice goes to the attorney general of the province, who I gather can declare that this particular material is obscene as far as that province is concerned. Does this mean that our customs and excise authorities are going to take the decision of the attorney general of one province and apply it all across Canada? I can certainly foresee difficulties arising from this situation, because there are marked disagreements from province to province about what may constitute an obscene publication.

If as a result of this new procedure the decision of a judge promulgated by an attorney general is to be taken by the customs branch as official advice that will determine whether a book is admitted or barred from a country, we are going to be up against the problem of having the action of one magistrate and one attorney general determining the policy in so far as the importing of certain books is concerned.

The minister indicated that despite the new definition the Hicklin definition of obscenity as something tending to deprave and corrupt would still be enforced. I should like him to give us an indication how he thinks that definition will work. He used a British example, but I wish to point out to him that there has been considerable controversy over the Hicklin definition and over the way United Kingdom censorship is exerted. The objections concentrate largely upon the stage plays and the role of the chamberlain; however, there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction concerning the censorship of books in that country. I can give the minister several examples such as "Lolita", which we can buy in this country because it is allowed in but which is not allowed into England at the present time. Another example is D. H. Lawrence's "Rainbow" away back in 1915, which was barred at one time but later allowed to come in.

The British in their application of the Hicklin ruling regarding depravity and corruption have scared the wits out of many publishers. And England is not looked upon by publishers as being as open and fair a place to publish as is even the United States. The whole question of how you define obscenity, I think we all agree, is most difficult. The meaning of the word "obscenity" as legally defined by the courts in the United States is as follows:

> —tending to stir the sex impulses or to lead to sexually impure and lustful thoughts.

This definition is taken from the judgment of John M. Woolsey, United States district judge, in the case of the United States of America v. one book called "Ulysses". The judge went on to say:

> Whether a particular book would tend to excite such impulses and thoughts must be tested by the court's opinion as to its effect on a person with average sex instincts—what the French would call l'homme moyen sensuel—who plays, in this branch of legal inquiry, the same role of hypothetical reagent as does the "reasonable man" in the law of torts and "the man learned in the art" on questions of invention in patent law.
>
> The risk involved in the use of such a reagent arises from the inherent tendency of the trier of facts, however fair he may intend to be, to make his reagent too much subservient to his own idiosyncrasies. Here, I have attempted to avoid this, if possible, and to make my reagent herein more objective than he might otherwise be, by adopting the following course:
>
> After I had made my decision in regard to the aspect of "Ulysses", now under consideration, I checked my impressions with two friends of mine who in my opinion answered to the above stated requirement for my reagent.
>
> These literary assessors—as I might properly describe them—were called on separately, and neither knew that I was consulting the other. They are men whose opinion on literature and on life I value most highly. They had both read "Ulysses", and, of course, were wholly unconnected with this cause.
>
> Without letting either of my assessors know what my decision was, I gave to each of them the legal definition of obscene and asked each whether in his opinion "Ulysses" was obscene within that definition.
> I was interested to find that they both agreed with my opinion: that reading "Ulysses" in its entirety, as a book must be read on such a test as this, did not tend to excite sexual impulses or lustful thoughts but that its net effect on them was only that of a somewhat tragic and very powerful commentary on the inner lives of men and women.

I bring up that point of literary assessment because of its relevance to the amendment we plan to move to the particular amendment brought in by the minister.

The hon. member for Hull pointed out that some religious groups have protested against the definition contained in this amendment. These religious groups have tended to be, as I understand it from the two items in the newspaper which I noticed, protestant religious groups. This underlines another very touchy and difficult point, that different religious groups have different sensitivity toward censorship and the whole idea of censorship and of obscenity. This is all the more reason why we should be very careful in the kind of measures we introduce.

It is very difficult for me to see how one can bring in an amendment to point out the traditional onus being shifted from the crown to the defendant. I do think that because this is such a switch we deserve a much more careful and reasoned explanation on the part of the minister as to whether it is a desirable thing that is being introduced, and whether it may not put far too much power in the hands of the crown. I know the minister underlined several times that this is designed to get after the comic books and the things that are on the newsstands, but how can he be sure it will not extend farther than that, and that an occasion will not rise when through one magistrate and one attorney general we might find ourselves in a position where much more than just the degrading comic books are in danger of being swept away from people who might care to read them.

The standards of magistrates will vary from person to person and place to place. I always remember one of the conclusions that Kinsey came to in his study of the sexual habits of the American male, which was I think a very relevant one, that magistrates and lawyers tend to come from a more sophisticated level of society, and certainly a more educated level, than the ordinary working man. They have different mores in regard to certain sexual aberrations. For example, the magistrates and the lawyers and the crown counsel tended to take a much more serious view of rape than the working man or the working class people tended to take. On the other hand, the working class people tended to take a much more serious view of homosexuality than the magistrates and the middle class did.

Kinsey pointed out that this is one of the great difficulties in trying any criminal matters in this particular field. First, what are the standards of the particular group or society or community within which a person making a judgment comes? I would not suggest that this analysis of Kinsey's can be applied across the board, but I still think it can underline the point that there is a great variation in what people consider to be obscene.

I can give the minister an example from this house. The other night an hon. member came up to me and asked whether I had read "Lolita". I happened to have read the book three times because it seemed to me it was a serious focal point of the kind of problem the censor is up against. Quite frankly I was shocked by it the first time. Friends of mine who are literary persons said "Read it again". I read it again and I began to see that here was a book which had perhaps exceptional literary merit, and after reading it a third time I became convinced that it was probably the best novel of its kind—I mean by that, a social criticism, expressing a social criticism, a social analysis of the United States—that I have encountered in five or six years. The member of this house to whom I was talking about this is a man whose opinion I respect very much. He told me—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I must advise the hon. member his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Deputy Chairman: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fisher: As I say, I respect the hon. member's opinion very much. He said that after 15 or 20 pages he put the book down. He said it was a horrible, terrible thing, which should never be allowed in. There is an example right within this house. I would like to think that I am a man of common sense. The hon. member to whom I spoke is a man with a fair amount of common sense, but you can get that much variety. That is why it seems to me that giving to magistrates and judges this much power is very dangerous.

I should like to know from the minister whether he has had any representations from the publishers in regard to this definition. Have they had the opportunity and the time to consider it? I should like to ask him what he thinks of the representations that I hope he received from the Canadian library association.

Since I have already overstayed my time, Mr. Chairman, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timmins:

That clause 11, subsection 8, be amended by striking out "a" in line 11 and substituting therefor the word "the"; and that the clause "and which is without literary or scientific merit", be inserted after the word "violence" in line 14.

Subsection 8 will then read:

For the purpose of this act, any publication the dominant characteristic of which is the undue exploitation of sex, or of sex and any one or more of the following subjects, namely, crime, horror, cruelty and violence and which is without literary or scientific merit, shall be deemed to be obscene.

I should like to give the reason for changing the article "a" to "the". First, it seems to me confusing. I would like to understand why a thing has a dominant characteristic. If you say that in a household the wife is the dominant person, that is the dominant characteristic perhaps in that household. "Dominant characteristic" is what confuses me. The only thing I can see it means is that in a book you could have a whole host of dominant characteristics, and you could pinpoint this one. If you take a book like "The Naked and the Dead" by Norman Mailer, which I thought was one of the great commentaries upon the war, to me the dominant characteristic in that book was the fight between the liberals with a small "l" and the fascists represented by the lieutenant and the general.

I could certainly say that was the main theme running through the book. Another reader might look at it and say the dominant characteristic was that of sex, because there were some scenes in it dealing with sex and therefore that would come under consideration. I think the putting in of the word "the" instead of "a" would help clear up this particular point.

The reason for adding the clause "and which is without literary or scientific merit" stems from the remark the minister made concerning the word "undue". He felt that the word "undue" would give protection to works of literary, scientific or artistic merit. I feel that if he wants to protect books of that kind he should not depend upon the interpretation by some lawyer or some judge of the word "undue". Let us put it right in there.

One of the things this would do, since the onus is now being put upon the defendant under this legislation, is that it would give him something to bite into. He could say, "Look, I can show this has literary merit because professor so-and-so of Carleton college has said so". He could show the work had scientific merit by comparing it with a certain scientific encyclopaedia which would show that the facts were there. We feel this would give more protection to the defendant upon whom the onus is being put at this time.

Mr. Crestohl: The minister made a rather lengthy statement this morning, Mr. Chairman, in connection with obscenity. I wondered why the minister was so late in giving that lengthy explanation.

Mr. Fulton: Because this is the first time we have reached the clause in committee, which is the proper place to make it. It is not late at all; it is the first possible proper opportunity.

Mr. Crestohl: I suppose the same thing occurred with respect to clauses 2 and 3, and perhaps rightly so. When we were debating the principle of the bill some of the speakers presented some of these problems to the minister and asked him in his reply to deal with these matters in order to enlighten the house on these various subjects. We discussed clauses 2 and 3 for some time, and it was after the adjournment of the house that the minister came back with a lengthy statement.

It is quite right that the minister should have heard some of the comments of the members and then come back with a long explanation as to why this innovation should be considered now. We had a lengthy discussion of this question of obscenity during the early part of the discussion on the principle of the bill, but only now does the minister come forward with a statement. The minister did take the trouble to make a statement in the general debate, but instead of dealing with these questions the minister, as the hon. member for Hull quite properly said, apparently had nothing prepared with which to answer and therefore launched into a political attack. This is what stirs me into stating what I am about to say.

The minister, instead of dealing with the question of obscenity or the definition of the words "undue" and "dominant", proceeded to attack Liberal members from the province of Quebec, and accused them of attempting to make a farce out of the matter. Actually the minister was then talking on his bill, and the dominant part of his address—I underline the word "dominant"—was purely political. If one were to go by the definition that we are being given, then one would say it was obscene.

I say that in all frankness to the minister, because I have always held that if there is one member of the cabinet who should be very anxious to avoid stooping to politics on every possible opportunity, that cabinet member is the Minister of Justice. He should really sit in an ivory tower and remember that he is there as the Minister of Justice for all parties in Canada and not merely for one party.

Mr. Pigeon: You will vote against the bill?

Mr. Crestohl: This has nothing to do with voting against the bill. I would vote against the minister for becoming political on a very important issue. There are cabinet ministers who, at times, can be political on various matters, but I have always hoped that the Minister of Justice would not, at each opportunity, stoop to pure and unadulterated politics. He should stay on the level of justice.

I say that when this matter is discussed—I do not make this as an accusation—the minister should not behave in that way but should give us an explanation such as he gave this morning with respect to obscenity instead of giving us something which, I repeat with the greatest respect, was unbecoming to any minister of justice in any government at any time. I point out that if the minister, in passing, had simply mentioned that he could not understand why the Liberals from the province of Quebec were treating the matter lightly, that would have been one thing. I have not the text in front of me, but the minister said four or five times, and he emphasized this, that the Liberals from the province of Quebec were making very light of this thing. I shall repeat that the fact that this was the dominant theme of part of his address made that part of his address obscene according to his own definition.

I would prefer, when we come to clauses 11 and 12, to deal with those in the way in which I think they should be dealt with. There is much to be said for them. I do not want to confuse both of my statements. I again appeal to the minister that in dealing with matters of justice, above all when he is dealing with amendments to the Criminal Code, he should keep the discussion on the high level of justice. Why could he not do that?

Mr. Fulton: Because you got it down from there in the first place.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks to make on this question because a number of my constituents have been most interested in this legislation. First of all, let me say we all know this matter has been of serious concern to a large number of people throughout Canada in recent years. I want to say right now that we agree with the intentions and objectives of the minister, but I rise to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for Port Arthur because we believe this amendment will further protect the rights of a free press and the right of free speech as we understand it.

As I said before, this is a most difficult problem. I know that so far as our group is concerned, since this legislation was introduced we have given considerable thought to this clause. We have had a number of meetings, and we have discussed the clause from every angle. I can assure the minister it is the intention of this group to offer this amendment in a constructive way in order to best meet his objectives and his intentions.

Now, Mr. Chairman, to indicate that there is serious consideration being given to this legislation since it was introduced into the house, I should like to read a news item from the Gazette of June 17, 1959, which I think puts briefly and in better form than I could the arguments against the clause as it is now worded. The article is entitled, "Clergy Hit Obscene Law Plan". It reads as follows:

Proposed federal legislation defining obscenity in relation to literature was attacked today by three clergymen here for the eleventh annual summer school of religion as indefinite and unnecessary.

In an interview at the University of Western Ontario, Dr. James T. Cleland of Duke University, N.C., Rev. W. B. J. Martin of the Scottish Congregational College, Edinburgh, and Rev. D. R. Fraser of Byron, Unitarian minister in London, agreed a wrong tack was being taken.

"You cannot legislate people into the kinds of individuals they should be," said Mr. Fraser, whose letter to the editor of a London newspaper prompted the discussion.

The letter stated in seeking more information about the proposed legislation: "We are already shackled by the legal chains of an outmoded Victorian morality in such matters as divorce and birth control. Citizens should be on guard to see that the prudery of a few does not place undue hardship or false propriety upon the many."

The reduction of obscenity in Canadian publications might be better achieved by a program of education rather than one of legislation, the ministers maintained.

We heartily agree with that contention. In the long run it is a program of education and of the raising of standards and concepts in this field that will bring the real improvement that we are all seeking.

[Mr. Crestohl.]

Wording Has Loopholes

Besides, Dr. Cleland, said, the legislation proposed leaves the matter wide open by its wording. The lawyers will have a field day with it.

We were under that impression, Mr. Chairman, when we were discussing this matter in our caucus. In our opinion it is wide open and leaves opportunities for wide differences of opinion between lawyers, magistrates and judges across Canada.

The legislation defining obscenity planned by justice minister Fulton for inclusion in the Canadian Criminal Code reads: "Any publication a dominant characteristic of which is the undue exploitation of sex, or of sex and any one or more of the following subjects, namely, crime, horror, cruelty and violence, shall be deemed to be obscene."

The clergymen pointed to the words "dominant" and "undue exploitation" as providing ready made loopholes.

We agree with that contention.

Dr. Cleland and Mr. Martin are guest lecturers at the UWO summer school which is now in its second day at university college.

More than one hundred clergymen are attending the five-day school.

Then to follow up that matter I want to read an editorial from the Globe and Mail of June 15 of this year. It is a very well known paper which generally supports the Conservative line of politics. It is a very fine paper, one which has a very good format and which in my opinion generally has a very excellent and democratic approach to international and national affairs and problems. I read many of the editorials with a great deal of pleasure and agree with them on many occasions, as I do with this one which is entitled "What is Obscenity?". It reads as follows:

Efforts by legislators and courts to define obscenity in literature have never been very successful. The dominion cabinet has just made a creditable attempt in an amendment to the Criminal Code introduced in the House of Commons.

Although the Criminal Code makes it an offence to sell "any obscene written matter, picture, model, phonograph record or other thing whatsoever", it does not at present specify what obscenity is. Police and courts are left to supply their own definitions, with such help as they can obtain from past precedents. The test commonly used in Canada was formulated by an English judge in 1868; "Whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall".

This definition is open to serious criticism, in that it makes the reactions of immature or abnormal individuals rather than those of normal adults—

Like members of parliament.

—the touchstone for determining whether a book is or is not obscene. Applied rigidly and literally, it can lead to the banning of many serious works of literature.

In place of this old rule, the proposed amendment offers a new definition for obscene matter:

Then the editorial quotes the section with which we are dealing, namely section 11, and continues:

This is a distinct improvement on the 1868 rule in two particulars.

We agree with that statement.

It lays stress on the "dominant characteristic" of the work rather than on isolated passages. More important, it makes the test whether there has or has not been a deliberate effort to exploit sexual desires. With this definition, it should be a little easier to draw a distinction between real pornography and works with a serious literary purpose.

Even so, the interpretation of the section is bound to present many difficulties. Where, for example, is the line to be drawn between "due" and "undue" exploitation? Narrowly construed, the new definition could condemn such classics as Hamlet, Othello and King Lear, all of which concerned with "sex, crime, horror, cruelty and violence". A great deal will still depend on the good sense of individual judges and magistrates.

It is unfortunate that when the government is trying to bring the law up to date on this matter, it has failed to touch the silliest and most indefensible anomaly of all. This is the rule which gives the Department of National Revenue authority to exclude from Canada any imported material its officials consider immoral or indecent. It is generally agreed that customs inspectors are not qualified to decide—as a sideline to their regular jobs—the often difficult and subtle question of whether a particular book is obscene. They do not, in fact, want the responsibility.

I am sure the Minister of National Revenue has indicated to the house very clearly that he does not enjoy this responsibility.

The law should be changed to leave the decision in all cases to the courts.

We think that editorial has placed the position very well indeed. With respect to the question of what is obscenity, may I say that I listened to a television broadcast at 10.30 p.m. eastern standard time over the trans-Canada network on Wednesday, February 10. I am going to read only the concluding paragraph because I think it deals effectively with the difficulty of definition.

To obviate this and other dangers—

This is referring to obscenity.

—it would seem that the most desirable procedure to deal with the present problem in Canada would be to attempt to enact a satisfactory and workable definition of the term "obscenity" and to apply the law where it was needed. Whether such a definition is possible is a question for those skilled in the law to decide. But this method would certainly seem preferable to the establishment of local or provincial boards of censors or the continuance of the present admittedly inadequate inspection of books entering the country. A combination of the threat of legal action, based on objective criteria, and the pressure of intelligently exerted public opinion should be sufficient to check the spread of unpleasant written material in this country.

As I said, Mr. Chairman, we fully recognize the difficulty of this problem. In moving this amendment we are trying to overcome what we think are some of the objections to the section as it now stands and to make the law clearer for magistrates and judges who have to administer it.

The hon. member for Port Arthur mentioned the different standards of magistrates and judges throughout Canada. I am sure the minister, with his knowledge of British Columbia, realizes that there is a great difference in standards as between magistrates and that things must be clearly defined if the law is going to be fairly applied all across Canada.

In order to illustrate that point may I say this. I remember two old justices of the peace in my district who were good citizens throughout the years. I remember that they always confiscated whisky that was produced in court. When people were charged with drinking it, they would solemnly confiscate it in the name of the crown to be presented to the local hospital. I was president or director of our local hospital for 18 years and I never had knowledge of a drop of that whisky ever turning up at the hospital. I want to mention that the point which always struck me was that the dear old gentleman, who was highly respected and was of Scottish descent, always concluded his sentence, whatever it was, $5 or $50, by saying, "Gentlemen, it is obscene to drink in public." There we have a definition of obscenity, and an example of the difficulties you get into with respect to differences between magistrates and judges. That might be an extreme case, but there is that possibility.

It is for the purpose of removing that deficiency as far as possible in respect of the section that my colleague the hon. member for Port Arthur has moved the amendment. Our group has given this section particular study. I think I can say that no clause of any bill which has been introduced into the house this session has received more consideration from this very small but very intelligent and very industrious group. We introduced this amendment because we believe it will achieve the common objective this group has in seeking to deal with the actions of this vermin of free enterprise which seeks to make a profit regardless of the welfare of our young people in Canada, and at the same time we are endeavouring to protect the rights of the free press and the right of free speech. Therefore I urge the minister to give serious consideration to our amendment in an effort to meet the needs of our times in those two directions.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, may I first say a word about one part of the amendment; the other part we will have a chance to study. I am directing my remarks to the part which proposes that for the words "a dominant characteristic" should be substituted "the dominant characteristic", which seems to us to make sense. However, if the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment would look at the French version of the bill, and if the minister would look at it, he would find that the French version of the bill meets that particular point, because the French version reads "la caracteristique dominante", whereas the English version is "a dominant characteristic". Perhaps we had better find out first from the minister which language will prevail in respect of this particular point.

So far as the clause itself is concerned, I agree with the hon. member who has just spoken that all members of this house undoubtedly support the purpose of this amendment, and we hope that purpose will be achieved by the amendment. We hope those who have been sceptical about the result of this amendment, in that it will make additional work for lawyers—or as one person, Mr. Harold Weir in the June 23 issue, of the Vancouver Sun put it, that the only thing accomplished by this so-called definition is to make the problem of pinpointing obscenity more complex—will be proven wrong by this amendment if it becomes law.

What it does, of course, is tighten up legal sanctions against what we all recognize to be wrong and evil, obscenity; but these legal sanctions, even though they are tightened by this clause, will not have the effect we would like them to have if they do not have behind them perhaps the even more important moral sanction of public opinion. Bishop Gower said, as reported in the Vancouver Sun the other day:

> It is society that is making this problem, and only society can cure it. If the change in law is a reflection of the desire of society as a whole, then it will be a change for the better.

We also hope, Mr. Chairman, that this tightening up can be brought about without interference—I know the minister hopes this also—with our traditional freedoms, our freedom of expression, which we cherish and which we do not want to see weakened. I am sure that by leaving this matter as it is intended in the hands of the courts we will get the kind of protection for our freedoms that we have the right to expect.

There is one aspect of this amendment with which perhaps the minister has dealt. If he has I apologize, but it has to do with the definition of "publication". When the problem was being discussed in the British House of Commons in the spring, the minister will perhaps remember that the solicitor general emphasized that while most discussion about obscenity had centred on authors and books, the responsibility of the government was much wider than that and had to include things like records, pictures, films and television film tapes. So I ask the minister whether the definition of "publication" is wide enough to cover these other matters without which, of course, this amendment would only have partial effect. Perhaps he could deal with that point.

I would like to say in conclusion that we heartily approve of the purpose of this amendment, and we hope this purpose will be achieved without interference with those freedoms which are of such great importance and which are always under threat these days.

As far as the other part of the amendment is concerned, that which would insert the words "and which is without literary or scientific merit", we would like to study it. I have the feeling that it is already covered, but we would like to look at it and express our views on that after the luncheon recess.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I realize it is just before one o'clock, but there is one point I would like to deal with now. I shall attempt after one o'clock to deal with every point which has been raised, but I want to deal with one point now to clear up a misapprehension.

The hon. member for Port Arthur said that in clause 12 we are shifting the onus of proof from the crown to the accused. I would like to correct that misapprehension at once and say that is not the case. If my hon. friend will read subsection 1 of the proposed section 150A, as he has done, he will see that the judge has first to be satisfied by information upon oath that there are reasonable grounds for believing that any publication is obscene. Then if he reads subsection 4, he will see it reads:

> If the court is satisfied that the publication is obscene or a crime comic, it shall make an order declaring the matter forfeited to Her Majesty—

In each case, but particularly in subsection 4, which is the main consideration which has to be met before the order can be made, the court has to be satisfied. Mr. Chairman, the onus of satisfying the court is always on the crown; therefore it is perfectly clear that the crown has to discharge that onus of proof that the matter complained of is obscene within the new definition or the definition of the Hicklin case, whichever definition the crown wishes to rely upon.

I would like to dispose at once of any suggestion that we have put upon the man in whose possession the publication is found the onus of coming to court and proving that the publication is not obscene. He does not have to prove that. He has to come into court to answer an allegation, yes. The allegation is that the matter is obscene, but there is no onus on him to prove it is not. The onus is still on the crown to prove that it is obscene before the court can be satisfied that it should make the order referred to.

In that connection I think my hon. friend was not quite clear in his reference by way of illustration to something which was proposed to be done in another bill, namely the bill to amend the combines act. My hon. friend said that we had again shifted the onus to the accused, and my hon. friend has missed the point. We have done nothing of the sort. What we have done is to create certain defences. We have made it clear that there are defences to a charge, and those defences were not established before. It is one thing to establish a defence, in which case of course the accused has to prove the defence; but that does not shift the burden of proof with respect to the charge itself to the accused. The crown still has to prove its charge. Then if the accused relies on certain defences, he has to prove them. All we have done there is to say that there are certain defences available, and then the accused has to prove them if he relies on them. Therefore in neither case have we placed any onus on the accused of proving his innocence; the onus is still on the crown to prove the offence as charged.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Fulton: I do not think the amendment has yet been put. We were discussing it before lunch, and I had just dealt with some of the points which were made by the hon. member for Port Arthur. I should like now to deal with some of the other points which were raised by hon. members during the discussion.

The hon. member for Hull implied that I was somehow or other guilty of failure to carry out an undertaking in that we have not provided, made special provision in this clause for proceedings against a printer or publisher. In the first place I should like to say that I gave no such undertaking. What I said in the speech to which the hon. member made reference was that we were considering whether we should make some special provision for the prosecution of printers and publishers to an extent not normally made now.

We did consider that point, which was what I undertook to do, but we came to the conclusion that because the question of proceeding against printers or publishers or anyone else who may be involved in this offence is primarily one for the law enforcement officers of the crown, and as the law enforcement officers of the Criminal Code are the attorneys general and other officials of the provincial governments, it did not seem very appropriate for the federal government to provide that there should be a prosecution of a printer or publisher in every case, or in any particular case. Of course a printer or publisher, if he is subject to the jurisdiction of our courts, can be proceeded against on the decision of the provincial attorney general or other prosecuting officer.

I would also remind the committee that inasmuch as we are providing this new procedure in rem we feel that this provides a quick, and as I have said before, objective method of disposing of the issue as to whether or not a publication is obscene, and it would be our expectation that, if the courts did decide that a certain publication was obscene, the matter would be finally disposed of and the publication withdrawn from circulation. Of course should a decision to this effect be given by the courts and the publisher or printer, or anyone else, persist in continuing the offence of publication in Canada, that person, whoever he might be, would be liable to prosecution with the consent of the attorney general.

Mr. Fisher: In any part of Canada?

Mr. Fulton: In any part of Canada, yes; wherever he could be found, but you cannot prosecute him in one province for an offence committed in another.

Mr. Fisher: Let us take as an example the novel "Lolita". Suppose someone brings it to the attention of the authorities and Britnell's in Toronto has a whole host of copies; does a decision reached by the magistrate in Toronto mean that all across Canada booksellers who have "Lolita" in stock should stop distributing and selling it?

Mr. Fulton: I think the practicality would be that a case of that kind would come before the Supreme Court of Canada before it was finally settled. If a disposition were finally reached in this way, that decision would, of course, be binding on all courts in Canada. But if in a particular case a decision was only given in the magistrate's court, that decision would not be binding on other courts in Canada, particularly on higher courts. Persons who might be called upon to give advice as to whether or not their clients should continue to distribute a particular publication would no doubt be largely guided by the decision made in whatever court it might have been given, but the only decision that would be binding on all the courts of Canada would be a decision of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Fisher: Can I ask the minister what effect these magistrates' decisions on books might have upon the customs people, and what considerations they are to take into account?

Mr. Fulton: That would be a matter of administrative policy on which I have not had any discussion with my colleague the Minister of National Revenue to find out what instructions he would give, but I would assume it would be the normal thing that, if a certain publication were found by a magistrate's court or any other court in Canada to be obscene under the new provision, the Minister of National Revenue would so instruct his customs officers and they would tend to give effect to that decision where they were called upon to do so to prevent it from entering the country.

Mr. Fisher: Because of the decision of a magistrate?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, wherever the decision might have been given. But, as I say, all these decisions are subject to appeal. I find it difficult to contemplate a customs officer, knowing that a decision had been given by some court in Canada that a certain publication was obscene, continuing to allow it to come into Canada. I cannot conceive that would be done. One good reason is that, if the decision is not appealed, one must assume that the person concerned accepted the decision as proper. If it were not accepted as a proper decision, presumably it would be appealed. Therefore I think the customs officer would be entitled to assume, in the absence of an appeal, that the decision of the magistrate's court was one to which he should give due weight.

Among other questions raised was the question of whether or not expert witnesses should be allowed to give evidence in prosecutions under this amendment. I recognize that the United Kingdom bill includes a provision which would allow the giving of expert evidence, but I know that this caused grave misgivings to the law officers of the crown there. I should like to emphasize that there is a fundamental difference between the approach here and that in the United Kingdom—the only fundamental difference of which I am aware—namely that we are seeking to establish an objective test whereas in the United Kingdom they have simply carried forward, with some modification but in the main without modification, the distinction in the Hicklin case, which as I have said before is an almost completely subjective test. We are trying to keep this as simple as possible to make it possible for a court to apply simply rules to establish whether or not a publication is offensive, and in general that is not a type of test which lends itself to interpretation by expert witnesses. On the other hand, the subjective test depending on opinion is a much more proper opportunity for expert evidence to be heard. But while we do not feel at the moment, that it would be appropriate to include a provision allowing the giving of evidence by expert witnesses, we shall watch carefully the experience in the United Kingdom and will reconsider the point on the basis of their experience and our own experience in connection with the amendments.

I was asked whether I had spoken to any representatives of the publishers since the bill was introduced. I have not spoken to them personally, but at the request of one spokesman for Canadian publishers I arranged an interview for my deputy minister, and he and this gentleman had a long and informative discussion as a result of which I believe some of the misapprehensions in the mind of this particular publisher about the effects of our legislation were removed. We indicated to the gentleman in question that, if he had further representations to make, we would be very glad to receive them, but as yet we have not heard further from him or from his association.

The hon. member for Kootenay West, if I may suggest it with respect, seemed to me to adopt two conflicting positions. In the first place he said it was the desire of the C.C.F. party to make certain that we did not go too far, that, in introducing these amendments, we did not go so far that we might throw the net over books about which there was genuine controversy. I think that was the effect of his argument, and with that view I find myself in agreement. As I explained in the statement I made this morning we have been careful not to go too far, and for that reason we deliberately used the phrases "dominant characteristic" and "undue exploitation". If the hon. gentleman had stopped there, I would have agreed with him entirely, but he went on to read the report of the statement made by a group of clergymen at a meeting in London, Ontario, in which they suggested the exactly opposite view; that is to say, they attacked the use of the words "dominant" and "undue exploitation".

I point out to the hon. member for Kootenay West and to hon. members of the committee, because others have referred previously to the statement made by the clergymen, that one of the three clergymen quoted is from the United Kingdom and another is from the United States; and while I respect their motives and their learning I think it may be fair to suggest they are perhaps not intimately aware of the situation in Canada. The interesting thing is that these gentlemen attacked the bill—where they attacked it at all specifically—on the grounds, as I say, that we used the words "dominant" and "undue exploitation". If we were to take those words out, it seems to me, we would be in danger of going too far, perhaps, in bringing under the terms of this definition, in an absolute fashion, books over which there was room for genuine controversy because while they contained some passages or words that might be regarded as objectionable, on the whole they were regarded as being of genuine literary, artistic or scientific merit. It is to protect the position of such publications that we have used those two phrases, "dominant characteristic" and "undue exploitation".

The Leader of the Opposition asked me whether the absence of a definition of the word "publication" would have the effect that the legislation would not cover such matters as phonograph records and other objects. I would direct his attention to the fact that section 150 of the Criminal Code at present provides as follows:

150. (1) Everyone commits an offence who
(a) makes, prints, publishes, distributes, circulates, or has in his possession for the purpose of publication, distribution or circulation any obscene written matter, picture, model, phonograph record or other thing whatsoever—

I believe that is the answer to the question; that these other various types of offensive materials are covered in the earlier provision of section 150 of the code.

I was asked a question as to whether the word we intended to use is "a" dominant characteristic or "the" dominant characteristic. I admit that in this regard there is apparently a difference, and it is an important difference, between the English version and the French version. The English version of this bill shows that the proposed section could read as follows:

For the purposes of this act, any publication a dominant characteristic of which is the undue exploitation of sex, or of sex and any one or more of the following subjects, namely, crime, horror, cruelty and violence, shall be deemed to be obscene.

That is the formula we intended to use. Those words express correctly the intent we had in mind in introducing the bill. The French version, however—

Mr. Herridge: As that correction is included in our amendment, will the minister not agree that the study made of it by the C.C.F. indicated the weakness in the amendment on this point?

Mr. Fulton: That may be, Mr. Chairman; but I believe, for reasons I will explain, that the C.C.F. amendment is itself in error in seeking to incorporate the word mentioned therein. I shall deal with those reasons in a moment. "A" is the word we intended, as it appears in the English copy of the bill. If, therefore, the committee agrees with me and rejects the amendment of the C.C.F., I will move that the French version be corrected by deleting the word "la" where it appears and substituting therefor the word "une" which will make the English and French versions the same.

The reasons I suggested that the amendment moved by my friend the hon. member for Port Arthur should not be accepted are the following. We are trying to keep this bill as simple as possible and make it as simple as possible for the courts to find whether or not a publication is obscene. What is it that the courts are called upon to consider in making this finding? They will be called upon to consider whether it is a dominant characteristic of a publication that it unduly exploits sex, or sex and any one or more of several subjects, and it seems to me it is a simple question to put before the courts, to determine whether it is a dominant characteristic of a publication that might be in question.

If, however, you use the word "the"—it is "the" dominant characteristic of the publication in question—that does open all sorts of loopholes for legal argument of exactly the type which my hon. friends have previously criticized; because then you might have the lawyer for the defence suggesting that perhaps the dominant characteristic of the book is not this undue exploitation of sex, etc., but it is perhaps the artistic format of the book itself or some other characteristic of the book. If the courts answer the question that it is a dominant characteristic of a publication that it unduly exploits sex, I do not think the courts should be asked to make refinements as between other principal characteristics of the book and as to which one is the dominant and only characteristic. It is quite possible for a book to have more than one major characteristic.

If my hon. friends will look up the definition of "dominant" in the Oxford English dictionary they will find that one of the definitions—and I say it is one and not the only definition—is "occupying a commanding position". As an example of the use of the word "dominant" in that sense I give the following: "To take possession of the dominant parts of the globe", which indicates clearly that there may be a number of dominant parts or characteristics of a single whole. Therefore we have purposely used the words "a dominant characteristic" rather than "the dominant characteristic" for the reasons I have tried to indicate.

The other part of the proposed amendment would add the words "and which is without literary or scientific merit" so that the proposed clause would then read:

> For the purposes of this act, any publication the dominant characteristic of which is the undue exploitation of sex, or of sex and any one or more of the following subjects, namely, crime, horror, cruelty and violence and which is without literary or scientific merit, shall be deemed to be obscene.

I am sorry I cannot accept that part of the amendment either, for this reason. It seems to me that the insertion of those particular words would impose definitely upon a person who intended to publish an obscene book the necessity merely to put in one chapter, or indeed one paragraph, with literary or scientific merit, and then he would argue that this book did contain some passages of literary or scientific merit. Therefore, he would say, this book should not be found to be obscene.

We have provided in this section as it is drawn, Mr. Chairman, what we believe to be a fair, simple and conclusive test; namely, is a dominant characteristic of this book, or of other work, the undue exploitation of sex, or sex and crime or any one of a number of additional subjects? I think this is a simple question for a court to answer, and if the court can answer the question affirmatively, then I see nothing unfair in its bringing in a finding that the particular publication is obscene.

We do not want to open loopholes which, first, will permit of a number of unduly technical arguments; and, second, may well provide a loophole for escape on the part of those who should not really escape at all. Therefore I must say we cannot accept the amendment.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I was not very convinced by the definition of "dominant" the minister read out. I still think there can be really only one dominant characteristic of something. I believe the minister could or should elaborate even more on some examples of what are a series of dominant characteristics. I know in the field of heredity study the phrase, "genes with dominant characteristics" is used in the plural, but that is about the only field I can think of in which it is the practice.

To say that the amendment respecting literary and scientific merit might open the door to someone sneaking in something, I understood the minister to say the very reason the words "undue exploitation" were used was to give protection to works of scientific, literary and artistic merit. If that is so, and since there may be a great deal of argument over "undue", I thought the addition of the direct phrase "and which is without literary and scientific merit" would correct that situation.

The minister emphasized throughout his remarks that this is a simple and objective way of getting at the problem that is presented to us. I wonder whether we really want it that simple. I wonder whether we really do not want the protection that we would get from having "the" instead of "a", and requiring that literary or scientific merit be considered. What is the magistrate going to do when this material is brought before him if it is not to make a decision as to whether the work has literary or scientific merit?

This brings me to the point where the minister said I was wrong in suggesting that the onus was being shifted from the crown to the defendant. Perhaps my choice of words was not fortunate; perhaps I did not make the point very well, but it certainly seems to me that this is a new procedure which is being tried by this amendment. For example, if a crusading police officer in a metropolitan city wanted to build up his reputation he could go around and make a number of seizures; or a crusading politician, as far as that is concerned, could go in and note some material and then take it to the magistrate or to the crown attorney and swear under oath that there were reasonable grounds for believing that this material was obscene. The material is all pulled off the shelves and the seller finds himself in court.

In effect, it seems to me that under subclause 3 he has to come in and show cause why the material should not be destroyed. What happens to him in the interval? It seems to me that by those seizures the court is putting him in a very serious situation. It could wind up by his getting into business difficulty, especially if his whole stock or a large portion of it was seized. It could certainly, because of the action of bringing him before the courts, bring him into disrepute and therefore put his business in difficulty. From that point of view I think this new procedure does put the defendant in an unusual position.

I wish I had more legal background so I could make a point about subclause 3 in effect forcing the defendant to show cause why the material should not be destroyed. I feel that this is something new, and I should like the minister to give us the precedents for this kind of procedure in law or in Canadian practice.

The other point I am not very satisfied with is this. Of course the minister assumes that the customs department, once they know a magistrate has ruled on a book, would not allow it into the country. If that is the way it is going to be, we could get all kinds of silly situations. I know the minister will remember the Senate committee that looked into the question of salacious and indecent literature in 1952 and 1953. I can well remember one of the most vicious blasts that were made in that committee was against a play by a British Columbia writer by the name of Ethel Wilson. Certainly a number of people in one of the provinces of Canada thought it was a most indecent and obscene thing and that the C.B.C. should never have been allowed to produce it; it was a foul and filthy thing. Well, by this sort of procedure, if Ethel Wilson had this book published in the United States we could wind up having some magistrate in one province decide that the book was obscene and the rest of Canada, where it might be found quite acceptable, would be barred from reading it.

In the light of the fact that the Minister of National Revenue was very strong in his statement last year about wanting to get this question of making decisions on obscenity out of his department, I wonder whether the minister thinks this is a really satisfactory solution.

Mr. Fulton: I think the answer to the last question should be given at once and that is, yes; we do think it is a satisfactory solution because we are leaving the decision to the courts. The decision as to whether or not a publication is obscene is now to be made by the courts under this clause.

In answer to the other part of the hon. gentleman's remarks, I can only refer him again to the fact that the proposed subsections 1 and 4 should be read together. I emphasize that since subsection 4 says that if the court is satisfied that the publication is obscene it shall make an order declaring the matter forfeited to Her Majesty, this makes it clear that the crown has to satisfy the court.

Consider the situation that would exist if, for instance, neither side gave any evidence at all. Then the court would not be satisfied that the publication was obscene and the accused would be, I expect, acquitted. Let us put the other case—I am trying to illustrate the point to assure my hon. friend that there is no shifting of the onus—where the crown simply gave no evidence; then of course there would be nothing before the court upon which it could be satisfied. I think, therefore, we have clearly preserved the ordinary principle of law that it is the onus of the crown to prove its case. The case the crown is seeking to make clear, and which it has to prove, is that the publication complained of is obscene.

In so far as the "show cause" summons is concerned, I am quite frank to admit that it is a new procedure under circumstances of this kind. I could give one or two other examples, although I do not say they are parallel. I think particularly of a judgment summons which in effect calls upon the judgment debtor to show cause why he does not pay the judgment. If he fails to show cause he is liable to be put in prison, not for debt but for refusing to comply with a judgment of the court. The judgment debtor is therefore called into court to show cause why, in effect, he should not be committed for contempt of court by refusing to pay the judgment. There are other cases, but I cannot think of them at the moment, and I do not want to be inaccurate. The show cause summons is not a new thing. It is a new procedure with respect to obscenity, but it has been in force in the United Kingdom for over 100 years.

I should like also to deal with one other point made by my hon. friend, and that is the possibility of somebody in one province of Canada making a finding which my hon. friend alleges would be binding in all other parts of Canada, where perhaps the feeling was not the same. I can only emphasize again that there is, first of all, the right of appeal available to a person who feels himself aggrieved or who feels that somebody has not arrived at a proper decision. Second, not only the owner of the article seized but, under our proposal, the author is given the right to appear and make his representations refuting the crown's claim that the publication complained of is obscene.

Mr. Fisher: Is it not true that in so far as the censorship of films is concerned, that is done directly within provincial compartments?

Mr. Fulton: Yes, but there is no censorship here. This is one of the things I should perhaps emphasize at this point. We have set our faces against censorship so far as publications are concerned in the dominion parliament and we are seeking, under the ordinary legal principles applicable in Canada, to provide a method of dealing with publications which are offensive. I personally, as Minister of Justice have said—perhaps not as minister but certainly when I was a member of the opposition—that I could visualize no circumstances under which I would countenance the establishment of a bureau of censorship, certainly not in peacetime. It is because I recognize that there is a problem here, and it is because I am not prepared to recommend censorship, which I doubt would be acceptable to parliament, that we have sought this way of meeting the problem and still keeping within the confines of long accepted, well understood and sound principles of the Criminal Code, namely that a man is innocent until he is proven guilty. Here the publication is not obscene until it is proven to be obscene. What we are trying to do is define what we mean by obscene.

Mr. Crestohl: Speaking to the amendment I say, with all respect, that I do not share the view of the minister when he prefers the use of the term "a dominant feature", instead of "the dominant feature". My understanding is that there can be only one dominant feature, but I understand what the minister is trying to do. He is trying to bring under the section a case in which a feature may be an undue exploitation of sex but which does not necessarily constitute the dominant feature of that work. Perhaps the minister would consider eliminating the word "dominant" and using this language: "For the purpose of this act any publication, a feature of which is the undue exploitation of sex—". There you do not have to show that it is the dominant feature. So long as that work has in it a characteristic or a feature which is the undue exploitation of sex, then this wording might cover the situation, without making it necessarily the dominant feature.

I am just addressing myself to this one point. I should like to say something with regard to subsection 3 when we get to that.

Mr. Eudes: The amendment moved by the hon. member for Port Arthur, Mr. Chairman, contains two points. First to substitute the word "the" for the word "a" after the words "any publication". As the Leader of the Opposition said this morning, the French translation of this section reads as follows:

(Translation):

—any publication a dominant characteristic of which is—

(Text):

Notwithstanding the arguments brought before the committee by the Minister of Justice I still believe that in this case, the French version should be adopted, substituting in the English text the word "the" for the word "a". There cannot be, in my opinion, more than one dominant characteristic. If the word "a" remains in this proposed new section it will then mean that a publication could have more than one dominant characteristic, which is difficult to conceive. I admit that a publication can be marked by many characteristics, but if one of those is the dominant one it should be termed "the" dominant and not "a" dominant characteristic, otherwise the word "dominant" would lose its meaning.

As to the second part of the amendment, that is the insertion following the word "violence" of the words, "and which is without literary or artistic merit", I simply say that part of the amendment adds nothing to the clarification of the definition of obscenity suggested by the Minister of Justice. The words in the new definition contained in this bill, "dominant characteristic", would in my opinion take care of a production which is a literary or scientific work. Even if isolated passages of such a publication would exploit sex and other immoral subjects, if the dominant characteristic of that publication is of real value in literature or science this new suggested definition of obscenity would not apply.

The proposed amendment to the section under study—I refer to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Port Arthur —would perhaps complicate the task of the judge who would then have to decide on the literary or scientific merit of the publication suspected of obscenity. More evidence would then be needed to enlighten the judge and to help him to decide upon the literary or scientific merit of the production under examination.

Evidence of fact has always been admitted before our courts, and exceptionally evidence of opinion is generally admissible whenever an issue comprises a subject in which knowledge can only be secured from experts or scientists. This amendment, I believe, in order to meet the requirements of all our acts, should also contain something along this line; that the opinion of experts as to the literary and scientific merit of an article may be admitted in any proceedings under this act. The amendment, if accepted, should also be moved under section 12 of this bill adding paragraph 150A to the Criminal Code; and to be complete it should also include the words "art or learning or of other objects of general concern".

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, there is no perfect system of law, but I think we can take it that we have achieved the least imperfect jurisprudence because we have been wise enough to realize that it is difficult if not impossible to chart in advance in its entirety or to define with accuracy and precision all the countless relationships between individuals or between individuals and the state. We have been content, and I think properly so, to leave to our courts and to men who are learned in the law, dedicated to their calling and very knowledgeable in the facts of human nature, sufficient room in which to manoeuvre to draw the distinctions and make the refinements necessary to arrive at the greatest measure of justice.

Show me any system or any code of conduct of human beings where an attempt is made to cover every contingency, to cabin, crib and confine within narrow limits behind high walls all the various matters which may be considered by a court, and there you will see a greater volume of litigation and a greater amount of jurisprudence than in any other system of law of which I know. I think, for example, of the revenue laws and the liquor laws of the respective provinces.

But having said that, I still think here is a case where amendment has long been needed to bring this particular aspect of the criminal law into line with the present-day situation. As the minister said, one of the leading cases on this particular branch of the criminal law is one which was decided in the United Kingdom shortly after the middle of the last century. I have before me the latest annotated Criminal Code and the cases referred to under section 150. The latest criminal case in Canada was Rex v. Ballantyne, decided in 1916. Both these cases were obviously decided at a time when there was not considered nor was there even contemplated all the volume of filthy and salacious literature which has descended upon us in recent years. For that reason it is quite obvious that we have needed for some time an amendment which will act as a beacon and a guide to courts in dealing with this particularly knotty problem.

Dealing very briefly with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Port Arthur, may I say this. I am quite satisfied that if this amendment which he seeks was in fact enacted it would greatly increase the amount of litigation and the number of contested cases. Counsel for the defence would have a field day with an opportunity to make use of an amendment of that kind. As I think the hon. member who just took his seat said, what is of literary or scientific merit? As the minister himself said, any small portion of a publication could be directed to a high level of literary or scientific merit, and there would be a perfect defence. I suggest that the adoption of this amendment would certainly not achieve the results which the hon. member may be trying to seek.

Before I take my seat there is one matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister pertaining to section 12 of the bill or section 150 of the Code. It seems to me to give a simple and expeditious method by which the crown could inquire whether or not a publication is obscene having in mind the fact that the definition in section 150 lists the variety of people who may be the subject of a criminal charge:

Criminal Code

(1) Everyone commits an offence who
(a) makes, prints, publishes, distributes, circulates, or has in his possession—

I am wondering whether it would not be possible for any one of the people falling within those categories to be able himself to come before a court and say, "I have in my possession certain publications and I am doubtful whether or not they are obscene within the definition which has been enacted" and thereby simply and cheaply ask the court for a declaration as to that particular matter.

Mr. Fulton: I think that could be very simply accomplished, in the proposal before us, in that all that person would have to do would be to get somebody else, his lawyer or someone, to lay an information with respect to the particular matter about which he was concerned. In that way he could very quickly get before the courts.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Earlier in the session I had prepared notes for a speech I had intended to make on this subject. However, at this stage of the session such a speech, as detailed and exhaustive as I intended it to be, would be quite inappropriate. Consequently I should like to confine my comments to half a dozen sentences.

First I wish to state that I believe the present proposal constitutes a constructive and forward-looking attempt to deal with a problem which is as difficult as it has become alarming. The steep increase in the sale of salacious and depraved periodicals, of corrupt and rotten publications is a threat to our established national standards of conduct and decency.

In large measure this increase is the result of the illicit, clandestine activities of certain distributors to compel retailers to handle these offensive magazines as a condition precedent to receiving for sale other periodicals. Especially, Mr. Chairman, do I hope that section 150B will be rigidly enforced in order to eliminate these purveyors of putridity, these profiteers in pornography.

In my view the amendment that has been presented to the committee by the hon. member for Port Arthur would render that section totally unworkable and would pull any teeth which it has. For that reason I intend to vote against it.

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, I rise to add a few comments which I feel may assist the Minister of Justice in bringing before this committee the amendment he has in mind, because I find this is possibly one of the most important pieces of legislation which we have faced for some weeks. I realize that in these troubled times if the moral standards of our community are to be upheld, this may be the means of achieving a victory which could not be achieved in other ways.

Comments were made to the effect that this is a matter into which politics could not enter. I regret very much the remarks of the Minister of Justice last Wednesday when this matter first came up and when he indicated his opinion as to the remarks made by hon. members of the opposition. I was further surprised this morning when the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm stated that this amendment presented to the house was a total remedy for the evil presently existing. I am speaking on this matter because I feel it is most important.

In our area a short time ago it was alleged that two children of 10 or 11 years of age burned a $1 million school, their own school, after having inscribed on some of the blackboards a remark indicating their intentions. When such things occur there is no doubt that these young people, knowing the act they were about to commit, were prompted by their imaginations, which possibly had been led astray by crime comics or other literature which unfortunately had been furnished to them.

I must state at this stage that I feel the Minister of Justice has failed to include in this amendment a higher penalty if the sale is made to a minor instead of to an adult. I am sure that if we are to protect the Canadian people under the new law of this country, we must certainly protect the minors. We have provisions in many statutes in our country, both provincial and federal, whereby a crime, especially a crime against morals, carries a greater penalty when it is committed against an infant. I am sure it will be a surprise to the Canadian people when they see that an amendment such as this does not include that provision in what has been stated by some hon. members to be a total remedy to the evil.

We are trying to bring about in our Criminal Code of Canada a definition of what we consider a crime so that the judges of this country, in each of the provinces, will decide what is the evil we are trying to prevent. We cannot assume in this regard that we are both the legislative and administrative body in this country. It is very wrong for this parliament to bring in a piece of legislation feeling that judges will necessarily take the opinions or interpretations which we have today placed upon them; therefore it is our duty to be accurate when we define this crime which we are trying to prevent. I would like to quote on that score a paragraph from a very fine article which appeared in August, 1958 in the periodical or review Relations. There is an editorial on page 197 to this effect:

(Translation):

In order to be effective, the law must conform to the exacting standards of natural ethics, and define them so clearly that no amount of pettifoggery can distort their meaning or impair their scope.

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, this definition which is now being placed in our Code fails in many aspects in trying properly to define the crime for which our judges will punish the guilty ones. It will open doors which will necessarily permit the defence lawyers to discuss at greater length the merits of the offence. Therefore I would like, in assisting this committee, to make some comments of my own concerning the possible interpretations which could come about.

The first is one which the Minister of Justice just a moment ago pretended to solve in replying to the Leader of the Opposition, when he used the word "publication" in the clause relating to obscenity. Many things are defined by the Code as obscene; and, of course, a person found having such a publication or other matter in his possession for the purpose of sale, and so on, is guilty of an offence. Now, however, the definition simply says a "publication". I think when the Minister of Justice starts to think how you can define a dominant characteristic, or an undue exploitation of sex, in anything but a publication, I am sure the judges would also want to consider, for example, a photograph or a phonograph record.

The Minister of Justice says he is bringing forward this amendment for the purpose of clarifying the position, but he is not clarifying the position as far as, for example, models or pictures, or articles such as a deck of cards are concerned. I feel that a judge, when adjudicating upon this matter and having the word "publication" before him in the statute, will be unable to find that such an article as a deck of cards can be described as a publication. Therefore I think the words should be repeated as we find them in the old section so that all these matters are covered. This will have some relevancy to these other matters considered under clause 12, such as a tied sale. For example, you could have a tied sale of an article, or a tied sale of a film, as well as a publication. And such is in no way covered by this statute.

We have also heard some discussion about the word "dominant" and the words "the" and "a". I feel that the trouble has occurred because of the use of the word "dominant". I think the intention of the Minister of Justice is to define it as meaning a great part or an important part; but the word "dominant" means a majority. To most of the people in this house it means over 50 per cent. What will it mean to the courts? Possibly the same thing.

I can also see certain publications, especially in the domain of magazines, where you may have ten articles, no two of which the subject matter are connected. I realize that the hon. member for Port Arthur, who is a librarian, is thinking of books of say 600 pages, containing a few pages which may be found objectionable; therefore the book should not be condemned because of that. But when you are dealing with magazines and publications you may find 15 articles in the magazine, two of which are most objectionable, the other 13 not being objectionable. In that case you might have two very bad pieces of obscene literature; how can you fit in the word "dominant" if the word "dominant" means the majority, over 50 per cent, and so on? I think the intention is to condemn books or magazines wherein you find an important, undue exploitation of sex.

In trying to find the meaning behind the use of the word "a" or "the", as I stated, you can have a magazine containing eight articles all unrelated, six of which pertain to sports and the remaining two to something absolutely immoral. Now, by the meaning of the word "dominant" could you find a magazine obscene for six articles out of eight, the six sports and two only concerning obscene literature?

I would like to say something about section 150A. The minister has a new procedure, and intended well, but what exactly does it do? You have subsection 4 whereby you cannot seize an article or a model or a photographic record and find it obscene. I think that the same words should be used to start the clause as in the original section 150 to ascertain that you could have these articles found obscene and forfeited to the crown in the right of the province in the same way, but I fail to see that a publication would mean an article or an instrument as subsection 4 states.

There is something that can be said about the assignment of the onus—why it says in subclause 2 that the person against whom the complaint is made may appear before a court and show cause why the matter seized should not be forfeited. Other words could be used. He could appear on his own defence, but if he does not appear to show cause why it should not be forfeited many magistrates may take it for granted that if someone does not show cause, automatically, without reading the book or getting the required evidence, it is obscene. I realize what is said in clause 4, but magistrates may consider themselves satisfied because they did not find someone to show cause and they would have the accused admitting the crime in a sense and therefore I feel that it is not the intention of parliament to shift the onus, and the words "show cause" could be replaced by "defence".

Then we have the fact which I think most important that if a motion is made for an order under this amendment no other proceedings in the province can be had under section 150 without the consent of the attorney general. This is giving the administration of our criminal law to elected representatives. There could be a situation in which there were only five books out of a publication of 10,000 in a province and people might make it a point to appear before the magistrate and lay a charge against their own people so that they might pay a fine on five books and the whole matter is stopped and cases which have begun under section 150 must be discontinued, cases, say, where 500 or 1,000 books have been seized or where a charge has been laid under section 150. These charges will be discontinued unless an elected representative, the attorney general of the province, will grant permission, and I fail to realize why the criminal law should be placed in this manner in the hands of an elected person. That is certainly a fault which can be found readily.

Further, why could it not be if five books are found obscene within a province that all the copies of that obscene literature would thereby be condemned and could be forfeited to the crown? It seems to me that that would be a very small step and that would take off our shelves in each of the provinces those books which are thought obscene by a judge of the province, because the way this clause is made even on an order made when the judge is not satisfied that the material is obscene, that can occur, and if an order is made by a magistrate in one part of a province that that literature is not obscene, it will thereby bar all other cases in the province unless the attorney general can review the matter and say possibly that this first magistrate was wrong and permit a trial under section 150.

I feel that possibly the amendment suggested may not be the most correct one, but I am fully aware that the amendment does not satisfy the need of this country to condemn false scientific works. A lot of books on the shelves today are being sold for no other reason than to arouse interest in obscene literature and so on and there is absolutely nothing brought forward to take care of that difficulty where people will hide behind the fact that it is an effort to put out a scientific book. I fully realize that to bring about a proper solution of this evil in this country no doubt the co-operation of the people is required and I apprehend that many Canadian organizations realize that; but notwithstanding the fact that if an amendment of this kind is to be brought in it should do away with all these possibilities that laymen like ourselves could not take on ourselves. There is always the possibility that the judges will interpret these terms in a way different from the way in which we interpret them today; they will go to technical terminology and to the dictionary and I doubt that they will as above stated condemn an article or a film under the word "publication". Undoubtedly the minister is trying to do a good thing, but I feel that though he has had objectives which were stated to be political, he is being in this instance absolutely conservative. We have heard that a conservative is sometimes a person who acts hastily after thinking over a thing too long. The minister has thought about this a lot and in the dying days of this session he brings in an amendment which many institutions in this country had no time to study and report to their representative.

Mr. Pearson: I do not think the committee need apologize for having spent a certain amount of time on this clause, since it is as complicated as it is important; important not only in relation to social health and public morality but also in its implications concerning at least one of our traditional freedoms. The minister has emphasized both in this house and outside that he has no desire to introduce anything in the nature of censorship. I am sure he is quite sincere in that, and I am not suggesting that this particular clause does that, but it is something about which we want to be as certain in our own minds as we can be. The hon. member for Peace River when he intervened a few moments ago expressed some anxiety about the amendment to the amendment which is before us in that it might encourage litigation and makes things more complicated. When things are complicated lawyers usually have a better opportunity of intervening. I can say that, not being a lawyer. The difficulty and perhaps, in a sense, even the danger of this kind of legislation in general dealing with this subject is that in the words of, perhaps it was Dicey, though I admit it was in a different context, it tends to substitute litigation for legislation. That is one of the things which has worried a number of members about this kind of amendment.

In so far as the amendment of the hon. member for Port Arthur is concerned I felt that the original French text was more logical than the present English text, but which, as the minister pointed out, is the official text.

[Mr. Godin.]

When you talk about something being dominant you think of something being almost exclusive; a characteristic which is dominant does surely, at least in my understanding of it, exclude other and secondary characteristics in respect of any particular matter. Perhaps the minister will be able to explain to our satisfaction how in a publication there could be four, five or six characteristics each of which is dominant. The very concept of dominancy means it is superior to other concepts. That is why it seems to me that the amendment of the hon. member for Port Arthur is a logical and reasonable one. The other part of the amendment seems to me to be a little more difficult to support.

I would ask the minister this question. If a particular publication does have literary or scientific merit, can its dominant characteristic then be the undue exploitation of sex? If the answer to that is no, then perhaps the amendment is redundant. I noticed that the British parliament—and no doubt the minister has also noticed it—in discussing this subject last February did include a clause in the bill they were considering to deal with the particular problem which was raised in this committee by the hon. member for Port Arthur. The clause introduced in England reads:

> A person shall not be convicted of an offence against this section if he proves that his publication of the matter in question is justified as being for the public good on the ground that it furthers the interest of science, literature, art or learning, or of other objects of general concern.

I think I am right in saying that this particular clause was included in the British bill and passed after a great deal of discussion and some amendment. If I am wrong, the minister will correct me on that.

Mr. Fulton: May I ask the Leader of the Opposition if the bill to which he is referring is the obscene publications bill of this year?

Mr. Pearson: I am referring to the one introduced last February, or at any rate last spring. I am reading from a passage in an article published in the London Times of February 27, 1959, referring to that bill. The British parliament after a long discussion, much longer than we are having, which included committee discussion, felt it was desirable and indeed necessary to include that paragraph. Does the minister think that point is sufficiently met in the amendment he has himself introduced at this time? I again ask him the question which it seems to me has a bearing on this. If any publication is of literary or scientific merit, can its dominant characteristic be the undue exploitation of sex?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate that it is difficult to be dogmatic and completely certain about the word "dominant" and whether it should be "a" dominant characteristic or "the" dominant characteristic. Perhaps I can try to illustrate the point of view which I believe the courts will take and which my officials after long and careful consideration have felt argues in favour of the use of the word "a" instead of "the". There are those hon. gentlemen opposite who ask, "How can a book have more than one dominant characteristic," and who say if their argument is correct the word should be "the" and not "a".

Let us say that you have a valley adjacent to which are three mountain peaks of equal height. Which of those peaks is the dominant peak? Or let us take another illustration. Let us assume you have a book—and it is dangerous to attempt to be too particular in these matters—which purports to be a study of sociological problems and in that book the author has gone about treating the subject in a manner which involves the use of illustrations of sexual relations arising in the course of the thing, as a secondary characteristic, which leads the law officers and, let us say, which we think would lead a court to assume that it is an obscene publication. It might be argued that there are two dominant characteristics of this book. In the first place it is a book dealing with sociological problems and consequently an undue exploitation of sex, and containing illustrations or scenes of sex or illicit relations. In this sense I think it is possible for there to be so many characteristics of a book or publication—let us not confine it to books—which are not necessarily of a related nature that it would be impossible, and thus defeat the purpose of the clause, if you required the court in each case to say that the only dominant characteristic of the book—in the sense of there being only one dominant characteristic—is that it unduly exploits sex or sex and one or more of the other subjects named.

I believe there are cases in which it is a profitless task to seek to isolate a thing as being the only dominant characteristic and it is for that reason we have purposely used the words "a dominant characteristic". I ask hon. members to consider the over-all effect of the question which the court is going to be called upon to decide before there is a conviction. That is to say, the court will have to decide that this is a publication a dominant characteristic of which is the undue exploitation of sex or of sex and any one or more of the subjects named. I do not think the use of the words "a dominant characteristic" in that over-all context poses the court with any obstacle which it cannot answer for itself or which makes it necessary for the court to be asked to answer the question as to whether or not this is the only dominant characteristic of the publication.

Mr. Carter: Would the minister permit a question, Mr. Chairman. Would it not be better to use the word "prominent"? The reference would then be to a prominent characteristic rather than a dominant characteristic.

Mr. Fulton: There are two reasons why we rejected words of that type. In the first place we did not want to spread the net so wide that we caught books, as it were, without any real possibility of successful defence and about which there is room for genuine controversy. There are so many books I can think of of which the prominent characteristic in certain passages is the exploitation of sex. We wanted to go no farther than that. The other reason is this. The main concern we have in mind and which we are framing this amendment in an attempt to meet is the pulp trash type of stuff that is appearing in such vast quantities on our newsstands. While I do not for a moment pretend to be unconcerned about the major book type of publication, I must say I am far less concerned about that type and less concerned if one or two such books escape, than I would be in allowing this other stuff, about which there is really no genuine controversy to escape because we over-refined the amendment we are trying to introduce.

The Leader of the Opposition raised a very good question about this matter of whether it should be a defence to show that the work contributed to the public good. I would refer him to section 150, subsection 3, of our present Criminal Code which contains a provision very similar to that contained in the British obscene publications bill to which he referred. The subsection reads:

(3) No person shall be convicted of an offence under this section—

Section 150, which creates the offence of obscenity. I continue:

—if he establishes that the public good was served by the acts that are alleged to constitute the offence and that the acts alleged did not extend beyond what served the public good.

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, if the minister attaches so much importance to retaining the word "a" instead of the word "the" in the English version, why does he leave the word "la" instead of "une" in the French version?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I have already explained that if the committee agrees with me in rejecting the amendment now before us, I will then move that the word "la" be changed to "une", in the French version.

Mr. Crestohl: Will the minister please explain how the clause would be affected if he left out the word "dominant" altogether and simply said "a characteristic of which is the undue exploitation of", or a feature of it "is the undue exploitation of"; leave the word "dominant" out.

Mr. Fulton: Again I say, Mr. Chairman, if we did that then we would cast a net to catch a number of things that we really do not want to catch under this definition at all. We designed this definition having in mind the type of pulp trash that appears on the newsstands. I said I am not unconcerned about the others but I am mostly concerned about dealing with that.

Mr. Pearson: The minister has, I think, made a pretty reasonable explanation of the wording which he has put before the committee. May I ask him one further question? This is a matter, as I recall it, which received a good deal of consideration also at Westminster. I ask this question as a layman. Perhaps if I were a lawyer I would know more. Would there be any difficulty in the way of expert evidence being acceptable before a court which would have a bearing on the literary, scientific and other qualities of a particular publication?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Chairman, I explained earlier that our attempt here is to produce an objective definition, or as objective as we can make it, to introduce a number of pretty factual tests by which the court is asked to measure this question of obscenity. It is my view that this type of definition does not lend itself to the giving of opinion evidence by experts. If, as was the case when the only definition we had was the Hicklin definition, your definition is almost entirely subjective, if it has to be interpreted in the light of what are its effects on certain individuals, then, I think, there is much more room for opinion evidence. But I point out to my friend that actually, even when we had only the Hicklin definition, the Ontario court of appeal in the American News case, in the judgment of Mr. Justice Laidlaw expressly ruled that opinion evidence was not admissible, on the grounds, in his opinion, that it was irrelevant.

I go back, having made these explanations as to our present thinking, to repeat what I said earlier, that we feel we are moving in this field. This approach is, I believe, objective but if you like I am prepared to regard it only as a preliminary move. I recognize that in the United Kingdom, they have given a great deal of consideration to it and they put a provision in their bill allowing for expert evidence. We will watch the experience there and we will also carefully watch the experience here and we will be prepared to reconsider the matter in the light of the experience.

Mr. Pearson: As far as I am concerned I merely wish to add that, with the minister's explanation, I am prepared to support the clause as it stands and I hope it will have the effect that we all desire.

(Translation):

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, as was indicated by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Pearson), a member should not be reproached with slowing down the proceedings if he chooses to make a few remarks.

Upon receiving both versions, the French and the English, I looked through them carefully, and found that the English version said this:

(Text):

Any publication a dominant characteristic—

(Translation):

Whereas in French, I found this:

—publication dont la caractéristique dominante—

I must say I found the English version much more air-tight, because, contrary to my belief, the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Eudes) has indicated that there is not merely one dominant characteristic. A moment ago the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) gave an illustration that might perhaps be carried a bit further. Take a painting representing the sea and the sky. You might ask a man to stand before that painting and tell you what, in his estimation, is the dominant characteristic of the picture. Now for that particular individual it might perhaps be the blue of the sky, or the green of the sea, or again the green of the mountains; it would all depend on the individual concerned, on his frame of mind, his tastes, etc. He would say what, in his view, is the dominant characteristic. However, on the basis of the French version, the crown attorney might feel that the dominant characteristic is one thing, while the attorney for the defence, if he is a better attorney, could prove that the dominant characteristic is this or that other thing whereas, in fact, neither characteristic might have occurred to the person having the publications in his possession, because the dominant characteristic is appreciated on the basis of an individual's education, culture and outlook.

That is why I am of the opinion that the present English version, as well as the French version—which will probably be corrected—do more justice than the previous ones.

One might then conclude that in the text or picture there may be more than one characteristic which are precisely of the nature referred to in section 11.

Now, in the second place, I believe that amendment proposed by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) is unwarranted, first because of the reasons outlined by the Minister of Justice, and then, one must not forget that we are dealing with a matter covered by the Criminal Code and that the mens rea, criminal intent, must be established. If a scientist should be brought to court for utilizing or having in his possession one of those publications, we still have to prove that, having those publications in hand, he had some criminal intent; unless that is proven there can be no proof of the offence with which he is charged.

Furthermore, as the Minister of Justice said a moment ago, if the matter involves no danger for the public welfare, the common weal, the accused cannot be found guilty.

Now, in closing, I suggest it is extremely difficult to find a definition of obscenity. I listened to the article read into the record by the hon. member for Nickel-Belt (Mr. Godin) and I must say that even the authors of that article, the editors of that magazine, who tried to devise a definition, failed in the attempt.

In my opinion, the definition which is being proposed today will adequately serve the needs of the population, and the Minister of Justice—

Mr. Godin: You obviously have not read the definition.

Mr. Fortin: I shall go on with my remarks, and I would ask the hon. member for Nickel-Belt to ask his question after, if he sees fit.

I say that, with experience, a way will be found to correct this definition. I think the main result of introducing this definition into the Criminal Code will be to make people who are in the habit of keeping such publications on their shelves more careful about checking to see whether the publications are obscene or not, and to make sure, before buying such publications or books, that they are not such as to sully the mind.

And if I may be allowed to express a wish, I hope that, when the definition is adopted, the C.B.C. will have proper regard for it in the production of their TV programs.

(Text):

Mr. Godin: Mr. Chairman, I would like to remind the hon. member who has just spoken that he brought in the matter of mens rea. If he reads section 150 of the code as it now stands he will see that mens rea is not a matter for consideration in this crime. Subsection 6 of section 150 of the code reads:

> Where an accused is charged with an offence under subsection (1) the fact that the accused was ignorant of the nature or presence of the matter, picture, model, phonograph record, crime comic or other thing by means of or in relation to which the offence was committed is not a defence to the charge.

Amendment (Mr. Fisher) negatived: Yeas, 4; Nays, 76.

Mr. Fulton: Then, Mr. Chairman, in pursuance of the explanation I made earlier I shall ask one of my colleagues to move that clause 11 of the French version of Bill C-58, be amended by deleting the word "la" where it appears at line 13 on page 4 of the said version and substituting therefor the word "une". I shall ask my colleague the Minister of Veterans Affairs to move that.

Mr. Brooks: I so move.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the minister explain what the significance of the amendment is?

Mr. Fulton: The significance of the amendment is to bring the French version into line with the English version, in accordance with the vote of the committee which has just been taken.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Godin: I should like the minister to explain how the courts are going to use the definition on matters other than publications?

Mr. Fulton: I am sorry, but I did not catch the question.

Mr. Godin: The amendment by subsection 8 of section 150 seems to apply to publications only and I fail to see, in the absence of any explanation by the minister, how other matters which may be obscene, such as articles, could be covered by this definition.

Mr. Fulton: I think that will be done because section 150, subsection 1, of the Criminal Code reads as follows:

> Everyone commits an offence who
> (a) makes, prints, publishes, distributes, circulates, or has in his possession for the purpose of publication, distribution or circulation any obscene written matter, picture, model, phonograph record or other thing whatsoever,

Just by reference to the word "publication" in subsection 1 of section 150, I believe the use of the word "publication" in the new subsection 8 to be added to section 150, will extend the coverage of the section to include pictures or phonograph records, because it is obvious that what is contemplated now by section 150 is the publication of phonograph records. In the new subsection 8 we refer to publication, the dominant characteristic of which is. I think, therefore, it is most likely that the courts would understand this use of the word "publication" in connection with articles such as phonograph records.

I want to make it clear when I say that, that that is my opinion and the opinion of my legal advisers. Our primary intention, as I have made clear before, was to catch this type of trash that was appearing on the newsstands. This was our main intention and is the reason we did not add words to make it doubly certain that it would cover this other type of article which my hon. friend has in mind. If it appears on the basis of experience that we should extend this to cover such things as phonograph records, and if it appears particularly it is the desire of parliament to do so, I would be glad on another occasion to consider making it quite clear, especially if the courts do not agree with my interpretation that this includes other articles.

Mr. Godin: The minister's explanation may be true, but how would the minister explain the application in section 150A? How can you address section 150A to phonograph records?

Mr. Fulton: The answer to that, I think, must be that in this section we did not have anything in mind other than written publications. I am not nearly as certain of that as I am about the earlier section, but in this section we were concerned with written publications appearing on the newsstands.

Mr. Godin: In so far as section 150A is concerned, it is not the intention of this government to make it applicable to these other obscene matters?

Mr. Fulton: It is our intention to make it expressly applicable to the written publications which are appearing on the newsstands. We did not intend to make it non-applicable to these others, but we did have written publications particularly in mind.

Mr. Godin: Will section 150B apply if the article is other than a written publication?

Mr. Fulton: I think that is clearly confined to written publications because it uses the words, "copies of any other publication". I do not see how that could be anything other than a written publication.

Mr. Fisher: Has the minister considered specifically exempting libraries from section 150A, where it says that a judge who is satisfied by information upon oath that there are reasonable grounds for believing that any publication, copies of which are kept for sale or distribution and so on; was there any consideration given to exempting libraries from this section because they are distributors? The reason I raise the matter is that it is quite conceivable you might get—I do not want to use the word a "crackpot"—somebody who had a very narrow interest in this field, and he could make it very difficult for public libraries in relation to the books they might have on their shelves. I just wondered whether the minister had given any thought to these people?

Mr. Fulton: I do not believe it would be wise to exempt libraries from this clause. After all, a complainant will have to go to a judge and satisfy the judge that the matter is obscene. I point out here, and perhaps I should have dealt with it earlier in reply to the hon. member for Nickel Belt, that the provisions of subsection 7 make it clear that there will be no prosecution in respect of a publication found to be obscene under this section without the consent of the attorney general. It was for the purpose of preventing victimizing persons who would, in a loose sense of the word, be regarded as distributors, that we provided this quick method of getting a decision on the merits of the issue and then the prosecution with respect to these items will only be launched with the consent of the attorney general.

Mr. Fisher: If someone did have their own private collection, would it be perfectly legitimate under this section, no matter what sort of publication there was in it?

Mr. Fulton: I think the answer to that question is generally yes. I give that answer because of the wording of subclause 1 of the proposed section 150A wherein it is provided that a judge has to be satisfied.

> —that there are reasonable grounds for believing that any publication, copies of which are kept for sale or distribution in premises within the jurisdiction of the court, is obscene—
