The Canadian Import Tribunal is currently investigating whether imports of subsidized beef from the European Common Market are injurious. There have also been indications in the press and elsewhere that the Ontario Corn Producers Association intends to request a countervail investigation against corn imported from the United States. Canadian agricultural producers are acutely aware of the massive subsidies made available to the U.S. farmers by their Government. Should a countervail investigation be launched against American corn it would be the first such case involving imports from that country. Surely the Opposition would not suggest that Canadian producers should be unilaterally denied their right to seek relief from injury while the trade negotiations with the United States are under way.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let me reiterate for the benefit of the Members opposite that the Government recognizes the threat posed by U.S. countervailing duty actions for Canadian exporters. The Government has launched a major initiative to negotiate a better framework for the conduct of our trade relations with the United States. The U.S. and Canada have the most extensive business relationship in the world. Because that relationship is so large and so broadly based there are bound to be occasional scrapes and abrasions in our business with each other. There have always been and there probably always will be. A key objective of these negotiations will be to negotiate better rules to resolve our disputes. These include rules to ensure that countervailing duty actions do not impede our exports to the United States or theirs to us.

If the members of the Opposition are genuine in their concern for Canadian lumber workers, they will lend their support to this important endeavour. Let me ask them one thing, Mr. Speaker. What would be the result if the House carried this resolution? Would it resolve the softwood lumber issue? I suggest it would not. Would it resolve anything at all, or would it simply be a sterile exercise in partisan futility like an angry hockey fan shaking his fist in the stands? I ask the Members of the Opposition to consider this question seriously for the benefit of Canadians, if not for the cameras.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I found the response of the Minister of International Trade (Mr. Kelleher) to this motion to be totally unsatisfactory. The Minister talks about naive presumptions on the part of the Opposition. Yet, during the course of his comments he conveniently forgot that it is none other than the President of the United States who said, with respect to the Canadian softwood lumber problem, in his letter dated May 8, but received only yesterday: "I intend to press for an expedited resolution to this problem independent of the comprehensive negotiations. If this cannot be achieved through bilateral negotiations then I will take such action as may be necessary to resolve this problem consistent with U.S. law".

That is not an idle statement of interest by the President to the U.S. lumber industry. That is not an idle comment that he shares their concerns or empathizes with their frustration or that he understands some of the things they are talking about. That is a clear commitment: "If this cannot be achieved through bilateral negotiations then I will take such action as may be necessary to resolve this problem consistent with U.S. law".

This motion intends to place some resolve in the backbone of the Government. It even assists the Canadian administration because it allows it at least to go to the United States and play the same game south of the border as is being played with our negotiators. If the Government does not have intestinal fortitude, in the Minister's words, and does not have the basic understanding of the tough and rough poker game which is being played, to talk tough at the table, then at least carry to the U.S. administration the feelings of the Canadian Parliament and Members of that Parliament on both sides of the House in all three Parties.

I cannot believe that there are members on the Government side from the Province of British Columbia who are prepared to put a $3 billion industry and tens of thousands of jobs on the line in the hands of a special set of envoys. The last time we used envoys it was on acid rain and we all know the result. The U.S. President admitted that bird droppings do not cause acid rain. He has not yet quite determined what does.

I cannot believe we are prepared to make a separate deal on lumber which will sell our people short in order just to sit at the table of free trade talks which are not guaranteed to be successful. Is this Government determined to lose the vital softwood lumber industry of British Columbia and elsewhere as it symbolically lost the Provinces of P.E.I. and Newfoundland when it put out its free trade propaganda kit? Is that the kind of competent negotiations we are going to see?

Mr. Kelleher: Mr. Speaker, one need only look at the record of this Government to realize that it will never sell Canada short. Never will this Government sell short the lumber interests of British Columbia or any other province. We have been acting like rational people. When there is a problem we sit down and try to resolve it by discussing it with our neighbour and biggest trading partner. Surely there is nothing whatsoever wrong with that. I just do not understand the attitude of Members opposite. They do not want to sit down and discuss a problem like civilized human beings.

I would like to point out again that they do not seem to understand the import of this resolution. It is naive. If we expect for one moment that the Americans will withdraw their right to impose countervailing duties such as those imposed to date, then surely they are going to say in return, if they even considered the question seriously, "are you prepared to withdraw yours"? I ask the Hon. Member and others opposite, are they prepared for the next several years while discussions continue to withdraw our right of imposing countervailing duties against American goods which might be dumped in this country? Who in fact is selling the people of Canada short? It is certainly not Members of this Party. It is Members opposite, not this Government. We will not treat Canadians that way.

Mr. Tobin: Supplementary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have five questioners. A very short supplementary, then I will recognize the Hon. Member for Essex—Kent (Mr. Caldwell), the Hon. Member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso (Mr. O'Neil), the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis), and I will try and get the Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon) in. Please use discretion.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, the Minister's bombast and rhetoric will not hide the fact he is dragging a red herring across the floor of this House. The Government of Canada is not entering into an agreement to drop our right to impose countervailing duties if the Americans drop their right to do so. What the Government is entering into now is a bilateral negotiation by appointing trade envoys. The U.S. administration said to Canada that the price of a free trade discussion, not an agreement, is a deal on lumber. That is what is happening. The U.S. administration has singled out one particular industry, the softwood lumber industry, and said, we have to have a deal. The way we are going to get that deal is to name envoys. We are going to do a backroom political deal and you are going to pay before the talks start. The Minister knows he sold out the people of British Columbia and elsewhere who are involved in the softwood lumber industry. He has done it in the same way he gave away Newfoundland and P.E.I. on the map of Canada.

Mr. Kelleher: Mr. Speaker, again the Hon. Member has difficulty listening to me, for whatever reason. However, I will not get into that. We are not entering into negotiations with the Americans on lumber. This is a process we agreed to last December, long before the two countries ever agreed to the commencement of trade negotiations between our two countries on a bilateral basis. We have been meeting regularly since last December. Everyone knows that. It has been quite open. It has been discussed and debated in this House. Indeed, we are having another meeting tomorrow to discuss this issue. I think that is proper and sensible. I have never regarded sitting down and discussing a problem with somebody else as a giveaway or sign of weakness. I think it is a sign of maturity in this Government.

Mr. Caldwell: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister the same question I asked the Hon. Member who proposed this motion. It concerns the statement made by the President of the NDP, Marion Dewar, who indicated that a nation's economy must stop being based on the illusion that it is possible for every nation to export more than it imports. It does not add up. Does the Minister agree with that statement? Does it mean that Canada should not worry about exporting lumber and simply use it to build our own homes? As well, what would happen if we simply disregarded exports and simply imported what we needed? Would our economy suffer very much?

Mr. Kelleher: Implicit in that statement is a suggestion that Canada should indeed become fortress Canada. No country in the world can survive that way. Canada exports almost one-third of its GNP. No other country in the world except West Germany exports as much of their GNP as we do. That is why we have a standard of living almost second to none. We are an exporting nation. We have to export more than we import. If we fail to do that it will cost us thousands and thousands of jobs. Perhaps Members opposite do not care about that, but this Government does. We intend to create jobs for Canadians through trade.

Mr. O'Neil: Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Minister on his remarks and for his initiative on this important issue. It is interesting to see the two socialist Parties, appropriately seated on my left, now supporting the trade agreement with the U.S. In the first part of this debate the NDP and Liberals were against jobs for Canadians resulting from trade with the Americans. They would rather see the people of Nova Scotia and Atlantic Canada unemployed than working in factories which make products to be sold to the U.S. All this because of their dogma. These people would rather see Canadians out of work than selling products to the Americans.

The people of Nova Scotia are very pleased with the initiatives of this Government which is moving to protect the sale of fish products to the U.S., as well as the important forest industry in Nova Scotia where we export so much to the U.S. We in the Conservative Party want to keep Atlantic Canadians working. We prefer to have them employed in factories than sitting home drawing benefits from social programs.

I would like the Minister to comment on whether we have rights under the GATT and why we do not take this issue to the GATT?

Mr. Kelleher: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is quite correct. Canada does have rights under the GATT and we are exploring those rights at this time. If indeed we cannot resolve this problem with our American neighbours and they take some action that we consider harmful to our interests, then of course we would explore very carefully our rights to take action under the GATT.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, my question to the Minister concerns the proposal to have envoys discuss the matter of softwood lumber between Canada and the U.S. I would like to know the names of the provincial Ministers responsible for forests from those provinces involved in the agreement to have envoys on this issue. Will the Minister expand on exactly what will be included in the discussions between the Envoys? Does it include any limits on exports or anything related to export price? Will he name the Ministers and the provinces that have been involved in this proposal and exactly the nature of those discussions between the envoys?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Minister of International Trade has 30 seconds.

Mr. Kelleher: Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to expect a politician to say anything in 30 seconds. All I can tell you is that on Monday the provinces were involved in discussions with us on this matter. Last evening I sent telegrams to the various Ministers of Forestry and Trade. We will be discussing this further in Washington tomorrow, when I will be getting back to the Ministers of the relevant provinces. At that time we hope to have some resolution to the mandate and who the envoys might be.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The period for questions and comments is terminated. Debate.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this debate. Contrary to what the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Kelleher) would have Canadians believe, the only debates in the House on the issue of lumber and the forest industry since September, 1984, have been started by the New Democratic Party and never by the Government or the Official Opposition.

The fact that the Minister said that no countervail has been filed indicates that he is not completely aware of everything that is going on. In fact, the International Trade Commission and the Commerce Department have agreed that the clock started running yesterday in terms of the countervail action being taken in the United States against Canadian softwood. Technically, the countervail is already in process.

The Minister indicated that he has been in touch with the provinces regarding the appointment of envoys and what will be substantively discussed between the two envoys. However, it seems to fly in the face of what has really gone on in terms of this issue.

We learned today that the forest companies in the United States are proposing a $53.65 U.S. countervail duty per thousand board feet against Canadian SPF. My friend, the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis), pointed out that today wood is moving at $184.50 on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange. That represents a 29.1 per cent countervail to be taken against Canadian wood. When I toured the country last year I learned from most of the majors in this country that anything remotely above 10 per cent would put most of the mills and most of the softwood production in this country completely out of business. A 29 per cent duty would have a dire effect.

I want to point out exactly what has gone on and what has been said with respect to this issue. When our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) appeared before the Canadian Forestry Association on April 9 in Ottawa, he indicated the following:

> The Reagan Administration has agreed to the concept of a "clean launch" for the talks but some members of Congress from lumber-producing states are trying to link the broader trade discussions to the lumber dispute.

The Prime Minister goes on to say:

> I refuse to accept the proposition advanced by some in the United States that the softwood lumber issue must be resolved in favour of the United States prior to the talks beginning.

Who is the Prime Minister kidding? Either the President of the United States has not been telling our Prime Minister exactly what is going, on or our Prime Minister has not been telling Canadians exactly what has been taking place.

President Reagan's letter to Senator Robert Packwood, Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, is very blunt and clear. It runs completely contrary to what the Prime Minister has been peddling in the House and across the country. In the President's letter to Senator Packwood, dated May 8, he said:

> I am committed to finding a rapid and effective solution to the Canadian softwood lumber problem which restores for the American lumber industry a fair opportunity to compete.
> To this end, I intend to press for an expedited resolution to this problem independent of comprehensive negotiations.

We must gain an understanding of what is being said in the United States. The President has made it very clear that, if necessary, he will take actions quite independent of the comprehensive trade negotiations between Canada and the United States that are to start in the middle of next week.

There was not a clean launch and that is what the people involved in the forest industry in British Columbia have been saying in the last 48 hours. It was a dirty launch because clearly there was linkage.

Furthermore, a 10-10 tie vote in the Senate Finance Committee is about as close to a failure as one can get. According to their system, a tie goes in favour of proceeding with fast track. Furthermore, the reason there was a tie is that the President and the administration had been leaning on various Senators from Hawaii and other areas of the United States to make sure that there would be at least 10 votes.

Let us examine these developments more closely. The President promised that he would provide some kind of mechanism that would satisfy those lumber state Senators and members of Congress who were concerned about Canadian wood. The President has done that by making it clear that he will take unilateral trade action if the bilateral lumber talks fail.

What did our first Minister in Washington, Mr. Roy, have to say yesterday? He is very knowledgeable about this issue and said that this envoy offer has not been officially presented to the United States adminstration, but is not expected to include Canadian concessions to limit exports or raise the export price. That is exactly what I hope he would say. However, it seems that the Government has not really understood this process which has been going on for so long.

Last year I accompanied an all-Party delegation to Washington where we met every member of the House and the Senate who had any kind of protectionist legislation related to the forest industry. All of us returned to Ottawa with the firm understanding that some very strong action would be taken by the United States. There was only one solution to that problem then, but unfortunately we do not have enough time left to take the intelligent option the Government should have used. That option which I presented almost a year ago in the House was to convince those in the United States, who could impress upon Republicans and Democrats, that it is important to maintain the relationship we have on wood because Americans buy Canadian SPF preferentially at a higher price because it is a better product. They also buy it preferentially because our market involvement has tracked the U.S. dollar absolutely parallel for a number of years, to the point where we are at 33 per cent or 34 per cent.

Who is kidding who? Either the Prime Minister knew that there would be this kind of linkage or the President did not tell him. If that is the kind of relationship the Prime Minister has with the President, I am not sure where these so-called trade negotiations will lead this country.

The Senate Finance Committee made it clear that it intends to fully maintain the power of countervail. It has made no indication that any of that will be on the table in relation to this deal.

Let us examine this issue seriously. This is the largest industry in Canada which has had absolute free trade with the United States for half a century. The President of the United States is saying that this big ticket free trade item will have to be dealt with before free trade negotiations begin. He is saying that the Americans will have to bring a countervail against it in order to bring Canadians to their senses.

The Government should have been considering all kinds of information but has not been doing so carefully enough. Sam Gibbons has a Bill before the U.S. Congress which I believe is very likely to be the trigger mechanism in the present process. In an interview last February he said:

> We ought to come to the rule of law instead of putting the ambassador in the terrible position of having to negotiate.

That is in relation to wood. The article goes on to say:

> While Yeutter said the U.S. administration will keep plugging away with "blood, sweat and tears" to resolve what he called the unglamorous lumber dispute, Gibbons said the matter should be settled through legislation, not negotiations.

It appears that this is what is likely to occur. That is what Sam Gibbons said to me two months ago. Some time in late May or June his Bill, or some omnibus Bill like it, will move to the floor of Congress and will move on through. I think now the deal will likely be that the President of the United States will get the Republicans to fully endorse and put their support behind that kind of omnibus Bill.

I find it preposterous that the Government has done nothing about such an important industry. It continues to say there was a clean launch, but there was not a clean launch. It is very clear now from what the President of the United States is saying that at least in his mind—because he was putting pressure on members of the Senate Finance Committee the day of the 10-10 vote—he knew full well there was no intention of going forward with a clean launch. Now we know there was not.

Let us take a look at the industry which is now at such great risk and examine what the implications are likely to be. It is amazing to find out from discussions I have had with the two Ministers, the Minister of State for Forestry (Mr. Merrithew) and the Minister for International Trade, that there is no study being done even now of the impact or implications of a countervail, or of the changes proposed in the Gibbons Bill, or of any of the independent postures referred to by the President of the United States.

This is the largest industry in Canada which employs directly 300,000 persons and indirectly another 700,000 persons. We have the largest single industry which is worth $26 billion per year. We know it has troubles with insects, forest fires, over cutting, bad provincial replanting programs, and so on, but the fact is the federal Government is supposed to carry the ball on these kinds of issues. The Prime Minister and the Government have clearly dropped the ball on this issue. This is the most important free trade issue Canada has, and our Government is allowing it to slip through its fingers. It continues to make concessions.

This Friday, I understand, the Bill to spend a couple of hundred million dollars on generic drugs will be reintroduced. That is something else the U.S. wants, so it gets it. The last time we had envoys on acid rain, as my friend in the New Democratic Party pointed out, the former Premier of Ontario gave us zip. He gave us absolutely nothing on acid rain. Whatever happened to cleaning up the Niagara River? What has happened on a lot of other bilateral disputes? Nothing.

The Minister has the audacity to rise in this House and say the softwood issue is a serious problem. The reason it has become a problem is that he and his Department, and his colleagues in Cabinet, have done nothing about it. The U.S. pushes the button; the United States says it is a problem and all of a sudden, bing, he stands up in the House and reads another pre-typed speech saying it is a serious problem. When Canadians have a problem with the United States it is very rarely even raised in the United States. No one in the United States Congress ever stands and says this is a terrible problem. I wonder who is writing these speeches for the Minister. Perhaps he simply does not understand what this issue is all about.

I would like to put on the record a few reasons why this is such an important issue and why it is going to continue to be raised, and hopefully we will bring about some action from the Government. Seventy two per cent of our exported softwood goes to the United States, 12 per cent goes to Europe and 6 per cent to Japan. Our net trade surplus last year from softwood was $11 billion. Right now we hold 33 per cent to 34 per cent of the U.S. market. That has traditionally been about the amount of the U.S. market we have held. It has been free for over 40 years. We have had fully free trade between Canada and the United States. Yet on the eve of the so-called "free trade" negotiations" with the United States, our largest freely traded commodity is what is under attack by the Reagan administration. Has anyone not woken up to that yet? I just cannot believe Hon. Members on the Government side think these so-called "free trade" negotiations are going to go anywhere when our largest most consistently freely traded commodity is what is under attack.

We exported $3.3 billion in softwood to the United States last year. The overwhelming majority of that softwood came from British Columbia. It reached the point in some States such as Georgia, which is why there is a political issue being raised in the U.S., where 50 per cent of the wood used is spruce, pine, and fir number one from British Columbia. Again, it is exchange rates which are at the root of this problem and the fact that consumers in the United States, particularly contractors, preferentially purchase our SPF, particularly over southern yellow pine.

I want to deal now, Mr. Speaker, with why what is happening is a carefully calculated execution by the United States. It is not something which has suddenly been popped on us, although I am sure many journalists, when a Bill is finally passed through Congress in the next six weeks, will say: "Good grief, how did this get popped on us? We suddenly have this Gibbons Bill on our backs. How can this happen? Tens of thousands of Canadian workers are going to be put out of work and we have to come up with a dramatic new budget and new ways of dealing with this problem", and all of this kind of gobbledygook.

We have known for a long time that this was a serious political issue in the United States and we have done nothing serious to deal with it. We have had the little tour to Prince George. We have talked about the size of plywood and what kinds of insect repellants we are putting on the ends of two-by-fours, and so on, but we have not got down to the brass tacks of dealing with the United States in a way it expects every other country in the world to deal with it. We have to get our message across.

The present administration of the Conservative Government has simply not done the job. What other country in the world would not have a Minister directly responsible for the largest industry in its country? Only Canada. What kind of Cabinet would agree to only allow a very hard working Minister $500,000 in his budget to deal with this issue? I have talked to the Minister's Department and he only received less than a half a person year to deal with this issue. I do not want to condemn carte blanche how many other Ministers are left in Cabinet, they have been dropping so fast. How many is it now, Mr. Speaker, 38?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Reisman got $500,000 for his office.

Mr. Fulton: That is right. That is just for office rent. Why would the rest of Cabinet not support someone who understands the industry and really wants to get out there and protect it? Why would the Government not give him any money or an opportunity to have his views brought to the United States where they could actually have some impact?

Let me deal once again with the issue of studies which the Government has not done and steps which should have been taken to deal with this issue. We have seen countervailing action effectively taken against hogs, blocking them from the U.S. market. We have seen that happen to our fish, 5.8 per cent on whole groundfish. We have seen this happen to berries, steel and all kinds of commodities. The Government has not responded, in my view, the way it should. Our workers in the forest sector, and the forest industry, have spent over $10 million lobbying on this issue in Washington while our own Government has done almost nothing. It certainly has not given the right kind of tools to our trade consulates to use in the United States. Why would our Government not do any studies on what kind of effect different options which a large trading neighbour was planning to take against it would have? Why would it not undertake an evaluation so it could determine what kinds of steps it should be taking itself?

I suppose the envoy proposal will go ahead. It's a way of buying a little time. Someone will be appointed and that person will meet with a well known American. They will drink a little champagne and eat some caviar and agree they are good pals. Our envoy will come back and make some kind of proposal in order to buy a week or two weeks of time. But the President of the United States has made it clear to the U.S. Senate Finance Committee, and to Republicans and Democrats in the United States, that there is a timetable on this issue. The countervailing duty process started yesterday.

The Minister says the envoy is going to go to Washington tomorrow. He sent telegrams out to the Forest Ministers last night. That is all very marvellous. But the fact is, if you want to know what is going to happen, Mr. Speaker, this process may go ahead through the existing countervailing process because there have already been changes. Since the administration has accepted it, it may move along fairly quickly. It may be moved forward and they may come up with a countervail. However, if those key people such as Packwood and Gibbons, and others in the United States, do not think going that countervailing route will be significant enough to protect them from the politics about which I am speaking, the grassroots politics—they have large amounts of unemployment in their states, although it is nowhere near as high as what we have or have had in recent years as a result of technological change—the Gibbons Bill will move forward. It is an omnibus bill directed to resource subsidies. It will have direct support from the President, the administration and the Republicans. It already has the support of most of the Democrats. So those are the two scenarios. There is the countervail scenario, or a countervail approach through new legislation, which seems to be the preferred route.

I must say that I was sorry to hear the speech by the Minister for International Trade. I think this issue is far more significant and far more ominous than his speech writer obviously felt last night while he was writing it. I hope that the Minister of State for Forestry will have more to say on the dilemma in which we are now involved.

Even the head of the Canada Lumbermen's Association predicts that 75,000 more jobs will be lost. These are the jobs of buckers, fallers, skidder operators—people who work in the bush. I am not talking about secondary and tertiary industry. We are facing a very dire dilemma. Either the President of the United States has gone back on his word or our Prime Minister has not told all. In either case our forest industry faces a very serious and debilitating situation with a near 30 per cent countervail proposal coming through the Department of Commerce.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Are there questions or comments? The Hon. Member for Sarnia—Lambton (Mr. James).

Mr. James: Mr. Speaker, I guess I am a little confused as to where the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) is coming from. He seems to be arguing in many different ways. First, it is as if we had never heard that the U.S. industry has maintained that our stumpage policies were not advantageous. That is not new. It has been going on for years. It is something about which we have fought. To listen to the Hon. Member it is almost as if the Government brought it on. The Hon. Member seems to be tying this matter to the bilateral trade negotiations. Just last night the Deputy Chief Negotiator, Mr. Ritchie, reconfirmed that it is a very separate and distinct negotiating situation. It has nothing to do with the preparation for bilateral negotiations.

The Hon. Member refers to going down to the U.S. and having consultations. Yet he does not seem to want us to consult with the U.S. and negotiate. The Hon. Member cannot have it both ways. Perhaps it is because I am new here and the Hon. Member has been here longer than I that there does not seem to me to be any direction to all this.

The Hon. Member is blaming the current Government for not selling the lumber issue, which is a very important issue. On the other side of his discussion he says we should not be negotiating with the U.S. on settling our trade situation. I think the Hon. Member knows that even in the current situation under GATT there can be countervail even when there are free duties. We have repeatedly said that one of the very important reasons for getting into a negotiated agreement with the U.S. is to settle the countervail situation. That is what the Hon. Member has said is so very important. He has said that the Minister did not say it was important enough. The Minister has repeatedly said that countervail is one of the main concerns we have, and one which we should be settling in a negotiated agreement. Perhaps the Hon. Member will set me straight as to where in the world he is coming from.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to deal with the Hon. Member's questions regarding the 1982 countervail situation which the Canadian forest industry was successful in beating back. As the Hon. Member likely knows, in that case there was what is known as a de minimus ruling. This means that the amount of subsidy found in the Canadian industry was less than 1 per cent, thus no countervail was forthcoming. What the Hon. Member is likely unaware of is that the rules of the game have dramatically changed since that countervail process took place. In fact, it will now be a much more difficult case for the Canadian industry to deal with as a defendant as effectively as was the case three years ago. I know that people in the Canadian forest industry to whom I have spoken are much more worried about the countervail clock which started running yesterday than they were three years ago.

In relation to the U.S. Senate Finance Committee, I am sure the Hon. Member is aware that it has made it very clear that it is the intention of the committee to fully maintain the powers of countervail in relation to the International Trade Commission. The committee has made it clear that that is quite a separate issue, apart from the bilateral trade negotiations which were supposed to start next week in the United States. I am surprised that the Hon. Member is not aware of these two matters.

In relation to the Government not selling this issue in the United States, I think that will be found to be true by the historians who will take a look at this issue this fall. Once the fall-out comes home to roost here it will be found that that in fact was the largest single oversight of the Government in relation to the whole issue. It was raised with me by senior people at our embassy in Washington. It has been raised with me by senior observers far closer to the issue than I. It has been pointed out that the largest single problem has been that there has never been a lobbying effort, or as many lobbying firms working on Capitol Hill in Washington as there have been working for the Coalition for Fair Lumber Imports in Washington. Tens of millions of dollars have been spent on that effort. Our industry has spent $10 million in Washington to try to deal with this issue. There has not been a two-tiered approach to the issue in the United States. There have not been well-informed trade initiatives and good spokespeople going to the radios, public meetings, et cetera, dealing with state and federal legislators in states such as Georgia where this is a very important issue.

This was pointed out to me by Senator Mack Mattingly at a meeting just six weeks ago when he said: "Look, Fulton, if you were standing up in Prince Rupert and 50 per cent of the wood being used in your constituency was from Georgia and you had lines of fallers, buckers and skidder operators outside your constituency office, what would you be saying about Georgian wood?" I said that I understood that. I told the man that I was not born at six o'clock that morning and that I understand that type of politics. I understand how lobbyists work in the United States.

What we have not become aware of is the fact that lobbyists in the United States are efficient and effective. I am not saying that this is just a problem of this Government. It is something which has gone on for more than a decade in the country. I am not just referring to lobbyists on Capitol Hill. They fan out through ads in magazines, radio and television. They get to legislators. We should have gone to those states and put forward the position that our wood is preferentially purchased and that it is a better wood. The reason for the prices is that we have been tracking the U.S. dollar. These are powerful, accurate and substantiated arguments which we should have put forward. It is exchange rate oriented as opposed to subsidy oriented.

On the other side of the coin, some 75 per cent of our gross trade is with the United States while some 25 per cent of that country's trade is with us. Some two million Americans go to work with their lunch pails every morning and come home every night with a pay ticket which is directed related to the commodity they are making which is sold in Canada. These people are easy to identify. We should have gone to them and we should have said: "Look, here is a freely traded commodity. It is preferentially purchased in your country and there is a lot of hogwash being peddled by Democrats and Republicans on the grassroots politics of the issue". I think the largest single failure has been that we have not gotten that message out as clearly as we should have gotten it out.

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, when the Minister of International Trade was on his feet he suggested that we won the countervail case in 1983. I think what he was really telling us is that we should not be worried because we won it in 1983 and we will win it again. Personally, I see that the circumstances have dramatically changed. I say this because of the U.S. Commerce Department's interpretation of what compromises an unfair trading practice, by the omnibus bill in the United States today, the trade bill, and in other areas as well, including the president's letter and his implicit support. I am not convinced of the view the Minister seems to be putting forward, that in the final analysis if nothing else works they will make a countervail complaint again and we will win again. That is nothing but a recipe for a very unpleasant surprise for the Minister and the Government.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is quite correct. The rules of the game have been substantially changed. I do not think we should look in isolation at the countervail clock on wood which started running as of yesterday, without looking at the matter of fish. I say this because the 5.8 per cent which has been taken against whole groundfish is well worth taking a close look at. If it is taken against the whole fish—and the overwhelming majority, some 85 per cent, of provincial and federal subsidies have gone to processing plants—and not against the filets, then it is a matter of politics. There is a large dose of politics coming our way, both in terms of the countervail clock which is running and the Gibbons bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to inform the Hon. Member that his time has expired. When the debate resumes I will recognize the Hon. Member for Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin).

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

BAN ON PUBLIC ACCESS TO RESIDENCY GROUNDS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, every year, the magnificent gardens at the residence of Canada's Governor General attract thousands of visitors from all parts of Canada and from all over the world.

Rideau Hall, a symbolic institution dear to the hearts of Canadian men and women, has seen many people walk through its gates to admire this splendid residence or simply for the pleasure of walking on the Governor General's lawn.

A decision has now been made to restrict access to the public areas of Rideau Hall to groups that have received prior authorization. The only justification given as yet has been the possibility that the safety of the Governor General of Canada might be at risk. If that is the case, I fail to understand why, in 1986, here in Canada, we cannot both protect our head of State and provide access to this lovely expanse of green that belongs to Canadians.

It would be unfortunate if because of fear of some incident, we were to restrict our freedom, our civility and the long tradition we have in this country of encouraging people to move freely—

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

DENIAL OF PUBLIC SERVICE TELEVISION LICENCE IN MANITOBA

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have to raise concerns regarding the decision made by the CRTC to deny a licence to a community based non-profit organization in favour of yet another commercial television station in southern Manitoba. This is an important matter because the winner of the fourth English-language service in southern Manitoba is receiving the last available VHF station. The decision means that Manitoba will be the only province west of the Maritimes not to have a public television station.

The board which made the Manitoba public television application includes representatives of two universities, the mayor, the President of Great West Life, representatives of native and multicultural organizations, as well as other private interests. The CRTC states that it supports the concept of wide ethnic and community involvement in proposed programming but could not appreciate the fact that a community based station could not give the same financial guarantees, at least initially. Undoubtedly there were pros and cons for each application but I have to express my concern that so little attention was paid to the public—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Sixty seconds.

ABORTION

ADVERTISEMENT SEEKING STAFF FOR TORONTO ABORTION CLINIC

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, a harmless classified employment ad in this weekend's Toronto Star offered positions for two counsellors and three nurses. The employers wanted warm, caring applicants with a sense of humour. There is nothing unusual about a job offer like this except that this one was from Toronto's second free standing abortion clinic.

Dr. Robert Scott was charged along with Henry Morgentaler for the operation of Toronto's Harbord Street abortion clinic. Although these doctors openly acknowledge their violation of the Criminal Code's abortion provisions, Dr. Scott obviously feels that he has a green light to perform abortions with utter impunity.

If a criminal offence can be promoted without any response from either the police or legislators, then our country should ask itself why it bothers to have laws at all. The answer to that question is obvious. We have laws to protect those who cannot protect themselves, in this case, defenceless babies in their mothers' wombs. It is time for Parliament to make sure that our laws are enforced.

MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

CRITICISM OF BEHAVIOUR

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people are not amused. In fact the childish conduct of Members of Parliament, both in the House and in committee, leaves Canadians justifiably disillusioned and disgusted.

No one will deny that careful analysis, perceptive and probing questioning, and lively debate are the legitimate tools of any Member of Parliament. However, when analysis becomes innuendo, questioning deteriorates into thinly disguised accusations, and debate degenerates into a pathetic, egotistical free-for-all, then Members have abused their privileges and abdicated their responsibilities.

It is essential that we remember who we are, where we are, and why we are here. Surely all Members want Canadians to be proud of their democratic institutions and of their elected representatives. Therefore, I urge all of us to render ourselves more worthy of this House by demonstrating greater respect and common human decency.

THE ADMINISTRATION

CONFLICT OF INTEREST GUIDELINES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, on September 9, 1985, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) sent an open letter to Members of Parliament and Senators. He also made what was affectionately known in the House as his deathbed repentance speech on patronage. In the letter that he sent to Members of Parliament, he said the following concerning the conflict of interest guidelines:

> In carrying out that responsibility the Government is directly accountable to Parliament and through Parliament to the people of Canada. You will find no quasi-independent agencies in this Code that will allow the Government to shirk its responsibility by saying that the problem belongs to someone else.

• (1405)

Some eight months later the Government and the Prime Minister once again betrayed the people of Canada.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

IMPORTANCE OF SUMMITS AS MODELS FOR DISCUSSION

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, last weekend, the Outaouais Socio-Economic Summit was held at Mont Sainte-Marie. For nearly 18 months, participants from the Papineau area in my riding have been preparing development plans and asking their provincial and federal representatives for help in implementing projects such as Highway 50, the potato packaging co-operative, Oueskarini Park, the Centre d'observation de courte durée, Fromagerie Agrodor, the Papineauville gymnasium, and so forth.

Mr. Speaker, all these people have volunteered their time to help improve the economy of their community. Of course, many projects will not be carried out right away, but this fine show of consultation and co-operation has given all parties involved in the Outaouais a chance to get to know each other and express their needs.

This is an experiment that bears repeating, because I think these summits are an excellent way to avoid wasting time and money. I earnestly hope that the federal Government will consider this kind of regional consultation as a model for discussions with the provinces.

YOUTH

PROPOSED YOUTH GUARANTEE PROGRAM

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, for Canada, unquestionably the richest country in the world, to have so many of our young people out of work is nothing short of immoral. The Government should not tolerate any youth unemployment in Canada. It would be well advised to initiate the proposal put forward recently by the Leader of the New Democratic Party in British Columbia who proposed a youth guarantee program which would guarantee every young person in British Columbia a choice of a full-time education, full-time training, or the opportunity for full-time steady employment. It virtually guarantees the young people of British Columbia a minimum of two years of full-time educational or on-the-job training, or a full-time job.

The $150 million cost of implementing such a program would result in more personal taxes being paid, in more sales taxes being collected, in more corporate taxes being paid, and in more excise taxes being collected. In the end it would actually be cost effective for the Government of Canada.

To have so many of our youth on UIC, welfare, or jobless, must be considered intolerable and unacceptable. The program which Bob Skelly suggests for British Columbia young people should be implemented across Canada forthwith.

FISHERIES

STORM DAMAGE SUFFERED BY FISHERMEN IN NOVA SCOTIA

Mr. Lawrence I. O'Neil (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I rise to draw the attention of all Hon. Members of the House to special problems being experienced by Nova Scotia fishermen.

Over the weekend a storm damaged the boats and gear of fishermen in the region. I urge the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon) to do all possible to ensure that his Department responds quickly to these special circumstances. Fishermen in my riding are just getting their fishing efforts under way and have been hit with this major set-back.

A second major problem for area fishermen is the absence of sufficient quota to ensure a full season of fishing. An agreement must be reached with the mobile fleets to ensure that fishermen living and fishing in 4 VSW are left some quota. Perhaps trip limits are the answer. I urge the Department of Fisheries to direct its officials to find an answer to this serious problem.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

SITUATION IN MONTREAL—NEED FOR HELP FROM INTERESTED GROUPS

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval): Mr. Speaker, although over 40,000 jobs were created in Montreal in the last twelve months and the unemployment rate has gone down by 1.2 per cent, the Montreal region is still suffering the effects of an imbalance in economic development compared with other regions. To correct the situation we need the help of people in the community. The economic partners of our governments must make a commitment and get involved. Governments alone cannot do everything.

Montreal's economy will recover only if its leaders want it to recover. For instance, in Quebec, automobile production accounts for only 5 per cent, while the province buys more than 43 per cent of the automobiles produced in Canada. It is unthinkable that a country as industrialized as ours should not have a domestic automobile industry, spread equitably across the country. Why isn't Canada's automobile industry expanding? That is the question we must ask ourselves. We should stop expecting governments to do everything. Let's act now and the rest will take care of itself.

PLANNED PARENTHOOD

ADOLESCENT PREGNANCY STUDY

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with all Canadians the results of an important study on adolescent pregnancy by Planned Parenthood of Ontario, entitled "Progress in Prevention".

[Translation]

The study's findings demonstrate how useful preventive action is. Sex education for children and family planning clinics are a must if we are to stop teenage pregnancies.

The study shows that access to voluntary termination of pregnancy services has not increased sexual irresponsibility and has not caused adolescent pregnancy to rise.

The authors of "Progress in Prevention" prove that the costs of not reducing adolescent pregnancy are enormous.

Government attempts to reduce the deficit by making cuts in preventive programs are self-defeating.

HEALTH

ORGAN TRANSPLANT DONATIONS—SUGGESTED CENTRAL REGISTRY

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, recent attention focused on the donation of human organs for transplantation has shed light on a serious defect in the process. At present many Canadians complete a donation card but fail to notify their family members or personal representatives. The consequence is that in many tragic deaths no steps are taken to implement the donation.

There is a simple solution. Organ donations could be recorded with the Canadian Police Information Centre and the donor fully identified. There is access to CPIC all day, every day, through police forces across the land. All that is needed is the authorization of the Solicitor General (Mr. Beatty) and the police authorities.

Let's make it easy to give the gift of life.

AIR TRANSPORT

PURCHASE OF AIRCRAFT FROM SOUTH AFRICA BY WARDAIR

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my office has confirmed with Wardair its purchase of three South African jumbo jets and that delivery is expected in August of this year.

On September 13, 1985, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) announced an embargo on air transport between South Africa and Canada. How then are these planes to get here? Is it possible that Wardair is unaware of the embargo, or are we unaware of some convenient arrangement that Wardair has with the Government?

We have ample evidence in recent weeks of Tory cronyism transcending principle. Will this be another example?

SHIPYARDS

NEED FOR RATIONALIZATION POLICY

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Mr. Speaker, Canada's shipyards are facing a serious crisis. It is becoming increasingly clear to all parties concerned, whether they belong to the public sector, the private sector or labour, that a rationalization policy is necessary. I hope such a policy will be based on the fundamental principle this Government has always defended, namely that of free enterprise. In fact, any other approach would merely serve to extend the life of the "lame ducks", to the detriment of shipyards that are already reasonably competitive.

Mr. Speaker, in the past, Governments that were more concerned about their voters than about providing this country with sound economic management had no qualms about controlling the way government contracts were awarded. This solution is no longer acceptable today, and I think that from now on, the process of awarding contracts should be based on the free market system and thus on the fundamental principle, in a capitalist system, of having the right to bid on a contract.

AGRICULTURE

GOVERNMENT'S PERFORMANCE

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, for 20 months this Government has been taking some very important measures in the agricultural industry. From assistance to drought-stricken farmers to establishing a new dairy policy and abolishing all federal taxes on fuel for family farms, our Government has shown a depth of understanding never seen before in Canada. The new measures adopted by the Farm Credit Corporation were well received by farmers in Beauce, Quebec and Canada. Speaking of farm credit, the Liberals strangled many farmers with their exorbitant interest rates. Just look at the number of farm bankruptcies caused by the federal Liberals' failure to understand the problem.

A number of sound measures were taken recently by this Government and there are more to come. As a Conservative Member, I believe in the future of the agricultural industry, and we are doing what is necessary to help this industry prosper. Beauce farmers can count on my co-operation and understanding.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INVITATION TO QUEBEC TO ADHERE TO CONSTITUTION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Hon. Members will recall that last Friday, Mr. Rémillard, Quebec Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, made a new proposal to the federal Government that would bring Quebec closer to signing the Canadian Constitution. Unfortunately, contrary to what the Prime Minister promised during the last election campaign, this elicited an immediate refusal from the Secretary of State. Mr. Speaker, one of the requests made by the Government of Quebec was that the Government withdraw Bill C-96, whose purpose is to penalize the provinces.

I therefore urge the Prime Minister and all Members from Quebec to think about this question and make sure they do everything they can so that Quebec adheres to the new Constitution.

PRESIDENT'S OPINION OF NEAT TO BE DEAD SONG

Mr. Bob Pennock (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Communications (Mr. Masse) asked the President of the CBC to reply to my allegations that the song Neat to be Dead could encourage teenage suicide. In response to my charges Mr. Juneau wrote, without seeking professional opinion:

I find it hard to believe that curiosity about this fundamental human question translates into an invitation to teenage suicide.

You may find it hard to believe, Mr. Juneau, but let me quote from the written opinions of two doctors who specialize in this field. First, Dr. Huessman wrote:

It is clear that highly publicized suicides increase the likelihood of others committing suicide.

● (1415)

Dr. Marshall wrote:

It is my professional opinion that the material in "What It's Like to be Dead" could possibly stimulate a seriously discouraged teenager to act upon his suicidal thoughts.

Mr. Juneau, you acted irresponsibly by not seeking professional advice before you replied. You now owe it to the people of Canada to demand that this song not be aired again.

RESIGNATION OF FORMER MINISTER OF REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION—APPOINTMENT OF INVESTIGATOR

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. He has been a Member of the House for a long time and knows that issues of ministerial responsibility are better left to Parliament. Yet the Prime Minister is suggesting that he is going to appoint an outside inquiry to deal with the conduct of the former Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion.

Why would the Prime Minister announce such an outside inquiry, which he says will be impartial, while saying in the same breath that he is fully confident that the former Minister will be vindicated? Would the Deputy Prime Minister not agree with me that that statement of the Prime Minister already undermines the confidence of Canadians in any such outside inquiry?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it should come as no surprise to the hon. gentleman that we are breaking new ground here.

Mr. Broadbent: Yeah, right.

Mr. Nielsen: That was quite evident last September 9 when the whole package with respect to the Code of Conduct was tabled, and in the open letter to Members and Senators, which was signed by the Prime Minister, explaining that circumstances may arise from time to time which would warrant the appointment of an impartial person to investigate the facts in given circumstances. It is no news that that new proposal was there. The hon. gentleman has had a long time between last September and now to comment on it. I suggest to him that, in light of all the circumstances, this is the best way to proceed for this institution itself.

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has reasserted his opinion that the Minister has done nothing wrong and that he will be able to resume his post in Cabinet. On what as yet unpublished facts is the Prime Minister's opinion based? And if there are new developments, why doesn't the Prime Minister of Canada reveal them, so that all Canadians will know what they are?

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): It is precisely for that reason, Sir, that the impartial person is being sought for the purpose of conducting the investigation, a process which was explained last September. The hon. gentleman, as a former Prime Minister and the present Leader of the Opposition, should be the first to realize that the bitter and very highly partisan atmosphere which now surrounds this matter is a circumstance which compels one to the conclusion that the only impartial method of dealing with the matter is by the process contemplated last September.

PRIME MINISTER'S KNOWLEDGE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister is making a prejudgment about the reputation of the Hon. Member for York Peel being vindicated, why would he not have shared those facts with the House of Commons or allowed the Minister, as he then was, to make such a statement? What facts does the Prime Minister have, that Canadians generally do not know about, which affect the situation?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Sir, it is not I who is prejudging, it is the hon. gentleman by the very nature of his question.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The Prime Minister is prejudging.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. gentleman has a responsibility, as Leader of his Party, to ensure the proper standards of conduct by some members of his own caucus with respect to this institution and its committees.

Mr. Gauthier: We'll look after that, Erik, thank you very much. We don't need you to tell us what to do. Look after your own.

Mr. Andre: When are you going to start?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Order!

Oral Questions

CONDUCT OF INQUIRY

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Acting Prime Minister. He tells us that new ground is being broken in the use of this impartial inquiry. The Prime Minister is picking the commissioner. The Prime Minister is setting the terms of reference. Yet the Prime Minister is also telegraphing the fact that his Minister will be vindicated and brought back into the Cabinet. How can you possibly break new ground and have an impartial inquiry with that kind of prejudgment by the Prime Minister?

• (1420)

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman should know, he has been here long enough, and certainly his Leader knows, that we are dealing with a unique and exclusive responsibility of the Prime Minister concerning conflict of interest. He should also know or have concluded, if he has not by now, that whatever the report of that inquiry, it will be made public. There is that safeguard as well.

PRIME MINISTER'S OPINION

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Will the Prime Minister make public the reason, the facts he has, which justify saying, as he did in Korea, that the Minister will be vindicated and brought back into cabinet? What was he talking about?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): There is no analogy there at all. The former Minister has said and continues to say the same thing. It is only Members opposite who are foreclosing any option other than guilt. Their minds are closed to any other possibility. That in itself demonstrates the compelling need for impartiality.

PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, surely what we are talking about here are impartiality and fairmindedness. When I asked him yesterday quite deliberately whether he and the Prime Minister maintained their view that the former Minister was innocent of conflict of interest, the Deputy Prime Minister said both he and the Prime Minister "would not prejudge the outcome of the inquiry". Is that answer consistent with the view expressed by the Prime Minister last night in Seoul, Korea, when speaking to the media, that he was convinced at the outset, before the evidence is even considered, that the Minister would be totally vindicated? Are you loading the dice in advance in this inquiry?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): I said no such thing. What I was trying to convey to the Leader of the NDP, in response to questions by his supporters and those of the right hon. gentleman opposite, was that they should have the decency to allow a process of impartial investigation to proceed without loading the dice, which they obviously want to do.

PRIME MINISTER'S FORECAST

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, we on this side are quite happy to have what the Deputy Prime Minister supported when he was on this side, namely, a consideration by the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure. It is not we who are loading the dice.

Does he not think that a Prime Minister who is trying to get an impartial, fair-minded person to look at this is really loading the dice and establishing a prejudicial position? Is he not doing that when he says at the outset that the Minister is going to be vindicated? That is loading the dice.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Not at all. Implicit in the question is the assumption that nowhere in this country can there be found a person of sufficient national reputation and integrity to conduct an impartial investigation as to the facts. I do not accept that whatsoever.

Mr. Broadbent: It would be nice just for once if the Minister would answer a question he is asked.

INQUIRY WHY MINISTER DOES NOT ADOPT APPROACH HE ADVOCATED THREE YEARS AGO

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my last question to the Minister is as follows: When he was on this side of the House as Leader of the Opposition three years ago, he moved a motion to have the Committee on Privileges and Elections examine the question of Ministers and conflicts of interest. That was three years ago.

Why didn't the Minister take the same approach in this case?

• (1425)

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe we are doing precisely that. If the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party would revisit the processes that were outlined in the September 9 tabling of the Code of Conduct, it anticipated circumstances which might call for the appointment of an impartial person to investigate the facts. It did not preclude the publication of the report, once made. I have already indicated—

Mr. Broadbent: For Privileges and Elections?

Mr. Nielsen: It did not preclude the option of a reference to a standing committee of the House—it might be that one—when the report is made. But surely, to anticipate beyond that is going a little too far with respect to the integrity of the process itself.

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF PRIME MINISTER'S PROPOSAL CONCERNING INQUIRY

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. The Government is proposing an inquiry, to be conducted by a so-called independent investigator appointed by the Prime Minister. The inquiry's terms of reference will also be determined by the Prime Minister, by the same Prime Minister who announced last night that the Minister will be fully vindicated.

How does the Government expect us to believe that an inquiry organized by the Prime Minister would be preferable to, and as impartial as, an inquiry conducted in public by a committee of this House?

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is the same question that was asked by the Leader of the New Democratic Party and by his own Leader. The same answer applies. The hon. gentleman is inferring in his question that there is no person of sufficiently high repute and integrity in this country who can conduct an impartial investigation. I do not accept that and I really do not believe that he, in his heart, believes that no such person can be found in Canada.

INQUIRY WHY GOVERNMENT WANTS TO CONDUCT INQUIRY OUTSIDE PARLIAMENT

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, all I want is a straightforward answer. Why conduct an inquiry away from Parliament, headed by a Government appointee and operating under terms of reference determined by the Government? Isn't this just a way to cover up an affair that has become an embarrassment to the Government?

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, after reviewing the questions that were received yesterday, I have given Hon. Members the assurance that whatever statements or allegations have been made in the House of Commons, however temperate or intemperate, will be the subject matter of those terms of reference. The Code of Conduct will be part of that. The Prime Minister's letter of September 9 will be a part of that reference. How much fairer can one get than to remove the matter from the bitterness and partisanship of the House of Commons to an impartial investigator who will make the report public, with the outstanding option of referring it to a committee? Is that not the fair course to follow in all the circumstances?

REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. Is he suggesting that it would not be possible to construct a panel of members from Members of the House of Commons who would be capable of conducting a fair and independent inquiry, as has always been the case in matters such as this?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in all fairness, if we followed that course within our normal processes, and if the committee or panel were to come down with a favourable report, his colleagues would be the first to accuse the parliamentary majority of government Members and would call it a whitewash.

REQUEST THAT INVESTIGATOR'S REPORT BE REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, does the Deputy Prime Minister not recognize that he is prejudging the outcome?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deans: In the interest of satisfying the needs of Parliament, will the Acting Prime Minister make a commitment to the House today that the report of the independent inquiry, by a motion of the House will be referred to a committee of the House for study and that that report will deal only with factual information and make no recommendations of any kind?

• (1430)

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Surely it is the Hon. Member who is prejudging the matter, not I. Surely he would not wish an impartial person to investigate the facts in any constrained and limited way. Surely he would want to clothe that impartial person with the broadest possible terms of reference—

Mr. Broadbent: That's not what your regulation says. It's not what it says.

Mr. Nielsen: —including all of the matters which have been raised in the House of Commons with respect to these circumstances—

Mr. Deans: No.

Mr. Nielsen: —including everything which has been raised in the media, including the Code of Conduct—

Mr. Broadbent: Read the Prime Minister's letter.

Mr. Nielsen: —including the Prime Minister's letter. Surely the Hon. Member would not want to restrict those terms of reference but rather to broaden them.

REPLACEMENT FOR MINISTER WHO RESIGNED

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. When the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans resigned, he was replaced by the Deputy Prime Minister. When the Minister of National Defence resigned, he was replaced by the Deputy Prime Minister. This time, why did the Prime Minister ask the Minister of Transport to take over from the former Minister? Is it because like all Canadians, the Prime Minister has lost confidence in our Deputy Prime Minister?

[English]

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): What a childish question.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if that question deserves the dignity of an answer, it is only to point out the outstanding capabilities of the Acting Minister, the Minister of Transport.

REQUEST FOR RESIGNATION OF DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Deputy Prime Minister again is it not true that he has become a liability to this Government?

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Ms. Copps: —and in fact the Prime Minister was forced—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Has the Hon. Member a question for the Minister in his ministerial responsibility?

Ms. Copps: And the only way we are going to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Is the Hon. Member just going to continue the statement or ask a question?

Ms. Copps: I am going to ask a question.

Mr. Speaker: What is the question, please?

An Hon. Member: Ask her to resign.

Mr. Speaker: What is the question?

Ms. Copps: Does the Deputy Prime Minister not believe that the only way the stink is going to be lifted from this House is when he resigns?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member for Nickel Belt.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. Members have the right to ask questions in this House. The Chair will decide whether they are in order. That is the fair way of doing it.

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE REFERRAL

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. In light of the fact that all the precedents in the past, the Mackasey precedent, the Axworthy precedent, the Murdock precedent in 1924, asked for a reference from the House of Commons to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, did the Deputy Prime Minister suggest to the ex-Minister that he should have followed that route of precedents and asked the House of Commons for a reference to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): No, I did not, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. gentleman for Nickel Belt had read carefully the package which was tabled last September 9, 1985, he would recognize that there was a new process set out of which the Prime Minister may avail himself if circumstances justify adopting it.

Mr. Deans: They don't.

Mr. Nielsen: Those circumstances, in the view of the Prime Minister, exist.

Mr. Broadbent: I thought it was Stevens who suggested it.

Mr. Nielsen: That is the course which is being followed here. I would suggest in all of the circumstances that it is the fairest possible and most impartial course to follow without closing off any options to refer the report of the impartial investigator to a Standing Committee of this House.

Mr. Deans: Erik, you would never have said that from this side of the House.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in light of the fact that these circumstances are no different in principle from the previous ones, why is the Deputy Prime Minister taking away the right of Parliament to look at the ethical behaviour of Hon. Members of this House? Why are you doing that?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is simply not being done in any way, shape, or form.

Mr. Rodriguez: Well, you are.

Mr. de Jong: Absolutely.

Mr. Nielsen: I can be helpful to the Hon. Member by suggesting that he goes beyond, historically, the September 9, 1985 tabling, back to the Starr-Sharp report and back to the circumstances which gave rise to the preparation of that report. He might then have a different comprehension than he does now about the correctness and appropriateness of the course being followed in the circumstances.

Mr. Deans: Totally inappropriate.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS—OFFER OF CONTRACT TO MICHAEL DEAVER

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I hope it is all right for a "precedent" to ask a question. I would like to direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. We heard yesterday from the Secretary of State for External Affairs that Mr. Doucet of the Prime Minister's Office had made an offer of employment to Mr. Deaver—

An Hon. Member: He never said that.

Mr. Axworthy: —when he was in the White House, albeit a lightheaded one. Now we have had a further revelation that Canadian officials met 15 times with Mr. Deaver when he was in the White House. Both cases are clearly in violation of American law.

An Hon. Member: Question.

Mr. Axworthy: Knowing this, would the Deputy Prime Minister tell us why the Government offered a contract to Mr. Deaver knowing it would violate American law? And who authorized that kind of offer to be made? Was it the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who is unavoidably absent, responded to some questions yesterday on that subject matter with respect to the details of a contract entered into by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and Mr. Deaver. I would have to take notice of that question and get whatever details the Hon. Member wishes.

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE HEARING

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that offer. In making that request, may I also make a request that the Government divulge all records and information relating to the hiring of Mr. Deaver and at the same time make available Mr. Gotlieb and Mr. Doucet before the Standing Committee on External Affairs so we can properly examine how the Government goes about hiring foreign lobbyists and what rules should be applied?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course, in the examination of the estimates of External Affairs before that committee, it is open to the hon. gentleman to make the request for the appearance of the ambassador and other witnesses he may wish to have.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): If we have your support it would make it easier.

Mr. Nielsen: I will certainly carry the remainder of the Hon. Member's representations personally to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

SHIPBUILDING

FUTURE OF INDUSTRY IN QUEBEC

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I have a letter from Mr. Peter Paul Saunders, the Chairman of Versatile Corporation, in which he informs the Quebec Minister of Industry and Commerce that he had been named by this Minister and by the former Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, to negotiate a plan for the reduction of the shipbuilding industry in Quebec, which included the closure of Marine Industries in Lauzon. Why was Mr. Saunders given that particular responsibility? Was it not a conflict of interest for this Minister and the former Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion to ask a president of one Quebec shipyard to develop a plan which would involve closure of one of its major competitors?

[Translation]

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, it is clear that in Canada today there is surplus capacity in our shipyards. At the time, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion examined a plan for rationalizing the shipbuilding industry in Canada. The discussions that took place between Mr. Saunders and representatives of other shipyards in Quebec are continuing, and rationalization will come later.

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF NEGOTIATION THAT WOULD IMPLY CLOSURE OF COMPETING SHIPYARD IN PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, could the Minister explain the conflict of interest . . . Why was the director of a shipyard appointed to negotiate a reduction in the industry's capacity which would involve closing down his major competitor in the province of Quebec? Is it appropriate for a company to make a decision involving the shutting down of another company in an industry that is so important to Quebec?

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): I think the Government asked the parties to talk and to arrange a rationalization strategy amongst themselves, before taking any measures whatsoever.

BANKS AND BANKING

INTEREST RATES CHARGED BY CHARTERED BANKS

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. We are happy to see the continual decline in Bank of Canada interest rates. However, at the same time we do not see these rates being passed along by the chartered banks as quickly as when the rates go up. Why are these decreases not passed along to the consumers as quickly as are the increases? Why does a four-point spread still exist?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, quite rightly, with some enthusiasm the Hon. Member notes the drop in interest rates in Canada over the past three or four months.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I have been watching the spreads between the bank rate and the bank prime rate. The spread is not four points, but less than that. I think it is something in the order of two points. However, during the month of January is was narrower than normal. It is now somewhat wider than normal. I am watching the matter very closely. As we monitor the situation I think we can expect that some alleviation will occur and that we will have a drop in rates.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS—HIRING OF LOBBYIST

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, since the Government came to power we have heard the Prime Minister continually sing the praises of the ever deepening friendship with the United States. In the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs my question—not about specifics—is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Given this new glowing friendship, does the Minister believe it is necessary to spend over $100,000 of Canadian taxpayers' money to hire one American to promote Canadian interests in the United States? Has our policy come down to "Leave it to Deaver"?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the short answer to the latter part of the hon. gentleman's statement, or question—however it might be described—is no. I think that it is a reality, a fact of life these days in which we are now living that there are lobbyists here in Canada, as well as elsewhere in the western world. To my recollection, that has been the situation for at least 15 years or more. So I can see nothing improper with recognizing the process of lobbying.

I might point out as well—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HIRING INQUIRY

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian people have a right to know what Mr. Deaver did or promised to do to earn that massive salary of over $100,000. Are there other dealers—excuse me, Deavers—on the Canadian payroll?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that was one of the first matters which the Government decided required some attention. Therefore, as he well knows, as part of that September 9 package, again, the question of lobbyists was addressed. There is a paper which is before a committee. I understand that House Leaders have discussed the registry of lobbyists. All of these matters are now in train. We believe that there should be that type of public disclosure available with respect to lobbyists in the system.

AIRPORTS

SECURITY CONTRACT AT DORVAL AND MIRABEL

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. As I understand it, Burns Security Services at Dorval and Mirabel Airports are being replaced, or have been replaced. Has the Minister's Department or have the airlines awarded a contract, or are they in the process of awarding a contract, to Metropole Security Ltd. for airport security at Dorval and Mirabel Airports? Did he or any of his officials carry out any investigation of Metropole Security Ltd.?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the first part of the question is no. My information is that Metropole Security Ltd. is not employed by Air Canada but that the firms of Metropol Airport Security Services Ltd. and Metropol Base-Fort Airport Security Services Ltd. are, in fact, employed by Air Canada. Yes, there was an investigation made as to the ownership of these companies by the Department of Transport.

AWARDING OF CONTRACT

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, was the provision of these security services tendered? Is Air Canada in a consortium with other airlines or is this arrangement only with Air Canada? Did any—I repeat any—of his cabinet colleagues have any discussion with him or any officials in his Department at any time about the provision of security services at those airports?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any such discussions, other than the fact that Burns Security Services indicated its intention to withdraw from providing that service. Air Canada undertook to make arrangements with the other two firms.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL

BAN ON ACCESS TO RESIDENCY GROUNDS

Mr. Barry Turner (Ottawa—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works.

Last week, the entrance gates to the Governor General's residence were closed to the public, and I would like to know who requested this and why, and whether the gates will be opened to allow the public immediate access.

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to remind the House that it is customary to limit access to official residences.

As part of its new responsibilities, the NCC has decided to apply the same policy to the Governor General's residence.

I would like to remind the Hon. Member who is showing a great deal of concern for those who visit the residence that it will always be possible for Canadians to visit the Governor General's residence on the special and specific occasions when this was possible before.

EMPLOYMENT

JOB DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Will the Minister explain why since April her Department has virtually closed down the Job Development Program in that her officials across the country have been telling project applicants that there are no funds available or that the funds are frozen? After announcing this program with such great publicity, why is the Minister not giving it the funds it needs to do the job?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member will be interested to know that since April 1 some $120 million worth of new activities have been committed by the Government under the Canadian Jobs Strategy, $40 million of that in the Province of Quebec alone, with $10 million of that going into Job Development in the Province of Quebec.

TREATMENT OF APPLICANTS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, I am talking about job development and not the Jobs Strategy. Why is it then that the Minister's officials in Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, Ottawa, Windsor, New Brunswick and British Columbia, even this morning, have been telling project applicants that there are no funds available? Why are they telling these applicants that, if what she is saying is correct? She had better check with her officials.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, indeed, I have checked with my officials. I have said to the Hon. Member that some $10 million has been approved for projects under Job Development in the Province of Quebec alone. We are managing our money carefully. By the end of June we expect that something in the order of 22,000 people will be involved in Job Development projects across the country. We feel that we are doing something right because the Canadian Jobs Strategy has helped contribute to the 630,000 new jobs in Canada since we came into office.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRADE

LUMBER EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES—REPORTED APPOINTMENT OF ENVOYS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. In the run-up to free trade negotiations the Prime Minister promised two things: full involvement of the provinces, and opposition to a separate process to deal with the softwood lumber trade. Will the Minister confirm that the Government's proposal to appoint envoys was made without discussions with British Columbia? In fact, he only sent telegrams there last night.

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the Hon. Member that, indeed, the Government is on record for fully involving the provinces in everything we do, not just Canada-U.S. and not just lumber, but every initiative the Government takes. Envoys have not been appointed. That is in the discussion stage. The provinces have been alerted to this. We will be discussing this matter in Washington tomorrow. No decision will be made until we have in fact consulted with the provinces and have obtained their approval.

IMPORTANCE OF LUMBER INDUSTRY TO BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. I am sure he is aware that lumber is the largest industry in British Columbia, but he sent a telegram to the Province of British Columbia just last night. Will he confirm to the House whether or not there will be any options or concessions on volume or price for Canadian softwood to be put to those envoys should that process proceed?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I can advise the hon. gentleman, as I did earlier in this morning's debate, that it is not the practice or habit of the Government to make any decisions affecting the provinces without fully involving them. That is our practice and we will continue it.

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—INVOLVEMENT OF ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade as well. Now that it is assured that the long awaited talks on enhanced trade are going ahead, good news indeed for Canada, will the Minister assure the House, and particularly Atlantic Canadians, that no longer will the Government tolerate a second-class status for Atlantic Canada?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to answer that question. Certainly we would afford nothing but first-class status to the Atlantic provinces, as we would to all provinces in Canada. I can certainly remind all Members of the House that, indeed, a number of the chairmen of the Sectoral Advisory Committees on Trade who will assist us in these negotiations come from the Maritimes.

LUMBER EXPORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. The Prime Minister, speaking in the House of Commons on April 24, 1986, in denying that there would be a separate deal made on lumber with the United States, said that the President of the United States said that negotiations would begin without conditions and that that is also the position of the Government of Canada. Why is the Government of Canada now proposing to make a separate deal, a precondition, that will limit the export of some $3 billion worth of Canadian softwood to the United States in advance of the beginning of any free trade talks? What has changed?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): For the life of me, Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the Hon. Member is getting his information. I can tell the House, as has the Prime Minister, and as the President of the United States has said publicly, that there were in fact no preconditions to the start of these talks. None exist, and I just do not know where he is getting that information. Perhaps he could enlighten me in that area.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, is it not true that the Government of Canada, in conjunction with the Government of the United States and specifically President Reagan, made a commitment to the Senate Finance Committee three weeks ago, and particularly to Senator Packwood, to resolve U.S. complaints about the Canadian export of softwood lumber by limiting that export in order to acquire U.S. Senate Finance Committee support for the start of free trade talks? Is that not true?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the simple answer is that it is not true. The Prime Minister has never made a commitment of any such nature to the Senate and we have never made a commitment to the President or anyone else to limit the exports of our lumber to the United States.

DRUG PATENT LAW AMENDMENTS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same Minister. Last night CBC news reported that the drug patent law changes will be presented to Parliament this Friday. Will the Minister now admit that this is part of the price which Canada has agreed to pay to get the free trade talks going and approved by the U.S. Senate Committee?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that in the future the Hon. Member would not rely upon the CBC for his information. I can only repeat what I said earlier, which is that there were and are no preconditions to the commencement of trade talks between Canada and the United States.

CANADA-UNITED STATES DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, in that case let me ask the Minister a direct question. At any stage in the discussions with respect to the Senate's approval process were there discussions between Canadian and American officials with respect to patent law changes? Is the Minister denying that such discussions ever took place?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, again I can only reply to the hon. gentleman by saying that there were no preconditions whatsoever in any area for the commencement of talks between Canada and the United States with respect to a comprehensive trade agreement.

SHIPYARDS

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT HAS DECIDED TO CLOSE CANADIAN VICKERS LIMITED SHIPYARD IN MONTREAL EAST

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses and concerns shipyards in Quebec. Could the Minister confirm to the House that his Government, with the co-operation of Mr. Saunders, has decided to close down the shipyards of Canadian Vickers Limited in Montreal East? Yes or not?

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, I thought I made all this clear earlier to one of those Members who, like the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie, Mr. Speaker, will not listen. The Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, and I repeat, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion sent a letter to the people involved with the shipyards, asking them to have a discussion and to find out if industry rationalization could take place. These are people in the private sector who are supposed to meet and determine the scope of rationalization.

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF POSSIBILITY OF CLOSING SOREL SHIPYARD AND LEAVING YARDS AT LAUZON AND MONTREAL OPEN

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister aware of the fact that Mr. Saunders is responsible for two shipyards in Quebec, one in Lauzon and one in Montreal, and that Quebec is responsible for the shipyard in Sorel? Does the Minister want us to believe that Mr. Saunders is capable of closing down the Sorel shipyard and leaving the other two yards open?

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, see what it's like, when someone will not listen!

We are talking about someone involved in the industry, and the fact that these people have to talk to each other. If they don't, how can you expect them to come up with something positive? Mr. Saunders has two shipyards. I imagine he should be able to talk with the other yard owners about what the best policy will be.

ALTERNATE DAY DELIVERY PROPOSAL

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the post office. In the Budget the Government called upon the post office to produce an operating plan. We have it from reliable sources that this plan recommends alternate third-day delivery. In light of the need for public debate on such a drastic change in public policy, will the Minister make this report public and do so before the Estimates of the post office are dealt with by the committee?

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Canada Post): Mr. Speaker, I do not know my colleague's sources, but all I can say is that there are many alternatives being examined right now by the post office in order to comply with the request of the Minister of Finance which was to come to self-sufficiency in a short period of time. We are examining many alternatives, and one of them could be alternate-day service.

REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF REPORT

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has just admitted that he is examining alternate-day service. Will he bring that report forward and make it public so that the examination of the alternatives can be made in a public environment?

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Canada Post): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the alternatives that we are examining. As soon as we will make a decision on that, we will make it public.

CANADAIR—APPOINTMENT OF BURNS FRY TO REVIEW PRIVATIZATION PROPOSALS

Hon. Douglas C. Frith (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Does the Deputy Prime Minister not agree that the former Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion created the appearance of another conflict of interest when he appointed the firm of Burns Fry to review and recommend a buyer for Canadair while the President of Burns Fry was sitting on the board of directors of Magna International, a company which at the same time was wishing to purchase Canadair?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is simply one more of those statements that will be added to the reference of the impartial investigation that will be conducted.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT INVESTMENT CORPORATION—MEMBERSHIP OF DIVESTITURE COMMITTEE

Hon. Douglas C. Frith (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, would the Deputy Prime Minister therefore confirm that as part of the reference for the inquiry he will also look into the situation where the majority of members of the divestiture committee of the CDIC happen to belong to one firm in Canada? Does he not also agree that that creates the impression of a further conflict of interest?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is not original in making that allegation. It has arisen before and will obviously be part of the reference which is made to the impartial investigation.

Point of Order—Mr. Lewis

POINT OF ORDER

POWERS OF COMMITTEE UNDER STANDING ORDER—
GOVERNMENT RESPONSE—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. On May 1, 1986, the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council (Mr. Lewis) sought clarification from the Chair as to the interpretation of Standing Order 99(2). The first question to be addressed is specifically whether a committee can ask for a response to only a part of a committee report.

It is clear to the Chair that such a request, while not expressed in specific terms in the relevant standing order, is a valid one since it would be a simple matter for a committee to present a separate report containing that part of a main report to which it wishes a response. Further, there are numerous supportive precedents on this very question.

The second question which has to be settled is that, when a committee has asked for a partial response, is the Government bound to comment only on that specific part of the report. In the opinion of the Chair, should a committee request a response to a particular part of a report, the whole of the report remains open to comment by the Government, if it so chooses, although the Government would have no procedural obligation to respond to more than that part of a report to which a committee requested a reply.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 82—CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE—
RESCINDING OF EXISTING COUNTERVAILING DUTIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Riis:

That this House urges the Government not to proceed with any free trade talks with the United States Government unless that Government rescinds existing countervailing duties and guarantees that such duties will not be used in the future, given the current threat of U.S. countervailing duties in the softwood industry—an industry in which free trade now exists.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Hon. Member for Humboldt—Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) seeking the floor on debate?

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I wish the Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon) to have the floor.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the Chair misrecognized the Hon. Member for Humboldt—Lake Centre and is prepared to recognize the Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon) on debate.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Minister for International Trade (Mr. Kelleher) indicated, the motion before us today goes right to the heart of a debate which is taking place in the country. It deals with the question of countervailing duties and the role of continuing countervailing action in respect of the negotiations as they themselves take place.

For most Canadians the concept of countervailing duties is not easy to understand. What exists in the United States—and it exists in a somewhat different way in Canada—is a system which permits companies, Senators, Congressmen, and a variety of different forces to go before a quasi-judicial body, the International Trade Commission, to raise the possibility that they are being damaged by foreign trade or that the effect of foreign imports on a domestic U.S. industry is negative. In conjunction with that quasi-judicial investigation by the ITC is an investigation by the Department of Commerce, part of the administration of the United States. It investigates whether subsidies are being provided by the country which is exporting into the United States and potentially damaging domestic producers within the U.S.

The countervail process in the United States comes out of these two streams and leaves a giant decision at the end, with input from the ITC indicating that a particular industry or set of firms is indeed being damaged. As well it has input from the Department of Commerce saying whether or not subsidies are being provided. If both these decisions come down in favour of the United States, the consequence is that the exporter to that country can have erected against his enterprise a countervailing duty. Countervailing duties can range across a vast area; we can talk about very small countervailing levels or very large ones which can be extremely damaging to exporters to the United States.

This is a crucial area for Canada. It is a case which has hit Canada repeatedly over recent years. I know the Minister and I have no disagreement that the countervail power of the United States is extremely important, has been extremely damaging to certain Canadian industries, and can be even more damaging to other Canadian industries, of which the most obvious at the moment is softwood lumber. However, softwood lumber is not by any means alone. Our salt fish and groundfish have already been hit this year by countervailing tariffs. After building an industry with the support of the province, hog producers in Essex County found themselves facing near bankruptcy because of the countervailing duties against live hog exports.

It is not only those cases which are the problem, but also those cases which represent constant threats to Canadian producers, constant threats which they have to fight often, and certainly financially, on their own in the United States. For example, I could point to mould producers in Essex County who were taken before the International Trade Commission and accused of exporting with unfair subsidies and hurting certain U.S. producers. They were told in the end that they have no choice but to fight the case themselves. Despite the fact that they were part of a small industry, they spent over $100,000. In the case of the hog producers, that industry too, despite very limited funds, has had to spend over $200,000 to fight its case before the ITC.

We have first, the serious sets of cases which have damaged Canadian exports, and second, the spread taking place in the United States of our policy areas which the U.S. now believes are part of what constitutes subsidies.

I have before me the preliminary decisions of the Department of Commerce on the groundfish case. It lists within it 54 federal and provincial programs that were considered by the International Trade Commission in the United States to constitute potential subsidies. The Department of Commerce in turn reviewed them and concluded that they did represent subsidies. Some of these are absolutely crucial to the future of Canada, not just in the Maritimes, not just in British Columbia but right across the country.

We have The Export Market Development Program which is considered to be an unfair subsidy. We have the Regional Development Incentive Program that is considered an unfair subsidy. We have the Industrial Regional Development Program, something which goes into half the constituencies of members represented in this House, and that too is considered an unfair subsidy.

It is not just the federal Government which sees its programs and policies at risk, but also the provincial Governments. In the case of groundfish we see programs from New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Quebec, in fact from all of eastern Canada considered to be unfair subsidies. Therefore, they could provide the basis for the United States to put up new tariffs which would damage producers on this side of the border exporting into the United States.

Our argument throughout this whole free trade debate is for a direct and agressive policy on the part of the Canadian Government to persuade the United States to cease using its countervail power in this way. The best way to do that is through a double-pronged program. First, is via GATT. In the renegotiation of the next round of GATT which starts this September it will be possible for us to have very powerful allies as we attack these various attempts by the U.S. to extend countervail power beyond the boundaries of what anybody expected in the last GATT round. We could have powerful economies like Germany, France, Japan and Great Britain with us as we make the case against the United States in GATT that its countervail approach is unfair trade. It represents a predatory attempt to overextend the boundaries of GATT's previous concerns and prerogatives.

Second, we have argued that it is crucial for us to take a much more aggressive position ourselves, that we take our own countervail program, which is extremely slow and unfair to the producers, and streamline it more so it becomes possible to use that program either directly through government or indirectly via producers to take retaliatory action against the United States when our producers are hit.

It may sound like the mouse that roared when you talk about Canada taking retaliatory action against the United States but the trade flows that exist between the two countries are of significant importance to both countries, and for us to have built into our legislation, as we advocate, the power to take such retaliatory action, is crucial.

At the moment we have a system where even to get the chance to take a case before our special import tribunal it is necessary for our producers to go to the Minister and get his okay. I recognize that the Minister is an eminently reasonable man, but that is not the kind of fast effective hard-hitting tribunal which can take us into a position where we can fight back against the U.S. in this war of countervail activities that has begun to develop between the two countries. That is the approach we have suggested.

On the other side there is, I believe, a myth. That myth is that we can somehow escape through these free trade talks from the countervail system itself. I have here dozens of reports of speeches by key American officials that make it absolutely clear that they will not give up their right to countervail under any freer trade agreement which we might sign. We have the statements of Mr. Merken to a Wayne State university group. He said quite clearly to them that there was absolutely no chance that the countervail system in the United States would be eliminated to benefit this country. He said that if the Candian goal was to get that kind of countervail it was simply not going to be possible in the trade talks. The same skepticism was expressed by the American representative for trade, Mr. Yeutter. He has said that he would not be enthusiastic about anyone being exempted from anti-dumping or countervailing duty laws.

We can continue with all sorts of comments from, as an example, the Select Committee on Economic Affairs in Ontario which went to Washington and interviewed many groups asking if it seemed at all likely that the countervail power might be, in any sense, restricted. In each case the answer was that there is no possibility that that route will somehow win a solution for our lumber, fish, strawberry, or hog producers.

The thrust for freer trade which we have set out upon is built on a wing and a prayer which, unfortunately, is almost doomed to failure. It is almost certain to fail because that power of countervail is so crucial to U.S. producers and politicians. It is for this reason that the Government should take a different approach. It should work through GATT and develop the retaliatory powers to enable it to fight back when countervailing actions are taken. That direction provides some hope as opposed to myth.

Mr. James: Mr. Speaker, I cannot help but be amazed at the anti-Americanism which comes from the Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon). He talks about an aggressive position on countervail. Only this morning a member of his Party spoke about the real problem of countervail by the United States on our lumber. He now wants us to develop an even more aggressive position. He talks about the mouse that roared. Now he wants us to develop an aggressive position while saying that we cannot negotiate or compete with the United States. He now wants us to become the aggressor, saying that that will be the solution. The arguments of the Hon. Member and other members of his Party are not coherent or organized. They are trying to create confusion to muddle the minds of Canadians. They present so many arguments which are diametrically opposed that they think the poor Canadians will not be able to figure this out. I am sure that they will be suprised.

The Member says that they want a war of trade. He wants the matter to turn into an adversarial situation of even greater proportion than it now is. This is terribly surprising and concerning. A member from his Party said this morning that we have not been talking and negotiating enough to avoid this potential countervailing situation in connection with rubber. He is also pre-empting the talks. Earlier there was rhetoric coming from this side indicating that things were being pre-empted and predecided. He has already made the decision that the U.S. will never give up on countervail. Yet, this morning the Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) said that potential countervail should not happen. We hear doom and gloom right from the start from that Party. The Member talks about a wing and a prayer. The Government knows that negotiations with the United States can fly and we intend to put the intelligent word out to the Canadian electorate in an organized and straightforward plan which they will understand, rather than relying on confusion.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I would certainly hate to leave the Member for Sarnia—Lambton (Mr. James) confused. That would do no good. My speech was not meant to be anti-American but to recognize certain realities which exist. These realities are, in some respects, the very same realities which the Minister of International Trade noted this morning. The fact is that there is a great deal of countervailing action being undertaken by the United States. It has been extended more and more widely, and has in fact been used by the Government as a reason for trying to undertake these freer trade talks.

The point is not that that is anti-American. It is a reality to which we must react. The question is what capacity we have with which to react and what is the best way to react. At the moment our capacity to react is limited. It was the conclusion of the special committee which looked at the issue last summer that our own countervail laws were not sufficiently strong. I simply make that point here.

We must choose the route which is likely to result in success with respect to trade. We are talking about trade wars—nothing more dramatic than that. This is a serious issue in my part of the country, as I suspect it is in the Hon. Member's part of the country. We must decide what is the best way to deal with that problem. I make the case that it is much better to take a route which draws allies with us and gives us the chance to try to push back against what has become a very aggressive American approach on trade, which is recognized throughout the world.

In closing, in its trade relations with the United States the European community has been very much more aggressive. I think it is working out solutions for which it is much more respected than is the case with us.

Mr. Caldwell: Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to my colleague from my neighbouring riding of Essex—Windsor. He continues to oppose the idea of entering into a bilateral trade agreement with the United States. He has many fears of this and plants the fear in people's mind that Windsor, which is a border town, is going to suffer because of any enhanced trade. He mentioned hogs as an example. Would it not be wiser if we were able to entrench that $800 million market with an agreement similar to what we have regarding the Auto Pact which the UAW opposed when it was being negotiated? They are now, of course, opposing any enhanced agreement with the United States. Is this not a similar situation? I cannot understand the Hon. Member continuing to be fearful of an agreement such as this when, at the same time, he holds up the Auto Pact as one of the greatest agreements ever signed. That pact was negotiated by Simon Reisman, the same person now negotiating for Canada on free trade. The UAW opposed that then, and now they oppose bilateral talks. Does he not want to see our farmers in Essex County get a good agreement, one similar to the Auto Pact?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, that mixes together so many magnificient things that one hardly knows which string to pull to start with. Let me try.

First, each of us must attempt to assess the likelihood that we as a country are going to get from the U.S. something which will safeguard us. In the case of the Auto Pact, we got those safeguards because we were dealing with one sector and we fought very hard. Mr. Reisman himself said he opposed such safeguards, but the Government of the day, perhaps because of pressure from the UAW, who know, told him to insist on safeguards. Those safeguards, as he and I both know, have been absolutely crucial for and beneficial to Canada in that particular case. It is because of those safeguards that we hold up the Auto Pact as a sensible and desirable kind of development.

However, with respect to hogs, we have to ask the honest question: Is the U.S. likely to do away with the power to apply countervailing duties as it has done over the past year with respect to the Hon. Member's farmers and my farmers, all of whom have been hurt quite badly? As reasonable people I think we have to look at the evidence. I have tried to put a little bit of that evidence on the record today. We have the comment from Mr. Merken that they do not believe it would be possible to exempt any country from countervailing duties or anti-dumping laws. He, of course, is the U.S. deputy trade representative with special responsibilty for—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the Hon. Member's time has expired. Debate.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate today. As I do so, I ask Hon. Members to reconsider the motion before the House. It says:

That this House urges the Government not to proceed with any free trade talks with the United States Government unless that Government rescinds existing countervailing duties and guarantees that such duties will not be used in the future, given the current threat of U.S. countervailing duties in the Softwood Industry—

That motion might easily have urged the Government to keep its word to the House of Commons concerning the softwood lumber industry. It might have been a motion urging the Government to keep its word to the industry itself. It might have been a motion urging the Government to keep its word to the Premier of British Columbia who has told BCTV, among others, that he has a commitment from the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) that there shall be no separate deal with the U.S. on softwood lumber from B.C. or anywhere else in Canada. If such a commitment, and we only have the word of the Premier, was given to him, then indeed that commitment has been shattered. It has disappeared like the snow in spring.

We know that because we heard the Prime Minister say in this House that no separate deal, no preconditions, would be attached to free trade talks. We know that that commitment has been shattered as well. As recently as yesterday the Canadian Ambassador to the U.S., Mr. Gotlieb, was suggesting to the Americans that each country should appoint envoys to sit down and negotiate a separate deal on Canadian softwood lumber exports to the U.S.

The Prime Minister said he had a commitment from the President of the United States that there would be no preconditions. If the President gave the Prime Minister that commitment, then the President's word has been shattered as well. On May 8, just five scant days ago, he wrote a letter to Senator Packwood, Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, saying that there must be—not "may be", or "should be" or "would be nice if there was"—but there must be separate negotiations on the export of Canadian softwood lumber to the U.S. He went on to say that if this cannot be achieved through bilateral negotiations, then he will take such action as may be necessary to resolve this problem consistent with U.S. law. This letter from the President follows by three weeks a tie vote in the U.S. Senate Finance Committee to initiate free trade talks. That followed by three weeks some kind of backroom manoeuvring in the U.S., arm twisting to get Senators on side to allow the free trade initiative to begin. It was a tie vote, and at that time it was reported that the President had made a private and confidential commitment to Senator Packwood to write him a letter indicating that the U.S. Government was committed to resolving this issue, to limit the import of Canadian softwood lumber, and that he would put it in writing.

Canadian officials in Washington and Ottawa scoffed. They said no such letter exists. Why? Is it because they were really interested in the letters the President was writing to U.S. Senators? No, they scoffed because the existence of this letter from the President of the U.S., following discussions between the President and the Prime Minister, following negotiations between the Minister of International Trade (Mr. Kelleher) and his U.S. opposite, indicates clearly there was a deal made between the Government of Canada and the U.S. administration that the price of getting the free trade talks started was the beginning of a separate deal to limit the export of Canadian softwood lumber from this country to the U.S. That is why they scoffed at the existence of a letter.

I do not believe, as the Minister of International Trade would have us believe, that he does not know where this letter came from. I do not believe, as he would have us believe, that he is not sure what the President of the U.S. is trying to say. I do not believe, as the Government would like us to believe, that this commitment by the U.S. President to the Senate Finance Committee, a very powerful committee, was written holus-bolus, out of the blue, without some pre-discussion and negotiation with the Canadian Government.

The reality is this. The Government of Canada has invested so much of its political capital, tied so much of its future to free trade negotiations, invested so much of its reputation in the successful outcome of those negotiations, that it has now politically put itself in the position where it can no longer say no.

The perception of beginning free trade talks and the completion of those talks is now more important than their substance. The Government of Canada had its back to the wall. A number of U.S. Senators told the President that he would not get a start to free trade talks without the votes in the Senate committee to initiate those talks. They said he will not get those votes unless the Canadians give in on softwood lumber and there is a commitment to limit the export of Canadian softwood lumber. The Government of Canada had no choice but to tell President Reagan to go ahead and make that commitment and it will make a separate deal on softwood lumber. That commitment was made either directly in a phone call between the Prime Minister and the President or through Mr. Deaver who informed the President in a visit to the White House. There is no way that such a commitment could have been given without the consent and advance knowledge of the Canadian Government.

The Government has given in on the question of generic drugs in advance of the negotiations. It has given in on the Foreign Investment Review Agency and on some aspects of the NEP in which it has placed the decision affecting Canada's oil industry back in the boardrooms of corporations south of the border. The Government is learning that by giving in on these matters in advance of negotiations it does not get any favours.

The Government has been giving away the shop, and every time it gives an inch, the U.S. administration or U.S. interests come back and look for another foot. That is what is happening to us in this softwood lumber industry dispute. This morning, the Minister for International Trade spoke in an attempt to reassure Canadians that everything would be all right.

The Minister said that if the Government's about-face, 360 degree flip-flop, from no preconditions and no negotiations to the appointment of an envoy on each side to resolve the dispute, fails, he reminded the House that a similar action to seek countervail that was launched in 1983 by the U.S. administration did not work then and it will not work now.

I hope the Minister was only making that statement for public consumption, as part of the rhetoric that flowed from his speech. I hope he does not take the simplistic view that if all else fails we are in good shape. The world has changed dramatically since 1983. Mr. Yeutter, the U.S. special trade representative, stated in mid-April that the Canadian means of pricing standing timber is an unfair trading practice. That was not the case in 1983.

Recent Commerce Department decisions have taken a much more expansive view than in the past regarding the labelling of foreign government aid of natural resources industries as an unfair subsidy. That is a new interpretation by the Commerce Department that did not exist in 1983.

An omnibus trade Bill was passed by the House Ways and Means Committee in Washington several weeks ago. It contains language that would specifically find the pricing of natural resources as it is done by Canada to be an unfair subsidy. Finally, the President of the United States stated in a letter to Senator Packwood that the matter must be resolved in bilateral negotiations, and if it is not resolved he will take whatever action is open to him under U.S. law. That has changed as well. The naive view that we won in 1983 and will win again is not only foolhardy, it is dangerous. The Government must decide soon that the substance of its agreements between Canada and the United States is far more important than the perception that the Government is committing itself to its major initiative of free trade negotiations. It must decide that it will draw a line around a number of areas and that it has been pushed too far by the U.S. administration in clearing the decks for free trade negotiations.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Côté) will add several hundred million dollars to the cost of generic drugs for Canadian citizens and untold millions of dollars to the cost of medicare in order to satisfy U.S. interests. That commitment has been given away. It cannot be negotiated in talks across the negotiating table. It is gone.

The Foreign Investment Review Agency has been rewritten to suit the interests of the corporate boardrooms in New York, Boston, Texas and elsewhere. It cannot be negotiated because it has been given away.

Canada's energy patch is in deep trouble. It is bleeding and weakened and is now wide open for U.S. corporate interest takeover. The protection of that sector was given away when the NEP was scrapped. It can no longer be negotiated because it is gone.

The U.S., seeing how desperate the Canadian Government is to begin these talks, with its political credibility and reputation on the line, decided that no talks will start until its demands are satisfied on the question of softwood lumber. The Government of Canada is amazed that the United States would do this, having won all these concessions even before the first day of negotiations. The United States is demanding that Canada voluntarily sit down and negotiate a reduction in our $3 billion worth of exports of softwood lumber to the United States.

That is what the Government of Canada has done. It has broken faith with the House of Commons. It has broken faith with the industry. According to the Premier of British Columbia who spoke on BCTV this morning, the Prime Minister has broken his commitment to the Premier that there shall be no separate talks.

If the Government cannot find the backbone to stand up to say that enough is enough, I suggest that it find a bit of steel for its backbone so it can state, in the words of this resolution, that the Government of Canada will not proceed with any free trade talks with the United States Government unless that Government rescinds existing countervailing duties and guarantees that such duties will not be used. Failure to do so will mean that the Government is putting its political objective and its perception of reality ahead of the interests of the people of Canada, particularly those tens of thousands of Canadians who make their living from our renewable resource—our forests.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, this morning and on previous occasions the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Kelleher) has been asked the question which was raised by the Hon. Member for Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin). That question related to the issue of preconditions, and the Minister has, on at least two occasions and probably more, given the House his straightforward assurance that there are no preconditions. The Hon. Member opposite alleges that there are preconditions. Does the Hon. Member not believe the Minister?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I hate to answer a question with a question, but how does the Hon. Member interpret the fact that the President of the United States has committed himself, despite his negotiations with the Prime Minister to a pre-negotiation, which is a precondition and a "pre-settlement" in his own words, of the Canadian softwood lumber controversy? He said: "I intend to press for an expedited resolution to this problem independent of the comprehensive negotiations". He states that it "... must be resolved before", not after, not during, not sometime. The President's words were: "... must be resolved before we submit to the Senate the results of the comprehensive negotiation". If that is not a precondition by the President of the United States, I do not know what else it could be called.

What conclusion does the Hon. Member come to on behalf of his constituents when he hears that the Canadian Ambassador in Washington, Mr. Gotlieb, on the instructions of the Minister for International Trade, presumably with the knowledge of the Prime Minister—although he claims to have knowledge of precious little these days—made a proposal to the U.S. administration that Canada and the United States should both appoint joint envoys to sit down and resolve our dispute about lumber? In the words of representatives of the U.S. industry and in the words of the President: "It must not only be resolved but be resolved before we submit to the Senate the results of the comprehensive negotiations". So it is not a question of believing or disbelieving the Minister for International Trade. It is a question of educating him, of making him aware, because he is obviously an innocent abroad, of the hard-nosed nature of these negotiations. The Minister could do with some direction. It is the same Minister who lost Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland in merely presenting a map of Canada. So it should not surprise anyone that he fails to understand the implications of the letter written by the President of the United States which states: "Before this Government shall ratify the agreement we must resolve in the interests of the United States, Canada's export of softwood lumber into our nation". If that is not a precondition, could the Hon. Member give me another word which Webster's might offer up in its place?

Mr. Brisco: What the Hon. Member for Humber-Port-au-Port-St. Barbe seems to ignore selectively is the fact that the issue of countervail, whether it is with forest products, steel, potatoes or berry crops, is frequently before us. It is an ongoing process. It has been there before, it is there now and, who knows, it may be there again down the road. Independent of any discussions, the Hon. Member should know that already a negative decision is on the horizon, in fact, even closer than that, with regard to the shake and shingle industry. However, the Hon. Member would not really be concerned about that because he has none of that cedar in his riding. He does not know what a cedar tree looks like. We in British Columbia do have some semblance of that industry and we know the impact of a negative decision.

Taken in the context of the Hon. Member's previous remarks with regard to the energy policy, to generic drugs and to the trade deficit, which he is obviously unaware we have in high tech, when one takes all of that into context, one must seriously question the allegations. Obviously, the Hon. Member was not in Alberta watching the deterioration of that whole province because of the National Energy Program. I was there. I saw it happen. I saw it go down the tube.

Mr. McKenzie: Sixty thousand jobs were lost.

Mr. Brisco: That does not make any difference at all to the Hon. Member for Humber—Porte au Port—St. Barbe. But I saw that happen and I saw the reversal. That reversal happened as soon as this Government was elected. It happened even before we cancelled the National Energy Program in anticipation of its cancellation.

Mr. Tobin: Can I respond to that, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Brisco: Let me now get on to the Hon. Member's—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): You had better get on with it very fast because he has only 30 seconds.

Mr. Brisco: This is the only country in the western world which shuts out the research component of the pharmaceutical industry to our detriment and adds to that a $12 billion deficit in research and technology, which is growing at 15 per cent every year.

Mr. Tobin: I will be very brief, Mr. Speaker, but I want you to note that the Hon. Member spoke for some 4 or 5 minutes in asking his question.

Let me say that it is a sad day indeed when a Member of Parliament from Newfoundland who has in his riding pulp mills, not the cedar shakes which are in the Hon. Member's riding, has to stand up and speak on behalf of the Hon. Member's constituents because that Hon. Member insists on putting his loyalty to his Party and to its political agenda ahead of his loyalty and commitment to his constituents and the industry which sustains them. It is a sad day indeed when Members of Parliament from Newfoundland must stand up to ensure that the interests of the Province of British Columbia are heard echoing off the walls of this House because nothing but a whimper of support for the Government's failed position is being heard from Hon. Members from British Columbia.

The Hon. Member knows that the only way the U.S. administration could get the U.S. Senate Finance Committee to go ahead with free trade talks—and we barely made it with a vote of 10-10—was when the President told Senator Packwood: "I will fix up that problem you and some others have with the import of Canadian softwood lumber into the United States, and I will put it in writing". Some three weeks later, just a scant five days ago, the letter came. In the letter the President of the United States states that that matter must be resolved by bilateral negotiations, and if it is not resolved by bilateral negotiations, then he will take whatever actions are necessary that are consistent with U.S. law. That is the reality. The Hon. Member may not call that a sell-out, he may not say that his constituents' interests have been sold to get free trade talks going, but I say that.

I am sure British Columbians thank God sometimes that there are Members of Parliament who are prepared to stand and be counted for every part of Canada, not just for their own home province when other Hon. Members see it as their duty to stand behind their Party and not behind their own constituents.

The Hon. Member was sent here to be the voice of British Columbia in the House of Commons. The people of British Columbia do not want an apologist to speak for them. Do not ever forget that.

Adjournment Debate

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time for questions and comments has now terminated.

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 82—CANADA U.S. FREE TRADE—RESCINDING OF EXISTING COUNTERVAILING DUTIES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Riis:

That this House urges the Government not to proceed with any free trade talks with the United States Government unless that Government rescinds existing countervailing duties and guarantees that such duties will not be used in the future, given the current threat of U.S. countervailing duties in the softwood industry—an industry in which free trade now exists.

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to take part in the debate which centres around such an important aspect of trade, particularly trade in a commodity which is so very important, a fact which has been pointed out today by several previous speakers.

I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the motion before us clearly demonstrates, in my view, that the New Democratic Party does not understand what is the essential need to move forward with bilateral trade talks with our partners to the south. The very real threat, even in the last few days of countervailing action by the U.S. against Canadian softwood lumber, points to the very reason why it is absolutely essential to continue trade talks with the United States. What we are talking about here is gaining access and maintaining access to a market which takes 76 per cent of all lumber produced in this country. That is why we are going ahead with such vigour. It is to try to make sure, if we can, to preclude the kinds of actions and protectionist sentiments which are so prevalent in the United States.

I wish to point out that it was mentioned previously by my colleague, the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Kelleher), that to date there has not been a countervailling duty petition launched with regard to U.S. lumber interests. I have heard such terms as count-downs and figures such as $53.65 and 29 per cent mentioned. At this point in time it is important to recognize, in order to keep the record intact, that there has been no countervail launched.

I have been involved with the lumber issue for as long as anyone here in the House. Not only have I been dealing for the last 18 months with my own colleagues in Cabinet on this particular issue of trying to protect our lumber producers' access to that big market, but I have done so as provincial Minister as well. I fought very hard at that time in working with others in the country to try to do the same thing when the first countervail issue came forward in 1982. To those who think it is not going as well as it should be going, I suggest that they might want to ask the Ministers and industry representatives who were present then which particularly defensive issue has been handled in the best way. I can tell Hon. Members that the type of conferences that we had, the communications and the interchange of facts with industry and with the provinces are significantly better now than when I was a provincial Minister faced with the same type of issue.

I now wish to point out a couple of facts important to the debate before us. The first is that, despite the fact that there is a great deal of trade between the two countries and, in fact, that the U.S. depends on our country for a good deal of its commodities, the United States is still a sovereign nation. We are not yet in a position to dictate to it how its administration should administer trade remedy legislation. It is there and it can use it in the way it wishes. It is a sovereign state. We cannot impress on Congress how it should develop its own legislation. Congress will act in the way it wishes to act. It will bring forward such legislation as it deems fit and sees necessary.

The second fact is that the Government of the United States is organized differently from ours. On the one hand there is the administration, and on the other there is Congress, which acts independently of the administration. That fact is important because it leads to the third fact, that is to say that, generally speaking, the administration is known for its opposition to protectionism everywhere, including the U.S. Congress, but that protectionism still exists and still threatens Canadian softwood lumber. We do not deny that. It is something about which we have been aware for a long time.

With respect to lumber, Members of the House are all too aware of the intensity of the protectionist measures in the U.S. aimed at restricting our access to a market which is valued at well over $3 billion. The threats are not new at all. In recent years our lumber exports have been subjected to two investigations by the U.S. International Trade Commission and by yet another one, of extraordinary complexity, namely, the Department of Commerce. Neither of these investigations by U.S. agencies under U.S. laws provided any substantiation for the persistent myth that Canadian lumber exports are subsidized. They both found that there was no subsidization and that Canada was trading fairly. Our softwood lumber exports are threatened by initiatives in the Congress and by potential trade remedy action triggered by the U.S. industry. I think it is important to note that it is not necessary to have many participants of the industry file a countervail action. It only takes one or two.

I would now like to deal briefly with the initiatives in the Congress which could adversely affect our lumber exports. We understand the pressures in the U.S. Congress. After all, we are all politicians here. The American lumber industry has experienced a protracted period of unprofitable operations and has suffered closures and lay-offs. I wish to tell the American people and the Canadian people that we, too, have shared in some hard times in this industry. We, too, have had shut-downs and lay-offs in this country. It is not unique to the U.S. We have not run to the bank all the time that the Americans have gone to the poor-house. It seems to me that only a market turn-around—and thank goodness there appears to be some indication of one—will provide a solution to the problem.

In this environment it is easy to understand the concern of the U.S. Congress for the American lumber industry. What I cannot accept is that Canadian lumber should be made the scapegoat for it. I remind Hon. Members that Canadian access to the U.S. market has been bought and paid for in previous rounds of multilateral trade negotiations. It has taken time for Canadian producers to establish their positions in the United States. They have done it by being competitive and by providing a product their customers want.

There are now about a dozen Bills before the Congress designed to restrict the entry of Canadian softwood lumber. Of most concern is the Bill introduced by Representative Gibbons of Florida, who happens to be Chairman of the House Subcommittee on Trade. The provisions of his Bill covering resource pricing policy, including removal rights, have been rolled into an omnibus trade Bill which has been reported out of the House Ways and Means Committee and is now being debated in the full House.

The resource pricing provisions of the new Bill would modify U.S. countervail law to deem that a subsidy existed where Canadian stumpage prices—that is, the price a lumber company must pay the Government for cutting down a tree on Crown land—fell short of an arbitrary figure based on American stumpage prices.

I wish to reiterate that the Government is taking the threat posed by this Bill seriously. On April 29, Ambassador Gotlieb wrote to 30 key members of the Democratic and Republican House leadership registering the Canadian Government's strong concerns over provisions of the omnibus trade Bill which could adversely affect Canadian trade interests. They are protectionist and inconsistent with the U.S. Government's international obligations. The letter referred pointedly to the resource pricing provision arguing that this provision would present a unilateral departure from the internationally-accepted definition of a countervail subsidy in violation of the GATT.

We will continue to bring our concerns on this trade Bill vigorously before the Congress. We will be making detailed representations to the administration shortly, urging it to continue its opposition to the protectionist provisions of that new Bill. In addition, as the House knows, a comprehensive and well co-ordinated Canadian campaign of private and public diplomacy opposing any restrictive action against softwood lumber has been mapped out and has been under way for some time.

This strategy runs along the following lines. We are trying to neutralize the U.S. campaign of misinformation by actively disseminating in the United States the Canadian perspective of this issue, by ensuring that the administration understands our opposition, and by conducting a co-ordinated campaign in the Congress. We are also bringing onside allies, and we have some in the U.S., alerting American constituencies which would suffer from restrictions on lumber imports, including, of course, the housing industry.

The campaign involves the co-ordination of a large number of players, including the embassy, all 13 Canadian consulates, and the Washington representatives of Canadian industries and federal and provincial Departments. We have argued that we are fair traders, that we are not benefiting at U.S. expense, that our success in the U.S. is based on competitive marketing factors, including a favourable exchange rate, consumer preference for our spruce, pine and fir and Canadian wood products, and superior productivity in our mills, which has been pointed out by several Hon. Members today.

I was gratified to note that these arguments were essentially supported by the U.S. International Trade Commission's recent Section 332 report. Our message continues to be communicated via congressional staffers, press briefings, speeches, testimony to congressional committees, information kits, and briefing sessions with Congressmen and administration officials.

The strategy we have been employing has enjoyed a number of successes. For example, we have received strong editorial support from major newspapers across the U.S. We have an excellent organization in place which links the federal Government, industry and the provinces. We have mobilized U.S. interest groups, such as transport interests, lumber dealers, home-builders and the like. They have coalesced in clear and vocal opposition to restrictive action against Canadian softwood lumber. In other words, we have succeeded in resisting the momentum for congressional legislation which would affect Canadian lumber exports.

The Canadian Government continues to work with the administration to help manage this lumber issue. To that end, Canadian and U.S. officials have recently resumed a new round of talks at the request of the U.S. trade representative, Ambassador Clayton Yeutter, to review the factors affecting competition in the North American lumber industry and to clarify government policies and practices in Canada and the United States affecting the lumber trade. This morning, my colleague mentioned that another very important meeting will take place tomorrow.

The first meeting was held in San Diego in January. A technical session took place in Prince George from February 12 to 14, and of course discussions took place in Washington on March 12. A further meeting was held in Ottawa on April 11.

The Government of Canada and the lumber industry are now faced with a very real threat if trade remedy action is taken against our softwood lumber exports to the U.S. markets. While it is possible to fold certain aspects of the lumber issue into the trade negotiations, let me make it clear that efforts to erect barriers to Canadian softwood lumber exports to the U.S. will not be put on hold pending conclusion of the negotiations.

The U.S. lumber coalition still has available to it U.S. countervailing duty legislation which affords protection against alleged subsidized imports which are causing injury to the U.S. industry. The U.S. industry is now on the brink of filing a new countervailing duty petition against our softwood lumber exports. Through the strongest of efforts, we have managed to win a delay in this action and will continue to work with the administration to hold this action off.

If, in the end, the U.S. industry files a new petition, we will argue strongly that the Commerce Department should not accept the petition because its own guidelines on this matter note; first that the Commerce Department does not investigate programs that are clearly not countervailable. Second, it does not investigate programs determined to be not countervailable in prior determinations unless the petition shows new data. As I have mentioned before, several of those investigations have already occurred, including one complete countervailing duty action. Third, it does not re-examine a program found to be generally available in the prior investigation without new evidence of changed circumstances.

In view of the above, the Canadian Government finds a re-profiled petition difficult to understand in light of the clean bill of health we were given following an identical countervailing duty action against lumber which occurred in 1982-83. In that investigation, the Commerce Department totally and unambiguously rejected a U.S. industry allegation that provincial stumpage programs conferred a domestic or export subsidy on the Canadian softwood lumber industry. Incidentally, that decision was never appealed by the U.S. petitioner.

I have already made it abundantly clear to the administration at the cabinet level that we are strongly opposed to the initiation of another investigation. In short, if a petition is filed, we will take every opportunity to register with the administration our strong views that there are no grounds for the U.S. Commerce Department to accept a new petition and to institute a countervailing duty investigation against imports of softwood lumber from Canada.

There have been no significant changes in government policy and practice in Canada affecting the lumber producers since the 1983 countervailing duty determination. There have been no changes in U.S. countervail law which would justify a new investigation involving programs which the Commerce Department has already determined to be countervailable. In the Government's view, to proceed with such a case would be inconsistent with the Department's own guidelines with respect to acceptance of a countervailing duty petition as well as being inconsistent with the U.S. obligation under the GATT. Hon. Members should be assured that the Canadian Government will continue to commit the resources, the effort and the vigorous leadership required until this, our number one trade problem with the U.S., is resolved.

I would like to comment on a few of the remarks made by the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) this morning. I think the record should be correct, and I am sure the Hon. Member would want it corrected. He referred to the efforts we are making to deal with this particular issue. First, he knows full well that the trade issue is the responsibility of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) and, more appropriately, perhaps, the Minister for International Trade. The important thing is to realize that we are working together with the provinces and industries to assist in any way we can the sectors for which we and other Ministers are responsible. Obviously, the sector in which I am most interested is one at which we have been working very hard.

The Hon. Member mentioned some figures that I should correct. As soon as I became Minister, I set up an industry and trade branch in the Department, something which never existed under the previous Government. The branch will have an establishment of 14 person-years when complete. We also have an economics branch consisting of 16 people which supplies the Government with data and analyses on trade and industry issues.

It might be important to note at this time that both of the Directors General of those two branches are active on the government-to-government negotiating committee. The heads of both these branches are playing a daily role with the staff of the Minister for International Trade on this particular issue. Naturally, we will always play a support role in trade because it is not primarily my responsibility, but peripherally and indirectly it certainly is. I intend to continue that kind of activity.

Adding all of that to everything else that has been done by the complete staff available to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister for International Trade, as well as my own personal staff, not large but active, I think we have made a major change in the thrust of the Canadian Forestry Service which in the past was essentially a research service. We have moved from a spectator's role to the role of a key player in the discussions and negotiations that are now taking place.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Hon. Minister would not want to leave the record with any bruises on it, so I will take this opportunity to seek some clarification from him. I think he would agree that in the Estimates of his Department under agriculture for 1986-87, some $500,000 is to be used to deal with the issue of softwood trade and difficulties related to the issue we are discussing today. An additional half a person-year or so has been added on.

Mr. Merrithew: Fourteen person-years.

Mr. Fulton: Fourteen new person-years have been added? We will deal with that next time the Minister is before the committee.

I would like to hear from the Minister his understanding of the issue of the countervail suit. It is my understanding that if there is not satisfaction with the envoy proposal on the U.S. side between now and next Monday, the countervail will be technically filed on Monday but the Secretary of Commerce will not take the full 20 days required to make a ruling. In fact, he will accelerate that by one week, meaning that the ruling on whether or not to proceed with the countervail would come only 13 days after next Monday. In terms of timing, the actual free trade negotiations are scheduled to begin in the middle of next week. Because of that timing, it would be very much in the interests of certain U.S. lumber interests that the countervailing petition be filed next Monday rather than this Monday so that it would roll over into the free trade negotiations which are supposed to begin in the middle of next week. I would like the Hon. Minister to clarify that for me.

My second point deals with the Gibbons Bill, the resource-pricing provisions on which the Minister touched, and the new removal rights clause. As the Minister knows, that was voted through last October by the subcommittee so it can, in fact, on very short notice, go to the floor of the Congress.

Does the Minister think it is more likely that the very powerful U.S. forestry industry lobbyists who are loose on Capitol Hill are likely to accept the envoy proposal if there are no volume pricing provisions provided as a possible concession from Canada? Second, does he not agree that it is likely that those hardliners in the U.S. Senate and House, both Republicans and Democrats, who have been pushing this issue will want to go the Gibbons Bill route? That route would guarantee them the new arbitrary evaluation procedure between U.S. standing wood and stumpage and Canadian Crown or private standing wood and stumpage, as opposed to going through the new countervail, even though recent rulings by the International Trade Commission and the Department of Commerce indicate that it is somewhat more likely that they would be able to find a countervail against Canada under a 1986 application rather than under the 1982-83 process which Canada won at only 1 per cent.

Mr. Merrithew: Mr. Speaker, I want to address three or four of the comments of the Hon. Member for Skeena. First, I made the point on the countervail because the dollar figure and a percentage were actually mentioned this morning. We would not want to leave a perception in the minds of Canadians that that petition has already been filed. It has not been filed at this point in time. However, the figures were mentioned both in dollar terms and in percentage terms. The Hon. Member himself used the phrase "the clock is running", which I understand may very well be the case. I wanted to ensure that there was no misconception on the part of the Canadian public.

In the meantime, negotiations and discussions will take place tomorrow. As the Hon. Member well knows, undoubtedly they will be important. He is absolutely correct that the concept of removal rights in trade legislation did get by a subcommittee and awaits discussion of the full House. He is absolutely correct as well that those kinds of phrases in that legislation pose a threat to us. However, the legislation has not passed.

The Hon. Member knows as well that many of the Senators will be going to the polls later this fall and that there may be trade-offs, as there have always been in their democratic system, in which they may volunteer support for one aspect of trade legislation in exchange for something else. However, we are not privy to that information, and the only thing we can do is to make the strongest possible representation to all Congressmen and Senators that we do not think it will serve free trade, freer trade, or enhanced trade very well.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I have a very short supplementary question. As the Minister knows, British Columbia was informed late last night directly by telegram about the latest proposal of Canadian and U.S. envoys to look at concessions. Does the Minister think that that is enough time for provinces such as British Columbia, which ships about 60 per cent of Canada's over-all softwood lumber into the U.S. market, to take a close look at this approach, or is it in fact true that there is not much co-operation coming from Premier Bennett on this issue?

Mr. Merrithew: There is no question that we are down to the eleventh hour on the issue. No one is taking it lightly. After discussions it was felt that the concept of an envoy or envoys might very well resolve issues which we have been unable to resolve as of this time in government discussions, in discussions between politicians at every level, or in discussions between the United States administration and the Canadian Government. It was just an idea that was floated. The provinces were informed of it. Hopefully, later this week, depending upon certain things happening, Trade Ministers will meet with Forestry Ministers to discuss that concept fully.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Forestry (Mr. Merrithew). It does not concern softwood but concerns the red cedar and shake problem. It has nothing to do with subsidies, by the Americans' own admission, but from what I can gather they are concerned about competition and the problems caused by that competition in the United States.

The International Trade Commission recommended that the President step in—and I ask the Minister to confirm this—and impose a duty of about 35 per cent on our red cedar shingles and shakes. Could the Minister confirm that that is a proposal or initiative of the ITC? If so, why is that proposal being made in light of there being no subsidies?

Mr. Merrithew: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member knows that the shakes and shingle industry in the United States has filed an action against Canada. Again we are perceived to have some sort of subsidy or benefit for our producers, much to the chagrin and loss of American producers. Also it is interesting to note that the vote on the preliminary ruling was very close. I think it was three to three or four to three, or perhaps the reverse of those numbers. However, it is important that they recommended to the administration that there be a 35 per cent countervail duty not on all shakes and shingles but on red cedar shakes and shingles only. We have protested that in no uncertain terms. We have some doubt as to whether the U.S. industry can supply all the demand. We have fought that all along the route and will continue to do so.

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the Government has embarked upon a number of steps aimed at securing and improving Canada's access to world markets generally and to the U.S. market particularly. I want to take this opportunity today to outline the many important considerations which have led us to conclude that these initiatives were essential to promote the well-being of the Canadian economy and future prospects for a continued healthy growth of output, employment, and incomes of Canadians.

In my judgment, the very substantial consensus across the length and breadth of the country in support of seeking a comprehensive trade agreement with the United States reflects a growing concern that the Canadian economy is becoming increasingly vulnerable as a result of a number of adverse developments which have been building up for a period of several years.

Taken together, these developments present a serious threat to a continued healthy growth of Canadian output, employment, and real incomes. As the C. D. Howe Institute put it in a recent statement, "The status quo cannot be the goal of economic policy if Canadian living standards are to continue to rise in the future".

Canada has long been in the forefront of the countries which have supported the progressive liberalization of world trade under the GATT, and indeed continues to be in that position. However, there has been a growing appreciation that further progress on the international front is likely to be very slow and to address only a limited number of pressing concerns which Canada has with the United States. It is this market which currently absorbs more than 75 per cent of all our merchandise exports and is critical to the well-being of the Canadian economy.

It has become glaringly evident that the policies and practices, which may have served Canada well in the past, have become increasingly untenable. The necessity of adjusting to rapid change is now one of the inescapable facts of Canadian economic life. The C. D. Howe Institute declared recently in its Policy Review and Outlook, 1986 the following:

> Governments can try to delay the inevitable by preserving the status quo. But delay simply increases the magnitude of the adjustments when they come, as come they must.

One of the major forces for change which has developed over the past several years is the massive increases in trade protection pressures that have taken place around the world, particularly in the United States, the major buyer of our exports.

South of the border these protectionist measures have taken two forms. One is increasingly intense resort by U.S. firms and the U.S. administration to existing trade protection measures such as countervailing and anti-dumping duties and so-called safeguards, in an effort to cut back the flow of exports from Canada as well as from other countries. Of equal or greater concern are the more than 300 Bills currently before Congress to establish new protectionist measures, many of which could have a seriously adverse impact on Canadian imports and Canadian jobs. Existing and proposed protectionist measures pose a threat to more than just current exports and current jobs. They also serve to compel some Canadian companies to invest south of the border in order to avoid such measures, as Bombardier felt required to do to help secure a $1 billion order for subway cars in the United States. The result of such developments is a loss of investment that otherwise would take place in Canada and the loss of new jobs that otherwise would be created in our country.

Even more important, Mr. Speaker, than the present and prospective protectionist threat to our trade with the United States is the increasingly adverse impact of a number of other developments that have combined to compound severely the problems we face as the only industrial nation in the world, other than Australia, that does not have free access to a market of 100 million people or more.

Included among those developments is the continued decline in relative importance of Canadian resource exports both because of changing technology that has led to the replacement of some of these products by other materials, copper wire by fibre optics, for example, and because of the increasingly intense competition from a number of less developed countries.

In addition, we have faced increasingly significant competition in the field of manufacturing from the newly industrialized countries, such as, South Korea and Hong Kong. Canada has also faced increasingly intense pressures in the marketplace at home and abroad from other more advanced industrial nations. The problem is not one that has suddenly developed overnight. Instead, it is one that has been developing for some years. In a document published in 1983 entitled Canadian Trade Policy for the 1980s, the former Liberal Government warned:

> Our competitiveness is slipping compared to our major trading partners and we are not as well positioned as our competitors to export manufactured goods—the area of greatest anticipated growth in the 1980s.

A similar warning was sounded more recently by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Given the right policies, the Association said:

> Canada's employment of two million people in manufacturing could be increased by 25 per cent by the year 2000. That prospect would grow more and more elusive if we just kept on our present course . . . Our major competitors are already ahead of us in the productivity race.

The fundamental problems created by Canada's small domestic market and lack of secure and more open access to a larger market has been accentuated by what the CMA have characterized as a "world scale explosion of new technologies" that has by now set in motion a "fourth industrial revolution".

Most critical of all, however, is the increasingly severe problem faced by a number of Canadian manufacturing industries that are falling progressively further and further behind in the international competitive race because their lack of assured access to a major market results in declining efficiency and heavy costs. The result is that the productivity of our manufacturing sector is in the order, on average, of 25 per cent or more below that of the United States which, in turn, results in substantially lower real incomes in Canada.

In the early 1960s, the process of rapid technological change was threatening to drive the Canadian auto industry to the wall because the relatively small domestic auto market failed to provide the volume of sales required to achieve maximum efficiency and the lowest possible costs. The Macdonald Royal Commission underlined the fact that it was only because of the opening up of the U.S. market under the Auto Pact that the Canadian automotive industry was able to achieve the strong and healthy growth it has experienced over the past two decades.

The problems facing the auto industry in the early 1960s are very similar to those that now face a number of other manufacturing sectors, stated the Commission. It said:

> Our industry urgently needs to increase economies of scale in order to realize greater productivity.

To achieve that important objective, it requires assured and open access to a large market such as that offered by the United States.

The economic benefits that would flow to Canada from the implementation of a comprehensive trade agreement with the United States would depend on a number of factors, particularly the extent of the reduction or elimination of the existing barriers and the provisions made by phasing in the reduction of those barriers over time.

Assuming that the agreement is broad in scope and phased in gradually, a number of calculations have been made by several of Canada's outstanding economists. On balance, they have concluded that the benefits for Canada would be very significant in terms of increased output, of employment, and the real incomes of Canadians.

It has been estimated, for example, that Canada's annual national output would increase by some 3 per cent to 8 per cent as a result of a trade agreement with the United States, which is on top of normal growth that might be expected.

Similarly, it has been calculated that the number of new jobs created might increase by as much as 5 per cent within two years of the start of the implementation of an agreement.

By one estimate, real incomes in the manufacturing sector could be expected to increase by some 28 per cent as the productivity of that area of the economy moved into line with that in the United States. In addition, one well known firm engaged in economic analysis, namely, Informetrica Ltd., recently concluded on the basis of its projections that a comprehensive trade agreement with the United States "would provide positive results from the beginning, and across almost all sectors and provinces".

Not the least of the benefits that would flow from a comprehensive trade agreement with the United States would be a significant reduction in the relative costs of a great many of the things that Canadian consumers buy directly and indirectly, together with a substantial increase in the range of consumer choice.

The initiative undertaken by this Government in proposing the launching of the negotiations aimed at reaching agreement of a broad nature with the United States has commanded strong support of several major business organizations and national economic institutions in Canada. This approach was also strongly recommended by the Macdonald Royal Commission on the Economic Union. The Commission declared:

> We are convinced—that the potential economic benefits to Canada of freer trade with the United States far outweigh the costs, and that the principal hazards can be met by instituting appropriate policies of adjustment. Given Canada's increasingly isolated position in the international economy at large, it is difficult, in any case, to conceive of a genuinely effective policy alternative.

Among the many advantages that the Commission considered would be yielded by a trade agreement was that it would enable Canada so to strengthen the competitive capacity of its economy over time that it would be able to reverse and reduce its growing dependence on the United States economy through increased exports to other markets around the world. Paradoxically, we believe that improved and secure access to that market will, in the long run, be the best means of achieving greater diversity of our economic and trade relations.

One of the most immediate and important gains that we would expect to obtain from a comprehensive trade agreement is a substantial measure of protection for Canadian exports from both present and prospective U.S. protective trade barriers. While Canada urgently requires more open access to U.S. markets, it also has a desperate need for security of that very important access.

In addition to providing more secure access, it is to be expected that a new agreement will result in the elimination of some other substantial barriers to trade other than tariffs. That would be things such as "buy America" provisions which severely restrict the market for Government procurement. A trade agreement could open up that very substantial market which amounts, at present, to something in the order of $500 billion per year.

In summary, we in Canada find ourselves at a critical crossroads in our history. The choice we face is threefold. We can hold to our present course, which threatens to lead to a continuation of the erosion of our international competitive position which has been under way for some years, and a continuing decline in the comparative well-being of the Canadian economy in terms of growth, production, jobs, and wealth. One alternative to this is to do nothing. That course is to retreat behind the protective walls of "fortress Canada", which I am sure most Canadians will recognize as a sure-fire recipe for disaster on the part of a nation which has lived by trade with the rest of the world for so many years.

Finally, we can choose to follow the course of substantially reducing the barriers between Canada and the United States which is the only road that offers the promise of substantially strengthening our economy and bolstering its ability to grow and prosper in a fiercely competitive world. Is it any wonder that most Canadians have concluded that there is no real alternative to the approach to trade that the federal Government has elected to follow with the firm support of a broad segment of our nation? Surely this is an idea whose time has really come.

Mr. Lesick: Mr. Speaker, I hope the television cameras have allowed Canadians throughout the nation to hear my colleague, the Member for Sarnia—Lambton (Mr. James), speak this afternoon. He told us the facts. He spoke the truth. He has been in the House all day listening to Opposition Members and Members of the Government speak. His speech was positive. It told us that we do require a comprehensive trade agreement. We heard all of his good reasons for this and all of Canada should know about them. A 28 per cent increase in manufacturing will mean lower prices and more jobs. What we need more than anything is assured access to American markets. That is what the comprehensive trade agreement will achieve for us.

I know that my colleague, the Member for Sarnia—Lambton, listened carefully to the remarks of Members of the Opposition. Why are Opposition Members afraid of trying something new, different, and positive such as the Member spoke about? The Opposition has been swinging at puffs of smoke. Why do Members of the Opposition have these fears?

Mr. James: Mr. Speaker, I do not understand where members of the Opposition are coming from. They seem to be contradicting themselves so many times. This afternoon I heard an Hon. Member speaking about the 10-10 vote of the Senators. Could you imagine the hue and cry there would have been if the Senators had voted "no"? When the Senators on the Finance Committee were deliberating, we heard that a number of them were concerned about whether to vote positively. Members on the NDP benches wondered why the Government had not sent representatives down there to communicate. The next minute they do not want to communicate. I am not sure where this comes from. I am sure that if the Senate Finance Committee had voted "no" they would have said that that was a terrible thing.

The other thing that concerns me is the lack of objectivity in the rhetoric. The Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon) was speaking this morning with doom and gloom and telling us the reasons why we should not enter these negotiations. He did not seem to have any objectivity. It seems that one can say anything in this House without any facts to back it up. He said that they never agreed to countervail.

Another thing that really gets me excited is that the President said he would like to clean up the countervail situation on softwood lumber. This morning the Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) said that that is what he wanted to have done. This afternoon someone said that it is bad that the President wants to have that cleaned up. They seem to have a problem making up their own minds. The Government has made up its mind that negotiating a trade agreement with the U.S. will give us jobs, which is what the country needs.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can shed some light for the last two Members who asked what the Opposition is concerned about with regard to dealing with something new. We have had free trade in softwood lumber for half a century. This is nothing new. We have had, by and large, a very good trading relationship with the United States in softwood lumber. However, because of the difference in currency, and because our mills now rank among the most efficient in productivity anywhere in the world, and because our labour force also ranks among the most productive anywhere in the world in the woods industry, we are able to out-compete the Americans on their own turf. We have had free trade in lumber for 50 years. They now want to stop free trade.

We have done so well in that area that the Americans are afraid of the Canadian competition. We are concerned that that same mentality will be extended to a whole variety of commodity and product areas. Is this what free trade is all about? That is the reason we have indicated concern about the open-ended support for the free trade concept.

Mr. James: Mr. Speaker, that is why I am concerned that the Opposition is negative about entering into a trade agreement with the U.S. The Minister of International Trade (Mr. Kelleher) said from the outset that one of the main reasons for negotiating an agreement with the U.S. would be to negotiate away the countervail situation which exists. That is always a possibility under GATT. We hope to be able to negotiate on that countervail situation. In addition, we would have a tribunal to handle any irritants which still develop.

• (1650)

It seems to me that this is the very thing that the NDP would like to have. I know that the softwood lumber industry is very important. I agree with the information given to us today by a member of the NDP concerning the number of jobs in the U.S. which are contingent upon that industry. This Government has tried to have that story told. When I was at our Washington Embassy, they explained to us the whole story. It was very important and they were getting the story out.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will entertain a short comment and question from the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow).

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the Hon. Member. This is the first time I heard a Government Member make mention of information available from the Department of External Affairs which analyses the "buy American" policy. If the Hon. Member would look at that information he would understand our concerns. I am reading from a document prepared by our Department of External Affairs. It is headed "Buy American". It shows that U.S. preferential public purchasing policies date from 1933. Those policies generally provide that federal Government procurement for use within the U.S. must be restricted to domestic products unless the purchase of such supplies is inconsistent with the public interest. It then goes on to list a whole series of subsidy programs for the American fishing and agricultural industries. It then lists alphabetically every state in the U.S. and the restrictions they put on purchases in their states against every other state in the Union, let alone purchases from Canada.

We are being urged to give up the things we do to protect our industry and jobs. When is the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) or Mr. Reisman going to ask the U.S., if we have to give up our protection, when are they going to give up their protection? When are we going to stop negotiating with both hands tied behind our backs?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will give the Hon. Member 30 seconds in which to reply.

Mr. James: I would just like to say again that that is one of the reasons we would want to negotiate an agreement with the U.S. Certainly "buy American" is a concern, an irritant. I believe I said that in my dissertation this afternoon. It is a tremendous market and we would like to have access to it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret but questions and comments are now terminated. The Hon. Member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco).

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, the story of this Government is a story of success. It is an indication that our Government has been working. In spite of the laughter in the NDP ranks, we will be able to demonstrate in a few words the kind of economic progress which Canada has made in the last two years.

Already our successes are starting to show. Momentum is building. We have not allowed inflation to devour the earnings of Canadians. That is a success. With inflation under control, we have started to nudge the economy into first gear. We were able to drop the unemployment rate from 11.6 per cent to under 10 per cent. That is a real figure. There are over 600,000 people across the nation who know the meaning and feel the worth of that number. They can give at least partial thanks to their federal Government for the employment we helped to create. We are now creating new jobs at the rate of over 1,000 per day. That is the act of a responsible Government, a Government that works. Canada is stronger now as a result of the policies of this Government.

Employment is not the only indicator of our successful policies. For the first time in a number of years productivity is increasing at the same time as employment is growing. That is a significant trend. In the last five or six years productivity gains were made at the expense of employment. Now more and more Canadians are joining a workforce which is becoming stronger and more competitive. Canada is becoming a stronger nation. We are no longer hewers of wood and drawers of water. Canadians can be proud of this nation's growing sophistication and diversified industrial base which makes us a major trading nation, the seventh largest in the world. While some 60 per cent of Canada's exports remain resource based, a growing proportion are being processed in Canada. Less than one-third of Canada's exports are now raw materials. We are a nation relying more and more on the ingenuity and skill of our highly-trained workforce for today's production and tomorrow's national wealth.

We have a strong and growing economy. Exports have jolted the sometimes sluggish economy. Compared to the U.S., our economic recovery has been stronger. In 15 months the Canadian economy zoomed ahead at an annual rate of growth of 6.1 per cent, compared to 2.6 per cent for the U.S. Our growth in employment has outpaced the U.S. More important, Canada's increase in productivity in the last year and three months has been five times as great as the U.S.

Canada has not been so strong for years. Never before have so many Canadians been ready to take on the world, to recapture our share of foreign trade. Since the recovery began, Canada has increased the value of its exports by 40 per cent. That is double the increase following any other recession since the Korean War. Trade is important. Exports continue to contribute to Canada's standing as one of the world's strongest and largest trading nations. We are second only to Germany in the amount of economic activity which depends on trade. One of the things that sets Canada apart is the degree to which this nation depends upon trade. Some 30 per cent of our economy depends upon international trade. That is almost twice the average for the western industrialized countries.

That dependence, of course, is a double-edged sword. As long as Canadian workers can remain competitive, we will continue to create jobs through export markets. It goes without saying that if Canada's workers are to remain competitive, then industry itself must remain competitive, and that responsibility falls upon industry. Currently, more than three million workers owe their jobs to international trade. A strong trade performance means undeniably more jobs. For every $1 billion in merchandise exports, 16,000 jobs will be created in Canada.

The other side of that sword is that if Canada does not maintain its competitive edge, jobs will be lost. In the 1970s the Government allowed Canadian productivity to drift. The result of looking inward was that Canada's share of world merchandise exports dropped .5 per cent to 4 per cent in 1983. What is .5 per cent? The Economic Council of Canada noted that it was worth employment for 160,000 Canadians. Through the gradual reduction of international trade barriers, Canadian producers have become more competitive, the Canadian economy has become more productive and efficient, and this encourages the nation to concentrate on what we do best.

Increased trade has benefited Canadian consumers and producers alike. Yet we must not lose sight of the bad news. In the last 10 years, Canada has lost ground to other traders. This country must run to keep up with the pack. We have to apply even more energy if we are to make the best of available economic opportunities.

Since the First Ministers met in Regina, this Government has been pursuing a three-point strategy to improve Canada's economic performance. Those three points are: Improved trade competitiveness; secured and enhanced access to foreign markets; and more effective international marketing.

GATT and U.S. trade are two important opportunities. The goal of secured and enhanced access to foreign markets will be sought on two fronts, through the bilateral negotiations with the United States and through the continued and active role that Canada will play in the upcoming round of talks on GATT. Together, this two-point strategy will lead to a growing world of economy and to particular benefits at home where new employment will be generated.

The Government has had an equal emphasis on bilateral and multilateral negotiations, not on the joys of continentalism, nor on the merits of putting all our eggs in one basket. Neither are subscribed to by the Government. We must seize the opportunity and secure a greater share of world trade for the benefit of Canada. That can only be achieved by permitting trade patterns that benefit both sides and having a trade policy which recognizes the need of both importers and exporters.

Since 1968, Canada's share of world trade has been declining and, in parallel with that trend, so have Canada's employment opportunities diminished. In the past decade Canada looked inward and concentrated on domestic problems.

There is a new confidence in Canada. Our economy is improving and expanding. More people are working. Canadians are up to the challenge to reach out and trade with the world.

Canada's national Government knows that we can compete and Canadians know that we can compete. We want to harness their confidence. The Government's obligation is to regain the advantage we once had in order to put more people back to work. We must do this through enhanced trade, and that is the mission that drives this Government.

Our objectives are to explore a trade agreement with the United States which is mutually advantageous. The Government has established four basic means for securing and enhancing access to that market. One is fair trade by reducing the scope for harrassing competitive Canadian exports. There are over 300 Bills in Congress which seek to limit Canadian exports. We would like to see this kind of retaliation against fair trade curtailed.

The second is fair protection by codifying rules on subsidies to industry, agriculture and fisheries. Both countries use domestic subsidies, yet there is no agreement on what constitutes a fair subsidy. We would like to see clearer rules which would stop Canadian policies from being attacked by U.S. protectionism.

The third is fair access by reducing the impact of "buy-American" laws and eliminating U.S. tariffs in order to give Canadian companies access to U.S. federal and state government markets that are worth as much as $500 million annually. We want to see the pressure on Canadians to transfer products to the United States removed.

The fourth is fair settlement by agreeing on effective mechanisms to settle disputes about trade. Canada and the United States have many disagreements, but no means of arbitration. We would like to see more predictable rules to allow problems to be quickly and fairly addressed and resolved.

What are the benefits to Canadians? There are a number of studies which point to the benefits of enhanced trade. The Macdonald Commission generated over 40 studies which dealt directly with Canada-U.S. trade. An extensive range of studies have been undertaken within the Government. These reports prove the merits of the trade initiative.

The studies agree that the reduction of trade barriers would stengthen Canada. The economy would grow by 8 per cent. Productivity would rise without a trade-off in total employment. Jobs would be created in both the manufacturing and service sectors. Average incomes would increase, and some studies show that wages would increase by as much as 13 per cent to 15 per cent. Exports would rise and consumers would benefit from lower prices.

With transition periods and phased elimination of trade barriers over eight to ten years, we will experience managed and orderly adjustment. That kind of change is preferable to that which comes from a factory door bolted shut because of lost export sales. It is that kind of planned and phased in change that will make Canada stronger.

Many factory workers already experienced this kind of change when the Auto Pact was signed in 1965. In the words of Bob White, President of the United Auto Workers, the Auto Pact: "Led to a major expansion of trade." He said: "We have modern plants in Canada with state of the art technology. We have a skilled workforce and our labour costs are very much in line".

There will be adjustment, just as there is now. However, with improved trade rules, this adjustment will lead to a better tomorrow. It is based on job creation, not job loss. The Government would like to see those working in other sectors have the same benefits that auto workers now enjoy. Why should Bob White want the benefits restricted to his workers? Let us have trade rules that cover as much of our cross-border trade in goods and services as we possibly can and build upon the excellent start that was made with the Auto Pact.

Some studies have assumed that any Canadian based company exposed to new competition would just wither and die. That is scarcely the Canadian way. That is not the Canada that I know. Canadian managers would stay and fight, as they did after the Auto Pact was signed.

Enhanced or no enhanced trade, Canadian subsidiaries are in Canada for good. Many Canadian subsidiaries are no longer branch plants but independent companies with their own world wide mandate.

It is not Canada's high tariffs that keep subsidiaries in Canada. Many studies have shown that companies are interested in the nearness to the market and the quality of the Canadian labour force. These will not change after any possible agreement with the United States. Canada will still be a good place in which to invest and a good place to be employed. It will be a good deal, or there will be no deal.

The Cabinet and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) will only consider an agreement if it is in Canada's best interest. It will be a good deal, or it will be no deal.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Are we allowed to read speeches under the new rules or are we supposed to give speeches?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Experienced Members should not be reading, but there are opportunities for the Hon. Member to look at notes. I am sure the Hon. Member is well aware of what the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) has just said. I know that these are just notes. He is entitled to refer to them.

Mr. Brisco: As the Prime Minister stated:

> International negotiations are complex and extremely challenging. Success is not a sure thing but the results of success are well worth the enormous effort and good faith required for the negotiations.

This is a winning proposition. Negotiations for both multilateral and bilateral trade agreements will lead to investment, expansion, modernization and specialization. Canadian businesses will become better competitors. We are pursuing agreements with the United States and the world which will prepare Canada for the 21st century.

Earlier today, the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) addressed the House on the subject of free trade, particularly with regard to the forest sector. I am grateful that my prompting provided him with an opportunity to explain to the House why the United States is so concerned about the forest sector and why that country's productivity is simply not on the same competitive basis as Canada's. When I asked why, he responded correctly. I asked him to give us the corollary by telling us what is happening in the United States, which he did. He did it very well and very forthrightly. I would suggest to the Hon. Member that the one element he left out of his speech, and I am sure he is aware of it, is that the recession in the United States was not as deep as ours at the outset and was slower in coming. Our forest industry in British Columbia was actually in that serious downturn before the United States. So we have gone through the recovery stage and it has been a remarkable recovery. We have seen improvements in our sawmills and pulp mills. We have seen increased productivity as a result of modern equipment. I am grateful to the Hon. Member for having put that on the record.

I would also like to say to that Hon. Member and to all Hon. Members of the House, particularly those who come from our forest regions, that the matter with which we are faced is one which is not only of concern to us. It is of concern to 140,000 businesses, members of the United States national building organization. That vocal group supports the position Canada has taken. It is incumbent upon us as Members of Parliament, regardless of Party, to work collectively for the betterment of Canadians and of forestry workers to whom we are dedicated.

In conclusion, I think it is important to indicate that it is going to take a collective will in British Columbia to resolve its economic problems. It is going to take a collective will in Kootenay West. Earlier today the Hon. Member for Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin), indicated he, an Hon. Member from Newfoundland, was the only one who was speaking for Kootenay West and British Columbia. Of course, I reject that statement categorically, particularly when I look at the Hon. Member's record of speaking on behalf of the forest sector as spokesman for the Liberal Party. One only needs to examine the Hansard Index to see how little he has said about trees.

Kootenay West is a riding which has suffered seriously in this economic downturn but it is slowly recovering. I would like to give that community the reassurance that we will see a new lead smelter at Cominco, that we will see a rejuvenation of industry in that community that by working together with community action groups and employing the ideas which develop within those groups along with the ideas and experience from the outside.

I would like to make reference to Sudbury and its particular approach to its problems which provides an excellent format for any economically depressed area. I would like to give my constituency the assurance we are doing everything we can to join them in getting the economic condition of that one area back in tune with the rest of Canada so it can enjoy the successes which are presently before us, particularly in the industrial corridor.

Mr. McCurdy: Mr. Speaker, the previous speaker, once again, cited the Auto Pact as an example of free trade. He suggested that Bob White would deny Canadians the same gains resulting from free trade that the auto workers received as a result of the Auto Pact. The Auto Pact is an arrangement of free trade in a commodity in which there is a proportionate Canadian value-added and a proportionate number of jobs guaranteed to be produced in Canada in proportion to the exchange of that commodity between the two countries. Perhaps the Hon. Member thinks he can change Bob White's mind and our minds by telling us that this is what we are looking for, that kind of arrangement in all sectors of trade between Canada and the United States which is precisely like the Auto Pact. Or are we going to stop this nonsense of describing the Auto Pact as a model for something of which it is not a model? If the Auto Pact is such an excellent arrangement, why is it that the Government persists in undermining it, as attested to by all the major domestic manufacturers, the unions—that is the assembly corporations such as Ford, GM and Chrysler—the UAW, the parts manufacturers and the tool makers? They are all complaining that if the Government continues in its present path of undermining the Auto Pact by encouraging the construction in Canada of assembly-only South Korean and Japanese plants, then all of 15,000 to 20,000 jobs, or perhaps as many as 200,000 jobs, may be lost because the Auto Pact has been undermined. Will you answer that question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I will ask the Hon. Member for Kootenay West (Mr. Brisco) to answer the question. However, I am sure we are talking about countervailing duties in the softwood industry. I do not think auto parts belong to the softwood industry.

Mr. McCurdy: On a point of order. The issue of the Auto Pact was raised in debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. Easy. Would the Hon. Member for Kootenay West answer the question, please?

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I can understand and appreciate the nature of the question. I am sure the Hon. Member also understands that the nirvana he seeks is beyond us. It is beyond any two trading nations which have free trade agreements. It is beyond more than two trading nations which have free trade arrangements in terms of guaranteeing the employment component or the degree to which productivity would be there.

In response to his alarm, I am reminded very much of the attitude we saw springing from some elements in the United States. The elephant was afraid of the mouse on enhanced trade. What I say to the Hon. Member is, for heaven's sake, where is it evident that in competing with overseas markets we have no courage? Do we have no courage at all?

Mr. McCurdy: That is not the question. Why are you misleading the people?

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I really do not know what the value of the interjection is.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I will allow the Hon. Member a supplementary question if we could just get this over with. There are still a couple of Hon. Members, both from the Hon. Member's Party and the other Party, who would like to speak. I would like to get all these Hon. Members in, if possible.

Mr. McCurdy: The Hon. Member knows very well that the Auto Pact does not constitute an example of the kind of free trade arrangement which the Government is trying to achieve. I do not mind there being a difference. However, I would like Government Members to cease communicating a message which belies the facts. The Auto Pact is not an example of free trade. It is an arrangement which guarantees a certain proportion of jobs and a certain proportion of production.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Hon. Member for Kootenay West has 30 seconds.

Mr. Brisco: It would take more than 30 seconds to try to drive the differences through the head of the Hon. Member, and I will leave that until later.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time for questions and comments is now terminated.

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the debate this afternoon, which has focused mainly on the softwood lumber problem and the dramatic and visible impact which would happen to a number of regions of our country if the United States were to impose countervailing duties.

I must say, though, that the debate has left me somewhat uneasy for a number of reasons. First, I would have liked a bit more attention paid to high technology. I believe we must use advanced technologies to revitalize our traditional industries as well as develop new industries. I am concerned that the Government may be ignoring the dynamic and changing nature of our economy. It was a concern expressed last week by the Science Council of Canada in a statement in which it said that there is a danger the Government may be attempting to preserve our past while sacrificing our future.

I am worried as well because the Government has not clearly stated the objective it seeks to achieve from a free trade arrangement. It has not clearly stated the details of such an agreement, or the sectors which it would favour or disfavour. I heard the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Kelleher) speak on Cross Country Check-up on Sunday last. He referred to Auto Pact as free trade. It is not free trade. I agree with the Hon. Member for Windsor—Walkerville (Mr. McCurdy) that the Minister, his Party and his colleagues are misleading the public about what this crucial question is all about.

I am concerned as well because—

—in Quebec we have a saying that one should not be more Catholic than the Pope. And in this debate on free trade, I often get the impression we are doing just that.

I wish the Secretary of State (Mr. Bouchard) would stay for a few minutes, because I have a few comments I would like him to hear, especially on the need for a good post-secondary education system in this country so that we can compete with the United States and other countries on world markets. I will get to that in a few seconds, if he could wait. As I was saying, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

I think there is a tendency in this country for us to be holier than the Pope, as we say, in our approach to trade issues. We continually focus on what we might have to give up in a trade arrangement with the Americans, on what constitutes a subsidy or on what is unfair competition in our practices in Canada. Every single item is mentioned in the media. We refer to the Unemployment Insurance Program as possibly being a subsidy in certain regions of the country. We refer to our regional development policies. These questions are on the front pages of our newspapers on a daily basis. We have a masochistic attitude about it.

I remember about two years ago when Bombardier was trying to negotiate a sale of subway cars to New York City, which it ultimately successfully negotiated. A question arose as to whether or not financing furnished by the Export Development Corporation might constitute an unfair subsidy. Canadian reporters went down to the United States. They talked to local Congressmen and said to them: "Here is the Export Development Corporation in Canada giving Bombardier a subsidy. Do you think it is fair?" What answer do you think the Congressmen in the United States gave, Mr. Speaker? Contrast that situation with what happens in the United States. Do we see articles in U.S. papers stating that this or that measure is protectionist, or that the U.S. defence industry favours American companies? Not at all. The approval of the U.S. Senate Finance Committee, which made headlines and which was the first item on the news here in Canada, attracted little attention in the United States. For the Americans we are but small potatoes. It is this imbalance between our two countries which gives me great cause for concern. I feel that the deck is stacked against us at the very outset because of the different sides of our two countries.

As I said earlier, the Government has failed to state its objectives in any more than a general way. I ask myself why. Is this part of its negotiating strategy? Or is it because the Government does not have any objectives? Personally, I think it is the latter. There is an absence of objectives. I listened to the last two speakers, members of the Conservative Party, who spoke in the House. In listening to them one would understand that free trade is seen by the Conservative Government as a substitute for a broad range of policies which are required to make Canada prosper. To them it is seen as the answer to all our problems, a panacea. Free trade is used by the Government as a mask to hide a series of incoherent policy decisions.

Several minutes ago my colleague from Windsor mentioned Hyundai, a Korean manufacturer setting up business in Canada. The Government gave Hyundai millions of dollars. Yet the representatives of that company said that they did not even want it. They did not even ask for a subsidy, but we were falling over ourselves trying to show that we created jobs in this particular industry. We did so regardless of the problems of over-capacity already in the industry and regardless of the fact that they were not asked to comply with the provisions of the Auto Pact. Millions of dollars were poured into an industry without any thought or concern for an over-all policy or for the over-all benefit which would accrue to Canadians.

The capital gains exemption of $500,000 in a taxpayer's lifetime is a boon for the rich. Every stockbroker, investment dealer and financial adviser in the country tells us that this measure will not achieve any substantial investment in the risky areas of our economy. The Government is willing to put money into the area but, as I said earlier, we are neglecting our human resources.

A Bill which is before Parliament today, Bill C-96, deals with post-secondary education and health, the established programs financing. In this Bill the Government is washing its hands of post-secondary education. We are cutting some $8 billion out of transfer payments which would otherwise have gone to the provinces for health and post-secondary education.

[Translation]

I would have liked to put the question directly to the Secretary of State. How are we going to compete with the United States if we do not have a good post-secondary education system in this country? Can we compete with the United States without world-class universities? Can we compete with the United Stated and the Japanese and the Europeans without centres of excellence in this country? What is the federal Government's role, Mr. Speaker? Why has the federal Government completely abdicated its responsibilities in this area?

[English]

Several months ago I read about three super computers which were being furnished to three different universities in the United States. I believe one was in New York State, another in Illinois and the third in California. The computers were being completely paid for by companies such as IBM, Kodak and Sperry. Why? The head offices of these companies are located in that country. They benefit from the research which is conducted at those universities. Their offices are located close to these universities. When do members of the Conservative Party think that companies such as IBM, Sperry and Kodak will finance research in Canadian industry or in Canadian universities in the same magnitude as they do in the United States? We have a tradition of Government involvement in building this country which is being totally ignored by the Conservative Party.

In the face of this absence of clarity, this absence of policy from Government, it was refreshing to see a statement last week put out by the Science Council of Canada in which it pointed out some of the things that Canadians should watch for as we undertake these bilateral trade negotiations. Earlier, I mentioned the absence of information regarding policies which the United States has which benefit and give an unfair advantage to its industries. The Science Council of Canada pointed out that, among other things, in the United States defence contracts make up a substantial component of regional development support, and much of the support for industry does not appear as direct budget outlay. Second, when dealing with non-tariff barriers, the U.S. market is far more protected than Canada. In 1982, the United States sectors protected overtly by non-tariff barriers covered 34 per cent of the market for American manufacturers. This shold be compared to the figure in Canada of just 10 per cent, the figure of 7 per cent in Japan and the figure of 20 per cent in West Germany. Canada is a most open economy when it comes to non-tariff barriers.

In a section of the study entitled "The U.S. Challenge", the Science Council pointed out that 55 per cent of all research and development in the United States is funded by the Government compared to 50 per cent in Canada. This is contrary to what we hear every day of the week. The bulk of this research and development is limited to defence, which of course will not be discussed during these negotiations. Defence was specifically excluded from the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade. Defence spending had grown to 65 per cent of federally funded research and development in the United States in 1984. In 1984, some $32 billion of federal research expenditures were employed for defence-related activities.

There are more interesting facts. Within the U.S. Department of Defense budget, less than 10 per cent of contracts are publicly advertised and 40 per cent are signed with companies that have a complete monopoly on the equipment. How does one expect Canadian companies to compete in that kind of a market? Foreign companies are not even allowed to bid on some of these prime contracts. Canadian advanced technology companies are denied access to SDI briefings. The Science Council study also points out that at the state level, there are so many initiatives to promote technological innovation that in 1984, the Office of Technology Assessment was unable to provide a comprehensive inventory of these programs.

In the military sector of the aerospace industry, American companies have a number of advantages. First, they have open access to bidding on defence contracts. Second, they have greater R and D support than Canadian companies. About 70 per cent of R and D costs are paid for by defence contracts in the United States versus only 30 per cent in Canada. Third, the cost of machinery is covered by Department of Defense contracts in the United States. Fourth, in terms of information access, several U.S. government-sponsored computer information systems are accessible only to U.S. users.

How are Canadian companies to get access to this information and these contracts? There is only one real way to get access, and that is, to join the United States, to become American. I am telling you today, Mr. Speaker, that under a free trade arrangement with the United States, we will not be given access to the bulk of U.S. defence contracts. We could have the best negotiators in the world on our side, and I give all due credit to the man heading the Canadian negotiating team, Mr. Reisman, but when it comes down to the crunch, Canadians will not be given total access.

The Science Council of Canada sets out four policy principles which it believes should guide bilateral negotiations, and I would just like to summarize them briefly in conclusion. First, the Science Council believes that a free trade agreement should permit measures which would protect and favour infant industries on a carefully defined, temporary basis. Second, and this is the point to which I referred just a moment ago, all United States and Canadian Governments should allow what is referred to as national treatment to both U.S. and Canadian firms when bidding on all Government contracts, research awards and development assistance. This will not happen. Third, both parties must develop a clear understanding of the range of science, technology and industrial policy measures that each Government may take without the risk of countervailing action.

Again, referring to the comments I made earlier, we have even taken up the American jargon during the course of this debate. We refer to a level or a fair playing field, but I think that Canadians must understand that each sovereign country develops its own way of dealing with problems and concerns. Canadians must demonstrate to Americans that just because an approach is a Canadian approach does not mean that it constitutes an unfair advantage, and that any deviation from American methods and approaches is not unfair just because it is not American. They have their particular distinctive ways of arriving at solutions as do we. We should be able to continue such an independent approach.

Fourth, and again I do not see this happening, both countries should provide equal access to briefings and Government-sponsored scientific and technical information systems to enable firms in both countries to respond promptly to government procurement opportunities. Again, I find it very difficult to see this being totally opened up in the context of such negotiations.

I understand that most of today's debate has dealt with the softwood lumber issue. I would hope that on another day in the near future, we would deal specifically with high technology and the future of high technology and its application to our traditional industries.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Hon. Member who just spoke is aware of what precipitated today's debate. I would like to ask him a question regarding that. On May 8, the President of the United States sent a letter to Senator Packwood, the Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, a committee which tied in a 10-10 vote as to fast tracking free-trade negotiations with Canada which are to begin the middle of next week. In that letter, the President said that he will press for an expedited resolution to this problem independent of the comprehensive trade negotiations and moreover that the President promised to take unilateral trade action if the bilateral lumber talks fail. We have that ongoing process involving the President, the United States administration, and its Senate Finance Committee, and Canada's largest single industry, largest single source of balance of trade, and second or third largest industry in the Province of Quebec.

I should like to ask the Hon. Member what he thinks about what is happening now. Representatives of the industry lobby in the United States have suspended temporarily their filing of a petition for a countervailing duty against Canadian softwoods until next Monday, although they were told by the Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Baldridge, that the clock is already running, to which I made reference earlier today. Rather than having to wait the full 20 days for a ruling on whether or not a countervail process will go ahead, they will only have to wait 13 calendar days from next Monday.

My question concerns the point of today's debate—whether or not Canada is steaming in the right direction. I think some enormous errors have been made by the Conservative administration on this issue, but I should like to know from the Hon. Member what he and his Party think about the proposal which will be carried forward by the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Kelleher) to Washington tomorrow. I am referring to the appointment of a Canadian envoy with very specific terms of reference on which to negotiate at very high speed on behalf of a $26 billion Canadian industry. Does the Hon. Member and his Party think that that process is likely to succeed?

Do they think it appropriate that the volume and price of Canadian softwood products going to the United States should be negotiated by the Canadian and U.S. envoys?

Mr. Berger: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his questions. With regard to the specifics, I defer to members of my Party who have a more intimate knowledge of the questions than I do. However, in general terms it is difficult for me to say whether this approach will succeed.

In the letter to Mr. Packwood from the President, the President said that he planned to take action independent of the trade negotiations. That indicated to me that we do not have a clean launch and that the President is saying that they will look after American interests immediately and quickly. It is not the only area on which Americans want quick settlement. In fact there are a number of other areas.

I see our being in a position where the big guy is getting nasty and is shoving us around and we are giving in. There is a possibility that we will give in on a number of essential points even before the negotiations have begun.

I found it rather remarkable—and I did not see anything in the press today—that the news last night included an item indicating that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Côté) would be tabling Canada's new policy in respect of generic drugs, whereas just two weeks ago he said that the legislation would not be introduced until the fall and that further negotiations were required with the provinces. How come the process has been speeded up all of a sudden? It seems to me that we are not seeing comprehensive negotiations. We are seeing a series of attempts to satisfy the Americans. They are pushing their weight and trying to settle items immediately in their favour. This prejudices the entire ensuing negotiations.

Mr. James: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is speaking more anti-American rhetoric than I have heard for a long time. It really concerns me.

The Hon. Member said that we as a Government were putting forward all the things we were giving up. I have never heard the Government talk about giving up anything. It is the Opposition which raises all the so-called things we will be giving up in the negotiations. The Opposition's reaction has been nothing but a negative one to the whole issue. I think the Hon. Member was a little confused when he talked about what was being given up.

Also he said that we were small potatoes, yet the dissertations of Hon. Members opposite all day have indicated that the United States would countervail us to death because we were so important. As has been the case all day, we just keep hearing counter-arguments.

Also he talked about objectives. I have not heard any mention of objectives or policy from his Party. There certainly appears to be a great division in his Party on what should happen in the negotiations with the United States.

As well he talked about the absence of clarity in policy. Honest to Pete, he should look inward to the policies of his cohorts; it seems that they have policies on both sides of the line.

Also he referred to non-tariff barriers in the United States and 34 per cent of the market. However, he seemed to indicate that we should not be negotiating with the U.S. to remove those non-tariff barriers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I do not like advising Hon. Members that if there are any meetings to be taken care of, they should be done behind the curtains, please. I am finding it very difficult to listen to the Hon. Member for Sarnia—Lambton (Mr. James) who, I believe, has finished his question. The Hon. Member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) has only 30 seconds in which to reply.

Mr. Berger: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I respectfully say to the Hon. Member that I do not think there is anything anti-American in my comments. I believe in taking a strong Canadian position. I believe in putting forward Canada's interest. I do not believe that our interests are always and inevitably totally associated with American interests, which Hon. Members of the Conservative Party seem to indicate.

Perhaps the Hon. Member should read what I said when I talked about what we have to give up. I was not saying that the Government was putting that forward. I was saying that there was an inevitable focus on that in our country and in our media because we are a much smaller country than the United States. The natural focus is on problems in Canada as opposed to those in the United States where Canadian trade with the U.S. is much less important than is our trade in our country, all proportions being respected.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, there is not a Canadian who does not realize that if Canada is to prosper, if people are to find work, and if our companies are to operate and make a profit, we require increasing trade between Canada and all other countries.

If we are to improve trade between Canada and other countries, we have to understand what are our needs, what are their needs, and particularly what are their policies to protect their people, just as we want to protect and improve the lot of Canadians.

We all know that grain farmers in western Canada are in a terrible situation. Many of them will be wiped out in the next few years, not because they cannot produce grain efficiently, but because of the actions of our traditional customers in western Europe who are members of the European Economic Community. They are subsidizing the production of grain in their countries so much that not only do they not purchase grain from us, but they compete in other markets with our farmers. Also we know that the new American policy of subsidizing export sales of grain for American farmers will destroy further markets for us.

The Government is urging us to sign quickly some kind of free trade deal with the United States. Just at the very time we are talking about that and we are lecturing Canadians that we should get on with the job and make concessions so that the Americans will agree to free trade between Canada and the U.S., the Americans are imposing countervailing duties on Canadians. They are proposing a 30 per cent countervail duty on softwood. That would affect British Columbia very quickly, but it is not just British Columbia that would be affected, the Atlantic provinces would also be affected. They have a forest industry, as does my Province of Manitoba and the Province of Saskatchewan. We do not hear about the things that the Americans do to protect their forest industry.

A few weeks ago the Americans imposed a countervail duty of 5.8 per cent on East Coast fish. The U.S. Commerce Department supported that position. It listed 55 federal and provincial programs ranging from fisheries research grants to grants for shipbuilding as constituting countervail subsidies.

I have before me a document prepared by our External Affairs Department which lists a large number of programs which the U.S. Government has established to assist its fishing industry. Let me read from this document. It says under the heading Direct Subsidies, loan guarantees for construction, reconstruction or reconditioning of fishing vessels. Then we see under Federal Tax Deferrals the fishing vessel capital construction fund for vessel acquisition. This program effectively provides an interest-free loan from the U.S. Government equal to the federal income taxes which otherwise would have to be paid. Next is Operating Cost Assistance. The Fishermen's Protective Act provides funds for fishing vessel and gear damage. Then we find Additional Measures. The Nicholson Act forbids foreign vessels from landing directly in U.S. ports, thus forcing Canadian boats to land in Canada and ship overland by truck, thereby increasing Canadian costs and making the Canadian fish less "fresh" than the U.S. product.

That is what the Americans do, Mr. Speaker, but when the Americans put a countervailing duty on Canadian fish, I did not hear the Minister for International Trade (Mr. Kelleher) saying to the Americans: "Hey, guys, you are doing the same thing as you are accusing us of doing." Not only did he not say it to the Americans, but he did not get up and tell Canadians how one-sided, how tunnel visioned, how unfair the Americans were during this so-called period of negotiations. He was silent. There was not a peep out of him. Why, Mr. Speaker? I believe he takes that attitude because he wants to sell this concept to the Canadian people and he knows that if they know the facts, they will not buy it.

The other day when my Leader, the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent), put some questions to the Government, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) answered by suggesting that my Leader and our Party were taking orders from the President of the Canadian Labour Congress, as if only labour is opposed to the free trade negotiations, as if only labour is worried that somehow in these negotiations Canadians would be hurt. Let me quote from a recent issue of the Winnipeg Free Press. I hope the Minister for International Trade will listen.

I want to put on the record the views, not of labour leaders in Manitoba, but of three farm leaders in Manitoba. These are not my concerns but their concerns. On April 24, 1986, in part the article quotes John Kuhl, Chairman of the Manitoba Vegetable Producers Marketing Board, as follows:

Manitoba vegetable growers cannot compete on equal terms with their American counterparts because of higher taxes, higher fuel prices and shorter growing seasons—

Next is Waldie Klassen, Chairman of the Manitoba Chicken Broiler Producers Marketing Board, who said:

As far as our industry is concerned it would have some far-reaching and devastating effects.

Most of our industry could disappear.

He was talking about free trade in agriculture. Then we have Jack Penner, President of the Keystone Agricultural Producers, an organization which represents all the producing groups of agriculture in Manitoba, who said he is worried:

—that agriculture has been combined with the food and beverage sector for negotiating purposes, which will make it harder to protect agricultural interests.

Our concern is that agriculture not be used to gain other advantages.

Who is he complaining about, Mr. Speaker? Who ignored agriculture? Who put somebody from the food industry as chairman of the advisory committee? It was the Minister for International Trade. Then the Government has the gall, the colossal nerve, when we are asking very legitimate questions about what is going to happen if we go ahead with free trade negotiations without protecting Canadians and asking who will be hurt, to answer with scare tactics and give us a smear campaign that we are speaking only for labour. Nothing could be further from the truth, Mr. Speaker, and the Minister for International Trade and the Secretary of State for External Affairs know that this is a fact. They know that more and more people and more and more groups are expressing opposition or asking some very important questions which need to be answered.

We are for enhanced trade. That is why we support it and have always supported the Auto Pact. If we are going to look at each sector of our economy to try to work arrangements with the USA, or Japan, the EEC or anybody else that will bring advantages to us and them, we are all for it. What we are opposed to is this blind rush to do things without looking at the real situation.

The Government knows because the departmental officials in External Affairs have done their job. They have given reports to the Government, about which the Government does not talk, which the Government would prefer to hide, which tell in detail the things the Americans do to protect their people, their jobs and their industries. It is this whole "buy American" policy. Why doesn't the Minister for International Trade and that great negotiator, Mr. Simon Reisman, come clean with Canadians? Why don't they tell Canadians: "Look, we are going to try to negotiate better trading arrangements with the U.S., but you have to know not only that there are 600 Bills before Congress calling for more protection, but the U.S. has since 1933 had policies to protect the United States market for Americans"? Even if we get a free trade agreement, Mr. Speaker, the ability of American states to hinder trade not only between Canada and the USA but between American states to protect their markets will still be there.

If we are going to have a serious, honest discussion on free trade, let the Government be honest. Let the Government tell Canadians what is involved. Let the Government tell Canadians about the benefits they will get but also about the harm that will be done to individuals and to many groups unless the Government of Canada is vigilant, tough and negotiates as an equal, not as a supplicant to the Americans. We cannot be telling the Americans that we will do anything as long as they give us a few bones to chew on.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 66 deemed to have been moved.

HOUSING—FUNDING OF PROGRAMS. (B) EXTENSION OF 1985 PROGRAMS—INTERIM FUNDING

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, in December, 1985, the Minister of Labour (Mr. McKnight), who is responsible for CMHC, announced in the House of Commons a new housing program. A National Direction for Housing Solutions outlined five major program areas, but provided no details. It is now May 13 and not one of these programs is in place. Not one bit of federal money has gone toward the building of one housing unit so desperately needed in Canada.

On May 5 I asked the Minister in this House where the new housing programs are which he promised. Five months into 1986 he answered:

Mr. Speaker, the answer is apparent. Due to the change in delivery and cost sharing, effective in 1986, operating agreements with the provincial housing corporations have to be negotiated.

With all due respect, that answer is not apparent. What kind of Minister plans a year's housing programs which, almost half way through the year, are not in place because he still has to get agreement on the very housing programs that he wants to use?

On May 5 I also asked in this House whether, acting on precedent, the Minister could have either extended 1985 programs or provided interim funding for projects which are ready to go. When it became apparent that these agreements were not going to be negotiated until early in 1986, why the Minister did not bring forward a contingency plan for this year's housing. Why did he not extend the Section 56.1 program or the RRAP program until the negotiations were finalized?

The consequences of this delay are almost criminal. In Toronto, city delivery agents have been anxiously awaiting the announcements and the budgets for the RRAP programs since December. On the homeowner and disabled program, they were told funding would come through early in April. It did not. There are real emergencies which are not being dealt with. In Toronto the municipal delivery agents, such as the Non-profit Housing Corporation, are on the verge of sending applicants to apply under the provincial renovations programs in Ontario, which are not nearly as good as the federal program for homeowners, because they have no idea when the federal RRAP budget is coming through. Month after month it was promised that the money is coming, the application forms are coming, and the criteria are coming, but only rumours come.

An example of the tragic consequences of the delay is a disabled man in Toronto who has requested RRAP assistance in order to get his motorized wheelchair out of his home. Recently he has had to go to the hospital three days a week and, because he has not had the RRAP assistance to make his home accessible, he must pay out of his meagre pension to take a taxi each time.

The consequences do not stop there. The entire building season in northern Manitoba may well have been lost because building materials would have had to be transported in on the winter roads. They will now have to wait until next year. Those co-ops and non-profit groups which may be so lucky as to one day get start-up funds will, in all likelihood, be building next fall and winter and paying premium rates for heated concrete and any number of expensive alterations to building procedures to cope with the cold weather. The money spent on this will obviously be taken out of the other aspects of the design which might have added to the comfort and quality of the housing. It may even reduce the number of units built. This money is to pay for the Minister's delay.

I suggest that the Minister has been almost criminally negligent. Homeless people died in Toronto. An evicted tenant committed suicide in Vancouver. The answer to the pleas for someone to pay attention to the needs of Canadians desperate for housing was met time and time again in the House of Commons with the answer that the negotiations were ongoing with the provinces and a bigger and better housing program for needy Canadians was at hand, if they live that long.

I also suggest that the Minister and CMHC officials continue to mislead Members of Parliament and the public about these programs, however unintentionally. Last week my office received a notice from the Minister announcing that he had authorized the release of the 1986 RRAP budget. That is false. As of today no delivery agents have been told this. Even in his announcement he states that "CMHC will be in touch with local municipalities and delivery agents shortly to inform them of their homeowner RRAP allocations". "Shortly" is not "now". That program has not started. He states further that "the rental RRAP and the RRAP for the disabled will be delivered once the appropriate regulatory changes are obtained. I expect these will be finalized shortly". "Shortly", again, is not "now". Since this is the same thing as he has been saying since December, can we expect to wait for another five months?

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Canada Post): Mr. Speaker, the Minister and his officials are now completing what has been a most extensive and productive consultation and negotiation process on new housing directions which will focus on assisting those Canadians most in need. This lengthy process has meant meetings with the provinces and many representatives of housing interest groups, non-profit associations, native organizations and the real estate and building industry. As well, over 300 written briefs have been reviewed.

Over the past few months, planning and negotiations with the provinces have resulted in the implementation of social housing programs that both maintain federal objectives and meet the identified needs of the various provinces and territories. Most important, the provincial cost-sharing arrangements, along with targeting to households in core need, will more than double the number of housing units produced this year for those who must pay more than 30 per cent of their income for suitable, adequate accommodation.

At times, the negotiations have been complex, but the Minister is pleased to advise that eight global agreements have already been signed outlining the partnership arrangements between the federal and provincial Governments. In addition, detailed operating agreements have been signed with two of the provinces, and the final agreements should all be completed in the next few weeks. The Minister has authorized the release of the budgets of the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program for home owners and native people on-reserve to repair their houses. The remaining RRAP budgets will be allocated very shortly. The Minister would like this House to know as well that the Co-operative Housing Program is well under way. Sponsoring groups are submitting projects, and Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation officials are in the process of selecting those that will proceed in 1986. Proposal development funding has been made available to groups to assist them.

All in all, implementation of the programs is progressing well and we expect to complete all the arrangements within the next few weeks.

CANADA POST CORPORATION—PRIVATE ENTERPRISE DOOR-TO-DOOR DELIVERY

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise this evening to pursue a question I put to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister responsible for Canada Post (Mr. Domm) on February 25 concerning the delivery of mail. I asked whether or not Canada Post would be encouraged to contract out more of its services in order to reduce the Corporation's costs and increase its efficiency. I also pointed out that many Canadians who do not receive door-to-door delivery are hiring enterprising young people to pick up their mail from community boxes and deliver it to their homes on a daily basis.

Just last weekend I noticed an article in the Ottawa Citizen which profiled a local entrepreneur who has begun this kind of service for a monthly fee of less than $12. I believe this is an excellent initiative, and I certainly hope Canada Post officials will encourage more enthusiastic business people to undertake the same service in other communities. Had the Speaker afforded me the opportunity on February 25 to put a supplementary question, it would have concerned whether the extra amount paid by Canadians to obtain adequate door-to-door mail delivery service could be tax deductible. I look forward to speaking about that at another time.

Canadians are well aware of the serious problems facing Canada Post. Despite a five-year deficit reduction program which was to have eliminated Government subsidies by this year, Canada Post continues to mount severe losses. In 1985 this loss amounted to well over $300 million. Projections indicate that further deficits will continue. The Marchment report highlighted a number of other problems such as service, delivery, labour relations, financing and management.

In the recent federal Budget, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) stated that the Government is determined to come to grips with the financial and operating problems of Canada Post. The Government has also indicated that the corporation will be required to develop a new operating plan to improve productivity in order to reduce its operating deficit to zero by the end of fiscal year 1987-88.

I would like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary if that plan is now in place and if it includes greater contracting out of services. In addition, I trust that entrepreneurs will be allowed and encouraged to provide delivery service door-to-door from community boxes. I understand that this kind of service may involve a violation of the "exclusive right" privilege Canada Post enjoys to collect and deliver mail. If so, I would suggest that it is time to redefine that "exclusive right" privilege in order to increase the competition of mail delivery.

If this country is to enjoy effective and efficient mail delivery, we must meet the challenge of improving Canada Post. It is time to take immediate action to reduce costs by contracting out services and introducing greater private sector opportunities in mail delivery.

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Canada Post): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post has the mandate to provide Canadians with convenient and efficient service at a reasonable cost. Over the last three years, the corporation has extended door-to-door mail delivery to over 340,000 addresses in Canada.

Last June, the corporation announced plans to upgrade delivery service to more than 200,000 additional addresses during the current fiscal year by readjusting letter carrier routes or by providing mail delivery through group mailboxes or community mailboxes.

These initiatives clearly demonstrate the corporation's concern in providing convenient service to all its customers and achieving financial self-sufficiency as requested by its shareholder, the Government of Canada.

These alternate means of mail delivery—group mailboxes and community mailboxes—are not exclusive to Canada. While these alternate modes of delivery offer convenience to customers and contribute substantially to reduce the deficit of Canada Post, it is understandable that some private citizens might want to contract the delivery of their mail from the postal station or group mailbox directly to their home.

Although Canada Post does not support such a service, principally on the grounds of security of the mail, it cannot refuse to hand over the mail to a third party when authorization that can be verified has been given by the customer.

It should, however, be clear that these particular arrangements are made solely between these individual contractors and their clients, and that Canada Post is not part of the contract. The corporation's responsibility for ensuring the security of the mail extends only to the point of delivery, should it be a local postal station, a lock box, a group mailbox or a community mailbox.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

AMENDMENT CONCERNING BENEFITS—EARLY RETIREES

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Today, Mr. Speaker, over 1,000 elderly Canadians demonstrated on Parliament Hill to defend their rights. Once again, unfortunately, they were forced to protest against the Conservative Government's decision to deprive 34,000 Canadians of the unemployment insurance benefits for which they have paid.

Mr. Speaker, these 1,000 Canadians are not alone: more than 5,000 others from all ridings throughout Canada have signed petitions to denounce this measure.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, a Conservative Member crossed the floor today because he can no longer accept the policies of this Government. I hope Quebec Members will wake up instead of walking out one after another, and urge the Minister to reconsider this decision which is unfair to Canadian early retirees.

TRADE

STEEL EXPORTS AND IMPORTS

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, by early June of this year the International Trade Commission in Washington will rule on whether Canadian steel products are being dumped into the United States. This ruling can affect all steel producers in Canada and particularly inflict serious harm on Ipsco Steel of Regina.

What Ipsco and its workers need is the public support of the Government in the fight against the growing tide of American protectionism. Just as important, the Government has to become proactive rather than reactive when it comes to the importation of steel products from such countries as South Korea. Both union and management of Ipsco have endorsed the following actions to be implemented by the Government; first, more thorough monitoring of steel imports into Canada, second, tightening the inspection of steel imports and, third, the removal of special tariff concessions on steel imports from such countries as South Korea, Brazil, and Argentina.

No other major trading bloc extends such preferential tariffs on steel. Canadian steel exports are threatened in the United States while foreign—

AIRPORTS

MERGING OF DEPARTMENTS' SECURITY PROCEDURES ADVOCATED

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound—Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, in this day and age of rampant international terrorism, we as parliamentarians must take every precaution to protect the Canadian people. Our peace-loving nation is an integral cog in the wheels of the world and, therefore, our own airport security is of paramount importance.

Before Parliament, I advocate the mating of two government Departments in the interest of public safety. The transportation and national defence sectors of the Government would do well to join forces toward securing Canadian airports from certain undesirable factions circulating freely around the globe. Our highly trained Armed Forces personnel should be placed visibly inside our international airports as is the case throughout Europe and points beyond.

We are not a threatening people, but we must use the suggestion of force to deter terrorists who use their political beliefs to bludgeon justice on a world-wide scale. We must be quickly convinced our airport security is sadly inadequate, and right the situation—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Sixty seconds.

PETRO-CANADA

PRICE OF GASOLINE

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, my constituents continue to be disappointed that oil companies are not passing on the savings in world oil prices to consumers.

Unfortunately, there is a very real lack of competition in the market-place. Prices rise, and sometimes fall, in unison and without explanation. Where is the consumers' power to regulate the market-place if in fact they have no real choice? Perhaps there are indeed too few genuine competitors as a result of recent takeovers.

Perhaps some of the problem lies with Petro-Canada which seems to follow the market when there is a downward trend but, according to reports, leads the market when there is an upward trend. Many of my constituents believe that the time has come for the Government to get rid of Petro-Canada. They believe an aggressive investor-owned company would mean more genuine competition in the market-place and hence lower gas prices.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

CALL FOR INTERNATIONAL STANDARDS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): As you know, Mr. Speaker, there are some 374 nuclear reactors in the world in 26 different nations. The International Atomic Energy Agency has virtually no muscle or power to implement safety measures in order to protect human health. Recent events require intervention on a global scale in order to protect human health from any possibility of similar incidents occurring.

Therefore, I once again call on the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) to take an initiative in the name of Canada, and all the 26 nations which have nuclear reactors within their boundaries, to establish, first, international standards—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Sixty seconds.

THE ECONOMY

REDUCTION IN INTEREST RATES

Mr. Jim Jepson (London East): Mr. Speaker, the gears in the market-place are really turning now because interest rates are going down fast. While low interest rates make the economy work, they are also a sign that people have confidence in the Government and in the productivity of their investments. The previous Liberal Government policies were responsible for a prime business rate of almost 23 per cent in 1981. When you compare that to a current prime rate of 10.5 per cent, it is obvious that the Conservative economic agenda is right on target.

There is now no reason for home owners to give up their homes because of unaffordable mortgage payments. Rates of over 20 per cent under the Liberals have now fallen to close to 10 per cent, and are still dropping steadily.

While the central bank rate has been going down, it is clear that the chartered banks do not want to pass this on to borrowers as quickly as they pass on increases. Consumer and business credit markets depend on a competitive environment and the Government should take steps to see that our banks pass on these decreases and not skim off added profits at the expense of Canadians.

LEVEL OF FUNDING FOR NON-PROFIT ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, the Government has decided that part of its famous "jobs, jobs, jobs" strategy will be to cut funding for summer students who could be hired by many non-profit groups which in previous years qualified for job creation money. Over 60 non-profit organizations in Toronto, which received wage subsidies under the Challenge '85 Program last year, will not get funding this year. Planning for programs and services those agencies provide has been wasted because it is too late for them to seek funding elsewhere.

• (1410)

What is involved is a reduction in the amount of money spent in the program and a shift from non-profit organizations, such as day camps for children, to profit-making enterprises.

According to a report in The Globe and Mail, two of the companies involved are Magna International and Bell Canada. Is this called helping those who need it least? This is just another example of the Conservatives blindly following ideology at the expense of average Canadians, in this case young workers and the recipients of the services of non-profit organizations.

IMMIGRATION

CALL FOR INCREASED LEVELS

Mr. Jack Scowen (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, it appears obvious that many of Canada's present economic problems are related to its vast size and, in particular, to our small population. We rely on exports for our lumber, fish, mining, and agricultural products to such an extent that we often get caught in a buyer's market where we must produce below costs.

Think of the difference if we consumed most of our own resources. What we need is an influx of people such as we had during the early 1900s and after the two Great Wars, which were some of the boom periods in our country's economy.

We should be welcoming new Canadians at a rate per month that we permit per year.

AIR TRANSPORT

PRICE OF AIRLINE TICKETS

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to protest the price of airline tickets.

During the 1970s when the price of gasoline was quadrupling the airlines kept putting up the price of tickets and told us it was because gasoline was getting more and more expensive. Last week I checked with an airline company and found out that approximately 40 per cent of the price of a ticket goes to the cost of fuel. If gasoline prices have been falling and falling, as they have been over the last months, why have airline ticket prices not been falling as well? This is something which I protest.

I urge the airlines of Canada to pass on the savings which they are now realizing to the people who are travelling.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ISRAEL—INDEPENDENCE DAY ANNIVERSARY

Mr. Bill Attewell (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, 38 years ago today Jews around the world rejoiced in the creation of the State of Israel. In 1948, on the fifth day of Iyar in the Hebrew calendar, a state was created, the realization of a Zionist dream and a haven for the homeless in the tragic aftermath of the Holocaust. Today, as we celebrate Israel's Independence Day, Israel is a vibrant, beautiful state—the desert blooms.

While the past 38 years have been marked by a number of conflicts, and it has not yet been possible to achieve a lasting and just peace, the achievements made during this relatively short period of history have not only been remarkable but also have been a justifiable source of pride to Israelis and to Jews around the world.

The leaders and the people of Israel are in our prayers. May Israel continue to grow in peace. Shalom.

ALBERTA—ASSISTANCE FROM GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, for a few moments I would like to talk to Members of the House about some of the concerns of the Province of Alberta.

As most people in Canada know, we are largely a resource based economy. Right now two of our main resources are facing very serious difficulties. The first one, of course, is in the petroleum and gas sector, where prices are down, investment is slipping, and gas is soon to be deregulated, which will also result in a drop in prices.

The second resource is that of agriculture. Again we have the same problem—lower prices and a high debt ratio for many of our farmers. As a result of that, very little spending is being done by our farmers, which has had a dramatic effect on the Alberta economy.

Essentially, I would like to see the Government look at a couple of things.

First, I ask the Government to urge all Departments to get involved with provincial officials to talk about the programs which are available, and to talk about assistance which is available to put Alberta on a fast track to make the kind of decisions which are necessary to help the economy.

The second one—

JOB RE-ENTRY PROGRAM—REFUSAL OF CORNER BROOK APPLICATION

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, the Government has been claiming that the way to create jobs in the country is by supporting small business. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) has claimed that job-creation dollars and training dollars should be geared to small business.

Mr. Speaker, you can imagine my surprise when I heard from the President of the Newfoundland Career Academy in Corner Brook, Newfoundland, yesterday, that his application to train 30 people under the Job Re-entry Program to give them entrepreneurial skills had been turned down by the federal Government. When he asked why that application had been turned down, he was advised by the Minister's official that it was because there were no entrepreneurial skills or opportunities for entrepreneurs in western Newfoundland. This kind of double-talk, on the one hand claiming that small business is important and is the backbone of the economy, and on the other telling Newfoundlanders that there are no opportunities for entrepreneurs in Newfoundland, simply will not wash.

• (1415)

The Government ought to get its act together, come clean with the people of Newfoundland and put its money where its mouth is. The propaganda will not carry any longer.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

RESIGNATION OF FORMER MINISTER OF REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION—ESTABLISHMENT OF INQUIRY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The Prime Minister assured Canadians that an inquiry into the dealings of the former Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion would be launched without delay. If there has been a delay, is it because the Government is having some difficulty finding someone willing to undertake the inquiry now that the Prime Minister has poisoned the atmosphere of impartiality?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the last unworthy comment made by the right hon. gentleman, if there has been any poisoning of the atmosphere, something which I refuse to believe, it has been by that kind of question that has been asked since last Monday.

The short answer to the question is that active efforts are currently under way to identify an impartial person to undertake the investigation as to facts. It is the Prime Minister's intention that the identification of the impartial person to head that investigation should get under way just as quickly as possible.

INQUIRY'S TERMS OF REFERENCE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the reason for the delay might also be that the terms of reference are proving difficult to draft. I recall to the Deputy Prime Minister that the Prime Minister said in the House on September 9 that any such inquiry should deal simply with the facts. Is the Government attempting to draft terms of reference that are so wide and that deal with the general issue of conflict of interest guidelines so as to obscure the real issue which is the conduct of the former Minister?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Not at all, Mr. Speaker. Quite the contrary. As I have assured the House on Monday, Tuesday, and again today, the terms of reference will take into account the allegations made in the House of Commons, both temperate and intemperate. They will take into account the allegations made in the newspapers, both temperate and intemperate. They will take into account the allegations made in the electronic media, both temperate and intemperate. It will be in the context of the conflict of interest Code of Conduct for public office holders, in addition to the Prime Minister's letter of September 9 to the former Minister and other members of his Ministry.

INQUIRY WHY GOVERNMENT DOES NOT HAVE INVESTIGATION CONDUCTED BY PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, you know the terms of reference will be very vague.

My question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Why not have an inquiry before a parliamentary committee, so that the former Minister can be judged by his peers in the House, instead of a judicial inquiry that will deal with a purely political question?

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have answered that question before as well. I am sure that the hon. gentleman, by his own questioning and by that of his colleagues since Monday, should recognize the fact that the atmosphere in the House and in its committees is now so bitterly partisan that it would be very difficult to apply oneself to an investigation of the facts with impartiality.

I might say that the process is nothing new. It was exposed on September 9, 1985, and indeed has been followed in the past. I remind the Right Hon. Member that this is the course that was requested—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question was short.

EXAMINATION OF CONFLICT OF INTEREST GUIDELINES

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, to be absolutely clear, the House is interested in whether or not the Minister has violated these guidelines. I ask the Acting Prime Minister for his assurance that the Government will not throw up another diversionary tactic by asking the commission also to examine the question of revisions to the guidelines and other guidelines. It is these guidelines that we allege have been violated.

• (1420)

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am totally familiar with the allegations of the hon. gentleman, of other members of his Party, of those in the New Democratic Party, and those in the newspapers and the electronic media. I can assure him that the conflict of interest Code of Conduct which was tabled September 9, 1985, will be the code that is looked at. I would not wish, as I am sure he would not, the impartial person investigating the facts in these circumstances to confine himself to the 1985 package tabled because it may well be that the circumstances might relate to the guidelines which were in place under the former Government, and which were in place until September, 1985, so there are two there.

INVESTIGATION OF MINISTER'S CONDUCT

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I accept the point just made by the Acting Prime Minister, and I agree with it. The allegations are part of the case, but when a cloud is thrown, as it has been thrown, over the conduct of a Minister, will the inquiry be free to examine all the conduct of the Minister, the appointments he has made and the decisions he has made as a Minister, which may have been affected by the conflict of interest we have put forward in the House?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think I have made it abundantly clear. I have said that I would expect the terms of reference to include all the allegations which have been made in the House by himself and others in the Opposition, all the newspaper allegations, and all the electronic media allegations. They have covered such broad ground that I cannot really imagine how an impartial person investigating the facts would fail to take into account all of the wide range of allegations which have been made.

INQUIRY'S FINDINGS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary questions are on the same subject matter. In the past couple of days the Deputy Prime Minister has indicated, with reference to the letter of September 9 to Members of Parliament and Senators, that there would be an impartial inquiry into the facts. I think he used that phrase 14 times two days ago. He also indicated that factual allegations coming from this side of the House, the media and so on, will be considered. One thing he has not told us is if the inquiry will make a judgment on whether or not there has been, in the opinion of the inquirer, a conflict of interest. Is that part of the mandate?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party describes as fact allegations which he and others in the Opposition have been making. Surely the task of the impartial investigation is to establish what is fact and what is not, if there is any factual substance to the allegations which have been made. That, I would expect, would be totally open to the impartial investigation process by the impartial person to conduct it when that person is identified and named.

MANDATE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I will go back and ask the question again, and maybe I will get an answer. Will the Deputy Prime Minister answer the question? In terms of the mandate being given to this inquiry, will Members of Parliament, or whoever will see the recommendation when it comes, have the following question answered by the inquiry: was there or was there not a conflict of interest? Is a judgment to be passed as part of the mandate requirement for the inquiry?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Well, of course, Mr. Speaker, that would be the purpose—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: They say "Oh, oh!" That is the whole—

Mr. de Jong: Is it so hard to say yes or no?

Mr. Nielsen: The whole purpose of the impartial investigation of the facts in the context of the conflict of interest code applicable to public office holders is to determine whether or not there has been a breach, as has been alleged so many times, real or apparent.

• (1425)

ROLE OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, that is the first time the Deputy Prime Minister has said he is going to make a judgment on whether or not there has been a conflict of interest. The Deputy Prime Minister is shaking his head. Is he aware that by going outside Parliament for an inquiry of this kind to make a judgment about conflict of interest he is, in fact, going outside the terms of reference of the letter from the Prime Minister of September 9 that makes no such reference, and is he aware that he is denying the whole parliamentary tradition of having the privileges and elections committee reach such decisions, and not an outsider?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is simply untrue.

Mr. Broadbent: Which is?

Mr. Nielsen: There have been instances in the past where this route has been followed. I will agree with the Member that in this instance the process that is being followed for the first time is different from past precedents, but it should come as no surprise to the Member because the possibility of that new process being invoked was tabled as part of the package last September, 1985.

Mr. Broadbent: No. Give us the reference for that.

Mr. Nielsen: It certainly was. That is the process being invoked now.

GUIDELINES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. In his answer to the previous question, he indicated to the House for the first time that this impartial person conducting the investigation will decide if there has been a breach of the guidelines. I wish I had before me the letter sent by the Prime Minister on September 9 in which he said that he had no intention of delegating his responsibility, and that the ultimate responsibility for deciding whether someone had infringed the guidelines was his.

How come the Government's policy has changed?

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): It has not changed whatsoever, Mr. Speaker. I thought it would have been apparent to even a simpleton that the impartial investigation would have to be done in the context of the conflict of interest code, all of its provisions, which among others provides for avoiding any breach or apparent breach. In addition, I have told the House repeatedly that the letter of the Prime Minister to each of his Ministers tabled on September 9, 1985, will be part of those terms of reference. I do not know how I can make it any clearer.

OBJECT OF INQUIRY

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister could considerably clarify the situation, something he seems to have trouble doing, by giving the House the assurance that this so-called independent and impartial inquiry will consider only one main question, namely whether or not the guidelines were breached, because at the rate the Deputy Prime Minister is using this inquiry as a catch-all for any number of items, it will be utter confusion and no one will know what is going on. Please give us the assurance that only the main question will be considered for a decision.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Too long, much too long.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Let us know whether or not the guidelines were breached.

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, for two and a half weeks now they have covered a broad gamut of allegations. Now they seem to be requesting me to ensure somehow that we confine the inquiry instead of addressing all of the allegations that have come forward.

Mr. Gauthier: We want an inquiry here.

Mr. Nielsen: It seems to me, Sir, that what they wish to do now is to undermine the credibility of an impartial person before he is identified, or she, and before their appointment and before the terms of reference have even been set. That is impartiality, I ask you.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is Hon. Members' time. The Hon. Member for Regina West.

AIRPORTS

AWARDING OF SECURITY CONTRACT AT MONTREAL AIRPORTS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Transport told us that he investigated the companies involved with the recent award to supply security services at Montreal airports. He said he was aware of who owned the company that would replace Burns Security which backed out of its contract while its employees were on strike.

Is the Minister aware that this new company, which has received a $1 million contract, is not even two weeks old and is not even a licensed security agency in any province? Is the company bonded? Is it insured? Is this increasing the standards of airport security? Under whose licence will it be operating?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the House yesterday, there are two firms to which Air Canada has turned over the security service as a result of Burns Security's desire to remove itself. The two firms in question were taking over the existing contract which was originally awarded to Burns.

I am still checking out more of the details. There have been further revelations in the press which I am going to check out. I will certainly make that information available to the Hon. Member and the House as soon as I can ascertain the details and the answers to the questions which have been posed.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Regina West may ask one supplementary question.

PARENT COMPANY INQUIRY

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister tell us if this new company is a front intending to operate under a licence held by another company which is owned in part by the wife of a cabinet Minister? Why did these people get a $1 million contract as their first job before they were even licensed? Why does the parent company hold contracts for Regina, Saskatoon, and Winnipeg? Is there not a conflict of interest here, too?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there are a number of allegations contained in the Hon. Member's question to which I am certainly not going to subscribe without checking out the facts. My understanding is that some of the contracts which were awarded in the western region of Canada were awarded in March of 1986.

With regard to the allegation with respect to the Hon. Senator's wife, the Senator made a statement in the Senate yesterday clarifying that position. I am sure that, in the interest of ensuring that there is not or does not seem to be a conflict of interest, the Hon. Senator has taken the right steps.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF NEW ZEALAND MINISTER OF THE ENVIRONMENT AND MINISTER OF HOUSING

Mr. Speaker: May I draw to the attention of Members the presence in our gallery of the Hon. Phil Goff, Minister of the Environment and Minister of Housing for New Zealand.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF INDONESIAN MINISTER OF TRADE

Mr. Speaker: I would also like to draw to the attention of the House the presence of Dr. Rachmat Saleh, the Minister of Trade for Indonesia.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST GUIDELINES—GOVERNMENT RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. In the September 9, 1985, letter to MPs it says: "—circumstances may arise that call for an impartial investigation of conduct as it pertains to fact." It says further that: "—making use of these instruments will not relieve the Government of its responsibility to decide and to stand accountable before Parliament".

Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us today what made him and the Prime Minister change their minds as to that particular sentence in the declaration of September 9, 1985?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that misquoted portion of the letter to which the hon. gentleman has just referred. When he was quoting the letter, he inserted words which are not in the letter in the order which he has outlined.

Mr. Boudria: Oh, yeah? Which ones?

Mr. Nielsen: There has been no change of policy. The open letter to Members and Senators from the Prime Minister provided that there may be circumstances which would require the appointment of an impartial person to conduct an investigation as to facts. If the hon. gentleman reviews the "blues", he will see that he inserted words which were not in that letter.

INQUIRY WHY GOVERNMENT DOES NOT PERMIT STANDING COMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS, PRIVILEGES AND PROCEDURES TO CONDUCT INQUIRY

Mr. Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, that is certainly not the case, and as my supplementary, since in the same letter the Prime Minister says that the responsibility for the standards of conduct of the federal Government and Cabinet lies ultimately with the Prime Minister, I would like to ask whether the Prime Minister has also dissociated himself from this part of his letter? If not, why won't he let the House, through the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedures, investigate this question and draw its own conclusions instead of having a so-called independent enquirer who, as far as we and most people can see, will try to cover up the truth?

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the allegation imbedded in the question of the hon. gentleman is utterly false. The Prime Minister fully stands by the conflict of interest code which was tabled in September, 1985. He fully stands by the letter of September 9 to his Ministers. He fully stands by the open letter to Members and Senators, which was tabled as part of the package, and every other part of the conflict of interest package which was tabled in September, 1985.

Mr. Boudria: Why are you not doing it?

Mr. Nielsen: He says: "Why are you not doing it?" The Prime Minister is doing it as quickly as possible. An impartial person will be identified as quickly as possible. The investigation will proceed as quickly as possible. It will report as quickly as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PRIME MINISTER'S LETTER

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister indicated that the Prime Minister fully stands by his letter. I would like the Deputy Prime Minister to explain to me and to the House where in the letter there is reference to the right of an independent investigator to find that there is or is not a conflict of interest.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): That's a new addendum to the letter.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, surely the purpose of the investigation as to facts would be—

Mr. Broadbent: That's not the question.

Mr. Nielsen: —to see whether or not there was an actual or apparent breach of the Code of Conduct. I cannot put it more simply or clearly than that—

Mr. Broadbent: Or inaccurately.

Mr. Nielsen: It is not inaccurate.

Mr. Gauthier: Sure it is.

Mr. Nielsen: —as being the role of an impartial investigation as to facts. It must do two things: one, investigate; two, report.

RESPONSIBILITY OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Does the Deputy Prime Minister understand that in the letter it says that: "—circumstances may arise that call for an impartial person to conduct an investigation as to fact"? It goes no further than that. Is he not aware that the Prime Minister also goes on to say that the "—responsibility of government and the supremacy of Parliament are respected and reinforced", and that that supremacy and responsibility require that Parliament make the judgment as to ethical standards of Members of Parliament in the House of Commons?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. gentleman knew the system and this place better than that.

Mr. Deans: I know it very well.

Mr. Nielsen: He is omitting to say that, in addition to the code that will be looked at by an impartial person investigating the facts, are the letter of September 9, and all of the allegations that have been made over the course of at least two and a half weeks. With respect to the point about Parliament, the Hon. Member will appreciate that the option is there for the report to be referred to a standing committee of this House.

Mr. Deans: Where is the option?

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. gentleman says "Where is the option?" It is inherent in the prerogative of the Prime Minister which we are dealing with here.

Mr. Blackburn (Brant): It's in invisible ink.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT IS WILLING TO WITHDRAW RETROACTIVE PROVISION CONCERNING BENEFITS

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

This morning, more than 1,000 senior citizens were on Parliament Hill to protest the decision made by the Minister on January 5 to cut unemployment insurance benefits. Is the Minister willing to admit today that these people have been unfairly penalized, especially since, this morning, some people proved to us that their unemployment insurance benefits were now down to only $12 a week? Is the Minister prepared to withdraw a retroactive measure that affects 34,000 people?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I had an opportunity to meet the leaders of this group at noon, and we discussed their concerns. As you know, I have received a number of representations from various groups on the same subject. That is why I have asked Mr. Forget to look into the details of this question and give me his recommendations.

INQUIRY WHY MINISTER DID NOT AWAIT FORGET COMMISSION RECOMMENDATION BEFORE MAKING DECISION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, we have this stupid reply from the Minister, while the people up there are losing 200—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Just the question!

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, does the Minister realize that the people who are here today are losing $200 a month in income? Why did the Minister ask the Forget Commission's advice and cut unemployment insurance cheques? Why didn't she ask for a decision by the Forget Commission but let these people draw their cheques?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please!

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the amendments to these regulations were announced by the Minister of Finance in 1984, and as we all know, since that time we have debated the question here in the House and I am now waiting for Mr. Forget's recommendations.

REDUCTION IN BENEFITS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, and it is prompted by today's demonstration by thousands of people on Parliament Hill.

Can the Minister explain why the Government continues to deny unemployment insurance benefits to pensioners in spite of the fact that, since early January, this Government policy has been rejected in practically all 400 appeals filed in Quebec against such cut-backs?

• (1440)

[English]

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, a number of appeals have been heard by boards of referees. As Members will know, a number of decisions have been made upholding the claimants' appeals. A great many more decisions have been made which denied the appeals. Because of these conflicting rulings, the next step will be to refer the matter to a higher level of judicial review. That process is taking place.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Can the Minister explain why the Government has chosen to harass people who won their appeals before the arbitrator, by taking them to a higher court? This forces them to continue without the revenue which is their due. Why did she harass those people when in Quebec 400 cases went for the claimants and only 10 for the Department?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this is one of the few times I have heard an individual Member of Parliament argue against the judicial process. This process allows people to proceed through different levels of review and, Sir, that is taking place.

HEALTH

WEST COAST RADIOACTIVITY REPORTS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock—North Delta): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. People on the West Coast are understandably concerned about the reports of radioactive contamination of rainwater. The Minister has given both assurances and a caution on this subject. Can he take this opportunity to give us an update on the situation in order to reassure people out there?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as of this morning background radiation in the air in B.C. is down. That includes rainwater, and water in the Coquitlam reservoir. As far as milk is concerned, we are testing it daily. I note the B.C. Minister of Health has indicated there is no problem. We have found no traces in milk but we are testing daily as a precaution.

CHANGE IN REGULATIONS—PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY CAUCUS INQUIRY

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. If she thinks that the anger over her unemployment insurance cuts is going to go away, she is in for a big surprise. If she will not agree with Members on this side, or listen to the demonstrators outside, will she at least listen to Members of her own caucus? Does she disagree with the Conservative Member for Annapolis Valley—Hants who said if there was a vote in the Conservative caucus they would reject her policy?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, this matter has been raised on a number of occasions and I will give exactly the same answer I have given on other occasions. This modification was introduced in November of 1984. At that time a one year lead time was given before implementation so people could adjust to the change in the regulations. There never was any question that it would come into effect in January of 1986. That has taken place, and we will await the report of the commission headed by Mr. Forget to see whether any recommendations for changes are made.

REQUEST FOR FREE VOTE ON ISSUE

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. When we have the final votes on the Estimates will he allow or arrange for a free vote on this issue—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: —so that we can once again test the integrity of the Conservative caucus and the spirit of the new rules in this House?

Mr. McDermid: You can do the same thing on Turner's leadership.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the Standing Orders are quite clear in that regard. However, I would be a little concerned because I think we would probably have 39 different positions from the Liberal Party if we allowed that.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: Try it.

REPORTED PROPOSAL FOR THREE-DAY ALTERNATIVE MAIL DELIVERY

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for the post office. Yesterday he said he would make public the new business plan for the post office after he made a decision. In light of the seriousness of the proposal for delivery every three days only, which will affect seniors, will he make that plan public now so we can have a debate, or is he going to force us to use the Access to Information law?

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Canada Post): Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat what I said yesterday. We are examining a lot of alternatives with the post office administration. Alternate day delivery is just one. Internal analyses are being done and, as soon as a decision is reached, it will be announced publicly.

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION CONCERNING POSTAL SERVICES

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the Minister has simply indicated that he is considering several alternatives to reduce services. I should like to ask him, first whether he feels it is important to hold a debate on postal services before making that decision and, second, whether he would rather have us proceed under the Access to Information legislation.

[English]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Canada Post): Mr. Speaker, I said we were examining a lot of alternatives. The Hon. Member knows that in order to comply with the request of the Minister of Finance to achieve self-sufficiency in the post office very shortly we have to examine these alternatives and take the best available. That is exactly what we will be doing, and we will do it without affecting services.

EMPLOYMENT

LACK OF BRICKLAYERS IN MISSISSAUGA

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Mississauga is booming. A hundred million dollars worth of building permits are issued each month. The problem is that construction companies cannot get any bricklayers. Will the Minister try to issue short-term visas or work permits for bricklayers in order to help alleviate the situation?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we are indeed conscious of the prevailing situation in Mississauga, and in the Toronto area in general, concerning bricklayers. The Department has, through the Canada Employment Centres network and the National Job Bank, advertised the vacancies across the country. We are hoping this will alleviate the situation. In addition, officials of the Department will be meeting with the Toronto Home Builders Association next week to discuss what other steps might be taken to remedy the situation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS—HIRING OF MICHAEL DEAVER AS LOBBYIST

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In an interview published this morning, Mr. Michael Deaver quoted Fred Doucet of the Prime Minister's Office as saying to him: "You know you're a hell of a guy, a guy Canadians ought to be thinking about", to which Mr. Deaver replied: "For God's sake, don't talk to me about that." What possible explanation can be given for this comment by a senior official of the Prime Minister's Office which was obviously taken seriously by Mr. Deaver? Has the Minister properly investigated this exchange which is a clear breach of American law?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear that the Hon. Member would be far happier if he were a member of the Congress or Senate of the United States so that he could pursue the issues that really interest him. Some of us from time to time think that this country would be better off under that circumstance as well. As the Member well knows, the comment read into the record of the House of Commons was a comment made in a light-hearted way by Dr. Doucet. It was interpreted that way by Mr. Deaver. Thoughout this, the Government of Canada has respected the law of Canada and the United States. Any suggestion to the contrary is unworthy of a Member of this House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: We have become quite used to the unworthy answers that we have received from the Minister. It is a serious question.

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Considering that this is a matter that concerns the behaviour of a Canadian official in the Prime Minister's Office, has the Secretary of State for External Affairs properly investigated it to determine whether this is a violation of Canadian law? Is he prepared to report to this Parliament so that we know what our officials are doing in foreign countries, breaking the law?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can report categorically to the House of Commons of Canada that the contract approved was in accordance with the law of Canada and with the law of the United States. I can also express my regret that the Hon. Member, perhaps inadvertently—since that is his custom—has been twisting words on this matter in the House and outside the House. That is conduct unworthy of a Member who wants to have the respect of the House of Commons and the people of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HEALTH

MONITORING OF RADIOACTIVITY LEVELS IN CANADA FOLLOWING SOVIET NUCLEAR REACTOR ACCIDENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Canadians from coast to coast are deeply worried and disturbed about the long-term effects of radiation from Chernobyl and the inadequacy of regional measurements here in Canada. Since we have now learned that some foods are being impounded and high levels of radiation are of concern in terms of some of the crops grown in the Vancouver area, will the Minister be submitting a claim to the Soviet Union for all costs and damages?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think there is one point that has to be made before the question is answered. In his preamble the Member mentioned that Canadians were concerned about the inadequacy of Canadian monitoring or testing. That is simply not the case. Our monitoring and testing have been very good by every measure, including my discussions with the European regional office of the World Health Organization from which we just had a telegram again yesterday. There has been full co-operation, both internationally, and domestically with the provinces. That must be said so that the people of Canada know they are being well protected. That is the first point.

Should a claim with respect to any compensation have to be made, I, as Minister of Health, could not answer that independently. The Cabinet would have to make a decision on that. It has not yet been discussed.

REQUEST THAT DAMAGES CLAIM BE SUBMITTED TO SOVIET UNION

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, there is only one area that has been tested in British Columbia. That is Vancouver. There are other areas of British Columbia.

An Hon. Member: Not true.

Mr. Fulton: Ketchikan, Alaska, gives reports every five hours, not once a week.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the Hon. Member have a question?

Mr. Fulton: My supplementary question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who, I believe, has the jurisdiction in this. On January 24, 1978, Cosmos 954 crashed here in Canada, causing $14 million in damage.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the Hon. Member have a question immediately? Just a question.

Mr. Fulton: Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An Hon. Member: That is not a supplementary.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair obviously cannot tell if a question is supplementary until it has heard the question. May I hear the question, please?

Mr. Fulton: Based on the precedent of Cosmos 954, will the Minister be submitting to the Soviet Union for payment, all costs and damages affecting Canada that are attributable to the Chernobyl disaster?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if there are damages to Canada proven as a consequence of that terrible accident, we will certainly seriously consider the suggestion that the Hon. Member has made.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

ABORIGINAL LAND CLAIMS BOUNDARY

Mr. Thomas Suluk (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Hon. Minister for Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Last Friday, the Inuit, the Dene, and the Métis reached a tentative agreement on where their land claims boundary will be. If this agreement is ratified, will the Government of Canada accept this agreement as being conclusive on the extent of jurisdiction for each claim, and if the boundary is also acceptable among northerners as the basis for the division of the Northwest Territories, will the Government of Canada be prepared to accept this boundary for the creation of two new territories?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Hon. Member for raising the matter. It gives me the opportunity to congratulate those who were involved in the recent meeting on the progress they have made. The Hon. Member may know that the native leaders will be meeting with the Government of the Northwest Territories in Rankin Inlet in June. I hope there will be progress at that meeting as well. As always, the federal Government stands in a receptive mood to resolve the matter, especially as it is being developed by northerners, in the North. I also want to take the opportunity to thank the Hon. Member for his contribution.

VISIBLE MINORITIES

INTERNMENT OF JAPANESE CANADIANS DURING WORLD WAR II—PRICE WATERHOUSE REPORT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. The Price Waterhouse study of the losses suffered by Japanese Canadians is now public and serves to demonstrate the severe magnitude of the problems inflicted on this very community. Rather than taking an indifferent and irresponsible view of the findings, as he has to date, will the Minister assure the House that he will use this report as the vehicle to begin meaningful negotiations, as he promised in December, 1984, rather than taking to Cabinet an order that would run roughshod over the sensitive concerns of this community?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, without accepting the Hon. Member's preamble, I will say that the results of the Price Waterhouse study were not a big surprise to anyone. As a matter of fact, in preparing the options for Cabinet, the losses were taken into consideration. The Hon. Member should know that there is more to the redress issue than financial matters. There is a moral matter and, from a moral standpoint, this Party is doing the right thing. It is certainly not his Party, which wanted to do nothing at all for the Japanese Canadians.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, it seems that the malaise that has gripped the Government has now paralyzed the Minister as well because he knows that what he said is not true.

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Marchi: I want to ask the Minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member may disagree on the facts but he cannot accuse the Minister of saying something that he knows not to be true. The Hon. Member knows he is moving into the area of unparliamentary language and I ask him to withdraw it and simply put his question.

Mr. Marchi: I disagree with the Minister's interpretation.

Some Hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Marchi: I would like to ask—

Mr. Speaker: I ask the Hon. Member to withdraw his statement, please.

Some Hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order on this side as well. I ask the Hon. Member simply to withdraw his comment and put his question.

Mr. Marchi: I withdraw, as you instruct me. Why did the Government break its promise of December, 1984, when it said two things: first, that it would negotiate; second, that it would do it with and through the NAJC? Why has that not happened? Why can you not have the decency to use this report as the basis for genuine discussion?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Member is being long.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Mr. Speaker, it is very obvious that the Hon. Member is doing nothing but grandstanding. He knows very well that I, as the Minister representing the Government, have gone through the widest possible terms of negotiations and discussions with the Japanese Canadian community. I have put options before the Cabinet, and in recent days I have been asked by Mr. Miki, President of the NAJC, to meet with him to discuss the results of the Price Waterhouse study. I have accepted his invitation and I look forward to meeting with him and bringing any new evidence to the cabinet table for consideration.

• (1500)

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am in receipt of at least one request for a question of privilege arising out of Question Period and at least one Point of Order also arising out of Question Period. I intend to invoke our precedents with regard to a different matter of privilege before hearing those matters and recognize the Hon. Member for Terrebonne (Mr. Toupin) on a question of privilege.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MEMBER FOR TERREBONNE—CHANGE OF POLITICAL ALLEGIANCE

Mr. Robert Toupin (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell the House about my decision. I will simply read the self-explanatory letter I wrote to the Prime Minister: Mr. Prime Minister, I hereby advise you of my decision to leave the ranks of the Conservative Party of Canada. You may rest assured that I made this decision after long and serious consideration. There have been and there are still basic and now irreconcilable diverging views between your Government, your Party and myself concerning major issues. Henceforth I shall therefore sit as an Independent Member for the greatest benefit of all my Terrebonne constituents.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Accordingly, the House will know that the Chair will find the appropriate way as early as possible to change the seating arrangement.

I am in receipt of a notice of a question of privilege arising out of Question Period from the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria). For clarification, the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) has submitted a question of privilege relating to yesterday which I will have to hear at the end of matters arising out of today's Question Period.

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENT BY MINISTER—ALLEGED UNTRUE STATEMENTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to draw to the attention of the Chair what I believe is a question of privilege. I want to indicate that if the Chair decides I have a prima facie point of privilege, I am willing to move the appropriate motion to send it to the appropriate parliamentary committee.

As the Chair is aware, the rules in Beauchesne state we are not to accuse other Hon. Members of making untrue statements in the House of Commons. That is found on page 114 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fifth Edition, as decided by your predecessors on June 21, 1977 and November 16, 1977.

The point I want to bring to the Chair's attention is that a document was tabled in this House on September 9, 1985 from which I have quoted verbatim today in the House of Commons. In view of the fact that this document was tabled in this House, it is therefore a document in your possession, Mr. Speaker. I want you to investigate as to whether or not the declaration I made today in quoting from that document was untrue as alleged by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen) when he answered a question in Question Period. He alleged I had made to you and to this House untrue statements relating to the letter of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) which was tabled in this House on September 9, 1985.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the Hon. Member knows that is not in fact a question of privilege but a point of order. Second, I think the Hon. Member is asking the Chair to investigate the facts with regard to an allegation. He knows the Chair does not do that.

The question he is asking me to determine is whether the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen) was out of order in his suggestion that something was untrue, that a fact was not a fact. I think that, as the Hon. Member knows, is a matter of debate and not a matter of privilege or of order.

The other point of order I received was from the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary, or would he prefer that I hear the other point of order first? The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) is also rising on a point of order. Would the Parliamentary Secretary prefer that I hear the Minister of National Health and Welfare first?

Mr. Lewis: Yes.

POINTS OF ORDER

STATEMENT BY MEMBER—TESTING FOR RADIATION

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Today in Question Period I was asked a question. A supplementary question was then directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark). Before the supplementary question itself was posed, the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) put into the preamble something which I think is very damaging, not to me, but I think it is very important when we are dealing with issues of health and safety and radiation that accurate statements be made in the House.

The Hon. Member indicated that we were only testing in Vancouver. We are testing in three other locations in British Columbia. I think it is important that the House have that information in view of people's anxiety about this issue.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is exactly the same as the other case. It is not a point of order.

INTERRUPTION OF QUESTION—CONTINUATION OF TRANSLATION—HANSARD CONTENT

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise a point of order arising out of Question Period. During the second question asked by the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) the Chair found it necessary to rise to interrupt him, presumably because the question was too long. I was listening to the translation and trying to follow the question in French. Although you rose, Mr. Speaker, and in effect cut off the Hon. Member's microphone in the middle of his last sentence in French, the English translation continued and was completed.

Although I was not listening to the series of questions asked by the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), I wonder if the same thing happened. I want to be very clear that everyone in this House from all Parties has the greatest of respect for the people who work in the translation booths. We all realize it is a very difficult job.

However, I want to put a question to you, Mr. Speaker. If a Member of Parliament is to be disciplined by being interrupted, and, therefore, is interrupted by Telecast and by microphone, should that discipline not continue—and I say this with respect to Ministers and Members of the Government as well as Members of the Opposition—should that procedure not continue, if possible, through the translation and also in Hansard?

I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that the point has never before occurred to me, but if that discipline does occur, live as it were, should it not occur in translation and also in Hansard? I do not know the answer to the question. I thought it should be posed.

Mr. Gauthier: On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker, I just want to bring to your attention that translation sometimes has a delay time. Perhaps the Hon. Member does not recognize that. The translators are not translating, they are interpreting so that the interpretation could be different from the translation as a means of communication.

I caution the Speaker that in a case such as this the interpretation of what was said by the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) could have taken perhaps a little more time. I cannot see any point of order.

Mr. Speaker: I will look at the point of order raised by the Hon. Member. However, I think the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) is right in the sense that I would assume, and I will look into it, that once I turn off the microphone the connection between the Hon. Member and the translation booth is broken. I would assume, therefore, what is happening after that is what is left over from what has already gone through the microphone system.

With regard to Hansard, I would be happy to look into it. However, I think the Hon. Member will know that Hansard picks up whatever Hansard picks up from whatever source, which is not always simply the microphones. It may not be possible to create that interruption.

I appreciate the point the Hon. Member is trying to make and I will look into it.

I have received notice of a Question of Privilege from the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray).

PRIVILEGE

CONFLICT OF INTEREST—APPOINTMENT AND TERMS OF REFERENCE OF INQUIRY—ALLEGED INTIMIDATION

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, on Monday 11, 1986, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion (Mr. Stevens) announced that, in the face of allegations of conflicts of interest raised in the House and in public, he had resigned from the Ministry and he asked for a public inquiry into the allegations in question. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) in the Far East, and the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen) in the House of Commons, have indicated that the Government has agreed to such an inquiry outside this House, presumably under the Inquiries Act. But the person or persons who are to undertake this inquiry are not yet appointed and their terms of reference have not yet been made public.

It has been the contention of the Opposition that while an inquiry is most certainly required, the proper place for such an inquiry, since it directly involves the privileges, procedures and Members of the House of Commons, is the House itself, likely through one of its committees. The validity of this assertion has been proven by statements in the House during Question Period both yesterday and today by the Deputy Prime Minister concerning the proposed inquiry. These statements have underscored the unsuitability of an inquiry outside of this House under the Inquiries Act or otherwise, in this case, and the statements alone, I submit, violate the privileges of this House. In particular, the Deputy Prime Minister said yesterday, as recorded on page 13225 of Hansard for May 13, 1986:

> —I have given Hon. Members the assurance that whatever statements or allegations have been made in the House of Commons, however temperate or intemperate, will be the subject matter of those terms of reference.

Later, on the same page, he is reported to have said:

> Surely he would want to clothe the impartial person with the broadest possible terms of reference . . . including all of the matters which have been raised in the House of Commons with respect to these circumstances—

Today in the House of Commons the Deputy Prime Minister said, and I think I have reported it accurately: "The investigation will take into account allegations made in the House of Commons both temperate and intemperate". These remarks make it clear that the Government is seeking through executive action to call into question statements made by Members of the House of Commons in Parliament in a place that, if it involves the Inquiries Act under statute law, has the power of a court of record. This is a clear violation of the privileges of Parliament recognized as long ago as the 14th century and, in fact, codified in Article 9 of the English Bill of Rights of 1688 as follows:

● (1510)

> The freedom of speech and debates, or proceedings in Parliament, ought not to be impeached in any court or place out of Parliament.

The applicability of this principle to Canada is clear. I draw your attention, Sir, to the 1971 case of Roman Corp. v. Hudson's Bay Oil & Gas Co. wherein Mr. Justice Houlden of the Ontario Supreme Court, after citing the aforementioned Article of the Bill of Rights, held:

> The court has no power to inquire into what statements were made in Parliament, why they were made, who made them, what was the motive for making them or anything about them—

The judgment was upheld on appeal by the Ontario Court of Appeal, wherein Mr. Justice Aylesworth held, in part:

> I respectfully agree with the learned trial Judge that the respondents cannot be called upon to plead to or defend against, in any ordinary Court of law, the allegations concerning statements they made in the House of Commons. For more than one hundred years no such Court has entertained an action based upon such statements, declaring it to be within the absolute privilege of the House itself to deal with them as the House may see fit.

This case was appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada. Mr. Justice Martland specifically upheld the statements made in both the trial and appeal judgments that applied to statements made in Parliament.

This fundmental principle has also been upheld in the courts with respect to proceedings in provincial legislatures. For example, the Chief Justice of Quebec in the Quebec Court of Appeal in the case of Lavergne v. Le Club de la Garnison de Québec dealing specifically with this point said:

> This freedom of speech was originally intended as a protection against the power of the Crown.

Erskine May's Nineteenth Edition, Chapter VI, provides lengthy and learned defences of these positions. It is of particular interest to note its commentary on page 84, respecting Article 9 of the Bill of Rights cited previously:

> There are three principal matters involved in the statement of law contained in this Article:—

1. The right of each House to be the sole judge of the lawfulness of its own proceedings;

2. The right implied to punish its own Members for their conduct in Parliament.

Further—

This point is not directly relevant to what I am submitting.

Further, there is the question,

3. What is the precise meaning of the term "proceedings in Parliament"?

In any event, it is the first two of these principles with which we are concerned here.

As of this moment it is true that no inquiry outside of Parliament has attempted to improperly examine any statements made in Parliament; nor has the Government yet published any Order in Council under the Inquiries Act. However, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen) has made it clear that the Government intends to do so and, in so doing, intends to instruct such inquiry, quite improperly and in breach of the privilege of the House, I submit, to call into question statements made by Members in the House.

Freedom of speech in the proceedings of Parliament, however, is so fundamental to the constitutional role of the House of Commons, that so clearly expressed an intent, the intent to cause an appointee of the Crown to infringe upon the freedom of speech of the House of Commons, must surely in itself constitute a breach of privilege.

There is also another breach of privilege in the statement of the Deputy Prime Minister. His statement that the Government intends to appoint an inquiry outside of the House of Commons into the proceedings of the House of Commons and statements made therein is a clear threat to Members of the House, if they do their duty as they have been doing, and as they intend to. The Deputy Prime Minister has clearly attempted to intimidate Members from saying and doing in the House what they consider to be the proper thing. He has threatened them with what could turn out to be an external kangaroo court investigation of whatever they say in the House if it does not please him, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the Government.

Citation 71 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition clearly states:

Direct threats which attempt to influence Members' actions in the House are undoubtedly breaches of privilege.

I conclude by saying that the Deputy Prime Minister has therefore clearly breached the privileges of the House on at least two scores. First, he has stated his intent to cause an appointee of the Crown to infringe on the freedom of speech of the House, a freedom so fundamental to the constitutional duty of Parliament that to express intent alone must surely constitute a breach of privilege. Second, his words constitute a clear threat in an attempt to intimidate Members in the exercise of their duties.

By way of conclusion I say that if the Deputy Prime Minister wants to have examined statements by Members made in this House, then surely it is an argument for our position that this can only be done in the House, or one of its committees. If the Government wants to have an investigation sufficiently broad to examine what Members say in this House, then it should agree with our position—there should be an inquiry in one of the committees of this House.

I submit there has been a prima facie breach of privilege. If you agree, Mr. Speaker, I have an appropriate motion to move.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, of course, I did not have any prior notice of this question of privilege. After hearing the House Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Gray) I am glad that I did not.

Mr. Gauthier: We will see how smart you are.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: There is absolutely no foundation with respect to the contention made by the Hon. Member that there is a question of privilege in this particular matter. If we were to follow the logic of the Hon. Member's submission, then any inquiry with respect to any item which is the subject matter of debate or questioning on the floor of the House of Commons would somehow be interpreted as being an infringement on the rights of Members with respect to the deliberations of the House of Commons. Clearly, this is not the case.

Indeed, if Your Honour were to search the record you would see that this is the paradox of the whole situation. During the course of Question Period, not only were members of the Opposition demanding information with respect to this matter, they were demanding—and I believe it was the Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker), as well as other Members—that there be an independent inquiry with respect to this entire matter.

Mr. Gauthier: Parliamentary.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Of course, it is now a parliamentary inquiry. I want to make what I have to say brief because I understand the political point that has been attempted to be made by the Hon. House Leader. Clearly, this is a political position put forward by the opposition Parties. I accept that as a political position. However, as far as being a question of privilege is concerned, I would like to make two points. The first, in a procedural sense, is that the whole question of a Code of Conduct for cabinet Ministers is not a matter which is normally within the scope of the activities of the House of Commons. It is extra-parliamentary, if I may put it that way. It is a matter within the prerogative of a Prime Minister—

Mr. Foster: That's a new theory.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —just the same as it was with the predecessor to the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). There is adequate authority and precedent—

Mr. Foster: Name one!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —with respect to this matter. If Hon. Members opposite will give me a few moments, and some notice, I would be glad to quote chapter and verse out of Bourinot's and out of—

Mr. Foster: Quote it, then!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I know there are precedents, Mr. Speaker, because I have observed them on a number of occasions with respect to different cases. I recall the case of John Pallett, MP, wherein there was a question of his activities and an allegation made with respect to those activities in 1959. The Speaker at that time held that matters that occured outside of the House of Commons, not in the capacity of a Member of Parliament, were not matters of privilege.

Mr. Gauthier: That's not the point!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: So the question here with respect to the Code of Conduct—Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray)—

Mr. Gauthier: No, you did not. Evidently you did not.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Perhaps they would do me the courtesy of letting me complete my argument. I take seriously the position put forward by the House Leader of the Official Opposition. I think it is unfounded; but I listened to him and I allowed him to complete his argument.

What I am saying is that this matter is a matter in which there is an investigation. As a matter of fact, the Acting Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen) has indicated the intention of the Prime Minister with respect to the process, which is outlined in the Code of Conduct set forth in his letter and the letter to Ministers which was tabled in the House of Commons on September 9, 1985.

I would like to conclude here. I simply say that this is not a question of privilege. It does not affect in any way whatsoever the ability of Members to conduct their affairs. It does not in any way constrain Members from carrying on debate. The question of privilege is one which impinges upon the ability of Members to carry out their responsibilities. There is absolutely no question with respect to the intent of this particular inquiry. It has to do with matters outside of the House of Commons and not the activities of Members of Parliament in this place.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I take it Hon. Members now wish to rise to debate the question of privilege? Hon. Members know that the Chair has been given notice of a desire to raise a prima facie case of privilege. It is our practice, when it is put by a House Leader, to allow a response from a House Leader. However, the Chair cannot allow debate on the question at this time without determining whether or not there is a question of privilege. I think Hon. Members know that. Does the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) wish to contribute somehow to the question of a prima facie case?

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I do wish to rise to speak to the question of prima facie breach of privilege in these circumstances. I would ask leave of the Chair to have an opportunity to make a brief submission on this very important question.

The issue here is clear and goes directly to the heart of Parliament itself. As has been suggested by the Government House Leader, we are not talking about actions which have taken place outside the House or this institution. The allegation of breach of privilege does not go to the actions or alleged actions of the former Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion or to the Code of Conduct. Rather, the allegation of breach of privilege goes squarely to the question of the words of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen) and the centuries-old traditions of the House. I would suggest that that is the issue.

The Government House Leader has suggested that some obscure precedent from 1959 involving activities outside the House was not relevant here. He is absolutely right. That precedent has nothing whatsoever to do with the allegations made here.

The allegation made here is quite straightforward. Yesterday and again today the Deputy Prime Minister stated that an outside inquiry would be given any statements or allegations that had been made in the House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, may I have—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member is making the speech he might wish to make if the matter were before the House. Could he bring himself to precedents with regard to a prima facie case, please?

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, in pursuing the question of the existence of a prima facie case, I would again remind the Chair that the privileges of which we are speaking here date back to 1688 and to the Bill of Rights. It is totally unacceptable and indeed a breach of the privileges of all Members of the House for any outside body, whether it be a judicial inquiry, a quasi-judicial inquiry or any other form of outside body, to be passing judgment on words spoken in this House. The opposition House Leader made reference to the precedents. He referred to the statements of Mr. Justice Houlden and others. That is the issue which is squarely before the House. No outside body has the right to pass judgment on words spoken here.

If any individual wishes to challenge words spoken in the House, the proper mechanism for doing so is surely within the House itself through the committee on privileges and elections. I suggest that the words spoken both today and yesterday by the Deputy Prime Minister, in and of themselves, constitute a breach of the privileges of all Members of the House.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I believe that my colleague, the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr.

Gray), has gone far enough in establishing precedents. In my brief contribution, I would like to draw the attention of the Chair to other occasions on which the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen) used language of the same kind. On May 12, as reported at the bottom of page 13171 of Hansard, the Deputy Prime Minister said the following:

> The impartial investigation which is being considered will be governed by terms of reference broad enough to encompass all of the accusations, allegations—unfounded or whatever—> —that have come from opposition Members and, I might add, from the media.

I bring this up to add to what my colleague has already said. It is clear that it is the intention of the Government to have what has been said in the House of Commons scrutinized by an organization outside this House.

Mr. Speaker: Given the nature and length of the interjections, of course I will reserve on this and get back to the House as quickly as I can.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 106(8), I have the honour to table in both official languages the Government's responses to five petitions.

MORGENTALER CLINIC—ALLEGED RESTRICTIONS ON POLICE

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition on behalf of residents of Scarborough who call upon Parliament to require the Government of the Province of Ontario to remove restrictions in regard to laying charges under Section 251 of the Criminal Code concerning the Morgentaler clinic in Toronto.

ABORTION LAWS—REQUEST FOR CHANGE

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition on behalf of residents of the riding of Mississauga South who are urging that Section 251 of the Criminal Code be strengthened to make the law against abortion more easily enforced.

USE OF PENSION INCOME IN CALCULATION OF UI BENEFITS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by some of my own constituents who claim that the deduction of the pension benefits from the unemployment insurance benefits is seriously interfering with efforts of employers in the community to create employment via early retirement pension packages and they ask that the House of Commons rescind that action by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald).

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of submitting a certified petition on behalf of a number of residents from Kamloops, British Columbia, who are concerned about the decision of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) which is that after December 31, 1985, pension benefits are to be deducted from unemployment insurance benefits. They are simply calling upon the Government to ensure that all retired employees keep their pension benefits and receive their unemployment insurance benefits without the deduction of pension income.

PRICE OF GASOLINE—REQUEST FOR REDUCTION OF TAXES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock—North Delta): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting a certified petition which contains names gathered by the BCAA and asks that Parliament consider withdrawing the separate excise taxes on automotive fuel, reducing the federal sales tax applied on gasoline to a fixed level as it was prior to 1981 and calling a federal-provincial First Ministers' Conference at an early date to discuss the methods by which provinces could reduce respective taxation on automotive fuels.

GASOLINE AND HEATING OIL—REQUEST FOR BASE PRICE

Mr. Aurèle Gervais (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I have a certified petition signed by 950 residents of the Town of Chapleau, representing more than one-half of the adult population of the town, calling upon Parliament to urge the large gasoline companies to end the practice of having different gasoline and heating oil prices in zones that they themselves create artificially and to move toward a common base price for the Province of Ontario in both commodities.

REQUEST TO REFUSE THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A FIRING RANGE—SAGUENAY-LAC SAINT-JEAN

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table a petition signed by some 3,000 residents of the Saguenay-Lac Saint-Jean region asking Parliament to reject the establishment of a firing range in their area and demanding that this money be reinvested into true development programs such as job creation, education, health, social services and tourism. This petition has been organized by Mrs. Albertine Larouche and the committee against the firing range, based in l'Ascension, Quebec.

REINSTATEMENT OF KATIMAVIK PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I wish to table a petition which meets the requirements of Standing Order 106. The petitioners state that they are in favour of the Katimavik program which had proved a success both for the development of some 20,000 young participants over the past 10 years, and for the major community projects in which these young volunteers were involved. They ask the Government to reconsider its decision to terminate this program.

Mr. Speaker: Is the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) seeking the floor to present another petition? Our practice would normally be to hear his petitions all at once.

PRESERVATION OF SOUTH MORESBY AS NATIONAL PARK

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House a petition which has been signed by several hundred residents of provinces across Canada, organized by Mr. Richard Pearson of Marie-Reine, Alberta.

The petitioners call upon the Government to preserve the South Moresby region of British Columbia as a national park in order to preserve the pristine nature of the virgin forest of that area.

Mr. Speaker: Before the Hon. Member continues, may I point out to him that the part of his remarks referring to the petition being organized by somebody is out of order.

LOCAL MEASURED TELEPHONE CHARGES

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present petitions signed by several hundred residents of the constituency of Burnaby. They call upon the Government to ensure that the CRTC denies telephone companies such as B.C. Tel the right to impose a charge for each telephone call. Also they call upon the CRTC to order the retention of monthly rentals for telephones and to deny local measured service.

Mr. Speaker: Have all those petitions been certified by the Table prior to their presentation?

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, as always, they have been certified.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you please call notices of motions Nos. 20 and 21, standing in the name of the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Carleton (Mr. Turner)?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Does the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary want to present the responses?

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Carleton (Mr. Turner) could not be in attendance at this time. He asked that the responses be read into the record and then, if you would be so kind, to transfer them for debate.

AMERICAN EMBASSY—SITE SELECTION CRITERIA

Motion No. 20—Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of any report made to the Minister of Public Works concerning the site selection criteria for locating the new home of the American Embassy and all other embassies within the National Capital Region.

Mr. Ron Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, to date there has been no report made to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. La Salle) concerning the site selection criteria for locating either the new home of the American Embassy or other embassies within the National Capital Region. Selection criteria often vary with each case. The National Capital Commission has hired consultants to prepare a full proposal for the relocation of the U.S. Embassy based on site selection criteria developed by the United States Government and the National Capital Commission. If the consultants determine that the Mile Circle is indeed the appropriate location for the American Embassy, a report will be presented to the Minister for his review and consideration at that time.

I therefore ask the Hon. Member to withdraw his motion.

SECURITY REQUIREMENTS OF NEW AMERICAN EMBASSY

Motion No. 21—Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of any report made to the Minister of Public Works concerning the exact security requirements of the United States State Department and all Canadian investigations for the security needs of the proposed site for the new American Embassy within the Mile Circle in Ottawa, Ontario.

Mr. Ron Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, to date there has been no report made to the Minister of Public Works concerning the exact security requirements of either the United States State Department or the responsible Canadian security authorities for the security needs of the proposed site for the new American Embassy within the Mile Circle in Ottawa, Ontario.

I therefore ask the Hon. Member to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Speaker: Further to the request of the Hon. Member for Ottawa—Carleton, Motions Nos. 20 and 21 are transferred for debate, subject to Standing Order 73.

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 82—AGRICULTURAL STABILITY—IMPACT OF CANADA-U.S. FREE TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma) moved:

That this House urges the Government to take immediate and firm action on behalf of Canadian farmers to ease the burden of debt by introducing such measures as court-ordered debt review, a meaningful interest relief program and an increased commitment to research, and further urges the Government to make firm commitments now to Canadian farmers that they will not be harmed or their interests sacrificed in its comprehensive trade negotiations with the United States and to provide a strong response to difficulties expected as a result of the U.S. Farm Bill.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have the opportunity to speak this afternoon on the U.S. Farm Bill. I do not think there has been a time in the last 50 years when agriculture in Canada has faced a more difficult period. Clearly the motion is designed to draw the attention of the House to the gravity of the agricultural situation in Canada and in many ways around the world. We want to examine the lack of adequate response by the Government, and the direction the Government is giving on the issue of agriculture. I will also talk about the impact which I think has resulted because of the Government's public relations technique in dealing with this grave situation.

Certainly the Government's commitment to agriculture has been called into question as the Standing Committee on Agriculture, the subcommittee on grain, and other agricultural committees have travelled across the country. Farmers have seen what the banking industry and others have received in the past year, but they have not seen the same action, commitment and reaction to the crisis which they face. I believe it really boils down to a lack of trust in the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) himself.

A couple of weeks ago the Prime Minister announced some agricultural initiatives in Ottawa about which I will talk more fully later this afternoon. He flew to Vancouver and met with a few agricultural representatives, but he did not stop on the Prairies to discuss the details of his proposal. I suspect he did not do that because he knew it was a public relations job and there was very little in his announcement at that time.

Let us talk about the gravity of the situation faced by farmers. The latest figures of the Farm Credit Corporation show that some 39,000 or 40,000 farmers are in serious financial difficulty, and that 18,000 or 20,000 of them are in rather severe financial difficulty. These figures are out of a total of some 170,000 farmers with over $20,000 of production per year. If we look at the brief provided by the FCC to members of the Standing Committee on Agriculture, we see that the arrears situation of the corporation has increased dramatically during the past year. This is an indication that farmers simply cannot meet their payments.

This past week the agricultural committee on the domestic price of wheat visited Saskatchewan and was told that the farm income in that province had dropped every year since 1981. The Saskatchewan pool elevator group has indicated that net farm incomes have dropped below $5,500 a year on the average in that province. Farm debt in Saskatchewan has increased from $3 billion in 1982 to $5 billion this year. Those are devastating, frightening and concerning figures. It it clear that action is required by the Government of the day.

We are concerned with those figures indicating that net farm income has dropped by 14 per cent in 1985, because we have seen the international trade war for farm commodities, especially between the European Economic Community and the United States, accelerating during the past four or five months. We have seen the whole issue heat up with the United States Congress having voted an estimated $52 billion U.S. for subsidization and assistance to farmers over the next three years. In fact, some observers have suggested that figure may rise to $60 billion or $70 billion U.S., or $100 billion in Canadian funds, to subsidize and assist American farmers during the trade war over the next three to five years on commodities such as wheat, corn, red meat and so on. Our farmers, on the other hand, go into a trade war without any commitment by the Government, or any deficiency payment such as American farmers will get.

The U.S. has set its loan rate at $2.40 a bushel American for wheat. The U.S. has guaranteed its producers $4.38 a bushel for wheat regardless of whether the price goes to $2.40 or $2 or $1.75. Producers are guaranteed $4.38 which, rounded out in Canadian funds, is $6. The whole situation for Canadian farmers is very uncertain. The Government's response has been to drop the initial price of wheat from $160 a tonne last year to $130 a tonne this year or 80 cents a bushel.

How then can farmers compete? How can farmers survive? They cannot survive unless the Government responds. The Government's approach at this stage has been to cut farmers adrift. The Tory attitude seems to be to let the system shake down. If we lose several thousand, 5,000, 8,000 or 10,000 farmers, that is acceptable to the Tories, but I do not think it is acceptable to the country at large. Most provincial governments have responded with tremendous financial assistance during this past six or 12 months, but so far we have seen very little response from the federal Government.

Beyond those deficiency payments, Mr. Speaker, the U.S. Farm Bill provides some $1 billion in a bonus program. When a country is buying commodities, grain, wheat, et cetera, for every three bushels provided by the market trader, one bushel is provided by the Government as a bonus program. This has a dramatic effect. The United States is crashing into traditional markets, not only that of the EEC, which apparently is the target of the Americans, but also into markets traditionally held by Canada. For example, Algeria where 100,000 tonnes of grain are being marketed in wheat, flour, table eggs and barley and other markets, like Egypt, Yemen and the Philippines. Some 700,000 tonnes of wheat are being marketed in Syria. The war is just beginning to heat up. The impact is not only on world prices but on Canadian sales, and it is just becoming apparent.

When the Prime Minister met with the President of the United States a couple of months ago he put out a very lovely glossy booklet which told about their trade discussions. It mentioned things like steel, softwood lumber, electric razors and all the issues which the Government was going to discuss with the Americans. But nowhere in the glossy lovely agenda with all the glossy pictures was there any mention of the U.S. Farm Bill. Without doubt, this will have a greater impact on Canadian farmers' income than any other piece of legislation passed by the United States Congress. I daresay it will have a greater impact on the Canadian economy than any other single piece of legislation.

A recent study carried out by Chase Econometrics indicated that net farm income will fall as a result of the United States farm Bill by 20 per cent in the coming year. In places like Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta, and in some areas of Ontario where corn is produced in abundance, the impact will be far above a 20 per cent reduction in net farm income. I daresay it will be at least a 30 per cent reduction, perhaps even more.

Yet here we had the Prime Minister of Canada going to the conference without having that item on the agenda. The issue was raised in the House. He said that he was going to raise the matter at the summit meeting with the President. Apparently he did, but he came back empty-handed with no visible commitment that the U.S. bonus program would not be used against Canada in our traditional trading markets. There was no backing off.

Someone has described the price war going on between the United States and the European Economic Community like two guys who are out in a boat. One gets in a rage, shoots a hole in the bottom of the boat and the other one responds by shooting a second hole in the bottom of the boat and they start to sink. That summarizes the situation that the main agricultural trading nations like Canada, the United States, the EEC, Australia and Argentina, are facing in this current price war.

We were hopeful that the Prime Minister would have more success in his meeting at the Economic Summit conference in Tokyo, Japan. He gave a strong commitment to Canadian farmers that he would be raising the agricultural trade war. I believe he did raise it, but he certainly did not seem to get much response at the conference. The communiqué made no mention whatsoever of the agricultural trade war going on in which the U.S. has committed upwards of $100 billion over the next three years in Canadian funds to fight that war.

It would be interesting to know just how much the U.S. spent on the Second World War because it is certainly willing to commit a lot of funds battling it out with the European Economic Community. The summit conference did not seem to resolve that in any way. It did not even mention the trade war that will be so devastating for Canadian agriculture and other major grain producing countries such as Australia and Argentina. Nothing will be accomplished by it.

I attended the grain summit in January. One of the great hopes was that resulting from that, we might bring trade in agricultural commodities under the provisions of the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, the ministerial conference of which is being held in September or October this year. There was no mention whatsoever in the communiqué from the Economic Summit in Tokyo that agricultural products would be the subject of negotations. In fact, the United States Secretary of the Treasury, James Baker, said that there was no decision made in the meeting of the seven heads of Government to put agriculture on the negotiating table for GATT. That is clearly a tragedy.

Other things which the United States wanted on the agenda for the GATT negotiations, such as foreign investment, service industry, and intellectual property, were not included. We seem to be facing the terrible situation of preparing all our agricultural producers for an all-out trade war in agricultural commodities for the next several years. The Canadian Treasury is very inadequate to cope with the Treasury in Washington or the European Economic Community.

I travelled across the country during the last several months with the National Liberal Task Force on Agriculture. No issue was of greater concern in any province, and especially in the Province of Ontario, than the prospect of a comprehensive free trade agreement with the United States. The American system of marketing, support and assistance of agricultural commodities is at great variance with the Canadian marketing system. Many countries around the world would like to have the marketing system which we have for dairy products, fluid milk, industrial milk products, eggs, turkey and broilers. Yet, our marketing systems could certainly be put into jeopardy if we enter into a comprehensive trade agreement with the United States. There has been much concern because it is not clear where the Government stands on this issue.

In response to a question which I asked him in the House on January 23, the Secretary of State of External Affairs (Mr. Clark) indicated that our marketing boards and stabilization programs would not be on the negotiating table. It is interesting that only two days later the Minister got a thorough tongue-lashing by the American administration in an article in The Globe and Mail. The article reads:

> "First it was going to free trade, then it was free except for culture, then culture and provincial exclusions, and now it's agriculture," one senior Reagan administration official said yesterday. "We're not even talking yet, and Ottawa keeps changing the rules."

It is clear that the Minister of External Affairs was not reflecting the views of the Reagan administration. A couple of days later the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) indicated in an interview which was carried in the Winnnipeg Free Press that in fact agricultural commodities, marketing boards, and so on would be on the negotiating table. There is grave concern about exactly what the government position is with regard to our marketing boards and stabilization programs. Through all of our difficulties with agriculture in this country, the supply management and marketing boards have been among our most successsful mechanisms for marketing our farm commodities.

Nothing demonstrates the Government's approach to problems better than the commodity-based mortgage. On Budget night $700 million at 6 per cent interest was announced for this purpose. It sounded exactly like what people wanted. When we got into it we found that the $700 million was over two years and that it was not new money but $700 million of loan money to replace $700 million of existing loan money. We learned that the interest rate would probably be 13.5 per cent in most cases rather than 6 per cent. In any event, it has been described by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture as a "complex, risky and complicated farm mortgage system which should be withheld by the Government".

There are many examples that I wish I had time to present to the House this afternoon, but that is clearly not possible. There is a need for a greater commitment by the Government, not only in interest relief and in farmer-creditor arrangement legislation, but in research. The Budget for agriculture research has been cut by $42 million. Yet, the Government is dribbling away $10 million on a crazy scheme with a bunch of New York investors on Dreamstreet. Surely it is time for the Government to get its act together and provide the kind of stabilization assistance which agriculture in Canada needs and is entitled to, due to the importance, diversity, and advantages which this industry can provide for the country.

Mr. Sid Fraleigh (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to participate in this debate. I look forward to it. First, I would like to commend my colleague, the Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), for bringing this issue before the House. It offers rural Members a chance to debate and point out the issues facing agriculture today. Members representing rural ridings fully understand the agricultural problems of today. I believe it is our duty to impress upon our urban counterparts here in the House of Commons, and the urban population, the dire straits which agriculture faces.

At the outset, I would like to point out a misunderstanding on the part of the Member for Algoma. I understand that the leaders of every major farm group in the country were invited to the meeting in Vancouver. Every report of that meeting which I read indicated that it was an outstanding success and showed the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mulroney) commitment for agriculture.

The motion points out the broad waterfront of problems which face agriculture. I would like to take a minute or two of my time to list some of those. The Farm Debt Review Board was first announced in the February Budget by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson). Money was allotted for the establishment of Farm Debt Review Boards. At the same time there was a commitment to revise the bankruptcy laws. I suggest that the second part of that commitment may be as important as the first part. For too long farmers and fishermen have been treated somewhat differently than other businesses in this respect. It is time that the law was changed and farmers and fishermen placed in the same position as other businessmen.

The commitment in the Budget has since been backed up by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise), and then the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) when in Vancouver he committed this Parliament to bringing forward legislation which will allow farm debt review panels to be put in place, and legislation to change the bankruptcy laws.

I would like to take a minute to talk about some of the ramifications involved in those two changes. It is my feeling that the farm community wants to be heard. Those people in dire financial straits want to be heard by an independent body of their peers. It is my feeling that the debt review board will allow this to happen and I look forward to the upcoming legislation.

The second point raised in the motion concerns interest rates. I think everyone on both sides of this House would agree that the worst enemy of agriculture was the rapidly escalating interest rates of the early 1980s which put a great many farmers with floating interest rate mortgages into the mess they are in today. When this Government was elected in 1984 it took action to correct these problems. The Farm Credit Corporation had a large number of customers locked into high interest rates. The Minister of Agriculture managed to persuade the Cabinet to waive the rules so that the effective interest rate for those people was reduced to 12 per cent.

This Government has done other things to help the farm community. First we had the introduction of a shared risk mortgage program which allowed the farmer to reduce the risk of carrying his mortgage. He shares the risk with the Government. In bad times the Government absorbs part of his loss. In good times, he pays some of it back.

The second change implemented by the Minister of Agriculture was a moratorium on FCC mortgage foreclosures. One Member opposite said the situation is a disaster. I would be the last one to try and play down the seriousness of the situation facing Canadian farmers today. However, I want to point out that there were less farm bankruptcies in 1985 than there were in 1984 under the previous Government.

Lastly, this Government introduced the commodity-based mortgage. I am the first to admit there has been a great amount of confusion and misunderstanding in the country concerning this move. The Minister of Agriculture made a commitment that if changes were needed in that program, he would see they were brought in. To me that seems more than fair.

I would now like to move to the third part of the motion which deals with trade. Most of the concern raised by opposition Members has dealt with bilateral negotiations with the U.S. There is some concern as well over the upcoming comprehensive negotiations under GATT. It is my belief that this Government has put together the best trained negotiating team this country has ever had for both rounds of negotiations.

The Canadian farming community has no apologies to make to anyone. We feed our population as cheaply as any country in the world. We do a lot of things in Canada and do them well. It bothers me somewhat to hear the doomers and gloomers saying that we cannot compete. Many parts of our agricultural industry have been competing with the Americans with a wide open border for years. Over the last 25 years Canadian cattle producers have in effect had an open border with the U.S. For all those years Canadian beef producers have been winners. The pork industry has been in the same position, and in 22 of those 25 years we have been winners.

I think the major concern of a great number of people in our farming community is the recent action in the form of protectionist measures in the U.S. They have been a concern to us all. However, this Government is committed to having everything on the table. It is our belief that is the only way we can get a truly meaningful negotiation going. However, there has been a commitment by this Government that farm commodities will be negotiated commodity-by-commodity.

It has been said that this Government does not have a commitment to its farmers. Obviously that is not the case. Just today a release came across my desk which said that Canada will host a meeting of the major grain exporters of this world to try and resolve some of the major problems facing grain exporting nations. Right from our election in September of 1984 the Government recognized agriculture as a top priority. Despite severe budgetary restraints, we have been able to announce farm measures worth almost $4 billion, of which $1.5 billion have gone directly to western farmers.

I think the Canadian farm community has shown a great deal of understanding for the plight encountered by our western colleagues who were hit not only by drought but by low prices and grasshoppers to boot. In February, when the Budget stressed the need to cut back in all areas of spending, this Government recognized the plight of our farmers and announced a $195 million farm relief package. On April 30 the Prime Minister took a lead role in addressing the concerns of Canadian farmers, and I want to go through some of the things he promised to leaders of all major farm groups in this country. He promised an increase in the price range of domestic wheat for human consumption, rising from $5 to $7 to a range of $6 to $11. The farmers' share of grain freight rates was frozen for the 1986-87 season. All federal sales and excise taxes on diesel and gasoline for farm use were effectively removed through an increase in the federal rebate on federal fuel taxes. I urge all Members to co-operate in streamlining this so that hopefully the Government will be able to totally eliminate the rebate program and rid the farm community of a bureaucratic mess that has existed for years.

As was mentioned earlier, the Government will make every effort to pass farm debt review legislation before the House rises for the summer.

I want to address the impact of the U.S. Farm Bill and what the Government will do to try to counteract that impact. Canadian farmers are efficient, productive and quality conscious. Western wheat producers must be, because 80 per cent of their production goes off shore. As a result, they are most vulnerable to world market prices.

The unfortunate aspect of the dilemma facing our producers is that the problem is not of their own doing. Our farmers are the innocent victims of the costly madness of subsidies which has gripped the European Economic Community and, in response, the United States.

Canadian farmers are not competing with farmers of other nations. If we were, I can assure you that we would not have a fear in the world. The fact is that our farmers are competing with the treasuries of other nations, particularly those of the EEC. The respected forecasting firm of Chase Econometrics has pegged EEC export restitution payments at $120 per metric tonne which they say is a conservative estimate.

The U.S. Farm Bill is the American administration's response to the common agriculture policy of the EEC. It is an attempt by the Americans to regain markets lost to the EEC which, over the years, has gone from being a large importer of many commodities to a large exporter in almost every agricultural commodity. We cannot predict when this escalating subsidy war will end. Each nation is concerned about the subsidies of the other, but Canada is even more concerned because we rely more heavily on exports than the United States or the EEC. We question their methods and we have serious reservations with respect to their actions. There is no question that we cannot match either of their treasuries.

The dangers of competing in a treasury war are evident. Governments spend a lot of money, the international price is driven down and the farmer's rate of return is severely reduced. As well, a transfer of wealth occurs with the exporting nation on the losing end and the importing nation coming out the winner.

Let me point out an even worse result. Third World countries will become dependent on the supply of food while neglecting their own agricultural sector at the same time. Many people in this country do not realize that the Continent of Africa has more arable land than any continent other than Asia. That continent is quite capable of feeding itself, were it not for government intervention.

The Prime Minister made agriculture his priority at the Tokyo Summit. The last people to whom he spoke before leaving for Tokyo were Canadian farmers. He sought their advice and counsel before presenting their case in Tokyo. This is the first time that I can recall a Prime Minister of this country raising the agriculture issue at a summit conference. In Tokyo, the matter of agricultural subsidies was put on the agenda and was addressed in the leaders' final communique. This is a very important start but we will not rest until the issue is resolved.

Today's announcement by the Minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Mayer), at a major meeting of all wheat exporting countries that we hosted, is a first important step in that direction. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) has taken Canada's case to the EEC and the Federal Republic of Germany where he is meeting with their Ministers of Agriculture this week. These initiatives are part and parcel of Canada's commitment to freer and fairer trade. We are working on many fronts internationally to promote this commitment.

Our negotiations with the United States, while beneficial from a bilateral position, will also form the basis for our multilateral talks. In terms of agricultural trade, current sales of our farm products south of the border account for about 10 per cent of all farm cash receipts. If we exclude grains and oilseeds, more than half of our exported farm products flow to the U.S. market.

When it comes to agriculture, the aim of the discussions between Canada and the United States is to settle our disputes and achieve a better understanding of each others' farm programs and how they affect prices, production and cross-border sales.

In conclusion, ours is a Government that cares about our farmers. We recognize and respect farmers' contribution to the Canadian way of life and the Canadian economy. We are studying every avenue that might be taken in order to assist our farmers, and we are making every effort on their behalf.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed the speech by the Hon. Member for Lambton—Middlesex (Mr. Fraleigh). He talked about the free trade debate with the United States. He talked about hogs and beef. We all know that there is essentially free trade in these commodities now. Would he like to see the marketing boards and stabilization programs which are so important to many parts of our country placed on the negotiating table?

With respect to farm creditor arrangements legislation, last July 10, the Minister of Agriculture said that in September he would introduce legislation with real teeth, like that which was before the House in June, 1984. However, at the end of January he indicated he would only be introducing legislation that would provide for negotiation, with no actual court authority to negotiate reductions in payments. Which approach does the Hon. Member favour and which approach will be used by the Minister of Agriculture?

Another important question is the Commodity-based Loan Program. Clearly, Members on both sides of the House were very concerned when it was presented to the Agriculture Committee a few weeks ago. Most of the mortgages under this program will have a rate of approximately 9 per cent rather than 6 per cent. It entraps people in an interest rate program that could well be over 13 per cent. Although the Minister said he would listen to representations, the President of the Ontario Federation of Agriculture indicated to me this week that no changes in the program had actually been made.

My final comment is in regard to the Prime Minister's announcement last week which really boils down to a reduction of 2.5 cents per litre in the excise tax on farm fuels. We pleaded with the Government not to put that tax on last September. The farm debt crisis was just as bad last September as it is now. The tax was put on in September and the farmers paid it during harvest and they paid it on the fuel used for planting. It is now being taken off as of September 1. We are glad the Government stopped the larceny on May 1 but we believe it should not have been put on at all. We suggest the rebate be made retroactive to last September.

The Hon. Member knows the freeze on freight rates is strictly a recalculation of the number of bushels being shipped down from 31 million tonnes to about 28 million tonnes. It really comes down to a smoke and mirror show. If the domestic price of wheat is raised, of course, it will be paid by the consumers and not by the Government of Canada.

Mr. Fraleigh: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the intervention of the Hon. Member. It gives me a chance to straighten out some very serious misconceptions he apparently has in his head. I am in full favour of all commodities being placed on the table during the upcoming bilateral negotiations. I will place most of our agricultural commodities against like commodities in the United States any day of the week and we will do very well against them, thank you very much.

Mr. McDermid: You bet.

Mr. Fraleigh: The power of the farm debt review board is based on the model which is in place in the Province of Saskatchewan. In the case of the Saskatchewan model, the experience has been that negotiations between the review board, the farmer and the lenders, in 99 per cent of the cases, have resolved the problem without it ever going to court. There is a great constituency out there which is very nervous about court imposed settlements with regard to mortgages.

With respect to commodity-based mortgages, I want to say that I do not know how more open the Minister could be than he has already been. He has indicated to the House publicly that if that program can be improved, he is prepared to do so. The Hon. Member indicated that most of the mortgages would be at 9 per cent. I assure him that that is not the case at all. Commodity-based mortgages will be allowed to the farm community on the basis of the equity farmers have in their own operations. Those farmers whose equity is between 20 per cent and 40 per cent will be eligible for 6 per cent mortgages, and those who have 40 per cent to 55 per cent equity in their operations will be eligible for 9 per cent mortgages.

With respect to the fuel tax rebate—talk about smoke and mirrors—that was a tax imposed on the farmers which had been in effect for years and years. The Hon. Member was in Government at that time and he never did anything to reduce it, not once.

Mr. Foster: You put it on last September.

Mr. Fraleigh: We did not.

Mr. Foster: Sure you did.

Mr. Fraleigh: We certainly did not.

Mr. Caldwell: Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to hear the speech of the Hon. Member for Lambton—Middlesex (Mr. Fraleigh). I am glad that someone is finally putting the record of this Government straight as far as agriculture is concerned. It is rather unfortunate he did not have a little more time to explain some of the other programs the Government has put in place over the past 18 or 19 months.

I would like to ask the Hon. Member a question of concern to me, and I know it is of concern to him because he is also a soya bean and corn producer. Recently we have heard a great deal about the assistance given to western Canada and its grain producers. I wonder if the Hon. Member could tell us why we have not seen any assistance for soya bean and corn producers who are also facing severe difficulty in our particular area of the province?

Mr. Fraleigh: Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to respond to that question. As I indicated in my remarks, I thought all of the farm community had been very understanding about the plight of the western farmer. We have addressed those problems with some haste. We have been told that the Department of Agriculture and the Minister have been thoroughly reviewing the thought of a like program for the eastern Canada corn and soya bean producers. I think in all probability before the summer is over we will have an advance payment for corn and soya beans.

We made commitments to the farmers of this country at Prince Albert in 1984. We have lived up to every one of those commitments. In my memory, I cannot remember one government, particularly a Liberal Government, which has run on a platform and then carried out every one of its promises. I think it is a record of which we can all be proud. We as Conservative Members of Parliament are particularly proud of that record.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has designated Thursday and Friday of this week as allotted days. Therefore, there will be no Private Members' Hour on those two days. I have instructed the Table to reschedule those items of business and put them at the bottom of the order of precedence.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak about agriculture because it is only on Opposition days, when the Opposition brings a motion before the House on agriculture, that we have this opportunity. I thank the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) for providing this opportunity at this time. Had I put the motion I would have added a little more to it, and I may have the opportunity to do so.

What we are really talking about is a farm crisis. Just the other day the Standing Committee on Agriculture met with Dr. Lillian Walker and Dr. James Walker. The topic of discussion was stress. The learned doctors wanted an opportunity to put before the committee and to the people of Canada, to some extent, what they had learned in a study of farmers, particularly those in western Canada, and what was affecting them and causing the amount of stress from which they were suffering. Their paper contained a litany of reasons why the farmer is in trouble and feeling stress. The study came to the conclusion that modern farming may be one of the most stressful of occupations. We all think of the farmer as a relaxed individual; these days he is anything but.

Let me go through the top 10 stresses very quickly. They are rising expenses; low commodity prices; concerns about continued financial viability of the farm; pressures in having too much to do and too little time; increased workload at peak times; Government policies and regulations; long work hours; crop loss due to weather; machinery breakdown at a critical time and the Government's cheap food policies. If one reads that list carefully, one will recognize that a good portion of every one of those stressors can be affected by the policies of the Government in power. What has happened in the last four or five years has increased each of those stress factors; rising expenses, and commodity prices and the Governments' cheap food policy. The paper presented also suggested a number of effects of this stress. Farmers who might be listening to this debate, or those who might read it at some later time, will recognize the effects of this stress. They are: chronic tiredness, trouble relaxing, forgetfulness, the losing of one's temper, disruptions in sleep patterns, arguments with family members, frequent back pain, difficulty making decisions, frequent headaches, changes in health, problems with children, discouragement about the future, less satisfaction with life than before, thoughts of suicide, and depression from mild to severe. These are the types of things which are decimating the farm population.

About three weeks ago representatives from the Ontario Federation of Agriculture appeared before the caucuses of the Parties of the House. They indicated a very surprising, but in some ways a very telling, statistic. They told us that out of 295 farm deaths last year, 95 of them were registered as suicide. This figure does not count deaths caused by car accidents, the pick-up truck running into a telephone pole, or anything like that. Those are cases in which the cause of death cannot really be determined. One-third of the farm deaths in Canada last year were suicides—the results of stress.

I am trying to place before the House the reasons why we have a real and broad responsibility to do something about the farm crisis. The manifestation of the stress being placed on farmers is resulting in members of the farm population going as far as committing suicide. So we are losing productive farmers, not only as a result of suicide, other deaths and illness, but as a result of bankruptcy as well.

The Farm Credit Corporation suggested that in 1984-85 some 478 bankruptcies occured. The corporation estimates that this year, 1985-86, there will be some 375. The reason for the reduction is that the corporation has ceased taking any action against farmers. It has ceased to take action with regard to bankruptcies, whereas the year before it would have taken legal action. There was a moratorium placed on farm foreclosures several months ago. However, there were still 375 actions taken by the Farm Credit Corporation. As I stated before, these figures deal only with farmers who are dealing with the Farm Credit Corporation. The corporation suggests that the level is approximately one in four. Some 25 per cent of the farmers in the country are finding themselves in financial trouble and may be forced off their farms next year unless the Government takes some action with respect to commodity prices.

As the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) pointed out, last year there was a 17 per cent reduction in farm incomes. In April of this year, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Mayer) announced that the Wheat Board will be paying 17 per cent less for the initial price of wheat. I am referring to No. 1 wheat, that which is 13.5 per cent protein, the best possible wheat that we have. That was bad enough. It was suggested that the price of other grains will drop by 25 per cent to 30 per cent. Just last week we were presented with the rest of the prices for grain. If we thought that the 17 per cent drop for No. 1 wheat was bad, the price for the feed wheats, No. 1, No. 2, and No. 3 utility, is being reduced by 25 per cent to 30 per cent. In other words, in considering the basket of grains, the reduction in terms of the price is around 27 per cent. It could be as low as 27 per cent in terms of the initial prices. Hopefully, we will receive less of a reduction in the end, but that is the reduction which we can expect.

I know that all Members are not farmers or wheat growers. However, the situation with respect to other commodities is not that much different. I refer to the markets for potatoes, fruits, pork and beef.

There was a 17 per cent reduction in income last year and there will be a 25 per cent reduction in income this year. That amounts to a grand total of 42 per cent in just two years. Two years ago most farmers found themselves in a pinch. They were just getting by. Since that time they have had to deal with a 42 per cent reduction in income. At least that is what we are expecting by the end of this year. If they felt pinched before they will really feel the squeeze now.

We have been trying to convince the Government to do something about this situation over the last several months. We want the Government to relieve the financial pressure on farmers. The Government has said that it will make some moves. It has done some things, but it has talked about a great many others. It is taking responsibility for some measures which were already in place. Most of the efforts of the Government in terms of helping agriculture have been talk.

Two weeks ago the Government made an announcement that there would be something initiated which would be of great help to farmers. In 1984 the Government promised that it would remove the tax on gasoline and diesel fuel. It did this. That was supposed to be a great move for farmers. That is something for which we asked. In fact I have a Private Member's Bill before the House suggesting just that. Why make such a big deal about the amount of money being rebated to farmers? The 5.5 cent per litre decrease on diesel fuel and the 7 cent per litre decrease on gasoline leaves less than 1 cent of tax on each of those products. That sounds great. We can thank the Government for that. However, just exactly how much do these decreases amount to?

In my area of the country it costs approximately $100 an acre from preparation to harvest. That is what it costs me at the absolute most. Some 20 litres of fuel is needed per acre. So the 2.5 cents per litre which was added on last week results in less than 50 cents an acre of that $100. However, it is something because the margin is small and 50 cents might make a difference. At 7 cents an acre, the figure would be $1.50 or $1.30 out of the $100. That is a start. I recognize that the Government has moved to fulfil the promise it made in September of 1984.

The second big government statement was with respect to a freeze on freight rates. It was suggested, although never proven, that the freight rate would move from $6 per tonne to $7.50 per tonne. The Minister had that frozen. However, the original freight rate was established with over 30 million tonnes in mind, but no one believes that we are going to ship that many tonnes in the next year. Therefore, the $1.50 increase per tonne is a false figure. Even if it were not a false figure, it is not government assistance.

If I am lucky, I might harvest a tonne of grain per acre. Therefore, even if there had been a reduction in the freight rate from $6 to $4.50, something which I would have accepted as being a reduction rather than simply a holding off on an increase, that would have saved me $1.50 per acre out of the $100 per acre it costs me to farm the land. However, now I will have a reduction only of $3 per acre.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) also said that he or the Government would bring up the plight of farmers at the Tokyo Summit at which seven nations were represented, at the OECD which represents 24 nations, and at GATT which represents 91 nations. To his credit, we understand that he did bring it up at the Tokyo Summit. We hope he will bring it up at the next meeting of the OECD since agriculture was not discussed at the last OECD meeting. We also hope that he will bring it up at the GATT.

Conservative Members suggested that the matter of agriculture will be brought up at the next GATT round of negotiations. However, according to The Globe and Mail, the Organization of Economic Co-operation and Development has only said that it might study the issue. Everyone except for Margaret Thatcher and the Canadian Prime Minister has suggested that there is no commitment to discuss agriculture at GATT. In any event, we have not done particularly well in the agricultural sector at GATT negotiations in the past. Our negotiators have always given away the best deals. They have traded off agriculture for deals in manufacturing or the sale of other products.

We should not feel too secure that this particular Government, any more than the previous Government, will put GATT agriculture discussions at the top of its list to make sure that agriculture does not get traded away for some other industry. We hope that the words spoken by government Members will still be in their minds so that they will put agriculture at the top of the list when they begin to negotiate at GATT.

The fourth matter brought up by the Prime Minister was the change in the price spread for two-price wheat from $5 to $7. Again, I thank him for that action. If that regulation is put in place, it will allow for something to be done, but in itself it does nothing. It allows the price spread of domestic wheat to go from $6 to $11.

Traditionally, until last year, the price spread was established by the world market. If the price on the world market was $7, our price went to $7, but if the world price went higher than $7, our price usually stayed at $7. It was a guarantee for the consumers of Canada that they would never have to pay more than $7 and less than $5 for wheat. The new price range is from $6 to $11. If it wishes to do so, the Government does have the authority to put the price of wheat at $10 or $11 if it goes before a special committee.

Because we have not been able to get a commitment from the Government to very specific payments, I would like to move an amendment to this motion. I move:

To remove the period after the words "farm bill" and insert the following therefor:

"by accepting the proposal by the Canadian farm groups that deficiency payments be made to keep Canadian prices at the farm gate equivalent to prices received by their American counterparts."

I know we are not voting on this motion, but I do wish to add this amendment to the motion put by the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster). It would suggest to the Government that it can talk about all the things it has said it is going to do, but unless it actually gives the farmers some belief that at the end of this year they will receive enough for their product to pay for the cost of production, 25 per cent of farmers will decide that there is no reason to grow grain.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair has received a copy of the amendment proposed by the Hon. Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo). However, if the Chair recalls correctly, the Hon. Member for Prince Albert seconded the motion moved by the Hon. Member for Algoma. That means that the Chair cannot accept an amendment from the Hon. Member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, could you accept that amendment with the unanimous consent of the House?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Certainly. Does the Hon. Member have that unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no unanimous consent.

Mr. Fraleigh: Mr. Speaker, one point on which the Hon. Member and I could agree is that in the past, we have not done well at GATT. However, there are a couple of points he raised on which I would like to question him.

In closing he said that farmers wanted to be given something. Farmers do not want to be given anything. All they want is to be treated fairly. I attended the same committee meeting the Hon. Member attended the other night at which the psychologist was present. Does the Hon. Member not think that if the same survey had been done 10 years ago, 20 years ago or 30 years ago, it would have received exactly the same responses?

Could the Hon. Member point out all of those things that the Government has done to assist the western grain grower? There have been two advances under the Western Grain Stabilization Act and disaster relief went not only to the grain farmers but to western livestock farmers as well. Could the Hon. Member expand on those things in his response?

The Hon. Member made light of the freezing of the freight rate and of the farm fuel tax rebate. Surely he was not suggesting that the Government should not have taken those measures.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, first, my statement about what farmers need was very specific. I said that they need to know that at the end of the year they will receive enough for their grain to pay for the cost of production. That statement was a very specific one. Whether it is done by a deficiency payment or by establishing the price of grain in some other way, it is one of the requirements. Otherwise, we will lose 25 per cent of those farmers in the next year.

Referring to the statement which suggested that the results of the psychiatrist might have been the same 20 years ago, there have been a few years when that was possible. For example, 1972 was one of the best years farmers have ever had. There was no doubt in my mind or in the mind of any farmer 12 years ago. Farmers were out there expanding their operations as quickly as they could have five years ago, and there was no doubt in their minds. There have been such occasions, but for three years now we have been faced with the same situation, and it is becoming worse every year.

I mentioned a couple of the things that have been done. I congratulated the Government on making the move on oil prices because it was promised and it was a worth-while move. Also the Government changed the Western Grain Stabilization Program allowing for payments to be made on an interim basis. However, to most farmers that points out the extent of the crisis. The program was not supposed to solve the deficiency in farm incomes last year. It was set up as a replacement for a reduction in income. It was an insurance policy for which farmers paid a certain amount, and it was paid back to them. It has been in existence since 1977. The very fact that it was called upon is a good indication of the kind of crisis faced by agriculture. The fact that it will be needed again next year and the fact that the program will be deficient in funds next year are indications of how badly we need the deficiency payments which have been suggested.

As far as disasters and the attempts by the Government to help out in disaster areas are concerned, it is an accepted tradition of all Governments. It did not occur last year because a Conservative Government was in power. It has been a tradition of all Governments of the country for many years. It was the least that could be done. It was too bad that it took as long as it did to pull it out of the Government.

Mr. Caldwell: Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I rather enjoyed the comments of the Hon. Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo). I notice that he is having more difficulty, as these debates take place once every few months, trying to criticize the Government for some of the things it is doing. As he pointed out, he had a Private Member's Bill calling for the elimination of fuel taxes, and of course the Government met that request. Of course we understand that the Liberals will continue to complain; they did not do anything when they were in power.

The Hon. Member sort of said that the elimination of the fuel tax was good but that it did not go far enough; that the Government should have done this or that. He had a Private Member's Bill calling for its elimination and, now that it has been done, why is he still not satisfied? It is somewhat like the NDP philosophy. We took the capital gains off farm land, and the next thing we know, members of the NDP are complaining about that. I am just wondering where they actually stand on some of these issues. I would like to hear the Hon. Member thank the Government a little more rather than hear his condescending tone during debates.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I like to give credit where credit is due. I have never failed to congratulate the Government when it has made a move. I just wish the Government would do it a little faster. The Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) have indicated twice that they would look at a deficiency payment. Farmers are holding their breath because they need to know that there will be enough money coming out of the next crop, as do the credit unions and banks. If the Government intends to make a deficiency payment, why is it dragged out? It would be much more valuable politically for the Government to do it now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate with the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Blais).

Mr. Boudria: Oh boy!

Mr. Pierre Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I must say the cordial welcome I am getting from my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) inspires me.

I was listening earlier to my hon. Opposition colleagues, and I really wonder what we could give them, what we could "put on the table" to make them really happy. Even the Member who spoke just a moment ago said he never failed to acknowledge the moves this Government made for Canadian farmers. I must have a poor memory, because in the last 20 months there were very few favourable comments on the part of the Opposition, following the series of measures, more than 200 of them, that were taken by this Government—the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) and the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Mayer)—to help farm producers.

The motion presented by our hon. colleague from Algoma, Mr. Speaker, raises several problems. Obviously, they "put everything on the table". In fact, they had to put a lot on the table to find any negative aspects that were contrary to this Government's policy. All the—

Mr. Boudria: Oh my God!

Mr. Blais: The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell may well invoke his God.

Mr. Speaker, all Members will readily admit that a number of Canadian farmers are now in a financial predicament. That is obvious, everybody knows about their financial difficulties stemming from the economic slump which began a few years ago. Still I think it is important to reassure our friends and remind them of the positive measures taken by our Government. Quite a few have already been implemented and others will be launched in the near future to relieve as much as possible our agricultural producers of the difficult and, in some cases, intolerable circumstances besetting them.

In response to the motion of my Liberal colleague, Mr. Speaker, I intend to touch on several issues, including indebtedness, interest rates, research, the U.S. Farm Bill and, finally, wheat prices.

With respect to indebtedness, Mr. Speaker, I would be tempted to ask my colleague from Algoma where he was when the Minister of Agriculture, along with many of my colleagues and myself, held a number of public meetings throughout Canada to discuss this issue with various farm groups. Hardly a week ago, just before flying off to Tokyo, our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) met with all Canadian farm leaders to seek their views before joining with the major world powers and asking them to put the agricultural situation on the agenda for consideration.

Had the Hon. Member been able to meet with Canadian farm producers, perhaps he would now be in a better position to appreciate the unacceptable consequences which would flow from the kind of proposition he has made.

Mr. Speaker, the proposed court-ordered debt review would not solve the problem of farm producers. Instead we would recommend—and this is clear, I think—the establishment of committees to review the farm debt. As our Minister has already pointed out, these committees would help farmers refinance their debts and make some arrangements with their creditors.

It takes a lot of nerve to give advice on farm credit after making Canadian farmers pay 18 and 20 per cent interest on their loans and holding them hostage as it were for a number of years.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that thanks to the economic policies we introduced, interest rates have reached far more acceptable levels and all Canadian producers can appreciate this development. Our approach, combined with other measures announced last February, reflects this Government's firm and steadfast resolve to do everything in its power to remedy a situation that developed under the previous Government.

Mr. Speaker, agriculture is certainly one sector where the Government's action has been speedy, with a host of measures being taken to deal with various problems simultaneously.

The work we have accomplished in the past 18 months is certainly nothing to be ashamed of. Those who should be ashamed and who should be shamed into silence after their many years of inaction are the people in the Opposition. I realize my colleagues in the New Democratic Party may, on occasion, have raised a number of ideas that were both new and innovative. It is much easier for them, since they know they will never sit on the Government benches and be in a position to introduce Government policies. There is many a slip between the cup and the lip, and it is not always easy for a government to reconcile the kind of problematic economic situation we were left by the present Official Opposition with the need for finding the funds to help farmers in distress.

As for interest rates available to farm producers, may I recall that on April 1, the Minister announced the fourth drop in 18 months in the rates on loans provided by the Farm Credit Corporation to its customers. Interest rates had reached their lowest level in more than seven years. The Opposition didn't mention that. It didn't mention the drop in interest rates which is continuing even now. Farmers have also benefitted from a similar easing of rates on loans provided by financial institutions in the private sector. This trend is being felt across the country, Mr. Speaker.

Through the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise), the Government has repeatedly indicated its firm resolve to reduce the burden on our farmers. This is what we are determined to do, Mr. Speaker, and I think that we have taken a step in the right direction. I find it unacceptable for people to say that nothing has been done and that we prefer words to actions. That is completely false. In spite of a difficult economic situation, we have succeeded in implementing new programs for farmers, especially as concerns farm loans. We were the first to innovate in years.

The special farm loans program of the FCC amounts to $700 million.

Mr. Boudria: Who wrote that?

Mr. Blais: What I have said, dear friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, is written in my heart and my mind. It is not difficult when you know what is going on. If you had listened earlier, you would have understood the meaning of what I was saying instead of only hearing the words.

Mr. Boudria: I understand quite well. I simply find it incredible!

Mr. Blais: Incredible, is it? When you return home after the next elections and want to go back into agriculture, you might be eligible for a FCC loan. Since you did not listen in this House, we can send someone from the FCC who can explain to you how it works, perhaps better than someone from the New Democratic Party who cannot do so, at the moment, but who should.

On February 16, the new commodity-based loans system was announced. Indeed, if I am not mistaken, the details of this program were released to all FCC offices in Canada in the last couple of days or weeks. There are already many applications and I think that we should soon be able to implement this program which will help all farm producers. It is an innovative program. Like always, it will take a certain time for the people to get used to this new idea and for it to become truly effective. Rather than criticizing us before we have taken even a single step, I think that the Members opposite should give a chance to this program which will make $700 million available to farm producers. If we want to be fair and honest and to help farm producers, we must give this program time to work.

Conversely Mr. Speaker, research happens to be the best way to support our agricultural food industry and turn it into a powerful and leading sector. The results of work done in our stations throughout Canada continue to be a major contribution. We were able to slow down the growth rate of our expenditures without affecting the inherent value of our programs. Various ongoing projects and others to be announced shortly attest to our Government's obvious intention to promote the interests of this sector.

As the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell suggests, it is true that certain projects had to be put off because—

Mr. Boudria: I did not say that.

Mr. Blais: Had the Hon. Member been in his place, I might have been able to refer to the other Member, but since as usual you never stop talking while I make a speech, I thought you were the one who had interrupted me once again.

In any case, it was simply because of sheer mismanagement that we ended up with a $200 billion deficit which prevented us from going ahead with some research projects. Instead of trying to blame us for such delays, you should own up to your mistakes and remember that we are forced to put off investment programs because you left us in a precarious financial position. Some of our Government's decisions were not easy to make, Mr. Speaker. Considering that we have to pay $75 million a day in interests on the debts piled up by the previous administration, no wonder we have to put some investment plans on the back burner. We are not doing this for the fun of it, Mr. Speaker, and that is something they ought to realize and understand.

Regarding our trade negotiations with the United States, we have said many times this is an important challenge we must meet. The United States is our main trading partner, and instead of keeping our distance like the previous Government, we have decided to co-operate and work together with our main partner. I think that is a legitimate and normal desire. They are our friends and we must work together. It makes sense when 75 per cent of our trade is with the U.S. I think that the challenge we have to meet is a challenge . . . We must try to provide markets not only for our agricultural sector but for all our Canadian industries. However, repairing the damage they did by scaring off everyone everywhere is not done in a matter of days. Nevertheless I think it is feasible through frank and honest discussion and by starting a normal debate with the parties concerned. Anyone in this House or elsewhere who has ever taken part in negotiations knows or should know that negotiations involve sitting down and looking at the various arguments and points that are put on the table.

Mr. Speaker, for several months, our Government, and more specifically the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) have made it clear that we are certainly not going to put agriculture on the block. In recent months, the Official Opposition has once again been raising the spectre of fear and using scare tactics to keep that fear alive. Why, Mr. Speaker? Well it's quite obvious. In fact, I was with the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, who doesn't always go to Southeast Asia, when he went to the U.S. on one occasion.

We met with U.S. Members of Congress. We found that they understood our situation and that they had problems of their own. And using scare tactics here in the House is not going to help one bit when the Americans are putting protectionist legislation before their own Congress.

As parliamentarians and representatives of our farm producers, we must go and see them or invite them here to discuss with them and find ways which will enable us to set up the appropriate mechanisms to share our markets and strengthen our economic relations to the satisfaction of both countries. Canada and the United States are two developed countries and our previous relations have been positive, although they had begun to deteriorate before we were elected. I think everybody was prepared to admit that, including Members of the Opposition. We have taken over and we are in the process of putting the ship back on an even keel. They should help and encourage us because the interests of Canadian farmers have precedence over the interests of the Party in office or the Government. The outlook might be somewhat more promising if only Members of the Opposition were to rise to the defence of Canadian farmers, and the speeches heard in this House indicated that we are not here to debate meaningless issues, but to uphold the interests of our agricultural community.

I would suggest that the common agricultural policy as set forth in the U.S. Farm Bill has given rise to the escalating war of subsidies. Every country is concerned about the measures taken by its partners, as evidenced by the fears expressed by the United States and the European Economic Community countries. This week our Minister of Agriculture held negotiations and discussions on this particular issue with our European Economic Community partners. We have every reason to be concerned, of course.

Canada is definitely not immune to the concern which is now being felt worldwide. Our country depends on export trade a lot more than do the United States and the European Economic Community.

It may be that when the European Economic Community countries established their agricultural program they had no intention of creating huge agricultural surpluses. That was not their objective, but they are now facing a situation which is having a very negative impact in Canada, in the United States, and even in Europe. We must find a solution, Mr. Speaker.

Half of our farm revenues come from export sales. We too are worried, and we believe something must be done.

The dangers inherent in a financial war such as this are obvious, Mr. Speaker. The various Governments spend enormous amounts of money, the prices on international markets are subjected to downward pressures and Canadian farmers' income is reduced. We are all aware of that, Mr. Speaker. This commercial war is not the only factor involved. The international market is undergoing rapid change. We must adapt to changes and live with the international financial situation. The global supply and demand fluctuations exert a far greater influence on Canadian agriculture than any other factor.

Mr. Speaker, we must secure our markets, and I think we have already started doing this. There is a factor which appears very important at this stage: Are the countries of the world . . . At this time, one needs raise the issue more as a global attitude.

Mr. Speaker, I personally had the opportunity to raise this issue during a meeting of the World Health Organization; because environment, health and education are all sectors that are connected with agriculture, this organization had chosen this year to focus on the interrelations between agriculture and the various other sectors.

We should ask ourselves a question. I have asked it myself in this House, Mr. Speaker. When one-third of mankind, perhaps a little less, is faced with enormous farm surpluses, and when two-thirds of mankind have needs which we cannot fully satisfy with the international system which we have now, there is cause for concern.

I have raised this issue. It appears in the official report of the particular workshop on agriculture of the World Health Organization, because it is absolutely necessary for every country, while not forgetting to defend its own interests, to take into account the needs of the other countries of the world. We are in a situation—I understand and will conclude with this, Mr. Speaker—where we must take into account the markets of other countries. Our Government is very sensitive. I believe our Prime Minister went to Tokyo to tell exactly that to the representatives of the other countries. They have understood. We have seen this in the reports which have been mentioned, in the report of the Economic Summit in Tokyo.

That is indeed already a first step and it is Canada which has taken it. Mr. Speaker, you can rest assure that our Government will continue in this way in the forthcoming weeks and months.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, it was nice to hear from the Parliamentary Secretary who spoke in his rambunctious fashion this afternoon. I noted that during the last election campaign the Tories suggested that they would expand agricultural research and development by providing greater assistance for agriculture, more funding for research, and so on. Yet, the budget for this year is down about $40 million from previous years.

I had the opportunity to visit the broiler research facility in Kentville, Nova Scotia. That very important research facility burned down last June. I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary, who speaks on behalf of the Minister and the Government, can give a commitment this afternoon that funding will be provided to reconstruct that facility, which is absolutely essential, not only to the poultry industry in Nova Scotia but to the entire Maritimes.

I ask that because the Government has agreed to contribute at least $10 million to a research project funded by a group of wealthy investors on Wall Street in the United States called Dreamstreet. Some people say it is $50 million, but it is at least $10 million. If there is funding available for that program, which was apparently approved by the Department of National Revenue in spite of the protestations of the Department of Agriculture and the various Canadian Holstein organizations, to do research, which has been categorized as being almost useless, can the Government provide $350,000 for the reconstruction of the Kentville agriculture research facility which is dedicated to poultry research?

The Hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Brightwell) and I have made many representations about Dreamstreet. In fact, we have asked to have it put before the Standing Committee on Agriculture and to have the key promoters of it brought before that committee so that we can investigate it. It is interesting that I received a memorandum from Dr. Ken E. Leslie, the dairy co-ordinator for the Ontario Ministry of Agriculture. He comments about the Holstein project which the Government is funding to the extent of $10 million, perhaps a great deal more. Concerning the determination of physiological differences and the profitability of red and white Holsteins, he says that generally the protocol has poorly-defined objectives, superficial background documentation, inadequate experimental methods, and an ambiguous approach to analysis. He says that the motives of this project clearly extend beyond the objectives of the study and the methods are very suspect.

• (1720)

Is the Government willing to provide funding through the Scientific Tax Research Credit Program for that purpose if it is willing to provide funding for the reconstruction of the Kentville Poultry Laboratory?

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, of all research programs in Canada, it is clear that a number—and as you know there is not only one—that one in particular, I have no details, but I was struck by the figure that was indicated to me about the $40 million cutback. This is approximately one half of what we are paying in interests every day on the deficit built up by your Government. You are in a position to realize indeed . . . You should not, I cannot understand why the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Mr. Speaker, insisted on my speaking before him. I fear if it was in order to heckle during the remaining of my remarks. If he wanted to speak first, he should have said so and spoken in his turn, rather than asking me to speak before him.

Mr. Tardif (Richmond—Wolfe): It was in order to put the records straight after hearing your falsehoods.

Mr. Blais: Did you hear that, Mr. Speaker? Again, that has no sense. Anyway, we will have to get used to it.

Mr. Tardif (Richmond—Wolfe): We want the question answered.

Mr. Blais: We will have to get used to it, Mr. Speaker, because comes the next election, we will have 17 more. This is what is cheering me up, Mr. Speaker, to a certain point. I am saying to myself that at the next election, we will have to work to have those people replaced by others capable of coming here in this House and understanding reason, rather than uttering comments such as: You are lying, you are saying ineptitudes, as we have heard again this afternoon in this House. We are here to make serious comments on investment projects, Mr. Speaker, but listen to those ungracious remarks! One might think this is a circus. Fortunately, you waited until those young people who attended the debate, who were here behind the Chair, who were there part of the afternoon . . . I would be ashamed of uttering such nonsense, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Boudria: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) on a point of order.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am certain that you have noted what is happening and that you are certainly aware with your great knowledge of the rules of this House that Members must not refer to people in the gallery.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the Hon. Member for Bellechasse (Mr. Blais) conclude his intervention?

Mr. Blais: There is no one in the gallery, Mr. Speaker. You are speaking about people who are not in the gallery. I shall come back to my comments.

What I said, and I want to come back to it because the Hon. Member does not seem to have understood . . . First of all, he was not sitting in his place and kept talking all the time I was making my speech. If he had listened, he would have understood that what we have tried to do in the area of research is to protect what we have because they put us in a difficult economic situation. It is extraordinary that we have been able to maintain as we have research programs throughout Canada, and it has long been an asset in this country that research programs are decentralized. Because of their irresponsible financial behaviour, they have forced us to tighten the purse strings if we want to pay our bills. Naturally, since we are responsible people and a responsible Government, Mr. Speaker, we shall eventually straigthen out our finances and certain research projects will be able to go forward with some delay. The Members opposite should understand this because $40 million is exactly half of what it is costing us each day to pay for their deficit. We may have cut back this amount in one year, but it is costing us twice as much each day in interest charges because of them.

[English]

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary could comment on the commodity-based mortgage. Is there any new money or does this program essentially take an existing mortgage and replace it with a new mortgage? There is a lower interest rate provided the commodity price stays low. However, if a potato farmer in Prince Edward Island takes out a mortgage with potatoes at 2 cents a pound and the price goes up to 6 cents a pound, about the break-even point, then the mortgage principal increases three times. Although the Government said it was providing $175 million over two years, the literature says that there is no subsidy. The Government plans to get back all the money it puts in at the full rate of interest which the FCC provides for. The other problem is that it is only available to people who have—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but the time allotted has expired.

The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary may reply briefly.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I would like to answer. This is certainly an interesting question and these matters will be examined further in the coming weeks. However, I am glad that the Hon. Member has spoken about the potato issue in the Maritimes because I checked some facts this morning and found that what we have done in the case of potatoes, for instance, which was to implement a diversification program, has had a very positive effect on the market. In one month, the price nearly doubled in certain sectors. This has provided additional income for the farm producers. That is to our credit, but they do not talk about such good news.

An Hon. Member: Speak about the potato issue in Quebec.

Mr. Blais: Change places if you want to speak more nonsense. I shall not name him, but he is not in his place. You should ask to be recognized later if you have something to say. If you have a question to ask, stand up and ask it.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate with the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria).

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague from Richmond—Wolfe (Mr. Tardif) for showing the Parliamentary Secretary this afternoon once again how inadequate this Government's measures are.

[English]

I would also like to congratulate the Hon. Member for Algoma on a very thoughtful and appropriate motion. Let me remind the House about this motion and how important it is for all of us to consider. I am sure that although you remember it vividly, Mr. Speaker, the Tories have forgotten it by now. The motion says:

[Translation]

Consideration of an Opposition Motion—That this House urges the government to take immediate and firm action on behalf of Canadian farmers to ease the burden of debt by introducing such measures as court-ordered debt review, a meaningful interest relief program and an increased commitment to research, and further urges the Government to make firm commitments now to Canadian farmers that they will not be harmed or their interests sacrificed in its comprehensive trade negotiations with the United States and to provide a strong response to difficulties expected as a result of the U.S. Farm Bill.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is obvious the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) gave this motion a great deal of thought, since it includes many of the problems facing our farmers today, problems the Government should have dealt with but, once again, did not.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment briefly on interest rates. The Government, through its Members, has been bragging almost daily about present interest rate levels. It has taken every opportunity in the House to make the point that interest rates today are lower than ever.

I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that real interest rates, in other words, the difference between the inflation rate and the rate a farmer can expect to pay on a loan, that this difference commonly referred as the real interest rate is higher today than it was during the worst of the economic recession two or three years ago. Why is this situation allowed to continue? Do we see the Government bragging about the level of real interest rates? Of course not, Mr. Speaker. By failing to raise this point in the House, Government Members from agricultural ridings are acting irresponsibly. Fortunately, however, for the House and for our farmers, Opposition Members are going to keep on showing this Conservative Government that this problem cannot be ignored.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that the Tories made many promises during the last election campaign. You will recall that there were 338 Tory promises. Let me refresh your memory about the promises that were made with respect to agriculture. Being the non-partisan person you are, Mr. Speaker, you had to listen to those Tories make all these promises which they knew they could never fulfil. The Hon. Member for Lambton—Middlesex (Mr. Fraleigh) will undoubtedly recall those promises.

These particular promises come directly from a book of promises which even has the PC logo on it. These promises were made in Sherbrooke, Quebec, on July 26, 1984. One states:

We will establish an Agri-bond Program to provide loans at reduced rates to producers. A tax exemption for earned income on these bonds will be provided to encourage people to invest in this program.

I challenge Tory Members in the House to stand up and tell me and my constituents of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell what happened to the agri-bond program. Was it a promise? Yes. Was it a broken promise? Yes.

Mr. Siddon: Be patient.

Mr. Boudria: It was a Tory broken promise.

Let me read another promise just in case I have not convinced one or two Conservative Members, although I know their numbers are declining daily. Promise No. 7 that was made in Sherbrooke, Quebec, is:

Since many producers find their economic viability threatened as a result of being locked into long term high interest rate loans, we will immediately allocate the necessary funding to assist producers in refinancing their loans at more reasonable rates.

Mr. McDermid: We did.

Mr. Boudria: Some Members across the way say that they did. Where was this immediate initiative to refinance existing loans?

Mr. McDermid: It's done.

Mr. Boudria: There are farmers in my riding who are locked into long-term loans, and it is certainly not those Tories opposite who have done anything to get them out of those loans. They made promises to the Canadian people but did not deliver on them. The Tories promised to take this action immediately.

Let me quote Promise No. 9 that was made in Sherbrooke. It states:

We will change Section 31 of the Income Tax Act, as it applies to farmers, to reflect the principles of equity, neutrality, simplicity and certainty.

I quote further:

In addition, the strong arm and confrontationist tactics presently practised by the Department of Revenue will be immediately abolished and a practice whereby the taxpayer is treated openly and honestly will be instituted.

While that is an elaborate promise stated by the Tories, where are the modifications to Section 31?

Shortly after the election, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) published a White Paper on farm financing, Section 31 and the Agri-Bond Program. An all-party committee of the House studied those issues and came to the unanimous conclusion that there should be an agri-bond program and there should be modifications to Section 31 of the Income Tax Act. If you believe that is a partisan statement, Mr. Speaker, you would be incorrect because that committee included members of the Conservative majority. What political weight did those Conservative back-benchers who sat on that committee have with the Government? They had no weight because nothing was done. The Minister of Finance blocked his ears and did not read the report. He did not listen to the Tory back-benchers.

Mr. McDermid: You would make a good stable boy.

Mr. Boudria: It is another broken promise. Let me read promise No. 12.

Mr. McDermid: You can shovel it.

Mr. Boudria: The Member across the way says a shovel was required to shovel those promises during the last election.

Mr. McDermid: You would make a good stable boy.

Mr. Boudria: He is correct to say that this is all it is. We have a lot of what these promises are made of behind the barns in my riding. I thank the Member opposite for bringing that to our attention this afternoon. He is quite correct in saying that we have to shovel promises like that because that is what they are. Let me read promise No. 12. It says:

A PC Government will develop a healthy Canadian agricultural industry by providing a strong agriculture research base through greater assistance for agricultural colleges, more funding for agricultural research and development and amending tax policy to encourage private sector investment.

What is the reality behind that promise? My colleague, the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), pointed out very eloquently earlier today that the same Conservatives who made these promises cut back on agricultural research. He gave an excellent example of the poultry research facility in Kentville. That important facility burned down. It is not a matter of constructing a new facility but of replacing one which already existed. The Government does not even have the political will to replace an important facility that burned down, let alone live up to its campaign promise to build more facilities.

Furthermore, not only will the Tories not fulfil their promise to build more facilities, they are actually cancelling the previous Government's commitment to research facilities.

Earlier today, my colleague, the Hon. Member for Richmond—Wolfe (Mr. Tardif), referred to the Government's expenditures and program review of 1984. That document was tabled in the House on Black Tuesday in November, 1984. In it, the program to build a facility in Victoriaville was cancelled by the heartless Government across the way. As you can see, Mr. Speaker, the Government has broken its promise of the sacred trust.

With respect to free trade, during the election campaign free trade came up as an issue. Canadians were asking the various political candidates what their position was on free trade. When they asked the Conservative Leader, he said, and he said it again in a speech made in the Province of Quebec: "Fair trade but not free trade". Those were the words used by the Leader of the Conservative Party. What happened to him? Why did he have this change of heart? What made him sell out the interests of the people of Canada in this way? Perhaps Hon. Members opposite at some point in the future will explain this irrational behaviour on the part of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney).

I would like to quote from a statement made to the federal Liberal Task Force on Agriculture in Charlottetown on March 19, 1986. This is not a Liberal group. This is a very objective, well known and respected organization.

An Hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Boudria: Perhaps my colleague opposite thinks otherwise. Let him put it on the record if he thinks the National Farmers Union is other than the way I have described it. The representative of that organization said, and I quote:

Under Canada-U.S.A. Bilateral Free Trade package we may have to support an American domestic or military protectionist stance. ... Even though the Right Honourable Joe Clark is quoted as saying that the existing Canadian Supply Management Marketing Boards would not be a part of the Free Trade Negotiations, the reality is, if other sectors (i.e., processing of turkey, chicken, dairy, eggs, et cetera) are negotiated, the real danger is that the processing industry (mainly American-owned) will move south of the border resulting in massive Canadian unemployment—

Not only does the National Farmers Union have a concern about the agricultural industry in terms of farming, it has a second concern which relates to the processing of agricultural products as well. Some Hon. Members opposite, partisan as they are, do not want to believe what the National Farmers Union is saying. Let us see if they can criticize my next quote from the New Brunswick Milk Marketing Board. Even Tories would find it hard not to believe that organization. Other provincial milk marketing boards have said the same thing. The National Farmers Union talks about the potential of loss of supply management under a comprehensive bilateral trade agreement, and I quote:

The removal of supply management and trade restrictions would see a reduction in price to the New Brunswick consumer for milk and dairy products. The consumer would have access to a wider variety of imitation dairy products (imported) than is the case at present. Milk producers would have susbtantially reduced incomes. They would be faced with two decisions: (1) to get out of the dairy business, or (2) increase production in order to maintain cash flow.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, with the large dairy surplus in the United States right now, it being larger than the total Canadian production, what would we gain by over-production, what would we gain by over-producing in order to try to regenerate the income which would be lost by the potential loss of our supply management system? I would like to hear the views of Hon. Members opposite as to whether or not we should have a comprehensive bilateral free trade agreement which would cover agriculture. Do they think our supply management system is worth retaining? I believe it is.

In the very limited moments I have left, I would like to elaborate on that further.

[Translation]

Mr. Boudria: In my riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Mr. Speaker, there are a great many dairy producers who are quite concerned about free trade. You will recall that I have tabled in this House petitions on this issue signed by some 4,000 Glengarry—Prescott—Russell constituents. From the Conservative Government, they ask for, request and demand the assurance that their milk quotas will be maintained . . . I should like to remind the Hon. Member who is vociferating over there that the quota system was an initiative of a Liberal Government. Our Party set up that quota system and we are not going to let this Conservative Government terminate it. As long as I sit in this House, I shall try the utmost to protect the dairy producers in my riding.

[English]

Let me say very briefly that the farmers of Canada are not pleased with the February 26 initiative concerning commodity-based mortgages. They have said very clearly they want no part of it and that this measure is unfair and, by and large, useless to the agricultural industry. It is not the panacea which the Tories pretend it is.

Had I had more time, Mr. Speaker, I could have developed further this point and several others aspects of the farm industry.

To conclude, I should like to congratulate the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) for his excellent initiative of bringing this dossier to the attention of the House of Commons. It is hoped, Mr. Speaker, that the Government will listen and will act along the lines suggested by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Algoma.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Champlain (Mr. Champagne) for a question or comment.

Mr. Champagne: Mr. Speaker, first of all, when the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) speaks about promises made in Sherbrooke and broken by our Government, I would like to point out that he is forgetting to mention many promises which were kept. They appear in the document and he voluntarily omitted them. The first concerns the long-term dairy policy. Mr. Speaker, we had promised this during the electoral campaign, and when the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell says that the quotas were implemented by his Government, I can tell him that he is quite wrong because the quotas were implemented by the farm producers themselves. That is what all Canadian farm producers want.

Second, Mr. Speaker, in 1981 the Liberal Government promised to sign a long-term dairy policy. Who broke that promise? The Liberals did. We signed the policy, and we paid for the 1983 crop losses because the Liberals did not want to take action, they did not want to pay. They simply forgot all about Quebec agricultural producers. We paid, Mr. Speaker, not the Liberals. They had nothing to do with it. Who lowered interest rates which peaked at 22 per cent under the Liberals, and who drove Quebec and other Canadian farm producers right into the ground? Again the Liberals, and none of them stood up to defend the interests of our agricultural community, least of all the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Speaker, Canadian farm producers know how the Liberals operate, and indeed the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell was supposed to come to Trois-Rivières, but he did not show up, he did not have the courage to come and repeat the misleading statements of his Government before the agricultural producers of my riding. In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would urge the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell to learn to read and be at least honest enough to admit that our Government has done some good; he should stop criticizing the constructive measures taken by our Government.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I have just grasped the Conservative mentality. I have just grasped the Conservative mentality.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Della Noce: If you have grasped it, do not cross over.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) should reply.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, the Conservative mentality means that if you promise a great many things and deliver a few, you will be forgiven for all your broken promises. You see, Mr. Speaker, all a Conservative has to do is to promise the moon and the moment he delivers something, he can say that the objective has been met because something has been done.

The Canadian people will not allow themselves to be deceived by the Conservatives. I will point out to Hon. Members that, at the going rate, the Government will need until year 2026 to live up to the 338 promises it made and which I have enumerated in the House on a number of occasions. And if the Hon. Member opposite is satisfied with this, Mr. Speaker, I, for one, am not, and neither are my constituents of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, a number of Members who have spoken this afternoon have indicated that interest rates are critical to the farm community. They mentioned the fact that interest rates have been very high. Of course, interest rates are still excessively high. It has been said that they have caused problems. Will the Hon. Member explain why he believes the Government has stood idly by, in a sense, when one looks at real interest rates in Canada today? Real interest rates are the difference between the prime rate and the rate of inflation. Today, real interest rates in Canada are among the highest in the world. They are higher today than they have been in the past number of years. As a matter of fact, the highest rates were in the years 1984 and 1985.

Mr. McDermid: Nonsense!

Mr. Riis: The Hon. Member says that this is nonsense. I dare him to stand up and explain why real interest rates today in 1986 are higher than they were in 1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983. I will sit down and he can stand up to explain the situation.

Mr. Dick: They were 11 per cent in 1981.

Mr. Riis: Today, real interest rates in this country are the highest in the world. In 1985 they averaged out at 6.58 per cent. In 1984 they were 7.66 per cent.

Mr. Dick: They were 11.5 per cent in 1981.

Mr. Riis: I am trying to get a question out, but I am having some difficulty.

I challenge Members opposite to challenge my statistics. I challenge one of them to stand up and put it on the record publicly.

Mr. Dick: It is on the record.

Mr. Riis: No, it is not. The Hon. Member must stand in his place and be identified by the Speaker.

I challenge Hon. Members to challenge my statistics. I challenge them to say that interest rates in Canada, in real terms, are not the highest in the western world and that they are not higher today than they were during the Liberal regime. Can the Hon. Member explain why the Government has failed to take action in this respect?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I guess the mistake made by the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) was that he did not explain his position slowly enough in order for Conservative Members to understand. What the Hon. Member says is quite correct. He has referred to real interest rates. I will explain what it means, slowly, in order for Members opposite to understand.

Mrs. Sparrow: You don't have to do that!

Mr. Boudria: Maybe the Hon. Member for Calgary South (Mrs. Sparrow) knows, but others in her Party do not since they have been asking questions. The difference is that the spread between the rate of inflation and the rate at which one can borrow money is greater today than it was at the height of the recession. What is even more difficult to understand is the fact that this high real interest rate has been offered to Canadians by the same Government which made Promise No. 7. I will remind Hon. Members of that promise. It states that since many producers find their economic viability threatened as a result of being locked into long-term high interest rate loans, the Government will allocate immediately the necessary funding to assist producers in refinancing their loans at more reasonable rates.

What have members of the Government done thus far? They have established the highest real interest rates that we have seen in this country in many years—in decades. That is what the Tory regime has done. I am sure it is a record of which Members opposite are ashamed. They should hang their heads in shame for even trying to justify these actions.

Mr. Fraleigh: Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—wherever he is from—that if he thinks that his turning this debate, which started out very seriously, into a zoo will impress very many Canadian farmers, he is out by a mile. I have a document in my hand which contains a list of ten agricultural policies. We have acted on nine out of ten of these policies. I wish to tell Hon. Members who proposed these policies. The document is entitled "Turner Agricultural Plan Unveiled". Nine out of the ten points promised in the Liberal platform have been acted upon by this Government. Will the Hon. Member comment on that?

While he was on his feet he made a statement about the processing—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but the last minute in the ten minutes provided for the question and comment period will go to the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria).

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that the Hon. Member for Lambton—Middlesex recognizes that the ideas which members of his Party have are not all that great and that occasionally they steal good Liberal ideas. That is probably the only good thing this Government has done since it took office.

I would like to tell the Hon. Member that if he thinks his government initiatives are appropriate, the brief I have in my hand from the Nova Scotia pork industry sets out the disappointment which that association feels. It states:

> Our Association was extremely disappointed that the February 26th federal budget contained no referral to the feed grain problems in the Maritimes.

The document goes on to criticize the Budget.

In closing, I wish to remind the Hon. Member that the name of the riding which I represent is Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. The people of my riding are proud of the name and they hold dearly to it.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, having sat here all day, for three minutes—

Mr. McDermid: I thought you were giving me the floor.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I decided against giving my spot up to my hon. friend.

In three minutes I wish to raise what has become a very serious issue in southern British Columbia, that is, in spite of the Government's decision to extend drought relief to the hard-pressed cattlemen in southern British Columbia for feed bought between September and which was most recently extended to the end of March, it has unfortunately left most of the cattlemen still in need. I refer to those who bought feed prior to September of 1985 and those who bought feed after March 31, in other words, those who bought feed during the month of April. Unfortunately, so many cattlemen looked ahead and saw the difficulty coming in terms of the drought that they went out and bought feed prior to the dates for which they would be eligible for drought support. Since the situation in central and southern British Columbia was brought about as a result of a very difficult spring and people had to go out and buy feed again during the month of April, there are literally hundreds and hundreds of cattlemen who have been kept out of the government relief program.

I wish to raise this critical concern during the debate today. I plead with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise), his Parliamentary Secretary and department officials who may be listening today to consider extending the dates, thus enabling hundreds of cattlemen in southern British Columbia to qualify for the $30 per tonne rebate for feed purchased above and beyond their normal requirements.

In the closing moments of the debate I would simply like to add my voice to that of my friend, the Hon. Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo), who moved a motion earlier. I would like to move the following amendment:

> To remove the period after "Farm Bill" and insert
> "by accepting the proposal by Canadian farm groups that deficiency payments be made to keep Canadian prices at the farm-gate equivalent to prices received by their American counterparts".

Mr. Boudria: Of course, I second that motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Chair finds the amendment to be in order.

It being six o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 82(12), the proceedings on the motion have expired.

It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

The House adjourned at 6 p.m.

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 82—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY—NUCLEAR POWER

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena) moved:

That this House urges the Government to immediately initiate a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power.

• (1110)

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to lead off the debate today. As I am sure Hon. Members have noticed, the wording of the motion before the House today is taken from the PC Campaign Handbook for the 1984 election in which it is very clearly stated:

We advocate a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power—

That is precisely what we will be debating today. It goes on further to state:

—and have opened the nuclear power approval process to the public.

I think that today's debate is really the debate of our times. It is something which involves the survival of all life. It really depends on our will to learn, to understand and to act on this issue if we are to survive the rest of the century.

On October 22 of last year my colleague, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie), introduced a Private Members' Bill entitled the "Nuclear Power Act" which provides for three specific Acts to be taken by Parliament. The first is to invoke a moratorium on the new construction of nuclear facilities in Canada; the second is to hold a public inquiry; and the third is to hold a national referendum on the issue of nuclear power and nuclear energy in Canada.

Why have a full public inquiry? I think the Chernobyl accident has raised the concerns of many Canadians and made many of us realize why it is so important. I think that today it is important in the debate to hear what the alternatives are in terms of energy alternatives in the soft energy path. We should consider why we should be looking more carefully at the issue of safety and why we should be looking at the issue of mining and its affects on workers who have been involved throughout the whole of the nuclear cycle from cradle to grave. We should consider the issues of transportation, storage, disposal, nuclear power itself, the movement of a lot of this material into nuclear weaponry and the effect of accidents.

I would like to begin my remarks this morning by dealing with the Chernobyl accident. I think it has raised the interest of many scientists and certainly of many people around the world.

When I first contacted the Department of National Health and Welfare and, in particular, the Atmospheric Environment Service, I was advised that because there are 28 atmospheric testing sites in Canada which had demonstrated an ability during the 1950s to give fairly accurate readings when atmospheric bomb testing was taking place in the Soviet Union, the United States or elsewhere, that, similarly, those 28 sites would provide accurate atmospheric and rainfall information throughout Canada. We found out that that, in fact, has not been the case.

In fact, just yesterday the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) rose in the House to indicate that new test sites will be opened in Terrace, Prince George and Revelstoke. Up until now the only information available from British Columbia, for the whole of British Columbia, has been from the tests taken in Vancouver. The majority of those tests were brought here to Ottawa to be tested, the information then being made available through the so-called hot line. As those who work on the hot line have pointed out, many of the staff members are left with the same basic information for two days. So if a person calls on two consecutive days they are getting essentially the same information. As I pointed out yesterday small communities in Alaska, such as Ketchikan, have had installed on-site equipment which can provide background readings, both atmospheric and rainfall, on a five-hour basis to be provided to the residents of Alaska.

Clearly, the proposal which was put forward by the Government on May 5 has not been adequate in terms of providing accurate information to Canadians. However, I must say that the information which has come to be available is not something about which Canadians should be overly alarmed, at least not enough to cause them to go out and drink iodine or take similar measures.

What we have to do is learn from what has happened in Chernobyl and take the type of intelligent steps which we should as a Parliament, particularly in light of the promise made by the Conservative Party prior to the last election. These promises were carried in headlines across the country in Toronto, Vancouver and elsewhere. They stated that one of the priorities of the new Government would be to call a full public inquiry into the nuclear industry, something which is very much needed.

As I learned under the administration of Mr. Trudeau from committees and in the House, it was impossible to obtain updated information. Every attempt taken by either the Conservatives or by the New Democrats to have an inquiry or to obtain accurate, updated information on what AECL and AECB were really up to was blocked by the Liberals. I do not think many of us have forgotten the amounts of money which have historically been squandered in this area of concern, and the heavy water plants in Cape Breton are an example of that. Over $100 million of taxpayers' money went to keep those heavy water plants going while there was no use for that heavy water in Canada and no sale for it offshore.

The Conservatives seem to be changing ground rather quickly on the issue—

Mr. Friesen: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) has just said that Canada was testing in only one place in Vancouver and planned to test in three others. I would quote from yesterday's Hansard wherein the Minister stated that—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): I am sorry to interrupt the Hon. Member. I would point out to him that in this debate there are 20 minutes allowed each speaker to be followed by a ten-minute period of question and comments. I am sure the Hon. Member for Surrey—White Rock—North Delta (Mr. Friesen) will take a great deal of interest in the question and comment period.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, in reponse to the campaign promise made by the Conservatives the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) wrote to one of my colleagues on June 4, 1985, and indicated the she did not intend to broaden her consultations beyond the industry and the provinces in relation to a full public inquiry into the nuclear industry. She went on to state:

—it is my view that a national inquiry on this topic is not a high priority at this time.

That is what the Minister of Energy had to say on behalf of a Government which clearly ran on a campaign promise to have a public inquiry into the nuclear industry.

It is also interesting to look to see what the present Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Oberle) had to say in a wire story which states:

Progressive Conservative MP Frank Oberle (Prince George—Peace River) said handling nuclear wastes from other countries could become a "lucrative business".

Now we can see why the Conservative Government is tending to shy away from the very important campaign promises which it made.

I would now like to quote from a 1982 issue of The Canadian Business Review. It is an excellent article written by Gordon Edwards, someone who long ago should have been given the Order of Canada for his work in relation to the nuclear industry. In his article he quotes from the draft of an internal Government review which states:

—it is doubtful "whether the nuclear industry will survive the 1980s".

The chart provided in The Canadian Business Review points out what the energy consumption by fuel type is in Canada. It is well worth taking a look at these figures. Energy consumption directly from oil accounts for 52 per cent of our energy. With respect to natural gas, the figure is 23.5 per cent; coal is 3.9 per cent; and wood pulp 4.1 per cent. The total with respect to electricity is 16.5 per cent. Hydro is 11.4 per cent and coal-fired is 2.4 per cent. Nuclear power accounts for 1.3 per cent while oil-fired accounts for 0.7 per cent. Gas-fired accounts for 0.6 per cent and wood and others account for 0.1 per cent. Nationally, it is interesting to note how small is the amount of energy provided by nuclear power. Yet there are tens of billions of dollars which go into directly subsidizing this particular industry.

Under the section on energy in The Canadian Business Review article Mr. Edwards points out a number of key points, around which I think the debate should revolve, as to why there should be a full public inquiry. I refer to reactor safety studies. I think we must learn from Chernobyl and Three Mile Island that although many people for many years have told us that CANDU is the safest and best protected nuclear fission technology in the world, it is an area about which we need to study more closely. This should be done in a public inquiry where witnesses can be protected in giving evidence.

With regard to radioactive waste disposal, I recently had a chance to listen to Morris Udall, as did you, Mr. Speaker, who is now putting together what he himself describes as probably the largest, grandest scale project in the history of the United States. This project is the movement of nuclear waste from their sites to storage areas perhaps immediately below your own constituency, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McDermid: That has been ruled out.

• (1120)

Mr. Fulton: The issue of radioactive waste disposal is very important. It is a crucial issue in the United States. The Americans are trying to deal with it by the year 2000. We have no plans like that and there is certainly nothing before Parliament to deal in a parallel way with what is going on in the United States.

Regarding the issue of the highly radioactive wastes produced by the reactors, there exists in excess of 100 million tonnes of highly toxic low level radioactive waste called tailings. The amount of tailings at Elliot Lake alone would cover the Trans-Canada Highway three feet deep from Vancouver to Halifax. Those tailings are sitting there waiting for Canadians to come up with a way of dealing effectively with radioactive waste.

Regarding the decommissioning of nuclear facilities, there is a requirement to develop techniques and tools for the dismantling of the highly radioactive structures left at the end of the useful lifetime of a reactor. We know, for example, that Gentilly I is awaiting that kind of proper decommissioning. The argument about workers being thrown out of work if we were to have a moratorium on nuclear power and start decommissioning our nuclear industry simply does not stand up under the scrutiny of economists and scientists who have looked at the amount of work required in the decommissioning of the existing sites. Similarly, specialized tools and skills would be needed to simply retube reactors during the period of a moratorium in order to keep the operations going as safely as possible.

Regarding energy self-sufficiency, Dr. Edwards made an important comment about evidence given by Sir Brian Flowers. He said the following:

> Canadians should carefully weigh the advice of Sir Brian Flowers, a prominent British nuclear physicist, who warned in 1976 that "a major commitment to fission power and a plutonium economy should be postponed as long as possible." The reason for this is fundamental.
> Plutonium appears to offer unique potential for threat and blackmail against society because of its great radiotoxicity and its fissile properties.
> The construction of a crude nuclear weapon by an illicit group is credible. We are not convinced that the Government has fully appreciated the implications of this possibility.

That evidence was given in Great Britain before a royal commission. Many years ago, the Britons took this issue much more seriously than we do.

The Select Committee on Ontario Hydro Affairs took a look at the issue of accidents recently and had the following to say about the devastating and irreversible consequences of a major accident in a CANDU reactor:

> It is not right to say that a catastrophic accident is impossible.
> —The worst possible accident would involve the spread of radioactive poisons over large land areas, killing thousands immediately, killing others through increasing susceptibility to cancer, risking genetic defects that could affect future generations, and possibly contaminating large land areas for future habitation or cultivation.

Dr. Edwards goes on:

> According to the Ontario Royal Commission on Electric Power Planning, the most realistic probability for a complete core meltdown in a CANDU reactor is about 1 in 10,000 per reactor per year.

It is interesting that that is precisely the same figure used by the Soviets in relation to Chernobyl, a state of the art graphite reactor built only a few years ago. The quote goes on:

> With 23 reactors now committed in Canada, each expected to operate for 30 years or more, the over-all probability that a catastrophic meltdown will occur at one of these plants in the future is greater than 1 in 15—more than twice the probability of rolling a twelve with two dice—
> Even non-catastrophic accidents can have a crippling impact. The cleanup following the Three Mile Island TMI accident in Pennsylvania is expected to take about ten years and cost $1 billion to $2 billion, but there is no assurance that cleanup efforts will be successful.

It is also interesting to look at the calculated probabilities for accidents in CANDU reactors. This information comes from the Atomic Energy Control Board itself as given to the Royal Commission on Electric Power Planning. The calculated probabilities for accidents are as follows: for loss of coolant, with one reactor it is one in 100 annually; with one reactor it is one in four over the reactor's lifetime; with 20 reactors, it is one in five annually, and with 20 reactors it is 99.7 per cent over their lifetimes. On core meltdown, something which has already occurred here in Canada, the probability is one in 10,000 for one reactor annually; one in 300 for one reactor's lifetime; one in 500 for 20 reactors annually, and one in 15 for 20 reactors over their lifetimes.

The probability calculated by the Atomic Energy Commission itself is that one is as likely to roll a 12 with two dice as we are to have a meltdown at some point during the life of the reactors we have here in Canada. Again, that is a very important reason why there should be a full public inquiry into the issue of safety of existing complexes and wastes in Canada.

The only legislation for the protection of Canadians in and near nuclear sites, places like Toronto, is the Nuclear Liability Act passed by this House limiting off-site liability to a maximum of $75 million for each nuclear site. Comparable legislation in the United States, the Price-Anderson Act, an Act which is in the process of being amended, provides $560 million per site. It is now being suggested by the U.S. General Accounting Office that that liability should be increased far above $1 billion. That certainly appears to be a good example for us to follow. Financial institutions, not only in North America but in most of the world, are now reticent to finance nuclear reactors. As well, there are no insurance companies of which I am aware that are prepared to give liability insurance to any facilities in the world.

In British Columbia, the very excellent Bates Commission looked into the whole issue of uranium mining particularly but looked at the nuclear cycle as well. It had a number of interesting suggestions to make in relation to that. Regarding radioactive material in relation to Chernobyl and others, the U.S. geological survey had this to say:

> High-level radioactive wastes produced by reactors are capable, in principle, of causing "millions to billions of fatal cancer doses . . . an admittedly unlikely scenario." The U.S. Geological Survey has pointed out that there isn't enough fresh water in the world to dissolve these wastes to "acceptable" levels of concentration.

That is something that concerns many Canadians right now, even though the addition of radioactivity from the Chernobyl accident is only one-twentieth of background levels. However, it is that amount that is added to already existing background levels that is of concern. This clearly raises the possibility of serious medical problems for people throughout Canada.

Dr. Edwards goes on:

> The B.C. Medical Association considers it "irresponsible in the extreme for the Government of Canada to allow the further development of uranium mining and reactor construction until a safe, proven, permanent waste disposal technology is developed for the wastes that have already been produced."

If we as legislators do not listen to the evidence given by physicians before a Royal Commission on the effects of these kinds of contaminants on the general health and wellbeing of Canadians, to whom are we supposed to listen? Should we only listen to those who are promoting the technology? I think not, and I think for that very reason we should be moving vigorously and quickly toward the full public inquiry that was promised by the Government before the election.

The issue is very crucial. I know that my time is running out so let me end by reading what Dr. Edwards said about Dr. Bernard Feld:

> Dr. Bernard Feld, Assistant Leader of the Critical Assembly Group in the World War II Atom Bomb Project, is one of many who have warned that the spread of nuclear technology will soon advance beyond the ability of human societies to control it:
> Let me tell you about a nightmare I have. The mayor of Boston sends for me for an urgent consultation. He has received a note from a terrorist group, telling him that they have planted a nuclear bomb somewhere in central Boston. The mayor has confirmed that twenty pounds of plutonium is missing from Government stocks. He shows me the crude diagram and a set of the terrorists' outrageous demands . . . I would have to advise surrender.

The issues surrounding the nuclear fuel cycle from cradle to grave are vast and important. I would like to end my remarks by talking about what I consider to be the other part of this issue that is rarely looked at by Parliament, parents, schools and physicians, and that is the effect of nuclear fear on young people in Canada and around the world.

According to a recent poll taken in British Columbia, 80 per cent of students fully expect to die a nuclear death and 80 per cent of them want to do something about it but do not know what to do. Clearly, during this period of time in the history of the world, one of the things this Government can do, in good faith since that is its policy, is hold a full public inquiry to investigate what is happening to uranium miners, nuclear wastes and the wastes being stored at CANDU facilities. That alone would fill a hockey rink waist deep with highly radioactive waste which is being improperly stored. Also, it should deal with the questions of radiation, its effect on individuals and its effect on the psyche of young people and people around the world.

Generally Canadians are not people who will get out and march, although in Vancouver close to 100,000 or more march year after year on the issue of nuclear energy. They demonstrate their desire for some kind of realistic investigation of it by the Parliament of Canada.

In my closing remarks I want to stress that it is important to understand the nuclear nightmares of young people, to understand the nuclear fear out there, and to act responsibly rather than irresponsibly and unresponsively to this very real issue, one of the most crucial issues of our time.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I would like a clarification from the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton). He seemed to mix two things today. He talked about nuclear war and tried to tie it in with the peaceful use of nuclear power in Canada. As he knows, there are no nuclear weapons on Canadian soil. In fact, we use nuclear power for peaceful purposes, such as the generation of hydroelectricity and isotopes which are used in the health field. If the NDP had its way, we would not have any of that expertise in Canada. By the way, we are a leader in that field.

Is the Hon. Member really being fair when he tries to tie in the peaceful use of nuclear energy with the phoney issue of it somehow being tied in with nuclear war?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I will deal first with the issue of nuclear medicine. As a matter of fact, the last time there was an opportunity to debate the issue in the House, I was unfortunately in hospital in Ottawa. Fortunately I had the opportunity for nuclear medicine to be of great assistance to me. It proved to be of great benefit. There is no one in my Party or in any Party who opposes the peaceful use of nuclear technology for medicine in particular. However, in tying the issues together, I think we have to understand that so far as we know the Chernobyl reactor was being used for peaceful purposes as well. It was being used to provide power to the City of Kiev and to the outlying area.

The issues before us are mixed. Approximately 85 per cent of the uranium mined in Canada is exported. A great deal of it goes to the enrichment plants in the big four—in France, Britain, the Soviet Union, and the United States—for enrichment to weapons grade material. The overwhelming majority of that is going into the 50,000 plus nuclear weapons which are constantly being upgraded around the world.

The Hon. Member said that there were no nuclear weapons on Canadian soil. That is a bit of a shell game. The Hon. Member knows full well that nuclear weapons are frequently tied up in downtown Vancouver, in Esquimalt, in Halifax, and in various areas. The only difference is that there is a rope tying the boat to the dock. Often there are nuclear weapons in the downtown areas of many Canadian cities. That has never been denied by any Minister in the House or by anyone in the United States. In fact, those weapons are being brought in.

The reason there is a link between the issues is partly because of the Chernobyl incident. It is also because of the evidence which came forward from the Royal Commission in Great Britain. The expert evidence given by witnesses there such as Dr. Feld and others was that the real concern was that Governments were not scrutinizing as carefully as they should the highly radioactive plutonium waste which is sitting, for example, next to all our reactors in Canada. It is not being moved to be stored carefully and properly, perhaps in plutons or perhaps in other areas. I am sure we will have to develop a technology, a routing, and a system to get that waste to a proper long-term storage basin.

As those witnesses pointed out, there is linkage between peaceful sites or the peaceful utilization of nuclear material for electrical energy and for other uses and the no longer so remote possibility that terrorists will make use of plutonium and highly radioactive materials associated with peacefully used plants around the world. It is precisely for that reason we require a full public inquiry.

As the Speaker and myself learned at a meeting in the United States from Morris Udall, who is carrying this process forward for the U.S. Congress, probably the largest single industry between now and the turn of the century in the United States will be the decommissioning of reactors and the removal and safe containment of waste. It will be larger than the industries involved in the construction of highways and buildings in the entire United States. It will be a massive industry.

For a variety of reasons our country is not looking at the possibility of terrorist activity. We are not looking at the need to deal with the hundreds of millions of tonnes of low-level radioactive waste or at dealing effectively with the whole concept of technology for decommissioning and proper long-term safe storage of the nuclear waste we already have at our nuclear sites.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I think the Hon. Member really does not have his facts together. He knows full well that probably one of the finest research projects is ongoing now in Canada on the safe storage of nuclear waste, and that the Americans, thank goodness, have contributed to and are participating in that research. We want to assure ourselves in Canada that not only do we have safe storage of nuclear waste but that they have the same technology and are storing it as safely as we are and in areas which are safe. I think the Hon. Member is being very unfair when he says that there is none of this going on. One of the most extensive research projects is going on in Whiteshell now on this very matter. Had he come to the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources to hear what was going on, as did his hon. friend behind him, maybe he would change what he just said. I wish he would correct the record.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the Hon. Member in my committee for years and years and years; "ta, ta, ta". This issue is a very important one. Government Members constantly want to slide away from the real issue. They ran an election on having a full public inquiry, and now they are thumbing their noses at the public of Canada and saying "ta, ta, ta".

Mr. McDermid: Answer the question.

Mr. Fulton: I have looked at the budget, what is being spent in this country and in the United States on investigating technologies for safe and proper storage. It is piddling, compared with the taxpayers' money being spent to prop up a basically bankrupt industry. There are many other ways of providing energy safely over the long term in Canada, such as wind, tidal, peat, oil and gas. We have all kinds of alternatives which are far better. Even in Ontario there are far better alternatives than nuclear.

Because of the centralized control of a number of financial institutions and certain vested interests, that Government over there is not prepared to live up to its campaign promise. That is the root of this debate. There are Canadians from coast to coast who want a full public inquiry into the safe and proper utilization of technologies for the storage of the waste, the decommissioning of those reactors, and dealing from cradle to grave with the whole issue of the nuclear cycle in Canada. That is what the debate is all about.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, would the Hon. Member be kind enough to advise the House of the financial institutions and industries which he says are sort of combining and co-operating to keep the nuclear industry going? Who are these people about whom he is speaking? What information does he have, or is it just another blatant rumour which the NDP is trying to throw out at the people of Canada? Name them.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the Hon. Member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) is not aware of the large number of small and large contractors which are directly involved in creating and providing all the technology to keep these existing facilities going. Their concern, whether it is in relation to the tube reactor systems, the cement work or any of the work that has gone on at the site for construction and revamping, is about how Parliament is going to respond to the issue of decommissioning reactors and how Parliament is going to respond to the safe, proper storage and handling of uranium on its way to the sites and the wastes, to be stored properly over the long term.

I am saying that a full public inquiry is the way to go about providing assurances to those tens of thousands of workers in small and large corporations that are associated with the nuclear industry which, as the Member knows well, has been almost entirely funded by public dollars through Ontario Hydro, through AECL, or through our own public watchdog, the AECB.

I am talking about the need to provide accurate information to those small and large corporations associated with the industry so that the old red herring: "If we have a full public hearing and they talk about decommissioning, all you guys are going to be thrown out of work" will not be hurled. It is not true at all, as Morris Udall pointed out at our meeting in the United States. This is going to be an enormous project in the U.S. that will employ not just tens but hundreds of thousands of Americans in the process of decommissioning and the proper safe storage of nuclear waste in the United States.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member in his remarks before replying to my question implied that there was a conspiracy of financial institutions, of contractors, of engineering firms and so forth to keep the nuclear industry going. I want him to define and name the people in the conspiracy.

Mr. McDermid: Yes, name who is in the conspiracy.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, it is not a deep hidden secret or conspiracy. Those are the words of the Hon. Member for Burlington. Perhaps he would like to pursue that a little further. What I am saying is there a deep vested interest in the nuclear industry to preserve and expand it.

When I went after the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) last year about the issue of putting nuclear reactors in the North he tried to downplay it, but that information came out of the general accounting office and the budget from the United States. The Minister denied it in committee, but then he wrote to me a little while later and said: "Oh, yes, the information that you were pursuing in the committee was all factual. AECL has been operating with the United States."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, please. Debate.

Mr. Kempling: The Member shifts his ground.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Debate. The Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster).

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening to the debate back and forth. It is all very interesting. When the Tories were in opposition, according to their handbook, they called for a public inquiry in words something like this, to be found, I think on page 113 of the handbook:

> We advocate a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power and have opened the nuclear power approval process to the public.

In a summary of promises kept and not kept, according to the June 8, 1985 issue of The Toronto Star, one of the broken ones was to provide continued support for Canada's nuclear industry. In the article it said that there were severe cut-backs of the order of $50 million or $100 million, especially at the AECL facilities at Deep River—

Mr. McDermid: Chalk River.

Mr. Foster: —at Chalk River. This is unfortunate because the nuclear industry in Canada has played a vital role and will continue to play a vital role in providing electrical energy.

AECL has done an excellent job in nuclear medicine and in giving assistance to industry. When you include mining and refining, the nuclear industry employs 36,000 people. AECL designs reactors and supplies heavy water. It takes the lead in export marketing. Provincial utilities, like Ontario Hydro, New Brunswick Hydro, Quebec Hydro make the decisions on new capacity and undertake management of these facilities.

When the present facilities are completed and into production around the end of this decade, Ontario will have some 50 per cent of its hydro provided by nuclear energy. It will provide the base load of energy for the Province of Ontario for close to 10 million people by that time. Balanced against that 50 per cent, which will be provided by nuclear reactors located at Douglas Point in Bruce County, at Pickering and Darlington, another 50 per cent of the energy required will be provided by hydro.

These two forms of energy are compatible. They are probably less harmful to the atmosphere than oil fired or coal fired thermal generating stations. The base load is provided by nuclear energy; the peaking power by hydro. In Ontario that is especially important. We have vast supplies of hydro and uranium which fuel nuclear reactors.

Private sector industries throughout Ontario have provided the principle components for the CANDU reactor and they perform the engineering services in Canada and abroad. In 1982 the Government undertook an extensive review of the whole nuclear industry. A 359 page report was issued called "Policy Review. Background Papers." There were 16 papers covering a range of reviews of public concern including questions of health, safety, environmental impact, waste management, reactor exports and non proliferation treaties.

In the nuclear industry as in the petroleum industry we have seen dramatic cut-backs in the amount of electricity needed, just as we have seen dramatic cut-backs in the amount of petroleum needed in the past eight or 10 years since the energy crisis. We have seen cut-backs in the number of nuclear reactors constructed.

At the Lennox generating plant, a massive 2,000 megawatt oil fired generating plant which has never produced any electricity for any sustained period of time was under construction in the early 1970s. It was completed in the mid-1970s. This oil fired electrical generating plant was designed to use bunker C or heavy residual oil which would have created enough electricity to provide half the needs of the City of Toronto. It was made obsolete because the price of oil went from $2 a barrel in 1971 or 1972 to $35 to $38 Canadian in the years 1979-80-81-82, which has dropped back to $13 or $14 U.S. I do not know what the cost of that plant was, but several billions of dollars were spent. It was made totally obsolete as a result of oil prices. We see Ontario moving to a supply of nuclear energy balanced by hydro electric energy.

My constituency has always been especially concerned about nuclear energy because Elliot Lake, a town of some 20,000 people, was developed and built around the nuclear industry. The plant at Elliot Lake produces vast quantities of uranium which is sold, not only to Ontario Hydro, and the United States in past years, but as well to Japan, France, the United Kingdom and West Germany.

That industry in Elliot Lake is facing fairly severe cut-backs over the next few years because the present contracts established in the mid-1970s will not all be needed. A couple of weeks ago we received word that a factory in Algoma will have to cut about 200 jobs during this calendar year. That is as a result of the restructuring of the contracts between Ontario Hydro and Rio Algoma mines. I hope that that cut-back can take place over a 12 or 18 month period so that the lay-off of 200 people at Stanley Mine can be accomplished through attrition with people taking early retirement or taking up new careers in order to avoid dramatic lay-offs, especially of young workers.

I call upon the Minister of State for Mines (Mr. Layton), who is very concerned about these workers being laid off, to put a great deal of pressure on the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) to change the UI regulations. If there is a generous program provided by Rio Algoma mines and Ontario Hydro, a lot of older workers would probably take early retirement. However, with the present regulations they would have to sacrifice unemployment insurance benefits for a year. We just went through that in Sudbury where the youngest person in the labour force will probably end up being 45 years of age. If we had left the old provisions in place, allowing people to receive severance pay and early retirement benefits as regular income, older workers who are approaching 60 or 64 years of age would take early retirement, thus allowing younger workers in their 20s and 30s to retain their jobs.

Surely we need a more satisfactory method of making those large industrial adjustments. I cerainly hope that that provision of UI will be changed so that if Rio Algoma and Ontario Hydro come forward with a policy for retirement the benefits will not be treated as regular pay. They should not be. We are making adjustments for early retirement to facilitate industrial adjustments such as we are seeing in the nuclear industry.

People opposed to the nuclear industry will talk about the number of reactors which have been spun out over a longer period of time. That is happening in all energy industries. Although we do not like to see people laid off in any industry, we know that the conservation methods which Canada and other countries have implemented are in the best interest in the long term. We use so much petroleum and we know that resources of petroleum are finite and will eventually be used up.

Eldorado Resources, a uranium refinery in my constituency at Blind River, Ontario, is very active in the nuclear industry. It employs 180 people. It refines uranium from yellowcake to uranium dioxide which is then transported to Port Hope for upgrading to uranium hexafluoride. That industry is very, very dependant on the further upgrading policy of the Government of Canada which has been in place for many, many years. That is why I was very pleased by the Minister's comments which were carried in The Toronto Star on November 8, 1985. He indicated that the Government was going to toughen its policy. Elliot Lake, Ontario, and northern Saskatchewan are the two principal uranium mining areas in Canada and they are very dependant on that industry for jobs with the United Steel Workers of America at the various refineries. The Minister indicated that he was going to toughen his stand and ensure that those jobs were retained in Canada. That was very good news.

I am glad that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) happens to be in the House today. I was very concerned when I read an article in the April 21, 1986, edition of NuclearFuel, the main journal of the nuclear industry. The headline is very disturbing to people in the uranium mining communities in Saskatchewan and Ontario. The headline reads: "Canada may drop uranium upgrading policy". The article suggets that Canada is changing is negotiating position on that. The article reads:

> The Canadian government is apparently moving to drop its upgrading policy for uranium exports. According to sources, Canadian government officials agreed in principle at a meeting with U.S. officials in Washington April 16 that the upgrading policy should be abandoned. "Both sides felt satisfied," according to one knowledgeable source. He did not say definitely that the upgrading policy would be abandoned or when, indicating only that the action is "more likely to happen now."

Late last year, the Mulroney Government reaffirmed its commitment to the upgrading policy, which requires Canadian uranium to be exported as UF6 unless there are "exceptional circumstances," such as a customer's prior contract for conversion with a non-Canadian converter—

Although both the Mulroney and Reagan administrations are eager to negotiate a comprehensive free-trade agreement, the discussions of abandoning the upgrading policy are not directly tied to that effort, sources said. The U.S. has been pressing Canadian officials for almost two years to modify its upgrading policy. But only in March of this year at a meeting in Canada with U.S. officials did the Canadian government indicate a willingness to consider the issue, according to a U.S. source.

According to sources, Canadian officials are concerned that the existence of the upgrading policy is providing ammunition to Sen. Pete Domenici (R-N.M.) and others who want to restrict Canadian uranium imports to the U.S. Sources also indicate that the U.S. side raised for the first time at the March meeting its concerns that the upgrading policy may violate the General Agreements on Tariffs & Trade.

That article was written by Michael Knapik of Washington. I certainly hope that when the Minister of State for Mines speaks in the House today he will be able to indicate that this report is false, that the policy, as he announced it last November, is the policy that the Government will pursue, that it will maintain the 500 jobs which are being created in the riding of the Hon. Member from Port Hope and the riding of Algoma, and that there will be no secret deals made to trade off that nuclear upgrading policy.

The jobs are the most important aspect but, as well, the Government has spent some $200 million through Eldorado in developing state-of-the-art uranium refining facilities in Blind River and Port Hope, Ontario. They are world class facilities which can handle some 18,000 tonnes a year. There are about 175 or 180 jobs in Blind River and 340 jobs in Port Hope, a total of approximately 500. The economic activity generated by those two uranium refining and upgrading facilities amounts to about $100 million. There is the additional benefit of $16 million worth of exports. I hope that that will not be walked away from. To trade off those excellent facilities in some secret negotiations, as the report in NuclearFuel of April 21 suggests, would be a very bad action by the Government.

Of course, there is ongoing concern in all of those communities that somehow the uranium refinery and upgrading facilities in Blind River and Port Hope will be traded off in the free trade negotiations. That would be a disaster. We have often been accused of being hewers of wood and drawers of water. If we make that trade-off, we will become just that. We will be selling yellowcake to the U.S., Japan and West Germany in its unprocessed state and we will lose some $100 million worth of economic activity and 500 jobs. I must say that I have a very personal commitment to seeing those jobs saved.

Those are the concerns I want to put before the House today. The nuclear industry provides some 36,000 jobs. In Ontario by the end of this decade nuclear energy will provide fully 50 per cent, as I understand it—

Mr. McDermid: Sixty per cent.

Mr. Foster: —of our energy. In other provinces like New Brunswick and Quebec it will provide cheap, reliable and efficient electrical power for the future.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Questions or comments?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster). I might assure him that the report he referred to regarding upgrading is false. There is no intention on the part of this Government to follow along those lines. So I will set his mind and those of his constituents at ease in that regard.

The NDP would like to stop all research and other work going on into the peaceful use of nuclear energy. They would like a moratorium on the building of nuclear reactors to provide electrical power. They would like to freeze everything right now and have this full-blown inquiry. The Hon. Member did not quite come out and say it but is he for or against that?

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I am impressed with the Hon. Member's comments that our uranium upgrading policy is not going to be bargained away in the free trade negotiations. Although I do not think he went quite that far.

Mr. McDermid: No, I did not go that far.

Mr. Foster: I would be much more reassured if he or the Minister could indicate that there will be no more exemptions to the upgrading policy this year. During the past year and a half there has been a massive number of exemptions and that destroys the viability of our facilities. They are designed with a 15,000 tonne or 18,000 tonne annual capacity. If they are operating at only 6,000 tonnes capacity, you do not even meet your overhead costs. I would really be pleased if that announcement were made, and I hope we will hear it. Not that I doubt his word, but the Minister could add to the strength of his comments.

The Hon. Member was asking about the Liberal Party's commitment to nuclear energy. It was the Liberal Party that provided most of the funds since 1947 for research and development into the peaceful uses of nuclear energy. The CANDU reactor has played and is playing a leading role in electrical power generation in Canada. Certainly it will supply at least 50 per cent of that power generation in Ontario by the end of the decade, and the Hon. Member suggested it may be more.

Of course the Liberal Party supports the peaceful use of nuclear energy. We think it was a bad decision to cut back research. I have forgotten the exact figures, but I think it was something around $50 million or $100 million in cut-backs. The Hon. NDP Member from B.C. indicated in his comments that we have to continue our research, not only into the peaceful uses of nuclear energy but to develop a solution to the problem of nuclear waste disposal. If we cut back on that research, then we of course inhibit our ability to come up with an adequate solution.

Mr. McDermid: He still did not say whether he was in favour of what the NDP wanted to do, Mr. Speaker. Apart from that, I can tell him that research is ongoing. The amount of money has been increased because those who are going to benefit from the research are now paying for it. I think that is only fair. We should not expect the Canadian taxpayer to foot the Bill for research which will benefit other countries. The U.S. is now participating in the major research project at Whiteshell on the safe storage of nuclear waste. They are putting millions of dollars into it and we are pleased they are doing so. Although Government expenditures may have been cut back, funds are coming from elsewhere for research which we think is beneficial. The ones who benefit should help pay for it and I think the Hon. Member would agree with that.

Mr. Foster: I certainly agree with that, but I recall quite a violent reaction from the people who work for AECL in the Chalk River research facilities over the massive cut-backs. It seems to me that Ontario Hydro has a great deal of responsibility for the research into development and improvement of reactors. However, much of the medical research into isotopes, which are used in industry as well, tends to lend itself more to Government support.

Clearly the research into the development of safe nuclear waste disposal really boils down to being the responsibility of the Governments of Ontario, New Brunswick and Quebec. However, the federal Government still has a lot of responsibility in this field and I would be surprised if adequate research is carried out if the federal Government bows out. It seems to me that practically all of the research is being done by the Ontario Government, the Department of Energy, and the federal Government. I do not see the nuclear supply industry being coerced into doing very much research in that regard. If Canada cuts back Ontario will probably not do it on a 50-50 basis, or even less. They will not likely take up the slack. Although they do not envisage, as I understand it, actually planning to commission such a nuclear waste disposal facility until around the year 2000, clearly doing the research now and reassuring people that such a facility and technology is adequate should be done now. The cut-backs in AECL research are probably very harmful to the industry. I would caution the Parliamentary Secretary that, although he may be very happy with the research cut-backs, many people in the industry are not.

I wish it was closer to Black Thursday, November 8, 1984, when these cut-backs were made, because it was very clear in my mind exactly the level of cut-backs which had taken place. I recall that they were quite massive.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): A very short question.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to make sure that the House was aware that the early remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary were, of course, misrepresentative and false about the NDP position. My question is to the Member who was previously speaking. I would like a clear definitive answer from him on the Liberal Party's position on a full public inquiry into nuclear power in Canada; are they for it or against it?

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, our Party has not called for a full public inquiry. The NDP has, and the Tories did so before the last election. There have been many inquiries in the nuclear industry. There was a massive review completed in 1982. There were extensive public inquiries; one of the most massive that I can recall was into uranium mining carried out by the Ontario Government back in the 1970s, into the whole question of the development of those mines, to which the Ontario Government was putting some $700 million of investment. That inquiry had to be complete before that mining could go ahead.

The Hon. Member has mentioned the public inquiry in British Columbia which has been carried out. There has been a public inquiry in Nova Scotia. It seems to me—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order. Period for questions and comments is now over. Debate.

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, like many Canadians I have concerns about some of our advanced technology, such as nuclear power. The tragic accident at Chernobyl brings home to all of us that no technology is entirely free of risks.

Before we launch a new and extensive public inquiry we have to look at nuclear power in a comparative way. We have to look at the benefits they bring, such as those that have been enunciated by the previous speaker, the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster). We must look at the risks, and try to reach a balance.

We must focus on specific situations. The nuclear power program in Canada is different from those in other countries, and in many ways more successful. Nuclear power reactors in Canada achieve a level of safety comparable to the best reactors in the world. They are licensed by an effective independent regulatory agency with expert staff, the Atomic Energy Control Board.

Reactor operators, such as Ontario Hydro, are responsible for the safety of their nuclear plants. They must also convince the AECB that they meet stringent safety requirements before they are allowed to operate those plants.

There are some basic differences between the CANDU reactors and the Chernobyl reactors and the way in which they are operated. I think we need to focus on those differences. The Chernobyl reactor would not meet the AECB safety requirements, and could not and would not be licensed in Canada. The Chernobyl reactor has a graphite moderator which can and did burn. The CANDU reactor has a cool water moderator which removes heat. In contrast, the Chernobyl reactor does not have a containment building which would satisfy Canadian safety requirements. CANDUs have effective containment.

Nuclear power reactors in Canada embody defence-in-depth. All systems must perform to high standards. Major failures are still assumed to be possible, but highly reliable safety systems are included to ensure that, even with those assumed failures, workers and the public are still protected.

An accident identical to Chernobyl cannot happen in Canada. The CANDU reactor is different in many ways from the Chernobyl reactor. Serious nuclear power reactor accidents in Canada are extremely unlikely. The stringent Canadian safety requirements, such as effective containment, ensure that Canadians are adequately protected against accidents. There is always some residual risk with any endeavour, but it is extremely low for the CANDU reactors developed by Canada.

The benefits from our nuclear power program are large, and they more than offset that very small risk. The Government of Canada is fully committed to sustaining the CANDU reactor as a safe, reliable and competitive nuclear power system.

Some critics have noted that the authorities in the Soviet Union told their people that a serious nuclear accident was extremely unlikely, and so these critics asked why we should believe ours when they say the same thing. My response is that the Soviet Union has a highly secretive regulatory practice.

Mr. Waddell: So does Canada.

Miss Carney: The Canadian nuclear system has operated in an open and public manner. Information about it is widely available. It is regulated by an independent body with an expert staff.

The Hon. Member for Vancouver—Kingsway (Mr. Waddell) is overreacting to my speech, Mr. Speaker. I should point out to him that for the last six years the AECB has made available, upon request, information dealing with all licensing decisions and the supporting safety analysis, but there has been very little demand for that kind of information.

Mr. Waddell: Why did Joe Clark sue them once for information?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order.

Miss Carney: May I continue, Mr. Speaker? All unusual incidents at nuclear power plants, however minor, are reported to the AECB, and the reports are available to the media and the public, including even the NDP should it ask for them. In the reactor safety field there is an ongoing review to ensure that we work with lessons learned from normal operation and accidents.

Although Chernobyl is very different from the CANDU reactors, Canadian officials will study that accident, along with their international partners, to determine if there are any lessons for Canada. This is one reason why we have requested information from the U.S.S.R. on the accident. Until we have received more complete information on the causes of the Chernobyl disaster no meaningful review is possible.

A great deal of technical analysis of the accident and its consequences will be necessary before conclusions can be drawn. I am asking the AECB, and other responsible Canadian agencies, to participate in the international assessments of the Chernobyl accident, and to report fully on its implications for us.

The resolution calls for a full and immediate public inquiry into the nuclear industry in Canada. I understand there are serious public concerns about the Chernobyl accident, and we must deal with them in an effective way. The Government has already taken the following steps. It has offered assistance to the U.S.S.R. and extended our sympathy to the victims, while expressing serious concern about the lack of timely information provided. It has ensured that Health and Welfare Canada is monitoring conditions to protect the health of Canadians. It has decided that Canadian reactor safety experts will participate in international reviews on the Chernobyl accident to determine if there are lessons to be learned and applied for Canada. It has requested information from the U.S.S.R. to enable review by Canadian experts.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and his colleagues at the recent Tokyo Summit called for international measures to strengthen systems for early warning and mutual assistance in cases of severe accidents like Chernobyl. The Russian proposals yesterday seemed to support these initiatives. We must deal with these problems through international co-operation.

I think these actions speak loudly for the Government's concern and that they represent an appropriate response. The decision to proceed with the public inquiry into nuclear power should properly await the conclusions of the work in progress. The CANDU nuclear power system has already been the subject of two extensive public inquiries, as the Hon. Member for Algoma has noted. The Royal Commission on Electric Power Planning in Ontario, the Porter Commission, found that the CANDU was safe. The select Committee of the Ontario Legislature on Ontario Hydro Affairs found the CANDU was acceptably safe. Parliament and its committees provide an adequate forum for public discussion of issues such as this. The Government in turn will accept its responsibilities and make appropriate decisions. Further public inquiries into nuclear power are not likely to add significantly to our knowledge of the safety of the CANDU nuclear generating system at this time. The Government believes that the system was safe before the Chernobyl accident and it is safe now. Nevertheless, we want to learn as much as possible about the accident, and the proper procedure is for Canada to participate in international studies of the accident and its implications, then to draw the right conclusions and apply them.

I appreciate the concerns of the public about the tragic reactor accident at Chernobyl. We dealt with the immediate consequences of that accident and there is no threat to the health or safety of Canadians. Our own nuclear power program is very different in design, operation, regulation and public scrutiny from that of the Soviet Union. The Government believes that the CANDU reactor is a safe and reliable generating system and that it is properly regulated. We want to learn as much as we can about the Chernobyl accident. We will work together with our international partners to do just that.

Nuclear power has become an important part of Canada's energy mix. We have abundant energy in Canada and most of our electricity comes from hydro power. It is the main source in Labrador, Quebec, Manitoba and British Columbia. We have cheap lower sulphur coal in Saskatchewan and Alberta. Coal from Cape Breton is the main source of electricity in Nova Scotia. These areas may not need nuclear power for many years to come.

In Ontario and New Brunswick, for example, most of the low cost, large-scale hydro power sources are already used. In those provinces, nuclear power is the preferred source. It provides over 40 per cent of the electricity. It saves over $400 million each year compared to the cost of coal. The federal Government has worked with the private sector and with the provinces, especially Ontario, to develop nuclear technology for Canada. The scientists and engineers at Atomic Energy of Canada and Ontario Hydro can be proud of their achievement. The CANDU reactor is a Canadian success story. It uses Canadian technology and resources, adding diversity and security to our energy supply. In today's volatile energy world that is not something to be lightly dismissed.

In Ontario, when the Darlington Station is finished, nuclear power will provide 60 per cent of the electricity for Canada's industrial heartland. Nuclear power helps to keep Canada's electricity costs among the lowest in the industrial world. Electricity is an efficient and productive form of energy and it will continue to increase its share of the energy market. As the Hon. Member for Algoma has already noted, it also provides some 36,000 jobs for Canadians.

Nuclear power is a high technology industry which attracts other advanced industries such as General Motors' proposed $2 billion high tech Autoplex Plant in Ontario. Modern factories need cheap and reliable electricity and nuclear power supplies it in Ontario.

The CANDU reactor is an extremely safe and reliable technology. Ontario Hydro's CANDU's have been among the world's top performers in terms of reliability and electricity costs. Their high performance is not just due to the operational skills of Ontario Hydro. The CANDU at Point Lepreau in New Brunswick was second in performance among over 100 large power reactors in the world in 1985. The CANDU in South Korea was fifth in the world in terms of performance. The CANDU can be operated reliably by smaller utilities as well.

In most of the industrial countries, nuclear power supplies a larger share of electricity than it does in Canada. The nuclear share is over 30 per cent and increasing in France, Sweden, Belgium, Switzerland, Finland and West Germany. Nuclear power is the leading source of power in Japan. Nuclear power plants in industrial countries displace the equivalent of six million barrels of oil per day. This has been a major factor in reducing oil demand and bringing down the price.

A recent study by the OECD showed that nuclear power was cheaper than coal in most of the industrial countries of the world by a margin of 40 per cent or more. The only exceptions were the western regions of Canada and the United States where coal plants can be built closer to load centres. The industrial countries will have to make sure that nuclear power plants are built and operated safely but they have indicated they are not going to give up that energy option. Nuclear power is here to stay on a worldwide basis.

There have been cases where nuclear power has not worked out well. Some projects in the Unites States have run into cost overruns and some have been abandoned. But many utilities in the United States have very successful nuclear power programs. Like any technology, it has been managed properly, and in Canada we have done it well.

In conclusion, I want to stress that we have a safe, reliable nuclear industry in this country. I do not believe that a public inquiry into nuclear power is useful until such time as we have the product of our reports on the disaster in the Soviet Union.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I have two questions. I would like to ask a simple question first, and then ask a supplementary, if I can. The Minister was instrumental in writing the Conservative energy policy. Why did she put in the energy policy these words: "We advocate a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power"? Why is she now saying we do not need an inquiry when she put those words in then?

Miss Carney: Mr. Speaker, I should report for the record that the New Democratic Party's motion is almost word for word lifted out of the Conservative campaign material.

Mr. Waddell: Exactly.

Mr. Fulton: You are really wide awake today.

Miss Carney: I have already noted that I am not ruling out a full-scale inquiry at this point, but I made it very clear in my speech that that decision should await the work we are doing with other international experts in assessing the Chernobyl incident. We assume that all countries can learn from the fact that this disaster happened. Our system is very different from the system used by the Soviet Union. As I pointed out, the nuclear reactor at Chernobyl would not be licenced, nor could it be operated in Canada. It seems to me it would be much more useful to await the conclusions of the work we have committed before proceeding on the basis of the motion of the New Democratic Party.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources could comment on an article in Nucleonics Week Magazine of April 21, written by Michael Knapik of Washington? It states, and I quote:

> The Canadian Government is apparently moving to drop its upgrading policy for uranium exports. According to sources, Canadian Government officials agreed in principle at a meeting with U.S. officials in Washington April 16 that the upgrading policy should be abandoned. "Both sides felt satisfied," according to one knowledgeable source. He did not say definitely that the upgrading policy would be abandoned or when, indicating only that that action is "more likely to happen now."

Would the Minister indicate whether the policy of the Government of Canada has changed and if there will be any exemptions given to the upgrading of uranium this year, that is, upgrading outside of Canada?

Miss Carney: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has already been told in the House by my Parliamentary Secretary that the article he has quoted from is not accurate. I presume he is quoting from the same article?

Mr. Foster: Yes.

Miss Carney: It is not accurate. We have no plans to drop our upgrading policy in Canada and I think the Hon. Member knows that. In terms of exemptions, I can only add that I do not know whether there will be exemptions granted this year. However, the policy does provide for exemptions under specific and very constrained circumstances.

• (1230)

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a specific question of the Minister. Yesterday, I was in attendance at a meeting of the Standing Committee on Justice at which time a Freedom of Information Commissioner appeared before us. I asked the commissioner whether the Atomic Energy Control Board releases information to the public. Last year there were some eight requests made for information. I was told that some of the information was not given out because it was classified. Does the Minister feel that this information should be released to the public? I believe that the public has the right to know what is happening in the area of atomic energy.

My second question for the Minister concerns the price of oil. The Minister said that she believes nuclear energy is a source of energy on which we should be working. As an Albertan I believe we should be looking to oil and other sources of energy to power our electrical power stations.

Miss Carney: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's second question was not really in the form of a question but in the form of a statement. I can reply to it, however. As I said in my speech, and as I have said on many other occasions, we have a balance of energy resources in Canada. I do not know whether the Hon. Member was in the Chamber when I made my speech. However, I noted in my speech that we have a variety of energy resources, including oil and gas, coal, hydroelectricity and nuclear power. I pointed out that some provinces are more dependent upon nuclear power than are others. It is my belief that nuclear power will continue to be an energy resource, particularly in areas such as Ontario where it supplies the industrial heartland and where there is already a market served by natural gas.

In terms of the AECB, I cannot specifically reply to the Hon. Member's question concerning the eight requests for information since I do not know what those requests were. I will look into the matter and report back to the Hon. Member.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, now that the Minister has admitted that the position of the Conservatives during the last election campaign on which they garnered front page headlines across the country advocating a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power is false, I would like to ask her a question. It concerns comments she made in her speech concerning the fact that the Atomic Energy Control Board is wide open and that information is easy to obtain and so on. In 1976 the Auditor General's report revealed that on top of the $100 million loss, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited had committed major financial indiscretions. During the last Parliament the House brought officials of AECL before the Public Accounts Committee. At that time the committee launched an investigation which was blocked by the Liberal majority which denied the power of subpoena to the committee. AECL refused to present its books and its top officials refused to answer questions. Members of the committee called the AECL witnesses "reluctant, evasive and unco-operative". The committee concluded:

> —the successful concealment, by complex and sophisticated payment and banking procedures in foreign countries, of the identities of the ultimate recipients of the funds and the nature of services rendered, leads your Committee to suspect that some of the payments were indeed used for illegal or corrupt purposes.

Does the Minister not think that in light of that comment there was a great deal of support across the country for the Tory promise to hold a full public inquiry? The Minister is now backing down. In fact, what the Conservatives ran on during the campaign was false.

Miss Carney: Mr. Speaker, in view of the heated rhetoric of the Hon. Member from the NDP, I should point out that I have not made the statements which he has attributed to me. If he had listened carefully to my speech, he would have learned that that is not my position.

In terms of 1976, I remind the Hon. Member that this is 1986. As I have already explained in my speech, the operations of the AECB are much more public. In terms of AECL, I personally tabled in the House the annual reports and the corporate plans for AECL. I believe that Mr. Donnelly, the President, has been made available, or will be made available, to appear before committees should they want to call him before them. I cannot recall from memory if he has appeared before the standing committee or not, however, that is my understanding.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the Minister says that the reason she is not calling a full public inquiry into nuclear power in Canada now is because she wants to find out what happened at Chernobyl. I would like to remind the Minister that at Chernobyl it was a graphite cooled system. The CANDU reactor systems in Canada are heavy water cooled. There is absolutely no relationship between the Chernobyl accident and the 1984 campaign promise of the Minister and her Party. Does the Minister stand by the promise for a full public inquiry? She promised it two years ago. Her Government is now halfway through its mandate. Will there be a full public inquiry or is this just another false Tory promise?

Miss Carney: Mr. Speaker, I am amazed that the Hon. Member is asking me questions without having listened to my speech. I pointed out in my speech that the CANDU reactor is quite different from the one in Chernobyl. I also pointed out that our system uses heavy water and not graphite. I am surprised that the Hon. Member should feel it necessary—

Mr. Fulton: So why did you deceive Canadians?

Miss Carney: —to raise this matter at this time.

Mr. Waddell: When are you going to have the inquiry, then?

Miss Carney: Mr. Speaker, if members of the NDP are not interested in my answers, I do not see why I should be required to supply them.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to participate in this very important debate. It is a debate on a system—a very dangerous and expensive system—which essentially boils water. It is dangerous because accidents—and accidents do happen—result in radiation being spread across the planet. It gets into the ecosystem and into the food system and can last for thousands and thousands of years. It is an additive process. It is a system in which one cannot afford to make mistakes. It is a system which has to be 100 per cent mistake proof. Unfortunately, as we know, there is no technology which is 100 per cent safe. As well, there are no social institutions which can deal with this technology.

I find that the Minister and spokespersons from the Liberal Party are arrogant in assuming that they, their bureaucracies and our technologies in this country and in others are sufficiently developed that we can place at risk the generations and generations yet to come. I find it arrogant that these Hon. Members are able to rise in the House with such tremendous confidence to speak as though we have the ability and the capacity to ensure that generations to come will not be put at risk. It is this type of arrogance which makes me doubly convinced that the uraniuman and nuclear option is not a proper option for development at this time. When one listens to the speeches of Hon. Members, such as the Minister, one begins to realize that thinking has not developed to a point where it can even deal with technology such as nuclear technology, let alone social institutions.

Hon. Members have spoken about the Chernobyl accident. Indeed, it is a catastrophe, a catastrophe for the whole human race. There are important lessons to be learned from this accident. First, I would point out that there are some similarities between the bureaucracies which are in charge of nuclear power plants in the United States and in democratic countries, and the bureaucracies which are in charge of nuclear development in Soviet countries and in the centrally planned economies. We begin to realize that there is not much difference between them. It is essentially a policy based on protecting one's ass.

The people who were in charge of the plant in Chernobyl thought that they could contain it and that they would not bother to tell the guys up top. That began the cycle of misinformation and lack of information. It was a natural human and bureaucratic response designed to protect the bureaucracy and its jobs. It is not much different from the events surrounding the accident that occurred at Three Mile Island. It took quite awhile, in fact I understand almost three days—

Mr. Fretz: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder if you could make a ruling on suitable language to be used in the House of Commons. During his speech, the Hon. Member used a phrase which I think is unacceptable in the House.

Mr. Keeper: What phrase?

Mr. Fretz: He said "covering one's ass", and I think it is unacceptable for Hon. Members to use a phrase such as that in the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): I am informed that the expression itself has not been ruled, per se, to be out of order.

Miss Carney: So rule, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): No, I do not intend in this specific case to rule. However, I do think that the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary brought up a very legitimate point about the level of language used in the House of Commons, a level that applies generally in all debates. All Members should be reminded of the level of language that we are all expected to use.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, let me withdraw the remark.

Mr. Fretz: Thank you.

Mr. de Jong: You're welcome. Let me also point out that if that is what concerns the Hon. Member about this very important debate, I would suggest that he should go somewhere else. That pettiness in the midst of a very important debate is, I think, very unbecoming of the Government Member.

Mr. Fretz: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The use of words is part of debate. If the level of debate is lowered to the point at which we are using gutter language, then that affects the quality of the debate.

Mr. de Jong: That's not a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Make the guy shut up and sit down.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order. Having already ruled on the issue, I address myself to both Hon. Members. I think we would do well in pursuing the substantive arguments of debate.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, the point I was trying to make was that it really does not matter very much what type of bureaucracy is in charge of nuclear power plants and development. Whether it is the centrally planned type of bureaucracy found in the Soviet Union or the bureaucracies found in the United States, France, Sweden and the more developed industrialized, technological and democratic societies, the attitude is essentially one of protecting the bureaucracy. Because of this, generally misinformation and lies occur. Reassurances are given by the industry on a continuous basis.

The lesson to be learned from the major accident at Chernobyl is how similar the bureaucracies are and how irresponsible and incapable they are of dealing with nuclear technology. The essential point is the inability of those bureaucracies to deal with nuclear technology. Whether it is the case of the United States, where the low bidder gets the contract, or the case of the bureaucratic state, in which the bureaucracy at times produces unsafe structures, it is all the same.

There was a tremendous amount of hysteria in the western press when the Chernobyl accident first occurred. Again, it is unfortunate that Washington chose to use this as an instrument of the cold war. Certainly Washington was in no position to level the types of charges it did when the accident first occurred.

Now Washington and the international community are condemning the Soviets, and rightly so, for not giving proper information to neighbouring states and for not giving that information fast enough. Again, I would ask the same question about Three Mile Island. It took the Americans around three days to inform Congress that a major accident had occurred. It took the United States several days to inform the world that a major accident had occurred. I wonder if the United States ever informed Canada of the danger of a radiation plume moving north and affecting Canadian soil. Certainly Canada is much closer to Three Mile Island than Sweden and Norway are to the site at Chernobyl.

I repeat the point that the bureaucracies and Governments on both sides have shown their irresponsibility and have proven that as a human institution, they are not capable of dealing with nuclear matter.

The other aspect of this accident which makes it so tragic for all of us is the amount of nuclear radiation that has now spread throughout the world. We hear continuous assurances that certain levels of radiation are safe because those levels are compared to what is called the background radiation. They tell us that we are always exposed to radiation, that the rocks and the soil have radiation and that there is natural radiation. It is true that this natural radiation exists. However, I wonder what the natural radiation level was at the turn of the century before there were above ground nuclear explosions in the testing of bombs and all the nuclear accidents of which Chernobyl is now the latest. The background radiation has increased and the accident in Chernobyl will increase that background radiation even further.

Our generation and the generations to come are guinea pigs. We do not know what effect this accident will have on the health and wellbeing of the world population. I am amazed when I hear members of the Liberal Party and the Minister rise to tell us that everything is all right with the nuclear industry. What gall that these Hon. Members can rise in the House to say that everything is safe while generations yet to come have been placed at risk.

I want to deal as well with the whole question of nuclear proliferation. This is tied very closely to the nuclear industry. We know that Iraq wants its own bomb. In fact, it came pretty close to developing a bomb until it suffered a pre-emptive strike.

When I read about the development of the bomb in Iraq, I found some of the factors involved very interesting. The leverage Iraq used on France and Italy was that it promised those countries a long-term, secure supply of oil in exchange for which it got the nuclear technology. It is interesting to see how this blackmail occurs and how the transfer of material for peaceful uses can very easily be used in the production of war materials.

The case of Iraq is a classic case, but of course Iraq is not the only country involved. Through the use of Canadian technology and our good friends who developed the CANDU reactor, we know that India was allowed to develop its bomb. Pakistan wants to develop its own bomb. Rumours have it that Israel has its own bomb. South Africa wants its own bomb. Brazil and Libya want their own bombs. From where will they get the technology and the material to develop these bombs, if not through companies and countries involved in "the peaceful development of nuclear energy"?

The proliferation of nuclear weaponry is a real threat to the human race. One can only shakes one's head in fright and fear at what the development and usage of nuclear weaponry in the Middle East would do. We are concerned about the effects of radiation in Canada coming from the accident at Chernobyl. Let me tell the House that that accident is child's play compared with what would happen if a bomb were exploded anywhere in the Middle East. It would have effects on the milk and food we eat in Canada, not to mention the hundreds of thousands of people who would suffer and even die in the Middle East, in Europe, and in other surrounding regions.

Another area of concern is nuclear proliferation and how the peaceful use of nuclear energy leads to the use of nuclear material for weaponry. It is a major concern which a public inquiry should address. It should also address what is the nuclear cycle, for example, how uranium mined in Saskatchewan is refined and shipped somewhere else. It should inquire into how the networking occurs and how, on occasion, shipments of these materials become lost or stolen. There are holes in the system through which countries can illegally obtain questionable material, obviously to be used for the production of bombs. It is another area which has to be properly investigated, and hopefully a public inquiry will do that.

I should now like to deal with the economics of nuclear energy. We heard the Minister tell us of the need for expanding nuclear energy. It is the same type of bureaucratic mentality which was supplied to her by her Department and her bureaucrats that overestimated the demand for oil and the price of oil, so that we are now stuck with the many big lemons we will be paying off. It is the same type of mentality as that endless, boundless growth which now saddles Ontario Hydro with billions of dollars of debt and has the entire utility industry in the United States on the verge of bankruptcy. It is bad business planning. Yet from listening to the Minister, no lessons have been learned; it is gung-ho ahead with a mentality which will mean more losses in the future.

I wish to place some figures on the record from the World Watch Institute report of 1986 on how the demand for nuclear energy has diminished. For example, in 1970 the OECD projected that its members would have 568,000 megawatts of nuclear capacity by 1985. The actual total was only about 180,000 megawatts. Plans for nuclear plant construction world-wide levelled off in the mid-70s, and the expected capacity has dropped by more than 100,000 megawatts since 1978. This is largely due to the cancellation of 111 plants in the United States. However, orders have also slowed in Europe, in the Soviet Union, and several Third World countries. The 30 or so U.S. nuclear plants now being completed will have an average cost of close to $3 billion, or $3,000 per kilowatt. The bill for the power they produce will be approximately three times the average wholesale cost of electricity in the United States today.

If we were to decide the fate of nuclear energy just on its economics we would shut it down so fast it would not even be funny. It is amazing that the so-called business-minded Conservatives cannot appreciate the simple fact that the nuclear industry has been a boondoggle. In fact, the estimates are that by the year 1990 the Canadian nuclear industry will have run up a debt of some $60 billion.

Alternatives are available. I am reminded of the statement that if we took the same amount of money it would cost to build a nuclear plant and put it into conservation, we would save more electricity than that nuclear plant would ever produce. However, we have two different lines of development. One is capital intensive. It produces very few jobs. Consumers do not benefit, only the banks and utilities benefit. The other choice is to go the soft path to alternate energies and conservation. Consumers benefit from increased conservation and the saving of that electricity. It is not the banks, but it is the consumers or the people. It makes us as people more self-reliant and self-sufficient rather than dependent upon the nuclear industry. It is environmentally much sounder, yet this Government and the Government before it decided for and continues to place its bets on the nuclear industry. It is a shame and a tremendous mistake for which we will continue to pay in the years ahead in terms of a wasted environment, as we have in northern Saskatchewan where uranium is mined, and in terms of ongoing high charges for our electrical power just to pay off the debt. It will be the people who pay, and it will be the banks and the industry which benefit.

A proper inquiry into the cost, the safety, and the whole question of proliferation is urgently needed. I urge Hon. Members of the House to support our motion.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to the Hon. Member's speech, and I must say that I enjoyed it. I felt it was thoughtful. While I may not agree with all his points, at least he dealt conceptually with the issue. I agree with him that bureaucracies are totally self-serving. It does not matter whether they are in industry or in government, whether they are Tory or NDP, bureaucracies are self-serving.

I want to come back to the motion which his colleagues pointed out was lifted from the Tory campaign promise. It reads:

> That this House urges the Government to immediately initiate a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power.

Both he and his colleagues have made the point very strongly that they are opposed to nuclear power, the use of nuclear energy, and inferred that the purpose of that campaign statement was to end nuclear energy, and that would be the purpose of the public inquiry. However, let me read the rest of the campaign statement.

> We advocate a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power and have opened the nuclear power approval process to the public.
> We believe that there are good markets for CANDU technology but that the means of achieving entry into these markets must be re-examined.
> We would work with industry and provincial utilities to find new markets in the United States for our surplus electricity.

Since they have taken the first phrase of our campaign statement to infer that our purpose for a public inquiry would be to end the use of nuclear power and, in effect extrapolated it on to our campaign promise, are not the motion and their statements misleading Canadian people?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

CANADIAN JOBS STRATEGY

DIFFICULTIES ENCOUNTERED BY IMMIGRANTS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the Ontario Council of Agencies Serving Immigrants has drawn attention to some serious shortcomings in the Canadian Jobs Strategy for new Canadians who are unable to take advantage of the various employment programs.

Immigrants are not designated as a target group and the criteria for their participation are highly restrictive. Applicants for job development must be out of the workforce for 24 of the past 30 weeks, while for the job re-entry program they must have been out of work for three years. These mandatory lengthy periods of unemployment effectively exclude numerous immigrants since many of them experience high turnover of short-term work.

The Government should expand its programs to account for the employment reality which faces thousands and thousands of people each year. To ignore this sector of Canadian society is to ignore an integral part of Canada today and the Canada of tomorrow as long as immigration remains a national building force in this country.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NORWAY—NEW GOVERNMENT—NINE WOMEN MINISTERS, INCLUDING PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to offer best wishes to Norway, the country of my ancestors, and to the Democratic Socialist Labour Party Government led by Gro Harlem Brundtland. Gro is a female Prime Minister in a world which has far too few women leaders. She has chosen eight women in her 18 person Cabinet, and there are 30 women in the 71 member Labour Party caucus.

I, and Members of the New Democratic Party, wish Dr. Brundtland well in the difficult tasks which lie ahead. All Members of the House will congratulate Norwegians on being leaders in the western world by bringing women to positions of the highest power and public responsibility.

IMPORTANCE OF SMALL ENTREPRENEURS

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, dynamic, ingenious, honest and efficient, those are the adjectives that come to mind when I think of the small business sector in my riding. Since the 1984 election campaign, I often visit small business people in my riding, and I find those visits very rewarding. Last month, I went from door to door on Plante and Third Avenue, where I was given a warm welcome.

As we all know, operating a small business is not an easy matter. It means working long hours, the competition is intense and risks are high. It is the kind of work that requires a great deal of endurance and tremendous self-confidence. I therefore want to take this opportunity to give them the assurance that they have a colleague here in the Conservative Government and that he is always ready to defend their interests, at any time.

Mr. Speaker, small business people are the cornerstone of our economy, and should be encouraged to pursue their dreams and ideals and make them come true. Again, I want to give them the assurance of my dedication and support. Keep up the good work! The people of Quebec East are proud of you!

Small is beautiful, Mr. Speaker.

THE PRIME MINISTER

Mr. William G. Lesick (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) is returning from Asia today where he distinguished himself as a true statesman and the best international ambassador Canada has had in a long time.

Over the course of his visit to the Asia Pacific region, a number of significant developments in the area of international trade and economic co-operation were initiated. Among the Prime Minister's many achievements were his commitment from Japan that its building codes would be revised to facilitate exports of Canadian lumber, the signing of a science and technology co-operation agreement, and the opening up of the Korean market to Canadian coal and canola.

These initiatives will be of substantial benefit to Canada as a whole, and to western Canada and Alberta in particular. As an example, the opening up of Korean markets to Canadian coal exports and the slashing of tariffs on canola will inject new vigor in the West's economy. Jobs will be created in the primary production sector, in processing, in transportation, and in many other sectors of the economy.

SHIPBUILDING

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT ESTABLISH POLICY

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the president of the union at the Sorel shipyards informed us of the contents of a letter written by the president of Versatile Vickers to the Hon. Daniel Johnson, a Minister in the Quebec Cabinet, about rationalizing the Sorel yards of Marine Industries. Wednesday, the Minister of State for Small Businesses (Mr. Bissonnette) confirmed to the House that the former Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion had authorized Mr. Saunders to carry out this operation. Yesterday, Mr. Johnson, the Quebec Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, refused outright to rationalize the shipyard operations of Marine Industries in Sorel.

Mr. Speaker, I think all Conservative Members should ask the Government not to get involved in a rationalization operation and to set up a marine policy that would create jobs in all shipyards, instead of closing down the yards and creating unemployment.

FISHERIES

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT PERMIT FISHERMEN TO RESUME FISHING OFF ACADIAN PENINSULA

Mr. Roger Clinch (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, Canadian fishermen are once again faced with a critical situation with respect to the herring fisheries. The Gulf is full of herring but no fishing is allowed until May 22, since they have already reached their quota and did so in only two days.

Fishermen with over 20 years' experience say there is enough herring to justify doubling the quota.

Fishermen on the northeast shore of New Brunswick should therefore be entitled to continue their operations, which are their sole source of income.

Workers in the fish processing plants are also being deprived of a chance to earn a living. One plant was forced to close after a day's work, while another did so after only two days.

I therefore ask the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans to intervene and allow the fishermen to go back to their fishing grounds so they can earn a living.

IMPORTANCE FOR CANADIANS TO BUY CARS DESIGNED AND BUILT IN CANADA

Mrs. Anne Blouin (Montmorency—Orléans): Mr. Speaker, since September 1984, 630,000 jobs have been created in Canada, and more than 127,000 in Quebec. Quebec Members intend to continue this trend by promoting the development of our industries.

As part of the strategy for promoting job creation, we urge the Bombardier company to persevere in its efforts to reach an agreement with the Japanese Daihatsu corporation for setting up another automobile plant in Quebec. Such an agreement would help diversify our economic infrastructure and increase our exports.

We therefore urge Bombardier to continue its efforts, and we certainly intend to give the company our full co-operation.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, I hope that Canadians will take this opportunity to demonstrate their economic nationalism by buying a car manufactured and designed in Canada.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

MEMBER'S LETTER TO U.S. AND U.S.S.R. LEADERS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would like to read into the record a letter I wrote today to Mr. Ronald Reagan, President of the United States, and Mr. Mikhail Gorbachev, General Secretary of the Communist Party in the Soviet Union. It reads:

Dear Mr. President and Mr. General Secretary:

All citizens of our world can breathe a little easier now that the worst has passed at Chernobyl—just as we breathed easier in 1979 after the Three Mile Island reactor was stabilized.

Marshall McLuhan, a distinguished Canadian, once said that we now live in a "global village", meaning that we all share the problems of nuclear radiation. This goes beyond borders.

Perhaps something really positive can come from the incident at Chernobyl and that you, the leaders of the two world superpowers, can meet to discuss mutual ways of preventing such incidents in the future and of achieving a nuclear test ban.

Both your countries have joined together at Expo 86 in my home city of Vancouver to exhibit your technology to the peoples of the world.

Why not use this occasion to come to Vancouver, Canada in the early Fall to meet on these momentous issues?

THE ECONOMY

SUCCESSIVE INTEREST RATE REDUCTIONS

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, the Bank of Canada has again announced a reduction in the bank rate.

A few minutes ago, the bank rate was set at 8.59 per cent, which represents a drop of 13 percentage points since last week and 3.79 points since the election in September 1984. The chartered banks have just announced a one-half point drop in the prime rate. Falling interest rates are saving Canadian consumers, governments, businesses, and anyone who has to finance purchases and business operations, hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. Speaker, it is a foregone conclusion that this reduction in interest rates will increase consumption and trade. Thanks to our Government's policies, our economic growth is continuing, and we are creating more jobs for Canadian men and women.

PRIME MINISTER'S VISIT TO JAPAN, CHINA, AND SOUTH KOREA

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, if we take the time to read Hansard for the last two weeks, we find very few references to the trip to Asia made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney).

Mr. Speaker, it seems the House, and especially the Opposition parties, had more urgent matters to attend to.

Nevertheless, I think it is important to stress the extraordinary job done by the Prime Minister in Asia. As always, in these circumstances, he has shown he is a worthy ambassador of our country. In Japan, China and South Korea, he had meetings with the highest political leaders, inviting them to invest and buy more in our country. I am sure that in the months and years to come, we will reap the fruit of these meetings.

Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is returning to Canada this afternoon, after a long and exhausting two-week tour, and I hope that when he returns to the House, all parties will give him a welcome that is, at the very least, respectful and worthy of us as parliamentarians.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REMOVAL OF SERVICES ENJOYED BY VOLUNTEER GROUPS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, it is a bad decision on the part of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) to cut Environment Canada support to the groups that we all, including him, need as friends. By removing this support which the Department has offered over many, many years, the Minister is making it clear that Environment Canada is abandoning the advocacy role it has become known for all over the country for the past decade.

The contribution to environmental groups was minor in comparison to other expenditures such as the $600,000 the Minister is spending on advertising for Environment Week, but far more effective. Environmental groups which benefited from travel funds, access to long-distance telephone lines, photocopying or postage services through regional offices, rely heavily on volunteer support and operate on shoestring budgets. The removal of this support is a spiteful and petty move, not a very fitting show on the part of the Government of Canada.

CANADIAN COAST GUARD

PROPOSED AUTOMATION OF WEST COAST LIGHTHOUSES

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to call to the attention of this House a very serious matter, that of the automation of 10 lighthouses on the coast of British Columbia. The LeBlond Commission said these lighthouses were doing an excellent job on search and rescue, communications, and weather reporting. To save $4.3 million by 1990, the Government intends to automate these lighthouses, remove the search and rescue capability, communications, and effective weather broadcasting, and place the lives of British Columbians who travel the sea in jeopardy. I urge the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) to hold a public inquiry into this matter and stop any further action toward decommissioning and automating these lighthouses.

There is no doubt that the Government considers its only function is to provide light during bad weather conditions. Two thousand failures have occurred in automated lighthouse stations on the coast of British Columbia. This cannot continue. The Minister of Transport must stop it and begin a public inquiry.

LUMBER EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES—THREAT OF COUNTERVAIL

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, there is good reason to believe that, next Monday, U.S. lumber interests will launch yet another countervailing duty action against softwood lumber imports. No greater proof can be found that we desperately need to negotiate the bilateral agreement initiated by our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and President Reagan. This is the third effort by U.S. lumber interests to block Canadian access to their markets, and despite continued failure they persist in this harassment.

It should be noted that under U.S. law these American lumbermen have the right to petition the U.S. Government, but their action does not necessarily reflect administration policy. Our position must be to hold firm in our intention to restore stability in our trading relations and not allow this gesture to endanger this historic accord.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

DINING AND TRAVEL EXPENSES

Mr. Bob Pennock (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, Pierre Juneau claims that the CBC will have a $48 million budget shortfall this year. Here are a couple of examples of why.

The CBC had a high profile at this year's Parliamentary Press Gallery dinner, purchasing 73 tickets for its staff, picking up the tab for tuxedo rentals, a pre-dinner reception, and airfares. The total cost to the taxpayer was $7,000 for the evening's festivities.

Would you like to travel to Cannes on the French Riviera? Join the CBC. They sent 15 representatives and a secretary to the annual MIP-TV market. I do not question that the CBC should be represented at this important international event. What I question is the number of people, and a bill of $130,000 to the taxpayer for a five-day trip.

Between Juneau's junket to China and these two items, he has spent approximately $170,000 of the taxpayers' money. I suggest to him that this money could be better spent in providing quality programming for which the CBC is famous.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FORMER MINISTER—INQUIRY INTO APPLICATION OF CONFLICT OF INTEREST GUIDELINES

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. For two weeks now my Party has been calling on the Government and the Prime Minister to enforce the guidelines against conflict of interest against the former Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. Yesterday the Acting Prime Minister indicated for the first time that the outside inquiry the Government is intending to use will not only examine the facts, but will apply a judgment about whether the conflict of interest guidelines have been violated or not.

I want to ask the Acting Prime Minister how that function of deciding whether the conflict of interest guidelines have been violated or not can possibly be delegated by the Prime Minister to an outside person.

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, before any circumstances can be resolved as fact there is an element of judgment that has to be applied. With respect to the intention to conduct an impartial inquiry, that is in keeping with demands that have come from the hon. gentleman's own Members. He should know, if he does not, that the instruments that are necessary in circumstances such as these have already had parliamentary imprimatur and are there to be used.

Mr. Kaplan: Our Leader and our House Leader have already clearly spoken for us in favour of a parliamentary inquiry, not an independent inquiry in this matter.

ROLE OF INVESTIGATOR

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the following question. Does this mean that the person who will conduct this independent inquiry will merely analyze the facts and report on the matter, or will that person pass judgment and make a decision? What is this person's role, according to the Government?

[English]

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I said Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and now it being Thursday I say the same thing to the hon. gentleman, there are two elements to any inquiry. One is the inquiry process, and the other is the reporting process. There are numerous precedents to indicate the kind of processes that are contemplated to be set in motion.

Oral Questions

ATTENDANCE OF PRIME MINISTER DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Will he assure the House that the Prime Minister, who is returning to Canada tonight, will be here tomorrow during Question Period to answer for the disasters that he, the Deputy Prime Minister, inflicted upon the Government?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is a little hard to find that supplementary to the question. I think the Hon. Member already knows that. Does he have a supplementary question?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can respond by asking the hon. gentleman if the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition will be here? He is not here today.

TRADE

LUMBER EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES—THREAT OF COUNTERVAIL

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I would like direct my question to the Minister of International Trade. At the same time I would like to assure the Deputy Prime Minister that our Leader will be in the House, as he has been all week. The Minister for International Trade has now publicly stated that he would be planning to undertake counter measures against the United States if they introduce countervail on the lumber issue.

I would like to ask the Minister for International Trade what he means. What other measures is he now contemplating? What other initiatives does he plan to take to fight on behalf of the Canadian lumber industries? What change in policy is he now announcing?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I can advise the Hon. Member that if, indeed, countervail is applied by the Americans, that Canada has the right to compensation under GATT, and we would certainly pursue that remedy.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, we are fully aware of those facts, but that is not what the Minister is reported as saying. He said he is planning to undertake other measures in response to any countervail action by the United States. We would like to know what those measures are, and does this represent a fundamental change in policy from the previous position taken, which was that the Government would negotiate all these irritants under a comprehensive free trade negotiation? Have we now changed the policy and will we be dealing with these irritant problems one by one, sector by sector? Is this now a fundamental change in the Government's stand?

• (1420)

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, there is no fundamental change in the policy of the Government. To relieve the mind of the Hon. Member I can advise him that my colleague, the Minister of State for Forestry, and I are meeting with all the provincial Trade Ministers and Forestry Ministers this evening in Toronto at the Constellation Hotel. We will discuss the possible countervail action which may be brought by the United States producers against Canadians. We believe in the full involvement of the provinces before we do anything.

FORMER MINISTER—ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST—COMMITTEE ROLE

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. By now he will be aware that the government Members on the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure rejected both motions—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Order.

Mr. Rodriguez: —to look at the specific conflict of interest—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Order.

Mr. Rodriguez: —and the broader question. What method would the Deputy Prime Minister propose so that the House can look at both the specific issue of the ex-Minister's conflict of interest and the broader question of the guidelines for conflict of interest?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Perhaps I should have been aware, as the hon. gentleman says, of what transpired in the committee today. I believe the Hon. Member said I was not aware of it. With respect to the matter of a reference to a committee and the hon. gentleman's outright accusation, that option is there and I have been saying that all week.

I would urge the Hon. Member to be cautious in stating as an outright accusation that there has been a conflict of interest, and have the decency to await the outcome of the investigation as to facts.

REQUEST THAT INVESTIGATOR'S REPORT BE REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in light of the answer of the Deputy Prime Minister, will he give the House an assurance that the report from this impartial investigator as to facts will be referred to the Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is certainly an option which is open. But surely we should have the prudence and sense to await the appointment of an impartial person, the terms of reference, and the report itself, before coming to a decision which the Hon. Member wants the Prime Minister to make at this moment.

REQUEST THAT COMMITTEE EXAMINE GUIDELINES

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary question is also directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Despite the investigation which will go on, the adequacy of the process of conflict of interest remains. Can the Deputy Minister give the House some assurance that there will be a method whereby the Standing Committee which has traditionally looked at these matters will in fact look at those guidelines?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman is asking me to commit the Prime Minister and the Government to make a selection now of options based on something which has not yet been produced, namely, the report, surely that is simply not intelligent.

Mr. Rodriguez: You're looking at fact.

Mr. Nielsen: The options arise only after the report has been produced. Does not reason compel the Hon. Member to the conclusion that we should await the report in order then to select the option as to which way to proceed from that point on?

PUBLIC WORKS

AWARDING OF CONTRACTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works and concerns the letting of contracts for the Museum of Man in Hull. What steps does the Minister intend to take to give this House and the Canadian people the assurance that the contract-letting process used by his department, and especially in the case of the Museum in Hull, remains worthy of the trust of Canadians?

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think I can give the House that assurance and I want to say first of all that almost all contracts were let by the previous Government. As the Minister of Public of Works, I have been responsible for museums only since May 1985, and I can again give the Hon. Member the assurance that everything is being done by public tender, in the best interests of Canadians.

REQUEST THAT ROBERGE COMMITTEE BE ABOLISHED

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Is the Deputy Prime Minister now intending to abolish the Roberge patronage committee, which meets at the Ritz-Carlton, and other patronage organizations which exist within the Government and, more particularly, those that we saw reflected in the letter from the Hon. Member for Québec East when he wrote concerning patronage—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have trouble finding that question supplementary to the first question the Hon. Member addressed to the Minister of Public Works. Does the Hon. Member have a supplementary question?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Does he intend to end whatever committees there are involving patronage contracts from the Department of Public Works and any other Department to ensure that the credibility—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I still find it difficult to find that question supplementary to the contract process which was the subject of the first question. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre.

INTEGRITY OF CONTRACT PROCESS

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Public Works. In light of the events of today, the charges of bribery, fraud, and breach of trust, and without commenting in any way whatsoever on the innocence or guilt of an individual, will the Minister tell the House what he is prepared to do now to preserve the integrity of the contract letting process for public contracts?

[Translation]

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think all Members of this House are familiar with the usual workings and structure of this process, and we continue to make public calls for tender, and the best bid is usually the one selected by the Government. Now in the circumstances, I do not think I have anything new to announce. I think we should maintain the system of public contract-letting, and ensure that competence and cost considerations remain our fundamental criteria for letting contracts.

[English]

REQUEST THAT MINISTER EXAMINE PROCESS

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same Minister. Surely on a day when enough evidence has been gathered for 50 charges to be laid against an individual it is time for the Minister to take another look at the contract letting process to assure us, once again, that this process can take place without political influence?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I don't think I can comment on the Hon. Member's remarks, considering the fact that the matter is before the courts. About the contract-letting and the procedure being followed, I would like to remind the Hon. Member that our procedure observes the criteria of competence, quality and cost in selecting the best bid, in the interests of all Canadians.

AIRPORTS

AWARDING OF SECURITY SERVICE CONTRACTS AT MONTREAL AIRPORTS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Transport. As a follow-up to his investigation, can the Acting Minister of Transport tell us whether he sticks by the Minister of Transport's statement that there has been no conlict of interest in the case of the instant security companies which were awarded an untendered airport contract worth more than $2 million, given that we now know that they are operating under a licence for a company which involves the wife of a Conservative cabinet Minister?

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Transport was here in the House today he would reaffirm his observations of the last two days and confirm that in his belief there was no conflict of interest.

SECURITY DISCUSSIONS IN CABINET

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also directed to the Acting Minister of Transport. Given that the Minister of Transport himself announced in the House on April 9 that he and his cabinet colleagues were undertaking a complete over-feel of the security system at airports, can he tell us whether or not the cabinet Minister whose wife has shares in a company which is now benefiting as a result of the—

Some Hon. Members: Order, order!

Ms. Copps: —untendered contract absented himself during the course of those security discussions?

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the allegations made are completely unfounded. The Hon. Member is fully aware of that. The distinguished Senator has very clearly indicated that he took every human and possible step he could to remove any appearance of conflict of interest at the time of this event. That is certainly in the record and is well recorded.

SHIPBUILDING

POSSIBLE EXISTENCE OF CONFLICT OF INTEREST

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and it has to do with the conflict of interest stemming from the decision of the Minister and the former Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion to ask the president of a Quebec shipyard to plan the closure of another Quebec shipyard. Can the Minister explain why he refused to answer this question last Tuesday and tell us where he stands with respect to the conflict of interest in this industry?

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, I thought I made it quite clear last Tuesday that there is no conflict of interest in this case. On the contrary, we have asked the spokesmen for the shipbuilding industry in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada to get together with a view to discussing a rationalization process and making recommendations concerning the future of this Canadian industry.

PREPARATION OF CLOSURE PLAN FOR SHIPYARDS

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Considering that again the answer is coming from the Minister of State for Small Businesses, can he explain, first, why Versatile Corporation Chairman Saunders has been asked to develop a plan involving the closure of the Sorel Marine Industries Limited shipyard, without the knowledge of MIL, and, second, why has the Hon. Member for Richelieu—who was directly involved—been totally ignored in this matter?

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know which language to use to explain this. It has been made very clear that the Versatile chairman is one of the interested parties, so it is altogether normal that he should be involved in the discussions. What more can I say? There are three major shipyards in Quebec. Since the Versatile chairman owns two of them, it stands to reason that he has to be in on this.

Mr. Cassidy: To close the third one. Exactly.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Bissonnette: Mr. Speaker, we are not talking about closing down shipyards at this time, we are talking about discussions on the future of Canadian shipyards.

HUMAN RIGHTS

SOUTH KOREA—VIOLATIONS

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We read that the Prime Minister is reserving judgment on the question of human rights violations in South Korea. Could the Secretary of State tell us if he is expressing the official view of the Government and a view which the Secretary of State himself supports?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member should take it as a given that the reports he reads in the Toronto Globe and Mail do not express the view of the Government.

AMNESTY INTERNATIONAL REPORTS

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I take it that the Secretary of State is aware of the reports of Amnesty International which offer us examples of recent violations of human rights, the torturing of political prisoners and so on. Would he take it upon himself to issue a firm statement which makes it clear that the Canadian Government does not reserve judgment but in fact condemns these actions of the South Korean regime?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, not only am I and the Prime Minister aware of the position of Amnesty International, I am also aware of the position taken by the Prime Minister of Canada when he was in Korea, both publicly and privately. In public fora which were not recorded, and privately to the leaders of the Government of that country, he made the case very strongly of Canada's deep concern and recommendation for change about the human rights situation in South Korea. I am advised that he made representations much stronger than those that have ever been made on that issue by any other Canadian Prime Minister visiting South Korea.

SHIPYARDS

INQUIRY WHETHER VERSATILE COMPANY PRESIDENT GIVEN RESPONSIBILITY TO FIND WAY TO CLOSE MARINE INDUSTRIES LIMITED SHIPYARDS

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Could the Minister confirm to the House that Mr. Peter Paul Saunders, president of Versatile Corporation, was asked by the Government to find a way to shut down the shipyards of Marine Industries Limited, while in return, his own company, Versatile Davie, would receive a second construction contract from CN Marine, the Crown corporation?

[English]

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, we asked Mr. Saunders to hold discussions with the other interveners in Quebec in order to know what the new policy for Canadian shipbuilding can be.

RATIONALIZATION PROPOSAL

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, how does the Government believe that it is fair to ask the man who is in charge of two of the yards to undertake rationalization which involves closure of the third yard? Why is the Government not seeking ways to ensure that the ships required by Canadian interests are built in Canada, rather than finding ways of shutting down yards and putting workers out of work and on to the unemployment insurance rolls?

[Translation]

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, I answered this question just before, and I will repeat my answer. We have asked the parties concerned to get together. Should we ask outsiders to get together to tell us what the prognosis is for this industry or should we ask the parties concerned? We never mentioned closing a shipyard. We talked about the possibility of a national shipbuilding policy.

RATIONALIZATION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Small Businesses.

Mr. Speaker, in his letter, Mr. Saunders, who received a mandate from the Government, asked the Government of Quebec to rationalize the shipyards at Sorel. Yesterday, the Minister said no. Today, which shipyard is going to be phased out, the one in Lauzon or in Montreal, since Quebec refuses to rationalize the shipyards in Sorel?

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, once again, the Hon. Member for Sainte-Marie is alluding to a letter sent by Mr. Saunders to a Minister in the Quebec Government, and not to a mandate given by the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion—

Mr. Malépart: You said he had a mandate.

An Hon. Member: Can't you listen?

Mr. Bissonnette: I never said we gave him a mandate. I said we asked him to get together with his colleagues in the industry. That is what I said, and I maintain what I said.

Oral Questions

REQUEST FOR NEW POLICY

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, the Minister is contradicting himself. I have the proceedings of the committee, and the Minister said: Mr. Stevens gave Mr. Saunders a mandate to rationalize shipyard operations.

Doesn't the Minister think it would be preferable to establish a shipbuilding policy and create jobs in all our shipyards instead of trying to close some of them?

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what I am saying. We must find a way to upgrade our shipyards in Canada, and we have asked the parties to submit new ideas with a view to upgrading existing shipyards across Canada, to make them more profitable and more productive. We can't ask any more than that.

IMPORTANCE OF MAIL SERVICE TO SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Canada Post. Senior citizens and disabled Canadians, probably more than any other group, rely on the mails not only in order to receive pension cheques but to keep in touch with family and friends. Can the Minister tell me how he can possibly consider reducing mail service to three days a week in view of the importance of the mail to seniors and disabled Canadians as well as many other Canadians?

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Canada Post): Mr. Speaker, I think I have already answered that question in the last two days. I have said that we are examining alternatives in order to come to self-sufficiency in the next two years. In all honesty we have to examine all possible alternatives, and alternate day delivery is just one alternative that has to be examined. It might not be retained but it has to be examined.

REQUEST FOR PUBLIC HEARINGS ON ALTERNATE DAY DELIVERY PROPOSAL

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the same Minister. Would the Minister assure the House that before he goes ahead with any of the options he is considering, there will be full public hearings on the impact of his actions so that programs such as Seniors Alert, carried out by the letter carriers to protect and look after the interests of seniors, will not be dismantled or damaged?

• (1440)

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Canada Post): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my colleague of one thing, that whatever the decision will be, it will be in the best interest of all Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

NIAGARA RIVER POLLUTION—MINISTER'S DISCUSSIONS WITH UNITED STATES AUTHORITIES

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. During the last week the Minister was in Washington to discuss the question of the future clean-up of the chemical dumps along the Niagara River. Apart from any discussions relating to the future clean-up, did the Minister obtain a firm commitment either to stop up, or to divert immediately, the sewer in Buffalo, New York, which is pouring dioxins into the Niagara River? If he did not, why not?

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member will appreciate, my negotiations and discussions with the head of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency focused upon the broad picture of the Niagara River and the need to reduce very substantially toxic loadings there. We did not get into individual sources, whether industrial, municipal, or disposal sites. But I mentioned this particular one as an exception because of the topicality of the data Environment Canada made available to the public last week. I arranged for them to receive that data. They have now received it, but the agency have yet to have a chance to analyse it. They promised me, however, that they would do so, and that they would address the problem in the context of the global agreement we reached in Washington this week.

MINISTER'S RELATIONS WITH PROVINCIAL COUNTERPART

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of the Environment. On the eve of his departure for Washington, and in Washington, why did he publicize his disagreement with his Ontario colleague on how to handle toxic pollution in Lake Ontario, thus telling the U.S. Government, in a way, that the Government of Canada would settle for a second-rate clean-up plan? Why did he do that?

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that it is not a second-rate plan. It is the first time the Government of Canada has ever been able to reach an agreement with the United States on substantial toxic loadings reductions in any trans-boundary waterway. It sets a specific target, 1995. It sets a specific schedule by which to reduce toxic loadings by 50 per cent. We agreed that it would serve as a general bench-mark by which we will take individual decisions for that purpose. We are mobilizing top teams of scientists to help us refine the targets and schedules. We hope to have in place by July, 1987, the best toxic reductions program ever arranged between the two countries.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the Minister is more apt at taking photo opportunities or in participating in sing-songs on how to clean up toxic chemicals than in arriving at what he calls an agreement, about which nobody knows because it is kept secret.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Caccia: Why is the Minister condemning his Ontario colleague for taking a position which the Minister himself took in the House on March 24 when he said: "we think the only solution for the disposal sites on the American side along the Niagara River is excavation and incineration"?

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the agreement that we reached with the Americans—and after all it is an American plan, not a Canadian one, because 90 per cent of the toxins come from American sources—addresses itself to that very point. It says, and I will quote briefly, "the basic objective is the extraction and destruction of the toxic contents of the dump sites to the maximum extent technologically feasible, taking into consideration public health and safety". We wove right into the fabric of the document the very point for which the Hon. Member has called.

Mr. Caccia: Why don't you table it, then?

NATURE OF CLEAN-UP

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. Yesterday the Minister agreed with his U.S. counterpart, Lee Thomas, to hold off on any serious clean-up of Niagara River pollution for at least another year. Would the Minister tell the House exactly what clean-up and reduction in chemicals, both from the dump sites and from the sewer systems, will take place between now and July, 1987?

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member misunderstands. We are to begin immediately to clean up the toxins in the Niagara River from industrial sources, from municipal sources, and from dump sites. We have set 1995 as our target, by which time we hope to reduce toxic discharges by 50 per cent. In the meantime, because we hope to be able to advance the date and increase the amount of toxins we will be able to get out of the river, we have said that we will mobilize scientists to tell us whether by July, 1987, we will be able to refine the date. In the meantime we are using that general date as our target in our schedule.

TOXIC DUMPSITES IN UNITED STATES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the Minister's mind seems to be like jello in a sieve on this matter. Is it his view—and those are his words—that the Love Canal, Hyde Park, S Area, or 102nd Street dump can be made safe without all the material within them being totally excavated and incinerated? What exactly is his view on those dumpsites?

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member were genuinely interested in pollution, he would not resort to such expressions in the House of Commons. Nevertheless, my own preferred position is excavation, and I have said that. The Americans have some technological difficulties with it because the area concerned includes about 66 dump sites which, combined, are equivalent to the size of Prince Edward Island. They have a real problem finding anywhere in the United States to locate the excavated material, let alone develop the science quickly enough to incinerate without making the problem worse, because the incineration process itself contributes to environmental pollution, especially in the production of dioxin. Short of that, we favour extraction—taking the chemicals right out of the dump sites and destroying them through various means.

TRADE

CLOTHING IMPORTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of International Trade. At their annual general meeting the management of Celanese Canada asked for federal Government intervention to negotiate a new multi-fibre agreement and endorse bilateral agreements with other countries.

Does the Minister intend to negotiate these agreements to reduce imports, considering that between January and April this year, clothing imports were 13 per cent higher than during the same period in 1985?

[English]

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I assure the Hon. Member and all Members of the House that our Government is extremely concerned about the welfare not only of the workers but of the companies in that particular industry. In recent months, I am happy to advise him, we have entered into restraint agreements with Bangladesh, Brazil, Bulgaria, China, Indonesia, Malaysia, Pakistan, and Turkey. We are presently in the process of renegotiating a multifibre agreement with the aim of reducing growth levels, overhang, and surges.

Oral Questions

SOCIAL SERVICES

CHILD CARE—ONTARIO PREMIER'S STATEMENT

Hon. Douglas C. Frith (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Does he agree with the statement of the Premier of Ontario in which he said that child care should not be part of the welfare system but in fact is a social service that should be available to the Canadian public?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is out of Ottawa on important government business, may I be permitted to take that question as notice? I will have the Hon. Minister write to the Hon. Member in some detail, expounding his view of the statement by the Premier of Ontario.

COST SHARING INQUIRY

Hon. Douglas C. Frith (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question on the same subject matter is for the Minister of Finance. Now that the majority of the provinces appear ready to cost share universal access to day care, is the Minister prepared to do the same in terms of the budgetary process for next year?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as the Government House Leader indicated, this is a matter which the Minister of National Health and Welfare has under review. He will get back to the Hon. Member in due course.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

NUCLEAR REACTOR IN WASHINGTON STATE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It specifically concerns the Handford nuclear reactor which is located in Washington State not far from the British Columbia border. Given that this reactor is contained with a design similar to the one at Tchernobyl and has been described by a consultant to the U.S. Regulatory Commission as "an accident waiting to happen", has the Minister specifically requested that the U.S. Government close down the Handford facility?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will have to see if the unnamed individual consultant cited by the Hon. Member reflects a consensus or an eccentric view. I will certainly inform myself on the question. The Hon. Member may be assured that, if there is any danger to Canadians, I will, as I always do, act to defend the Canadian interest.

• (1450)

CANADA-UNITED STATES DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Minister does not want to make British Columbia the Ukraine of North America, so I will take him up on that offer.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Waddell: Would the Minister confirm that his Department has had discussions with the American Government concerning this reactor?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will have to inform myself on whether or not there have been discussions on the matter and I will advise the Hon. Member.

I would implore the Hon. Member, and all others in the House, not to abuse their positions as Members of this House to create false fears among the people of Canada.

DISASTERS

SAFETY OF CANADIAN STUDENTS IN KIEV FOLLOWING SOVIET NUCLEAR REACTOR ACCIDENT

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. As the Minister is well aware, a number of students from my constituency are currently in the Soviet Union attending a one-year study course in the City of Kiev. As a result of a recent accident at the nuclear power generating station in Tchernobyl the majority of those students have left Kiev and are now in Moscow. Three of them, however, are still in Kiev.

Will the Minister inform the House of his Department's up to date assessment of the health risk to those students from Kootenay West, and does he feel the need to continue to encourage those Canadians who remain in Kiev to leave the area?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his question and know of his very active interest in the situation of his constituents in the Kiev region. Our consul was the first non-resident consul into the Kiev region after the disaster. He spoke to all of the students there. He encouraged those who were prepared to leave to leave, and helped them to do that. We are remaining in touch with those who are still there. Our information, which we cannot regard as being absolutely reliable because no one can, would suggest that there is some stabilizing of the situation in Kiev. We are keeping in touch both with the consul and with the students there to try to ensure their safety is well protected.

EMPLOYMENT

JOB DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM FUNDING

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Employment. Earlier this week I asked the Minister to explain why so many of her regional offices were reporting they had no funds for job development when there were many outstanding applications, but she did not answer. Today I have an internal memo from her Associate Deputy Minister to all regional directors in which he says:

> You will appreciate that we face a challenge in meeting the Minister's direction to implement a more controlled flow of program activity throughout the year.

Does this explain why many regional offices have frozen their job development funds and have no money for job applications now?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as the Hon. Member has addressed his question to the Acting Minister, I will take that as notice and inform my colleague who is away from the House of Commons on Government business. I would think, however, the Hon. Member should recognize that since this Government took office in September, 1984, some 630,000 new jobs have been created, that the youth unemployment rate is down to the level it was in 1981; that mortgage rates are down; that economic activity is up, and therefore employment is up. I am sure the Hon. Member would like to recognize that in the House.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Minister is indeed an actor. Why is the Government spreading these job development funds over an extended period when jobs are needed now in many areas of the country, including Atlantic Canada, Quebec, British Columbia, and even Alberta? Why is the Government spreading it out over a long period when jobs are needed now?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Hon. Member will appreciate the answer from my colleague when she returns to the House. It will be given to him in the fullest. The ability of this Government to create employment, to endeavour to help those who need employment, is well known and well recognized. It is spread across this country from one end to the other where employment has increased since September, 1984.

FORMER MINISTER—STATUS OF OPPOSITION PARTIES BEFORE INVESTIGATOR

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, if it be true that the Government intends to proceed with this independent inquiry into the problems of the former Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, will the Government include within the terms of reference that the Opposition Parties in the House of Commons will have official standing before such an inquiry in order that they can be represented in the questioning and the providing of evidence?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Will they refrain from jumping over tables?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. gentleman, when he describes problems of the former Minister, wants his problems brought before such an investigation. I am sorry I must have entirely missed the point of his question. The investigation will be conducted in accordance with due processes that have parliamentary imprimatur.

ROLE OF OPPOSITION PARTIES IN INVESTIGATION PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): I do not quite understand what it is that the Deputy Prime Minister has difficulty with, Mr. Speaker. Let me ask him, so that even he might understand it, will the opposition Parties have standing before the chairman or the commission, or the board, or whatever it is that is struck to conduct this so-called impartial investigation?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the conduct of the investigation is surely a matter that would be left entirely to the impartial person who is going to be appointed.

Mr. Deans: That is ridiculous. You set the terms of reference.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. gentleman, if he knew anything about this place—

Mr. Deans: I don't need lectures from you after the last two weeks—

Mr. Nielsen: —would know that there are ample precedents for proceeding along these lines.

Mr. Nystrom: Doberman.

Mr. Nielsen: They have been in place for the almost 30 years I have been here.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PENSIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. On April 17, 1985 the Minister proudly told the House he had signed a pension agreement with the Public Service unions. A year has gone by, so would he tell us where we stand today? Was an agreement concluded, so that pensioners might know what to expect?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to respond to the question of my colleague. In keeping with the general principles included in the agreement I tabled in the House in April 1985, we have continued to work both within the Treasury Board and in consultation with the unions. A document has been submitted to Cabinet and discussions with the unions on the final draft will be completed in the next few days. I will certainly be in a position to report to the House before the end of the session.

INQUIRY WHETHER PENSIONERS WERE REPRESENTED DURING NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, were pensioners represented at the negotiations? If so, at what level?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): The pensioners' association has a representative on the pension advisory committee. Their viewpoint was taken into consideration during the discussions, and I can assure my colleague that our 1984 election campaign commitment concerning the protection of vested rights will be honoured in the agreement which will be presented to the House.

REGULATIONS

CODE ETHNICS

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for regulations.

On March 6 the Minister presented his code of ethics concerning regulations. Can he now give the House a report progress on this matter?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, again my colleague shows interest in the matter of regulations. I am pleased to inform him that the Government has finalized the action plan to put order in the regulations. I will unveil the details of this plan on May 27.

AIRPORTS

AWARDING OF SECURITY SERVICES CONTRACT FOR MONTREAL AIRPORTS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport. Yesterday the Minister informed us that he was investigating this new security company in regard to the provision of the security services at Mirabel and Dorval and that he would report back. Does this lucky two-week old company have completely separate assets? Does it have its own security licence, assets, and insurance? Is it bonded? Does it have an office of its own, or is it simply a shell company put together only for the purposes of receiving money from an untendered contract?

• (1500)

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Transport undertook to secure for the Hon. Member the answers to a series of questions which he posed. I am pleased to advise today that the two companies are separate. There are no common assets, fixed or otherwise. Yes, in fact the companies are bonded through the usual national bonding services. Yes, in fact they are either fully licensed or in the process of the approval of those licences both in the Province of Quebec and the Province of Ontario. Without any question, neither the Senator nor his wife has any interest whatsoever—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is three o'clock. The Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) has given me notice of a desire to raise a point of order.

POINT OF ORDER

TABLING OF QUOTED DOCUMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period in reply to a question of mine the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) read from a document. I wonder whether, in conformity with customary practice in the House, the Minister would have any objection to tabling the document.

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member referred to a document which I personally sent to his office upon its release from Washington. He had it 24 hours ago. I simply quoted from that document which he probably has in his own pocket.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): That doesn't answer the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Minister is indicating that he quoted from this document? He, therefore, has no choice under the rules but to table the document.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I would like to seek your advice on this matter. My understanding is that it is one thing to quote from documents which may be in the form of press releases or notes. However, if I am not mistaken, I believe the rules only require the tabling of documents which are documents of state.

Ms. Copps: The ruling has already been made.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: If that is not the case, I would be interested. I think it is an important point to take under consideration. I do not think that the tabling of documents and notes used by Ministers to assist them with statistics is contemplated by the rules or the precedents.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am prepared to hear arguments from the Hon. the President of the Privy Council or the Minister. However, I did hear the Minister say that he quoted from a document which he had sent to the Member.

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Speaker, I referred to a document which is a public news release. It was issued by me out of Washington. I sent a copy of it to the Hon. Member in his capacity as environment critic for the Official Opposition. I referred to it only by way of replying to a question, the answer to which was obvious.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The table advises me that the Minister has sent the document to the table, in which case I take it he is volunteering to table it. What is the Minister telling me is his position on the point of order raised by the Hon. Member for Davenport?

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Speaker, I am telling the Hon. Member that I have no problem tabling the document from which I quoted. However, the broader principle stands. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has stated, and I agree with him, that because a Minister quotes from a piece of paper does not necessarily mean it need be tabled if it does not fall into certain categories.

Mr. Gauthier: Oh, no.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Chair has ruled on that question many times and as recently as two weeks ago. I have to deal with the point of order that is raised. I take it the Hon. Minister is tabling the document voluntarily. I take it that is what has happened. Therefore, it is done.

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): This being Thursday, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Government House Leader, the Hon. the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Hnatyshyn), if he would tell us what Government business he plans to bring before the House next week?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will announce the business of the House tomorrow because, following Oral Questions Period, we will have a meeting with the Hon. Member and the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans).

POINT OF ORDER

REQUEST THAT MEMBER WITHDRAW HIS WORDS

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, during Oral Question Period, the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) mentioned that this week I said before a committee that we had given Mr. Saunders a mandate. I would ask him to withdraw those words, and I would like to quote page 3 of—

Some Hon. Members: Point of order!

Mr. Speaker: I believe the Minister is saying there is a difference of opinion about the facts. That is a matter for debate, not a point of order, and we have established this many times.

Mr. Bissonnette: Mr. Speaker, could I ask you . . . could the Hon. Member—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the Minister have another point of order?

Mr. Bissonnette: Mr. Speaker, may I ask you a question at this point?

Mr. Speaker: No.

Mr. Bissonnette: Maybe if . . . Can a Member—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Minister has informed the Chair that he disagrees with something another Member said.

That is what he said. It is not a point of order. It is a difference of opinion concerning the facts. That is a matter for debate.

Mr. Malépart: Bye! Bye!

Mr. Speaker: It is not a point of order.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Bring back Sauvé.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please! I will require the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Lewis) to withdraw that. The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary deliberately said that for the Chair to hear. I must ask him to withdraw his comment.

Mr. Lewis: I withdraw.

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 82—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY—NUCLEAR POWER

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fulton:

That this House urges the government to immediately initiate a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power.

Mr. Speaker: When the House rose at one o'clock there were eight minutes remaining in the period for questions and comments. If I remember correctly, the Hon. Member was about to answer a question from the Hon. Member for Surrey—White Rock—North Delta (Mr. Friessen). Therefore, I will recognize the Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong).

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member had asked me to make clear the position of the Conservative Party vis-à-vis its call for a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power. As well, he pointed out that in the position paper they also restated their belief that there were good markets for CANDU technology and that there was some possibility of exporting surplus electric power to the United States. I am concerned about those two aspects, the sale of the CANDU reactor and our technology.

I noted as well that the Conservative statement was somewhat critical of the Liberal Government for selling the Canadian technology to Romania in exchange for Romanian strawberries. I am still concerned about the sale of our nuclear technology to other states. I continue to be concerned about the possible sale of CANDU reactors to Romania, South Korea, Venezuela, Argentina, and all the other places to which our salesmen have gone. Certainly the conditions under which we have made these past sales have been questionable.

As I pointed out in my address, I am concerned about numerous instances in which technology, sold for peaceful purposes, has ultimately been used for the production of warlike materials. A public inquiry should address that question as well.

It is important that we again look at the economics of the nuclear industry, particularly as they relate to sales to the U.S. of our surplus electrical energy. It seems to me that the economics are just not there. For us to get into large-scale production of nuclear power plants in the hope of making some profit by selling the electricity to the U.S. just does not make sense.

In earlier debates, when the Government chose to shut down all the conservation and off-oil programs, I pointed out the per barrel cost of energy equivalents. Venture gas, for example, comes in at $35 a barrel equivalent; Hibernia is $30; Point Lepreau No. 2 reactor is $70 per barrel equivalent. On the conservation side, we have oil which is equivalent to $5 per barrel. I was trying to point out that it is much cheaper to conserve at a cost of around $5 per barrel equivalent rather than going the nuclear route which, at around $70 per barrel equivalent, is the most expensive route. I think it is ludicrous to suggest that we can build nuclear reactors, with their associated problems of waste disposal and environmental protection, and still sell the power produced to the U.S. at a profit. However, if Hon. Members opposite are serious, I plead with them to allow a public inquiry to determine whether these are indeed viable options. Is it viable economically? Is it environmentally safe? Let there be a public inquiry.

One of the things which saddens us is the secrecy surrounding the nuclear industry.

Mr. McDermid: Nonsense.

Mr. de Jong: The Hon. Member says "nonsense".

Mr. McDermid: I certainly do.

Mr. de Jong: I can relate my own personal experience. A number of years ago we had a very serious spill in northern Saskatchewan.

Mr. McDermid: A number of years ago! Things have changed since then.

Mr. de Jong: Not too many years ago. Two or three years ago. A group of my colleagues and I wanted to visit Key Lake and other mines in northern Saskatchewan. We had real difficulty getting into the federal Government controlled mine. We had real difficulty getting the environmental reports. We had real difficulty getting the health and welfare reports. In fact, I still have not received some of the reports I requested. There were difficulties here in Ottawa and in Saskatchewan with the Conservative provincial Government. For them to tell me it is an open society and anything we want is available I say is bunk. When I attempted to get important data relating to the environmental and health and welfare effects I was stonewalled. For Hon. Members across the way to suggest that it is all open means they are being hoodwinked by the industry itself.

There is one phrase which should really sum up this debate: Remember the Titanic.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): A short supplementary.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, in all honesty, that Member can never criticize cabinet Ministers for the way they answer questions because he has certainly not answered my question. The NDP presented a truncated version of our campaign statement. In the process, including in the remarks they have made today, they have tried to convey to the Canadian people that the purpose of our policy statement was to stop nuclear energy from being produced in Canada.

Mr. Fulton: Point of order. What the Hon. Member is saying, as is often the case, is totally false and misleading.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, please.

Mr. Friesen: Their entire debate has been based on the presumption that our campaign promise, in the truncated version they presented, was designed to stop nuclear power generation. It was not that at all. It was a matter of bringing order to the process. The question was: Is the NDP, in its resolution, not misleading the Canadian people in that sense?

I would now like to ask my supplementary question. The Hon. Member suggested an alternative, and it was a good one. Because there would be a shortfall in electrical power generation it would have to be replaced with something. He suggested there should be economies. I think that is a good suggestion, but it would not apply everywhere in the world. There are certain places where cutting back and economizing is not an adequate solution.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Questions and comments are now over. Debate.

Mr. de Jong: Surely I have an opportunity to answer that comment?

Mr. McDermid: You were too long in your last answer.

Mr. de Jong: Does the questioner have the last say?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, please. I recognize the point the Hon. Member is making. It is a 10-minute period for questions and comments and sometimes Members tend to forget that if they ask a question they should be able to expect an answer. Certain Members, while commenting or answering a question, should also bear in mind that other Members may want to make comments or put questions to them. It is not a period for speeches. We are now way over the period for questions and comments and the Hon. Member will have other opportunities during the afternoon, if he wishes, to reply, perhaps indirectly, or to participate in the debate. The Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia).

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, does this not then destroy the spirit of this—

Mr. Friesen: I will have another question afterwards.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Let me say to the Hon. Member, indeed all Members of the House, that I understand full well the point he is making. I think the decision I have come to is in conformity with that point. I take this opportunity to remind all Members that when they put questions or make comments they should bear in mind that other Members will make replies, and they should allow time for such replies. The Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia).

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us today reads as follows:

> That this House urges the Government to immediately initiate a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power.

In putting that motion forward, I suppose the mover and his Party intended to put to the test a commitment made by the Progressive Conservative Party during the last election when, I am told, they said that the Progressive Convervative Party would advocate a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power and open the nuclear power approval process to the public. That was certainly a substantial commitment. Apparently this is one of many promises that were not kept. In this particular field it is a promise which should not be made lightly, considering the implications and the rising expectations which follow a promise of that kind.

I would have preferred that the mover of the motion had added four words to his motion so that it would read, "That this House urges the Government to immediately initiate a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power at home and abroad".

Why do I say that? Because the picture emerging is far from reassuring. There are 26 nations with nuclear power operating a total of some 374 reactors around the world.

As a civilization we have adopted in North America, Europe and other continents, this kind of technology. We must, sooner or later, ask ourselves whether we want to strengthen and accelerate this process, whether we want to examine it, and, if so, what are the options, and whether we want to reduce our dependence on nuclear power.

I would have preferred a motion that had been global rather than limited to the situation in Canada. I do not know whether we can launch an investigation of this kind, ignoring what is happening around us on this continent and in other parts of the globe. Why is that? I am saying that because the recent serious incident in Tchernobyl has demonstrated the consequences of an explosion or a meltdown is such that it affects the global community. It is not like a railway accident or a fire in an urban centre. It is an event that has far reaching and long-term consequences well beyond the boundaries of the nation where the melt down or accident occurred.

How can we preserve the human race and ensure the health of present and future generations? I must tell you that the present situation leaves very much to be desired. We have created, in an effort through the United Nations in Vienna some years ago, an organization called the International Atomic Energy Agency. That organization was created with a very clear purpose in mind. It was created in order to ensure that nuclear reactors built for peaceful purposes, anywhere in the world, would not be used for military purposes. In that respect I suppose the Atomic Energy Commission in Vienna has performed reasonably well. It has probably fulfilled its mandate, but only within that very narrow scope I mentioned earlier.

The question is, how can we use this existing agency for the protection of health in case of accidents, explosions and meltdowns of this nature in the future? Number one, there are at the present time no internationally agreed upon standards of safety. Every country sets its own standards, and hopefully enforces them, evidently not always with great success, otherwise we would not have had Chernobyl, we would not have had Three Mile Island and we would not have had other known or even perhaps unknown accidents in the history of the nuclear industry.

The question is raised, how do we as a global community develop standards of safety that can be accepted by all nations and become the basic rules of acceptable performance in the nuclear industry all over the world, not just in one country? Secondly, is who is going to enforce them? Although we have the Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna we do not have in that agency the muscle or the teeth required to perform that policing role. Until there is an enforcement agency that ensures that the standards which have been agreed upon are enforced, respected, and put into place, we will be living in an uncertain world. We have 26 nations, as I mentioned to you earlier, with 374 reactors as a global total, each one happily operating independently from the others with different standards, which may be good, but which may also be very shaky, and with no international co-operation to ensure that these operations are safe.

If Chernobyl has taught us anything, it is that whichever nation operates nuclear reactors it has a responsibility to its own citizens, as well as to the neighbouring nations. Otherwise you would not have at the present time, as is the case in Europe, the stopping of cattle and food products at the border between east and west. You would not have grazing prohibitions in some countries until a certain date in the month of May in order to prevent the radiation from moving into milk, and therefore, into the human body. You would not have a number of measures that have been taken in the last 10 days in order to protect health outside the Soviet Union from an event that has taken place inside. You can see the implications and the repercussions that take place in neighbouring nations as a result of actions taken in one nation and crossing the oceans, so to speak, without respect for boundaries in other continents.

It would seem that an examintaion of the future of nuclear power, limited to Canada, would serve a very limited purpose at this stage, considering how many countries have advanced, considering how many countries have committed themselves, like France, for instance, to having some 400 nuclear reactors in place by the end of the century in order to meet their energy requirements.

There is a global situation here that requires some attention. This is why in recent days I have urged the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark), to take an initiative in Canada's name at the UN to see whether there are ways in which we can perform a leading role—considering also the reputation that we have in the global community—in bringing all the interested nations to the table. These should include not only those with nuclear reactor nations, 26 of them, but also the others. We could in this way attempt to produce the regulations and the enforcement standards I referred to earlier as a global initiative. Canada could perform a first class role in this respect. I submit that it has an opportunity to do so. I submit to you that it should also take this opportunity in the name of all those who are very preoccupied, and quite understandably so, as a result of the Tchernobyl event.

That is one observation which comes to mind in reading this particular motion by the Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), whom I congratulate for having taken this fine initiative.

The second thought which comes to mind when reading this particular motion is that I would prefer a public consultation, rather than an inquiry, in a forum where over the next couple of years we would consider the future energy needs of Canada, looking at perhaps the year 2020. If you like we could look at the year 2010. The Government of Canada, in an unusually enlightened manner, considering its performance these days, could somehow reach out and say to the public, "We want to know what your thoughts are as to our energy requirements by a certain year?". That would probably correspond with the emergence of a new generation, the youngsters who are now in school.

We would like to know how much we should depend on oil or gas or nuclear energy and how much we should depend on renewable sources, biomass and other sources of energy about which I am not very knowledgeable.

We should somehow focus the attention of the nation on a projected date and eventually, after having carried out public consultation and consultations with various industries and all the sectors interested in energy, the matter will come to rest in Ottawa and the Government would then eventually publish a plan for Canada's energy needs by, let us say, the year 2010. Through that plan we would have an indication of what our requirements are, which would not be a bad thing to know—we do not seem to know it today—and how these requirements should be broken down into the four or five categories I mentioned previously.

I suspect with that kind of consultation, Canadians would be able to tell us as a Parliament and as a Government whether we should maintain our dependence on nuclear energy, whether we should reduce our dependency or whether we should even phase it out. It is quite possible that many interesting ideas would emerge in that process. That has always been our experience when we were in Government whenever we launched a broad public consultation process.

The plan which has emerged in Sweden for its energy requirements by the year 2010—I am just going by memory—has led that country to conclude it should gradually phase out its dependence on nuclear power. That was a wish expressed by the population in consultation with the various sectors. What would happen in Canada? We do not know. However, it certainly has merit as a process, for any democracy at a certain point to look at its long-term requirements and the future and listen to the public about how we should specifically target our requirements by a certain date with respect to oil and gas, nuclear power and renewables such as sun, wind and biomass at large. I think that would be a very healthy exercise and would be very revealing.

I noticed in the Montreal Gazette of May 10 an article by Warren Caragata of the Canadian Press entitled: "Candu reactors are not meltdown-proof". Mr. Caragata quotes Mr. Domaratski, director general of reactor regulation at the Atomic Energy Control Board, as acknowledging that. He said:

—a meltdown could produce a "catastrophe" involving thousands of deaths.

But he said the risk of a meltdown is so remote, and the chances of major releases of radiation are so small, there's no point in trying to engineer a reactor building to guard against those possibilities.

I learn about these things from the newspapers as does the public and I find statements of this kind a bit unsettling because of the confused message they deliver. I suspect that Canadians at large when they read reports like this would wonder as well. Thank God, so far in Pickering, we have a nuclear plant which has a record of regular performance without accident. The production in Ontario of nuclear power alone corresponds to some 30 per cent of the total requirements of the people in that province.

Over the years, the source of nuclear electricity has become of major importance. We have progressed quite a lot in our dependency on nuclear power in certain parts of the country. But all of a sudden, and I suspect this is the reason we have the motion before us today, the whole dependency on nuclear power has become questionable, and understandably so in the light of the consequences which can be caused by a major disaster. I do not know how well we can change our course of action at this point, having already built what we have built, but certainly we are still in time to determine our future and decide whether we stay where we are without adding to the number of nuclear reactors, some of which are being planned in some quarters.

Even if we continued with our dependency on nuclear power, we could still begin a policy of gradual reduction of that dependence over the long term, if that is the will of Canadians. That could be achieved if we were to have a sufficiently long span of time. If we do that, we will have to be quite sure of the alternatives on which we will depend. I am told by scientists that in the long term there are opportunities shaping up in the field of energy by way of fission, that technology is advancing in the direction of producing energy by fission. This will permit the production of energy in the quantities we need without having to engage in processes like nuclear power, which are so disturbing in terms of realities.

I would imagine that the nuclear industry at this stage would do itself a great favour if it were to come finally to a conclusion in its research on how to dispose of spent fuel rods. There is a substantial quantity of these fuel rods accumulating at reactor plants in Ontario. This is temporary disposal in expectation of permanent disposition, which is the subject of intensive studies by the relevant authorities. I think the concern of Canadians would be partially allayed if the disposition of spent fuel rods could be resolved soon, so as to at least demonstrate that the industry is capable of disposing of its waste in a proper and environmentally acceptable manner.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the Hon. Member's presentation. I found myself agreeing with a great deal of what he had to say. I would like his view on the following. With regard to the whole area of nuclear energy we keep hearing from various sources, officials who represent the industry and now, most recently, from the Government, that everything is fine. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) indicated that the matter is being studied, but to date she and her colleagues have confidence in our own nuclear reactors as they operate in Canada.

I could not help but think back to a time, not many weeks ago, in the House when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) stood up and said that everything was fine with the two western banks, that the depositors and so on need not worry. He said: "Everything is fine. I am the expert. I am the Minister of Finance and I know these things". The Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) then stood up and said: "I am second-in-command here. I have expertise in banking. The banks are sound and stable. There is no worry at all". Even the Inspector General of Banks, the top-ranking public servant in banking matters, said on many occasions: "There is nothing to worry about. These are fine, upstanding, strong and stable banks". Then the Governor of the Bank of Canada stood up and said: "The banks are fine". These were statements made by the most senior financial officials in Canada. They said that our banks, in this case the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank, were perfectly sound. They were absolutely and totally wrong.

When we hear officials in the nuclear industry now stand up and say: "Everything is fine and safe, there is no need to worry, we have all safeguards built in", and when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources stands up and says: "Everything is fine, we have full confidence in the system", one begins to realize why we are less than confident in their words.

This is what I want to ask the Hon. Member, is not the nuclear industry existing on a whole set of lies in which people say that the industry is, in fact, safe when no one knows for sure if it is or not? This is why we are arguing that, not knowing for sure, we should not proceed to develop such, if you will, a horrible industry in terms of what it can do to humanity. Is this not an industry based on lies, lies from whatever country, at whatever level of the bureaucracy, either here or in other international spheres?

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) attributes to me a greater knowledge than I have in my capacity to analyze the industry's qualifications. I am inclined to think that the industry is comprised of professionals who believe in what they are doing. They have produced energy for Canada according to a technology which has its good features and its negative features. Therefore I do not think it would be wise to describe the people in that industry in the way in which the Hon. Member has, although I can understand that he wants to make a point.

The fact is that the industry in Canada is not operating in isolation. There are nuclear reactors which have been built, are being built and which will be built outside Canada, in substantial numbers. While all this is taking place there is no international set of rules on how to protect ourselves as a species while all this is going on. I do not consider this to be a Mephistophelean plan being undertaken by a few evil-minded individuals, but by technicians who are pursuing a certain technology which is available, which mankind has discovered and which—

Mr. Riis: Which they say is safe.

Mr. Caccia: —they claim is safe.

Having said that, there is nothing wrong with politicians displaying a healthy degree of scepticism on behalf of the public. Judging by the competent questions the Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap asks of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson), I am sure that is something of which the Hon. Member is capable. I say that it is good, particularly in the Opposition, in order to demonstrate that we want to probe and press any statement which comes from the government side, including statements with regard to this particular sector.

In conclusion, as I understand the issue at this stage at least, I am more pre-occupied with the horrendous vacuum which surrounds these 26 nations which have 374 reactors, in that there are no game rules for international protection in view of the international consequences of disasters. Perhaps I am somewhat narrow-minded, but we all have our weaknesses.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question to ask of the Hon. Member who gave what I thought was a very good and interesting speech. I am sure he is aware that motion before the House is for Parliament, and in particular for the Government, to consider having a full public inquiry into nuclear power, as was promised during the election campaign. We have heard and seen in the press differing views from different members of the Hon. Member's Party. I would like to know whether the Liberal Party has a solid position in relation to having or not having a full public inquiry into nuclear power.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, I hope that at the next convention, which will be held here in Ottawa in November, we will tackle this very important issue. I would also like to add that in tackling it I would like to see it approached as an over-all issue; that is, one with respect to the importance of determining for Canada the elements of an energy plan with a certain date in mind. In this way it can be established how much we want to depend on each of the components within an energy plan, including nuclear, as opposed to singling out one.

Why am I saying this? I think that it is a more productive exercise to look at a distant date. This will make the issue less political, since we do not know who will be in power in the year 2010. Therefore the exercise can be somewhat cooler. It can include the examination of the four or five components which I mentioned, oil and gas, biomass, solar, wind, nuclear and so forth. The Canadian public can be actively engaged in the exercise in an attempt and read what our requirements will be as a total. Then we can break that requirement down by sector and get a reading, a sense of direction from the public that we would consult. I hope that we might be able to do that, although I cannot give the Hon. Member a guarantee that it will occur at our convention here in Ottawa.

Mr. Ravis: Mr. Speaker, I do not have a question for the Hon. Member, but I would like to make a comment as someone who hails from the largest uranium-producing province in this country, if not in the world, that is, Saskatchewan. One thing I found decided after listening, not only to the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) but the other two speakers from the NDP Party who preceded him, was that if in fact the industry is made up of a lot of people who tell lies, then I guess I have to ask the following rhetorical question. What happens to someone who spends $600 million of public money in Saskatchewan to open up these mines and who encourages the investment of literally millions of dollars from the international market-place, and from the mining industry, when we now hear from the Leader of the NDP Party in Saskatchewan that maybe these mines might be closed down? It is no wonder that the industry is in a great state of confusion.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think my hon. friend made an inadvertent error when he referred to the NDP Party—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, order.

Mr. Riis: NDP Party would mean the New Democratic Party Party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, please. Has the Hon. Member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ravis) finished his comment?

• (1550)

Mr. Ravis: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to make a comment. I did not have a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Very rapidly, the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia).

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, the comment requires a quick clarification. The Hon. Member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ravis) attributed to me a statement which I did not make when describing the industry. Therefore, it was made by someone else. Second, I am not aware of any decision made in Saskatchewan by the NDP to eliminate or even reduce its use and dependence on nuclear energy.

Hon. Bob Layton (Minister of State (Mines)): Mr. Speaker, in listening to the presentations made by my colleagues today, I was taken back only a few days to the visit I made on behalf of the Government of Canada to Romania last week. The President of Romania, President Ceausescu, is an outspoken world leader for peaceful use of nuclear energy and power—

Mr. Caccia: But he hasn't got the money to pay. That's his problem.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order.

Mr. Layton: In the last 15 or 17 years, the Government of Romania has examined the energy needs of that country. Let us just imagine having lived in Bucharest last winter and having been permitted only one 40-watt light bulb. This was done in order to bring that country's economy into balance with its ability to pay. It is reducing its international debt. In putting themselves through that, Romanians have made a decision, with all of the technology at the disposal of that country and with the Government's capability to negotiate, to acquire the technology which Canadians developed, the CANDU nuclear reactor.

Our visit was coincidental with the accident at Chernobyl. Romania is within the 500-kilometre ring that was uncertain for public safety. Notwithstanding this, that society is totally committed to its need for nuclear energy.

We visited one single site at which four units of CANDU capacity are being constructed at the same time. There is confidence that Canadians and Canadian technology are capable and safe.

You will recall, Mr. Speaker, having shared in those discussions with the Romanian leaders, that the one thing they were looking for from Canada was the reassurance and reminder that, when dealing with danger, quality control in all its elements, including design, construction, equipment, installation, operation and supervision, will become more and more essential. Canadians working around the world, particularly in such a strange environment as eastern Europe, are looked to with confidence for that kind of quality.

We as a Government are concerned with safety for workers. We are concerned with safety for the public. We are doing this by demanding and rigidly applying all of the standards we have developed along with the Atomic Energy Control Board. It would be very easy to say: "Let's put a moratorium on the nuclear energy industry. Let's close it up. Let's go to some other alternative". However, all of the soft alternatives like solar, wind and wave energy are, as anyone with an engineering background will conclude, very limited resources compared to the demands our society today makes on its energy systems. Low-cost oil and gas is inevitably limited. Alternatives such as coal introduce other environmental concerns and costs.

When Canada shares its advanced, reliable and Canadian developed technology with Romania, Korea or Argentina, we do it with a sense of responsibility. The Government and the business community work together to ensure that the country that is applying that technology will receive our best counsel. We have confidence in our skills and technologies. That includes not simply the front end of the cycle at mining.

I was happy to hear the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) refer to the tremendous uranium mining industry and our ability to refine uranium for the market-place. I will reassure the Hon. Member that it is our policy to refine our resources as much as possible here in Canada.

Mr. Waddell: Including uranium?

Mr. Layton: Including uranium.

I was a little puzzled by the speeches by representatives of the New Democratic Party. They seem to be out of step with reality.

Mr. McDermid: You shouldn't. It's the same old wacky—

Mr. Layton: Same old NDP. They talk as if there were not a nuclear energy industry in Canada. A few moments ago, the Hon. Member for Saskatoon East (Mr. Ravis) said that Saskatchewan is without any doubt the most richly endowed resource centre for uranium in the world. That is something that has been given to Canada to share safely with the world.

I welcome the opportunity to speak on this opposition motion. It is a motion that allows us to put the facts on the table, and the facts are clear when it comes to the issue of nuclear power in Canada. First, let us look at the differences between Canada's CANDU system and the nuclear systems of the Soviet Union.

Over the past 26 years since Canada entered the nuclear age, the CANDU system has constantly out-performed almost every system in the world, both in terms of generating capacity and safety. Of the 212 large power reactors in the world, six of Canada's 18 CANDUs were in the top 10 in terms of lifetime performance.

Our capacity of 11,000 megawatts exceeds that of the entire James Bay hydro-electric complex and ranks Canada sixth in the world ahead of Great Britain and 15 other OECD countries. Nuclear power met 13.5 per cent of all Canadian electrical demand last year and almost 40 per cent of Ontario's demand in 1985. In other words, we believe that nuclear power in Canada is here to stay.

Nuclear power provides direct employment for 35,000 people. It generates well over $1 billion worth of electricity each year at costs considerably less than the next best alternatives, imported coal or oil.

The Canadian nuclear industry has always been aware of the potential hazards of producing energy from nuclear fission. It has always met the strict regulations of its licensing authority, the Atomic Energy Control Board. As a result, the CANDU nuclear reactor has a safety record virtually unequalled by any other industry. In 133 reactor years of CANDU operation in Canada, there has never been an injury of any kind to a member of the public. There has never been a release of radioactivity of a measurable exposure from any Canadian nuclear station to the public. In over 100 million person-hours of work carried out, no one has been killed or injured through the production of nuclear power.

Since the early 1970s, Ontario Hydro has tried to keep radioactive emissions from CANDU nuclear plants to 1 per cent or less of the regulatory limit set by the AECB.

• (1600)

The AECB annual regulatory limit has never been exceeded, and generally Ontario Hydro has met its self-imposed limit. Regular monitoring shows that radioactive emissions from nuclear power stations are only a fraction of emissions from natural sources and have a negligible effect upon the environment.

A person living on the boundary of a CANDU station would receive only one millirem of radiation per year. This compares with about 100 millirem per year from natural sources. The maximum permissible annual dose for an individual member of the public is 500 millirem.

The CANDU safety approach recognizes that systems and human beings are not perfect. CANDU plant design minimizes the effects of such failings. In practice, good design ensures that an accident is unlikely to occur. This is coupled with strict quality control during manufacture and installation, and with periodic inspection of the major components during the lifetime of the plant.

Information about Canada's nuclear system is widely available. The industry is regulated by an independent body with an expert staff, the AECB. All unusual incidents at nuclear power plants, however minor, are reported to the AECB, and the reports are available to the media and the public. There is a continuing review of reactor safety to build in lessons learned from normal operation and accidents.

The Chernobyl reactor is different from CANDU reactors. Nonetheless, our officials will study that accident, looking for ways to improve our safeguards.

There are serious public concerns about the Tchernobyl accident. Health and Welfare Canada is monitoring conditions to protect the health of Canadians. Radiation is considered a particular hazard in many peoples' minds, perhaps because of its association with cancer. Critics insist that there is no safe level of radiation; even small doses carry some risk with them. In order to be on the safe side, regulators accept this as true and set their permissible levels accordingly. However, it takes a significant dose of radiation to produce a significant risk of cancer. In the same sense, there is absolutely no safe level of doing anything, even driving to work.

The impact of low level radiation on health is so small that it is very difficult to measure. We all receive a dose of about 300 millirem each year from natural and medical sources. This is much more than the few millirem we could receive each year from living next door to a nuclear plant or a uranium mine.

By comparison, a cross-Canada return jet flight would give an additional dose of a few millirem. This is equivalent to the health risk incurred by smoking a single cigarette. A larger additional dose could be received by simply moving from one location in Canada to another because of the variation in natural radiation background.

Finally, let me come to the question of whether we need a royal commission to investigate all the implications of uranium mining and the nuclear fuel cycle in Canada. There has been a large number of public inquiries into nuclear power in Canada in recent years, and their proceedings and reports have contributed to the information and analysis available to the public.

The Ontario Royal Commission on Electric Power Planning, known as the Porter Commission, published a comprehensive set of reports after five years of work and several million dollars worth of expenditures. The Cluff Lake Board of Inquiry has also reported. These two bodies have taken a very broad view of their mandate and have considered international implications, as well as the moral and ethical aspects of the entire nuclear fuel cycle. In each case they have endorsed the use of nuclear power.

In Ontario a parliamentary select committee on hydro affairs investigated a number of aspects of the nuclear industry—electrical demand, reactor safety, and waste management practices, including the joint Canada-Ontario program for the management of spent reactor fuel wastes and the problem of uranium mine tailings. The committee found that Ontario's nuclear reactors were acceptably safe, thereby justifying the confidence the Government has in the future of the CANDU nuclear industry in Canada and around the world.

Uranium mining and upgrading are important sectors of Canada's great mining industry. After iron ore, copper, zinc, nickel, and gold, uranium is the most important mineral mined in Canada. Canada has a reputation for reliability and quality in terms of its deliveries around the world. We do not only sell the technology which permits the peaceful use of nuclear energy, we also have that great raw material, uranium, which can go into making those plants work. Safe and secure disposal of radioactive waste is a commitment of the Government. We are taking action on this commitment.

On behalf of the Government, I believe that the proposal of the opposition Party for an urgent and immediate study of the nuclear industry is unnecessary at this time.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the Minister seems to make it sound as if he has absolute, total confidence in the Atomic Energy Control Board and in the industry saying that there is nothing to worry about, that no one should blink an eye. He and other members of his Party ran on a platform which indicated that they would call for a full public inquiry into nuclear power. I should like to ask the Minister whether or not he agrees with the following quotation. I remind him that he ran on it and was elected on it. In part the book entitled Myth of the Peaceful Atom reads as follows:

> The power base of the Canadian nuclear lobby originates in the upper echelons of the AECL and Eldorado. Most of the key figures in the Atomic Energy Control Board (AECB) come from these two Crown corporations, as do most of the top Canadian government advisors on nuclear policy. In 1970, the Canadian Senate Committee on Science Policy declared that it was "startled to learn that most of the members of the AECB prove to be senior representatives of the very agencies" which the AECB is supposed to control.
> The AECB has, as a result, come under heavy criticism. The Paris-based Organization for Co-operation and Development has complained that the cozy relationship with the nuclear industry is an "implicit conflict of interest". The OECD also pointed out both the AECB and the AECL reports to the same Minister—Energy, Mines and Resources. The British Columbia Medical Association called the Board "unfit to regulate" and before the B.C. Royal Commission on Uranium Mining stated: "It is obvious Canadians cannot continue to allow vested interest ministries and regulatory bodies to promulgate maximum permissible dose limits . . . A review of the appropriateness of current radiation exposure limits in effect in Canada is long overdue".

The Minister is responsible for mining. He was elected upon calling for a full public inquiry into nuclear power. Does he not think that we should have one in relation to this evidence?

Mr. Layton: Mr. Speaker, I should like to respond to the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton). Yes, there is an element of risk, and that was certainly carried through my remarks earlier. There is no activity in which mankind engages involving equipment or movement that does not involve some element of risk. I believe we have the capacity—and we have demonstrated it—to control that risk to acceptable levels. We constantly learn from experience, our own and others, to introduce more safety into our lives. Despite the risks to which we are exposed today, radiation being among them, we all live longer. I think mankind, all human beings, has a particular capacity to learn from and grow with the changes which we face.

It is not an absolute confidence. It is a confidence in our ability to respond with the skills we have to control the environment in which we live. This does not mean that there will not be some mistakes. I believe in the Canadian approach to this. I shared these feelings and found myself to be in harmony with the others who were engaged in the discussions a week ago in Romania. They have a confidence in the way Canada presents itself, the way our technology is developing, and the way it is administered. They are in a hurry to have that power. The one thing they would like more than anything is to turn on the machines. Our advice is that they can do so only when everything has been properly quality controlled and inspected. Our Romanian partners are accepting those conditions.

It is a confidence that is based on a recognition that there is always a risk. I do not know when there would not be some reference to a risk. This one is a particular risk and you have to learn to live with it. Some Members have heard the discussions that we have had in past months on the asbestos industry. Is it ever absolutely without risk? No, it isn't but there is a controlled use approach which makes it safe for the worker, the miner and the public. I believe the same principle applies here.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister a question. The Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) made the statement that the nuclear industry was made up of people who tell lies.

Mr. Fulton: Unfit to regulate.

Mr. McDermid: Let me ask the Hon. Minister if that is not attacking some of the most able scientists, engineers, medical practitioners who are involved in the industry. Also, doesn't his comment bring into disrepute the hearings on the nuclear industry carried out by the churches in Toronto as late as 1984?

Mr. Riis: In support of it?

Mr. McDermid: An impartial panel concluded that nuclear power was an important and viable option among available energy resources. Also doesn't the Member's comment attack the Vatican which four years ago supported nuclear power as an alternate source of energy?

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I have a comment and a question. I heard the Minister talk about Romania, Korea and Argentina. There are fine engineers, no one is disputing that. We have come down a long slope to where we are scraping the bottom of the barrel trying to sell reactors. How does the Minister feel about that? We have to go to these regimes which are perhaps not the most stable regimes in the world desperately finding sales for a bankrupt industry. I would like the Minister to address that point. Would he also address another problem? Does he deny that he ran on the Conservative Party platform which advocated a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power? Did he or did he not run on that platform? Did he fraudulantly run on that platform? If the industry is so safe, so productive and so needed for jobs why are the Tories afraid to have an inquiry into how good it is?

Mr. Layton: Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that the call for a public inquiry at this time—

Mr. Riis: It was your call two years ago.

Mr. Layton: Members will recall, as read out by my colleague earlier today, that the Party policy included the reference "—and have opened the nuclear power approval process to the public".

Mr. Fulton: You haven't done that either. You are a hypocrite.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order.

Mr. Layton: We believe there are good markets for CANDU technology, but that means achieving entry into those markets.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. The Hon. Member called the Minister a hypocrite. I believe that is unparliamentary language and the comment should be withdrawn immediately.

Mr. Fulton: It isn't unparliamentary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, please. Would the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) like to withdraw that comment immediately.

Mr. Fulton: I will, if it is unparliamentary, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Layton: Mr. Speaker, in the excitement of debate, it was not noticed. I accept the withdrawal.

Mr. Fulton: You ran on a fraudulant basis.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order.

Mr. Layton: The people of Canada and around the world are having their full inquiry right now into nuclear energy. The Tchernobyl disaster has brought the matter to the forefront.

Mr. Riis: Is that what you meant in the campaign?

Mr. Layton: As for Canada having to scrape the bottom of the barrel, Mr. Speaker, we have developed the finest technology, in my opinon, in this field.

Mr. Riis: Prove it.

Mr. Layton: It has been proved in the market-place.

Mr. Riis: You can buy drugs in the market-place.

Mr. Layton: It has right now been proved in performance. As to competing with other interests, be they French or American, there is no question we are in international competition. We don't win them all. We are not the biggest players. We do not have the resources to put behind our marketing that some other countries have, but we are doing a good job.

Mr. Riis: Even bribery didn't work.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): A very short question or comment by the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster).

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the Minister on his statement that he would stop exemptions to the further upgrading. Another Minister this morning said that the article in the NuclearFuel magazine of April 21, 1986 was not accurate, that the Government was not negotiating to get rid of the further upgrading of uranium in Canada policy. Could the Minister just clarify under what set of circumstances he will give exemption? Will it be less than 5 per cent or 10 per cent of the uranium exports? What assurances can he give to the uranium refining industry that this policy will not be bargained away in the free trade negotiations with the United States?

Mr. Layton: Mr. Speaker, let me start by correcting something. There has not been a statement that says there will be no exemptions to the upgrading policy that we would like to see applied. The three Ministers responsible have agreed, after discussions with the industry at the mining level and at the processing level, to find a formula to do away with all of the delays coming into the system. They agreed to this some months ago. It was put into effect last fall and all Parties are living with it. In particular, El Dorado Nuclear. Let me read two passages as follows:

"whose sale to the private sector is now under consideration, is one of Canada's major uranium producers. Our company . . . ", said one of their directors, " . . . was not overly affected by the recession and stagnation of the market of nuclear plants. We will continue to sell our uranium, in addition to processing foreign natural uranium into nuclear fuel used in foreign electrical power plants."

[English]

El Dorado Nuclear Corporation is quite prepared to meet the international competition. It has told us so.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 82—REQUEST FOR PUBLIC INQUIRY— NUCLEAR POWER

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Fulton:

That this House urges the government to immediately initiate a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, as the preceding New Democratic Members have pointed out, and as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) has been forced to acknowledge, the motion before the House today is taken verbatim from the Progressive Conservative 1984 Campaign Handbook. At page 113 it outlined the Conservative position on nuclear power. It reads:

We advocate a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power—

We think that was written solely for the purpose of getting elected. When the Conservatives actually got into office they quickly forgot the solemn promises they had made to the people of Canada. They got power for themselves—their only real goal—and everything else went by the boards. Another sacred trust bit the dust.

• (1620)

Why does the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources think we used these words in our motion today? We used them because they are precisely the same words as were in the Conservative campaign promise. We in the New Democratic Party now find ourselves pleading with the Government to live up to the promises it made to the people of Canada. At a minimum, the Government should live up to its promises.

This is nothing new. It seems that Canadians are now coming to expect this kind of dishonesty from the Conservative Government. Nowhere has this transparent reneging on campaign promises been shown up more clearly than in the actions of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Immediately after the September, 1984, election, Energy Probe, the Toronto-based watch-dog group which has for years vigorously monitored energy policy development in Canada, wrote to the Minister to encourage her to follow through with her Party's clearly enunciated promise to launch a "full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power". The Minister rebuffed Energy Probe.

My colleague, the Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper), then took up the cause of Energy Probe, and on April 1 of last year wrote to the Minister of Energy requesting yet again that the Conservatives honour their promise to have a "full public inquiry into the nuclear industry". That was on April 1. Perhaps the response of the Minister was more akin to an April Fool's joke. She replied:

I (do) not intend to broaden my consultations beyond the industry and the provinces in order to arrive at a decision on this matter. I have consulted with these sources and it is my view that a national inquiry on this topic is not a high priority at this time.

That is a complete reversal. It is a complete and total repudiation of the promises on the basis of which the Conservatives had made their grab for power only a few months before that. This is a sorry track record. We had hoped that perhaps the events of the last few weeks in Ukraine, to which the Minister of State for Mines (Mr. Layton) has just alluded, might have impinged upon the Minister's consideration of what constitutes, in her words, "a high priority at this time". The disaster at Chernobyl, and the even greater catastrophe of a reactor core meltdown which was so narrowly avoided there, has driven home to all sane people the horrendous dangers inherent in reliance on nuclear power.

The Minister of Energy talked about risks. There are risks in everything in life. There is the risk of getting hit by a car when you walk across the street. Look at the risks of having a reactor meltdown in Pickering or somewhere like that. It means death for the people around Toronto. You die.

Mr. McDermid: What nonsense.

Mr. Waddell: Let's not mince words.

Mr. McDermid: You fear-monger.

Mr. Waddell: If there is a reactor meltdown in Canada people will die. Whole cities could die. The world could die. I see Members laughing. They think it is a joke. It is no joke.

Mr. McDermid: You are absolutely irresponsible.

Mr. Waddell: It means death if there is a major accident in this country. The world came close in Chernobyl and we thank God that that did not go any further. We still do not know all the ramifications of that. I am not mincing words here. That is what it means.

It appears that the only result of the Chernobyl incident is that the Minister has used it to stall on the Party's promise. We all listened to her speech today in the House. She said that any decision about the need for a public inquiry into the role of nuclear energy in Canada must await reports from scientists about Chernobyl. I find this very strange. Is the Minister laying claim to some special Conservative ability to look into the future, some ability to see that when they wrote their campaign promise in 1984? Was there some small print that we missed in that campaign promise in 1984? Did they decide then that they would not implement their promise until a major nuclear disaster occurred some two years after they made their promise?

I have in front of me the appropriate page from the Conservative handbook which contains the campaign promise. It does not read: "We advocate a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power following receipt of a full report on a major nuclear accident that will occur at a graphite-lined reactor at Chernobyl in Ukraine in the spring of 1986". I cannot find that anywhere. The position which the Minister of Energy enunciated in the House today was plainly ludicrous. As I understood it, she said that while we may still have an inquiry we have to wait to see what happens in Chernobyl. That is a fraud. That is treading water to get out of this debate because the Government is embarrassed about reneging on its campaign promise.

Mr. Fulton: That's why their Members are quitting.

Mr. Riis: Or going to jail.

Mr. Waddell: Much has been made in some quarters of the tardiness with which the Soviet Government came to terms with the scope of the Chernobyl disaster and the delays in the Soviets getting vital information to other governments and atomic control agencies. This is an important matter.

Those who watched The Journal on CBC television a couple of weeks ago may recall an interview with a British nuclear scientist who observed in this connection that the top Soviet leadership had reacted with considerable dispatch once they had been fully acquainted with the nature and import of the problem. He, of course, defined the problem as the bureaucracy, the politicians and leaders getting to know the extent of the problem because they must go through various levels of bureaucracy. This is a phenomenon which we have in Canada. A couple of Members on both sides of the House have alluded to that in this debate.

It was suggested that we were doing something bad when we raised the secrecy of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and the Atomic Energy Control Board. I ask Members opposite to recall when, in 1977-78, the present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) had to sue Atomic Energy to get information.

Mr. McDermid: Give him credit. It's available today.

Mr. Waddell: I give him credit. It was so secret that he had to go to court. A House of Commons committee has talked about AECL witnesses as being reluctant, evasive, and uncooperative in many ways. This is the nature of bureaucrats in this particular field. There is a tendency toward this in bureaucracy.

We have also seen another tendency, and that is to always have a kind of Pollyanna approach that there is not going to be an accident. I want to read to you from the Louisville, Kentucky, Courier-Journal of Monday, April 23, 1979. This is an account of a meeting in Moscow by American Congressman Michel of Illinois who was talking to the Soviets. Michel said:

—the Soviets do not plan to curtail construction of their nuclear power plants, which they feel are safer than those in use in the United States.

"They feel their safety provisions are such that they can proceed not only with the current model (of reactors) but with a fast breeder reactor.

During the Three Mile Island crisis the Soviet press said their nuclear power plants have a safer cooling system and are run with a better view toward safety than are the American plants.

Does that not sound familiar?

Mr. McDermid: Who said that?

Mr. Waddell: This is the Soviets commenting on Three Mile Island.

Mr. McDermid: Yeah, and they told us there wasn't an accident for a week after it happened.

Mr. Waddell: They told us they had safe plants and that they would not have an accident. Is this not the same kind of stuff that we are hearing from the Government today? Make no mistake, we do not want to have a nuclear accident, but we want to ensure that it does not happen in Canada.

We are having this debate today because in this way the Canadian public can see the dangers. People in my constituency are afraid of the rain that is falling. People in Ottawa were afraid of that. There are real fears. They are examining food in Europe. This is the time for the world to think about what is going on. While we are talking about the much vaunted superiority of the North American nuclear reactor design we should recognize that it is generally acknowledged that the Three Mile Island reactor came within a half hour of suffering a full-scale reactor core meltdown. I quote John Swaigen, an environmental lawyer from Toronto who said:

There are many uncomfortable parallels between the situation in the Soviet Union and in Canada. Both are Arctic countries with similar climates. Both have nuclear facilities sited near major cities.

• (1630)

Our scientists assure us that our nuclear plants are safe. So did theirs. In this field at least we share the Soviet Union's preoccupation with secrecy.

There is a reactor in Hanford, near the Columbia River in the State of Washington, just south of British Columbia. I raised this in the House today. It is a graphite reactor like Chernobyl. It is uncontained like Chernobyl. It is 40 years old and has been described by Dr. Rosalie Bertell, a research scientist and consultant to the U.S. Nuclear Regulatory Commission, as an accident waiting to happen. She wants to have this reactor closed. She says it is "so old anything can happen". I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs about this today. He did not even know that his Department had been talking to the Americans about this reactor. Those are the kinds of things we would like to see in the inquiry. Are we prepared for a disaster in Canada? Are we talking to the Americans about their old reactors? Are we looking into the safety of our reactors as well as theirs? Are we looking into the burial of spent fuel? Are we looking into the dangers of low radiation tailings, as my friend from Skeena pointed out? How much are we paying for these reactors? What are the alternatives? Can we get into energy conservation? All these questions need to be addressed.

The NDP have put forward other Bills on this subject. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) put forward a Private Members' Bill to establish a moratorium on the continued development of nuclear power in Canada. We have been trying consistently to get a full inquiry into this matter.

I want to reply to something raised by some Conservative Members. They have said it is going to be difficult to take us out of the nuclear system. I agree that some hard decisions will have to be made. Jobs are on the line. Scientific prestige is on the line. However, leadership means that you have to face these kinds of decisions. There are other answers. The Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) talked about alternative jobs involved in cleaning up the tailings and decommissioning the plants. Working people do not have to be put out on the street. Sweden has had to face this problem. Like Canada, Sweden has developed a reliance on nuclear-generated electricity. As a matter of fact, over 40 per cent of Sweden's electricity is currently nuclear generated. In Canada in 1983, it was about 12 per cent to 13 per cent. Sweden is far more heavily dependent than Canada on nuclear power, and any movement away from nuclear power would cause far greater economic dislocation than that facing Canada.

In saying that, I take into account the severe impact such a decision would have on particular regions of the country. I fully recognize that Ontario projects that by 1990 nearly 60 per cent of electricity produced by Ontario Hydro will be nuclear generated. However, I think the Swedish experience is directly applicable to Canada, particularly Ontario. In Sweden the major commitments to proceed with nuclear power were made between 1956 and 1970. Then questions emerged as to the wisdom of doing this. A public debate ensued. That culminated in 1980 with a national referendum in which the Swedes decided to abandon nuclear energy. This, of course, is the reason the Government is afraid to have an inquiry. The powers that be do not want an inquiry that would lead to a public debate which might in turn lead to the Canadian people doing something about nuclear power.

As a result of that referendum, the Swedish Parliament set up guidelines for the phasing out of nuclear-generated power. The guidelines stipulated that no further construction of nuclear reactors would be undertaken beyond the 12 existing or under advanced construction at the time. The last reactor would be taken out of service by no later than 2010, after an estimated operating period of 25 years. They set a sunset period. A National Board for Spent Nuclear Fuel was also established to oversee the management and disposal of waste generated by the Swedish nuclear program up to its termination. They have tried to start dealing with nuclear waste. An important consequence of this decision is that by limiting the nuclear program in time and size, the Swedes also set limits for nuclear waste production.

The importance of the Swedish experience in providing some guidelines for Canadian nuclear policy lies in the thorough technical follow-through which they have constructed to deal with the fallout of these fundamental policy changes. Even before the 1980 referendum their Parliament had passed, in 1977, a Stipulation Act under which permission to load a nuclear power reactor for the first time can be given only if the owner had shown that the spent fuel could be quite safely disposed of. After the referendum the Swedish Parliament unanimously passed, in 1981, a law concerning the financing of future expenditures for spent nuclear fuel. In this legislation, in which the main principles for the present day Swedish waste management policy were laid down, they dealt with the planning and financing not only of long-term waste management, but of the ultimate decommissioning of existing nuclear reactors. That is what my friend from Skeena was talking about.

What are the lessons for Canadians that emerged from the Swedish experience? How does that experience relate to the motion before us today? First of all, we in the NDP recognize that decisions must be made in the real world where major shifts in energy development cannot occur overnight. However, at some point a first step must be taken if somewhere down the road we are to arrive at a desired destination. That is all we are asking for. A first step by this Government was promised two years ago, which it has not yet taken, and which, according to the Minister's statement today, it is going to continue to postpone on the flimsiest of pretexts, that of an inquiry into the future of the industry. Can you believe the gall exhibited by the Minister's position? A campaign promise ought not to be dealt with because an event totally unforeseen when the promise was made, the Chernobyl disaster, has not been fully reported on. That is ludicrous. Who does the Minister think she is kidding with this trite, facile evasion?

I want to conclude by replying to the speech of the Minister of State for Mines. He is a decent man and he gave a decent speech. He raised the question of why are we not up-to-date. I think we are really up-to-date. I think the issues in the 1990s are going to be health, peace, environment, leisure, and technology. Who is out of step? I think we are in step. We are dealing with those issues today. We are not asking for the decommissioning of all the plants. We have suggested the way the Swedes have dealt with the problem. We are not asking to even stop the expansion of reactors. We are simply asking the Government to live up to its campaign promise, which was that there would be an inquiry into the future of nuclear energy. After Chernobyl, I cannot think of any inquiry which is really more essential than this particular one. I cannot think of anything. The Conservatives are just not listening to the Canadian people. Who is out of step? Not us, Mr. Speaker, but the Conservative Government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Leblanc): Questions or comments. The Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton).

[English]

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, when the Minister was speaking, he painted the issue of safety concerning the nuclear industry, the questions of radiation and storage of waste and so on, as comparable to smoking a cigarette and driving a car. I find that ludicrous. I would like to ask the Member who just spoke to comment on the following, which relates directly to the matter of radiation.

No amount of radiation is considered safe. Despite this, the exposure levels for uranium and nuclear workers is 10 times the limit set for the general public. Many questions remain about the scientific basis for these levels. The Atomic Energy Control Board, which the Minister of State for Mines (Mr. Layton) and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) spoke about, the federal Government's nuclear watch-dog, says a worker exposed to the limit runs the risk of dying of cancer caused by radiation seven to eight times the average risk for workers in safe industries, and two and a half times the highest accidental death rate found in mining and quarrying. Even these figures are now considered conservative.

[Translation]

Mr. Fontaine: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Leblanc): The Hon. Member for Lévis (Mr. Fontaine) on a point of order.

Mr. Fontaine: Mr. Speaker, that is neither a question nor a comment. It is a second speech. Other Members on this side of the House have been seeking the floor. This is the time for questions or comments, not to listen to a second speech by the Hon. Member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Leblanc): Order, please. The Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton).

[English]

Mr. Fulton: I will carry on after that unfortunate intervention, Mr. Speaker. Much of the evidence for risk comes from the study of survivors of the Hiroshima and Nagasaki bombing.

Mr. McDermid: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fulton: In the past three years, new evidence indicates survivors were exposed to less radiation than previously believed. Ever since the early post-war years, scientists have been meticulously recording the development of cancer and other diseases among the 80,000 survivors of Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Scientists have been relating cancers to the doses that the victims received. The original estimates of those doses are now recognized to be too low, which means that the cancers observed were caused by lower doses than originally thought.

• (1640)

Doctor Edward Radford, Chairman of the U.S. National Sciences Committee on the biological effects of ionizing radiation, said that the radiation risks are at least 10 times worse than generally accepted. In terms of the radiation levels alone, aside from the other questions of safety—here I am talking about the safety of the workers that the Minister of State for Mines claims to represent so carefully—here is evidence from the U.S. National Sciences Committee saying that our level of risk in Canada is perhaps 10 times higher than the AECB is prepared to admit. I would like to ask if that alone is not grounds for a full public inquiry?

Mr. Waddell: Yes, of course, it is. We are finding out more and more about nuclear radiation. A group of Japanese doctors visited Vancouver this year. They examined the survivors of Hiroshima. I will make the report available to the House if some Members would like to see it. In the report they show that there are increased cancers, increased levels of tension and various heart problems. They are just beginning, after 20 years, to really learn about this. We are dealing with different risks and we are dealing a lot with the unknown, all the more reason why we should have an inquiry into this matter. I do not think we have had a federal inquiry. The Government keeps mentioning provincial inquiries. We want a federal inquiry.

[Translation]

Mr. Fontaine: Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the comments made by the Hon. Member for Vancouver—Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), in a very quiet House, because in the last half-hour we haven't had a single Liberal Member here representing his or her riding. So I listened to his comments, and on the basis of what he said, I tried to find some indication of some kind of philosophy. I heard him say some very negative things, but I wonder whether he is not forgetting the Canadian economy, an economy that annually produces $500 billion in goods and services.

I also wonder whether he can appreciate the economic context of this question and realizes what would happen if his shortsighted ideas were implemented. If the entire nuclear industry were paralyzed in this country, the effects would be felt, because you Members of the socialist party depend on Canadian industry as well. And if you keep on destroying that industry the way you are now, you will no longer be able to enjoy its benefits, and you will only have the international unions left to make representations . . . So I ask you to stop insisting on killing the goose that lays the golden eggs, and to try and contribute to the development of our economy and discuss ways of doing this.

Mr. Waddell: The New Democratic Party didn't promise an inquiry into the nuclear industry in Canada, the Conservative Party did, and perhaps I could put a question to the Conservative Member from Quebec, and ask him why he ran for the Conservative Party. He promised an inquiry into our nuclear industry. Why isn't he speaking in this debate and why doesn't he ask his Minister for an inquiry?

Now, as far as the Canadian economy is concerned, that is a good question. I gave the example of the Swedes who have the same problem, with a country that is very industrialized, like Canada. They have decided to deal with the problem and phase out their nuclear industry after a certain time. As far as we are concerned, we are asking for an inquiry, and perhaps the problem you mentioned could be discussed within the framework of that inquiry. I understand that the Hon. Member may be speaking in this debate now and may support the position of the New Democratic Party, and after that, perhaps he could join us.

Mr. Fontaine: Mr. Speaker, as for the last comment by the Hon. Member for Vancouver—Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), he can wait until Hell freezes over. Before I cross the floor to join a socialist party, the radioactive isotopes released two weeks ago by the nuclear accident in Kiev will have long disappeared.

When the Hon. Member talks about an inquiry into our nuclear industry, I think our departments have sufficient experience to be able to deal with this important question on their own, and when he talks about what is happening in Sweden, we as Canadian parliamentarians are here to represent our respective ridings and not to comment on Sweden's problems. We are here to protect the interests of Canadian citizens, and we will do so by helping to develop our Canadian industries, something you in the socialist party have always tended to forget. And I wish you would repeat this tomorrow to our Liberal colleagues who are not here today.

Mr. Waddell: I agree with the fact that the Liberal Members are not here. The Conservative Member is right, and it is because the Liberal Party can never decide what position to take on this question or on any other question.

[English]

Let me say that there are alternatives to jobs in the nuclear industry. I ask the Member to look at that. A conference was held yesterday in Toronto and the Minister of State for Mines spoke there. I was there the other night and I looked at the fantastic machinery in the solar industry, the heat pumps and in conserving energy. There are a lot of jobs in a conserver society. Amory Lovens, the American expert in this field, says there are more jobs by far for the dollar in the conserver society than in the nuclear society.

I think the nuclear society is passé. I think it is finished. I said in my speech that the Government must be strong enough to recognize what is happening. This Government should not get down on bended knee to Romania and Argentina—we'll be selling them to Libya next—to try and sell the reactors. We should go into the conserver society in a whole different way. In any case, the Member may not agree with me, but—

—but I would still say today that this matter deserves an inquiry.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Leblanc): Order, please. The time allotted to the Hon. Member has expired.

[English]

Mr. John McDermid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have been sitting here all day listening to the excuses and the arguments that the New Democratic Party has put forward. I want, at the outset, to say to those people who may be watching on television, to those in the House and to those who may read Hansard, that the New Democratic Party is opposed to any form of nuclear energy, period. That is their policy, it has been for a very long time. As long as we understand where they are coming from in this debate, it probably puts it into a much better perspective. They are against anything nuclear.

Mr. Fulton: That's false.

Mr. McDermid: It is not false, it is very true. That is the stand they have taken here. We have one experimental reactor in the Hon. Member's City of Vancouver, by the way, which the city council calls a nuclear free area, and there is a reactor at the University of British Columbia. I do not know what they are talking about. I have not heard them talking about getting rid of that.

Mr. Waddell: It's not a reactor.

Mr. McDermid: It certainly is. There are a number of them throughout Canada being used in universities on an experimental basis. They are being used for medical reasons and so on and so forth. The New Democratic Party is opposed to anything nuclear. The Hon. Member for Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) stands up and says everyone in the industry is a liar.

• (1650)

Mr. Fulton: Point of order.

Mr. McDermid: That was exactly his statement.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, a great deal of what the Hon. Member is putting on the record is patently false. I think people should be aware of that—

Mr. McDermid: That's not a point of order.

Mr. Fulton: —although that is often his way.

Mr. McDermid: That is not a point of order, it is debate, and the Hon. Member knows that full well. Hon. Members of the New Democratic Party talk about campaign promises, but in the election campaign that Party said it was against NATO, NORAD and Canada should withdraw and not participate.

Mr. Riis: Tell us why you broke your campaign promises. Why did you lie to the people of Canada?

Mr. McDermid: Those Hon. Members said: "If we were the Government, we wouldn't do that".

Mr. Fulton: It is your campaign promise you are debating today. You are the one who is a fraud. You're a fraud.

Mr. McDermid: But what are those Hon. Members doing now? They are reconsidering their position.

Mr. Riis: You lied to the people of Canada.

Mr. Fulton: You don't know anything about what you are talking.

Mr. McDermid: I have them going now. We have rattled their chains a little, Mr. Speaker. We have them hollering over there. The Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) is upset all of a sudden because—

Mr. Fulton: Because you don't tell the truth.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Leblanc): Order, please.

Mr. Riis: You have no respect for the Chair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Leblanc): Order. The Parliamentary Secretary.

Mr. McDermid: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. It is very kind of you to let me speak. The NDP, with its screaming meemies over there, are getting a little agitated. It hurts them a little bit when the truth comes out.

Mr. Fulton: That's because you were elected fraudulently.

Mr. McDermid: They cannot stand to hear the truth.

Mr. Riis: We don't change our policies.

Mr. McDermid: They try to shout me down. They cannot stand to hear the truth and that is a real shame.

Mr. Fulton: Oh, come off it. You sound like a mina bird.

Mr. McDermid: We sat and listened patiently to their speeches. We sat and listened patiently to the Hon. Member for Vancouver—Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), who screamed about death and how terrible it is going to be. The Hon. Member for Skeena himself talks about a nuclear bomb which was dropped on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. That is a red herring and nonsense to bring into a debate on the peaceful use of nuclear energy in this country.

Mr. Fulton: That's what Canadian radiation standards are based on. It just shows you don't know what you're talking about.

Mr. McDermid: It shows how insecure the New Democratic Party's position is when it brings in all these red herrings. If I have to stand here and try and speak over the screaming of the Hon. Member for Skeena, who called this debate—

Mr. Fulton: We are talking about your campaign promises.

Mr. McDermid: —who is not gentlemanly enough to sit there and listen to other opinions, I will. People of this country have opinions other than opinion of the the Hon. Member for Skeena. There are other opinions. If the Hon. Member would be polite enough to sit and listen to some other people's position—

Mr. Fulton: Oh, you are Mister Polite now. You have been barking and honking all day long.

Mr. McDermid: I sat here all day and listened to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order. Order. I remind all Members that manners are not a subject matter of this Opposition Day.

Mr. Fulton: Well, one of the Muppets is talking.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order.

Mr. McDermid: In many instances I would much rather be a Muppet than an NDP, that is for sure. They make a lot more sense. I would like to cover three items, if the Hon. Member for Skeena will allow me. First, I want to talk about conservation and security of supply, which has been discussed here, second, the study of the nuclear industry and, third, the safe storage of waste from the nuclear industry. Those are three subject which have been broached by both Members of our Party and the Opposition. The Hon. Member for Vancouver—Kingsway and I agree wholeheartedly on the importance of conservation within the energy sector. There is no question but that conservation plays a very important role in conserving the finite supplies we have. I can tell the Hon. Member today that the Minister and I witnessed the signing of a contract on solar energy with the Government of China and one of our companies here in Canada, Petrosun. It is a $1 million contract. The conservation technology which was developed in this country is being shared with others around the world. Of course, that means jobs and income for Canadians. In Canada, as in other parts of the world, there must be an energy mix. The NDP would have us believe that we can rely solely on conservation.

Mr. Waddell: No, we never said that.

Mr. McDermid: Those Hon. Members want us to wipe out nuclear energy and the generation of hydro—

Mr. Waddell: What about oil and gas?

Mr. McDermid: That is fine, but the Hon. Member knows full well it is a finite commodity. That Party is the one constantly preaching conservation. The NDP is the Party asking us to look for alternative energy sources. This happens to be one energy source which is alternate from our oil and gas. It is one of many. It has a place in the mix of energy. We certainly support conservation. We support the industry.

If the Hon. Member had stayed at the conference and listened to the Minister's speech, he probably would have learned something. This Government wholeheartedly supports the conservation end of things. But we also support the nuclear industry because it plays a very important role in our energy mix. The NDP tells us not to burn coal because it creates acid rain, not to burn oil because it is disappearing, not to dam up any more rivers because we flood much needed land, not to do all this. That is fine, but where does our power come from? One of the advantages of Ontario, and Quebec for that matter, is an abundance of cheap power. That is why industries are attracted to Ontario. They know the energy is there and they know it is cheap. Forty per cent of Ontario's power is generated by nuclear energy, soon to be 60 per cent. That is very important for the economy of Ontario.

I would like to list the studies of the industry which are going on: the Environmental Assessment Review on New Brunswick's Point Lepreau nuclear generating station, and the Federal-Provincial Environmental Assessment Review on Point Lepreau; the National Energy Board hearings on the export to the U.S. of electric power from Point Lepreau; the Royal Commission on the Health and Safety of Workers in Mines, Ontario's "Ham Commission"; the Royal Commission on Electric Power Planning, Ontario's "Porter Commission"; La Commission Parlementaire sur l'Énergie, Quebec's "Joron Commission"; the select Committee on Ontario Hydro Affairs; the Cluff Lake Board of Inquiry, Saskatchewan's "Bayda Inquiry"; the Ontario Environmental Assessment Board hearing into the expansion of uranium mining at Elliot Lake; the Committee on Nuclear Issues in the Community, a cross-Canada effort by the Science Council and Royal Society; five hearings under Canada's environmental assessment and review process regarding a proposed uranium refinery, four in Ontario and one in Saskatchewan; the Royal Commission of Inquiry into Uranium Mining in B.C., the "Bates Commission"; the Energy Committee of the New Brunswick Legislature; the Key Lake Uranium Mine hearings in Saskatchewan; the Northwest Territories legislative hearings into uranium exploration and mining, and the uranium inquiry under Judge McCleave in Nova Scotia.

Hearings into Canada's domestic nuclear industry were arranged by a group of churches in Toronto, completely independent, at the end of 1984. That group is not known to be the greatest supporter of nuclear energy. An impartial panel heard evidence from both sides. It was a good hearing. We followed it very carefully. It concluded that nuclear power was an important and viable option among the available energy resources.

This industry has been studied to death. We are concerned about what happened at Chernobyl. I believe all thinking people are concerned about that. To compare the Chernobyl incident with what could happen in Canada is like comparing apples with oranges. The process at Chernobyl is an entirely different one. It does not have the safety features built in. The Hon. Member has stood up and said that the Soviets told us that it was safe. He knows the system of Government there. He knows how the public is informed there—they are not informed. The accident was not reported until three days after it occurred. The only reason it was reported was because it was being monitored by another country and that other country blew the whistle. So, to compare what is going on in Canada with what is going on in the U.S.S.R. is completely unfair. The Hon. Member knows that. It is a red herring.

He is right when he says that at one time in Canada everything was secret. I agree with him, I too think it was a mistake. It was a mistake on the part of Atomic Energy of Canada and on the part of the Atomic Energy Control Board. I think it was a mistake on the part of the Government of the day. Today, I think the industry realizes that it was a mistake. It was foolish to try to keep these matters from the public. The public has every right to know what is going on. It has every right to try to understand the complexity of the industry.

I have been involved in this sector rather intimately for the past year and one-half. I think I have learned a great deal from it and about it. It is a very complex issue. Today, everything is public. The reports of the AECB are public. If there is the slightest incident, no matter how minor, it is immediately reported to the press and to the public. We have seen these reports come out from time to time when it has been necessary to close down a reactor because of a leaking valve or whatever.

I agree with the Hon. Member when he says that at one time the situation was not satisfactory. But today, thank God, it is. Thank God that the Governments and the control boards are open with the public. People fear the unknown and that is a fact. The more open and honest we can be with the public, the more information and facts we can give to show that all possible safety precautions are being taken in regard to this valuable industry, the less fear there will be.

Members opposite have talked about Argentina. I can tell Hon. Members that the CANDU reactor in Argentina is under the strict control of the International Atomic Energy Board. It keeps a close eye on the situation. We do not or will not deal with a country unless a non-proliferation agreement is signed. The reactors are for peaceful purposes.

The countries to which I have travelled, and those which are interested in the nuclear option, are starving for power. One of the main problems is that they do not have enough power; they cannot get it. Romania was also mentioned earlier. The Romanians have been pumping oil for 70 years and the resources are dwindling away. They do not have an opportunity for hydroelectricity. They are looking at and proceeding with the nuclear option. The problem with most of these countries is that they are cash-short. However, they desperately need energy. In Romania, there are no street lights and only one 40-watt light bulb per home can be on at any one time. Restaurants are forced to close at six o'clock in Romania. The country is power-starved. In its wisdom, it has chosen as an alternative the nuclear route.

Indonesia is now looking at the same option. South Korea, which has one of our CANDUs, and which is operating very efficiently—in fact I think it is number five in the world out of 200-odd—is looking at purchasing another reactor. The Dutch are considering going to the nuclear option. Of course, we are very interested in being invited to bid on these nuclear requirements. Yugoslavia is another country which has out an invitation to tender.

I will tell Hon. Members that if Canada does not participate in this field then the French, the West Germans, the British and the Americans will. It just so happens that Canada has the Cadillac of nuclear reactors. We have the best in the world. I will shout that from any roof-top. I am proud of the CANDU and the technology which has been created here in Canada. I do not think that we should hide it under a barrel. We should assure ourselves—and to date I am assured—that we have all the safety requirements built in to our CANDU system which can possibly be built in.

The Atomic Energy Control Board, in co-operation with its international partners, is at this time very carefully examining the Tchernobyl accident with the information that is available. It hopes to obtain more. I am pleased that the Russians are now more forthcoming with information concerning the accident. If there are lessons which we can learn from the accident which can be incorporated into our system, then by all means let us incorporate them.

I am not sure of how much time I have left, Mr. Speaker, since I did not keep an eye on it. I have covered conservation and the study of the industry. I now wish to talk about safe storage for the waste from the nuclear industry.

There are three federal programs under way in Canada concerning the storage and disposal of radioactive wastes. These programs are related to three different types of radioactive wastes produced in the country, namely, irradiated fuel wastes, uranium mine tailings and low level radioactive wastes. The goal of these programs is the eventual transfer of the wastes from the current storage mode where their safety is assured by means of active monitoring and control. Since there were all sorts of innuendoes that there is not safe storage today, I can tell Hon. Members that there is safe storage on site at the generating stations. It is monitored on a minute-by-minute basis. There is enough room at those sites to store all wastes produced for the next 75 years. However, we are not happy with that. We are proceeding with these programs to assure the long-term safe storage for waste from the nuclear industry.

The major program deals with the irradiated fuel wastes. It is a co-operative research and development program with the Province of Ontario and the United States. It is budgeted at a current level of some $37 million per year. The program is managed by Atomic Energy of Canada Limited Whiteshell Nuclear Research Establishment in Manitoba. The Hon. Member for Vancouver—Kingsway knows that there is an open invitation to him and his colleagues on the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources to visit the site and to see the work going on. The disposal concept being assessed in this program is the burial of the fuel wastes 500 to 1,000 metres deep in the crystalline rock of the Canadian Shield.

The first report on the assessment of this concept was issued in September, 1981, for public content. It was followed in March, 1982, by an initial regulatory statement from the Atomic Energy Control Board—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but—

Mr. McDermid: With the unanimous consent of the House, could I continue, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Is there unanimous consent to allow the Hon. Member to continue?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McDermid: I appreciate having the opportunity to finish my remarks. I thank my colleagues for allowing me to do so.

The final AECB regulatory requirement was issued in January of 1985, and a second set of concept assessment documents from AECL was released in 1985. The final set is to be released in 1988 at which time the concepts are to be evaluated by: an inter-agency review committee, including staff representatives of the Atomic Energy Control Board, Environment Canada and the Ontario Ministry of the Environment; public hearings; the AECB; and the Governments of Canada and Ontario.

• (1710)

Approval of the concept by all of these bodies represents a full acceptance of the concept. Such acceptance, together with a decision by the owners of the irradiated fuel to actually implement disposal, is required before site selection for a commercial repository can be started. The July 1985 concept assessment document concludes that the total occupational risk, radiological and conventional, associated with the construction, operation and decommissioning of a disposal facility will be no greater than the risk in comparable industries.

While the main focus of the report is on evaluating the possible risks due to the facility, a part of the analysis also addresses the potential benefit to a variety of community types. The report states that an increase in employment and in the economic base generally would be beneficial to every type of community. There would be direct, indirect and spin-off employment. In addition, revenue in the form of property taxes or grants in lieu of taxes would be generated for community development purposes.

I do not wish to take advantage of the time that was given to me by the Opposition and for which I am grateful. However, I would like to sum up that particular part by saying that the Canadian program is held in high regard internationally. It supports the collective opinion of the experts in the nuclear energy agency of the OECD. They said that there is a high degree of confidence in the ability to design and operate geological disposal systems which will assure long-term isolation for high-level waste or spent fuel and meet the relevant long-term safety objectives.

I mentioned two other programs. Briefly, the second program initiated in 1983 deals with uranium mill tailings. That program is being undertaken by the Canadian Centre for Mineral and Energy Technology within the Ministry of Energy, Mines and Resources. The third program was also initiated in 1983 and deals with all other forms of radioactive waste produced in Canada.

I can assure Canadians that the Government is doing absolutely everything to ensure safety in the peaceful use of nuclear energy within Canada and in fact outside of Canada. Our expertise is now being recognized around the world and people are appreciating our work in that regard.

We have an industry of which we in Canada can be very proud. I always hear members of the NDP complaining about chasing research dollars out of the country and losing good research people. I happen to think that this is a very important industry for Canada in many ways. Some 30,000 workers agree with me and thousands of those who receive indirect spin-off benefits also agree with me. The general public agrees as long as—

Mr. Waddell: They do not.

Mr. McDermid: Excuse me. As long as they can be assured, and we are giving that assurance, that every possible safeguard has been taken when it comes to the use of nuclear energy. I stand by that. I want to assure the Canadian people of that today.

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, a countenance of self-assurance is very useful to Ministers and Parliamentary Secretaries. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. McDermid) is no exception to that generalization. Whether in blandness or in bluster, it is useful to be most self-assured about things.

Among the assertions offered to us by the Parliamentary Secretary is the assertion that the Government or the Conservative Party—for our purposes, the same thing—is at the moment in favour of conservation. The Canadian Home Insulation Program and the Canadian Oil Substitution Program were valuable programs for conservation and for seeking alternatives to the use of resources we already have in Ontario, particularly nuclear power. All of those who were interested in those programs must frankly doubt what the Parliamentary Secretary had to say.

When the Government, in its very first economic and fiscal statement, indicated its attitude toward conservation, it was to axe those programs at a conveniently early point in time and to bring to an end the public support for conservation of energy in Canada. How can the Parliamentary Secretary, with the bluster with which he began this afternoon, have the gall to talk about being in favour of conservation when the only kind of favour that counts is putting up money? This Government got out of the area of conservation as fast as it could. That is just plain contradictory and hypocritical.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to answer that. That is a very good question. We campaigned by saying that we did not think Canadians needed to be bribed with their own money and did not need to be convinced that conservation is important.

One of the programs to which the Hon. Member referred existed for five years and the other for some seven years. A million homes converted from oil to gas. There were very few conversions left to be done, quite honestly. Most people now understand the economic benefit of conservation. We have gone from handing taxpayers' money back to them in order to bribe them into doing something to educating them to the importance of conservation. I think that comes first and is most important.

Second, we have set up a conservation program which relies on research, development and demonstration. This is demonstrated by the R-2000 home program, which this Government supports fully, and by the National Conservation Program, which goes under the acronym NCAEI. That program is going extremely well in co-operation with the provinces. We have now signed agreements with three or four provinces and two more provinces will be signing agreements very shortly. When a few disagreements are straightened out, other provinces will be signing also.

We consider conservation to be very, very important. We do not believe that we have to bribe Canadians with their own money to let them know how important conservation is. There are other ways of doing that. The Hon. Member belongs to a Party that believes that the more money we throw at things, the quicker we solve the problems. If that is so, then we wonder why so many problems still exist after the huge deficits and the money that was thrown at problems by the previous Government. Those problems are still haunting us today.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, between 1960 and 1986, the Canadian Government subsidized offshore oil and gas production to the tune of about $10 billion. Compared to that, a pittance was put into alternate forms of energy. Can the Hon. Member tell us how much money the Canadian Government put into nuclear energy, considering that about 40 per cent of the nuclear industry is directly subsidized by the Canadian Government?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the Hon. Member the figure today because I do not have it with me, and am sorry. I will get that information for him and make sure that he receives it.

In all fairness, when the Hon. Member says that Governments have been throwing billions of dollars at the oil and gas industry, they have also been taxing it very unfairly through the PGRT. I believe the Government received some $7 billion in a tax regime that is entirely foreign to any other industry in Canada. When we balance one against the other, it is not quite fair to say that they were subsidized.

Also, I think the oil and gas industry is important. Of course we are getting off the subject of the motion, but that is fine; I do not mind discussing energy because we are in a country with a very good mix of energy. It is important to maintain our supply of oil. It is a very important commodity to our economy. Conventional oil is becoming scarce. We must continue to find oil. I am really excited about Gulf Oil and its find in the Beaufort Sea. It is proving to be a very good one, and I think there will be more exciting news this summer on that project. That type of thing has to be continued.

Every area of the Canadian energy industry must be supported. That is also very important. The Hon. Member and I have had discussions on the energy industry before. Oil and gas are important parts of our industry. Approximately $3 billion to $4 billion in export payments come into the country, which are very important to the entire Canadian economy, not just the economies of the producing provinces. The same holds true in the conservation industry, the nuclear industry, and hydro generation. We are now seeing more small hydro generation stations literally coming back on stream because hydro companies are now allowing individuals to sell into the hydro grid. There are all kinds of exciting things happening in the field of energy in Canada, nuclear being one of them.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Parliamentary Secretary. The Hon. Member cited a number of studies which were conducted of the industry. Presumably he and his Party were aware of most of those studies by 1984 when the PC handbook indicated that they advocated a full public inquiry into the future of nuclear power. Would the Parliamentary Secretary tell us whether he ran on that platform, whether he stands by that platform, and why he has changed his mind?

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I do not have the handbook here, so I cannot comment on it.

Mr. Waddell: Here it is.

Mr. Friesen: I have a copy of it.

Mr. McDermid: The service is fabulous, Mr. Speaker. If it was in our handbook and stated the way—

Mr. Waddell: It is right in the handbook which I have just given you.

Mr. McDermid: "The NDP statements make it appear that they are opposed to nuclear generation of electricity, but they have not proposed any alternatives".

Mr. Waddell: That is the PC handbook.

Mr. McDermid: The Hon. Member just handed it to me, and that is what it says. It also says that we advocate a full public inquiry. We are looking at the situation to see whether or not it is required at this time. Why have we changed our minds? We are looking very carefully at the other studies which have been made to see if in fact it is necessary. There are times when political Parties change their minds. God knows it, when we look at the NDP and some of the promises it has made and some of the back-pedalling it has done. That happens in political life. We know that and we understand that.

This policy still stands. We are taking a long look at it. The NDP would like the Government to do everything in the first six months, and it knows full well that is nigh on impossible.

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): It is some 18 months now.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the Parliamentary Secretary indicated that he was willing to support the nuclear industry and research. With his powers as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, would he be willing to re-establish the level of research which the Government had been doing in the past, especially in view of the need for a safe nuclear waste disposal regime to be put in place sometime toward the end of this century?

I was really impressed with his comments about the agreement on renewable energy which was just signed with the Province of Nova Scotia. I commend the Government for doing that. I just hope that it will re-establish all the funds which were taken away in the last two Budgets and economic statement with regard to conservation and renewable energy. If there is anything on which we have made great progress in the last few years, it has been renewable energy and conservation.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I can tell the Hon. Member that the research at Whiteshell to which he referred is not suffering. It is going ahead as planned and on schedule. As a matter of fact, we have attracted the Americans to participate in that research. They are contributing a very large amount of money to research for the safe storage of nuclear waste. It is only right that those who will benefit from the research should participate in it. We welcome their participation.

I cannot say that we will reinstate the amount of dollars; no, that would be foolish. The Government is spending taxpayers' dollars much more wisely. We are getting more value for the dollar than did the previous Government, which threw it around and displayed no responsibility whatever. We are getting results from fewer dollars because we are spending smarter.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, is there more time to ask questions?

Mr. Frith: Is it debate time, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): It is debate time.

Hon. Douglas C. Frith (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate. Provided that I do not need too much filler time, I will not get into what I think is the red herring part of the debate—the PC handbook and the broken promises which were made during the last election campaign. Frankly I think Canadians have come to expect that the Government will never live up to the promises it made in the election campaign of 1984. I do not think reference to that red herring will do much to enlighten the Canadian public in respect of the motion before the House.

All three political Parties recognize that the major catalyst which led to the present debate on the floor of the House of Commons was the nuclear reactor disaster at Chernobyl. All of us would agree that the events following that disaster have made us aware of the need for a co-ordinated international plan of action to deal with this kind of crisis in the future. It goes without saying that we live in a very interdependent world. It is not only an economically interdependent world. In terms of the ecological system, clearly it is a world which is so fragile and interdependent that we can no longer afford to have take place in the future what took place in the immediate days and weeks surrounding the disaster at Chernobyl.

Even to this day I find it difficult to believe that an international power, namely the Soviet Union, would be so irresponsible that it would not inform its other world neighbours of the potential harm to the atmosphere and the ecology as a result of that nuclear reactor disaster. It was almost as if the Soviets hoped that the high radiation levels which would be emitted into the atmosphere would never be detected. It is incredible, in the year 1986, that any country would attempt to throw a blanket of misinformation over a nuclear disaster of that magnitude.

The fact that it took a Swedish Government Ambassador to approach the appropriate authorities in Moscow to determine if any nuclear accident took place speaks volumes for the problems and the way in which the Soviet Government went about dealing with the disaster.

I should like to refer to the fact that it took several days for our own Government to respond. I say with all sincerity that the Department of National Health and Welfare has done what was expected of it and with the resources available to it in an attempt to cope with the repercussions from the nuclear accident at Chernobyl. As the House will recall, in the days following the accident, warnings were issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare concerning rain-water and concerning the uptake of radiation in our food supply or cycle. This illustrates the problem in an interdependent world when a nuclear accident occurs.

It simply cannot be contained within the area immediately surrounding or adjacent to the reactor site. It pointed at the weakness of the international agencies in responding to that kind of an emergency. Last night I witnessed the normal reaction among people in the free world. There was a two or three minute segment concerning the American doctor, I believe from the State of California, whose specialty is bone marrow transplants. He recognized that neither the Soviet Union nor anywhere else in the world could cope with a disaster of the magnitude of Chernobyl. On his own volition, together with a number of U.S. companies, the doctor managed to get together 136 bone marrow transplants for transfer to the Soviet Union. The expertise made available by that physician and his team speaks volumes for the way in which Canadians or any free thinking intelligent person would respond.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) made a statement in the House. I believe my colleague, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie), responded for the New Democratic Party and I responded for the Liberal Party. We both talked about the need to improve the response plan to a disaster at the international level and at the national level here in Canada. That is where the focus of debate should be.

The use of nuclear power will increase in the future. When one looks at the industrial giants, such as Japan, one has to come to the conclusion that nuclear power will be part of the energy options that will be made available to them. As long as that is the case, there exists the potential for disaster, similar to Chernobyl.

As a country that has played a significant role in the development of nuclear energy, we must take a leadership role. The international community must be in a much better position to respond to disasters like Tchernobyl.

When the Minister of National Health and Welfare made his statement, I said that I thought we should be doing more than warning Canadian citizens in the immediate vicinity of Chernobyl. Canada should be taking a leadership role at the international agency in Vienna that deals with nuclear power and issues. We should be telling the Soviet Ambassador here in Canada in very strong terms that Canadians deplore and will not stand for the kind of misinformation the Soviet Union attempted to dish out in the days following the disaster. With respect to the defence ramifications of how we view the Soviet Union, outside of the NATO pact and the Warsaw pact, the Soviet Union, whether we like it or not, is a member of the international community. We deal with the Soviet Union at the United Nations and on a bilateral basis.

We should be speaking openly to the Soviet Government about how we feel it mismanaged the Chernobyl crisis. The Soviet Union must realize Canadians were upset that it took Soviet authorities seven to eight days to inform the international community about the disaster. We have learned since then, even after the Soviet authorities acknowledged the existence of the problem at Chernobyl, but refused to acknowledge the severity of it, that until five or six days ago the Russians were still in danger of having a meltdown, an out of control reactor disaster, and yet their authorities still did not ask the international community for aid.

If we are going to have nuclear energy as an alternate source of energy in my future and my children's future, we should be asking Governments at the international level to have plans of action. We need international medical teams and international nuclear experts ready to respond to whatever country is in trouble. Canada has been at the forefront in the development of nuclear energy. I am sure Canadians would want the Government to lead that kind of a discussion at the international level.

I believe the Chernobyl disaster points out the inadequacies of many of the existing response programs we have in Canada. The Minister of National Health and Welfare responded. He told us he had established a special task force to review the procedure of dealing with disasters of the same magnitude as Tchernobyl. We need programs to deal with crises in the nuclear energy field. We should make sure that at the end of this exercise of review we can as a Government assure Canadians that we have done everything possible to deal with a nuclear crisis in the event of one.

I come from an area of the country that has and will maintain an economic interest in nuclear energy. I do not represent the City of Elliot Lake. My colleague, the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), has that honour. In the years from the mid 1950s into the 1960s and 1970s, the advent of the nuclear industry led to a significant economic improvement for those people on the north shore.

I recall very well the debate on the location of the El Dorado refinery when the decision was made to put the refinery in the Blind River area adjacent to Elliot Lake. Even our own Liberal Government at the time was considering putting the Eldorado refinery in southern Ontario in the Port Hope area. I recall the discussions we had with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources at that time. We told him as a northern Ontario caucus that if we were going to have nuclear energy, then surely the resources mined in northern Ontario should be refined in the North. That was our basic argument. We were successful in making sure the economic spin-offs to that industry were concentrated in the area of the resources.

As you can recall, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Government became involved in the nuclear field in the 1940s. This was done in a joint effort with the United States. It began with a military application of the use of nuclear energy. Since that time, nuclear technology has been used by nations to deal with their energy requirements. Nuclear technology is used in medicine, and in altering the ways in which we view our world. There have been some very important spin-offs to the advent of the use of nuclear technology since its inception some four decades ago. Even the Province of Saskatchewan, held successively by New Democratic Governments for several decades, recognized the need for alternate uses of energy, as does the present Government in Saskatchewan.

Any person who objectively and intelligently addresses the issue of nuclear power recognizes it as a form of technology that creates energy. We are asking to make sure that the energy choice is done in a safe way. That is the issue. I do not think we can hide our heads in the sand and with the wave of a magic wand eliminate nuclear power stations in Canada. That is simply not going to happen. Considering the percentage of hydroelectricity in the province which is generated by nuclear stations, it is obvious that the province has a vested interest. If the Province of Ontario has a vested economic interest, so has every citizen of the province.

I do not think we should be focusing on the elimination of nuclear energy as a source of power. We should be focusing research and development on technology to deal with the waste products of nuclear energy. The debate should be focused on the need for safe maintenance and operation of nuclear plants in the country. The Canadian public demands and is entitled to resources at all levels of government to respond in the event of an emergency. That is where this debate should be focused.

If people, for one moment, believe that that is the proper way to approach the issue of nuclear energy, then we must direct more and more resources toward the research and development in the three areas about which I have spoken. That must be the commitment of any government. Regardless of what political party sits to the right of the Speaker, those are the issues with which it will be faced when in government.

The one area with which I have some dispute is the cut-back in R and D which occurred after the 1984 election. The people of the riding of Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke have a right to be upset. I am speaking of the people who are involved in the nuclear industry and live in that riding. They had a right to believe that the proper amount of R and D would be done. The questions which are asked by the Canadian public deserve answers. If the debate is focused in that area, it is a justifiable debate. However, to engage in rhetoric by talking about another broken Government promise takes away from the level of debate which the public deserves to hear in the House of Commons.

Those are my thoughts with respect to this issue. I am sure that in the last 10 days to two weeks, due to the magnitude of the disaster at Chernobyl, all Canadians have had cause to rethink their concerns about the use of nuclear power. I think they would like to have their representatives here in the House of Commons debate the issues in the areas which I have outlined. The public needs those answers. I have listened to some of the debate here this afternoon, albeit not much. I could not be accused of that. In order to have a full debate about the use of nuclear energy, alternate uses of power must be put into the equation.

The Liberal Party has not committed itself to nuclear power, but it has committed itself to ensure that the proper safeguards are in place for the maintenance and use of nuclear power. The Liberal Party is committed to the improved use of moneys for research and development into methods for handling waste products. Those long-term answers are required in order to live comfortably with nuclear energy. To my knowledge, there is no form of energy in the world which does not have some malicious side effects. If we were to remove suddenly all of the energy power stations in the world and replace their energy output with energy derived from coal, the result would be a problem with the atmosphere. Every form of energy has problems. The debate must be intelligent and informed. If we can achieve that, I think we will have advanced the debate which the people have so badly wanted.

[Translation]

Mr. Hamelin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a short comment and put a question to the Hon. Member about nuclear power.

Naturally, the Hon. Member has denounced the delay of the Soviet Union in informing its own population and the other countries which are now affected, and this includes Canada, albeit not too seriously.

I would like to ask the Hon. Member why it is usually the leftist groups who organize protest marches against nuclear energy, and especially against the United States and other countries of the free world. How does the Hon. Member explain the fact that there were so few demonstrations in this case? Where are all the leftist groups which are gaining ground in nearly all parliamentary institutions, especially in Europe? Where are they? How can the Hon. Member explain their reaction to the events in the Soviet Union?

Mr. Frith: Mr. Speaker, I did not have any problem with the question asked by the Hon. Member for Charlevoix (Mr. Hamelin), but I do have one in trying to explain the absence of many people who do not want nuclear power in this country.

In view of the urgency of the situation, I think that everyone in this case wanted an answer to a two-part question. First, internationally, they wanted an answer by the international community about the problem in the Soviet Union. Second, in our country they want to see the development of an emergency plan of action in case of a similar problem. I think that in this case the response of people the world over was indeed to obtain the necessary information concerning the crisis created by the Soviet Union.

[English]

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to join in this debate and to conclude it. The motion before us this afternoon, which calls for a public inquiry into nuclear power, is one of enormous importance to the well-being of the entire country and, potentially, to the good health of individuals and communities in selected parts of our country where nuclear power is already important.

Nuclear power as an energy source deserves recognition for the enormous dangers which are inherent in that industry. We have all been watching, with a horrible fascination, the unfolding of the disaster at Chernobyl in the Soviet Union. We wonder what its consequences will be. One hardly need point out to people—although in the debate which we are having this afternoon it is worth doing—that when a disaster occurs at a nuclear power plant, it will not lead only to a loss of energy for people in the immediate area. It is not something which will affect only those persons who are in the plant in the way of immediate consequences of the accident. It is not a matter of physical injury and that is that. Quite clearly what happens or can happen in one of these disasters is a spreading of potential death for large numbers of people at considerable distances from the reactor itself. What the consequences are for those people beyond the immediate vicinity of the plant is something that only time will tell. It will take statistical studies to clarify the consequences.

What is so often forgotten when considering these things is that the question of safe levels of radiation is not a subject on which there is agreement in the scientific community. We live with the standards of the 1940s and 1950s. We live with the thought that it is high levels which are dangerous. Yet there are sneaking suspicions among some epidemiologists and other researchers that quite low levels of radiation can have equally harmful effects in the long term on human beings. The effect on workers in the plants, the effect on thousands of people at some distance from the plant, the spreading of radiation around the globe, the warnings not to drink rain-water even though it is safe for children to splash around in it, the need to check for radiation levels in milk, all underscore the fact that we are dealing with a quite unusual form of energy.

We take comfort from our technology. We have been fortunate in the Western hemisphere in not having any of our nuclear plants affected by earthquakes or similar disasters. Yet what would happen to that technology in the event of that kind of disaster? How widely would the consequences be felt? It is for those reasons that my colleagues and I are emphasizing the importance of a public inquiry on nuclear energy. I suggest that the need to do this can be underscored by the fact that we have built societies and developed economies on the basis of two kinds of dubious energy, the first being petroleum and the second being nuclear energy. Dependence on petroleum has made it possible for the producers to shock our economies and bring us near the brink of economic disaster several times. Because of the failure of their price program recently, there is the possibility of a new kind of disaster. We are in a most perilous economic situation these days because of our petroleum-dependent economy.

Then we have the consequences of dependence on nuclear energy which has developed in some parts of Canada. I am a Member of Parliament from Ontario and it has already been suggested by others that Ontario Hydro is a major user of nuclear energy. It is worth underscoring the importance of that dependence. In Ontario, 40 per cent of the energy being used is nuclear-generated. That 40 per cent is the base of the Ontario Hydro system. The reason is quite simple. Nuclear energy is a form of energy best used at a steady rate over long periods of time. It is much easier to control hydroelectric facilities by shutting off the water at night and then lifting the gates when morning comes and the energy is needed. It is relatively easy to fire up thermal plants of one sort or another. They are used as supplements.

What is running day and night, week after week, year in and year out, are the nuclear power plants which provide the base. The other power sources are called in as required to meet the demands of industry and the ordinary consumer. That is the reality in this province. As a Member of Parliament from northwestern Ontario, living on the Canadian Shield in an area on which Atomic Energy of Canada has fairly obvious designs for burying its waste, I appreciate the opportunity to address this matter.

There are so many aspects of the use of nuclear energy by Ontario Hydro that it boggles the mind. Surely planting those great stations so close to Metropolitan Toronto has to be an act of corporate lunacy. The cynics, or the tough-minded, I am not sure which they are, or the merely stupid, say that if it is going to be the basis for Metropolitan Toronto's power supply, then let the plants be close to hand rather than far away. I suppose suggesting that it should be in the Bruce—Grey Peninsula or somewhere up there—

Mr. Gurbin: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Bruce—Grey area contains the Bruce Peninsula. It is the Bruce Peninsula, not the Bruce—Grey Peninsula, and it is approximately 40 miles away—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Obviously that is a point of debate.

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): From the head of the lakes these things sometimes look a little closer together than they do down here. I might remind my friends from southern Ontario that the provincial Government has had the gall for years to publish a map which puts northern Ontario, some 87 per cent of the land area of Ontario, on a piece of paper the same size as southern Ontario.

The decision to build these power plants near Metropolitan Toronto is one of the highly dubious decisions which the Ontario Government made or allowed Ontario Hydro to make as it moved into the use of nuclear energy. We heard the Parliamentary Secretary, the Hon. Member for Brampton—Georgetown (Mr. McDermid), arguing strenuously a few minutes ago in defence of nuclear energy. That makes sense. Who was the MPP and Premier of the Province who allowed Ontario Hydro to do this? It was the MPP from Brampton. So there is a certain logic to that Hon. Member defending a decision which was never made by the people of Ontario. It was never made by the legislature of Ontario. It was Premier Davis and his colleagues who allowed Ontario Hydro to move into this deadly system of energy generation and who are now part and parcel of the system of research which anticipates the possibility of burying the waste in northwestern Ontario or other parts of northern Ontario and the Canadian Shield.

Let us remember the half life of this material, some 75,000 years and more. What are we going to do with that stuff in the future? Those are the kinds of things that deserve inquiry and that is why I speak in support of this motion.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 66 deemed to have been moved.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS—NIAGARA RIVER—TOXIC CHEMICAL DUMPS SITES. (B) REQUEST FOR MINISTERIAL STATEMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, to put the intervention tonight in the proper context, I would like to cast your memory back to October, 1984, when the Niagara River Toxic Chemical Committee produced a report on toxic chemicals and emissions into that water body. In May of 1985, the then Minister of the Environment made a glowing promise about obtaining from the United States Government a plan of action for the clean up of emissions, particularly the toxic chemical emissions, into Lake Ontario. It was quite a commitment that the then Minister made. It raised our hopes. I was pleased to hear that because it indicated that the then Minister intended to take pretty vigorous action and to make the United States authorities realize that there must be, on their part, an action that would enforce the commitment they made with us when they signed the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement in 1978.

In October of 1985, when the head of the Environmental Protection Agency visited Ottawa and submitted a report, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) was fuming and very upset over a criticism that was levelled by me because he felt I had not seriously approached and studied the proposal that had been brought here to Ottawa. The fact is that that proposal was kept secret in Canada and was made available south of the border. I had to rely on whatever information I could get to express my views on that.

My views at that time were fairly consistent with what the Minister himself said in March of 1986 in the House of Commons, which triggers this exchange tonight. I am quoting from page 11809 of Hansard. In answer to a question, the Minister of the Environment said the following:

> I did state categorically on behalf of the Canadian Government that we think the only solution for the disposal sites on the American side along the Niagara River is excavation and incineration—

That is a position that we support. It comes as a great surprise to realize that the Minister has departed from this decision, and has come to some kind of understanding in Washington about which we have to guess because of the secrecy that surrounds that particular understanding, the plan about which we read in The Globe and Mail, the Toronto Star and other newspapers. There is secrecy, therefore, about the proposal of the EPA to Canada last October. There is secrecy about the understanding that was reached in Washington a day or so ago. There is secrecy within that understanding about the substances that would be removed, reduced and cut, by a percentage that is speculated upon, and by a date that is also speculated upon.

In addition, there is a strange notion on the part of the Minister of the Environment, as revealed this morning, whereby he seems to believe that the United States Government is doing Canada a favour by acceding to our requests and by looking at our proposals. What this Government and the Minister do not seem to realize is that there is an agreement and the United States Government is bound by that agreement, as we are, for the recovery and the quality that has to be improved, hence the name the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement, in Lake Ontario and other lakes.

Therefore, there is an international understanding and an agreement signed by the heads of two nations which binds the Americans to look at the Niagara River with the same seriousness as we do. There is no room for interpreting this as a particular favour or nicety. There is a commitment. I hope this will get through the thick skull of the Minister of the Environment once and for all because he does not seem to understand. That is a very serious conceptual flaw in his approach to his American counterpart in dealing with this particular matter. He does not speak up for the Canadian interest with the determination and authority which this agreement gives to him.

I could not believe my eyes when I read in the newspaper about the difference of opinion between the Minister of the Environment in Ottawa and his counterpart in Ontario. The fact that the disagreement was made public is an indication of a poor negotiator, making public a disagreement on the eve of a meeting with the other side. It is also an indication of a poor player who does not understand the importance of having the full support of all the Canadian Ministers of the Environment on the eve of meeting with his counterpart in Washington.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), as usual, has some very firm points with respect to some of the issues which surround the agreement which has been reached by the Canadian Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) and the head of the EPA in the United States, Mr. Lee Thomas. Having been able to participate in some of the discussions and deliberations, I have a full sense of the format and conditions under which those agreements were approached. We are now in a position, for the first time since the Love Canal became a national issue, where we in fact have made real solid progress. It is progress which the four million Canadians who drink water from the Niagara region can count on to achieve some results. We could have sat and talked, as former Governments have, for a long time and achieved very little.

Although some of his points have some validity, one of the critical flaws in the approach of the Hon. Member for Davenport to this whole problem is his lack of understanding and appreciation of the information which is available to anyone, and which we must have in order to get the type of firm, hard, clear figures which all of us want inevitably. What I can say is that we have a firm date of July 1, 1987, when we have a commitment with the United States to arrive at those clear-cut targets and loading.

That information is not available to the Province of Ontario, to the American Government nor to the Canadian Government as of today. We have an objective which Mr. Lee Thomas, on behalf of the United States, and the Minister of the Environment of Canada have undertaken together, and perhaps we can exceed the objective of 50 per cent reduction by 1995. That is a major objective on the part of both Governments.

The Hon. Member for Davenport has mentioned the visit by way of the comments made by the Minister of the Environment in Canada insofar as the actions of the Province of Ontario are concerned. Having participated in the meetings with Mr. Thomas, it is unfortunate but there is no question that both Canada and the United States, wanting to co-operate with all parties, have some major concerns regarding the willingness of the Province of Ontario to do anything other than make headlines for its Minister of the Environment.

Mr. Caccia: Shame on you!

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—REPORTED ALLEGATIONS MADE BY SUPERINTENDENT. (B) REQUEST FOR INQUIRY

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, in 1973 a joint operation of three police forces, the Montreal Police Force, the Quebec Provincial Police Force and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, resulted in a break-in at a small news agency in Montreal, l'Agence de Presse libre du Québec.

Five years later the Solicitor General of Canada, Francis Fox, assured the House that this break-in, this breach of the law, was an exceptional and isolated incident and that the directives of the RCMP to its members clearly require that all their actions take place within the law. The statement of the then Solicitor General, Francis Fox, was clearly and utterly without foundation. As the McDonald Commission Report documented, there had been a whole series of breaches of the criminal law by the RCMP prior to 1977.

In late October of last year, a very senior and respected member of the RCMP, Superintendent Nowlan, indicated that the present Commissioner of the RCMP, Commissioner Simmonds, who was the Commissioner Designate in April of 1977, misled the Government of the day and, in particular, misled the Solicitor General with respect to the extent of criminal wrongdoing by the RCMP.

Superintendent Nowlan's allegations are very serious. In many ways they are unprecedented. What he suggested in his allegations was that some 17 days before the Minister made his statement in the House of Commons he, Mr. Nowlan, was ordered to begin an internal inquiry into allegations that members of the RCMP were involved in illegal operations other than the break-in at the l'Agence de Presse libre du Québec. Those allegations included barn-burning, including involvement of the force in the theft of dynamite, and the use of heavy-handed and illegal tactics to recruit informants in the FLQ.

According to Mr. Nowlan, at least three officers were well aware of the fact that the APLQ incident was not simply an isolated one. Those officers included the then Commissioner Maurice Nadon, the Director of the Security Service Michael Dare, as well as the Commissioner Designate, the current Commissioner Simmonds. Superintendent Nowlan suggested that Simmonds knowingly allowed the Minister to be misled and that because he was not asked the proper questions by the McDonald Commission, the McDonald Commission, as well, allowed the Commissioner Designate to get off the hook with respect to this very serious matter in April of 1977.

On October 31 I asked the Solicitor General (Mr. Beatty) to conduct an inquiry into these very serious allegations by Superintendent Nowlan. I note that my own Leader, based on the information that he had at the time, suggested that Superintendent Nowlan was responsible for misleading Fox. It is very clear now that that allegation was not well founded. In fact, Superintendent Nowlan was sticking out his neck to make sure that the Solicitor General was well aware of exactly what was going on and it was others, perhaps including the current Commissioner, who chose to deliberately deny access to that important information.

I asked the Solicitor General what action he intended to take with respect to these very serious allegations. The Solicitor General said that he intended to take no action whatsoever. Why was this? Because he had spoken with Francis Fox and Francis Fox said that he was not aware of being misled.

One must ask who in fact is in charge. Surely the Solicitor General had an obligation to meet with Commissioner Simmonds and put these allegations to him directly. How would Francis Fox know if he had not been given the information in question? Instead, the Solicitor General refused to conduct an investigation.

I have sought to have the Justice and Legal Affairs Committee give Superintendent Nowlan an opportunity to appear before it to present evidence. I suggest that the call of the former Superintendent who retired recently for an independent inquiry with the power to examine documents at National Headquarters is one which I fully support. Yet it has been stonewalled and denied by the Minister.

Who in fact is in charge? We have heard the rather contemptible suggestions made by the Commissioner that Superintendent Nowlan had certain mental problems, so his allegations should be discredited. While it is quite accurate to suggest that Superintendent Nowlan does suffer from manic depression, his doctor has made it very clear that he is a man of integrity and sound judgment. In addition, the former Solicitor General, Francis Fox, spoke very highly indeed of Superintendent Nowlan and called him a very honourable and a very thorough person.

In view of the seriousness of these allegations and in view of the fact that Superintendent Nowlan was well aware of what was going on and the extent of knowledge within the RCMP, particularly at the senior levels, I call upon the Minister once again to allow this matter to be examined. After all, what does he have to hide? Allow the Justice Committee to invite Superintendent Nowlan to appear before it. Appoint an independent investigator to get to the bottom of these very serious allegations.

I suggest that Superintendent Nowlan should be commended by Canadians and by the House for having the courage to speak out before he retired with respect to these matters. I would hope that instead of continuing to cover up these allegations which after all affect the Commissioner himself and his position, they should be fully investigated.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) has raised newspaper accounts of allegations made by an officer of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police concerning the conduct of senior officers of the force. These allegations related to matters which were the subject of deliberations of the Royal Commission of Inquiry established in 1977 under the chairmanship of Mr. Justice David McDonald and assisted by D. S. Rickard, Q.C., and Guy Gilbert, Q.C.

The key components of the mandate of this commission were to conduct such investigations as were necessary to determine the extent and prevalence of investigative practices involving members of the RCMP that were not authorized or provided for by law and to report the facts and to advise as to any action deemed necessary in the public interest about such matters.

Hon. Members will recall that in discharging its responsibilities, this Commission operated from July 1977 until August 1981, four years and 50 days. During that time, Mr. Justice McDonald and his colleagues searched for and heard testimony about these matters at a level of intensity and detail unprecedented in respect to the activities of the RCMP, its personnel or this general sector of Government operations.

The facts are clear. There were hearings of two kinds, evidentiary and those requiring briefs. Evidentiary hearings were held both in public and in camera. One hundred and sixty-nine public hearings and 144 in camera hearings were held at which 149 witnesses were examined and 105 exhibits received. Superintendent Nowlan was one of those witnesses. Public briefs were heard twice in Vancouver and some five times in Regina, Toronto, Montreal, Fredericton, and Ottawa. There were several volumes of public reports, and to supplement hearing information, the commission met informally with many groups and individuals.

What then of the allegations about the conduct of the present Commissioner of the RCMP, Robert Simmonds, relating to the matters examined by the royal commission? I refer Hon. Members to the second report, Volume I entitled "Freedom and Security Under the Law", where at page 7, paragraph 23, the Commissioners concluded the following:

> Robert Simmonds became Commissioner of the RCMP on September 1, 1977, almost at the same time as this Commission was established. Before that, since 1976, he had been the Deputy Commissioner responsible for administration, and his brief time in that position was his only prior experience at headquarters; all his earlier career, from the time he joined the RCMP in 1947, was spent in Alberta and British Columbia. Managing a police force the size of the RCMP is a difficult task at the best times. Commissioner Simmonds' burden has been increased greatly during the past three and one-half years by the activities of our inquiry and those of the provincial inquiries. His stance vis-à-vis this Commission has been, throughout, one of total co-operation. We are conscious of the fact that he has put on hold certain plans and proposals that he had for change within the Force, pending receipt of our report, and also that he has felt constrained to suspend or terminate certain practices merely because to continue them might have meant to continue unlawful conduct. Our inquiry and report touched only occasionally upon Commissioner Simmonds. He inherited the situation which led to our inquiry and participated in neither the formulation nor the continuation of the policies which have been its substance.

This royal commission had unrestricted access to every RCMP and almost every other Government record it wished to examine, and to any RCMP officer and other Government official it wished to question including the then Prime Minister. It was in full possession of the facts and thus in the only position to draw the appropriate conclusions. In this context, these allegations directed at Commissioner Simmonds seem particularly ill-advised, to say the least. This point brings me to the last observation which I wish to make on this issue.

The Royal Canadian Mounted Police is justifiably a well-respected institution in Canada. I say justifiably because of the way it links us to our past, because of the unparalleled record of service its personnel has provided to Canadians, and because of the universality of the regard and recognition it affords for Canada abroad. These are the facts, no less conclusive than the commission of inquiry's estimation of Mr. Simmonds.

In conclusion, I wish to state the Government's view that the facts as reported by the McDonald Commission speak for themselves, and that the call for another inquiry into these allegations is totally unjustifiable.

AGRICULTURE—EFFECT OF REDUCED INITIAL PRICE. (B) REQUEST FOR 1985 INITIAL PRICE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on April 10, I directed a question to the Minister of State responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Mayer). I asked him how he expected farmers in western Canada to survive when just a day or two before he announced the lowest initial prices for wheat, barley, and other grains in real dollars since the 1930s. The Minister's response to that request was essentially to slough off the question. He ended his response by saying:

> The problem we face is a larger problem, that is, very depressed world grain prices.

Was that a brilliant response to a serious question about how Canadians would survive?

The fact of the matter is that Canadian grain producers will be receiving about $1.50 per bushel for No. 1 wheat. Of course we have to take into account the cost of handling and transportation. The net return will be something over $3 Canadian, whereas United States farmers in the mid-West will be receiving over $6 Canadian per bushel this year regardless of the world price. For example, if the world price is $3.50 or $2.50 per bushel, they will still receive $6 plus per bushel.

Again I ask the Minister how he expects farmers in western Canada to survive when they are receiving about half as much per bushel of wheat as their American counterparts.

• (1825)

The doom and gloom hanging over western Canada is unprecedented, I believe, since the 1930s because the United States and the European Economic Community are engaged in an agricultural commodity price war. The United States Congress has voted sufficient funds to fight the war for the next three years. Its law provides funds for five years. The visits of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to Washington produced no results, assistance or backing off by the United States Government on the impact of that stablization, subsidization and bonus program.

When the Prime Minister went to the Economic Summit in Japan, he said he was going to raise the matter. I believe he did. There was no indication in the communiqué from the conference that the seven heads of Government would take any action with regard to the grain and agricultural commodity price war. The communiqué indicated that they would not even refer the matter of agricultural commodities to the negotiating table at the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade talks. That is a disaster for Canadian farmers. Everyone will have to hunker down to the prospect of a trade war. If the seven nations do not press to have agricultural commodities on the negotiating agenda in the GATT conference in Uraguay this fall, it means the agricultural commodity price war between the European Economic Community and the United States will go on. Not to have it on the agenda is a tremendous failure on the part of the Prime Minister.

I appreciate the fact that he raised the matter, met with farmers and their representatives in Vancouver, but the farmers are left defenceless. The Prime Minister and the Government must announce immediately a deficiency payment program to stabilize and secure the western economy. At the moment the western economy, especially in Alberta and Saskatchewan, is reeling from the impact of low oil prices. Not to provide minimum support for the grain industry will be devastating.

When the Parliamentary Secretary speaks tonight, it is essential that he immediately announce at the bare minimum financial assistance which the three prairie pools, the Western Grain Growers Association and other western farm organizations have asked for. They need a stabilization deficiency payment adequate to secure and maintain that industry during the coming crop year and in years ahead. One approach might be to reinstate the 1985 grain prices which would tell the farmers that the Government was not prepared to provide as much financial assistance as the United States Government does, but that there would be some financial assistance to stabilize and secure the whole western economy during the coming year.

If action is not taken now by the federal Government, there will be a serious financial crisis on the Prairies. There will be bankruptcies and farm losses. There will be a loss of the entire rural economy. I hope the Parliamentary Secretary will come forward and make that commitment tonight so that western agricultural and grain producers will know where they stand. They will know what their future is going to be and that the Government is going to support and assist them.

Mr. Pierre Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am always a little bit surprised when I hear my colleague the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) echo day in and day out the same fears and concerns expressed over the past 18 months by members of his Party about the farm industry. Given his considerable experience, he is well aware that Canadian grain producers are caught in a cross-fire of sort, in the war that is being waged between the European Economic Community and the United States. Canada is the innocent victim of the large scale war which two of the world economic powers are waging through massive subsidies to their respective agricultural industries.

We have tried to ease the burden of grain producers by reducing to 19 per cent the cut in initial prices which could have been a lot worse and which is a lot less than that made in the American prices.

• (1830)

[English]

When initial prices were announced, it was also announced that tariffs administered by the Canadian Grain Commission have been frozen at last year's levels. These include cleaning, elevation and storage charges at terminal and county elevators. The Government is acting in other ways. It is studying domestic wheat prices. A special parliamentary committee chaired by the Hon. Member for Crowfoot (Mr. Malone) is studying ways of increasing returns to wheat producers. The committee is expected to report to Parliament in mid-June.

When Members opposite call on the Government to do more for prairie farmers, they seem to have lost sight of the fact that the Government has done a lot for farmers already. It has announced policies and programs which have resulted in $4 billion in benefits to farmers, of which $1.5 billion has been channelled to western farmers in particular.

[Translation]

The Hon. Member should not disregard this fact nor ignore the efforts which our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has made. He has described this as a defeat. Is it possible to speak of a defeat when for the first time a Prime Minister, at an international meeting of seven world powers, has managed to have it appear on the agenda and convince these powers that it is absolutely necessary to do something to end this price war? On the eve of his departure for Tokyo, the Prime Minister had met all the Canadians representatives of the farm industry to seek their advice before meeting the representatives of the seven major powers.

Something else that had never been done in the past, Mr. Speaker, is that our Minister, the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board (Mr. Mayer) is going to meet with representatives of other wheat exporting nations in Vancouver in a few weeks from now.

I therefore feel, Mr. Speaker, that this Government has made every effort, everything it could in the current farmers' crisis of which we are well aware, to make sure Canadian producers are well represented and get the best deal in the circumstances.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NAVY PARTICIPATION IN HAWAIIAN ISLAND SHELLING EXERCISE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, today the Canadian Navy will begin shelling the Hawaiian island of Kahoolawe as part of RIMPAC 86 exercises with the United States. We do this despite strong opposition from the Hawaiian Senate and Congress, despite pleas addressed to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) by Hawaii's two Members of the U.S. House of Representatives, and despite the pleas from the Office of Hawaiian Affairs and hundreds of individual Hawaiians that we stop this process.

Over the years Canadians have prided themselves on their scrupulous regard for U.S. interests and, on occasion, have bemoaned and lamented the fact that our U.S. friends appeared not to reciprocate. Today, we are in the wrong. Today it is the Government of Canada which refuses to listen to the pleas of our friends when they remind us that the United States Registry of Historic Sites has designated 544 locations on the island as having historic and religious significance. It is time to listen to our friends and to act fairly.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

CONDITIONS AT HANDFORD NUCLEAR REACTOR IN WASHINGTON STATE

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I raised the matter of the Handford nuclear reactor, which is about 400 kilometres south of Vancouver. It is 23 years old and similar in construction to the Chernobyl reactor. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) was not briefed on the matter. I want to put on the record some things that he might consider.

• (1105)

In 1964 there was a hydrogen gas explosion there. In 1976 there was a second hydrogen gas explosion. In 1973, 500 million litres of nuclear waste were flushed out through the Columbia River to the ocean. More recently, there have been six shutdowns since January. A United States Government Department of Energy report of April 26 warned that the valve disc could break off and obstruct the cooling pipes around the reactor core and there could be a meltdown. They will have to spend $1 billion on the plant over the next eight years.

A Seattle newspaper has called for the reactor to be closed down and yet the Secretary of State for External Affairs does not know anything about this possible danger to Vancouver.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

TOXIC WASTES—MOBILE DISPOSAL UNIT

Mr. Allan Pietz (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to focus on some good news for the environment. A company in Welland has developed a mobile waste disposal unit with the highest PCB destruction efficiency rating in the world. The unit is called the Pyroplasma. Conventional units have a destruction efficiency rate of approximately 99.99 per cent. This unit has an unofficial destruction efficiency rate of 99.9999999 per cent.

The provincial and federal Governments are developing test procedures which will set permit application guidelines for the unit's use. The local public knows what the mobile unit can do and wants it to be used. Other Canadians living close to industrial dump sites have been asking for a solution to the toxic waste problem for years, and we believe we now have a solution in Niagara.

NATIONAL POLICE WEEK

SEVENTY-FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF FINGERPRINTING SYSTEM

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Mr. Speaker, this week is a special one as we celebrate National Police Week. The theme of this Police Week is the celebration of the 75th anniversary of fingerprinting in Canada.

In 1911, as a result of the diligent efforts of Inspector Edward Foster of the Dominion Police, an Order in Council signed by Prime Minister Laurier created a national bureau, and for the first time fingerprints were used as a means of identifying criminals. Seven years earlier in 1904, Inspector Foster had met with officials of Scotland Yard. It was then he first heard of this system, and on his return to Canada he lobbied for a similar system. The rest is history.

The fingerprinting system is the most positive means of identification available. It can safely be said that Canada's record keeping and fingerprinting systems are among the best in the world. We owe a debt of gratitude to the ingenuity, persistence, and foresight of Inspector Foster, and also to the capable men and women of today's RCMP who are continuing the excellence of the fingerprinting system.

ALLEGED STATEMENT BY SECRETARY OF STATE ON QUEBECERS' COMPETENCY IN ECONOMIC MATTERS

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, a report in today's Le Devoir indicates that 59 per cent of Quebecers are dissatisfied with the Conservatives.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell the Secretary of State (Mr. Bouchard) that, notwithstanding his low opinion of Quebecers' know-how in economic endeavours, 59 per cent of them are dissatisfied precisely because of the Conservative Government's mismanagement of economic affairs. The issues of Domtar, Gulf, Matane, Port-Cartier, Desbiens and the shipyards immediately come to mind.

Mr. Speaker, I would hope that the Secretary of State will apologize to Quebecers for insulting them by suggesting that they are not quite as competent as their English-speaking fellow citizens when it comes to economic matters.

TRIBUTE TO DESJARDINS GROUP

OPENING OF BANK IN TORONTO

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw the attention of the House to today's opening of the first Toronto office of the Desjardins Group.

Created in 1900 by Alphonse Desjardins, the group's first caisse populaire opened its door in Lévis. This co-operative financial institution is owned by more than four million members, most of them Quebecers.

Its 24,000 employees, supported by 18,500 volunteer board members, now administer $26 billion in assets through 1,400 affiliated caisses.

From its Lévis head office located in the riding of Lévis the Desjardins Group has launched a new expansion drive to diversify its clientele and its loan portfolio.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to see the Desjardins Group expanding into the Toronto area. Let us pay homage today to all employees and management staff of the Desjardins Group, particularly to its founder Alphonse Desjardins.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NAVY PARTICIPATION IN HAWAIIAN ISLAND SHELLING EXERCISE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, in a matter of days, Canadian naval vessels will begin shelling the sacred Hawaiian Island of Kahoolawe despite the fact that the State's Senate and Congress formally demand that the five RIMPAC countries, Canada, Australia, the United States, Japan and New Zealand, stop the bombing and return the island to Hawaiian control. Canada has consistently ignored this plea, and in 1984 under Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau was the only foreign country to shell the island.

Japan, and now New Zealand and Australia, are refusing to participate in the shelling, out of respect for the indigenous people of Hawaii.

• (1110)

This island is of deep cultural, religious, historic, and scientific significance. There are 544 recognized archaeological sites on the island. It is not just the Hawaiian people who are outraged at the insensitivity of the Conservative Government. All major peace and church groups have registered their protest.

Would Canadians stand by and witness a foreign military bomb Vancouver Island or the Queen Charlotte Islands, or shell our graveyards? No, they would not. Given the dozens of letters I have personally received on the issue, Canadians will not stand for our complicity in this act of military hooliganism.

TRADE

EXPORTS TO PACIFIC COUNTRIES

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, last year Canada's exports to the Asia-Pacific region were $15.2 billion, surpassing our total exports to western and eastern Europe combined. Thus the recent visit of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to meet with top leaders of Japan, China, and Korea was both timely and important.

The success of his major initiative is evident in the positive responses received from Japan in respect of easing its building codes, which would assist exports of B.C. lumber, and Korea's agreement to cut tariffs on canola and open up its markets to

B.C. coal. Our trade with China will benefit from the additional $350 million interest-free financing announced to support Chinese purchases of Canadian goods and services.

The Prime Minister's visit was vital in creating new friendships and understandings between our nations, for it is only from such a base of knowledge and mutual respect that we can build the foundations for expanded trade and investment opportunities on both sides of the Pacific.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

NEGOTIATION OF AGREEMENT WITH JAPAN

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister announced recently that the Canadian and Japanese governments have negotiated a bilateral agreement on co-operation in the field of science and technology.

The agreement identifies our objectives in this area and provides for a wide variety of joint initiatives, which will have substantial economic benefits for Canada and Japan. Such agreements have always proved to be very profitable for Canada. About 75 joint projects have already been initiated in this way.

Our Government recognizes the importance of research and development for Canada's future, and will continue to promote growth and entrepreneurship in this field.

As the Member for a riding where the technology sector plays a very important role, I am very pleased with this agreement.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

FRANCOPHONES' RIGHT TO TRIAL IN FRENCH

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, on April 15, I asked a question in the House about two Francophone defendants in Newfoundland who were seeking the right to have a trial in French. For the first time in this country's history, our Government has challenged before the courts their right to have a trial in French.

This morning I heard that the two defendants were appealing the decision and that the federal Government insists on having the trial continue in English, without first obtaining a ruling from an appeal court on the question of whether or not they have the right to be heard in French.

Mr. Speaker, the position taken by this Government in this case is shameful, and I would urge the Minister of Justice (Mr. Crosbie) to change that position.

[English]

IMMIGRATION

REVOCATION OF PERMIT HELD BY BATTERED WIFE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, on April 30 Employment and Immigration Canada sent a letter to Mrs. Helga Muselmann of Hawkesbury, Ontario, stating that she had one month to leave the country because she and her husband were in breach of a ministerial permit.

The breach in question is that the husband has been convicted of a crime. The crime he committed was that he beat up his wife, a crime which the victim rightfully reported to the police. The conclusion is that this woman is now being asked to leave the country because she reported a battering husband.

I call upon the Minister of State for Immigration (Mr. McLean), who is also the Minister responsible for the status of women, to take the necessary steps to allow Helga Muselmann and her children to remain in Canada. Otherwise all immigrant women will conclude that, if they are beaten by their husbands, they had better keep quiet or they will be deported by the Government.

IMPROVEMENTS IN SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. Don Ravis (Saskatoon East): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to share some good news. Today I want to share with the House the Government's latest economic successes. The Bank of Canada rate, set yesterday, is the lowest since 1978. The inflation rate in Canada for April dropped to 3.9 per cent, and unemployment is at a four-year low of 9.6 per cent.

These are figures to make all Canadians rejoice, but I should like to focus on my own Province of Saskatchewan for a moment. In that province our Government is responsible for creating 21,000 new jobs. The economy is booming. Bankruptcies were down 10 per cent last year, and exports in the first three months of 1986 were up 12.7 per cent over the same period last year. Housing starts were up 32 per cent in April compared to April, 1985, and building permits are skyrocketing.

Whatever the Opposition wants to have Canadians believe, these facts speak for themselves. Our economic policies are working, and that is what counts.

ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST—APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF JUSTICE PARKER TO CONDUCT INQUIRY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to welcome the Prime Minister back to Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I have a question relating to the Prime Minister's appointment of Chief Justice Parker to conduct the inquiry.

On August 21, last year, the Chief Justice of Canada, Brian Dickson, was speaking to the annual meeting of the Canadian Bar Association in Halifax, and he had this to say:

I think we must approach with reluctance judicial participation in royal commissions and inquiries.

Chief Justice Dickson went on to say:

Judicial affiliation with such commissions presents a serious threat to the reality and image of judicial impartiality and independence and, in my opinion, in most circumstances, is undesirable.

Why did the Prime Minister ignore that advice of the Chief Justice of Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I tried not to follow any advice. I think Chief Justice Dickson said "in most circumstances", as the Leader of the Opposition just quoted. This is an exceptional set of circumstances. I think we have acted properly. I would think that most Canadians would applaud the appointment of an impartial person.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Not many inquiries could be more politically charged than this one, Mr. Speaker, and I think Chief Justice Dickson's point has been made.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT ORDERED PUBLIC INQUIRY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my second question to the Prime Minister is as follows. I have read the terms of reference of this inquiry. Has the Prime Minister ordered Chief Justice Parker to hold a public inquiry? Is he going to give Opposition parties the right to retain counsel to represent them before the inquiry?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Chief Justice is bound and governed by the Inquiries Act which allows him to act as he sees fit in this area.

INQUIRY WHETHER PRIME MINISTER WILL TESTIFY

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the circumstances, doesn't the Prime Minister believe the judge might have ordered a public Inquiry?

In any case, my third question is as follows:

[English]

Will the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister, both having accepted responsibility in the matter since September 9 for the enforcement of the conflict of guidelines, be testifying before that inquiry?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that will be up to Chief Justice Parker as indicated in the letter of September 9 to which the Leader of the Opposition refers, that the appointment of an impartial person would be appropriate. We have done that.

Mr. Broadbent: Not for conflict of interest.

Mr. Deans: It is not appropriate.

Mr. Mulroney: We will, of course, follow whatever he feels appropriate.

ROLE OF JUDICIARY

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister about the propriety of dragging a judge into a matter like this. The Chief Justice of Canada last August referred particularly to the dangers of bringing judges into:

—matters of great political sensitivity and controversy—

We are not talking here about the laws, we are talking about an administrative policy, the guidelines introduced by the Government to fulfil a campaign promise. How could there be anything more politically sensitive and controversial, and won't the Prime Minister recognize the impropriety of dragging the Bench into a matter like this?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): That is a pretty unworthy statement, Mr. Speaker. On May 7 last, as reported at page 12880 of Hansard, the Member asked this question:

Is there not a duty on the part of the Government—to do an independent investigation and verification—

That is exactly what we have just done. We have done what the Member requested. Now you are on the other side of the street, as usual.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

TERMS OF REFERENCE

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask about that independent investigation, particularly why the terms have been drawn in such a narrow way. If it is found that a conflict of interest exists on the part of the former Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, should the inquiry not be able to look into all of the activities of the Minister, whether or not they are known to this House and the media? If a conflict of interest is found to exist, why is the inquiry limited only to looking into matters which have already been raised?

• (1120)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the terms of reference are broad and appropriate. We have full confidence in the independence of the Chief Justice to conduct the inquiry and make the necessary value judgments.

STATEMENT MADE BY FORMER PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, not only is Chief Justice Dickson opposed to using judges for this kind of political decision making, but last year's annual report of the Canadian Bar Association made exactly the same point. I would like the Prime Minister to consider the following observation made by a former Prime Minister, the Right Honourable John George Diefenbaker:

> It has been abundantly evident, however, that judges should not be used to preside over royal commissions in which matters of political controversy are of the essence.

Why did the Prime Minister not accept the good advice of Mr. Diefenbaker and keep the judges out of political decisions?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Chief Justice of Canada said that this should be avoided in most circumstances. We have done that. We are not trying to involve anyone in political decisions. This requires an impartial view, and we felt that the Chief Justice appointed was the most appropriate person.

MORAL RESPONSIBILITY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister acknowledge that what is involved here is not a matter of law? We are not asking the judge to determine whether the former Minister broke provisions of the Criminal Code. What is involved here is the moral responsibility of the Minister and, related to that, the moral responsibility of the Prime Minister to enforce his own guidelines. A judge should not be involved in that kind of process. It is the Prime Minister's responsibility.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is not a view which is shared by all Members and all previous Prime Ministers. Previous Governments have acted from time to time in these circumstances in the same way. We believe that, irrespective of the background, a man of competence and impartiality can bring about an appropriate result which will be helpful to the country and democracy.

REACTION TO PREVIOUS INQUIRY FINDINGS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, is the Prime Minister aware that, when the same judge was responsible for a similar inquiry at the end of the 1960s, as soon as he brought down his report there were criticisms of partisanship and unfairness? If he is aware of that, does he not understand that he is politicizing the judiciary, which ought not to be done?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: That is an improper question.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, to the contrary, the Canadian tradition—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member knows that question comes awfully close to—

Mr. Broadbent: To what?

Mr. Speaker: —comments about the judge.

Mr. Broadbent: No.

Mr. Speaker: Maybe he could rephrase his question.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to clarify it for you, if it is needed.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I am asking the Prime Minister—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Is that in order or not?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Order, please! I am trying to tell the Hon. Member that the question he asked, as I heard it, was, in my view, out of order. Can he rephrase his question in such a way that I can accept it?

Mr. Broadbent: Is the Prime Minister aware that when the same judge brought in a report at the end of the 1960s on a similarly delicate political matter there were immediate accusations by the media of unfairness and lack of objectivity? If he is aware of that, is he not aware of the position he is putting the judge in by giving him a political mandate? He is putting the judge in a position which no judge should be in.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Order. That's a statement.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian tradition is that once a man or woman accepts an appointment to the Bench, his or her political past—

Mr. Broadbent: You're asking him to make a political decision.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Let him answer the question.

Mr. Mulroney: —does not enter into the matter. We presume that all the federal judges are going to be as independent and impartial as they have traditionally proven to be.

• (1125)

REQUEST FOR REPLACEMENT OF DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. During his absence on official business the Prime Minister was unable to witness the most blatant example of stonewalling that this House has ever seen, which has caused the image of the Government to be tarnished. In view of this I would like to ask him if he would not undertake to ask the Minister of National Defence to step down as Deputy Prime Minister to be replaced by a more suitable appointee.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

RESPONSIBILITY TO ENSURE APPLICATION OF CONFLICT OF INTEREST GUIDELINES

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, if the Prime Minister refuses to replace the Deputy Prime Minister, could he at least give the House the assurance that he will remove the responsibility for applying the conflict of interest guidelines from his purview, considering the example given by the Minister in the past two weeks here in the House?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I think the position I announced in my replies this morning reflects the Government's position, which is entirely appropriate.

[English]

JUSTICE'S APPOINTMENT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question arises with respect to the position into which the judge who has been chosen to conduct the Stevens conflict allegations is being put. As a judge who was, in fact, appointed and promoted by Conservatives, as a former Tory riding president, and as a judge who conducted—

Mr. Speaker: Order, order. The Hon. Member knows full well our rules about comments about the judiciary. I am prepared to hear his question, but I must remind him that comments about the judiciary are out of order.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the inquiry report prepared by the judge in question was denounced as a whitewash and a political hatchet job for the Conservative Government of the day, and as a double standard by respected journalists of the day, I want to ask the Prime Minister, in view of those antecedents, does he not recognize he is putting the judge in an impossible position and opening him to precisely this kind of attack on his political independence?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): He was appointed by Mr. Diefenbaker, promoted by Mr. Trudeau, and he conducts himself, as with all judges, honourably in the conduct of a commission of inquiry. Mr. Justice Tom Berger, as I recollect, formerly of the NDP, was appointed a federal judge and conducted a commission of inquiry, and did so very well with no reference to his political roots.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, Tom Berger was not looking into allegations of misconduct by an NDP colleague.

TERMS OF REFERENCE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): In view of the fact that at the time Mr. Justice Parker accepted his previous commission of inquiry he emphasized that he accepted it because he was examining facts, and his findings would have no direct political effect.

Mr. Speaker: Question, please?

Mr. Robinson: Does the Prime Minister not recognize that this commission of inquiry is fundamentally different, and the Prime Minister has no business asking a judge to embark on an inquiry of this nature, which is properly conducted by the Parliament of Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): The terms of reference are clear, and they are, I think, very adequate, and will allow the Chief Justice to conduct the kind of inquiry that is required.

STATEMENT MADE BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Douglas C. Frith (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Upon the Prime Minister's return to Canada he said that the Conservatives are erecting a new standard of morality day by day in Canada. The manner in which the Deputy Prime Minister stonewalled this Parliament for two weeks refusing to answer legitimate questions of the Opposition with respect to the Stevens' affair—does that represent his concept of a new morality in this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I was referring to a ministerial resignation pursuant to the British parliamentary practice where we have differed sharply from the previous Liberal Government which insisted on a resignation only when a Minister was close to being indicted.

• (1130)

INQUIRY CONCERNING FORMER MINISTERS

Hon. Douglas C. Frith (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Would he kindly name the former Liberal Ministers to whom he referred in that response?

Mr. Gauthier: Put up or shut up, Mulroney. How is that?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member knows that such a reference to hon. gentlemen by name is out of order.

Mr. Frith: He won't answer.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if that was a question, the record speaks for itself.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST GUIDELINES—APPLICATION TO SPOUSES OF MINISTERS

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Since he indicates that the new standard of morality relates to the resignation of Ministers, perhaps I could refer him to his letter to Ministers on September 9 last year when he said that Ministers have an individual responsibility to prevent conflicts of interest arising out of business activities by their spouses. Is it the position of the Government that it is appropriate for the spouse of a cabinet Minister to do business with companies that are involved in a major way in doing business with the Minister's Department?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on May 9 the Member for Nickel Belt, presumably on behalf of his Party, asked for the appointment of an impartial, independent commissioner. That is exactly what we have just done, giving him the appropriate terms of reference. I think that should answer the apprehensions of the hon. gentleman.

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF PRINCIPLE ANNOUNCED BY PRIME MINISTER IN LETTER OF SEPTEMBER 9, 1985

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. My question is not related to the inquiry but to the principle set forth by the Prime Minister in his letter of September 9 last year to the members of his Cabinet. Does the Prime Minister think it is appropriate for the spouse of a Minister to do business with a company involved in business dealings with the Minister's department?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the subject matter before the commission of inquiry, and the chairman of the commission will pass judgment at the appropriate time.

PUBLIC WORKS

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF PRACTICE IN AWARDING CONTRACTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and concerns the contract-letting practices of the Department of Public Works. Yesterday, in reply to questions from reporters, the Minister of Public Works said: "I've always said that as long as the basic criteria are observed, namely cost and competence, I certainly don't mind showing my gratitude to people who deserve it." How can the Prime Minister reconcile this statement with his new morality code which he referred to earlier today and yesterday?

[English]

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, first, the Hon. Member will understand that the matter with respect to particular charges being laid is before the courts and it is not appropriate to raise any reference, directly or indirectly, with respect to that matter, in order to ensure that justice will be done impartially in the Canadian tradition. As far as ministerial responsibility, accountability, and the method of dealing in any particular Department are concerned, I believe my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, yesterday fully and clearly answered the whole question with respect to the way in which business is done. It is all above board by tender and is done according to law.

CONTRACTS AWARDED WITHOUT TENDER

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the Minister said that. The Minister did say yesterday that everything is done by public tender. We have a list of 2,000 contracts, since September 4, 1984, 1,000 of which have never been offered by public tender. Half of the contracts have had no tender in amounts in excess of $5,000. How can the Minister explain that today?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think I can explain it by saying that we are using the same Treasury Board guidelines that our predecessor, the Liberal Government, instituted. It has been a long standing tradition.

ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST—APPOINTMENT OF MR. JUSTICE PARKER TO CONDUCT INQUIRY

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. I was in the Ontario provincial Legislature during the last public inquiry in which Justice Parker took part, as far as I am aware. Does the Prime Minister not recognize the impossible situation in which he is placing the judiciary when he asks it to inquire into a matter which in fact involves the conduct of Ministers of the Crown as it relates to the exercise of their responsibilities to the Parliament of Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on May 9 in the House of Commons, the Member for Nickel Belt, speaking on behalf of his Party, asked for the appointment of a judicial inquiry into this matter. This is exactly what we have done.

ROLE OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister will also know that on May 9 I asked that the House of Commons Standing Committee on Elections, Privileges and Procedure make the inquiry. Does the Prime Minister not understand that it is more appropriate for Members of Parliament to pass judgment on the ethical standards of their peers than it is to ask a judge to come down with an inquiry which cannot satisfy either side in the argument, no matter how careful he is?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's colleague, the Member for Nickel Belt, specifically asked on behalf of his Party for the appointment of a judicial inquiry necessary to have—

Mr. Althouse: He is the House Leader.

Mr. Mulroney: Are you repudiating your own colleague? You better be careful because he has quite a temper. He asked for the appointment of a judicial inquiry and that is exactly what we have done. I am sorry that there is disarray in the NDP, but that is not unusual.

SHIPYARDS

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF CONTRACT AWARDED TO DAVIE SHIPBUILDING LIMITED OF LAUZON

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs or the Minister of State for Small Businesses. Could the Minister confirm that the contract for the CN Marine ferry awarded last March to Davie Shipbuilding Limited at Lauzon contained a provision asking the president of Davie, Mr. Saunders, to meet with the various parties involved in the Quebec shipybuilding industry with a view to rationalizing these shipyards? Is that correct? Yes or no?

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the day before and the day before that, I said that the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion had asked parties across the country—

Mr. Malépart: Does the contract contain a provision, yes or no?

Mr. Bissonnette: I mentioned that we had asked the people involved in our shipyards across the country to get together and let us know the best way to upgrade and increase the productivity of Canada's shipbuilding industry.

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION CONCERNING SOREL SHIPYARDS

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, the Minister doesn't want to answer the question because he is ashamed. Why does the Minister refuse to say that the CN Marine contract contains a provision in which Mr. Saunders is asked to meet with the industry with a view to rationalizing and phasing out the shipyards at Sorel? Why won't the Minister admit that a provision exists, and if it does not, why doesn't he table the contract in the House?

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, no, there is no provision that says Mr. Saunders is to shut down the Sorel shipyard.

PUBLIC WORKS

AWARDING OF UNTENDERED CONTRACTS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Yesterday the Minister of Public Works said that the Government has a godfather system whereby Conservative MPs can obtain information and occasionally other things from the Government for Conservative supporters in opposition ridings in Quebec. I assume this also applies outside the Province of Quebec. Since one half of the contracts are not tendered, will the Prime Minister explain why the Government not only looks at the merit of the applications but also at whom the applicants supported in the last federal election campaign?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is not unknown to political Parties to have Members of Parliament going into ridings that they do not represent in order to see whether or not they can either receive the benefit of advice in those ridings or convey some of the truth as they see it in those ridings. There is nothing unusual about this, and any suggestion that this is some sort of sinister arrangement would mean that all those New Democrats who come to Saskatoon West should be kicked out.

Mr. Broadbent: They are not coming with government contracts.

CONSTITUENCY ASSIGNMENTS OF GOVERNMENT MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, since this involves Government contracts, half of which are not tendered by the federal Government, will the Government House Leader provide us with a list of all Conservative MPs who are assigned to each one of the 71 opposition Members and tell us what instructions are given to his Conservative MPs about Government contracts?

• (1140)

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as you know, I would not comment on the admissability of that question since it has nothing to do with ministerial accountability. It has to do with the fact that—

Mr. Nystrom: Patronage.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: —in the New Democratic Party there are Members of Parliament who are given responsibility for certain areas and certain constituencies. This is not unusual. Any suggestion by the Hon. Member that there is something wrong with this system is simply not a strict, correct statement of fact.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DANGER REPRESENTED BY RISK OF RADIATION TO POPULATION OF QUEBEC

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Yesterday, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency issued a press release which referred to a higher than normal rate of radioactivity in the State of Vermont, which is on the U.S. border with Quebec. Could the Minister inform the House whether our people are at risk and whether there is any danger involved for our dairy producers in connection with the problem mentioned in the U.S. press release?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Hon. Member for Lévis for his question and his concern for the health of Quebec residents.

[English]

I wish to tell the Hon. Member that we continue to monitor the very high levels at Montpelier, Vermont, which have not been reflected in Quebec. I can assure residents of the province, specifically those in Montreal and Quebec City, that the radioactive levels we have detected in rainwater and in air have been very low levels, commensurate with the other levels across the country I have given in earlier days. There has been some radiation found in milk in Montreal, none has been found in milk in Quebec City. Again, that level is well below any set safety standard. We will keep on checking.

The fear that there were the same high levels in the province of the Hon. Member as found in Vermont has not been experienced. I wish to assure all Hon. Members and residents of the province that there is nothing to fear as we now know at this time.

AIRPORTS

AWARDING OF SECURITY SERVICES CONTRACT AT MONTREAL AIRPORTS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Transport. It is a follow-up to the Metropole investigation. On May 13, 1986, the Leader of the Government in the Senate was quoted as saying: "When I learned a deal was in the offing I made sure my wife stayed out of the arrangement". How did the Leader of the Government in the Senate know a deal was in the offing?

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, were the Minister of Transport here today I think he would remind the Hon. Member that the responsibility of the Government was to ensure the orderly transfer of security arrangements from one company to the other. The Government was advised that the company Metropole would be the company in question.

SENATOR'S KNOWLEDGE

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, if in fact the Senator had no involvement with his wife's business, given that we already know the wife is a shareholder in a company which is directly doing business with a Crown corporation, how did the Senator even know about the pending change in arrangements?

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I just attempted to indicate to the Hon. Member, all parties involved in the security at airports were advised. That includes the Government.

TRADE

LUMBER EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES—FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL MINISTERS' MEETING

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister who might be aware that we are on the brink of a trade war with the United States over free trade in softwood lumber. He might also be aware that the envoy process is going nowhere and that the clock is running on a U.S. countervailing action. My question is for the Prime Minister because it involves Canada's largest industry.

Would the Prime Minister advise the House whether there was any consensus for action on softwood trade at last night's summit meeting involving Trade and Forestry Ministers from across Canada, including our Minister of State for Forestry and our Minister for International Trade?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I cannot answer that question. I will be happy to enquire and report to my hon. friend as soon as possible.

MINISTER'S TELEVISED STATEMENTS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Prime Minister. Would he care to explain the comments made last night on BCTV by the Minister for International Trade who indicated that retaliation to the potential 30 per cent duty to be imposed against Canadian softwood is being considered by Canada? What U.S. goods is the Prime Minister planning to put on that hit list?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am unaware of that comment. Obviously, I do not accept the premise of it. I can tell my hon. friend that for two weeks, among other things, I have been constantly promoting the interests of the lumber industry across Canada through the Far East, as well as—and this will interest the Hon. Member—the interests of Expo 86.

EMERGENCY MEASURES ORGANIZATION

FOREST FIRES IN NEW BRUNSWICK—AVAILABILITY OF ASSISTANCE

Mr. W. R. Bud Jardine (Northumberland—Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. There are numerous forest fires now burning out of control in all of the maritime provinces. I am especially concerned about the forest fires in Northumberland County which have destroyed thousands of acres. Can the Minister advise whether provincial authorities have contacted the federal Government as yet, seeking assistance through the Emergency Measures Organization?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there is a very serious situation in New Brunswick. As of 9 a.m. this morning there were between 37 and 40 forest fires in the province, 16 of them out of control. As of 10 a.m. this morning the federal Government had received no request from New Brunswick for resources, although those resources, where we might be able to offer aid through EMO, have been inventoried so that, if called upon by the Government of New Brunswick, the federal Government will be able to act immediately.

I might add that, notwithstanding the serious situation, I am advised that there is no serious threat to life in any of the areas that are subject to the conflagrations.

REPORTED CONSEQUENCES OF ARTILLERY PRACTICE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the previous question. It is also for the Minister of National Defence. This morning I spoke with officials of Canadian Forces Base Gagetown who indicated to me that one of the major forest fires burning was a result of the use of live ammunition during artillery practice in the tinder-dry forests. Will the Minister explain what our Armed Forces personnel are doing shooting with live ammunition into the forests during these sensitive times? As a result of the fires established and the losses which will inevitably accrue, what compensation is the federal Government considering for the people affeded?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the allegations which have just been made by the hon. gentleman certainly will be the subject of close inquiry and scrutiny by the Department now that he has raised them in the House of Commons.

COMPENSATION INQUIRY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Minister of National Defence. Since one of the major fires was caused by the Canadian Armed Forces resulting in a number of towns being threatened in the Gagetown area, including the evacuation of many hundreds of families, what compensation is the Minister planning for these people?

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman has made a statement of—

Mr. Althouse: Of fact.

Mr. Nielsen: —a statement which he probably concludes is fact. Surely the prudent thing to do is to establish whether or not what he says is the case and is in fact true.

Mr. Riis: Then you should ask.

Mr. Nielsen: I think the very prudent thing to do is to allow me now to cause the necessary enquiries to be made in the Department to determine whether or not what the Hon. Member says is in fact true.

NATIONAL REVENUE

HOLSTEIN RESEARCH PROJECT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Why does the Minister continue to approve the spending of $10 million by Dreamstreet Limited to do a phoney research project to compare the production of red and white holsteins with that of black and white holsteins, when this project has been soundly condemned as useless by the Holstein-Friesian Assocation of Canada, the University of Guelph, and the Co-ordinator of Research for Agriculture Canada? What is the pressure that keeps the Minister approving this project and spending $10 million of taxpayers' money?

Mr. McDermid: Remember who brought that stupid scheme in.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, my colleague surely knows that there is no pressure involved. He must know that this is the residue of one of the most ill-conceived programs ever brought forward by the previous Government.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacKay: This is so in the opinion of all the knowledgeable tax experts in this country and is something which, incidentally, the Leader of the New Democratic Party was one of the first to note, to give him credit. It has turned out that we have had to audit all of these programs to ensure that the taxpayers' interests are being protected. I cannot comment on the state of this particular application because of the provisions for secrecy in the Income Tax Act.

APPROVAL OF PROJECT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, it is reported that this research project was turned down about three or four times before it was finally approved last November. Can the Minister indicate if the Minister of Agriculture or any other Minister made representations to have the project approved late last November or early December?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I can certainly tell my colleague that there were no such representations, as far as I am concerned. Even if there were, as I said earlier I cannot comment because of the provisions of the Income Tax Act.

MAIL DELIVERY SERVICE

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, daily mail delivery may be a thing of the past following a decision of the Government to be announced in six weeks' time. The Minister responsible has said that he could talk about delivery three times a week and he could talk about delivery four times a week. I ask the Minister not what he could talk about but what he is talking about. Will the Canadian people have input into this decision before the Government totally destroys the postal system in Canada?

• (1150)

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Canada Post): Mr. Speaker, I think I have already answered this question many times this week. We have been requested by the Minister of Finance to find the best possible way to bring the post office to self-sufficiency in a short period of time. Alternate-day delivery is just one of the alternatives that is being examined. It may not be retained but it has to be examined.

PUBLIC'S REQUEST FOR SERVICE

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the Minister says that he is searching for ways to fulfil the request of the Minister of Finance. What about the request of the Canadian people for better mail service rather than a return to the Pony Express?

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Canada Post): Mr. Speaker, I think I can answer that by saying that we have to deal with the deficit and we are committed to bringing economic renewal to the country. It is the representations that the Prime Minister makes in other countries that bring good news here to Canada.

LUMBER EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. I take it that the Prime Minister is aware of the May 8 letter of President Reagan to Senator Packwood indicating the President's intention to take unilateral action on Canadian softwood lumber. Would the Prime Minister not agree that there has not been a clean launch to the free trade issue? Has he not been doublecrossed by his friend, President Reagan, on the softwood lumber issue?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thought that had been asked and answered many times prior to my departure. I stand by the answer I gave. I do not know what unilateral action the hon. gentleman is talking about. We are satisfied that there will be a clean launch to the talks.

CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, given that the Prime Minister has been away and that these are more recent developments, would the Prime Minister inform himself of these more recent developments? Considering that this is Canada's largest industry, would he indicate to the House right now that he is prepared to fight for this industry, to oppose American countervailing tariffs, and to get himself informed about this issue?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not have to be informed about it. This Government is promoting the interests of that industry not only in the United States but around the world. We are actively seeking out new markets and we are trying to deliver relief to the industry which so desperately requires it. That is why we have been working so hard on behalf of this and other industries.

ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST—PARKER COMMISSION—REQUEST THAT OPPOSITION BE REPRESENTED AND PAID

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put another question to the Prime Minister regarding the Parker inquiry. If we consider the precedent of the Estey Commission, the Government of the country is certainly going to be well represented, and as the Prime Minister has said, handsomely represented, by counsel at the Parker inquiry. Will the Prime Minister allow the Opposition to be equally represented at that inquiry and to be paid by the Government as the Government's own representatives will be?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is asking me to intrude upon the jurisdiction of the Chairman of the inquiry. Representations can be made to the Commissioner under the Inquiries Act and he can make whatever determination he thinks is fair.

REQUEST THAT TERMS OF REFERENCE BE AMENDED

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister knows that he can control the parameters of the inquiry by amending the terms of reference. Since it is quite obvious, because of the Estey precedent, that the Government will be represented at public expense by counsel, will the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party be equally well represented and paid at public expense?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we are not controlling any parameters. The inquiry has been asked to deal with the matters raised by my right hon. friend.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): You set the terms.

Mr. Mulroney: Of course we set the terms as the Government must. When my right hon. friend was Minister of Justice, he was called upon from time to time to consult in that area on behalf of the Government. We have done exactly what my right hon. friend did when he was Minister of Justice in the Government of Mr. Trudeau. Representations can be made to the Chairman of the Commmission and he will exercise the same good judgment in that as he will, no doubt, in all other matters. He is entirely free, and given his remarkable competence and impartiality, I am sure he will make the right decision.

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—AUTO PACT INQUIRY

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Several weeks ago the Minister of Finance, speaking in Durham, indicated that the Auto Pact was definitely not on the table in the free trade talks with the United States. Would the Prime Minister therefore repudiate the statements made yesterday by Peter Murphy in the United States who said that Canadians have assured him that all items, including the Auto Pact, will be on the table?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the remarks of the American representative, Peter Murphy, were repudiated by the American Ambassador, Thomas Niles.

AGRICULTURE MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, of course it is Mr. Murphy who is in charge of the negotiations. Will the Prime Minister also choose between the Minister of Agriculture and Mr. Murphy and make it clear that marketing boards are also excluded from these talks?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would always be reluctant to choose against someone by the name of Murphy, but clearly I would choose our Agriculture Minister.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

POSSIBLE REDUCTION OF SERVICES—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Canada Post.

The Minister is considering various alternatives to reduce mail service so as to comply with the February 26 Budget constraints which fly in the face of the five-year plan advocated in the Marchment report.

Does the Minister agree with the Marchment committee recommendation that consultations be held with urban residents who do not have home delivery service, and when will he consult them?

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Canada Post): Mr. Speaker, my response to this question is that indeed the Marchment report raised a number of concerns. We are now examining its recommendations and we will comment on them when our operating plan is unveiled.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER MEET CITIZENS' COMMITTEE

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister meet with the Saint-Léonard—Anjou citizens' committee which is not satisfied with the service? As requested in my May 2 letter, will he meet with the committee before making a decision?

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Canada Post): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of my colleague's letter dated May 2 in which he asked me to meet with his constituents. Of course I will act on his request before announcing the policy.

AGRICULTURE

FARM FORECLOSURES LEGISLATION

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and deals with promises made to eight farmers who are faced with farm foreclosures. The Minister of Agriculture promised legislation before Christmas. The Minister of Finance had such legislation in his Budget. The Prime Minister himself mentioned it at the end of April and said that there would be legislation before the end of June. Can he now tell us what that legislation will be, and which Minister will be presenting it to the House?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we of course are working to pass what is probably the most exciting and best legislative package that has been passed by any Parliament—

Mr. Broadbent: In the history of mankind.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: — in the history of mankind. That legislation is a priority item and I hope I can count on the support of the Hon. Member in order to put the matter through quickly and expediently.

TIMING OF INTRODUCTION

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the Minister then explain to the House why the legislation was not put before us prior to Christmas as promised by the Minister of Agriculture? Will we again miss the June deadline set by the Prime Minister himself?

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, we want to make sure that the legislation is in the best form possible and has the widest consultation in order to make sure that all Members of the House who look at things objectively will pass it quickly.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the Hon. Member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke for one question.

LAKE HURON BOATING ACCIDENT—DISCONTINUANCE OF SEARCH

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, on or about November 9 of last year, a Kitchener, Ontario, couple were assumed to have perished in Lake Huron six days after the initial search and rescue operation was called off. Because of pressure, the Minister ordered another five hours of search on November 6. Why did he ignore the many requests from the family, from the community, and from members of his own caucus to continue the search for a longer period of time?

• (1200)

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I presume that question is directed to me. The Associate Minister of National Defence has been dealing with the details of that matter. If the Hon. Member would put his question when the Minister is back in the House on Tuesday, he would be delighted to respond in detail to him.

Mr. Hopkins: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I indicated to the Member that it would be for one question.

PRIVILEGE

CONFLICT OF INTEREST—APPOINTMENT AND TERMS OF REFERENCE OF INQUIRY—ALLEGED INTIMIDATION—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) raised a question of privilege on Wednesday on which, at his request, I indicated that I would rule today.

It is clear that no court or inquiry may "call into question statements made by Members of the House of Commons in Parliament" or "pass judgment on the proceedings of the House" or "infringe on the freedom of speech of the House".

The Hon. Member for Windsor West asks the Chair to find that there is a prima facie breach of privilege as evidenced by the intent expressed in the words of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen).

It is also clear that it must be possible to investigate the substance of an allegation once made in the House, although the making of an allegation during a proceeding in the House is protected by absolute privilege.

As the Hon. Member for Windsor West himself recognized, it would be difficult for the Chair to determine whether the purpose of an inquiry was "to improperly examine statements made in Parliament" in advance of the inquiry being created.

The Hon. Member asks the Chair to find, rather, that an intention to create such an inquiry has been expressed and as such would of itself be either a breach or an attempt to intimidate Members.

A breach of privilege cannot be hypothetical—it must have occurred—and therefore the Chair could not find an expressed intention to be a breach unless it were of itself a threat.

As the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault) and others suggested, the Chair examined more than the one answer of the Acting Prime Minister. Taken together and as a contextual whole, I cannot find that the answers impinge upon the privilege of freedom of speech of Members of Parliament. While the Acting Prime Minister indicates his intention that the substance of accusations and allegations made against the former Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion be investigated, I can find no threat, real or implied, that any Members may be called to account for anything they have said in the House, nor can I find a prima facie case of an attempt to intimidate Members and restrict them in what they might say.

I cannot find, therefore, that the basis of a question of privilege has been established, and I am therefore unable to accord this matter precedence over other business.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I undertook to address the question of the order of the business of the House for the first few days of next week, in any event.

There have been consultations among the House Leaders, and I am able to report that upon the return of the House after the long weekend we will consider second reading stage of Bill C-92, an Act to regulate interests in petroleum in relation to frontier lands; followed by second reading stage of Bill C-109, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, SRTC; followed by second reading stage of Bill C-106, an Act to amend the Young Offenders Act.

We will monitor the progress of these pieces of legislation. There are other items which I have discussed with the House Leaders that could be brought on for debate if we make progress on the Bills I have mentioned.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Government House Leader might take into account the fact that there is a large number of opposition days yet to be allocated and consider giving us some advance notice of when he will be calling those days.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I am certainly aware of that. I think we all agree that one of the dilemmas in respect of this particular trimester is that we have an inordinate number of allotted days, 13 in all, to fit into an otherwise constrained timetable.

I have attempted to do my bit for democracy in the Opposition by giving five allotted days this week, and I will attempt to give as much notice as possible in respect of the other ones which will be brought forward on a timely basis.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. In the interest of democracy, I think it would be appreciated by those of us in the Opposition if in similar circumstances we might not have five consecutive days but rather have them interspersed throughout the period so that we might deal with matters as they are current.

The Minister will recall that I requested an opposition day for April 14, which we were unable to get. For the future, perhaps we could try to schedule them a little more evenly throughout the period.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I accept that representation. Unfortunately the proposition put forward presumes that the Opposition cannot find five important issues to debate in any particular week.

Mr. Deans: It presumes that if we ask for one, it is important.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, last year the Government House Leader gave us an agenda some time toward the end of May. We are now into that period of time, and I am just wondering whether he will give us an agenda of work for the 30-odd days which remain before the summer recess. Of course we will start extended hours on June 12. Could he make it known in the next few days so that we can plan accordingly?

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, that topic is the subject of discussion with the Hon. Member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray) in House Leaders' meetings. The idea is that we all want to see what can be done in terms of the remaining days. I am trying to bring forth a reasonable list of priority items which we might address, and I think there is the prospect of making progress, to the credit of the Opposition as much as anyone.

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 82—GREAT LAKES WATER QUALITY AGREEMENT—INCLUSION OF TOXIC SUBSTANCE CONTROL PROGRAMS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport) moved:

That this House urges that the Government of Canada insist that the Government of the United States regard the fulfilment of responsibilities under the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement as an obligation, rather than a concession, and further urges the Government of Canada to renegotiate the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement to include toxic substance control programs to restore water quality in the Niagara, St. Clair and St. Lawrence Rivers for the benefit of millions of Canadians and Americans and that such negotiations should lead to the adoption of the zero discharge principle already embodied in Annex 12 of the Agreement.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it was in 1982, when Charles Ross, a former commissioner of the International Joint Commission, proposed in reference to the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement, which had been renewed in 1978, a national process and conference modelled on the 1972 Stockholm Conference on the Human Environment. The committee consisted of scientists representing the National Research Council of the United States and the Royal Society of Canada. It endorsed this proposal for a conference on the Great Lakes which would focus attention upon the importance of the Great Lakes as a resource and upon the severity of the problems facing it.

Therefore, in December last year the joint committee of The Royal Society of Canada and the National Research Council of the United States recommended that the parties to the agreement, namely, Canada and the United States, hold a binational conference on the Great Lakes and that they establish a preparatory committee to develop a draft statement of principles and a draft action plan to be acted on formally at the conference to be held before the end of the present decade.

You may be wondering why I put this statement on the record, Mr. Speaker. The statement when it was produced last December was urging Parliament to take the recommendation into account very seriously, and is one of the reasons that I, on behalf of my Party, am putting forward this motion today. There is a need to renegotiate or at least review the agreement with the U.S. on the Great Lakes water quality.

In November, 1984, there was an interesting document produced by the Niagara River Toxic Committee in which Canadian members of the committee recommended that there be a toxic substances control plan for the Niagara River. This was the result of intensive studies. In addition to that, water quality objectives should be stated in the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement for toxic substances in the Niagara River. These two recommendations are in keeping with the supporting and detailed material attached as annexes to the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement, but they are only annexes. Annex 1 specifies water quality objectives for certain toxic chemicals in the Great Lakes, and Annex 12 refers to persistent toxic substances and mentions specifically:

The intent of programs specified in this Annex is to virtually eliminate the input of persistent toxic substances—

I will come back to this later when I will touch briefly on the concept of zero discharge.

The point here is that you have another group of scientists, in this case all Canadians, who pursue very firmly the necessity, and raise it in the public's mind, that we should have a toxic substances control plan for the Niagara River and that the objectives in water quality should be stated in the agreement.

Moving on again to another document, the 1985 Report on Great Lakes Water Quality. In this we find some 21 recommendations. They all converge into one conclusion, at least they strike me as converging, on the necessity of definitely reviewing and where possible renegotiating certain aspects of the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement. I will read only recommendation No. 1, which has been brought to the attention of the public by media. Subsequent reports make the 1985 report significant and valuable. Reading from page 9, recommendation No. 1 is as follows:

The Great Lakes jurisdictions explicitly recognize the effects of air emissions on water quality in general, and on Great Lakes water quality in particular, in the formulation of air quality statutes, regulations and standards.

This statement in a way is vindicating some of the statements and even a publication issued by Environment Canada under the title Storm Warnings which the Minister has decided not to circulate because he feels that he has, in his judgment, a better knowledge of what the public should read and should not read. I would like the Minister to read this specific recommendation and reflect on it in depth. He would probably then reverse his decision because this very same matter is raised in a report that predates the publication of that brochure entitled Storm Warnings.

Another reason for a review or renegotiation, depending upon which of the two would be more effective, is the very important and complex but indispensable question of compliance of the United States and Canadian regulatory system with the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement. Nothing can be said that is adequate to stress the importance of this compliance, which is so essential for the working of the agreement. It is complex. It touches on several jurisdictions but it has to be done eight or nine years following the signing of the 1978 agreement. Therefore, the compliance aspect is extremely important. I would like to stress this in the strongest possible terms, even in the very short time available to me for the Government's consideration and action.

It is true that the November, 1984 cuts by the Government in toxicology research with the Guelph Centre and the Canadian Wildlife Service do not make our position stronger. Surely an intimate knowledge of the agreement per se, the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement, would make a difference, I submit, in the pursuit of a good plan for Canada, for Ontario, for Quebec and for any other province that in the long term would benefit from and would support it.

In this respect I have to put some starch into the collar of the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) because I have the impression that he has not done his homework.

I will read for the record, and for him, a passage or two from the agreement itself which was signed on November 22, 1978. In Article II the first Purpose reads as follows:

The discharge of toxic substances in toxic amounts be prohibited and the discharge of any or all persistent toxic substances be virtually eliminated.

This is a principle signed by both parties in the agreement. I am sure that the Minister takes seriously the Canadian commitment to that agreement and that he will hold the Americans bound. Yet in statements that he makes inside and outside of the House he conveys that somehow we should be grateful to the American jurisdiction, namely, EPA, for its even taking into consideration that something better be done in this area. It is as if it were a great favour due to us because of our smiles and statements of servile obedience to the dictator that perhaps have been given to the Minister by the Secretary of State for External Affairs for External Affairs (Mr. Clark), meaning that we must be nice at all costs. This is not the case, Mr. Speaker. The Minister must understand that there is an agreement which both nations have signed. Canada takes its commitment seriously and the Minister has the duty to ensure that the other party to the agreement also takes its commitment seriously.

• (1220)

There are other specific objectives contained in this agreement. I will briefly touch upon Article IV which says:

The Specific Objectives adopted pursuant to this Article represent the minimum levels of water quality desired in the boundary waters of the Great Lakes System and are not intended to preclude the establishment of more stringent requirements.

The Minister would do well to do his homework and become intimately acquainted with the wording and clauses contained in this agreement. If he does not do his homework, he cannot speak effectively for Canada. In the last week he has performed in a shaky manner. He has produced a shaky press release which I must bring to your attention.

In the third paragraph on page 1 reference is made to the understanding which has been agreed upon by the administrator of the EPA and the Minister of the Environment. It says that they, namely, the Minister and the administrator, suggested—note the word "suggested"—that a 50 per cent reduction of certain—note the word "certain"—toxic chemicals, taking into account applicable water quality and drinking water standards may be achievable—note "may be achievable"—by 1995 or sooner. We have the words "suggested", "certain", and "may be". What does this kind of press release achieve when the plan has not been announced and the wording of the statement is so vague? I urge the Minister to make that plan public and end the secrecy surrounding it.

There are other passages in the press release which really defeat the logic of any objective reader, but time does not permit me to put them on the record. When there is a suggestion of a 50 per cent reduction, when toxic chemicals are referred to as "certain toxic chemicals", and when it says that the target date "may be achievable by 1995 or sooner", it is not very convincing. This accounts for the reaction of groups which have already commented in very critical terms about the announcement made in Washington.

This leads me to the performance of the Minister as a negotiator. Quite frankly, I could not believe my eyes when I read in The Toronto Star of May 13 that the Minister had castigated the provincial Ministry of the Environment of Ontario for trying to scuttle a proposed clean-up agreement with the U.S. by demanding what he termed "unrealistically high standards". I do not know on what basis the Minister of the Environment for Canada can describe as unrealistic the standards set by his colleague from the Province of Ontario who shares with him the political responsibility for what happens through an agreement which is being worked out. If the Minister feels that certain standards are unrealistic, he should be forthcoming and explain why, rather than going public with what he is quoted as calling a "perception". In that article the Minister is also quoted as saying:

I'm prepared to be disabused of that perception.

Have you ever seen a better example of double talk? On the eve of a meeting in Washington with his U.S. counterpart the Minister of the Environment for Canada says that the Ontario Minister of the Environment is setting unrealistic standards and, in the same breath, he is indicating his willingness to be disabused of that perception on that eve of the meeting in Washington with his U.S. counterpart. Who in his right mind as a negotiator for Canada would, on the eve of a meeting with the representative of the other party to the agreement, go public on a disagreement among Canadians? That is unacceptable.

The Minister owes the House an explanation for that kind of silly, irresponsible and incompetent performance. If there was a disagreement between him and the Minister of the Environment for Ontario he should have worked it out in private. He should never have gone public with it. He made it public knowledge that the Government of Canada is in disagreement with the position of the Government of Ontario. If you were the negotiator on the other side of the table, Mr. Speaker, you would focus on and push for the lesser of the two positions. This is why we are gradually moving toward the adoption of a second-class plan. That is not fair, it is not right, and it is not in the interests of Canada.

When speaking for Canada the Minister of the Environment should put forth the unanimity of the views of the provincial Ministers of the Environment. That is the least he can do. If there is a disagreement, he should keep it to himself. A difference of opinion is something for Canada to resolve internally. It should not be proclaimed publicly here and in Washington to the benefit of the negotiating team on the other side of the table. I was profoundly disappointed by the Minister's action. I do not see how he can function effectively in this kind of an environment.

I am also disturbed by my impression that the Minister has not done his homework and does not understand that both Canada and the U.S. made an undertaking in the 1978 Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement. The U.S. is not doing us a favour by abiding by the content of this agreement. The Minister of the Environment does not yet seem to have understood this. This is a binding commitment. Certain parts of this agreement now seem to be in need of review and renegotiation as urged upon us by the Royal Society of Canada, the National Research Council of the U.S., and other reputable and substantial bodies in North America.

I am sure the Minister will get up and say that this is the first agreement, and the first time, and use other such wording which he has expressed in Question Period. The Minister is building on work which was done before he came on the scene. The 1978 Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement provided a building block. The study produced in November of 1984 by the Niagara River Toxic Committee is another building block. The study by the Royal Society and its counterpart in the U.S. is another building block. This is a gradual process. Now the Minister is in the driver's seat and he has to deliver. He must remember that his predecessor, in May of last year in this House, made a pretty strong statement promising some programs between Canada and the EPA on toxic chemicals in the Great Lakes.

I will conclude by saying we have moved this motion, and it is the second motion in 1986 on this crucial matter, because we can see that the well being of the economy and the health of Canadians of this and future generations are at stake here. This is a generational issue.

In the eight months since the Minister has been appointed he has not made one statement on his own initiative on this important matter unless prodded by us. Finally, Canadians at large, from Montreal to the west, are very nervous about this issue. I hope in his speech the Minister will reassure us that he understands the importance of being the negotiator for Canada, keeping the ranks together on the Canadian side, rather than giving away a bargaining position, and second, that he understands fully the power and the strength that he can derive from the proper, correct and decent interpretation of the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement of 1978.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I have two short questions which have to do with information. During the Member's comments he was discussing what has happened historically. He left out some of the important factors and accomplishments he was not able to achieve in his time as Minister of the Environment. Most of what he is talking about has to do with information.

I would like to make two points on the informational aspect. I would like to know if he understands that this plan, the negotiation that has occurred between Canada and the United States, which the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) in Canada has related by way of communiqué, has committed us, both the Americans and Canada, to providing the necessary information that is not available to Ontario, not available to the United States, but which is necessary to establish the loadings, targets and the timetables to reach the objectives we have committed ourselves to of 50 per cent. That is the first point.

Second, since he is familiar with events happening in Ontario and at the Ontario Government level, I wonder if he could tell us whether he will use his position as Member of Parliament for Davenport to reach an agreement to actually clean things up? Will he use his good office and his contacts with the Minister of the Environment of Ontario to see if he will release the necessary information to the Americans? The information is necessary for us, in co-operation with them, to clean up the St. Clair River.

Mr. Caccia: I find both questions extremely naive, to say the least. I do not know whether the Parliamentary Secretary realizes who is in Government. He is in Government and his Minister is in Government. I get my information from clippings in The Star. If the clipping is incorrect the Parliamentary Secretary has the time to correct the substance of the clipping. I do not mind at all. To expect me to operate as a mediator on his behalf, or on his Minister's behalf, or to obtain information for him is naive, I am not any more familiar than he is with what happens in Ontario. That is not the point. The point is that his Party is in Government. His Party has the responsibility to deliver. His Party, through the former Minister of the Environment in May, 1985, made a very strong statement at that time. I was happy to hear that because it showed that the predecessor to the present Minister was very keen to work out with Washington in May, 1985, a strong agreement. I am sure the Parliamentary Secretary remembers that.

Here we are a year later reinventing the wheel, talking about technical documentation, something that I thought was agreed upon a year ago, or that perhaps emerged last October when the head of EPA came to Ottawa. We have been kept completely in the dark. We do not know the contents of that particular plan, which I understand has been made public south of the border.

We can only go by what we know; a statement in May of 1985, a visit to Ottawa in October of 1985, then questioning the Minister in March, 1986, his commitment to excavation and destruction, and that is all.

If he sees in me the capacity of an alternate Government to obtain documentation and to negotiate on his behalf, I thank him for the high esteem that he has for me, but I am afraid he is overestimating my powers.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, what I was trying to do for the Member of Davenport (Mr. Caccia) is give him solid, clear information so that he might function from the same reasonable and accurate base that we are functioning from here. The necessary technical data for how much toxic material is going into the Niagara River and how much is totally going out is, indeed, part of the plan. We have a very rigid, close time frame in order to accomplish those determinations. What I am doing is telling the Member from Davenport that that is precisely a part of the plan. It is a very specific part of the plan and it is information that is not theirs.

I am also telling him that part of the reason it has been so difficult during this period of time, and part of the reason it has been so difficult from October until now in order for the Minister of the Environment in Canada to take the necessary leadership that he has taken now in coming to an agreement, is that if on the Ontario Government—and clearly he has political liaisons there and I think no one would argue that, himself included—the Minister of the Environment in Ontario wants to be even-handed and co-operate, as is necessary to clean up the problem, he is going to have to be open with all of us and provide the necessary information that is available only to him so we can get the job done. I am really giving him two pieces of information. I am letting him know that we, for our part, and the Minister of the Environment in all of his actions, have encouraged the co-operation of Ontario and look forward to their co-operation in any way possible in order to achieve a successful conclusion.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary seems unaware of the fact that the data on what goes into the river is already contained in a detailed study by the Niagara River Toxics Committee of October, 1984. It is a thick volume with detailed charts, containing all the emissions, industry by industry. It is right there. The data is coming out of our ears, as far as that is concerned. He can find it on pages 10 to 15 of the summary of that report, namely, the Niagara River Toxics Committee report of October, 1984.

As to the leadership of the Minister of the Environment, this is where I have difficulty in understanding what he means when leadership entails going public on a disagreement among Canadian Ministers of the Environment. What kind of leadership is that, I ask him? Does he consider that leadership?

Second, does he consider it leadership to go around, as the Minister does, trying to create the impression that in Washington they are doing us an enormous service, favour almost, by doing whatever he implies in this press release, rather than having the strength given to him by virtue of an international agreement. That is where the leadership would be. It is not this subservient attitude by which we thank Washington for paying attention to Canadians when there are so many problems with the environment in the United States. There is an agreement, with a very clearly defined set of principles. That is the basis on which the Minister of the Environment should be working, rather than creating the impression with the Press Gallery, as he did yesterday, that we should be grateful.

Mr. McMillan: What accord did you get from the Americans?

Mr. Caccia: As we did with acid rain, we laid out the foundation on which the Government could move. We did the preliminary work. There was an agreement with the provinces with respect to acid rain. There was an international agreement as well as a study by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources to assign a certain amount of money for the modernization of non-ferrous matters and so on. The basis is there. The world did not begin in September, 1984.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order. The period for questions and comments is now over. Resuming debate.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, while I do not want in any way to play down the importance of the pollution problems in other parts of the country, I want to spend most of the few moments I have in this debate speaking about the affects of pollution on Lake Ontario. I believe this particular area deserves at least one or two days of consideration, but I will attempt to deal with it in the 20 minutes that I have.

I suggest that we fail to grasp the significance of the problem if we do not consider it an act of criminal proportions when industries pour their killer pollutants into our drinking water. I realize that it is a difficult question and I appreciate that some would rather describe its significance in more muted terms. However, the facts are clear that for many years industries and municipalities, particularly those along the Niagara River, have been aware of the degree to which they were detrimentally affecting the future water quality of Lake Ontario as a result of much of what they dispose finding its way into the waterways of Canada.

What if such action were taken privately? For example, let us assume the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) lived outside the city and had some pollutants left over from a job which he undertook. If he could not find a satisfactory way to dispose of them and decided to pour them down his neighbour's well, he would be taken to court and put in jail for such a criminal act. In my opinion, that is a situation that is paralleled by what is happening to our drinking water in Canada as a result of what is being allowed to take place within the United States.

I see the Parliamentary Secretary screwing up his nose. The facts are clear that for many years the U.S. administration, as well as the Canadian administration, has been well aware of the implications from pollutants being disposed of either through toxic waste dumps or directly into the Niagara River.

Governments have pussy-footed for so long in trying to deal with this matter that the clean-up operations will now become the responsibility of the public purse when it ought to have been the responsibility of the corporate sector. The cost of meeting that responsibility will be immense.

I make that statement with some anger because I recall that when I spoke about the same kind of problems 18 years ago we received the same basic answers. We were told that further discussion must take place, that through the negotiation process we will find a way to solve the problems, that there will be certain progress forthcoming and that they would implement the proper technology if only it existed.

The Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) will recall a meeting in Stouffville, north of Toronto, that was held in the early 1970s. It was a public meeting held in a school gymnasium with at least 1,500 people in attendance. We were attempting to discuss whether it would be appropriate for liquid industrial waste to be poured into a deep well and pressurized into the ground.

It sounded like a simple process until one began to consider the consequences. Much of the water that serves the northern part of Metropolitan Toronto is drawn from that area. The faults that exist within the rock formations of that part of Ontario are such that any pressure would allow those pollutants to be forced through the ground into the water table. As that debate raged, there were those who actually thought there was no danger because such seepage would take so long that the pollutants would be cleaned up by virtue of passing through the soil. It was suggested that those who held that opinion could put the pollutants in their backyards. In other words, let those who produce the pollutants get rid of them. Perhaps industry would be more concerned and conciliatory in dealing with these problems if they had the responsibility of disposing of these pollutants as well as finding new and innovative uses for them in the manufacturing process.

That argument has been made as a possible solution to the matter. The only problem is that when given the responsibility of disposing of these pollutants, they were put in steel barrels, trucked out to the country and dumped in farmers' fields or along the road. That showed the degree of commitment and concern for the environment by those who were supposed to be trying to protect it.

I repeat that I believe such acts are of criminal proportion. I believe a number of people would share this view, perhaps to a lesser degree. Companies along the Niagara River, primarily but not entirely within the United States, are putting their killer pollutants in our drinking water. This will continue to happen for many years to come, notwithstanding the Minister's latest sojourn into Washington.

My attitude toward this problem is that the pollutants in those dump sites which have been identified should have been and must be dug up and disposed of in an area far removed from the waterways. I say that the Minister used to hold that attitude as well. If we cannot dispose of industrial waste, we must find new and more innovative ways of holding it until adequate disposal can be determined. This can only be done in areas far removed from the major waterways and major sources of drinking water.

I seem to recall that the Minister was an advocate of that very method, which was to dig it up, take it away and put it into containment areas until such time as technoloy catches up. We will then be able to dispose of it satisfactorially, neutralize it or do whatever one must do with it. That was the position of the Minister. Unfortunately, it no longer seems to be the position which we are advancing in the discussions. It is certainly not the position I hear coming across.

If I am not mistaken we now hear Mr. Thomas and the U.S. administration suggesting that they have come up with a new way. We will all get straws and suck it up. At least, that seems to be what they are proposing. The suggestion seems to be that somehow over the next 20 years we will find a magic, innovative way, yet to be discovered, to suck this stuff out of the ground. And to do what with it? I am not absolutely sure. However, it is a wonderful suggestion. How long will it take? It appears that the process which Mr. Thomas has yet to bring forward as a workable and practical means of dealing with the problem will take many, many years. In fact, it has been suggested that it will take a period of between 30 and 50 years before all of these pollutants can finally be gotten out of the—God knows how many perhaps 80—dump sites, large and small, which exist along the U.S. side of the Niagara River. In the meantime we must hope that it does not keep leaking. That seems to be the answer. However, if it leaks in the meantime we will just have to hope that no one takes sick as a result of it.

I think people across the country have to understand that what we are talking about is a river which contributes 83 per cent of the tributary flow into Lake Ontario. In fact, the river itself almost totally determines the environmental health of Lake Ontario, which is a source of drinking water for nearly four million Canadians.

Mr. Caccia: And nearly one million Americans.

Mr. Deans: We are not talking about the drinking water from some tiny lake which if closed off for human consumption purposes as a result of its waters being unfit for drinking could be replaced with some other source. Since the early part of the 1970s we have seen the detection of a wide variety—and I could list them—of chemicals, some in low and some in much larger concentrations, flowing into this river and subsequently into Lake Ontario.

While I was mentioning the four million Canadians who drink this water and who rely upon it as their sole source of drinking water, the Hon. Member for Davenport said that there are an additional 1.5 million people, I believe, who use Lake Ontario as their primary source of drinking water. The Niagara River problem and the pollution in it is one which has been with us, I suspect, for as long as the river has been there. However, the detection of major problems started back in about the late part of the 1940s—if I recall correctly it was in 1948—when the International Joint Commission issued a report on the sewage, bacteria, chloride, phenyl and other substances which existed in the river and, therefore, within the lake. From 1948 to date there has been report after report showing the deterioration of the lake, the deterioration of the fish, and the deterioration in the quality of all aspects of that body of water.

In 1974 the Department of the Environment reported widespread contamination in terms of mirex and PCBs in fish, in gulls and in gull eggs as determined by the Herring Gull Egg Monitoring Program, in Lake Ontario. In 1976 the Great Lakes Water Quality Board compiled a list of over 400 chemicals, some of them natural and some of them man-made—chemicals nonetheless—which were in the water, sediment and fish in the Niagara River.

In 1978 the same IJC, the same water quality board, reported 38 new toxic chemicals found in the Great Lakes environment, again including dioxin in fish. In 1980 the Canada-Ontario Review Board of the Niagara River Environmental Baseline Report reported high levels of toxic chemicals in the lower portions of the Niagara River, the part leading into Lake Ontario, and when compared to what was found at the opposite end, the in-flow from Lake Erie, in 1980, there was a report of elevated dioxin levels.

In 1981 there was a special report on pollution in the Niagara River and then there was the creation of the Canada-U.S. Niagara River Toxics Committee. I think at that point a great many of us breathed, if not a sigh of relief then at least a sigh of hope. It appeared that after numerous reports going all the way back to 1948 we had a group which was committed to doing something.

In 1983 the Canada-U.S. Water Quality Board reported that there were decreasing concentration trends for certain of the chemicals. I would say that was as a result of the vigilance of environmentalists; the Government of Ontario and the federal Government of the day had begun to identify the outflows which were occurring, where they were and what was causing them. I also pay recognition to the efforts being made as the result of certain of the manufacturers beginning to recognize their responsibilities. People were beginning to show some conscience with regard to the effect that that was having, and little by little we now start to back the problem up. However, I am afraid it is not being done quickly enough. Then, the Niagara River Toxics Committee released its report in 1984, something which my colleague who spoke before me dealt with.

I do not think there is any doubt as to what the problem is. The Niagara River continues to be a cesspool. It continues to feed into Lake Ontario. There are many along that river who do not give one hoot about what they are doing to the quality of the drinking water because they do not have to drink it. There are others who pay lip service to their concerns without being prepared to take the type of appropriate action. I wish to say to the Minister that among those is the administration within the U.S. itself which, for years, has fought tooth and nail against committing substantial sums of money to the clean-up. This is something the Minister knows. I am not telling him something he does not know. The former Minister is also well aware of the fact that the administration in the U.S. backed away when faced with the problem of having to extract from their corporate taxpayers the moneys necessary to effect the clean-up which they themselves required as a result of their own actions.

Mr. Caccia: Yet they find the money to build nuclear submarines.

Mr. Deans: Yes, that is right, they find the money to build nuclear submarines. The priorities are really a bit of a puzzle to people such as myself, and I am sure to many others.

This debate gives us an opportunity to put into perspective what we are seeing. It is not a new debate. It is a debate about a problem which has been with us probably since the beginning of the building up of the banks of that particular river and Lake Ontario. However, this problem has reached the point where, unless there is an emergency attack upon it, and unless it happens now and not in 1995, the effect of allowing it to continue will be one of disaster. The timing required to clean up the great lake of Ontario, will be such as to make it virtually impossible for people to continue to draw their drinking water from it into the year 2000. There is more which needs to be done.

I have a couple of minutes left and I will finish my remarks when we resume at 2 p.m.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I understand I have only a couple of minutes left. I want to end where I started.

It is indeed an act of criminal proportions to pour into the Niagara River the industrial waste that is going into that river and it can only be treated as such. If we understand them correctly, we consider the proposals made by Mr. Thomas, the Administrator of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, to be in the main inadequate. In certain areas, they are a step in the right direction.

We agree that plans to pre-treat municipal industrial discharges of toxic chemicals into the Niagara River and plans to more strictly control and monitor companies discharging industrial waste into the same river are a step forward. The plans to determine whether or not cleanups are required at approximately 60 lesser known toxic waste dumps along or near the river are a step forward. However, when discussing specific proposals to clean up the largest and most dangerous dump sites along the Niagara River including the Love Canal, Hyde Park, 102nd Street and the S-Site, Thomas apparently made it clear that EPA action does not envisage the actual digging up of the deadly toxins. These toxins are slowly seeping into the drinking water of almost six million people, four million of whom are Canadians. Instead, he is going to suck these up with some magic process he has not yet developed. The cleanup proposal outlined by Mr. Thomas is completely unacceptable.

I would call upon the Minister to make Mr. Thomas aware that the House of Commons, and I think I speak for most Hon. Members, will not accept anything less than an immediate start with adequate funds on the cleaning up of the mess that was created as a result of years of inactivity and negligence. If that cleanup is not undertaken, then we must find alternative ways of solving this extremely dangerous problem that has been allowed to develop over a number of years, notwithstanding the fact that information relative to the problem of the killing of Lake Ontario by Niagara River pollutants has been availble. Unless that problem is resolved, we will not be able, when the time comes, to clean up that water sufficiently to find it suitable for human consumption.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, the question I would like to ask the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) relates to industries, and particularly those in the Hamilton area. I think the Hon. Member might be able to offer some comment on this.

The Hon. Member spent a fair amount of time during the part of his speech I heard talking about the industries and their disposal practices and techniques. He mentioned that industry was a major if not the major contributor to the problem with which we are faced regarding toxins in the Niagara River and the Great Lakes Basin in general. I think members of the NDP often have difficulty removing the stereotype from industries. I think there is a valid point to be made here. Are all industries the same?

When the Hon. Member refers to industry, does he mean every industry? I think there are many examples of industries which in fact exceed the guidelines established and limits imposed through regulation or other means. I wonder if the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain would care to reflect a little on whether or not industry is the only cause of the problem. I think it is at least fair to recognize the efforts that have been made by some industries which have had some success, and on the other hand to identify and do something about those industries which have not responded in that way?

• (1410)

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I take that question to be a serious one. Of course in part the answer is that not all industries are the same. It would be a little foolish for me to leave the impression that I believed that; I certainly do not. Certain industries have made an effort and have been assisted in the making of that effort by public funds. However, there are industries operating in Hamilton—and my colleague just provided me with industries operating on the United States side of the Niagara River—which have been identified. The major pollutants in the Niagara River, the area upon which I concentrated primarily, have been clearly identified.

The most significant point sources of priority pollutants of the Environmental Protection Agency are the following: Buffalo Sewer Authority; Niagara Falls, New York Waste Authority; Bethlehem Steel; Niagara Mohawk Power; Atlas Steels, Ontario; Olin Corporation; Spaulding Fibre; the Town of Tonawanda, New York; the Town of Amherst, New York; and Donner-Hanna Coke, New York. In the area about which I am speaking, the primary producers of pollutants are almost entirely on the U.S. side.

If we are to have this matter cleared up, we have to treat it as a criminal matter. It is not an offence against the social fabric of society; it is a criminal matter. If people know that what they are putting into the rivers and lakes of the country is likely to make it impossible for that water to be used by plant, human or marine life, then they are committing an offence of a criminal nature. Having had it pointed out, there can be no acceptable explanation or excuse for continuing it. It is that simple.

Once it is pointed out to a company, a town or a city that it is polluting to the point where the water quality is being destroyed in such a way as to make it virtually impossible to recover from it, and peoples' lives are being placed in danger as a result, it has to be treated as a criminal matter. If that company, town or city continues to do it, it must face criminal charges. I speak for myself in that regard. That is my opinion of it, that is how I feel about it, and that is how strongly I take the position.

I do not think that slapping a weak fine on someone will make any difference, and begging them to change their wicked ways will not solve the problem. Therefore, I say to the Parliamentary Secretary that I recognize certain industries and municipalities are worse offenders than others. They should be told to stop now and, if they continue, that their principals will go to jail if found guilty. If they have no other way to remove the pollutant, they have either to decide not to use the product any longer or to find an appropriate way to store it until some satisfactory method is found to treat it.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the forthrightness of the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) in treating my first question in a serious manner, as it was a serious question. My second question is also a serious one and relates to available technology. I will not give my comments in the form of a long preamble, but I wonder whether the Hon. Member would describe his impression of available technologies. In his mind, what are the differences between extraction and the present proposal of the United States, which is being monitored in a way that will prove whether or not there is effectiveness and what has to be done?

It would be helpful for those of us on this side of the House to understand his sense of the situation. I would not necessarily blame him if in my opinion it was not accurate, but I would like to know what he thinks about extraction versus the proposal which he described as a straw, a proposal which really has a lot more to do with leachates than the simple sucking about which he spoke.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, let me put it into context. I am speaking about the proven method of extraction; going in, digging it out, and removing it from the areas of greatest environmental concern. That can be done in a relatively short period of time. It will require a considerable amount of time, effort, and work to do it. I accept that. However, if we accept a method which has yet to be proven or yet to be developed satisfactorily, it will take 30 years to 50 years, by Mr. Thomas' own admission, to achieve the result he anticipates could be achieved if it works.

My view is that we do not have 30 years to 50 years to wait for the clean-up which must take place. I well appreciate that the leaching operation, during the period about which we are talking, from an excavation point of view will be difficult to contain; of course it will. However, it will be more difficult or equally difficult to contain it in the other operation, and it will go on for much longer in the other operation if it takes some 30 years to 50 years to solve it.

In terms of existing dumps, it is my opinion that the excavation method is the only method which can be proven to work right now and can be proceeded with immediately. This must be kept in mind.

With regard to the future, I have held for years that no one should be allowed to introduce a new method of manufacturing which requires some form of disposal of industrial waste without producing concurrently the method to be used to dispose of the waste. If one wants to produce a new coolant, lubricant, or a new liquid into a process—it does not have to be a liquid, but that has been the major problem—one must produce at the same time the way one intends to deal with what is left over after it has been used. I believe that would go a long way toward solving the future problem. As far as the problem we have right now, I just cannot wait for Mr. Thomas to work it all out.

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if I were to clean up the Niagara River with the help of Hon. Members of the House and the Canadian people, my first suggestion would be to start right here in the House of Commons by clearing the air and by introducing Hon. Members opposite to a much needed dose of realism. The issue of toxic clean-up is too complex and the consequences too serious to allow for naïveté, much less for grandstanding and for playing to the galleries—especially to the Press Gallery.

Let us deal in facts. The Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement was first signed in 1972 and was revised in 1978. It covers all boundary waters, including the Niagara River, which lie within the Great Lakes system from Duluth, Minnesota, to Cornwall, Ontario.

We know that there are more than 800 toxic chemicals present in the Great Lakes waterway alone; what we do not know, as I have pointed out in the House and elsewhere, is what affect most of those chemicals have upon the environment, including upon human health. However, we do know enough to be alarmed and to act.

Although my hon. friend's motion does not mention the fact, the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement is one of the great success stories of North American environmentalism. The facts tell us why: the total phosphorus loadings to Lake Erie—and I use it only as an example—once listed as "dead", have been reduced by almost half. The rotting algae that made it largely unusable have virtually disappeared. Restrictions in the use and disposal of organochlorine in the Great Lakes basin was a major factor in the ten-fold decrease in the presence of 2,3,7,8-TCDD, one of the most deadly forms of dioxin in herring gull eggs in Lake Ontario between 1960 and 1980. In 1983, the mean annual concentration of DDE, DDT, HCB, mirex and total PCBs from two herring gull colonies on the Lake were lower than at any time since monitoring began in 1974. The decreases range from 55 per cent to 98 per cent.

Without a doubt, Mr. Speaker, our ability to clean up the havoc we have created in the Great Lakes has been outstripped by our skill at dumping more junk into them. We have to go beyond the present agreement to address the current problems in the Great Lakes and to prepare ourselves for the future. That is why it is fortunate that the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement is up for renewal this very year. It, along with the International Joint Commission, has been a very effective instrument for co-operative action by Canada and the United States.

We must recognize though that the situation in the Great Lakes waterway has a different meaning for Americans than it does for Canadians. Ironically, although the St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes provide drinking water for about 20 million Americans in all and about nine million Canadians—and here I am treating the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence system as one because they should be viewed as such—only 8 per cent of Americans derive drinking water from that system compared to one-third of all Canadians. When there is a problem in the Lakes, as there is, it constitutes merely a local or a regional concern to Americans and their federal Government, albeit a serious one.

In Canada, by contrast, the situation is a major national issue by virtue of the proportion of the total population affected by the pollution. For example, while we are appalled at the leakage of toxic waste dump sites along the Niagara River, Love Canal, 102nd Street, S-Site, Hyde Park and so on, Lee Thomas, Administrator of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, has to deal with similar problems all over the United States, not just along the Niagara River.

Mr. Caccia: They are not covered in the agreement.

Mr. McMillan: In that sense, his deep concern, and I don't doubt it, must be spread among more sites than is the case in Canada, where the effects of "hot spots" are concentrated largely in one part of the country. That is why, in discussing a new Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement, Canadians and Americans approach the bargaining table with different perspectives and a different sense of urgency, not because, I stress, Canadians are somehow purer and more environmentally sensitive than Americans, but, rather, because American problems are more widespread in a more populated, more evenly industrialized country. It would be well to remember that essential fact before we start sanctimoniously lecturing the United States on the conduct of its environmental affairs in particular cases, because our record as Canadians is pretty checkered too.

Ninety per cent of all the toxins that offend the Niagara River originate in the United States. Only 10 per cent do so in Canada. Partly as a result of the work done by previous Canadian Governments and previous Ministers, among whom I include the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), and perhaps partly out of personal interest, Lee Thomas has become particularly determined to find a solution to the Niagara. Given that the United States has, unlike Canada, numerous Niagara type environmental dump site time bombs ticking away in all parts of the country, Mr. Thomas' focus on the Niagara per se should be welcomed by all Canadians.

This week, he and I discussed the Niagara River Toxics Management Plan, a four party framework that will co-ordinate the individual action plans of the U.S. and Canadian governments, New York State and the Province of Ontario. The Management Plan is designed to define clean-up action and to schedule substantial reductions in toxic chemical loadings to the river.

Let me make two points, Mr. Speaker, about the plan. First, the largest share of the work is obviously going to be carried out by the Americans since the problem is overwhelmingly American in origin. Second, the American component of the plan, as originally presented to me by Lee Thomas, the head of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, in Ottawa on October 17, 1985, did not meet our expectations or objectives, and I told him that.

Since then, after extensive meetings among officials and scientists of all four jurisdictions, after many direct personal representations by myself to Lee Thomas, to his agency and, through his agency, to the Government of the United States, significant improvements have been made to the original plan. In other words, the United States has been steadily more accommodating and co-operative in dealing with the problems of the Niagara River with each passing week in the last year. That is a fact. Although we are not being given, and I would not accept, empty gestures devoid of any real chance of progress, it would be unrealistic to act—certainly it would be ludicrous in the extreme if I, as Minister, were to act as though I could dictate the terms of the U.S. Government's own action plan for this purpose, however much I would like to do so.

Americans, I think, and I say this as a grandson of an American, are basically rational human beings, however irrationally they might perform on the world stage from time to time. If you want to sway them, you have to be able to present a strong case and Canada certainly has a strong scientific and factual case to present. Americans will not accept, and Canada does not need, attempts at persuasion that are grounded in ill manners, shrill sermonizing and in taking cheap shots.

Canada and the United States have been negotiating on transboundary water related issues for nearly 80 years, twice as long as I have been living on the face of this earth. Much progress has been made in those eight decades, but never before in the history of our two countries, until this week, have we achieved an agreement on a major reduction in toxic loadings in any Canada-U.S. waterway, let alone in the Niagara River. Yet the problem is long term and the solution will remain the same, despite our current progress.

At this point we have an agreement, an accord, an understanding, an entente, a meeting of minds, if you will—deficient in some ways, imperfect as human instruments frequently are, and certainly not what I would have preferred in an ideal world. But the agreement is a very good start toward solving a problem that has bedevilled Canadians for more than half a century.

Americans and Canadians are now committed to establishing specific goals to cut toxic loadings substantially. Our immediate target for our two countries is a 50 per cent reduction by 1995 or sooner. I stress "sooner". It will be very clear by July, 1987, whether we can both advance that timetable and increase the reductions. At that time, high level scientific discussions will make it possible to refine targets and dates. I stress that the plan addresses all of the toxic subtance problems in the Niagara, including municipal and industrial point source contamination, dumpsite leakage and run-off.

• (1430)

Canada would certainly prefer to deal with the dump site problem by excavating. As the Hon. House Leader of the NDP (Mr. Deans) pointed out, that is a preferred option. I am talking about completely removing toxins, sediment, debris, embankments and all other contaminated materials to be found on both sides of the Niagara River, especially on the American side. If the Americans were to excavate only the worst sites in and around the Niagara frontier, they would have to deal with an area of several hundred acres. The size of all of the dumpsites in the Niagara area is equivalent to the Province of Prince Edward Island, from which I come. We are talking about a lot of space, a lot of toxins, a lot of sediments, a lot of debris, and a lot of embankments to be excavated. Once the material was dug up, it would either have to be removed to a safer place, if such could be found, or destroyed completely.

There are three considerations to take into account consistent with the preferred excavation model, three major technological obstacles weigh heavily on American officials and scientists in that connection.

First, as Canada's Pollution Probe has noted, based on work on excavation it has been doing on contract for Environment Canada, digging up the dumps is highly risky because the buried chemicals are, by definition, extremely volatile and emit dangerous fumes that could injure workers and area residents.

Second, even if the millions of tonnes of excavated material could be handled safely, which is a big assumption, the political problems, in the best sense of the word "political", aside from the scientific and technological problems, present enormous obstacles to the completion of the option we prefer. The problems of relocating the amount of toxic materials with which the toxic chemicals have come in contact with over the years are horrendous. Canada is not the only country in the world afflicted by the NIMBY, "not in my backyard", syndrome. The Americans have a real problem, given their uniform population, finding any community in which to locate the substances until such time as they can be incinerated safely.

Third, if the material were to be incinerated instead of relocated, the sheer volume of material to be destroyed presents technical problems, as well as genuine threats to human health and the natural environment. I am now talking about incineration rather than relocation or the process of excavating. Indeed, massive incineration, which would be involved, given the sheer volume of the chemical substances at stake, would produce pollution often as bad as, if not worse than, the substances being burned, including cancer-causing dioxins.

As a result of the technological and scientific considerations, the Americans favour extracting the toxins and destroying them on site. There is a problem of semantics. People tend to use "extraction" and "excavation" as though they were synonomous when they are, in fact, two different processes. Rather than excavating the sites themselves, extraction involves treating the sites and handling them in such a way so that they become virtually hermetically sealed units from which the toxins could be extracted. Mr. Thomas acknowledges, however, that excavation might well need to be applied at certain sites and that extraction would be used only where it was more effective than excavation in dealing with wastes that had seeped into surrounding bedrock.

To guide both countries in choosing the safest and most effective method for each dumpsite, whether using extraction or excavation, Mr. Thomas and I agreed to mobilize the best scientific minds in both countries for a major international working conference to be held over many days, even weeks if necessary, probably in Toronto, in the fall.

I emphasize again that the plan to which I am referring is not the one which, in isolation, other things being equal, the Government of Canada itself would have devised if it were putting together a program for the Americans. However, it reflects a major impact by Canada on the American approach to this highly complex and difficult environmental problem. That impact would have been denied us if we, and I in particular, had mounted a campaign in the United States or in Canada of empty rhetoric of the kind, if I may say so with all due respect to him, too often characteristic of the mover of today's motion.

It is ironic that the Member for Davenport accuses me of returning from Washington with a second-rate plan mended together for public relation purposes. I will set aside for the moment the question of how many arrangements, let alone first-class ones, he was able to make when he was Minister of the Environment for longer than I have been to date.

Mr. Caccia: We laid the groundwork for you to do this.

Mr. McMillan: If I was truly interested in playing to the grandstands, as the Hon. Member for Davenport has been saying, I would have chosen the route he frequently prefers: shrill rhetoric disguised as policy, inflexibility masquerading as philosophy, and rudeness defended as resolve. It is easy to cast oneself as a hero prepared to settle for nothing less than the perfect plan. According to that kind of environmental theology, it is preferable to let the rivers spoil with toxins until perfection can be achieved in some ideal world than to act now to deal with the problem in the real world. In my view, the goal of perfection is a prescription for procrastination. Some people would prefer a plan that will never be agreed upon by anyone but themselves to one that, whatever its imperfections, helps us get on with the job. That is not my approach, Sir.

In conclusion, while some people waste their time figuring out how many environmental angels can dance on the head of a pin, my Department and I are busy making the environment better, not for angels but for Canadians, their children, and generations of Canadians yet unborn. We recognize that the management plan is not the end of the road. In a sense it is, instead, the beginning of it, in that we have a long way to go before anyone will feel safe bathing in the Niagara River let alone drinking directly from it. Our goal is nothing less, as, I believe, is the goal of the Opposition, than the restoration of what was once the mighty Niagara, a symbol of our shared continent and of a commitment to real work, real solutions, and real progress in the real world. I think that what happened in Washington this week was, by any standards, an important step along that road.

Mr. Caccia: Mr. Speaker, why is the original plan which was produced in October of last year still unknown? The public and the Opposition could at least measure progress against that plan in order to know what the significant improvements are.

Secondly, why is the present plan that he and the EPA administrator discussed still unknown? Thirdly, why did he choose to make public his difference of opinion with his colleague in Ontario? I asked him this question in my speech and I think he owes an answer to this House and the Canadian public. Given the statement he made at the beginning of this week before going to Washington, it seems to me he has to prove it was not irresponsible to break ranks on the Canadian side and give Washington an idea that Canada was receptive to two different levels of quality. That is why we are saying it is second-rate stuff.

If the Minister does not believe in basic thinking, in principles and guidelines in an approach to the environment, if he wants to play it by the seat of his pants, he did not mention once in his speech that there is an agreement between the two countries. Lee Thomas, with all the problems he may have, has an international obligation to us. The Minister seems to be totally unaware of that fact. He has not done his homework. He has not done the studies needed in order to put forward Canada's position. He persists in creating the impression that the EPA is doing us a favour by contemplating the problems along the Niagara River. It is not a favour. Lee Thomas has an obligation to Canada but that does not seem to get through the skull of the Minister.

I have asked him three questions, I hope he will answer them because they are important. Why the secrecy over the plan? Why did he go public on his differences on the Canadian side before going to Washington, and while in Washington?

Mr. McMillan: Mr. Speaker, it puzzles me that the Hon. Member for Davenport, as a former Minister of the Environment, would not understand the process. There was a Niagara River toxic chemicals committee report. It was a general study or analysis of the condition of the Niagara River. On the basis of that report, there were to be four action plans, each done by one of the participating jurisdictions: the Government of the United States, the Government of the State of New York, the Government of Ontario and the Government of Canada. Each was to have its own action plan in the context of the Niagara River toxic chemicals committee report, addressing the same problem from different perspectives and jurisdictions.

What we are talking about, as far as this plan is concerned, is the American response to the committee. It is their action plan, not mine. I was invited by Lee Thomas to participate in the improvement of an American action plan. We have a Canadian plan, an Ontario plan, a New York State plan, and, of course, the Americans have a national plan. It was not my plan. It was not mine to release. It was an internal American Government document designed to be made public by them on their own schedule. That is point number one.

His second question is why we do not release the new document. I have been working on that action plan hand-in-glove with the Americans almost every day since October 17, 1985. My officials have been directly involved, many of them have gone to Washington for this purpose. I also worked on it myself on a one-to-one basis with the head of the EPA. Even as I went to Washington this week, the plan was not completed. Had it been, I would not even have gone. My purpose in going was to see if we could give it one more shot. We did. In particular, we agreed on a statement that would represent an understanding between the two countries on the way in which the U.S. Government action plan would be implemented. In that sense, the statement added to their action plan.

For example, I am not even sure whether there will be mention, in the document to be released, the 50 per cent reduction we expect to achieve by 1995. That is an understanding woven into the text of our distillation agreement this week. This will be a companion document to their action plan and will be seen together as constituting the one action plan the U.S. Government will be taking hand-in-glove with us, Ontario and the State of New York, in the context of the Niagara River toxic chemicals committee report. That is your first answer.

Why do I not release the October 17 document so you can judge how much of a change there has been? It is not my document. Why have we not released the new document? Because it has just been changed in a major way this week as I left Washington. Instead, we released a distillation of what was agreed upon. The new document is being printed and will be released by the Americans in due course, on a schedule they will have to devise.

In response to the second or, if you want to look at it in a different way, the third question about Mr. Bradley, it is not my style to engage in public altercations with my colleagues among the environmental Ministers. I have been working with Mr. Bradley day in and day out on many questions, acid rain being one. I think I have had a good personal rapport with Mr. Bradley. I like him, respect him and I think that is mutual. However, I must say that I viewed with a great sense of frustration his antics and those of his Department in connection with our negotiations with the Americans. I was getting feedback from the Americans with whom I was trying to get a deal for all of Canada that they did not trust him.

Mr. Deans: Whoops!

Mr. McMillan: That they did not—

Mr. Deans: That is not a good thing.

Mr. McMillan: Let me put it this way. I will say this to the House Leader of the NDP—

Mr. Deans: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The question and answer have taken an inordinately long part of the 10-minute—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Oh?

Mr. Deans: No, hang on a second. All I was going to say was that in the process of making—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): It is an attempt to cut off an answer you do not like.

Mr. Deans: No, I am quite happy to hear the answer. I am concerned about the long-term implications of an answer which leaves the impression that the U.S. administration does not place any trust in a Minister of the Crown in Ontario.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order.

Mr. Deans: I am just concerned about that. I think it results from long, involved answers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order. The Hon. Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan).

Mr. McMillan: I would like to conclude my answer by saying there was a strong feeling among those with whom I was negotiating that there was a breakdown in good faith between the Ontario Government and the Government of the U.S.—

Mr. Deans: That is a better way of putting it.

Mr. McMillan: —on an important bilateral agreement. I had to distance myself from the person viewed as responsible, if I was to get a deal with the Americans that was a credit to Canadians and that was going to protect their health and their natural environment. I was not interested in being party to or identified with an exercise that was viewed by those on the other side of the table as a sham. Certain Canadians were going down to Washington, looking the Americans right in the eye, saying everything is fine, smiling benignly and sweetly, and then returning to Toronto and saying something completely different to The Toronto Star, which the Americans, after all, read. That is not good faith. I am not a champion of the American ethos or the American cause; they can do that themselves. I am a champion of the Canadian cause, and I distance myself from anything that is detrimental to it, and that is exactly what I did in that instance.

• (1450)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Very short question.

Mr. Deans: I want to preface my very short question by saying that I do resent the fact that the question and answer took eight and a half of the ten minutes allotted. I think it is the responsibility of the Chair to make sure there are brief questions and answers. That is what this was intended to be.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): I do not think it appropriate for a Member to make such a remark, and the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) knows that. There is a different situation in every question and comment period. There are recourses for Members if they want to extend that question and comment period; they can make a request to the House, and the Member from Hamilton Mountain is aware of that. I would ask him to put his question, because time is limited.

Mr. Deans: I hope you exercise the same judgment in other cases.

Let me say to the Minister that I find his comments about the Minister of the Environment in Ontario offensive; not because I support him, not because I think what he did was right or wrong, but I do not think it helps the Canadian cause to create an argument in Canada over what is the appropriate way to deal with the issue.

I would say the same thing to the Minister in Ontario, that it does not help our cause to have an argument on the floor of the House of Commons over whether or not one or the other of the Ministers can be trusted.

Mr. McMillan: That was the question.

Mr. Deans: It could have been answered in a different way.

Mr. McMillan: That's the answer.

Mr. Deans: If that's the answer, well, fair enough. Remember when you start that it goes on ad nauseam and causes us in Canada to look stupid, quite frankly. It could have been answered better, if you will allow me, and briefer too for that matter.

Did the Minister get some inkling as to how the technology proposed by Mr. Thomas will work, when he proposes to be able to start utilizing it, and how many dollars have been committed by the United States administration to this on an annual basis for the next five years?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): On a very short answer, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan).

Mr. McMillan: I must say, for someone who wanted short responses, he ensured that I would have a difficult time acceding to his request by weaving into his question three separate, highly technical considerations. The simple answer is we have begun, the two sides have already begun.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Point of order, the Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker).

Mr. Baker: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think it is the opinion of the House that we allow the Minister to answer the question as completely as the House wishes and not be limited by time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): If the Hon. Member from Gander—Twillingate is putting that proposition to the House, is there unanimous consent to permit the Minister to answer?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Agreed, unanimous consent.

Mr. McMillan: There is some impression, created in part by the Hon. Member's colleagues, that somehow the plan that we have agreed to would not begin to be implemented until July of 1987. That is not true, we have begun already. We set 1995 as the target date by which we hope to achieve a 50 per cent reduction. There is a lot more science needed to be mobilized to identify the exact toxins in the river, and the different sources. We know enough to justify action, but we do not know enough to define the date and the percentage with the kind of precision we require.

By July, 1987, we hope to be in a position, following all the scientific mobilization we will set in motion, to specify with more certitude the 1995 date and 50 per cent reduction. We hope it may be earlier than 1995, and we hope the reduction will be larger than 50 per cent. How much is it going to cost? It is going to cost tens of millions of dollars. We cannot put a price tag on it.

Mr. Deans: I asked how much has been committed on an annual basis?

Mr. McMillan: This is the typical, if I may so, NDP approach. If it does not have a price tag, it is not effective. What we are talking about is the full mobilization of the scientific and technical resources of the Government of Canada, the Government of Ontario, the Government of New York State and of the United States Government itself. How do you put a price tag on that kind of mobilization? How do you do it?

Mr. Deans: That wasn't the question. I didn't ask you to put a price tag on it. I asked you to tell me how much they committed annually for the next five years for the cleanup?

Mr. McMillan: What is that if that is not a price tag? What is the difference between cost and a price tag? I am saying you cannot quantify the expenditure of money that the foreign Governments are going to have to devote to this cause over at least the next decade.

Mr. Deans: I asked how much they had.

Mr. McMillan: I do not think you could do it even for one year. For example, there are a lot of hidden costs. How do you put a price tag or a cost on the civil servants, the scientists and the technicians within Environment Canada, within Health and Welfare Canada, and within other Departments that are being mobilized within the Government of Canada for our part of the bargain? That is not to say that we cannot, in general, state with some certitude that it is going to cost tens of millions of dollars, and whatever it is going to cost it will be an awful lot less than the cost of not doing anything.

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, a word of advice to the House Leader of the New Democratic Party—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): On a point of order?

Mr. Langdon: Perhaps I misunderstood the request which was being made, but as I heard it, it was that the questioners would be permitted to continue raising questions with the Minister, not that it would apply just to one questioner.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): The Hon. Parliamentary Secretary also on the same point of order.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, what I specifically understood and agreed to in giving unanimous consent was for the Hon. Minister to finish his response to that statement. I think other Members need an opportunity to speak on this important subject.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Let me thank all Members for their generous contributions, but my understanding was to the effect that the Minister be permitted to finish his answer.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, you were absolutely correct, but I can tell by the Parliamentary Secretary's response that there is no sense in my asking the House for unanimous consent to allow the Minister to be questioned. I was going to say to the House Leader of the New Democratic Party that he has a tendency recently of giving speeches as he walks through the door. It is extremely difficult for the translation people, the camera crews and the microphones to pick up what the Hon. Member is saying, but you will notice how much respect he has in the House; everybody listens even when he speaks in the corridor, even the Speaker.

The Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) says that unless there is a price tag on it it is not effective as far as the New Democratic Party is concerned. After the record of this Government I would say that if it does have a price tag on it their philosophy is it is not necessary.

One only has to go back to the actions of this Government since they took power. On the subject of toxic wastes and on the subject of the effects that chemicals have on the environment there were cuts. We saw this incredible decision made by the Government of Canada, by the Department of the Environment, for which this Minister is now responsible. To my knowledge all of the studies that were done affecting wildlife and the effect that toxic chemicals have on wildlife were cancelled, from British Columbia right to Newfoundland. The Centre of Toxicology was also cancelled. We saw the study in British Columbia on the shore birds cancelled. Some people might say it is not very important to study how shore birds are reacting to certain elements in this environment. Then it went across the Prairies and cancelled the study on the effects of herbicides on the reproduction of ducks. Some people may say that this is not a very important study.

The Government then came to Ontario and cancelled the study on herring gull eggs and the effect that toxic chemicals along the shores of the Great Lakes were having on those birds. Some people may say that that study is not very important.

The Government went on to eastern Canada and laid off people associated with the study on the effect of insecticides and some herbicides on birds in Atlantic Canada as a result of aerial spraying. The results of that study would apply right across the country because chemical spraying on forests kills food for the birds. As a result of those studies, scientists were discovering that the very chemicals used to kill the insects that were the food for birds were actually killing the birds as well. Given that record, how can the Minister of the Environment stand up and say the Government has been doing a wonderful job since it came to power?

The National Research Council has had a number of projects cancelled. For example, there is the study on the effects of acid precipitation and toxic waste dumps on the quality of ground water in Canada. An updated scientific analysis of the key issues in the assessment of polychlorinated biphenyls that was requested by the Government of Ontario was cancelled. Some may say that that is not very important, but the fact is that polychlorinated biphenyls were originally used in Canada as a coolant in electrical transformers. They were outlawed in this country because PCBs were a toxic material that could have very serious effects on humans. The fact is that, unlike the United States, we have no way of getting rid of our polychlorinated biphenyls. The power corporations, the electrical companies, telephone companies and the provincial governments put them in casks and stored them in vacant mines and old buildings across the country. There is very little control or monitoring.

An examination of viruses in water and their impact on human health was cancelled. That study was requested by the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Canadian Public Health Association. The study of viral infections of fish and their impact on fisheries in Canada, requested by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, was cancelled by the Government since it came to power. The Minister talks in glowing terms about what the new Government of Canada has done in the area of toxic wastes, the use of chemicals and their storage. Is it any wonder that people who are knowledgeable of the facts ask what the Minister is talking about?

The Minister was very critical of the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), the Minister of the Environment under the previous Government. I recently read a transcript of a meeting that was held with the former Minister of the Environment and some environmentalists and scientists. It dealt with an interesting major development in your province, Mr. Speaker, and in fact, perhaps in your riding or close to it. They were talking about a biotechnological orientation national fermentation complex which would produce Bacillus thuringiensis from a mixture of potatoes, which they would get from the Chicoutimi region or elsewhere, and fish-meal that they would get from the Gaspé or elsewhere.

The reason I raised this subject is that today in Newfoundland, for example, chemical aerial spraying is probably taking place to kill either the balsam woolly aphid or the hemlock looper. The chemical being used is fenithrothion. According to the studies I have seen, fenithrothion is one of the most illogical chemicals to be used in aerial spraying over a large area. The studies conducted by the National Research Council show that when that chemical is sprayed over large areas of forest land, it kills the reproductive systems in the very birds that kill the insects for which the chemicals are meant. Yet, that is the only chemical registered by the Department of Agriculture in its pest control program to combat the hemlock looper.

At this time of year, we are also seeing aerial spraying of toxic chemicals on the forest lands in other parts of Canada. We also see forest management in parts of Canada in which chemicals are being used experimentally as a forest management tool. Not only is it used to destroy hardwoods that cannot be used in the paper-mills, it is also used for the reproduction of forest lands with the type of forests they need.

We see a policy in Canada and in many other countries whereby the Government intentionally approves plans to spray toxic chemicals over entire forest areas, encompassing hundreds and hundreds of miles. The toxic chemical is supposed to control the insects that eat those parts of the forests that people want for economic purposes. However, while the chemical kills harmful insects, it also kills the insects that are necessary in the ecology chain.

The Government of Canada has made an attempt to eliminate the use of chemicals by aerial spraying. It took place at the Laurentian Forest Research Centre in Ste Foy, Quebec. The one thing they did was discover an insecticide which is not a chemical. It was an incredible discovery. As I mentioned before, it is called Bacillus thuringiensis.

Representatives of countries from all over the world came to Quebec to see the studies which were ongoing by the federal Government over the last eight to ten years. They came from Japan, China, Norway, Sweden and Denmark. They even came from countries where chemicals are not used to control forest insects but where bird hatcheries are used instead. In other words, the logic is that if birds eat insects in controlled forest lots, then bird hatcheries could be used to get rid of the insects which needed to be got rid of. When people were looking for such an insecticide, it was found that the Government of Canada, through the Canadian Forestry Service, was also searching for a way not to use chemicals over our forest areas. Today, Canada is known around the world as the country which did all the experimental work in this area. This firmly establishes Canada as the country which led the way in the discovery of a non-chemical solution which could be used over forest lands. As the former Minister of the Environment knows, today, in most of the provinces, this non-chemical insecticide is sprayed over forest areas.

I am sure the former Minister of the Environment will be interested in what I am about to say. I am sure he will be absolutely shocked to discover that the entire research team at the Laurentian Forest Research Centre has been terminated. It was in the process of further experimentation on other types of forest insects. The team was considering mosquitoes and black flies. Would you not love to have black flies controlled without the use of chemicals, Mr. Speaker? That is what the research being done by Dr. Smirnoff was about to accomplish. As I understand it, Dr. Smirnoff reached retirement age and the new Government refused to allow him to continue his work. I cannot understand that since this Government introduced a Bill after his retirement which states that it is not necessary to retire at the age of 65. As I understand it, this world-renowned gentleman is now teaching at Laval University. I believe he is studying the papers done in biology for Ph.D. theses. But his research has been terminated. Why? Because it was cut back by the Government. The Government said that it would continue research in other parts of the country.

When the present Minister of the Environment is so quick to criticize the former Minister, he should think about what the former Minister did. I can assure Hon. Members that he never would have been party to a Government decision to discontinue this research team in the Province of Quebec which was doing such world-class research work.

We can stand up as often as we want in the Chamber to talk about this chemical problem and the problem regarding the storage of chemicals here and there and those which are seeping into the water supply. However, we should realize that today, in 1986, under the authority of the federal Government, and mostly under the jurisdiction of the provincial Governments, we have large planes which spray toxic chemicals over thousand upon thousands of acres. When one takes a walk in the woods and wonders why the birds are not chirping, I can tell Hon. Members why they are not chirping—

Mr. Gurbin: Because there are no bugs!

Mr. Baker: The Parliamentary Secretary says because there are no bugs. Well, that is probably one of the reasons.

To bow to the pressure of the industries in the U.S. which produce these chemicals, a great many of them for registry in Canada, is certainly not acceptable. It is also not acceptable to bow to our own lobby in Canada which says that the fastest way to grow a profitable tree as far as forest management is concerned is to use these chemicals.

The record speaks for itself. The present Government has done a great deal to discourage those people who were working with and associated with environmental concerns and scientific research. I believe the biggest step backward ever taken by the Government was when it terminated the tremendous work being done by the previous Governments in Canada, dating back over the last 10 to 15 years in terms of searching for and finding a non-chemical insecticide.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cadieux): Questions and comments. The Hon. Member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Duplessis).

Mrs. Duplessis: Mr. Speaker, I felt some comment was necessary because my hon. colleague from Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker) mentioned the Laurentian Forest Research Centre which happens to be in my riding. Since I am fully aware of the bacillus thuringiensis discovery and the steps taken by Dr. Smirnoff to have his assistant take over research on the budworm, I would like to pass on some information which he omitted to give in the course of his speech.

First of all, research in this area has not been abandoned. It is continuing, especially in the Chute-à-Galets centre located in the Parc des Laurentides between Quebec and Chicoutimi—actually closer to Chicoutimi.

I may also point out to my hon. colleague that today, the researchers who work at the Laurentian Forest Research Centre, in my riding, are moving to new quarters. They are right in the middle of moving day, so to speak, and cannot be ready to work right away. They are closing their old offices and moving to new premises that are not quite finished yet.

They do not intend to abandon their research in this particular area.

They are also pursuing another line of research on the budworm, that is, they are trying to make certain evergreen species more resistant to the budworm.

I think my hon. colleague is mistaken and has omitted to pass on this particular information, and I therefore welcome this opportunity to set the record straight, since this happens to be a subject I know very well.

[English]

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the interjection of the Hon. Member. I have in my possession a chart which outlines the complete reorganization made by the present Government as it relates to insect behaviour, insect control, pesticide evaluation, registration, pesticide technology and all research work done in Canada.

• (1520)

To put it in the words of the Canadian Forestry Service, there has been a reorientation of that particular work. As described by Dr. Smirnoff, who is known throughout the world, the reorientation as a whole tends to suppress research into the successful use of Bacillus thuringiensis for the operational control of the spruce budworm conducted in the Laurentian Forest Research Centre. He says that this is quite unbelievable considering that the insect pathology unit of the centre is the only unit in Canada and even in North America to have an international reputation in the use of Bacillus thuringiensis against the spruce budworm. He says that this is a blind decision and, as the former Minister of the Environment asked me to point out, this letter is under the signature of Dr. Smirnoff. I did not receive his permission to read that letter, and perhaps I should have before I did.

Government representatives should be down on their knees pleading with Dr. Smirnoff not to leave the Laurentian Forest Research Centre since he is the only thing they have going for them internationally. He is the only man who ever discovered a non-chemical insecticide to fight forest insects. What did they do instead? I have the letter here proving it. They turned him down. They told him that he could not have an extension. They said that that work was terminating in that centre.

I am glad to hear the Hon. Member say that some work is still continuing in that centre. However, the work that is continuing is certainly not as complete without the services of Dr. Smirnoff. I do hope that the Government will see the light and pay attention to the international journals which print his articles and speak about him and I hope they will try to get that man back working for the Canadian Government.

Mr. Fontaine: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to make a comment about the intervention of the Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker).

If, instead of allocating substantial amounts to pure research and very sophisticated laboratories and spending so much money on large research buildings, for which we must now pay maintenance costs even though they are empty, the previous Government had allowed co-operation between private business and the research sector, we would not be faced with these problems today.

We now have to bear the consequences of your mismanagement when you were in power.

[English]

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, that sounded as though it could have come from the mouth of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) or the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret). I congratulate the Hon. Member for actually being able to copy what those people say on a daily basis.

The hon. gentleman said that the former Liberal Government wasted money constructing research buildings and carrying on research when it could have had the private sector conduct that research in co-operation with the Government. He says that the Government would not have had to waste money paying all those salaries and buying all those test tubes. He is saying that that was not necessary. He is saying that we could have built tents but not buildings and that we did not need the person-years. He claims that if we had not over-spent on research, we would not be in the bind we are in today.

I presume the Hon. Member is talking about the almighty deficit of the Government of Canada. If the previous Liberal Government spent too much money on research, then my goodness gracious, he must really have a case in every other area contained in The Oxford Dictionary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cadieux): Questions or comments? The Hon. Member for Louis-Hébert (Mrs. Duplessis).

Mrs. Duplessis: Mr. Speaker, I think that the Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker) did not understand what my colleague was saying. He said that you mispent the money allocated to research.

I would like to emphasize once more that Dr. Smirnoff is a remarkable man who has made great strides in research and wonderful discoveries.

I can assure the Hon. Member that I keep myself well informed. I have visited the centre personnally and I am aware that work is going on at Chute-à-Galets. I repeat that the research centre is still looking at non-chemical methods to reduce or eliminate the spruce budworm.

[English]

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I presume the Hon. Member said that I misinterpreted the remarks of her colleague and that I had not understood his remarks correctly. I did understand his remarks absolutely correctly. I know what he was saying. I can only deduce that he was referring to the Budget, and I am certain that I heard him correctly. However, in trying to solve that problem, it should not be blamed on the people who work in Quebec.

[Translation]

The people in Quebec are not responsible for the problem. The Government is.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Cadieux): The Hon. Member for Louis-Hébert.

Mrs. Duplessis: Mr. Speaker, I want to tell something else to my colleague for Gander—Twillingate. One thing that he is forgetting is that the provincial Government is involved in all sectors of forestry research. There are agreements about this sector and a political will. The federal Government must respect the wishes of the provincial Government.

This is another factor to consider.

[English]

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, there is only one area for which the federal Government is responsible under the Constitution of Canada as it relates to forests, and that is research. The Hon. Member is absolutely correct in saying that the provincial Governments control the forests as such, but the federal Government has a responsibility for research, and that is what we are talking about here today. The only role the federal Government plays in the use of chemicals in forest areas is in approving the chemicals that the provincial Governments can use. That is the problem we have with this Government.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that this debate will be kept at a non-partisan discussion level as it proceeds. I would like to begin by stressing the importance of the crisis that faces us in the Great Lakes region. It is because of the significance of that crisis that this motion has been moved today by the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia). It is a part of his and our continuing efforts to make certain that public awareness increases and, as a result, Government action is taken.

I do not want to spend a lot of time on this matter because I have spoken about it before. However, I stress that the recent excellent report of the Royal Society of Canada assessing the 1978 agreement between Canada and the United States, to which the motion refers, came to some very sober conclusions. It concluded that the more difficult programs, such as controls on diffuse sources, remediation of contamination from landfill sites, development and implementation of measures to control in-place pollutants, and a more general comprehensive strategy to control atmospheric deposition of toxic substances, have been slow in advancing. In short, movement on the very heart of the problem has been least rapid, and the agreement before us paid little attention to it.

Perhaps that does not catch the imagination of people as does a study of the United States Environmental Protection Agency which was released this week. That study referred to dioxin contaminants in fish in the Great Lakes. It found that contrary to the information we have been receiving from the provincial Ministry of the Environment and from the federal Department of the Environment, over 41 parts per trillion of dioxin were found in a number of species of fish in different parts of the Great Lakes system. It showed that Lake Ontario had the highest dioxin level, with levels as high as 41 parts per trillion, as I just indicated.

That information tells us that people are eating fish with dioxin levels well above health standards. Also, it tells us that there is a potential for that dioxin to move further into the food chain and to be higher concentrated throughout the system, so as to make the entire situation significantly worse.

It is a crisis which has been marked not only by studies but by the emergence of local groups in areas throughout the Great Lakes Basin, partly in response to the basic conclusion of the study of the Royal Society of Canada that the Great Lakes Basin was the most polluted part of North America when it came to toxic substances. In Windsor there has been the formation of a group known as the Clean Water Alliance which met recently with the Minister when he visited that city. The Alliance put across very strongly the great public concern which exists in respect of the issue.

The sense of crisis comes not only from those of us in the Opposition, but from the federal Government itself, which issued a report card yesterday on its own performance. I would not say that the over-all report card was modest, but I think some of the marks are perhaps a little higher than I would give. However, in respect of toxic wastes, it was dead on. It said that the Government deserved an F or a failure in the control of toxic wastes. It made the point quite clearly that poor disposal practices were emerging as Canada's number one environmental problem. It also indicated that urgent actions were required to identify health risks, to set standards, and to implement control measures.

That is the reality which we in the Great Lakes Basin face. It is something which I do not think any Government, Parliament or country should tolerate. We in the Windsor area have seen it dramatically demonstrated with the pollution which was discovered and formed a backdrop to concern about pollution issues in the St. Clair River, the so-called St. Clair blob. Some Hon. Members of the House may think that that blob disappeared once the Minister reported on it in January. In fact, our information indicates that there continues to be seepage from the Dow Chemical site in Sarnia, and that the blob itself continues to re-emerge in smaller quantities.

That is certainly and very thankfully true, but it tells us about the basic problem of dealing with dangerous substances in the drinking water which flows downstream to the communities in which people live. Fish live in that water, and that water evaporates into the air and falls back down on our crops. We may not know as much as we would like to know about those dangerous substances, but they clearly have the capacity or potential to cause cancer in human beings and to generate other health risks.

With this as the backdrop, what do we make of the agreement which the Minister brought back from Washington? As the person in my Party who deals with the trade issue, I was particularly interested in examining its details. I see that the two Ministers who deal with this issue are talking to each other at the moment. I was interested in discovering whether we have succeeded in this document in getting a tough and effective accord with the United States on environmental issues. I thought it might give us some indication of whether we would be able to do likewise in respect of trade issues.

As I examined the document, my sense of grave disappointment increased line by line. In his speech today, the Minister tried to suggest that in effect it was an accord or an agreement between the two Governments. If one examines carefully the press release, for that is what in fact it is, one will find that there are only two or three points on which commitments were actually made. If this is not the case, I urge the Minister to rise after my speech to make a point to the contrary.

In fact, this press release as one reads it carefully says only that the Minister and the head of the EPA agreed that it is necessary to achieve significant reductions in the loading of toxic chemicals in the Niagara River. That is wonderful, but it does not exactly represent tremendous progress. They committed their agencies to complete a technical documentation of the pollution control measures needed to reduce direct discharge to the river. They also agreed, as we go further down in the document, to co-ordinate existing pollutant control activities, to establish a common basis for assessing the toxic chemical loadings in the river, to identify priorities for control measures and to evaluate the success of these measures.

However, no place within this document, Mr. Speaker, is there any commitment whatever to make this issue a priority, to take action, or to carry forth a massive effort to deal with a pollution problem which has made Lake Ontario the most polluted part of the Great Lakes system with dioxins, according to the EPA study that has just been released. Instead, we see this extremely weak phrase: "both agency heads stated that it is highly desirable to establish goals for the reduction of toxic loadings". As an example, they suggested that a 50 per cent reduction of certain toxic chemicals, taking into account applicable water quality and drinking water standards, may be achievable by 1995 or sooner.

I am not a lawyer and I am not a Minister, so I do not have to look at this through rosy glasses, but I can recognize flim-flam when I see it, and that is what we have here. We have emptiness wrapped in words and no commitment to the people of the Great Lakes Basin that that particular problem will become the priority that it should become.

I have to come back to an assessment of the Minister's performance since his appointment. I do this with some reluctance because I had very high hopes for the Minister when he was appointed. I think in his early days in office, as he reacted to the emergence of the blob and worked closely with people like Jim Bradley in Ontario, we had effective action being taken for the first time. The report that dealt with the blob itself was a good report, and the Government showed its good faith quickly by saying it would implement all 24 of the recommendations within it.

Frankly, since that period I fear that the Minister has entered what one can only call the Conservative mold for up and coming Cabinet Ministers. It is a mold which concentrates on image. It is a mold which concentrates, as we saw in the speech this morning, on insults to the Opposition. It is a mold which talks about participation and consultation, yet it leaves a group like the Clean Water Alliance in Windsor feeling very very unhappy with the so-called consultation which they had with the Minister. They felt it was contrived, that the time was far too short for them to communicate and discuss effectively the crucial issues, as they saw them, that affect the Great Lakes Basin.

We see something that seems to mark the new approach of the Conservative mold, the attack on the provinces. It has been evident in the free-trade context with the 90 day deadlines being massively overrun and with a continuing shout from the roof-tops by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) and by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) that there is one Government that speaks for the country and that is the Government in Ottawa.

An Hon. Member: Right on.

Mr. Langdon: You would think that Pierre Trudeau was still Prime Minister.

In addition, there has been an attempt, which also seems part of the mold, at control of communication, control of output from the Ministry, evidenced in this case by reductions and changes in policy which have been especially evident at the regional office levels in the Department of the Environment.

I hope that this is a temporary passing phase for the Minister, that perhaps the lessons of his own home island will come home to him and he will break out of the mold and try to go back to some of those hopes he kindled with a great many groups when he was first appointed. I fear that will not take place and the country will have to look for others to give some policy direction on the environmental quandary we face.

There is a direction we have tried to set out based on a philosophy of zero discharge, stressing independent monitoring of industrial companies rather than leaving them the right to police their own pollution, stressing the need for much stiffer penalties when pollution does emerge from industry and stressing tough action with our own dump sites. We would speak with much more authority on dump sites in the Niagara Escarpment if we had acted with equal dispatch in excavating dump sites in Lambton County which are dangerous to the people who live down river from that area.

If the Government is looking for direction, another direction is to give more help to municipalities so they can start to handle the sewer problems which are quite serious in the case of Windsor, for example. Finally, we should be much firmer when we negotiate with the United States. We should never see ourselves in the situation where a federal Minister attacks a provincial Minister in order to get an agreement with the United States. Instead, we should look for firmness. We should look for commitment to this country. If we do that, I think we can solve this problem.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, there is one particular point I am going to make in response to the speech just made by the Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon). While I in no way want to take away from the importance of and need for action on the difficulties which we face with the toxic chemical situation in the Niagara River, I do want to correct one point. That point is with regard to the relative level of the problem in other areas in North America.

Categorically this does not really represent the worst problem, even in North America. In fact, evidence will be presented next week at the World Large Lakes Conference on Mackinac Island which will show that we suffer no more from the pervasive influence of toxic chemicals than anywhere else on this chemical globe. In many instances we find that we are better off than other parts of the world, both developed and developing countries. This is not to suggest that this is not an important problem in many areas. However, in terms of perspective, I just want to correct that one point made in the Hon. Member's comments.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. That was the conclusion of the report of the Royal Society of Canada, not something which I brought independently into the debate.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I was not suggesting that the Hon. Member brought it in independently. I just thought that the information should be available.

The essence of the motion moved by the Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) is timely, but it is redundant. This motion is predicated on either an incomplete assessment and understanding of the situation and circumstances which exist today, or a desire to, in some way, take away from the work that has been done, the achievements that have been recorded, and the leadership that has been shown by the Government of Canada through the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) in co-operation with other jurisdictions, including Ontario and the United States of America.

I would like to focus my remarks on several somewhat difficult and technical areas. One premise of this motion has very much to do with the relationship and obligation, if you like, which exists through international arrangements beginning with the Boundary Waters Agreement of 1909 through to the 1972 and 1978 Great Lakes Water Agreements. In some ways this is a dry discussion, but it is important that the Member for Davenport understand this so that in the future, instead of bringing forward a motion such as this, he will be able to work from the proper information base and the proper understanding of what those international agreements and understandings represent and mean and what we and the United States have done in terms of complying with them.

I will leave the Boundary Waters Agreement of 1909 and go straight to the 1972 agreement. This agreement initiated a process which has continued to evolve. The 1972 agreement established a foundation on which to build by defining a set of principles to guide the preservation and enhancement of the Great Lakes. The most important of these principles were, first, the setting of water quality objective in the lakes, second, the establishment by the parties of a commitment to undertake all reasonable and practical control programs and, third, the institution of a surveillance and monitoring program which would assess the effectiveness of the control programs and the emergence of any new problems. When a revised agreement was signed in 1978 it preserved the basic principles while, at the same time, broadening the scope of the agreement and introducing the Great Lakes eco system concept.

What has really happened is that we have not only not made concessions but have met the obligations of those agreements. As that agreement is worked out and enacted between the federal Governments in the two respective countries, it becomes subject to the overview, suggestions and control of the IJC. The IJC is a body, the very presence and existence of which depends on the agreement of the two respective Governments to commit themselves to its determinations and findings. Rather than having a magic wand which we can wave to ensure that we or they will do this or that, we have an agreed upon process which is very dependent upon the co-operation of both Governments and upon the reasonable agreed upon action of the International Joint Commission for its effectiveness.

I would argue very strongly that this process and the obligations which flow from it have not only been complied with, but have been respected in every way. It is a process which is evolving very greatly. Why is it an evolutionary process rather than an absolutely black and white regulation? It was only about 50 years ago that we were cleverly beginning to create very complex chemical molecules which were, in many ways, of great benefit to society. We began sticking atoms together in ingenious ways for pharmaceuticals, plastics, and pesticides, many of which were capable of enduring for a long period of time.

We could criticize our ancestors for ignorance of the persistence of chemicals and the analytical techniques which would come along to reveal the existence of chemical substances throughout the environment in vanishingly small concentrations, but that would not help to solve our modern-day problems. Instead, we must take positive, co-operative action. Rather than criticize, we could marvel at the wisdom of generations ago of recognizing the need for co-operation to not pollute the waters of the Great Lakes. I refer, of course, to the Boundary Waters Agreement which was entered into in 1909.

Having discussed the process in a way which I hope explains the redundancy of the motion of the Member for Davenport I would like to suggest that no one in the House could challenge the success of the 1972 Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement. Its main focus was to resolve the phosphorus problem in the Great Lakes. Members will recall that, as the Minister mentioned in his remarks, in the 1960s phosphorus was choking the Great Lakes. It was over-fertilizing them, leading to massive amounts of algae blooms. These blooms would die and wash up on the shore, creating foul-smelling masses of unsightly decaying algae. They would die off each fall and settle to the bottom of Lake Erie, in particular, robbing the lake bottom of its oxygen supply and making fish breeding impossible.

We agreed with our colleagues south of the border to get the necessary treatment facilities to remove the phosphorus from the Great Lakes System. It was a costly undertaking. It cost $8 billion. I would like to remind Members of the House and Canadians in general that the Americans paid for three quarters of the cost of this $8 billion project in 1972.

In dealing with phosphorus, we set specific targets to deal with modern-day problems. Today we are also setting specific targets. The results in terms of the phosphorus problem has been abundantly clear. Concentrations have gone down and those lakes are now being restored to their once great status. Clearly in this area the U.S. Government accepted the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement as an obligation and delivered in the end a bona fide, solid performance.

• (1600)

The 1978 Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement has been much harder to implement. This is not surprising because dealing with 1,000 complex chemicals is 1,000 times more difficult than dealing with one. The U.S. acceptance of the 1978 agreement as an obligation has meant steady, methodical improvement with relation to our discussions with them as the Government of Canada. Both the U.S. and Canadian Governments have banned many chemicals like mercury, PCBs and dioxins. To make further progress, we will have to.continue to co-operate. We have secured this week a U.S. agreement to set specific targets and take specific action on the Niagara River. This is clearly an acceptance of the obligation. However, there is more.

The U.S. Government also agreed this week to apply the strictest standards to the Detroit incinerator in order to save U.S. and Canadian citizens from toxic air pollutants which would fall into our shared water resources. I hope the Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor appreciates the very successful representations the Minister of the Environment made on behalf of the Government of Canada to the EPA.

In contrast with what the House Leader of the Official Opposition said in newspaper articles, this is a commitment to not allow the operation of that plant without complete compliance with the U.S. Clean Air Act. That means millions of Canadians, to say nothing of Americans, will be spared the increased health risks which would have occurred if that plant had been otherwise allowed to operate. That is a real success. That is one of three or four things which were on the agenda and which this Government was able to secure on behalf of Canadians in discussions with the EPA.

There is still more. As the 1985 International Joint Commission water quality report shows, most toxic chemicals in the Great Lakes have declined substantially since the 1970s. Chemicals which have seen dramatic reductions include DDT, mercury and many others. This is not Government propaganda, but the objective report of a respected bi-national body of highly qualified environmentalists. The Great Lakes Basin is not the most heavily-polluted ecosystem in North America. I made that point at the beginning and I make it again. That I am sure will be of interest to all Members as the information is released next week in the discussions which will take place on Mackinac Island.

I do not know how much more evidence Hon. Members opposite need to convince them that we are making progress. We have never claimed that we have been totally successful. We know the objectives we have established, both in accepting the fact that there should be zero emissions of these toxic materials, but also in the very practical way of looking at a realistic goal of a 50 per cent reduction by 1995. We know these things are not perfect but they are real, solid progress and they have been achieved through successful negotiations in good faith with the U.S.

The record also shows quite clearly that areas along the St. Clair River, which in 1977 were polluted along 21 kilometres at the bottom of the river itself, have been reduced to only 10 kilometres. That is to say, since 1977, through action already taken by previous Governments and continued by this Government, we are now dealing with an area of concern on the bottom of the St. Clair River which is approximately one-half the original size. In co-operation with the Province of Ontario, we are taking the necessary positive steps to reduce this degradation even further. It is clear that we are threatened less now than we were then, but we still have a long way to go. We can only take the next steps in a co-operative fashion with all Governments at all levels.

Consider the areas of concern described by the Water Quality Board of the IJC in its 1985 report. The Governments of Canada and the U.S. have agreed to take a methodical, step-by-step approach to cleaning up these areas of concern. The steps agreed to include the full description of the problem, the development of concise action plans with specific dates and targets, and the monitoring of the situation after these action plans have been implemented in order to establish that the desired conditions in the areas of concern have been restored. We are on that step-by-step route for most of the areas concerned in the Great Lakes Basin. We must all co-operate to see this process through to succcess. We must not throw adversarial hurdles in our path.

Hamilton Harbour is one of the areas of concern described in the Great Lakes Water Quality Board report. There is little to be proud of in the emissions at Hamilton Harbour, but even this degraded area is on the relentless path to renewal. We have to help the process with co-operative and positive action, not negativism.

To this end, we have invited the IJC to play an even larger role in our work. It has the authority, both under the Boundary Waters Treaty Act and the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement of 1978, to look at our standards, laws and regulations and to assess them as to their adequacy on both sides of the border in order to resolve the common problems in the Great Lakes Basin. We are so confident in the successes which we have achieved in the Niagara River area this week that we are inviting the IJC to look at our plan to restore the quality of that area of the Great Lakes Basin.

I said at the outset that the Hon. Member's resolution is both timely and redundant. Since the U.S. Government recognizes its obligations under the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement and the actions it is taking with us are timely, let us not divide our energies and be conquered. In the field of international agreements, the pen is surely mightier than the barbed tongue. The prophet of gloom is doomed.

There is one other point I would like to add from a technical point of view in discussing this subject. The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), in considering excavation versus the alternatives for the dumpsites, left out one critical factor. Having established that our preferred option would be to dig all this stuff up and get rid of it somewhere, we have to at the same time recognize the reality of needing to get on with the job as quickly as possible and doing it most effectively.

There is a technical aspect which is difficult for everyone to grasp. No one knows for sure, nor can they until additional work has been done and assessments made. The problem is that we know we must contain so far as possible whatever chemicals there are in whatever area. Having been there for so many years, you can see the chemicals oozing out of the walls along the side of the Niagara Gorge. You can see the rot coming out. Chemicals have leached through bedrock and, even if there were excavation of many of those sites, it would still represent a continual and considerable environmental problem.

One of the options, which may or may not be real because it has yet to be determined, is that by removing the water and the contaminants therein contained, we may be able to reverse that leaching process. Instead of going toward the river, it would come back toward the dumpsite. It could then be removed and destroyed. That would be a technique which would have obvious advantages as opposed to simple excavation, and still being left with the problem of having to destroy the materials we have removed.

With that additional technical point, I think the House would want to recognize the ongoing interest of the Hon. Member for Davenport, but would like to suggest that he look at those agreements again. I think there has been a serious oversight in his estimation of what is contained in the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreements of 1972 and 1978, and what they really mean. Second, insofar as possible with whatever information we can give him, he should be in a position to look at the realities of technology and what is real and what is not.

Finally, through assessment, and this gives me confidence as a Member of Government and as someone who is paying as close attention as he can to this matter, I think we have the start of solid action here for the first time in a long time. We have in place, through solid agreement, the mechanisms and the best technology available to make sure that the agreements are adhered to and that our efforts are effective. If they are not, we obviously have to take other action.

Mr. Caccia: I want to reassure the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary, who has given us a fine speech according to a well prepared text, that I have looked closely at the agreements. That is what makes me say that the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan), if he had done the same, would not need to go cap in hand to Washington in order to obtain the co-operation of our neighbours on this matter.

Having said that, I would like the Parliamentary Secretary to look at his own press release, the one issued in Washington on May 14, and provide me with an answer to my question. The press statement recognizes that the administrator and the Minister agreed it is necessary to achieve significant reductions in the loadings of toxic chemicals in the Niagara River, which is a great statement, as you know, because it was made a year before by the predecessor of the present Minister of the Environment. It indicates the two had agreed on co-ordinating the existing chemical pollutant control activities in establishing a common basis for assessing the toxic chemicals, loadings, et cetera. It mentions, in identifying priorities for control measures, evaluating the success of these measures, which are all very marginal activities that do not come to grips with the question of cutting the emissions.

I would like to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to what extent, in the establishment of the goals that are outlined or referred to in the third paragraph of the press release, namely that both had stated it is highly desirable to establish goals, to what extent the 24 recommendations outlined in the 1984 Niagara Toxic Chemical Committee report have been incorporated in the goals? Can he tell us that?

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I can respond to that question. What I have to tell him is that the American action plan, which flows from the agreement that will be reached between the Governments, hopefully including Ontario and New York, are the only specific things that we will have access to. If he is talking about all specific 24 recommendations, I have to tell him clearly that I never sat down and tried to put 1 to 24 against specific things. In that sense I cannot answer the question. We know that within a period of two weeks or less the specific action plan for their part will be produced. That is number one.

Number two, if he reads only the first paragraph of the communique, he will know that the agencies are committed to complete by July 1, 1987 the technical documentation of the pollution control measures needed to reduce direct discharges. That means specific targets and dates. He and I have already had a discussion over the technical problems there are now which make it impossible for Ontario, New York, or any other level of Government to say any more than that, because while there are very specific findings in specific areas, 61 or 66, whatever the number is, there is not agreement, nor even a complete way of evaluation. There has not been agreement on how the full loading is going to be evaluated at one end as compared to the full loading at the other end.

The Hon. Member will know there have been a variety of figures ranging from one to nine tonnes of total load in the system. For that reason, until that additional information is available, it would be irresponsible for anyone to try to do other than this ambitious and very action orientated commitment by July 1, 1987. It would be nice to be able to say more and be accurate. It is just not technically possible, and no one can say that it is.

Mr. Langdon: If I could start with just a brief comment to recognize the fact that the Parliamentary Secretary stressed—which I had in fact included in my notes to make as an aside—that the incinerator solution in Detroit is something that we feel is the result of the kind of forceful representation of our case to the United States that we would hope would routinely take place on these cross boundary issues. It is something very much appreciated.

Second, a brief preliminary point is just to note the point that I raised surreptitiously as a point of order, which is that it is not the Opposition which is claiming that the Great Lakes Basin is a pollution disaster point, but instead a neutral group of both Canadians and Americans. In the report of the Royal Society of Canada and the National Research Council of the United States, they say their committee finds substantial evidence from the results of studies done by both the U.S. and Canada that the human population in the Great Lakes Basin is exposed to and accumulates appreciably more toxic chemical burden than other human populations in similarly large regions of North America for which data are available.

My question is to try to pin the Parliamentary Secretary down, because he once more has repeated the suggestion in his speech that, in fact, there is a commitment to a 50 per cent reduction by 1995 in toxic loadings with respect to the Niagara Escarpment.

I ask him specifically where in the press release, which is the only documentation we have and which I have in front of me, there is anything which even implies that that is a commitment? What we have instead, as I suggested, is a flim-flam statement that says, as an example, they suggest that a 50 per cent reduction may be achievable by 1995 or sooner. That is very nice, but it is not the kind of commitment which I am sure the Parliamentary Secretary, as a technical person, and others throughout the country would look to see as a real promise to achieve that goal.

Mr. Gurbin: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for the appreciation of the work that was accomplished in so far as the Detroit incinerator. I just mention in passing that another subject on the agenda was the progress on acid rain, and there are some good signs and some good activities in keeping with the commitments that have been made through the summit meeting with the President and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). We have had an update on that, which we are encouraged by, and we look forward to additional actions in the near future. We also discussed some of the nuclear repositories that have been suggested and are keeping the Canadian position and concerns of that development very much in the forefront in our discussions with the United States. I can mention other aspects as well.

With respect to the second question, it is academic whether it was him or the Royal Society report. I was not attempting to discredit him or the Royal Society report, I was merely trying to give additional information. The academic aspect is that it does not take away from the problem in any way. That is not what I am trying to do. I am simply indicating that while it is as serious as everyone believes and we should be working as hard or harder than we are now, it does not seem to represent the same level in comparison to the other problems in North America.

Let me try again to make my point with regard to the 50 per cent objective. Our goal is to achieve 50 per cent by 1995 or sooner. It is impossible to set those precise targets and dates until we have a firm and complete data base from which to work. The problem is that such a data base does not exist. While good information is available, it is limited and does not tell us about all of the leaching that comes out of the walls—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Order. Debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, before speaking to the motion moved by my hon. friend from Davenport (Mr. Caccia), I would like to say that I was somewhat surprised earlier today when I saw the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Gurbin) rise in the House and start off his speech by denigrating my hon. colleague's motion and describing it as redundant and even useless.

I find this surprising, because first of all the motion is not negative. We often have Opposition motions that censure the Government, which is not the case here. This motion is positive from beginning to end. It does not censure the Government. It acknowledges what has been done so far. It mentions existing agreements between Canada and the United States on removing pollution from the Great Lakes. It asks the Government to do more, which is only normal, and I fail to see why my colleague, the Parliamentary Secretary, is trying to lessen the importance of this motion.

Mr. Speaker, I think we should look at what the motion says and try and find whatever negative aspects it may contain. The motion says, and I quote:

> That this House urges that the Government of Canada insist that the Government of the United States regard the fulfillment of responsibilities under the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement as an obligation, rather than a concession, and further urges the Government of Canada to renegotiate the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement to include toxic substance control programs to restore water quality in the Niagara, St. Clair and St. Lawrence Rivers for the benefit of millions of Canadians and Americans and that such negotiations should lead to the adoption of the zero discharge principle already embodied in Annex 12 of the Agreement.

As you see, Mr. Speaker, the motion does not even criticize the Government. It asks the Government to take some additional steps, and in my comments I intend to ask the Minister for some clarification. I also intend to ask him to act more specifically in certain areas, but I am not going to start by kicking him in the shins and tell him that he didn't do a thing, although you must admit that during the year and a half this Government has been in power, in some areas, at least as far as my own region is concerned, some more specific action could have been taken.

To get back to the motion of my colleague from Davenport, it will at least have given Parliament the benefit of a full day's debate on the quality of the water of the Great Lakes, which is something I can only applaud.

Mr. Speaker, the Montreal riding I represent, the riding of Saint-Jacques, may seem very far from the Great Lakes. And it is. It is hundreds of miles away. However, we are closer than we think.

The St. Lawrence River binds us together and ties us closer, but it is not necessarily to our advantage when it comes to pollution. The riding where I live lies along the St. Lawrence River, all the way from Atwater Avenue to Papineau Street. Unfortunately it has been years since Montrealers—at least those who live in my neighbourhood—were able to enjoy their proximity to the river water because the port of Montreal covers the full extent of my riding. Thanks to certain initiatives taken by the previous Liberal Government, an opening has been made through the port of Montreal so that we now have a window through which downtown Montreal residents can have access to their river. One problem remains to be solved, however: now that people have access to the river they are quite upset to realize that they cannot enjoy it as much as they would like to for the simple reason that the water of the St. Lawrence River does not lend itself to the kind of activities which people generally look forward to. Perhaps they can take boat or canoe rides, but they cannot play in the water, go for a swim or practice scuba-diving because it is prohibited as a result of pollution.

At the risk of being somewhat sentimental, Mr. Speaker, I can tell you that some of the fondest memories of my younger days— or of my life, for that matter—relate to an annual visit we made when I was living downtown at the age of eight or nine. It was almost an annual pilgrimage. My parents were not rich by any means, but they managed to save a bit of money to take us for a whole day to Belmont Park close to the Rivière-des-Prairies. Not only did we enjoy ourselves in the various rides, but the best part of it was going for a swim in the Rivière-des-Prairies at the end of the afternoon. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, it has been years since people have been allowed to swim in the Rivière-des-Prairies.

At the risk of letting on that I am getting older, I was thinking earlier that you have to be at least 45 to remember people swimming in the St. Lawrence River and to recall the great beaches along its shores. I can understand your smile, Mr. Speaker, as I have just betrayed the fact that I am over 45 even through I may not look it. In any case, for young people today, the St. Lawrence is not a river where people swim, it is a dump, and as a certain Minister of the Environment said a while ago, it could even be described as a cesspool.

Naturally, a lot of the pollution does not necessarily come from the Great Lakes. A lot of it comes directly from the Montreal region. For instance, the sewers of a centre with a population of some two million people certainly do a lot of damage to the water of the St. Lawrence. There is also the fact that surface waters contain a lot of lead because of the very dense automobile traffic in the greater Montreal area, and there are also the industrial wastes from a number of plants as well as waste from the many cities and villages upstream from Montreal as far as the Ottawa River and all the way along the St. Lawrence up to the Great Lakes.

Mr. Speaker, a major part of the pollution in the immediate vicinity of Montreal is being cleaned up gradually thanks to initiatives of the city of Montreal and the various Governments. The newspaper of Saturday March 1 pointed out one thing which is certainly cause for rejoicing, namely the fact that the great sewage treatment plant in Eastern Montreal will provide some breathing space for the St. Lawrence River, called "this chronic patient" in the newspaper, when it becomes truly operational in two years. That is the objective. But, of course, treatment will not solve all environment problems, because all the pollution in the Great Lakes, which has been described by some Hon. Members who spoke before me, ends up being carried by the St. Lawrence waters and creating problems in the Montreal area. And even with all our efforts to treat our own local effluents, something else must be done to clean up the St. Lawrence River at its source, that is the Great Lakes, because that pollution comes from the Great Lakes.

Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity some three years ago, if my memory serves me right, to attend meetings of the Joint Canada-United States Great Lakes Commission. I was suprised to realize that the Canada-U.S. agreement, the Agreement on the Great Lakes Waters Quality, the so-called Boundary Waters Treaty, covers an area that is very large but stops in the vicinity of Cornwall, right at the door to the Province of Quebec. This means not only that the area covered by the Boundery Waters Treaty stops at Cornwall, but that funding also stops at Cornwall. And so does the expertise of that international body, and this is what I am concerned about.

Also, concrete steps taken by the Government of Canada to try and prevent pollution in the Great Lakes from reaching Montreal fail to go beyond mere words, and the Cornwall area.

One of the best reports on the St. Lawrence waters' pollution situation in the Montreal area, especially in terms of its originating in the Great Lakes, was published on April 14 in Le Devoir. It was written by Louis-Gilles Francoeur, who suggested that the Canada-U.S. Great Lakes agreement could be extended to cover the St. Lawrence River. I will go further, and suggest that it be extended to the St. Lawrence River because as severe as pollution may be in the immediate area of the Great Lakes, even though it is just as bad as far down as Montreal from the Great Lakes, the problem remains unsolved.

The Minister is aware of the situation, and in the same Le Devoir of April 14, we read:

> According to the federal Minister of the Environment, Ottawa is prepared to negotiate a comprehensive plan with Quebec to clean up the St. Lawrence, and would even be willing to renegotiate the Canada-U.S. agreement on the Great Lakes and extend it to the St. Lawrence River system, which is receiving increasing amounts of the toxic substances dumped in the world's largest bodies of fresh water by industries in Ontario and in the U.S.

Which is more or less what I was trying to say earlier, Mr. Speaker, but in more elegant prose. I shall go on, to show how well disposed the Minister seems to be, at least according to this article, where he says:

> I am quite prepared to discuss with Quebec the possibility of the province becoming a partner of the federal and Ontario Governments in this project—

He was referring to projects included in the Great Lakes Agreement.

Mr. Speaker, the sad truth is that all that rhetoric which we appreciate and endorse have not led to concrete action. This Government has now been in office here in Ottawa for a year and a half but nothing has happened, except eloquent speeches in which we are told that pollution in the Great Lakes is appalling, and following his trip to Montreal the Minister—fully briefed by his political advisers, I would imagine—now tells us in the House that the situation is terrible in the Montreal region and that something has to be done about it. Yet nothing concrete ever came out of his visit.

Again I quote some of the comments the Minister made when he was in Montreal:

> The federal Minister of Environment emphasized that Ottawa "is prepared to sit down with Quebec" to draft an "over-all plan" to fight the river pollution. The Canadian Government has the same responsibilities towards the St. Lawrence River as it has towards the Great Lakes—

These are reassuring words, and I will certainly not take the Minister to task for saying that. It being so, I would simply ask him: What are we doing to reduce pollution in the Great Lakes and in the water system which extends as far as the Montreal region?

And I am still quoting the Minister who, after giving some examples of what could have been done, became very cautious when asked whether Ottawa would invest as much in cleaning up the St. Lawrence as for the Great Lakes. It is very easy to say that there is a serious pollution problem in the Montreal area and that the federal Governement should sit down with Quebec to discuss it.

However, when we ask specifically how much the Canadian Government is willing to spend, the answers become more evasive.

When the Minister was asked how much money he intended to spend, he answered: The Government of Canada has the same commitment to the St. Lawrence system as to the Great Lakes. However, the Minister added that he could not reply to the question and clearly state that an equal amount would be allocated because a lot of very complex factors had to be considered.

The St. Lawrence pollution problem in the region of Montreal will therefore be judged as important as the Great Lakes, pollution problem, but when the Minister is asked to provide equal funding, he answers that he cannot do so.

Mr. Speaker, that is what find unacceptable. I have nothing against the good intentions of the Minister. On the contrary, I congratulate him about his good intentions.

However, I am asking him to take practical action—

• (1630)

[English]

In other words, as is said in English, he should put his money where his mouth is. If he were to do only that, then federal money would be added to the money which is already being spent in the Montreal area, since we are already depolluting the damage which we are doing to our river in that area. Let us have the federal Government give us a hand to try to kill the pollution which comes from the Great Lakes.

[Translation]

I therefore conclude by saying that the Canada-U.S. Great Lakes Agreement should, and not could, apply also to the St. Lawrence River.

[English]

Mr. Warner: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault) made some comments which I certainly share since my constituents also occupy an area along the St. Lawrence River. We are quite concerned about the pollutants in the Great Lakes system and how they affect the St. Lawrence River. This concern relates to the efforts of one of my constituents, Mr. George Williamson of 1603 Princess Street in Cornwall.

There are something in the order of 500 to 1,000 man-made chemicals which are discharged into the Great Lakes system. We must be concerned about these pollutants. As an individual, Mr. Williamson has certainly made an effort to do something about the pollution of our waters. It is something in which all people can participate, Governments included.

The Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques mentioned that sewers empty into the St. Lawrence River and into the Great Lakes system. The efforts of municipal and provincial Governments, as well as those of the federal Government, are required to do something about these pollutants.

Mr. Williamson of 1603 Princess Street in Cornwall has developed a $30-product which will clean sink drains without the use of chemicals. The product uses only pure, clear water in a pressurized system which is adaptable to all faucets. There are no chemicals, there is no mess, there is no danger, there are no plumbing bills. It is something that can be used in all homes, in industry or in Government offices.

Mr. Williamson of 1603 Princess Street in Cornwall will certainly be glad to hear from anyone who is interested in contributing to elimination of toxic chemicals which are in such common usage in drain cleaners. Would the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques be interested in using this product?

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member for Stormont—Dundas (Mr. Warner) is offering me a sample of the product in question, I would be glad to try it. As I said earlier, there are more than two million people in the Montreal area, so it does not take much from each individual to make a river absolutely polluted. A good many of the sewers are now cleaned up because there is a plant in Montreal, but the problem is not entirely over. It will take two more years before all the sewage is treated before being returned to the river. Meanwhile, we could be using this product of Mr. Williamson.

I believe that a good part of the Hon. Member's riding would fall within the area which is under the jurisdiction of the Great Lakes Agreement. His area can benefit from all the expertise and funding of this joint international organization whereas we in Montreal are on the outside. That is why I have been pleading that the area covered by this international agreement be extended to Montreal or even to Quebec City. The St. Lawrence River has to carry all the stuff that is dumped into the Great Lakes.

Unfortunately, if we want to solve the problem in Montreal, we have to buy Mr. Williamson's product on our own. We are not subsidized to do that, though I am willing to try it. However, in the Hon. Member's area, he can use Mr. Williamson's product, but he can also use all the services of the joint commission, something which I cannot do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Charest): Questions or comments. The Hon. Member for Saint-Henri—Westmount.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in this House to support the motion of my colleague, the Hon. Member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia).

[English]

I did not anticipate this opportunity but I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I welcome it very much.

The specific subject matter of the motion dealing with the Great Lakes, the St. Clair River and of course the St. Lawrence River is of particular significance to me as it is to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Saint-Jacques (Mr. Guilbault), who, like me, represents a riding in the great City of Montreal. I will return to that subject in several minutes.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, but I would like to point out that the Lachine Canal, which has extraordinary recreational potential for the city of Montreal, is also located in my constituency. That canal is so badly polluted that even canoes have been banned.

[English]

You can see, Mr. Speaker, that I have a personal interest in this matter on behalf of my constituents and the residents of the City of Montreal.

Before I deal with the specific motion, I would like to place it in a larger, global context. Those of us who have been following the environmental debate around this planet realize that our biosphere is truly in peril. As particular environmental problems reach crisis proportions in one country and another, those nations feel compelled to act. However, it has been a slow process and of course the essence of the motion put by my colleague serves to illustrate some of the problems that occur in environmental policy when different nation-states are involved.

Nations have always been slow to get into gear. Polluters are not often quickly detected. Only recently, the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) fingered five major polluters of the St. Lawrence. However, polluters are not always easy to detect and they are not all located within the boundaries of the country suffering the effects of pollution. What better example could there be than the example of the Great Lakes and that great St. Lawrence Seaway System.

International discussions can easily become deadlocked in an attempt to assign blame on one side or another or in an attempt to come to agreement on how to clean up the situation. I suppose the celebrated acid rain debate is a perfect example of this. The President of the United States has finally acknowledged that acid rain is indeed a problem. Upon the return of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) from Washington, the President's admission was heralded as a major breakthrough in bringing the acid rain situation under control. Meanwhile, people not only here in Canada but in the United States gradually watched their forests waste and their maple trees die. At that point, we had only got to the stage of agreeing that there was a problem.

I suggest that we who live on this wonderful planet earth and in this magnificent biosphere are only seeing the tip of the iceberg, albeit an important tip. There seems to be countless problems dotting the landscape. There are countless time bombs just waiting to explode. Almost every time I pick up a scientific journal, I read about another threat to the biosphere. For example, we are told that the ozone layer is being depleted. That means that the consequential greenhouse effect is likely to change climatic conditions and raise temperatures. As we know, tropical rain forests are being depleted, thus affecting the biosphere, the atmosphere and the oxygen content of the atmosphere. We know that the deserts are growing. Of course, the subject matter at hand is recognized by all as underlying the dreadful pollution that affects our water and causes poisons to accumulate in our air.

Undoubtedly, many Members of the House have seen some of the recent studies which have gone beyond the issue of acid rain to the issue of other toxic substances carried in the air. These in turn will create serious medium and long-term environmental problems.

I suggest to my colleagues that the consequences of our biosphere being in peril are almost beyond our imaginations. Another ice age may come. The polar ice caps may melt. Huge sections of low-lying land are likely to be flooded. Plant and animal species are likely to disappear. Of course farmland may no longer be able to bring forth the crops and bounty which have made those of us in this country one of the best fed and healthiest people in the world. Indeed the situation is a very, very serious one on an international basis, and one which all Governments must be called upon to address.

• (1650)

As we discuss the situation as it applies to our Great Lakes and waterways system, I raise today with my colleagues the question of what we as individuals, not just as lawmakers in the House of Commons—or it may be Congressmen or Senators in the United States or other elected representatives in other countries—can do and should do about the situation. Let me offer from personal observation what I consider to be good news about what has happened in our environment, largely through the efforts of individuals. Those Members of the House who are my age or approaching my age will have noticed a dramatic difference in the attitudes of individuals toward the environment. I remember growing up as a youngster both here in the Province of Ontario and later in the Province of Quebec.

Mr. Gurbin: How long ago was that?

Mr. Johnston: Perhaps the Hon. Member is not aware of it, but I recall how litter on our highways was deplorable and accepted, by and large. Cigarette cartons, packages, tin cans, and beer bottles were thrown out of the windows of automobiles as if it were the way to dispose of such items. It is seldom today that I see anyone throw litter out of a car window. It is not simply because we have anti-litter laws. I suggest that the culture has changed. Indeed there has been a greening of Canada and of America in the minds of our citizenry. People are becoming more responsible in terms of collecting garbage, in terms of keeping the landscape under control, and even in terms of their own individual pollution of lakes and rivers. I think individuals are much more conscious of the importance of preserving the environment, especially for generations to come.

Unfortunately there are issues today which really affect the environment and create a spectre of the kind I just described, namely, putting our biosphere truly in peril. Unfortunately those issues are really beyond the reach of individuals. They are and must be the subject of public policy. Of course, individuals will be there to ensure that politicians have the political will to make sure that the Great Lakes are cleaned up, that our waterways are not polluted, and that the kinds of doomsday scenarios from an environmental point of view which I have described will not occur. I believe that is happening. When one looks at surveys of public opinion, one sees that indeed the environment is very high on the Richter scale of public concern, as it should be. Hence, it will find its way into the public policy of all nations where environment has become a matter of great public concern.

I suppose one of the problems in the minds of many people is that while important, the environment may still be seen somewhat as a luxury for which inadequate funding is provided in a period of recession, or the axe falls on the environment when there are cuts to be made. As I just said, it is true that the environment is a legacy which we must leave for future generations. Unfortunately too many people in public life do not yet recognize that the future has a constituency. I believe that the future has a growing constituency, that people are becoming more and more concerned. I mentioned the polls and so on. The very fact that such debates are occuring in the House of Commons and in legislatures across the country is evidence of the fact that that constituency is growing.

However, I fear that often political programs to monitor, to protect, or to clean up our world will land on the chopping block, just as critical programs in research and development land on the chopping block. It is up to us on all sides of the House to ensure that that does not take place.

While cuts in environmental programs and while cutting back on monitoring the circumstances of our biosphere may indeed have a marginal impact upon reducing the dollar deficit about which everyone is perforce concerned, we must recognize that in this case we are simply substituting a major environmental deficit for a dollar deficit. That environmental deficit in the long term will result in many, many times the impact or the value of a cutting exercise.

Unfortunately I am nearing the end of my comments this afternoon. I see I have approximately four minutes remaining in which I should like to talk about the great St. Lawrence system that in part is the subject of the motion. The motion calls for the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement to be extended to include toxic substance control programs and to restore water quality in the Niagara, St. Clair, and St. Lawrence Rivers.

My home is in Montreal, a great and vibrant metropolis. It is on an island at the confluence of two wonderful rivers—the Ottawa River and the St. Lawrence River. It is surrounded by lakes, by beaches, by smaller islands, by rapids, and by inlets. The area should be an absolute paradise for fishing, swimming, sailing, canoeing—all manner of water sports and recreation. As well, of course, it should provide good drinking water for the population of the area. Effectively the waterways are sewers. They have been polluted through decades of wasteful and thoughtless abuse.

I have already mentioned the historic Lachine Canal. Some years ago a group came to me and asked, because the Lachine Canal cuts through my riding, whether it could hold a canoe race on that canal as part of the summer games. When we applied for permission to conduct such a race, it was denied because the pollution level of the canal was so high that it was considered to be a health hazard, not to swimmers, not to water-skiers, but to canoeists. Parks Canada denied our people, with good reason, the right to conduct a canoe race on the Lachine Canal.

I should like to refer to one last example which I do not think is partisan but concerns another Liberal function.

[Translation]

Last year, we had the Liberal Associations from approximately three or four constituencies together for an evening boat tour on the St. Lawrence River. It was a grand night. There was dancing, there was a buffet, etc., and during that tour with my colleagues, my wife, my children, my friends, my friend the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie (Mr. Malépart) who was also there, I was struck by the fact that it was impossible to have a swim in the St. Lawrence River, that swimming was dangerous. Despite that beauty all around us, we were cruising around on a completely polluted river.

[English]

It is a wonderful area to which the public is effectively denied access and is at risk, if it accepts access, of being ill and effectively using a sewer, which drains the Great Lakes, for recreational purposes. It is a situation we can no longer tolerate.

ABORIGINAL AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

PRESENTATION OF FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John A. PETITION

LOCAL MEASURED TELEPHONE CHARGES

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by several hundred residents of my constituency of Burnaby, particularly senior citizens, who call upon Parliament to direct the CRTC to deny to telephone companies such as B.C. Telephone Company the right to implement a system of local measured service whereby there would be a charge for each call, and point out that such a system of charging would impose a very severe hardship on thousands of Canadians, particularly senior citizens and the handicapped.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 29

FOREST FIRES IN ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Speaker: I am in receipt of a motion of an application under Standing Order 29 from the Hon. Member for Fundy—Royal (Mr. Corbett).

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, consistent with Standing Order 29, I have today informed you that it was my intention to raise a matter in the House requesting an emergency debate on a situation that I consider to be extremely serious. The debate I seek centres on the disastrous situation that has developede in Atlantic Canada during the past week as a result of many major forest fires. The fires have been particularly devastating in New Brunswick and Newfoundland, provinces heavily dependent on the woods industry for the employment of their people and the maintenance of their economies.

The forestry sector is the largest employer in the nation. One out of every 10 employed persons in Canada is employed by that sector. It is our biggest foreign exchange earner and one of the largest purchasers of manufactured goods in Canada.

With the devastation of Atlantic Candian forests, the potential disastrous ramifications to the nation are enormous. We cannot as legislators allow the seriousness of the situation to go unaddressed. We have a moral responsibility to respond immediately, and for that reason, Your Honour, I respectfully request an adjournment of the House for an emergency debate on this important issue.

Mr. Speaker: I have examined the letter the Hon. Member sent and I may say his application was exemplary. I am persuaded that the conditions and terms of Standing Order 29 have in fact been met. Does the Hon. Member have leave to move the adjournment of the House under Standing Order 29 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Leave having been granted, debate is set down for eight o'clock.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Ron Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, on Friday last, I asked a question of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. de Cotret) concerning pensions in the Public Service. I have had a question on the Order Paper for close to a year now dealing specifically with that matter. Given that the Minister told me he will give me an answer by the end of May, and that those figures for which I asked a year ago are very important for understanding this subject, I wonder if I could ask the Government to get an answer for my written question before the end of this week or next.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA PETROLEUM RESOURCES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Friday, May 9, consideration of the motion of Miss Carney that Bill C-92, an Act to regulate interests in petroleum in relation to frontier lands, to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and to repeal the Canada Oil and Gas Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, it is going to be a pleasure for me to speak for a few minutes on the new proposed Canada Petroleum Resources Act. This is something in which of course all Canadians have a great interest, but for those of us who hail from the areas where this Act will govern the disposition of oil and gas rights it is of double interest.

This Bill, Sir, is one of the final nails in the coffin of the late and not particularly lamented National Energy Program. If we compare Bill C-92 with the Canada Oil and Gas Act, which is to be no more after the passage of this Bill, we can perceive the difference in philosophy between the Liberals, who were responsible for the National Energy Program, and the Conservatives, whose philosophy is to be enshrined in the new Canadian Petroleum Resources Act.

On the one hand we have extreme Government supervision of the industry, for example, a great deal of government control over the day-to-day activities of the people who drill for and produce oil and gas in northern and eastern Canada. Under the Canada Oil and Gas Act the deals were negotiated. When someone has to go to Government to make a special deal, it always leaves room for abuse. It is much better if the rules of the game are known beforehand and if we have an open competitive system such as that contemplated under Bill C-92. Under the Bill it is to be left largely to market forces to determine such things as the amount of drilling to be done, the amount of production which will take place, and the prices at which crude oil and gas can be sold. All things which can be left to the open market will be left to that open market.

In my opinion it is time the dispositions on what is now known as Canada oil and gas lands be made available. Under the present circumstance of lowered oil and gas prices, there might not be quite the same level of interest in acquiring oil and gas lands as there would have been some time ago, but land should be opened up. There has not been any land made available for years and years, except some special cases wherein Petro-Canada was concerned.

One corollary which arose because the previous Government refused to make land available was that Canadian companies had to go cap in hand to the multinational companies that had previously tied up all this land to negotiated farm-ins at great expense. That is not the way it should have been; it worked to the detriment of Canadian companies and to the advantage of largely foreign-owned multinational corporations. That was the result of the Liberal policy of refusing to make oil and gas lands available.

One of the best things the Bills does is to remove the back-in, the infamous 25 per cent back-in. It was one of the worst aspects of the national energy policy. It put us on par with banana republics, that type of approach to life. It was grossly unfair. I am pleased to say that it will no longer exist once the Parliament of Canada has passed Bill C-92.

Now I should like to look at some of the specific measures contained in the Bill. One of the first things which hits someone reading the Bill is that there seems to be some discrepancy between the English and French versions. The French version is much shorter than the English one, which is not usually the case. Certain paragraphs on the English side are not on the French side. For example, in the English version there is Clause 37(1)(a), (b), and (c), whereas there is only a Clause 37(1) in the French version. When this matter gets to committee we will have to look at it closely so that both the English and French versions of the Bill read in the same manner. Otherwise I can foresee us getting into difficulty in the courts in years to come.

The Bill changes the name of Canada Lands, something which I did not really like that much, to the term frontier lands. I have certain reservations about that term as well. Undoubtedly the Bill regulates dispositions on the frontier lands. There is no doubt the Sverdrup Basin is a frontier area, as are the Beaufort Sea and the eastern offshore. Anyone who lives in Watson Lake, Yukon, or Hay River, Northwest Territories, might take exception to being told that they are on the frontier; that is not quite the case.

The lands in question can be divided into two parts. There are those over which there is no doubt that Canada has continuing jurisdiction, and there are those lands which are more correctly territorial lands, those lands in Yukon and Northwest Territories which are presently held in trust by Canada for eventual provinces to be established in those areas. Although it may not make a difference to this Bill, it ought to borne in mind by the Government of Canada and by the Parliament of Canada that at some point in time those lands will be transferred to new provinces and that in the meantime there is a trust relationship. We, as the Parliament of Canada, are legislating over lands which we are holding in trust, so we have to be very careful about it.

The Bill does not contemplate a resource revenue sharing agreement between the territories and the federal Government. It does not preclude it, but it is something to which I wanted to allude. I believe it was on May 25, 1985 that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) said in Inuvik that the Government of Canada would negotiate a resource revenue sharing agreement with the territories, along the lines of those which exist with Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. I urge her to continue in the negotiations so that that resource revenue sharing agreement can be brought into being at the earliest opportunity.

This is not a revolutionary Bill. In a way, it is evolutionary in that a lot of what is in it is something to which Canadians in the oil and gas patch have become accustomed. It follows on the oil and gas regulations made under the Territorial Lands Act and, to a certain extent, on the concepts involved in the Canada Oil and Gas Act when we come down to administrative-type things.

Purists—and among those I would include myself—wonder what has happened to the venerable institution of the oil and gas lease. In this Bill, as under the Canada Oil and Gas Act, the highest form of ownership which someone can have is a licence to produce. In most provinces we have oil and gas leases which give title to the resources contained in the ground. However, under this Bill we are stuck with the highest form of ownership, being the right to produce that oil and gas. I should like to see some explanation given why we cannot go back to the idea of having oil and gas leases.

The exploration licence is another aspect that has been carried over and something to which we have become accustomed. These licences will last for a period of some 9 years unless a significant discovery is made and some new regulations come into play. The licences will be issued on a bid basis. I am pleased to see that we are going into the posting system which has been quite successfully used in Alberta. This is part of the open market philosophy in which people who want oil and gas rights will have to bid openly on them and not make these special little deals with Government, as was the case under the old system. People will bid, presumably, on a basis of cash or commitment. All the terms and conditions should, and under this Act, I presume will be made known beforehand. For instance, if there is a requirement regarding local participation or a requirement regarding Canadian business opportunities, those things will be spelled out in advance, and we will not have one company running to COGLA trying to make some special deal that no-one else knows about.

I would presume, and hope this is the case, that the various licensed areas can be different depending upon the location. If you are exploring for oil and gas in the Sverdrup Basin where it is unlikely you will have significant production for sometime to come, where the drilling of wells is very expensive, you might need a different regulator in your regime, a disposition of maybe larger areas of land than would be the case say in the Cameron Hills just north of the Alberta border. The disposition ought to be of the same order of magnitude of those just to the south in northern Alberta. There is a difference between the non-frontier areas and the frontier areas proper where you are exploring in virgin territory in an area that is very expensive.

The Bill contemplates the making of drilling orders by the Minister. I would urge that only careful use be made of this provision. I would not want to see the case where a company has oil and gas lands, the seismic work et cetera looks pretty good, but for some reason, and the reason could very well be the one we find ourselves in today, namely, the company has no money because the price of oil and gas is so low, the company loses that land because it could not comply with a drilling order made by the Minister. This power should be used only very sparingly.

I am pleased to see there is no foreign ownership provisions in the granting of exploration licences. I think it is quite proper there should be at the production stage, but at the exploratory stage where there is no production I think it is better to have the maximum amount of money and the maximum amount of expertise brought to bear in finding new reserves for Canada. When we get to the production licences, which I note will be for a 25 year term and extended automatically when actual production is taking place, there is a requirement for 50 per cent Canadian ownership.

As I said before, I feel this to be right and proper. I would go even further than that. I would venture to suggest that we do not need all the exceptions to this that are in the Bill. If we just spell out exactly what we mean by 50 per cent Canadian requirement and make it a condition of getting a production licence, I think that would suffice. Maybe you would want to give a little discretionary authority to the Minister, but if you spell out all kinds of exceptions in the Bill they will become the rule rather than the exception and people are likely to take all kinds of advantage.

With respect to development orders contemplated under the Bill, I want to say the same thing that I did about drilling orders, but to make the case even stronger. If we look at the experience in Saskatchewan with the potash industry where the Government used its authority to tell people: "You develop a potash mine or you lose the right to that ground", we will note that everybody put new mines into being in an era when you could not sell all the resulting potash. That did not make economic sense. The idea of development orders is something you need in the Bill, but the provision should be used extremely sparingly, otherwise we could have an improper allocation of resources and flood our own markets. We have to be very careful about that provision.

The provisions with respect to subsurface storage leases, what is contemplated here I would imagine is the underground storage of crude oil, natural gas or maybe even petroleum products. If you read that provision in the Bill, the clause dealing with subsurface storage leases, it could mean dealing with the subsurface storage of butter, cabbages or anything else. I think a little bit of rewording is necessary.

With respect to royalties, let me put the good point first. I am pleased to see that a proper appeal procedure is to be put in place so that if someone has an objection against a royalty payment that they are obliged to make, they can appeal. There are a few points that are probably not to good, Sir. The amount and method of calculation for royalties has been left entirely to regulations. We had an explanation by the Parliamentary Secretary when he introduced the Bill saying what the royalties were to be. Generally speaking, the amount and method is pretty good, 30 per cent of net cash flow. I just wish these things had not been left entirely to regulations. There should be something in the Bill so that you could determine in an act of Parliament what is the maximum royalty to be paid. It is most important to know this when you are making a decision whether to invest or not to invest in the exploration for oil and gas.

I had many more things to say, Mr. Speaker, but I guess my time is getting nigh. I will put some of my notes aside for a further occasion. I think the Bill is a vast improvement on the Canada Oil and Gas Act. It will, however, require very careful study in committee. I imagine that many amendments will come forward as a result of committee study. I am pleased to support a Bill that will work to the best benefit of petroleum explorers, producers, consumers and Canadians in general.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I was interested to note in the comments of the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) when that he mentioned the back-in provision and the insistence, I suppose would be the word, of Canada to remain involved in the development or ownership of these oil lands. He compared that to an attitude of banana republics. He implied that only very backward nations followed such practice. The British have used a system of common lands all through their history, with a few minor exceptions. There was an enclosure movement at a time when some of the new capitalist class and the lords were getting very strong. They actually took over the common lands and enclosed them for a period of time, a move which was not remembered very fondly by most people.

Does the Member see that period of time as being the ultimate in the development of a country? Is he in fact advocating that Canada no longer treat parklands and our northern areas as part of the right of all Canadians? Does he feel that the use of oil from these lands should not at least partly accrue to Canadians as has been the British approach of keeping some lands for common use? Is he proposing to return to a form of enclosure?

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Speaker, I did not anticipate getting into a debate on the enclosure movement which occurred in England and other European countries as early as the 14th century, continuing until the 18th century. It is significant to note that the enclosure movement in Europe did not coincide with the great increase in capitalism of which my friend does not approve. It began much earlier than that and had much to do with the development of the wool trade, if I understand my English history correctly.

In any event, whether or not that is the case, I cannot see any analogy between what happened in the 15th century in England and what is happening under this Bill. It is made very clear that the people of Canada own the oil and gas lands. The most that will ever be given to anyone is a licence to produce. They will not even be given a lease. What do national parks have to do with this issue? This Bill has absolutely nothing to do with Banff National Park or any other national park. This Bill has to do with the disposition of oil and gas lands in areas which are not national parks. If the Hon. Member had taken the trouble to read the National Parks Act he would know that it is not possible to get any kind of oil and gas rights in a national park. I do not know what the Hon. Member is talking about.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to make certain that the Hon. Member put his own philosophy very clearly before us as it applies to national parks. From his remarks it sounded as though he was proposing to back away from the system of keeping Canadian content in those lands.

The Member went on to discuss the posting and bidding system in this Bill. He mentioned that the terms would be known before the drilling began. Does this mean that the public and interested bystanders would know the precise terms arrived at, or is there still some protection of so-called commercial confidentiality? Will other bidders become aware of why their bids lost out? Will that kind of information be made available?

Mr. Nickerson: That is the whole idea behind it, Mr. Speaker. Under the Liberal administration there was secrecy. One person said he would do one thing and another person said he would do another. Other people did not know what they were doing. Some bureaucrats then decided that one deal was better than another. Perhaps the Minister stuck his nose into it too. They considered which bidder was the best Party supporter and which would help out in the next election. That was the old system under the Liberals. We now have clear skies. Everyone will know what are the terms and conditions before the bids are made. It will be a free and open process. That is what it is all about. I am very pleased that the Hon. Member raised this point because it has allowed me to stress that very important difference in philosophy between the Conservatives on this side of the House and the socialists who hide under a shroud of secrecy on the other side.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, would the Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) confirm that the Government is proposing quite a different process than that currently being followed in the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion?

Mr. Nickerson: I was going to say that I hope so, Sir. I must say that I am not thoroughly familiar with the way in which the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion transacts its business. I know that it has come under some degree of criticism. When I was in my riding the other week a number of people complained to me about the way in which grants had been given. Business people were concerned that, after having paid taxes, this Department of the Government gave a large grant to their competitor on the other side of the street.

As a personal opinion, I have some reservations about some of the things which that particular Department does. I think it would be much worse if it had not been headed by such an Hon. Minister of the Crown who did his best to try to alleviate some of the worst shortcomings of a system of grants and subsidies which has grown up over the years.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have a chance to say a few words this morning on Bill C-92, a Bill to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act which will be known as the Canadian Petroleum Resources Act when it is passed by Parliament. This is a very appropriate time to be dealing with this because never in the history of the energy industry have we faced such a tremendous downturn as we have in the last three or four months. Even government Members talk about it as the most difficult time in the history of the Canadian energy industry. This Bill implements a number of the policies of the present Government which have already had a tremendously negative impact on the country.

In the 1984 election campaign the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) promised in Prince Albert and Halifax that 100,000 to 300,000 new jobs would be created. Recent information and analysis provided by the Canadian petroleum industry shows a dramatic drop, not only in investment, but in jobs. StatsCanada estimates that during March and April nearly 10,000 jobs were lost in Alberta, nearly all due to the downturn in the energy industry. There are projections that the level of unemployment in Alberta may go as high as 16 per cent by August of this year, with even higher estimates for the cities of Edmonton and Calgary which are especially dependant on this industry.

In the first weeks of May there were 39 rigs drilling in the western sedentary basin out of a total of 480 in western Canada. It is estimated that only one or two rigs will be operating on the east coast offshore, and there will be a decided downturn as well in the Beaufort. The most recent estimate of the Canadian Petroleum Association is that there will be only $6 billion of investment by the industry in 1986. That is down from a $10.5 billion expenditure in 1985, and a forecast expenditure for 1986 of $11.2 billion. Of the $6 billion, half was spent in the first quarter. That means there will only be about $3 billion to be spent over the last three quarters.

Obviously we have an energy policy which is not equipped to cope with the current downturn in the price of oil. In both the Western Accord and the Altantic Accord there is a very small paragraph saying that if there should be a precipitous drop in the price of crude oil, it would be subject to negotiation and discussion with the industry and the provincial Governments. So far we have not seen negotiations or discussions which will have a beneficial impact. Clearly the industry is gearing down and the economic and social carnage throughout western Canada is evident.

We do not have to look just to Alberta. We can look to communities throughout Ontario and Quebec. In my own constituency Algoma Steel is shutting down its tube-making facilities. A staff of about 800, members of the United Steelworkers' Union, have been or will be laid off very shortly. There is a new $370 million tube mill coming onstream late this year and the prospects for employment there are very negative. According to the front page of the Sault Star of Tuesday, May 16, the Algoma Ore Division of Algoma Steel has to reduce its production or develop a plan for an orderly shutdown. Communities like Wawa are facing the possibility of a complete shutdown. Carrying ore from Wawa to Sault Ste. Marie represents a majority of the tonnage carried by the Algoma Central Railway. If it loses that business, the viability of the entire operation will be in doubt.

Even government Members are complaining, saying that the Government has to take action. The Tories, when they were in Opposition, demanded that the PRGT be eliminated. They saw it as a source of additional revenue for the industry to be used in exploration and development. Yet the Government, which spoke so fervently against the tax, is maintaining it at the rate of 10 per cent in 1986, 8 per cent in 1987, and 6 per cent in 1988. At the same time, the oil industry is calling on Alberta and the other producing provinces to reduce their royalties from 30 per cent or 40 per cent to something in the order of 20 per cent or 25 per cent. So far no action has been taken.

Let us look at some projects which were onstream just a year ago and which have now been knocked off the rails. The Lloydminster upgrader was an excellent project, very labour intensive. It would provide a great deal of employment and a secure oil supply in the future. Yet the Government has backed away from the commitments made by the previous Government for some $50 million upfront and $750 million in loan guarantees. That project seems to be on the back burner. There is a very limited amount of activity in the Beaufort. Exploration and development in Hibernia is tied up in fiscal negotiations between the Newfoundland Government and the federal Government. Everything was supposed to have been solved with the wave of a hand and a quick handshake, but it is not very clear now whether Hibernia is going to go forward. The Venture and Sable Island projects certainly seem to be on hold and there is not likely to be any action there this year. Canadian-owned companies like Husky Bow Valley were promised PIP grants on some eight or ten wells but those PIP grants have been ground down to one or two. Certainly the legislation before us today is not adequate to deal with these kinds of problems caused by the international price of oil today.

During the election campaign the Minister and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) talked about energy self-sufficiency. Yet the CPA assessment indicates that statistical self-sufficiency could be lost as early as 1990, and a very significant supply gap would develop by 1995. This would make Canada dependent on imported oil for some 30 per cent of its requirements.

The low level of exploration spawned by the Western Accord and the Atlantic Accord will have a very negative effect on our exports. For example, if we compare the amount of oil and gas exports in 1986 with 1985, we see a 25 per cent reduction in the first quarter. In 1985 oil and gas sales to the U.S. were $1.497 billion. In the first quarter of 1986, they were $1.863 billion. It is projected that over-all our exports of natural gas and crude oil will decline from $9.8 billion in 1985 to $6 billion in 1986.

The present level of oil and gas exploration, development and exports will have a very significant impact on exports from our country, and thus our balance of trade, which has been one of our strongest points in the whole free trade debate. We have been able to look with pride at our oil and gas exports, along with automotive exports, softwood lumber exports and many other commodities as generating $20 billion worth of surplus exports. Whereas we see in oil and gas alone the projections are that we will lose about $3 billion this year.

The promise of the Minister of Energy on self-sufficiency certainly does not seem to be carried out. It does not look like we are going to be self-sufficient with the current level of exploration and development which is taking place under this Government. Certainly the Minister and the Prime Minister in the Prince Albert declaration talked about increased Canadian participation. Although this legislation before the House does provide for 50 per cent Canadian ownership at the developmental stage for oil and gas, it really takes away from the small Canadian companies.

All you have to do is attend the energy committee and hear the Independent Petroleum Association members talking about how they are not going to be able to fulfil their share of the current exploration and development phase; without the Petroleum Incentive Program they are not going to be able to keep their share. Even the big ones like Husky Bow Valley said that they were not going to be able to complete their share. The PIP grants were being taken away so rapidly that in their case, where they had hoped to carry out the completion of seven or eight or ten wells, they are only going to have adequate funding for one or two, and they consider that a breach of trust.

The new program of providing a 25 per cent exploration tax credit, only 40 per cent of which is refundable, is not adequate to keep the Canadian players in the field. Not only will it not be adequate in the future, but even for the current cycle of exploration and development it is most inadequate.

We will see the Canadian share being developed by Imperial, Texaco and Shell, the other multinationals, so that the Canadian participation will be very limited. It is hard to believe that the Canadian companies will find their share with the current system of financial assistance.

The final point in the Prime Minister's declaration at Prince Albert and in Halifax during the election campaign was fairness to producers and consumers. Clearly we have outlined the unfairness of the current system for small Canadian companies to paly an adequate part in exploration, whether it is off the east coast or in other areas of the country.

If we look at the pricing of gasoline and diesel, comparing it between Canada and the United States, we see a differential of anywhere from 10 to 15 cents a litre for gasoline. Clearly there seems to be a system going on in which we have the worst of both worlds. We have a low crude oil price which put the steel workers in Algoma Steel out of their jobs, whereas the retailers are charging—the big multinationals, including Petro-Canada—very high prices for gasoline. We end up with very high retail prices. Many pumps are selling at 40, 46 cents a litre. In many parts of northern Ontario it is even higher than that.

I do not think the Government's energy policy and this Bill which is before us today are really adequate to deal with the current energy situation in the world and current oil prices, because we see thousands of people being laid off in the energy industry right across the country, not only Alberta but in communities like Sault Ste. Marie, at a time when the Government promised hundreds of thousands of jobs in the energy industry, and that the energy industry would be an engine of growth. In fact, it is one of the most beleaguered industries in Canada today. Certainly this legislation and this policy do nothing to help it.

Mr. McDermid: I listened to the Hon. Member's speech with some interest. I was not entirely enraptured with it. I noticed he was quoting statistics from last year when the energy industry in Canada had a record year, and comparing last year with this year. I wonder if he might admit to the House and to the public that in fact falling world oil prices, over which Canada has absolutely no control might have had something to do with the problems being experienced with the energy industry today, rather than in fact, as he would like the people to believe, the energy policy? The energy policy last year generated a record year in energy in Canada. Since that time we have seen the fall in world oil prices. Would he not admit that that has had the major impact on the energy situation as we see it today in Canada?

Mr. Foster: The falling oil prices have had a very adverse effect on the energy interest, and that was the point I was trying to make, that the energy policy of the Government is not adequate. In the Western Accord, if you read through it, you will see one little paragraph about an inch long saying that in the event of catastrophic low energy prices, crude oil prices or, conversely, very high energy prices, the Government would take action, it would consult with the producing provinces, with the consumers and so on. That small paragraph obviously is not adequate to deal with the situation, because instead of having hundreds of thousands of new jobs being created, as was promised just a year ago, we see at least 100,000 jobs being lost in the energy sector.

I think the notional figure is that for every $1 billion worth of investment in the energy industry lost, you lose about 30,000 jobs in the Canadian economy. As I quoted the figures from the Canadian Petroleum Association in their most recent survey, it appears that the loss of investment will be in the order of $3 billion this year. The problem is that $3 billion in lost investment will occur during the last nine months. Therefore, we should expect that at least 100,000 jobs will be lost either directly or indirectly in the Canadian economy because of the inadequacy of the Western Accord.

When we examine the Atlantic Accord we see the loss of the Petroleum Incentives Program. During our consideration of the previous Bill, every company in the IPAC asked the committee for a system to extend the PIP grants for a certain period until they could at least complete their current exploration and development phase. So far, there has been no response by the Government and I do not see anything in this Bill except the 25 per cent exploration tax credit. Therefore, companies like Husky and Bow Valley, which had a commitment from the Government for the exploration of eight to ten wells, are being limited to one or two wells.

The suggestion of the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary fails on two counts. The Bill does not provide those incentives to continue exploration and development off the east coast. Second, the Western Accord is not adequate to deal with the current low oil prices. I do not understand how he believes that the Western Accord can adequately deal with this situation as thousands of workers are being laid off from steel mills in communities like Sault Ste. Marie and other parts of the country.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member failed to mention in his brief remarks that the reason money is not being expended now is that there is a lack of income as a result of the price of a barrel of oil. Billions and billions of dollars in investment funds left the country under the National Energy Program and went to countries that were more hospitable in regard to exploration. That is not what is happening now. Money is not being transferred to other areas for exploration; the companies do not have the money because of the decrease in cash flow as a result of the price of a barrel of oil. The Hon. Member should be fair in his remarks.

I have yet to hear what the Liberal's energy policy would be. I want the Hon. Member to give me the specific details of their energy policy and tell me what the Liberals would do today, if they were in power, to correct the situation in the energy industry. Will he explain to the Canadian people how the National Energy Program, which drove billions of investment dollars out of the country, would do any better under the circumstances of world pricing that we are experiencing today? It is interesting to note that prices are now back up to over $17 a barrel U.S. Obviously, the market is very volatile and the prices are fluctuating. Will the Hon. Member answer those two questions?

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, the Parliamentary Secretary talks about billions of dollars leaving the country. He promised that there would be billions of dollars coming into the country, but I have not seen that happen. Clearly that money is not going to Atlantic Canada or we would be seeing more than one or two wells being drilled there. Nor is it going to western Canada because exploration and development has been cut back to only $3 billion for the last three-quarters of this year. Many people in the petroleum industry say that this will cost thousands of jobs at a time when the Government promised hundreds of thousands of jobs.

Mr. McDermid: Answer the question.

Mr. Foster: The Government's policy was that by going to the world market price up to 200,000 jobs would be created. Under the National Energy Program the Government was in a position to adjust the price and the incentive programs to ensure that there was continuation of exploration and development. Even during the recession between 1982 and part of 1984 the oil and gas industry was more active in Canada than in the United States. That continued through 1985 with the Petroleum Incentive Program.

The present Government promised to get rid of the PGRT but, for some reason, in 1986 it is reluctant to do so even though the industry is demanding it. The proof is in the pudding.

The question we ask is why is there such an inadequate clause in the Western Accord to deal with the problem of precipitous drops in crude oil prices to the level of $10 or $11 a barrel or, conversely, an increase in world price to $40 or $50 a barrel? The Hon. Member knows that we end up with legislation that seems inadequate, and the Bill before us today will be inadequate to meet most of the criteria in the Prince Albert announcement. There will not be enough incentive for exploration off the east coast and certainly not for Canadian participation in drilling and exploration.

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to add my thoughts to the debate on Bill C-92, An Act to regulate interests in petroleum in relation to frontier lands, to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and to repeal the Canada Oil and Gas Act.

One of the characteristics of the energy debate which began even before the last election campaign, and one of the characteristics of statements that have been made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) in regard to Bill C-92 and its erstwhile predecessor with the previous administration, is the attractiveness of the rhetoric that the Government has been able to marshal in its support for the measures that it is proposing in this Bill. Some of the rhetoric is literally on the acceptability level of God, motherhood and apple pie.

The Government has been talking of simplification. Of course, no one would oppose that, except upon realizing what is entailed in that simplification process.

We have heard the energy industry described as an engine of growth, as indeed it has been for many areas of Canada. I do not doubt that the energy industry has the potential again to be an engine of growth in those areas but we must also remind ourselves of the difficulties that fluctuations in energy prices have caused in other parts of the country. We should remind ourselves that this engine of growth cannot be created without assistance from the Government and cannot spring from the ground, fully armed, at the Government's behest with the passage of this legislation. Nor is it something that could or indeed should be insulated from the world market. It will not happen automatically by the Government's legislative or, as we see in this Bill much more clearly, regulatory fiscal fiat.

• (1210)

We heard, after all, as part of the campaign of rhetoric the so-called putative practice of "drilling for grants" condemned. Indeed, with the generosity of the previous fiscal regime, a suspicion might legitimately have been held that companies were "drilling for grants" rather than for energy finds, were it not for the fact that those of us who spent a substantial portion of our lives in the private sector know very well that whether or not there are tax incentives applied, a company will always choose the most attractive form of action, the more attractive field to drill, if it is faced with a number of potential opportunities.

Another part of the rhetoric which was included in the Prince Albert declaration was the elimination of confiscation. Of course, the very idea of confiscation in a free and democratic society is something which is abhorrent. But the whole rhetorical campaign about the elimination of confiscation entirely begged the question and, indeed, ignored the evidence of what Canadians were contributing by way of tax incentives, subsidies and the whole range of breaks, bonuses and inducements in the National Energy Program to the development of Canada's oil and gas industry, particularly on the frontier. In reality there was no confiscation proposed but, as I will attempt to demonstate later in my speech, simply a measure which provided some return to the Canadian taxpayers for the very substantial investments we all have been making in the development of Canada's frontier lands.

We were told that the Government would guarantee Canadian participation. My colleague, the previous speaker, exposed some of the fallacies regarding that particular piece of rhetoric and I will attempt to uncover more. We were told, and this must surely be a phrase which is imbedded in the instant memory of the Government word processors, presumably available at the pressing of one key, that the changes would ensure effective regulation and administration. That again begs some very profound and fundamental questions as to what should be regulated and what should be administered. We were told that this legislation would protect the public interest. That is again something which is right up there with apple pie in terms of rhetorical content. We were also told that, in an echo of the drilling for grants and not for oil, that the policy would reward success and not effort. I am glad to see that the Bill before us does increase the claimability of earned tax credits, because that is something I believe will reward small Canadian companies which are active in this area, but this is really just a pale whimper of the rhetoric of rewarding success and not effort.

Something I must say about Bill C-92 is that we are glad to see that hindsight and experience have tempered some of the measures the Government might otherwise have been tempted to take. We are glad to see we do not have a Bill which is predicated on the assumption of continued strong rising prices on the international oil market. I am also glad to say we have a Bill which seems to come fairly close to being "assumption-neutral" in those terms. It is a Bill, in fact, which will provide for a regime which will at least function whether the prices go up or down.

There are some pretty significant points of criticism about this Bill, some which I would like to go into at some length. One of these criticisms relates to the idea of a single bidding criterion to replace the existing process of negotiation between companies and the Government, which can be used to foster local employment, contracting, the training of workers of aboriginal origin, the pace of development and a wide range of other considerations.

One of the great fallacies we continue to commit in the framing of industrial policy instruments, such as Bill C-92, is that such developments occur in a vacuum, whereas manifestly they do not. They occur as part of over-all economic development and as part of over-all social development. There is one thing we should never allow ourselves to forget in this Chamber and in our public pronouncements elswhere, and that is that the whole purpose of an economy is to serve society. The whole purpose of any part of our industrial, commercial trade or, indeed, administrative economy, is to serve and develop society. Something I see in the reverting to a single bidding criterion is the potential danger of ignoring or overruling, or the simple discarding of the very legitimate concerns of people in the affected areas, many of whom are the descendents of the original inhabitants of Canada, the danger of glossing over the concerns they very legitimately hold and the disruption of their traditional economic and social patterns.

I would like to quote from a few documents with respect to those matters, because one thing I notice, and something others have commented on in this legislation, is that we see a very strong representation from the energy side, so to speak, to the sponsors of this legislation, and very little evidence of consideration, safeguarding and policy analysis by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, which should have a very strong say in the framing of such legislation and which is mandated by treaty and trust responsibility to look after the legitimate concerns and interests of Canada's aboriginal people.

I would like to quote from a brief submitted to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie) by the Dene-Metis Negotiations Secretariat. These are concerns which were echoed at the Standing Committee hearing of which I was a part three weeks ago, I believe, in Yellowknife. Under the heading of "Opening Up New Lands", the Secretariat says:

> Neither the Bill nor the policy statement of last fall gives any assurance that the current "land freeze" in the Mackenzie Valley will remain in place until a final aboriginal rights settlement is in place, or until a co-ordinated process involving the Dene-Metis and the affected communities approves the opening up of new land.

Here is its submission:

> We ask that you follow up on our correspondence with you on this issue by making it clear that there will be no exploration licences on new lands prior to a final claims settlement without the direct and explicit approval of both the Dene-Metis and the communities directly affected.

That is a provision which is very evidently absent from this legislation. Yet it is a provision which relates to the very articles of the foundation, if you like, of the country and society in which we have the good fortune to live.

One of the ways in which Canada has traditionally operated, at least ostensibly, and overtly, is that we would not arbitrarily extinguish the rights of native people, whether it be their territorial rights, land tenure, or the right of their own form of government. Yet we see in Bill C-92 the potential at least—and I do not wish to accuse the Government of bad faith—for the overruling of legitimate native interest in the process of the bidding criterion. That is something which gives us cause for concern.

Essentially the only protection for native people which is offered in the text of the Act is a statement that their rights would not be abbrogated. That I think is frankly inadequate, because it begs the question of what are the rights and interests in the land and the land claims themselves. To put that in legislation without some documentation, some specificity as to what those rights are is, in my opinion, not taking adequate care of those rights and opening up the possibility in the future of the abrogation of them.

Another criticism we have is that there is really very little provision in the Bill for the pacing of development to accord with Canada's best interests. We do not know if we are setting the country up for a feast or a famine when it comes to oil development. We really do not know what the effects will be on the Canadian economy, whether there will be a stampede to the frontier or another capital strike of the nature of the one that occurred after the introduction of the National Energy Program and led to very little drilling in the frontier. By moving away from a system of orderly development, something that could have been negotiated according to the Government's priorities, policies and goals, will simply be at the mercy of commercial decisions which, in almost every case, will be taken entirely outside of Canada and beyond the bounds of Canada's ability to express the national interest and the Government's ability to influence the decisions that are being made.

Returning to the Crown share, I would like to echo the theme developed by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Vancouver—Kingsway (Mr. Waddell), who discussed the back-in provision of 25 per cent which gave the federal Government the right to acquire the interest in commercially viable petroleum funds in recognition of the very substantial burdens imposed on the Canadian taxpayer in the development of these frontier lands. It is all very well for the Government to refer to the 25 per cent back-in provision as being confiscatory, but there are two facts which the Government cannot influence. One is the success by comparison of the Norwegian oil industry. The Norwegian oil industry is one which, far from having a 25 per cent back-in provision for the state-owned company, Statoil, has a 50 per cent, and in some cases a 70 per cent back-in provision. Yet the Norwegain oil industry has flourished. Norway has gone from being a country which produced no oil 20 years ago to a substantial producer of oil and gas, indeed one with surpluses available for export.

Perhaps I could note one thing by distilling the evidence given by representatives of Statoil who were invited to the hearings on Bill C-28 of the previous Parliament at the initiative of my colleague, the Hon. Member for Vancouver—Kingsway. They were starting from zero. Essentially, as did Britain in the North Sea oil and gas, they started out without any experience, without a great deal of expertise in oil production, with no regulations and with no history of the production of liquid or gaseous fuel hydrocarbons. The Norwegians went ahead and introduced this legislation which gave them the right to a 50 per cent share through Statoil. I suppose our Government would call that double confiscation since it thinks of a 25 per cent back-in as being single confiscation. Yet the Norwegians built a successful oil industry.

Of course, the other thing that the Government cannot change is the fact that Canadian taxpayers have invested very heavily in this industry in the past. Surely we as taxpayers have the right to some return on that investment. Surely the Crown share is an effective way of getting that return.

I suppose others have already pointed this out, but I think it bears stating again that the Government is being inconsistent in this. In the Prince Albert declaration of 1984, the Conservatives had the following to say:

> We will set aside this retroactive "back-in", which is expropriation without compensation and has done so much to damage our relationship with international and Canadian investors. Instead, we will introduce a "Canadian share" which will encourage Canadian private and public ownership of oil and gas production on discoveries made after October 28, 1981.

In the speech by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources she said that there will be no Crown share in the legislation. We are left with the idea that somehow the private sector will provide an equivalent return to the economy as the Crown share unless, of course, it is the Government's intention not to provide an equivalent return to the Canadian taxpayers. That is a theme on which I would like to hear the Government expound and justify.

Regarding the interests of Canada's aboriginal habitants, Clause 3 states that nothing in the Act abrogates or derogates from aboriginal title, right or claim that pertained to the aboriginal peoples of Canada prior to the coming into force of this Act. As I have said before, apart from that clause, there is really nothing in the Bill that provides protection for Canada's aboriginal peoples.

As has been pointed out at some length by the previous speaker, there is nothing in the Bill to ensure that the costs which can be saved by the fall in world oil prices will be passed along to the Canadian consumer. We have seen a drop in the price of gasoline at the pump but it has not been of the magnitude of the drop in the world price. It is a particularly sore point in my riding that we have not seen any drop in the price of heating oil; rather, there has been an increase. We have not seen a drop in the price of aviation fuels; rather, there has been an increase. In committee last week, the Minister of State for Tourism (Mr. Murta) said that he really did not see doing anything about that.

As well, there is no commitment to the continuation of gas distribution incentives. Instead, we are being told by this legislation to trust the companies. I submit that the previous experience and recent history of the companies indicates that they serve interests which are largely based outside Canada, and they have an eye toward profits. Indeed, they are determined, because of the present fall in prices, to recoup what they see as being the reduced profits which, in their opinion, they have suffered over the last while.

I do not think Bill C-92 adequately addresses the energy situation in Canada today. I do not think it adequately addresses the needs of Canadian consumers or of Canadian taxpayers. It remains to be seen, of course, if it will provide the benefits in the frontier lands that it says will be possible.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Hon. Member for Kenora—Rainy River (Mr. Parry), said that taxpayers supported and paid for the exploration and development in the frontier. Back in about 1980, the previous Government introduced the National Energy Program which included a petroleum-gas revenue tax. That tax started out at 16 per cent and was a front-end revenue tax. The moneys collected from that came from western producers and supported PIP grants. The PIP grants were 80 cents on the dollar in the frontier and 35 cents on the dollar in provincial land, depending upon Canadian ownership.

My colleague stated that the taxpayers of Canada paid for the exploration in the frontier. Perhaps he could comment on the PGRT, a tax paid for by the western producers. That is how the money to explore in the North was found.

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Hon. Member for Calgary South (Mrs. Sparrow) is not suggesting that the total revenue reaped by the PGRT was equivalent to the incentives, direct subsidies and grants that were paid out for frontier exploration. I do not have the figures with me, but perhaps the Hon. Member does and would like to put them forward.

I would certainly challenge the Hon. Member by saying that the revenues collected through the PGRT did not come close to paying the cost to the Canadian taxpayer of the investment in frontier exploration.

• (1230)

I should like to remind the Hon. Member for Calgary South that we in the New Democratic Party, after all, opposed the PIP grants because we thought they were in fact too generous. I should also like to remind her that the previously available superdepletion allowances were in some cases giving back to the companies more than they were actually spending. In other words, they were receiving a tax break on their drilling investment which came to more than 100 per cent. At the time of debate on Bill C-48, we estimated that the combination of PIP grants and other tax breaks would mean that taxpayers would be putting up 93 cents for every dollar spent by a Canadian company and 72 cents for every dollar spent by a foreign company on Canada Lands.

Setting aside for the moment the superdepletion allowance, which is a fiscal measure of a different order that had the same effect of making frontier drilling very profitable for companies, I would defy the Hon. Member to say that a 93 per cent participation in the cost of exploration was anything other than a very substantial investment by Canadian taxpayers.

A couple of other points should be made. One is the enormous investment by Canadian taxpayers in picking up some of the costs incurred by other parties, particularly native people, and the costs of supporting and in many cases expanding communities which acted as jumping off points for that type of exploration.

Failing the presentation of further information by the Hon. Member for Calgary South, I would have to say that her hypothesis that the western oil industry funded frontier exploration through the Exchequer is entirely unproven.

Mr. Nickerson: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Kenora—Rainy River (Mr. Parry) spoke very sympathetically about the view advanced by certain land claimants that no further dispositions on oil and gas lands be made until such time as outstanding land claims had been resolved. I did not quite understand whether he was saying that it was the policy of the New Democratic Party to accept that and, in so doing, to give the right of veto to a group of private citizens, as important as they are, over such dispositions on oil and gas lands. Could he clarify that point and say whether or not his Party, were it to be in office, would grant that power of veto?

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson) for that very friendly question. I always enjoy discussing what our Party will do when we are in power.

I say to him very frankly that the native people of Canada are far more than private citizens. They have the commitment of the New Democratic Party to their claim to a share in oil and gas development and, more important, to their claim to a say in how that development will be carried out. However, I believe that we have a non-expressed or implicit commitment in the Constitution. We also have the commitment of the present Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on this point.

Perhaps I should reiterate that it was not suggested by the native people that they should have an absolute veto on development, but that no development on any lands subject to land claims, be they comprehensive or specific, should go forward without consultation and without the approval of the native people affected. Of course, none of these developments should ever go forward without proper provision for the participation of native people, and the employment and other economic benefits which would result.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I noted with interest the Hon. Member's concern about the single bidding process. I wonder whether he thoroughly read the Bill. Although there will be a single bidding process, the terms and conditions of that bidding will be clearly enunciated. For example, there could be a work project, there could be core, or the concerns could be those of the native peoples of Canada. The concerns will all be spelled out in the bid process and pre-published so that everyone in the country will know exactly what are the terms and conditions of the bid. It was done in secret before. There was wheeling and dealing behind closed doors. The Minister might have had a favourite or might have cut out the other guy because he or she did not like him. Now it will be up front. The terms and conditions will be laid out. They will be bidding on one item, on the lands as laid out, and on all the conditions which go with the issuance of an exploration licence. Does the Hon. Member not see the advantage of that to our native peoples?

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, of course I am very glad to have the commitment of the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary that such provisions as employment for native people and participation in the benefits will become part of the single bidding process.

Mr. McDermid: Could become.

Mr. Parry: I heard that they would become part of the process. I hear the Hon. Member saying "could". I must accept his correction of what he actually said. However, we are very glad to have it on the record whether it be "will" or "could".

In raising the point I wanted to make very clear that we in the New Democratic Party, if Bill C-92 goes through unchanged, would be looking very closely at those bids to ensure that employment and other benefits are provided for native people and that they will be consulted in the preparation of single bid documents.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, with reference to the matter raised by the Hon. Member for Calgary South (Mrs. Sparrow) and by my friend who spoke on the Bill, that is, the drilling in Ottawa for frontier moneys, for getting money from the Government, I draw the attention of the Hon. Member for Calgary South to my speech in the debate as reported at page 13143 of Hansard, in which I referred to former Energy Minister Marc Lalonde who spoke to the Energy Committee on January 20, 1981. He said at that time that some $4.5 billion to $5 billion had been spent to date on frontier exploration. He meant from about 1960 to about 1981. That was the period before the National Energy Program and under the old Canada oil and gas lands regulations. Mr. Lalonde felt that it was fair to say that some three-quarters of that, or some $3 billion, had been footed by Canadian taxpayers. He went on to say that more than 90 per cent of every exploration dollar had been covered by Canadian taxpayers. Some $3 billion was spent from 1960 to 1981, and we learned in committee that $7.3 billion was spent in PIP grants from 1981 to 1986. That is a total of about $10.3 billion which Canadian taxpayers have put in to subsidize the oil industry which feels it has been treated so badly in frontier development and exploration.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Government ran the country for 16 long years, and it led Canadians into a pit of debt so deep that a quarter of federal revenues must go to service our national debt. Canadians are fed up with wasting productive revenue on debt interest.

By the end of the decade, the measures announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) in his recent Budget will stop the national debt growing faster than the national economy. In just over 20 months we have begun to reverse 16 years of Liberal damage. We promised to reduce the deficit, and we have. We said we would create jobs, and we are. In 20 months more than 580,000 new jobs have been created and 82 per cent of these are full-time jobs. The official number of unemployed has fallen by about 17 per cent from September, 1984. But that is not the entire picture, Mr. Speaker. Tens of thousands of Canadians who had exhausted their unemployment benefits and therefore no longer counted among the officially unemployed are also finding jobs. Canadians are finding jobs because the economy has improved. The economic upturn is a direct result of the policies and programs this Government has introduced.

The frontier policy statement made on October 30, 1985 ended the five year nightmare thrust upon our economy, particularly upon our energy sector, by the Liberals' National Energy Program. In opposition we said there was a better way to achieve the goals of the NEP, but our views and the views of Canadian workers and business leaders were not taken into account by the previous Government.

We faced an uncaring Liberal Government that talked of fairness but then confiscated property. We were dealing with a Government that promised opportunities, then took steps that cut off investment in Canada's energy sector, sending tens of thousands to the ranks of the unemployed. The Liberals talked about security of supply, then through overly generous PIP grants they promoted drilling for taxpayers dollars and not for oil. To make that situation worse, Mr. Speaker, they imposed punitive taxes that discouraged commercial production.

At their first opportunity, Canadians rejected the Liberal claim of fairness, opportunity and security of supply. Canadians have lived with the NEP's inflexibility for nearly five years and many have suffered from this destructive policy. The Progressive Conservative message of fairness and market responsiveness was heard. It was understood by Canadians in every region. They demanded a change and gave the Progressive Conservative Party the mandate to reverse the economic decline, to put Canadians back to work and to re-unite the country after it had been torn apart by federal-provincial disputes.

As consumers, we felt the National Energy Program cut into our personal revenues as gasoline prices increased. In Ottawa, for example, prices for regular leaded gasoline rose from 29.3 cents a litre in December, 1980, to 51.5 cents a litre in October, 1985. That is a 75 per cent increase.

Crude oil prices are now entirely set by the market, and consumers today are benefiting as price decreases work their way through the system. The past Government did not want prices to fall because it was amassing a national debt. It looked upon the oil and gas industry as its cash cow, but even a 75 per cent increase in gasoline prices could not sustain the massive debt the Liberals created.

Under Conservative deregulation, crude oil price decreases that from time to time occur in the market-place are allowed to work their way through the oil production, transportation and refining systems and to consumers at the gas pumps. Deregulation of crude oil prices is only one feature of our energy policy which has been radically transformed in just over one year by the Atlantic Accord signed in February, 1985, by the Western Accord signed in March, 1985, by the Agreement on Natural Gas Prices and Markets and by Canada's Energy Frontiers: A Strategy for Jobs and Investment.

The Canadian Petroleum Resources Bill is an example of the spirit of consultation and co-operation that are integral parts of our energy policy. The Government understands the important role the north and offshore regions can play in Canada's economic and energy future. We saw the potential for development of our frontier resouces, but we also saw the need for new policies; policies that encourage development rather than smother initiative, policies that replace taxpayers subsidies with private sector investment, policies that pursue the national interest rather than nationalization, policies that respect the rights of others rather than confiscating their property, and policies that are based on the principles of co-operation and shared management among governments.

The Canada Petroleum Resources Bill meets these high standards. It is market responsive, internationally competitive, free of excessive Government intervention and sensitive to regional interests. This approach to energy policy reflected in all the measures we have taken is needed more today than ever before.

As Members know, the industry faces a severe challenge in the form of falling oil prices. Cash flow is dropping, exploration and development plans are being re-assessed and, yes, some jobs are at stake. But this Government is seriously concerned about the situation. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) announced a tax relief program on April 30 targeted at small producers in order to help maintain their cash flow and short-term exploration activity. The changes to the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax, or the PGRT, included an increase in the small producers tax credit from its current level of $500,000 to $2 million. A zero PGRT rate for the Sycrude and Suncor Oil Sands projects for the rest of 1986. These measures added $175 million to the significant tax relief announced in the Western Accord last year. They are consistent with royalty relief measures provided by the Government of Alberta.

This Government will continue to assess the impact of prices on the industry in close consultation with the producing provinces and with the industry itself. The Government has freed the industry from excessive taxation and regulation. Measures such as this Bill and the Western Accord have left the industry better able to do what it does best, respond to the challanges and opportunities of the market-place.

The Canada Petroleum Resources Bill responds to frontier challenge. It recognizes that exploration and production in Canada's far north or offshore carry a higher cost and a greater risk than in the conventional areas. This Bill will replace the existing Canada Oil and Gas Act with a simplified and fair set of rules designed to encourage development of our frontier resources. The Canada Petroleum Resources Bill provides the legislative framework for the Atlantic Accord and for agreements that may be reached between the federal Government and other coastal provinces and territorial governments. The Bill establishes a fair set of ground rules for exploration, development and production of our oil and gas resources on the frontier lands and offshore. Under this Bill the Government of Canada will introduce a simple, competitive bidding system for exploration rights to prospective lands based on a single criterion, one in which the best bid wins. This will ensure the maximum return to Canadians as resource owners. It will ensure fair treatment of companies bidding for exploration rights.

• (1250)

The Government does not confiscate property retroactively. Thus, the Canada Petroleum Resources Bill does not have a Crown share. However, this Bill does provide for 50 per cent Canadian ownership in frontier production projects. The Bill will require a company applying for development approval with respect to a pre-1982 discovery to submit a plan showing how it will attain a 50 per cent Canadian ownership rate by the time the production licence is issued. Unlike the previous legislation, the provisions in Bill C-92 are non-retroactive and non-confiscatory and emphasize private sector solutions. The Canada Petroleum Resource Bill respects the rights of companies regardless of their nationality.

This Bill does not give preferential treatment to Petro-Canada. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) has instructed Petro-Canada to operate as a private sector company and to deliver the best possible return to its shareholders, the people of Canada.

The proposed legislation provides for the fiscal measures outlined in the frontier policy statement. These changes will limit the royalty burden during the early stages of production, but will ensure an equitable sharing of revenue between Government and industry after the investment has been recovered. A 25 per cent investment royalty credit will be applicable to eligible costs of up to $5 million for new exploration wells. The credit will be applied against royalties otherwise payable within the region. This royalty credit will provide conventional onshore frontier exploration with reasonable fiscal incentives. A 25 per cent exploration tax credit will be introduced in separate legislation. It is part of a broader energy strategy that allows the industry to respond to the marketplace. It was the approach Canadians wanted. It is why they elected a Progressive Conservative Government.

It has been a pleasure for me to speak in support of Bill C-92 and I look forward to seeing it go to a legislative committee as quickly as possible.

Mr. Caldwell: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Hon. Member from Calgary a very brief question. Her expertise in the oil business is, of course, known across the country. What price does she believe oil would have to reach in order to really stimulate exploration?

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I would have to discuss conventional exploration versus frontier exploration. With regard to conventional, which would take place in the producing provinces such as Alberta and Saskatchewan, and to some extent B.C., as well as north of the 60th, the figure I have been given is about $18 to $20 U.S. a barrel. As my hon. colleague knows, yesterday the posted price was $17.30 to $17.40 U.S. per barrel. It is, therefore, gradually, escalating upward. It is, of course, far more costly to explore and develop in the frontier regions. In order to be economically feasible to produce in the frontier the price must reach $23 to $25 U.S. a barrel.

We must realize that in order to achieve a viable oil and gas industry and security of supply, all Canadian consumers will have to participate. The Government is communicating and consulting constantly with the Governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta with regard to conventional lands. The Government is looking carefully at the Beaufort because it has tremendous possibilities.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Member from Calgary a couple of questions about the approach taken by this Bill with regard to petroleum incentives for the east coast offshore. Does she agree with the proposal contained in this Bill that we go to a 25 per cent exploration tax credit in such a rapid way? The Member talked about the Bill not being confiscatory with regard to Canada Lands and the percentage of federal Government ownership and so on.

In view of the tremendous investments which have been made by companies like Husky Bow Valley which has invested hundreds of millions of dollars in exploration and development equipment, does the Member feel the Government has treated them fairly by cutting off the Petroleum Incentive Program grants? This Canadian-owned company made massive investments on the basis that it would be treated fairly by the Government. Now the Government is cutting off those Petroleum Incentive Program grants. It had an agreement to drill eight or ten wells and is suddenly only going to be able to drill one or two.

The Hon. Member heard the concerns of these companies before the Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources, which she chairs in a very distinguished way. It is great to get to the development stage and, fortunately, the Bill does not take away 50 per cent Canadian ownership at that stage. However, does she really think it is in the best interests of the country to take away the assistance which was committed to these Canadian-owned companies, especially in view of the massive investments which they have already made with a view to the completion of many wells rather than only one or two which will be the result?

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, my colleague mentioned 10 wells which were "typical" with regard to Bow Valley and the East Coast. That is not the right number. My colleague will also remember that at committee stage when we were discussing the grandfathering of the typical well, which the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources handled so well, companies were allowed to maintain grandfathering on four wells off the east coast under the energy agreements. We must realize that all wells must be based on geology and economics rather than dollars and cents. We must have the economics and geology to explore.

It is very interesting to note that prior to the National Energy Program and prior to the implementation of the Petroleum Incentive Program there was far more activity off Hibernia. The discoveries were made long before PIP grants were in place. We put the onus back on the resource companies to go to work and base their exploration on geology and economics. That is the way it should be done.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

TRADE

LUMBER EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES—APPLICATION FOR COUNTERVAILING DUTY

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, today we learned that the U.S. softwood lumber industry has applied for countervailing duties against Canadian lumber exported to the U.S. It has asked the International Trade Commission and the Department of Commerce to impose a 27 per cent duty on Canadian exports of softwood lumber. If this action were successful it would cost Canadian producers some $1 billion in duties and decimate the industry, costing tens of thousands of jobs. Canadian lumber producers are not improperly subsidized by low stumpage fees, as has been alleged in the application.

At the same time an omnibus Trade Bill is working its way through the U.S. Congress. It would further define items subject to countervailing duties and would be harmful to Canadian exports of lumber.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) boasts about his good relationship with President Reagan and how all he has to do to get action in the U.S. is to make a quick telephone call. Now is the time for him to show how much influence he has with President Reagan. Thousands of jobs and billions of dollars—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Sixty seconds.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

POSSIBLE RADIATION FROM NEVADA BOMB TEST

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, concerned citizens around the world have been worried about the effect of the Chernobyl accident on their health. However, there has been an abuse of the disaster by some for cold war purposes. Perhaps our own Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), who has been so openly critical of the Soviet Government for withholding information on the Chernobyl accident, should apply the same criteria to the fallout from the April 10 nuclear bomb test in Nevada, code-named Mighty Oak. Not only was there no official statement by Canada opposing the irresponsible American test, there has yet to be an official statement of concern about the effects of radiation from the Nevada test on Canadians.

This nuclear malfunction has been shrouded in intense secrecy for over a month. Canadian scientists such as Dr. Rosalie Bertell have raised concern that the high levels of radiation in B.C. may be from Nevada as well as Chernobyl. Carl Schumaker, a radiation expert from Alberta, shares this concern, as does Ian Thorsen, manager of the Subatomic Research facility at UBC. Nuclear radiation is dangerous, whether from an American or Soviet accident, and secrecy should be condemned equally and publicly.

HISTORIC EVENTS

MOLSON BREWERY BICENTENNIAL

Mr. Pierre H. Cadieux (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the attention of this House to the 200th anniversary of the founding of the Molson brewery. John Molson, who immigrated to Montreal from England in 1782, began the family business in that city four years later, in 1786. Since that time the Molsons have been business and civic leaders in Montreal, Quebec, and Canada. This evening Her Excellency the Governor General, the Right Hon. Jeanne Sauvé, will honour this remarkable family and their tremendous contribution to our nation.

I therefore invite all my colleagues in the House to join me in extending congratulations to the Molson family on this 200th anniversary.

GUELPH PLATERS WIN HOCKEY MEMORIAL CUP

Mr. William C. Winegard (Guelph): Mr. Speaker, many Members of this House know Guelph because of its famous university. Others know the city and the countryside around it as the agricultural centre of Canada. Some acknowledge our leadership in diversified industry. Still others recognize one of the beauty spots of our nation. Guelph is all of that, and more. It is now the home of the Memorial Cup. Only a ruling by you prevents me from congratulating the Guelph Platers.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

TELEGLOBE CANADA—OPPOSITION TO PRIVATIZATION

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, Teleglobe Canada recently tabled its annual report announcing a 1985 after-tax profit of 15.4 per cent. This is another wellfounded reason why the Government should reconsider its decision to divest. In its zeal to privatize the Government is dismantling a leading edge, high-tech communication service built by the Canadian taxpayer through proficient labour and management. Teleglobe's remittance to the federal Government will jump to $80 million this year. Its revenue increased to $678 million in 1985 and operating expenses dropped 1 per cent.

This side of the House will continue to pressure the Government for assurances that, if this unwise sale is to take place, Teleglobe Canada will remain totally Canadian owned, there will be no lessening of service or increased cost to consumers, the company will remain Montreal based, and the present employees' benefit package is guaranteed. Selling our only international communications network for a one shot charge against the federal deficit is shortsighted and poor management of our very precious public funds.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT

PRODUCTION AND PROFITABILITY

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, with total revenues close to a billion dollars a year the Royal Canadian Mint is big business and contributes substantially to Canada's economy. Some 5 million ounces of gold are being refined annually, making the Canadian mint the third largest refinery in the world after the Soviet Union and South Africa.

Sales of the Maple Leaf bullion coin, 1.88 million ounces in 1985, are most successful, as are sales of numismatic coins and circulating coins for foreign countries.

The Mint has geared up for the production of the proposed $1 Canadian circulating coin.

It is significant to note, Sir, that this year Canada will host the International Mint Directors Conference. This is the first time that this important event will be held outside Europe.

DISASTERS

DESTRUCTION BY FLOODING OF CREE VILLAGE AT WINISK

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, on Friday a flood destroyed the Cree Village of Winisk killing two people and leaving only seven buildings standing in a community that once counted 60.

This foreseeable tragedy in a village which is flooded more often in the spring than not, would not have occurred if the community's long planned relocation had been carried out already.

While we should be thankful for all the lives that were saved we should also be ashamed that this tragedy happened, since the best emergency planning cannot secure inherently unsafe situations. I therefore call upon the Government to act to help the Winisk band to build its new community this year.

HUMAN RIGHTS

ETHIOPIA—RECORD NUMBER OF INFRACTIONS

Mr. Reginald Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, Ethiopia has the worst record on human rights in the world. That is the claim of a study of 120 countries published by The Economist. Ethiopia scored only 13 per cent, far behind the Soviet Union and even South Africa.

Ethiopia, for example, has over 10,000 political prisoners, some like Haile Selassie's family who have been held for over 10 years without even a charge. I am reliably informed that Berhanu Dinka, the Ethiopian Ambassador to the United States and Canada, recently made the mistake of going home and is now being held in detention.

With this kind of political tyranny and human rights record surely it behooves Canada to help. We have influence in Ethiopia. We have moved to help their hungry. Surely we could move to help their oppressed. Linking development to human rights would be a good start.

TRADE

IMPORTANCE OF AMERICAN MARKET TO CANADA

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, for a number of months, the leaders of the Opposition parties and their Members have been doing everything in their power to try and scare Canadians. They brandish the spectre of unemployment before our workers, whenever we talk about increasing trade with the United States.

Mr. Speaker, the facts tell us otherwise. The United States is Canada's first trading partner and vice versa. Canadian-U.S. trade exceeded $110 billion in 1984, making it the most important bilateral trading relationship in the world.

Canada does about 75 per cent of its trade with the United States. The United States have more commercial exchanges with Ontario than with Japan, their second trading partner.

Unlike what the Opposition likes to think, the U.S. market is a source of employment for Canadian men and women, and we intend to keep those jobs in Canada and in Abitibi.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CRITICISM OF MINISTER

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, regrettably Canada's Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) had to cry from the rooftops that he and Jim Bradley disagreed on the U.S. cleanup plan for the Niagara River. What was wrong in adopting the stronger standards proposed by Ontario? Why did Canada's Environment Minister have to reveal to the Americans, on the eve of negotiations in Washington, that he was in favour of a weaker plan than the one his Ontario colleague proposes?

If details of negotiations are not public knowledge with free trade then why should it be so with the environment?

Incompetence as a negotiator is not all. The Minister's decision to accept the weaker proposal advanced by EPA, despite the urging of the NGOs and his Ontario colleague, reveals that he has no idea of what the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement is all about. The U.S. has a responsibility to Canada because of the agreement which entitles Canada to a cleanup in the Niagara as a matter of international agreement, not as an act of kindness.

DISASTERS

NEW BRUNSWICK FORESTS—TRIBUTE TO VOLUNTARY FIREFIGHTERS

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): This past weekend thousands of people throughout New Brunswick and the Atlantic region reacted to a series of very serious and risky situations in the most heroic and admirable way. They acted to save homes, property, and perhaps even lives.

• (1410)

Throughout New Brunswick and the Atlantic provinces over the holiday weekend, literally thousands of volunteer firefighters made tremendous and tireless efforts to cut the progress of many raging fires and to bring flames that seemed unextinguishable under control. Today a major portion of the damage is behind us, although the situation remains critical. This success is due in large part to volunteer efforts. Without the brave and selfless efforts of these men, it is certain there would have been much greater loss of homes and real property.

I saw many of these men at work with their hoses, axes, and heavy machines. Long after they were exhausted by the physical demands, and when lesser men would have quit, they struggled to contain the fires and the smoke.

I have now come to realize first hand how reliant a community facing fire fears is on those who act on its behalf. In many areas the only thing standing between a community and disaster was and continues to be the tremendous efforts of firefighters.

I think many of us in this Chamber would be humbled by the noble actions of the volunteer fire-fighters in New Brunswick and the Atlantic region.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS

GROWTH IN NUMBERS DEPENDENT ON FOOD BANKS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, last week Bishop Remi De Roo and a number of other representatives of churches who were meeting at a conference in Calgary took note of the very large increase in the number of people in Calgary who are now depending on food banks. They took note of the fact that this is happening in all parts of Canada and expressed a belief that it is morally wrong that people should have to depend on charity for food. They called on the federal and provincial Governments to re-evaluate the delivery of welfare to Canadians.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT'S PERFORMANCE

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, under the Liberal Government, employment in Quebec went down and unemployment went up. However, as a result of the favourable economic conditions we have created in Quebec, 127,000 jobs have been created. A drop of almost 4 per cent in interest rates since September 1984 has encouraged small business. Since the beginning of 1986, more than a third of small business owners have decided to increase their investments, something unheard of under the previous Liberal Governement.

Mr. Speaker, that is why permanent jobs are now becoming available for more Canadian men and women. This contrasts favourably with the unsuccessful Canada Works programs developed by the former Government. As we promised in 1984, every Thursday evening more and more Canadian men and women are receiving pay cheques.

THE ECONOMY

CREATION OF JOBS IN ONTARIO

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, ever since the Progessive Conservative Government took office here in Ottawa, the Ontario economy has been on the move.

Since September, 1984, some 305,000 jobs have been created in the Province of Ontario. The Ontario unemployment rate has fallen from 9.5 per cent to 6.8 per cent, and total unemployment has fallen by 114,000.

The value of building permits issued in 1985 was up 33.8 per cent, or $2.1 billion, compared with 1984. Building permits in the first two months of this year were up 60 per cent over the same period in 1985, and 76 per cent over 1984.

Retail sales increased by 9 per cent in the past year and 15 per cent since the September, 1984, election.

Capital expenditures are up by over 14 per cent, housing starts by 35 per cent. Bankruptcies are down 15 per cent.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Sixty seconds.

Mr. Redway: Things may not be perfect yet but Ontario is sure looking good.

HOUSING

SHORTAGE IN METRO TORONTO

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, a recent study revealed the desperate shortage of affordable housing in Metro Toronto where tens of thousands of people are estimated to be living in substandard and often overcrowded dwellings.

Ninety-five thousand rental householders in Metro Toronto are struggling to meet their payments; 20,000 people are waiting for subsidized housing; and 175,000 income-earning rental householders are paying 25 per cent or more of their income on rent and utilities. Yet, between 1981 and 1985, almost 9,000 rental units have been lost in Toronto and turned into single family homes for the more affluent.

Hardest hit by this crisis are the elderly, single parent families, low wage earners, students, and the disabled. That such conditions could exist in Canada today is indeed frightful. Even more alarming is the Government's silence, despite the plight of those who need reasonable and affordable shelter now. It is this part of Canada that the Conservative Party continues to ignore. Its members do so at their peril and at the peril of our socio-economic order, for the crisis has also contributed to sharp increases in family breakdowns, domestic violence, psychiatric problems, teenage prostitution, and increasing line-ups at food banks.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Sixty seconds.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—LUMBER EXPORTS—U.S. PRESIDENT'S LETTER

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to direct a question to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. The President of the United States, in order to facilitate a favourable vote in the United States Senate to allow free trade negotiatons to go forward, wrote to Senator Packwood of Oregon. He said in relation to the Canada softwood lumber problem:

> I intend to press for an expedited resolution to this problem independent of the comprehensive negotiations. If this cannot be achieved through bilateral negotiations then I will take such action as may be necessary to resolve this problem consistent with U.S. law.

Has the Prime Minister telephoned the President of the United States with respect to the agreement the President made with Senator Packwood and other Senators and informed him that that is not an acceptable position for him to take in view of our comprehensive negotiations with that country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I have not telephoned the President, but he is aware of my view, the view of the Secretary of State, and that of the Government in this regard. We look forward to the negotiations as an instrument which will resolve many outstanding difficulties. There will be ongoing irritants which will have to be resolved and we are working on those as well.

THREAT OF COUNTERVAIL

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it appears to us that the Government of Canada has put its interests in getting the approval of the Senate Finance Committee before the interests of the Canadian softwood lumber industry. Why has the Prime Minister sacrificed a $3 billion industry and opened us up to an attempt by the American industry, impliedly supported by the President of the United States, to countervail, under United States law?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I want to emphasize to the House that the Government will take every possible action it can to fight this countervail case. I want the House to understand that the very reason we need the Canada-U.S. agreement is to prevent this kind of thing from happening in the future. I cannot understand why the Opposition is not prepared to support us in this endeavour.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I will put the vital question to the Minister for International Trade. Why did the Government of Canada in order to facilitate its larger discussions, obviously sacrifice, with the consent and acquiescence of the President of the United States in order to get Senate approval, the largest export industry we have other than agriculture, and hundreds of thousands of Canadian jobs?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, with the greatest of respect, there is not the slightest shred of evidence to support an allegation of that nature.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The letter. The letter of the President.

Mr. Kelleher: If the Right Hon. Leader has any facts to give me to support that allegation, I would certainly be pleased to receive them.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): I will send you a copy of the letter.

Mr. Kelleher: In the meantime I want him to know that this was an initiative taken by the U.S. industry, not by the administration, and we are going to support our industry in every conceivable way. We will exercise every right we have under the GATT to see that our interests are protected in this matter.

APARTHEID

SOUTH AFRICA—RAIDS ON NEIGHBOURING COUNTRIES

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has stated he is outraged by the raids by South Africa on neighbouring states. He has given vent to that outrage by temporarily recalling our Canadian ambassador. Why does the Prime Minister not do what he committed himself to do before the United Nations last October, and immediately sever diplomatic relations with South Africa?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I issued on behalf of the Government, and I believe the people of Canada, the strongest possible condemnation of the raids by South Africa upon neighbouring countries which happen to be our partners in the Commonwealth. We are consulting now with a number of other Commonwealth countries to determine what would be the most effective way for Canada, the Commonwealth, and for all concerned with ending apartheid, to continue to act together to stop that practice in South Africa.

I have made it clear, as has the Prime Minister, that while Canada would not choose as a preference to disrupt our economic and diplomatic relations with South Africa, if we can find no other way to have our influence count against apartheid, then we will take that step. We believe that there are intermediary steps to be considered first in consultation with our ambassador and our friends in the Commonwealth and elsewhere, and we are doing that.

REQUEST FOR SEVERANCE OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, why do the Secretary of State and the Government not take the lead as is Canada's tradition in these matters? We know what has happened. The Secretary of State has condemned it in strong terms but words are not the same as action. Surely the time has come for Canada to terminate diplomatic relations with that regime.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada has consistently, at least since the election of this Government, taken the lead among nations in opposing apartheid in South Africa. One of the things we did was play an instrumental, important role in establishing the Eminent Persons Group of the Commonwealth. That Eminent Persons Group was making some progress in South Africa. We can only assume that the action taken was designed to sabotage the work of the Commonwealth.

In so far as we are concerned, I will be meeting later this week with Archbishop Scott, our representative on the Eminent Persons Group. We want to examine the issue to see if there is any possible future role to be played by the Eminent Persons Group. I would not want to leap to some hasty decision here in the House of Commons today that might cut off the possibility of the Commonwealth working effectively to bring an end to apartheid.

BAN ON INVESTMENT REQUESTED

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, the abolition of diplomatic relations with South Africa might simply lead to a continuation of massive levels of trade as it did, for example, in the case of Canada's relations with Taiwan. Given the obvious insult, to put it mildly, to the Eminent Persons Committee present in South Africa at the time of these horrible raids, will the Government undertake now to change its voluntary controls over Canadian investment in South Africa and to issue instructions to Canadian companies that there should be no more investment in South Africa as long as this abominable practice of apartheid is maintained?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we are of course considering all actions that are available to Canada. We are considering ways in which we can make our position known, but we are also considering ways in which our actions in concert with others might bring an end to apartheid.

It may well be that, in time, we will have to adopt the step to which the Hon. Member has referred. I have already said that and I have said that consistently, but I think that the Hon. Member would agree that it would be in the interests of all who are opposed to that absolutely offensive regime and all who are offended by the attacks authorized by the Government of South Africa to find some way, working with India, Australia, and our other friends in the Commonwealth and elsewhere, to be able together to accomplish more than one nation acting alone might accomplish.

[Translation]

REQUEST FOR BAN ON IMPORTATION OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCE FROM SOUTH AFRICA—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. More specifically, would the Minister agree to stop imports of agricultural products from South Africa?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, we are prepared to consider all available options. For the time being we believe it would be better to take joint action with our Commonwealth friends. We feel that joint action by the Commonwealth and other countries would probably have a stronger impact than unilateral action by a single government, but we are prepared to consider all options available to Canada.

[English]

REQUEST FOR COMMONWEALTH ACTION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the Secretary of State. Collective action by the Commonwealth would be the preferable route to take. I also strongly believe that Canada should show leadership in this matter. I understand from what the Minister himself has said before that he would be sympathetic to that view. Given these points, will the Minister consider taking two specific proposals to our Commonwealth friends?

• (1425)

First, we should all agree to ban the importation of agricultural produce from South Africa. Second, we should all agree now to stop further private sector investment in South Africa. Those are two concrete proposals upon which the Commonwealth acting in unison could act, to bring that Government to its senses.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, under the very skillful leadership of the Prime Minister at Nassau, the Government of Canada was instrumental in achieving common action by the Commonwealth in the form of the establishment of the Eminent Persons Group. Obviously we will continue to try to find any other action which might be capable of bringing the Commonwealth together.

I am meeting later this afternoon with the High Commissioners of the Commonwealth countries represented in the Eminent Persons Group. The Hon. Roy McMurtry, our High Commissioner in London, will be attending a meeting meeting tomorrow as a member of the Commonwealth Continuing Committee on Southern Africa. Archbishop Ted Scott, our member of the Eminent Persons Group, will be in Canada on Thursday and Friday. I would hope it would be possible for him to meet with the Hon. Member and with the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, or their designates, as he will be meeting with me, to bring us up to date directly on the view of the Eminent Persons Group. We intend to continue to do everything we can. We intend to continue to exert Canadian leadership.

LUMBER EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES—THREAT OF COUNTERVAIL

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. In response to a question from the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition he said that the comprehensive negotiations were designed to solve the problems of disputes over lumber. Would he confirm that he or Simon Reisman approached the American Government and its representatives and asked for a freeze on all countervail actions while negotiations to deal with those matters were ongoing, and that the Americans rejected that approach?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, at no time have I ever asked the American Government to entertain a freeze on countervail actions. The Hon. Member must understand that any such approach by us would involve a similar request by them of us. I point out, for example, that at this particular time corn producers are filing a petition for countervail against American corn coming into this country. I know the Hon. Member is not suggesting that we deprive our citizens of their rights of protection under our law. The agreement is designed to prevent this in the future. This is why I think the Liberal Party, with respect, should be supporting this initiative.

Mr. Axworthy: We are asking questions about the rights of 300,000 workers in the Canadian softwood lumber industry who are not being protected effectively by the Government.

REQUEST THAT NEGOTIATIONS BE HALTED

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, considering the fact that the Americans will not discuss this as part of the comprehensive negotiations, will the Minister instruct Mr. Reisman, when he meets with the American negotiator tomorrow, to say that Canada will not go forward with the comprehensive negotiations until such time as the countervail action is either rejected or withdrawn?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): No, Mr. Speaker.

APARTHEID

SOUTH AFRICA—PROCESSING OF URANIUM IN CANADA

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The world recognizes that South Africa is an outlaw regime just as is Libya, and that special measures should be applied. Will the Government consider extending its actions in response to the illegal occupation of Namibia? In particular, will it consider abrogating the contract for the processing of uranium from South Africa in Canada?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, what is at issue here is abrogation of a contract. That is a very serious matter into which the Government decided not to enter when we announced the series of measures approved by the House, including approval by a spokesman of the New Democratic Party, in September of last year. We have indicated that from the date of my policy statement in the House in September, no further permission would be granted for that kind of activity. We have dealt with all activities of that kind from the point of the announcement; we did not deal retroactively.

REQUEST THAT CONTRACT BE TERMINATED

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs not agree that we do not have ordinary circumstances or an ordinary regime? It is not a regime noted for keeping its word. Isn't it about time that we asserted our position in connection with other actions we might take by terminating this contract, which is to terminate in 1988, in 1986, and serve notice that we not only disapprove of apartheid but the illegal occupation of Namibia, which is part and parcel of that regime's actions against its neighbors and its own people?

• (1430)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Hon. Member was not seriously suggesting that, because South Africa breaches one code of democratic conduct, we should breach another. I am sure that was not his serious suggestion, although that is the implication of his question.

In so far as Canadian leadership is concerned, Canada demonstrated leadership last summer in the actions we announced, demonstrated leadership through the Commonwealth in the establishment of the Eminent Persons Group, and had the benefit of there being a clear and general consensus in this House and in this country that we had to act together effectively against apartheid. I believe that consensus still exists. I intend to try as long as it will prove effective to work with our Commonwealth friends. If that proves no longer effective, then Canada will, as we said we would, take actions on our own.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NEGOTIATION OF ADHERENCE OF QUEBEC TO CONSTITUTION—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the Prime Minister that during his absence, the Quebec Minister of Inter-governmental Affairs, Mr. Gil Rémillard, tried to revive the question of Quebec's adhering to the 1981 constitutional agreement. Unfortunately, a damper was put on his initiative by what I would call a blunder by the Secretary of State, who said that the federal Government was not in a hurry, and secondly, did not feel obliged to deal with the constitutional question before the end of its first term.

I would therefore like to ask the Prime Minister whether this reflects the federal Government's position, and whether Quebecers will have to wait until after the next federal election before the problem of Quebec's approval of the constitutional agreement is settled?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Quebecers have suffered a great deal as a result of the unilateral action taken by the previous Liberal Government. The Secretary of State said that caution was necessary. He said that caution was of the essence to prevent another debacle like the one brought down on us by the Liberal Government.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Prime Minister for this very clear answer. I am sure all Quebecers now know what to expect.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR UNDERTAKING NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Jacques Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he has confidence in the Secretary of State and whether he thinks Quebecers will trust him to negotiate the constitutional question after what he said last week, when he insulted them by saying they didn't understand economic matters.

Mr. Malépart: Is that the Prime Minister's opinion as well?

LUMBER EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister knows, President Reagan is personally supporting the U.S. countervail action against Canadian softwood and this action is designed to bring a countervail of 27 per cent against Canadian softwood. Will the Prime Minister acknowledge today that 300 Canadian communities rely solely on softwood trade as their economic base? Will he put his money where his mouth is on the issue of free trade and guarantee some financial support to the freely traded commodity of softwood?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I would again like to advise the Hon. Member that the President of the United States is not in any way supporting this particular countervail action. He has told us quite clearly that the Canada-U.S. trade initiative was without pre-conditions and that it was a clean launch.

Action has been started by American industry under American law. Industry has the right to bring that action, as Canadian industry does under Canadian law. I can assure the Hon. Member and every other Member in this House that the Canadian Government will do everything to support our industry in its fight against this harassment by the countervail action.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

LEGAL ACTION—REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL SUPPORT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister for International Trade. On May 8 the President of the United States made it clear that he is supporting unilateral trade action against free trade in softwood lumber. Will the Minister put some money where his mouth is? Will he financially support the legal side of the Canadian argument to keep free trade in softwood lumber free?

Hon. James Kelleher (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I can only reiterate that we are prepared to assist the industry in every way we can. I can tell the Hon. Member that we are having a meeting with the provinces on Thursday in Ottawa to discuss ways to defend against this action successfully, as we did in 1983.

PUBLIC WORKS

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF MINISTER'S ANNOUNCEMENT OF INQUIRY INTO AWARDING OF CONTRACTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works concerning the awarding of contracts by his department and his announcement on the weekend that there would be an investigation to find out why 86.5 per cent of service contracts awarded in Quebec during his Government's first year were given out without public calls for tender.

My question to the Minister is as follows: Could he inform the House who will conduct this investigation and what form it will take? And finally, will the results be tabled in the House?

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to say to the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell that I believe this House is aware, and that he ought to know, that the philosophy or the system in current use is the very system that was set up by the previous Government.

Second, I think this junior Member ought to know that the Minister responsible has no authority over contracts worth $30,000 or less, because that authority has been delegated to the regions.

That being said, Mr. Speaker, and considering the reports about which I have serious doubts, today I asked my Deputy Minister to give me a full report on contracts allowed since September 4, 1984, and I will be glad to table this report in the House before the end of this session.

MINISTER'S STAFF ASSIGNMENT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Deputy Minister of Public Works stated in committee on February 28, 1985:

—there is a member of the Minister's staff assigned to our Montreal region—

Can the Minister tell this House why he has a political assistant inside the regional offices contrary to what the preceding Government did? Why is there political interference in the process, if not to dole out patronage? What is the reason for it?

Hon. Roch La Salle (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell for giving me this opportunity to inform the House that, since I realized all Members of this House were

NEW BRUNSWICK FOREST FIRE—COMPENSATION REQUEST

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Associate Minister of National Defence. On Friday the Minister of National Defence was asked what the Government was willing to do to compensate those people whose homes and buildings were destroyed as a result of the actions of the Canadian Forces Base at Gagetown. Is the Associate Minister ready to give an answer?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Command Fire Marshall from the army is on site and is investigating the accident. A board of inquiry has been set up. The Base Commander is meeting today, and probably has met already, with the families concerned. I have issued instructions that the matter be looked into with due haste and that as soon as possible, within days, whatever actions are appropriate be taken so that no one is left financially penalized as a result of any due process.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Minister for that answer. Does the Government have a policy in place in the event of destruction of civilian property as a result of military action?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Associate Minister of National Defence): Yes, indeed it does, Mr. Speaker. The board of inquiry procedure is the process in place. When there is obvious responsibility on the part of the Armed Forces, compensation is made. That will be the case in this circumstance as quickly as possible.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR FOREST FIRE

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Associate Minister of National Defence. I would like to pursue this matter further. Would he assure the residents of that area that the military has recognized its responsibility for creating the fires along the highway from Gagetown to Upper Gagetown, and that they will not be kept waiting to know the results of the compensation program and rehabilitation program in the area for which the Government must take responsibility?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, that, of course, is the purpose of the Fire Marshall being there and for the inquiry. I can assure you that I have issued instructions that, under no circumstances, is this process to take an undue amount of time and that, if there is direct responsibility by the Armed Forces, compensation should be quick and generous.

TRADE

OBJECT OF NEGOTIATIONS—SOCIAL PROGRAMS—NEGOTIATOR'S MANDATE

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. On the weekend, Simon Reisman, Canada's free trade negotiator, stated that social programs might become negotiable if they had a substantial impact on trade between the two countries.

Could the Prime Minister inform the House under what conditions social programs would become partly or fully negotiable? And second, who would decide whether that was the case: the Canadian negotiator, Mr. Reisman, the Prime Minister or the House of Commons?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, Ambassador Reisman never made that kind of announcement.

Mr. Malépart: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is forgiven if he didn't have time to read the papers and listen to the news on the weekend.

OBJECT OF NEGOTIATIONS—SOCIAL PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Could the Prime Minister give the House the assurance that Mr. Reisman will never have a mandate to negotiate either part or all of our social programs, even if the Americans think they may have a substantial impact on trade between our two countries? Is the Prime Minister prepared to make a commitment to that effect?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there is no need for us to repeat a position that is well-known.

Canada's social programs are not at stake in negotiations that are exclusively concerned with matters of international trade.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

HANDFORD NUCLEAR REACTOR IN STATE OF WASHINGTON

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Last week I asked him about the Handford nuclear reactor, which is similar to the ones in Chernobyl, which is located in the State of Washington south of British Columbia. He kindly replied by letter today that his Government was awaiting a U.S. safety study on the reactor.

Given the lessons we learned from Chernobyl, why does the Government not go further and suggest to the Americans that this reactor be phased out in the interest of the safety of Canadians?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we thought we would await the evidence.

Mr. Waddell: He said that with regard to Chernobyl, too.

FUTURE OF INDUSTRY—PROMISE OF INQUIRY

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. Given the concerns with regard to Chernobyl, safety standards, and the economics of the nuclear industry, what is the Government's present position on its election promise to hold a full federal inquiry into the future of the nuclear industry in Canada?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, as you know, this was the subject of a full debate in the House last week. I can only repeat the answer I gave the Hon. Member at that time, which was that we are participating in the international review of the Chernobyl incident. There is no point in calling for any sort of investigation into the nuclear industry until such time as that review is completed.

Mr. Broadbent: That was your campaign promise.

Miss Carney: I should also point out to the Hon. Member that the kind of nuclear reactor that caused the problem at Chernobyl could not be licensed and could not be built in Canada. Our nuclear reactors are of a different design and we are satisfied that they are within the safety category.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Carney: I am sorry the NDP is not interested in the answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, order! Order, please!

TOURISM

MEASURE TO INCREASE NUMBER OF TOURISTS

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Tourism. Since the media are saying that more and more American and European tourists are changing their travel destinations this summer, I would like to ask the Minister what his department has done to assess the situation, and what specific measures have been taken to persuade these tourists to visit this beautiful country of ours?

[English]

Hon. Jack Murta (Minister of State (Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I will indicate to the House that we are probably facing the best tourist year that we have had in more than a decade.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Murta: The number of American tourists coming to Canada was up by 16 per cent in the first three months of 1986.

Mr. Broadbent: Thank the Libyans.

Mr. Murta: My officials are looking into possible new marketing initiatives in the United States. We expect to make an announcement in a very short period of time. More tourists in this country mean more jobs for Canadians, and that is what we are all about.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DISASTERS

DESTRUCTION OF CREE VILLAGE AT WINISK BY FLOODING

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As the Minister knows, the Cree Indian community of Winisk on the shore of Hudson Bay in northern Ontario has suffered a disastrous flood.

Can the Minister give the House an up to the minute report on the situation there, including whether there has been loss of life, the condition of survivors, and the over-all state of the community at this time?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for the opportunity to indicate to him and to the House that on behalf of the Government I sent condolences to the community on the incredible tragedy which befell it over the weekend. We have determined one loss of life and one confirmed still missing. One hundred and twenty people were airlifted to another community in northern Ontario where they are receiving some shelter and food.

The immediate course of action for us is to ensure that immediate arrangements are made for their safety and well-being. For that we have the co-operation of the Government of the Province of Ontario. Our second course of action is to move as fast as we can with respect to the relocation of the community.

RELOCATION OF COMMUNITY

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Minister is aware that Chief George Hunter is bitter and angry that it has taken so long to relocate his community to higher and safer ground. Can the Minister assure the House now that construction at the new site will begin this summer and that it will be completed before the winter?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, there is no question about the anguish, bitterness, and frustration felt. That community has been looking for relocation for over 20 years. I met with Chief George Hunter last Wednesday to discuss that and other matters. I will be in touch with him again after Question Period. I have met and talked with our own officials. There has been consultation with the appropriate Department in the Ontario Government. We need the full co-operation of the Government of the Province of Ontario, which the responsible Minister has indicated is forthcoming. I think the two Governments can move to get rid of all the obstacles which appeared to be there before. I want to give the Member and this House the assurance that whatever can be done with energy and vigour between these two Governments will be done.

SHIPYARDS

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF POSSIBLE CLOSURE OF MARINE INDUSTRIES LIMITED

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. I just spoke with management at Marine Industries Limited who confirmed that two months ago the Government asked Mr. Peter Paul Saunders of Versatile Vickers to draw up a plan for the rationalization of Quebec shipyards, and that Marine Industries Limited was not informed in any way, despite the fact that the possible phase-out of MIL is one of the key points of the plan. How can the Minister and the Government justify the fact that the phase-out of MIL was discussed without getting in touch or consulting with the company in question?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Acting Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure how the Member can honestly say that there is a proposal to close MIL. There are discussions ongoing within the industry to rationalize the shipbuilding industry. I am sure he knows there has been a decline in the shipbuilding industry, not only in Canada but throughout the world. What the former Minister was attempting to do was to solidify the future of the shipbuilding industry in Canada over the long term so it would provide a secure long-term future and secure jobs for those in it.

• (1450)

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister then explain why the Government has undertaken this process of rationalization, given it to the leader of one of the two shipyards in Quebec, and told him, as he puts it, that the possibility of Marine Industries closing its marine facility is one of the key issues to be discussed. How can you justify having one shipyard owner talk about the closure of another one, with no consultation at all with Marine Industries?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Acting Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member did his homework he would find there were discussions going on within the totality of the industry. He should check that out. Even Mr. Paul Martin, the owner of CSL, has been in discussion with other members of the industry. There is ongoing discussion between the various components of the shipbuilding industry, and the Hon. Member should welcome this initiative. At least we are trying to address the problem and cure it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HEALTH

PRESENCE OF DIOXIN IN VEGETABLES, FRUIT, AND MILK

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. A report this weekend indicated that excessive amounts of cancer-causing dioxin have been found in vegetables, fruit, and milk. Can the Minister confirm the truth of these findings, and will he advise the House what action the Government intends to take concerning the situation?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is referring to a meeting which took place last May 19 regarding the possibility of dioxins finding their way into the food chain. The Health Protection Branch has an ongoing program monitoring the food supply for a variety of chemical substances, including dioxins. So far the study has been primarily on foods which have a very high fat content. In speaking to the Branch today, we indicated that we will step up even further that study of dioxins in the food chain. I can also inform him that our studies to date do not show a danger, but that is not to say we do not have to keep monitoring. If other steps have to be taken, we will take them.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Energy has come up with a novel way to guarantee good publicity for herself and the Government. Her Department now says it will buy advertising in a newspaper only if the newspaper prints at least six pre-written articles which reflect, favourably of course, upon the Minister, her Department, and the Government. Is she trying to circumvent that unappreciative Press Gallery up there and set up a Pravda-style propaganda service paid for by the capitalists?

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I hope they are willing to listen to an answer. If it were true, of course it would be deplorable. In fact it is not true. The Hon. Member is talking about an advertising supplement we put out annually with such hot propaganda items as "A Guide to Insulation Materials"—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Carney: —"High Efficiency Oil Heat", and "What About Electrical Heating Options?" This year, when we decided to stop giving money away, we decided to give information on conservation and alternative energy which is important to Canadians, particularly at a time when energy security could be a problem.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, one of the articles which was entitled "Alternative Fuel" has now been changed by the Minister to read "Energy Minister Shows Alternative Fuel Leadership". What alternative fuel, apart from hot air, is she promoting? Does she not believe that the community-based newspapers frown upon having to carry a political message in order to get advertising dollars? Do you not think they will all label it as blarney from Carney?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Pat Carney (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to give this House some of the political propaganda contained in this year's supplement. It includes "The 10 Commandments for Fuel Efficient Driving", "Alternative Transportation Technologies on Display at Expo", "Canada on the Brink of Battery Breakthrough".

Some Hon. Members: More!

Miss Carney: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I think the Minister has answered the question.

Mr. Mulroney: Another supplementary, George.

REFUGEES

LANDED STATUS GRANTED TO FORMER NICARAGUAN REGIME AGENT

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Why is she changing Canada's policy of sheltering refugees from their persecutors to one of giving landed status to persecutors such as Edwin Miguel Gonzalez of Nicaragua, who admits that, as a spy for Somoza, he contributed to the disappearances of 50 fellow students? Why does the Minister select agents of a brutal dictatorship to be landed in Canada?

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned earlier, the new refugee determination process will be announced tomorrow by the Minister of State for Immigration. I trust it will have the support of the Hon. Member, indeed of all Members of the House. In the Gonzalez case, when it was reviewed by the Immigration Appeal Board, he was determined to be a refugee under the terms of the United Nations Convention.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the question still is: why should he be landed? Given that refugees from the death squads of El Salvador and Guatemala are meeting police informers from their countries on the streets of Canada, is our Government establishing in Canada part of an international network of right-wing spies and terrorists?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker, we are not. However, I know the imagination of the Hon. Member will lead him to make any kind of scurrilous accusation.

WOMEN

REQUEST FOR EXPLANATION OF DIFFICULTY EXPERIENCED BY CERTAIN WOMEN'S ORGANIZATIONS IN OBTAINING SUBSIDY CHEQUES

Mrs. Lucie Pépin (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State. Since the Conservative Government came to power, certain women's groups have had trouble obtaining subsidy cheques issued by the Secretary of State, because Conservative Members supposedly have veto rights over cheques given to women's groups in their respective ridings. Could the Minister inform the House why he tolerates this practice of patronage vis-à-vis women's groups and say whether he is prepared to put an end to this practice immediately?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker . . . I suppose the question is important enough for you to want to hear the answer.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to inform the Hon. Member that I have had no complaints from women's organizations that funds they were supposed to get were delayed for the kind of reasons she mentioned, and if anything of the kind did happen, I would like to know about it, but once again, I think that everything has been proceeding quite normally, and that these groups have received the money they were supposed to receive.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for Shefford (Mr. Lapierre), for a brief supplementary.

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF DOSSIER OF FEMMES COLLABORATRICES DU QUÉBEC

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may inform the Minister or ask him whether he intends to investigate the case of Femmes collaboratrices de Québec, where there was some interference last year by the Hon. Member for Laprairie and this year by the Hon. Member for Chambly, with the Minister's knowledge.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Secretary of State of Canada): The last part is frivolous, Mr. Speaker. I am now looking at the dossier—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bouchard: Mr. Speaker, I am now looking at the dossier of the Femmes collaboratrices and we should, as we usually do . . . but I think it is clear that we are perhaps being a bit more careful than you were at the time, because our methods are not the same, obviously.

CANADA PETROLEUM RESOURCES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Miss Carney that Bill C-92, an Act to regulate interests in petroleum in relation to frontier lands, to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and to repeal the Canada Oil and Gas Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Speaker: When the House adjourned at one o'clock there were four minutes remaining in the question and comment period with regard to the speech of the Hon. Member for Calgary South (Mrs. Sparrow). There being no questions or comments, debate.

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, in participating in the debate on Bill C-92 I want to say to the House that the particular difficulty I have with this Bill is similar to the difficulties, which I now see in retrospect, with what they sometimes call the wisdom of hindsight, I had with the preceding legislation, namely, the Canada Oil and Gas Act, which was promulgated in March, 1982, and which this Bill seeks to amend. In other words, the problem I see with this Bill in the one particular aspect I am going to address, was also the problem that existed in the previous Bill, which we are now amending.

Both of these measures, one passed by a Liberal Government, and this one seeking to be passed by a Conservative Government, fail, in my view, to comprehend what is involved in the unresolved settlement of aboriginal claims north of 60. That is the problem I see with the Bill, and it is on that subject alone I wish to direct my remarks.

Gurston Dacks of the University of Alberta has stated, and I agree fully with him, the following:

> The Government of Canada has historically viewed the north as a colony, and the basic thrust of its northern policy has been that the north must serve the strategic and economic needs of southern Canada.

Professor Dacks has described the native claims settlement process north of 60 as being glacial—an interesting description. He goes on to tell us what he means. He writes the following:

> —it advances very slowly and, like the glaciers, will leave a profound social, economic and political mark on the north for generations to come. Until these claims are settled, the non-renewable resource industries of the north, most notably the oil and gas industry, will face native opposition to their proposed projects.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Mines who spoke first on this Bill, the Hon. Member for Erie (Mr. Fretz), said during the course of his speech that "as a Government we are deeply concerned with the fair and equitable treatment of Canadians from all regions and from all walks of life". I have no reason at all to doubt the sincerity of the Hon. Member when he spoke those words. He does believe them. He is an honourable man, principled and upright in every respect. I have to point out to the House that nowhere in the speech of the Parliamentary Secretary in introducing Bill C-92 did he give even passing lip service to the concerns of northern native peoples, the Indian or the Dene, the Inuit and the Metis.

He said in his speech that there is concern for all Canadians in all regions, and yet he neglected any reference to these important people north of 60. They have to be mentioned whenever we talk about gas and oil development, whenever we talk about development of the non-renewable resources north of 60.

This legislation, Bill C-92, proceeds almost as if these people did not exist. Of course, as I started out by saying, the previous Bill this one will replace did exactly the same thing. In that regard, and in my own defence, I only want to point out that the Liberal Government's Canada Oil and Gas Act was promulgated in March of 1982. The Special Committee on Indian Self-Government did not report to Parliament until November of 1983. During the period of time that Members of Parliament for all political parties were working on that report of the Special Committee a great deal was learned by those Members. There was a good deal of sensitization to the reality of the rights and claims of aboriginal peoples in Canada.

I came to believe that, following the tabling of that report, those Members of Parliament, and I believe a growing number of other Members of Parliament, will never again have exactly the same perspective on public policy issues that in any way at all touch upon the rights and the prerogatives of native people.

It was for this reason that I was surprised that the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary for the Minister of State for Mines, who gave the opening speech in this debate, did not put something into his speech with respect to aboriginal peoples and their rights. I say that because we were privileged to have him serve on various occasions on that Special Committee, and his contribution was in no way small.

Talking about that report of the Special Committee on Indian Self-Government, making it apropos to C-92, let me just quote one small section. On page 111 it says the following:

> The resolution of land and rights disputes in the territories is an opportunity and obligation for the present generation to be generous and honest and to ensure that the indigenous people of the north are the primary beneficiaries of development there, with a fair share of resources now and in the future.

That is from the special committee's report.

I return now to the speech by the Hon. Parliamentary Secretary who pointed out to the House that the Canadian Petroleum Resources Act, which will replace the Canada Oil and Gas Act, will have a simplified and fair set of rules designed to encourage exploration success in Canada's frontier regions. He said these rights will guide Governments and the petroleum industry to the exploration and development of Canada's frontier and offshore resources. Then the Parliamentary Secretary told the House that the competitive bidding system will ensure maximum return. That is what he said, maximum return to Canadians as resource owners.

With great respect, I must remind the Parliamentary Secretary, and also the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney), that the question of ownership of resources north of 60 is an unsettled matter. It is part of and central to the settlement of aboriginal claims.

• (1510)

In his speech, the Parliamentry Secretary told us that Bill C-92 respects the rights of companies, regardless of their nationality. However, nowhere did he say that it respects the rights of aboriginal peoples, those who claim right and title to those lands north of 60 that have never been surrendered. There is no document available anywhere in the archives that shows that an act of surrender took place. Aboriginal rights in that part of Canada have never been extinguished. If we now take the enlightened approach that is available to us, we will no longer hear about the extinguishment of the rights of aboriginal people since we recognize that their rights have now been enshrined in the Constitution of Canada.

However, when I listened to the Parliamentary Secretary's speech, it just seemed to confirm for me the assertion of Professor Dacks who said that from the federal point of view:

> The North must serve the strategic and the economic needs of southern Canada. Northern megaprojects create southern jobs, investment opportunities, markets for Canadian manufacturers, much-needed tax and royalty revenues—

To quote the Parliamentary Secretary, this Bill is designed "to enhance the profitability of companies operating in the high cost and high risk frontier regions". I take strong exception to the Parliamentary Secretary's view that Bill C-92 introduces a balanced framework for the development of Canada's frontier lands. He pointed out in his speech that it is fair to provincial and territorial Governments and to all Canadians as resource owners. He said that the Bill is not only market responsive, it is internationally competitive and sensitive to commercial concerns of companies operating in the high risk frontier regions of the country. This may or may not be true. Those are very difficult and complex questions, most of which I will have to leave to our able energy critic, the Hon. Member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys (Mr. MacLellan). The Parliamentary Secretary and the Government for whom he spoke failed to comprehend the central issue of aboriginal rights in relation to Bill C-92. In my opinion, this casts very serious doubts on the validity of the legislation we are debating today.

Let me move away from the Parliamentary Secretary's speech and turn to the Bill itself, and the Minister's statement and accompanying documents of October 30 last year, to discover whether what the Parliamentary Secretary neglected to say is mentioned anywhere at all. It is mentioned, but only parenthetically. It is in no way central to the principle of this Bill. Clause 3 states:

Nothing in this Act abrogates or derogates from any aboriginal title, right or claim that pertained to aboriginal peoples of Canada prior to the coming into force of this Act.

If we were to interpret Clause 3 of the Bill in the broadest possible sense, in an all encompassing historical, constitutional and legal way, most of Bill C-92 would be null and void. The Government is legislating for oil and gas companies to develop these non-renewable resources on aboriginal lands where claims have not yet been settled. We call these lands frontier lands or Canada Lands, simply because it serves our own purpose.

Of course, we are told in the accompanying document entitled Canada's Energy Frontiers: A Framework for Investment and Jobs that Clause 3 is to be interpreted only in a very narrow way to cover one agreement that we now have in the Northwest Territories, the Committee for Original People's Entitlement, or so-called COPE agreement. That document says:

An agreement with the Committee for Original People's Entitlement (COPE) has already been concluded and enshrined in legislation. Nothing in this policy statement or proposed legislation will alter that provision of that agreement and its implementing legislation.

We are pleased with that and did not expect otherwise. Clause 3 is in Bill C-92 for no other reason than that it is a very narrow recognition clause.

To be fair to the Minister, there is some other reference and recognition of aboriginal rights in the statement to which I just referred. Let me draw those to the attention of the House. The document says:

The North is different from other frontier regions in fundamental ways. The prospective oil and gas areas are not just offshore. They are also on land, close to northern communities and within the traditional hunting and trapping areas of people with unresolved aboriginal claims.

One can see that we are making progress but only a little at a time. The document goes on to say:

Because of the complexity and far-reaching consequences of unresolved aboriginal claims, aboriginal groups must have the opportunity to participate in—discussions to ensure their rights and interests are protected.

The document which accompanied the announcement of the new frontier energy policy indicated that the frontier energy policy has been discussed with northern native groups. That statement caught my attention immediately, and when the Parliamentary Secretary spoke I waited for some information about the conclusions of those discussions. However, there was no mention of it at all.

Quite apart from other relevant issues related to energy policy, such as Canadianization, security of supply and fairness, Bill C-92 gives me grave concern because it makes no provision for the active participation of aboriginal peoples in the decision making process related to the development of non-renewable resources north of 60. It really ignores, almost completely, the impact of aboriginal rights now recognized within the Constitution of Canada. I believe that Bill C-92 underlines the fact that these constitutional rights that aboriginal peoples now possess are no more than paper rights at the moment. The Constitution is a beautiful and impressive document which talks about aboriginal rights. But I want to know when we will yank those rights off the paper and put them into the real world in which people live. We have not even begun to do that.

A very distinguished Canadian lawyer who has worked effectively in the field of native claims made this observation:

The issues are such that they can only really be resolved to the satisfaction of all through a negotiated fair settlement which requires a political and legislative approach and solution.

That statement, I believe, draws all of us in the House into the process.

There have been positive results throughout this process. The Minister of Indian Affairs asked for a task force to review the comprehensive claims policy since the old one was out of date, inadequate and unacceptable. Although it is not yet the policy of the Government, there is a report known as the Coolican report which is very important to legislation such as Bill C-92 and the process in which we are all involved in some way. The report states:

Aboriginal groups should be entitled to negotiate decision-making participation in the management and use of land and resources within their traditional areas. The decision-making structures in which they participate should have responsibilities that go beyond a merely advisory role.

It is vital that aboriginal groups be able to negotiate decision-making powers and to explore with governments the most appropriate means of sharing responsibility.

I would like to refer to the resource revenue sharing recommendation in the Coolican report. It states:

● (1520)

Economic participation by aboriginals in resource development could take a variety of forms. . . . such participation may result from aboriginal ownership of subsurface resources in certain areas. Even where aboriginals do not own the resources, however, there are other mechanisms that could facilitate their participation in the economic benefits of resource development. Such mechanisms could include a share of royalties derived through the Crown, and a share of other revenue sources such as licence, bidding, and annual fees.

None of that is in Bill C-92.

I will conclude by saying that the Minister, in introducing this new frontier energy policy, espoused for the House a principle I like very much and that is the principle of shared management. However, what the Minister meant by "shared management" was the Government of Canada, the oil and gas industry, the provinces and the territorial Governments. I have to remind her and the Parliamentary Secretary who introduced Bill C-92, that north of 60, sharing means involving another important group, perhaps the most important people who live there, namely, the aboriginal people. Their rights and their claims are paramount. If any of us are in any doubt about that, the Constitution of Canada makes it abundantly clear.

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to engage in debate on Bill C-92, the Canada Petroleum Resources Act. It is a very important piece of legislation designed to meet a number of objectives. It is important that we appreciate what the consequences may be for Canada, particularly in the circumstances of great change in the energy industry we are experiencing in 1986. It is also important for us to look critically at this Bill, because this is the larger part of the Conservative program to destroy the national energy policy of the early 1980s and to redesign the rules and structure for the petroleum industry in Canada which the Conservatives regard, of course, as having been so destroyed by the NEP. This is a program which is designed to re-establish the kinds of principles the Government says should prevail in the petroleum industry.

The petroleum industry is of enormous importance to us in Canada. There are a number of objectives to be achieved and we want to be sure that Bill C-92 will in fact provide for those various necessities. I think it is particularly opportune to be debating the Bill now in the middle of May, 1986, because circumstances in the petroleum industry have changed so greatly that we can already assess the validity of these decisions and the viability of the structure the Government is establishing. We have a means of questioning the advisability of this particular approach to the petroleum industry. The fact that we can do so in debate on second reading is very useful. It allows us to examine these matters quite early in the history of this Bill. If the Government were to come to the conclusion that the energy regime which it has put forward is unwise, here is the opportunity to go back to the drawing board and come up with better rules.

In expanding on this subject I would like to recognize clearly and explicitly the needs that face Canada at the beginning of this decade, and to consider the ways in which the Liberal regime was designed to deal with these necessities and whether this replacement for the Liberal program will do the job successfully.

We must remind ourselves that the National Energy Program was put forward in highly unusual circumstances which were novel at the beginning of the 1980s, although certain achievements by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries had intensified the abnormal situation which had prevailed since the early 1970s. We must appreciate the success of OPEC in driving up the price of crude oil, and with it natural gas, and the success of OPEC in forcing consumers around the globe to pay far more for petroleum.

We must also appreciate the consequences in at least a couple of directions. The first one was obvious, and that was the unprecedented transfer of wealth from the consumers to the producers. It opened possibilities for economic development in countries which had only dreamed of such possibilities before. It has had enormous consequences with consumers trying to maintain themselves by borrowing money and ending up as the debtors of world banking institutions in a way which threatens the economic stability of the entire western world.

Another consequence of the great increase in petroleum prices was to open new possibilities for exploration as well as to open the potential, at least, for alternatives to displace petroleum as a fuel in those instances where that could be done. I have in mind the possibility that these high prices would lead to exploration in the areas where exploration needed to be carried out, given the declining reserves and the fall off in exploration in the older areas, and I am thinking of Canada and the United States in particular, the continental reserves. To compensate for those declining reserves through the 1970s was one of the challenges we faced. The Governments worried about and grappled with the need to ensure that we would have security of supply in the future.

What is surely significant is that the regime which prevailed until the beginning of this decade, in which tax incentives were the main encouragement to exploration, had not had much success. Even when petroleum prices rose, as they did quite substantially in the 1970s—although relatively speaking they skyrocketed at the very end of the decade—there had not been very much success in the offshore areas or the so-called "Canada Lands" north of 60. That limited success is reason for asking ourselves whether a return to the regime of that era will be successful in our time. It is reason for asking at the outset whether security of supply, which is quite fundamental to our industrial economies and to the transportation systems on which we as consumers depend, will be provided for.

The Government did not see security of supply as the only objective on which the National Energy Program was based, and I recognize that as well. There were other objectives. One was to ensure an increasing ownership of petroleum and also to ensure that the people of Canada could, through tax schemes, share in some of the windfall gains which producers were trying to achieve, not because their costs of production were high but because they had succeeded through Cartel organizations in driving the price of petroleum so high. It is in considering these various objectives that the National Energy Program becomes such a complex matter with which to deal. On the one hand, trying to achieve security of supply led the Government to advance subsidies and grants in the amount of millions of dollars toward exploration in the areas where there had not been much accomplished before 1980. On the other hand, it appeared clear to the Government in those days that there were possibilities for compensating these expenditures by means of a tax regime through the petroleum and gas revenue tax that brought in large amounts of money, the kind of windfall gains the OPEC organization made possible even for countries that were not in any way members of the OPEC organization.

The combination of the PGRT with Petroleum Incentives Program and other provisions designed to achieve 50 per cent Canadian ownership along with the recognition that the people of Canada were in one way or another paying most of the costs of this exploration and the provision of 25 per cent of discoveries going to the Crown made up the provisions of the National Energy Program which Conservative Members in opposition found so objectionable. Why they found them so objectionable is a consideration on which it is worth spending a moment.

Conservative supporters in the petroleum industry, particularly those from the large multinational corporations controlled outside of Canada, found receptive ears in Conservative circles. They found ready listeners to the argument that this kind of energy regime was completely unfair. One need only read the statement made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) when she presented this scheme to appreciate the kind of moral fervour the Minister built up over what the multinationals saw as the unfairness of this particular system.

These corporate spokesmen persuaded the Conservative Party to destroy most of the National Energy Program while leading Conservative Members to think that thanks to prevailing high petroleum prices, exploration would go on with encouragement from tax incentives to the extent they were needed. The oil companies would be allowed to take most of the windfall gains, even if it took a few years to move to that regime, and then Conservative Members would hope quite devoutly that these oil companies would do the exploration required to ensure security of supply.

That is the reason the events of 1986 posed such a great challenge to the Government's legislation. It is the reason for the crisis that OPEC itself now faces as petroleum prices fall to levels lower than most people had believed or lower than, at certain moments at least, most consumers had hoped. It is there that one sees a crisis for the energy program of the Conservative Government and right there where Bill C-92 comes immediately into question. It is worth reading some of the statements made by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources on Wednesday, October 30, when she proudly presented to the House of Commons the agenda for the destruction of the National Energy Program. At that time, she said the following:

> Mr. Speaker, the reaction to these initiatives has been very encouraging.
> Oil exploration in western Canada is now higher than at any time in our history!
> Overall oil and gas investment intentions are up by about two billion dollars; more than a 25 per cent increase over last year.
>
> This investment is providing energy security and economic benefits—jobs—right across Canada.
> As well, deregulated oil markets are creating opportunities for both producers and consumers.

It does not take very much knowledge of the present circumstances to know that oil exploration in western Canada is not higher than at any time in our history. The oil and gas investment intentions of about $2 billion have shrunk considerably in the present circumstances. The investment that was providing energy security, economic benefits and jobs right across Canada is very close to lying in shambles. The Accords so proudly put forward by the Government as being its own political and moral solution to the situation created by the National Energy Program are not being realized.

Oil companies which had great hopes of profiting from the windfall gains that OPEC had made possible in the past are now laying people off, cutting back on drilling plans and returning to the circumstances of the 1960s and the 1970s. They are putting in fundamental question the possibilities of oil self-sufficiency for the people of Canada. There lies the fundamental weakness of this scheme.

Conservative Members thought that they could return to the days before 1980. Their friends in the oil companies were happy about that because it was going to give them a larger share of the very large pie which OPEC created while the Government gave up its share. Now, thanks to what has happened in the international petroleum industry, the whole scheme is in question.

If we were to have Bill C-92 before us in the House and in committee for several months longer, we would have more time to consider carefully the system with which the Government has come up and to discover exactly how far it will fall short as a basis for maintaining oil security, quite aside from concerns about Canadian ownership and other concerns of the petroleum industry. It seems to me that that is the largest difficulty that faces the Government. By its mistakes, that difficulty can be imposed on the Canadian people.

There are questions to be raised, and if I am raising spectres, I hope on behalf of the Canadian people that they are not justified. However, these days there is no assurance that this particular triumph of ideology in the Ministry of Energy, Mines and Resources will not leave us begging, freezing or standing still in the future. Then Canadians will look back on the Government they elected in 1984 and will curse it for what it did to Canadian people.

Let me deal with several other important aspects of the Bill. I have already explored the dependence on market forces which is central to the Government's action. I would say it is profoundly hypocritical to talk about depending on market forces when the first reality of the market is the triumph of an international cartel that has been rigging prices at incredible levels. At least intellectually, we now have the satisfaction of looking at market forces and deciding if dependence on them is such a bright idea. I know that the Parliamentary Secretary is listening to this with care because he will be there along with others answering for the Government when Canadians find themselves in the cold.

Dependence on market forces then is doubtful. Among the provisions of the Bill is one for competitive bidding based on a single criterion. The Parliamentary Secretary suggested this morning that it could be possible for various items to be written in, and that there could be a recognition of the needs of aboriginal peoples north of 60 with title not yet extinguished in so many areas and with concerns about their own benefit from petroleum. The provision is there, but many of us do not trust the Government when it comes to such things. Given its surrender to petroleum companies on the fundamentals of the regime, we do not trust that the Government will do anything better there. However, I suppose that for the Government to say at the outset that it will be a single criterion, or that it might be written up so that various things are provided, is perhaps not much weaker than leaving the matter less clear and saying that a variety of provisos or criteria will have to be confronted by the bids. All of this from one Government is neither here nor there.

• (1540)

I should like to refer to the matter of the sharing of the people of Canada in successful exploration. Before the National Energy Program was brought in Canadian people paid some 90 cents out of every dollar of exploration costs. This was made more explicit through the Petroleum Incentives Program which paid the money up front so that people could see the totals. The decision to move away from that kind of system to one which hides grants in tax expenditures is surely objectionable at a time when the entire tax scheme comes under more and more question. As a result of this we also lose the possibility of the people of Canada sharing by the Crown share, the 25 per cent share proviso which was part of the National Energy Program. This opened possibilities north of 60 for aboriginal peoples to take a fractional share of that in government programs and so on and so forth.

There are other weaknesses in Bill C-92, weaknesses which I think are quite fundamental as other Hon. Members have stated them. However, in my mind they do not bulk as large for the people of Canada as do fundamental questions about security of supply in this regime which I have explored primarily in my speech this afternoon.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member was all over the map. He did not come right out and say—and I would like him to come out and say it—that the reason drilling and exploration were down at the present was because of the energy policies of the Government. He knows that this is not true; he knows that it is because of the low world price of energy today. He also knows that Canadian energy is very expensive. The only solution the NDP has suggested is the establishment of a floor price; in other words, to have Canadian consumers pay more for gasoline than the price at which we export the product and to allow imports to come in at a lower price. I do not think Canadian consumers would appreciate paying more for their resources than the price of those being exported. The next thing in the line would be to say that we should cut off exports. Then what would we do with 600,000 barrels per day of heavy oil which are being used in the United States for its road upgrading program? I am sure westerners would really love to hear the Hon. Member advocate that we should not export any of our oil and gas to the United States at market price but at the price Canadians are paying, at which point no one would buy.

The NDP arguments have flaws all over the place. If the Hon. Member had been honest in his speech, he would have pointed out that the low price of world energy today has a lot to do with the downturn in the industry.

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I really appreciate the Parliamentary Secretary making these arguments. They allow one to come to grips with the hypocrisy of the Government's program and to deal with its weaknesses. Whatever criticisms he may have of my arguments, Canadians are not particularly interested in my arguments this afternoon. However, they have a crucial concern about the Government's program and whether it will work. I did not think it was necessary to say that the situation at present is so bad because of the low price of petroleum, although I said it. It has been the failure of the cartel arrangement which has cast us into this new situation.

The Government was sure that it could allow its friends in the oil companies to make billions of dollars thanks to OPEC. The Government withdrew from that area and left it to the companies. As I said before, it assumed all along that prices would remain up there somewhere and that exploration would continue. It was a matter of talking market while the industry wanted to profit from the most massive global intervention into the market that anyone has ever seen.

I should like the Parliamentary Secretary to concede that OPEC created this artificial situation with enormous economic rents to be captured. Oil companies wanted to have it all and not to allow the Government to share in it. Now that OPEC falls into difficulty, prices come down, oil rigs are left parked, and lawyers are laid off in Calgary, as one of the ultimate measures of how tragic is the situation in western Canada, the Government, perhaps to its credit, will stick rigidly to principle. It will go on talking market while we get closer to market forces prevailing. We in the New Democratic Party do not worship market forces. We think society deserves the guidance of the best minds in Government, and we do not only depend upon the market. We are looking at what might be done in the way of maintaining the industry and ensuring security of supply for the future. Rather than shooting at me on that, the Parliamentary Secretary might pay serious attention to how his government program will provide that.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I should like to get a clear indication from the Hon. Member of what is their policy. I have not heard what the NDP would do. He talks about market forces not working. Consumers in Canada are benefiting very well today from the market-place. The market-place is working. In 1985 we had more exploration than we ever had. There was more activity in the energy field than before as a result of the policies of the Government. Prices were steady. Throughout 1985 the price per barrel of oil was steady. There was no great increase or decrease throughout 1985 until the end. I say to the Hon. Member that a year and a half ago lower prices were predicted by all of us, including the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) who stated before the Western Accord was signed that oil prices were on their way down.

The NDP likes to throw around the red herring that the Conservatives are the friends of the oil companies. I should like to ask the Hon. Member why Canadian companies asked us to get off their backs and out of their hair. Why did they ask for the cancellation of the National Energy Program? He thinks that only five or six oil companies asked for it. I can tell him that that is not true at all. The Canadian industry—and our oil industry is now almost 50 per cent Canadian—asked the Government to get out. It was not only the big oil companies about which the Hon. Member likes to talk, the oil companies which the NDP likes to paint as the big bad bogymen in the whole scenario.

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have several points to make. It would be useful to have these letters tabled in the House so that we might all see the extent to which companies other than the Seven Sisters, or whatever their number is these days given the changes in the oil industry, were actually desirous of that sort of change. A reason for all of those who had great ambitions was to take advantage of the situation which continued to prevail in 1985, whatever thought there might be that prices would drop a little. No one really thought they were going to drop in this disastrous way, disastrous for producers and consumers in the long run given that there would be nothing quite so happy as burning all the petroleum we had in cars and in other ways at 25 cents a gallon. We could all be overjoyed at something like that. I am grateful that the Parliamentary Secretary frowns because he realizes his argument is a stupid one to put forward.

• (1550)

The difficulty we face is to find out what kind of a price and what kind of a regime we need to maintain exploration and to ensure that something resembling security of supply is a reality without oil companies being able to run away with us and our wallets, allowing consumers to maintain some sort of a reasonable standard of living. Those are the concerns. How to do that is not an easy matter. I depend on our critic for energy to lead in these areas rather than spelling things out myself. I can assure the Member that we are not adverse to considering regulated prices.

Mr. McDermid: At what level?

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): That is a nice question, at what level? The Hon. Member for Calgary South (Mrs. Sparrow) this morning was talking about $18 to $20 U.S. as the basic level at which the industry could operate. I do not know when we are going to see $18 to $20 U.S. again.

Mrs. Sparrow: What do you mean? It was $17 U.S. today.

Mr. Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): If we do not reach that level, what are we going to see? The schizophrenia in comments is lovely. Last year it was Government policy that lead to all this exploration. This year when levels fall off it is world economic forces. Politicians have a tendency to believe that good news is thanks to them and bad news is thanks to others, preferably international forces beyond the control of the Canadian people. That is the situation we are in these days, Mr. Speaker. It is no easy matter to resolve. I will leave whatever I have said about hypocrisy and other things this afternoon. We have a limited understanding about market forces when the cartel is triumphant, but at least there is some consistency now in continuing to talk market forces while the petroleum industry gets somewhere closer to market realities in terms of 1986.

Mr. McDermid: You have no idea what realities are.

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, earlier today I was talking to the Hon. Member for Laval-des-Rapides (Mr. Garneau) who had the good fortune to spend last weekend down south. He was telling me that the price of a gallon of gas in the U.S. is considerably lower on a proportionate basis than it is in Canada. That raises the question as to what the great market policies of the Government have produced when Canadians are paying hundreds of millions of dollars more for gasoline today than consumers in the U.S. are paying on an equivalent basis.

I have in front of me a survey of investment spending produced by the Canadian Petroleum Association. Market price is just one aspect. Another thing we could look at when we study the over-all policy of the Government is investment spending by the industry. In a recent survey, the Canadian Petroleum Association estimated upstream capital and exploration expenditures for 1986 to be 43 per cent lower than in 1985.

In 1985, the actual expenditures by the industry were $10.5 billion and the intentions for expenditure in 1986 were originally forecast to be $11.2 billion. It seems that the revised intentions forecast of expenditures is only $6 billion.

Since upstream spending was a significant portion of total business investment in 1985, the downturn will significantly impact not only on western Canada but on the economies of Ontario and Quebec.

If one wants to look at employment, public announcements to date indicate personnel reductions in operating companies of over 4,000 employees. Reductions in spending will severely impact in the drilling, service and oil field goods manufacturing which will cause additional widespread lay-offs. Statistics Canada estimates a loss of 10,000 jobs during March and April in Alberta alone. This loss was essentially related to the downturn in the oil and gas sector. Unemployment in Alberta rose to a seasonally adjusted rate of 9.7 per cent in April. The Calgary rate, I understand, was 10.9 per cent and Edmonton's was 12.5 per cent. Where are the benefits that have been produced by the Government's energy policies in Alberta?

Only 39 rigs were drilling in western Canada at the beginning of May, 23 in Alberta. There has been no recovery despite the lifting of road bans, and this low level is moving now into its fifth week, the longest sustained slump at such a low level in the past 13 years. Drilling completions for 1986 are currently estimated at less than 7,000 compared with nearly 13,000 last year.

Crown land sales, regarded as the bellwether indicator of industry health, have dropped significantly in total bonuses and prices per hectare. To the end of April Alberta land sale receipts were down an astonishing 52 per cent to $113 million compared to $236 million in the comparable 1985 period.

What about productive capacity? Lower oil prices and the resulting decline in upstream investment, especially the reduction in exploration, will have serious consequences for Canada's future crude oil production. A recent assessment of the productive capacity by the Canadian Petroleum Association indicates that productive capacity of light crude oil would decline approximately 30 per cent to 700,000 barrels a day by 1990, and 58 per cent to 420,000 barrels a day by 1995. Lower oil prices will also affect synthetic crude projects, bitumen production and conventional heavy oil output. Any additions to productive capacity or replacement of diminished output due to natural reservoir decline is currently expected to come only from bitumen products that are already in the construction or pre-production phase. Over-all, the assessment indicates that statistical self-sufficiency could be lost by as early as 1990 and a significant supply gap would develop by 1995, which could make Canada dependent upon imported oil for some 30 per cent of requirements.

• (1600)

With regard to the Canadian balance of payments, I am not telling anyone anything they do not know by saying that the export of oil and gas has made a significant contribution to Canada's balance of payments, its positive merchandise trade balance over the years. The price drop which we are suffering from at the present time will significantly affect that position. Indeed, the effects are already showing up. In 1985, exports of crude oil and natural gas were valued at $9.8 billion. The changes between the exports in the first quarter of 1986 and those in the first quarter of 1985 are astonishing.

Mr. McDermid: In volume or price?

Mr. Berger: In price, Mr. Speaker. In the area of crude oil there was a drop of 28.2 per cent in the first quarter of 1986. There was a drop of 22.6 per cent in natural gas for a total drop of 25.4 per cent.

Mr. McDermid: Tell us about the volume.

Mr. Berger: The Parliamentary Secretary says: "Tell us about the volume". It is, of course, the reliance on market forces and the willingness of the Government to accept the market price and all that comes with it that produces this effect on our economy. If the current price situation and marketing difficulties prevail, the 1986 exports are likely to drop below $6 billion. This, of course, is the situation of lower oil prices and how it will affect the petroleum industry in Canada. The outlook is not very encouraging.

I would also like to comment on the renewable energy industry in the country. One of the first initiatives of the new Government when it took office was to eliminate totally the energy division at the National Research Council. All research in energy in areas of wind, solar energy and biomass were cancelled. Canada had reached the point where it was developing world-class technology. We were starting to export to the counties of Africa and many other world markets. One of the first things that the Government did was to cancel all research into renewable energies, which left the industry in the position of exporting a product with the possibility of no future development.

If one looks at this in the short term on the basis of the low energy prices from the end of 1984 until today, one could find it difficult to justify expenditures on renewable energy which may be much more costly in the short term. Is this the way to go about securing Canada's energy self-sufficiency for the future? Surely the Government should be preoccupied with the situation which may prevail five or ten years from now when energy prices may again be at the level which pertained at the end of the 1970s and in the early 1980s. Surely we should be concerned about the energy self-sufficiency of the country when the hydrocarbons which we are presently consuming will be exhausted.

The energy policies of the Government seem to demonstrate a concern for the short-term and neglect the long-term perspective which is essential in considering the general impact of Canada's responsibilities in the world.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speech of the Hon. Member for Laurier (Mr. Berger) because he has a great grasp of the scientific aspects of the renewable energy industry.

Mr. Crosbie: Be serious, Doctor.

Mr. Foster: I heard the comments of the Parliamentary Secretary earlier this afternoon. He was acting as if the Government really knew what it was doing. One need only consider the fact that there are 36 out of 480 rigs in the western sedimentary basin which are operating. When I heard the Parliamentary Secretary speaking I was reminded of an article which I read in The Toronto Star on April 1. The headline reads: "Tories in quandry over oil price crash". The article says:

> Each week, rigs are coming back in from the fields and not going back out. The banks are becoming wary about making loans. Producers are cancelling their drilling contracts. Whole floors of office towers in Calgary are emptying out.

That would lead one to believe that the Government does not really know what it is doing. I would be interested in the comments of the Hon. Member for Laurier as to whether or not he thinks the Government knows what it is doing. The article continues:

> It is not that the members aren't hearing the cries of anguish from their constituents. "Calgary is in a disastrous state", says Bobbie Sparrow, one of the city's four MPs. "I'm on the phone every day with geologists and engineers in their 40s and 50s, with kids at university and mortgages and bank loans, who have lost their jobs."
> The problem is that the Alberta Tory caucus can't make up its mind what Ottawa should do. "It's happened so rapidly that we've hardly had time to think," says caucus chairman Jack Shields. He and his colleagues have organized a three-day brainstorming session in Edmonton this week to hear what oil executives, insurance spokesmen, drillers, geophysicists and provincial officials have to suggest.

I have not heard what the Government is going to do as a result of that caucus meeting a month or so ago. There certainly has been no indication of what it is going to do because the drilling rigs, with the exception of perhaps three dozen, are not going back out. I would be interested to hear whether the Hon. Member for Laurier has discerned whether the Government has chosen a direction in which to move since that time. Clearly there has been nothing decipherable from Members on this side of the House. Although this Bill provides for an exploration tax credit of 25 per cent in the offshore, it does not reinstate a cash incentive for exploration and development as was asked for by IPAC before the Committee on Natural Resources and Public Works a few months ago, at which time we heard strong representations. I would be interested to hear the Hon. Member's thoughts on this.

• (1610)

Mr. Berger: I thank the Hon. Member for his comments. When he was giving another vivid description of the sorry situation in Alberta, Calgary in particular, it brought to my mind a comment circulating some months ago that after the first year and a half in office the two strongest men in the Conservative Cabinet were considered to be the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) and the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall).

Mr. McDermid: Strongest what?

Mr. Berger: The two strongest men.

Mr. McDermid: Persons.

Mr. Berger: Which tells you a lot about the quality of the other members of Cabinet. Of course, the great claim to fame of the Minister of State for Finance was shutting down two banks in western Canada. What did the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources do? She did not really go through some terrific negotiations in the course of implementing the Tory energy policy. All she did was to say we are going to undo what was done before and give the oil companies a couple of billion dollars. My figures are not exactly—

Mr. Foster: It is $2.4 billion.

Mr. Berger: I thank the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster). That required no great skills. All it required was for someone to go out and say, "We are giving you what you have asked for, for many years". The situation has now changed drastically and there is a remarkable lack of original thinking on the part of the Government and its Members. That was reflected by the Hon. Member for Algoma when he quoted the Alberta caucus chairman as saying, "We have hardly had time to think". What does he mean by that? What do Members from Alberta spend their time doing?

Mr. McDermid: You would not understand.

Mr. Berger: The oil industry is the backbone of Alberta and these Members have hardly had time to focus their attention on it or come up with a few original ideas. That is really astonishing. It is this lack of foresight and imagination which was reflected in the provincial election in Alberta. The people said they have had all their eggs in one basket for too long and it is necessary to have a voice in opposition. It is necessary to achieve a little bit of original thinking in the legislature.

Mr. McDermid: They stayed away from the Liberals.

Mr. Berger: We will see the same results in the election in Saskatchewan shortly—

Mr. McDermid: They will stay away from the Liberals, too.

[Translation]

Mr. Berger: . . . and in other elections in this country in the months and years to come.

[English]

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I heard the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) talking about the Conservative Member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields) having a three-day brainstorming session on what to do about oil pricing. The thought boggles the mind.

Mr. Crosbie: You have to have a mind first; that is the problem.

Mr. Waddell: That is exactly the problem, my friend. You have to have a brain in order to storm it. Would the Minister like to come over and give the speech? I know he would like to do so.

Mr. Crosbie: I approve of everything so far.

Mr. Waddell: They probably spent three days deciding which restaurant to go to in Fort McMurray. That was the extent of their brainstorming if you look at the results.

According to the Government there have been tremendous complaints by unknown Canadians about the 25 per cent back-in which the Government gave to the Government oil company so it could have a quarter of the action in the development phase of offshore exploration. As I said earlier, the Government gave some $10 billion in grants and tax incentives to the industry between 1960 and 1987. The Conservatives are removing that share after all sorts of complaints.

The Hon. Member represents a riding from downtown Montreal. He knows that city very well. I am from Vancouver. I have not received one complaint in my office from any of my constituents, ordinary Canadians, who somehow wanted our Government to stop taking 25 per cent from the American oil companies. Was the Hon. Member getting any complaints, or did they just come from the Reagan White House and the large American oil companies which were upset about our taking 25 per cent of the action involving our own resources, the exploration for which we have subsidized for 20 years? Did he get any complaints in his Montreal office from his constituents that would force him to advocate bringing in a Bill like this?

Mr. Berger: I thank the Hon. Member for his question. Of course I should say that neither I nor probably most of my constituents have the expertise or interest in the oil industry that he and some other Members have. The answer to his question is no. Of course, the concern of consumers is with the high price of gasoline. When they see the price of a barrel of oil dropping and they are still paying the same amount at the pump, it is a matter of some concern.

When the Hon. Member talks about the back-in, I think one factor which is often ignored in discussing the economics of the oil industry are the forecasts of the price of oil in the early 1980s at the time the National Energy Program was introduced. We were shown forecasts which, had they come true, would have allowed companies like Imperial Oil to buy up the whole Canadian economy with the profits they made from oil and gas. It was necessary to introduce a certain amount of balance into the system. I believe other countries have similar provisions incorporating a figure even higher than the 25 per cent in Canada. Therefore I do not think what we did in Canada was unusual compared to world standards.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, it is always interesting to speak on Tory energy policy because it is pretty clear that the tooth fairy has landed. This is a wish list for the corporate board rooms of the big oil companies. My colleague from Vancouver—Kingsway and I sat for months with some of the same Tories here today and fought against Bill C-48 and all the Mack truck loopholes it contained. Now we find the Government side, now that it is Conservative, suddenly quiet because many of the wishes provided by the big corporations at that time we now find in Bill C-92. It calls for us to go through it with a little bit of care. I will highlight a few of the more glaring Mack truck sections, because I would not want to bore anyone who has to watch this debate or read this in the near future.

• (1620)

There are an awful lot of Canadians who do not know what lands are really affected. It is all of the Yukon, all of the Northwest Territories, all of the offshore up 200 miles, and all of the Arctic Archipelagos; all of those waters.

On that point I find it interesting, coming as I do from the North and travelling frequently, particularly in the Yukon, to have listened over the years to Yukon Erik and to the present sitting Tory Members in the Northwest Territories who, during the last election, were out there campaigning, and campaigning hard, saying that it is about time the Yukon got provincial status and provincial powers. They said that it is about time the Western Arctic got real powers and that they are going to fight for that in Ottawa. The Hon. Member for the Eastern Arctic said, "It is time for Nunavut. I am going to change the name to Nunavut and we are going to have real powers for the Inuit and the people who live north of sixty".

This certainly lays to rest the promises of those three Members coming to Ottawa to come into this Parliament and to fight for what most, if not all, northerners want, which is some sovereignty in their own area.

I can remember Tory Members in the last House talking about assisting to set up a heritage fund in relation to gas and oil and energy for the Yukon, for the Western Arctic and the Eastern Arctic to help with the Northwest Territories so they could get their own university, their own services and have their own sources of revenue. There is not even a whisper of any of that in here.

As a matter of fact, as a northerner you have to listen to this to get the drift of where this new administration is going. They define frontier lands in the following manner:

> "Frontier lands" means lands that belong to Her Majesty in right of Canada, or in respect of which Her Majesty in right of Canada has the right to dispose of or exploit the natural resources and that are situated in (a) the Yukon Territory, the Northwest Territories or Sable Island, or—

And this is where British Columbians who are listening should be interested to learn about the land grab about which the Tories stood up in this House five years ago. It was described as the greatest land grab of the century, the land grab off the B.C. coast, around the Queen Charlottes, the Dixon Entrance and the Hecate Strait, down in Queen Charlotte Sound, west coast Vancouver Island. They decried it and said it was terrible. On the East Coast it was already under way off Newfoundland, P.E.I., New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, that is all in here. This is pounding those last few nails that the oil companies wanted to see pounded in to make sure they could get whatever they wanted.

We have to look at some of the Mack truck sections of this Bill to see what is in this tooth fairy energy Bill, Bill C-92, that these great fighters for Canadian rights and northern sovereignty bring to us. My colleague from Vancouver-Kingsway raised Clause 3 on aboriginal rights, which says the following:

> Nothing in this Act abrogates or derogates from any aboriginal title, right or claim that pertained to the aboriginal peoples of Canada prior to the coming into force of this Act.

We went through the constitutional debate. We have the now Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie) on the record as saying that it is likely that there is aboriginal title in British Columbia. We are in the process of negotiating the settlement of outstanding aboriginal claims in the Yukon, in the Western and in the Eastern Arctic. Nothing is happening in British Columbia, and in terms of the offshore, this Bill tries to extinguish some of those outstanding and, as yet, unnegotiated and unresolved legitimate claims to aboriginal title, particularly in terms of the offshore.

What became of this open Government that was going to negotiate, sit down with the Government of Yukon, the Government of the Northwest Territories, the aboriginal peoples north of sixty, and particularly in British Columbia, to talk about a heritage fund, to talk about participation, to talk about the process of farming in to these various developments, both onshore and offshore? There is not a peep. There have been no discussions, no negotiations, and certainly nowhere in this legislation do we find anything that remotely resembles any kind of an architecture that would allow for the proper easy flow-in of those rights as they are negotiated in tandem with the introduction of this kind of legislation.

Aboriginal people in Canada should know full well that this is a shot across their bow. There is a test here by the Mulroney administration to see whether or not aboriginal peoples will sit down and quietly accept this kind of an approach by Conservatives from British Columbia, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, which is completely contrary to what they have spoken about in terms of the election.

Let us take a look at these Mack truck loopholes that I have alluded to, because I look forward very much to hearing Conservative Members, particularly from B. C. and the North, explaining what these kinds of loopholes really mean. Let me refer to page 12. This is where the Government sets up a nice little regime that looks as if it were going to provide a regulatory regime that protects the public interests. It is Clause 26, subclauses (3), (4) and (5). I want to refer to subclause (4) where it says the following:

The Governor in Council may make regulations prescribing areas in respect of which the Minister may make an order pursuant to subsection (5).

We have to read subclause (5), and it says the following:

The Minister may, subject to such terms and conditions as the Minister deems appropriate, extend the term of an exploration licence in relation to any frontier lands within a prescribed area that has been renegotiated under subsection (3).

We have had to read subclause (4) to get to subclause (5). Now we have to read subclause (5) to get back to Subclause (3). Subclause (3) says the following:

Subject to subsection (5) and Section 27, the term of an exploration licence entered into or in respect of which negotiations have been completed before December 20, 1985 may be renegotiated once only for a further term not exceeding four years and thereafter the term thereof shall not be renegotiated, extended or renewed.

If you go through Subclauses (3), (4) and (5), what you find out when you read subclause (5) is that it is all politics. The tooth fairy has landed once again. Any large corporation that wants an extension of any kind can simply get it. This is what I described as setting up a regime and then designing a loophole. That is just the kind of thing the big oil companies like to have.

Let us go on to what is called the lapsing of interests in Clauses 42 and 43. This is called subsurface storage licences, which anyone who has read any evidence of the Beaufort panel or the recent B.C. offshore panel knows that this Government, and certainly the Government of British Columbia, constantly attempt to downgrade, denigrate, and do whatever else they can to destroy the very important environmental concerns that are brought forward. Let us have a look at how you get a licence for subsurface storage. Clause 43 says the following:

The Minister may, subject to any terms and conditions he considers appropriate, issue a licence for the purpose of subsurface storage of petroleum or any other substance approved by the Minister in frontier lands at depths greater than twenty metres.

It sounds innocuous enough, does it not? One of the great concerns about lifting the moratorium off the B.C. coast, and as has been demonstrated in offshore drilling elsewhere in the world, is that there is an enormous amount of waste product every day. Your average size offshore semi-submersible or jack-up rig has about 10,000 barrels a day of drilling mud and fluid, much of which is extremely contaminating to the environment and can in fact in very short order kill off not only the vital plankton and the small plants near the surface of the ocean, but also affect salmon, perhaps in British Columbia, the whale populations, marine birds and so on in the North. These are crucial questions.

Here we have a Mack truck loophole to allow companies that find that there is a particularly suitable area either onshore or offshore. It is not limited, so they can simply pump their refuse down so long as it is 20 metres or more underground or underwater. This is very interesting. I have worked on oil rigs in the Northwest Territories and northern Alberta. I know what can happen when drilling companies do not have very specific written regulatory regimes under which to work. Their purpose is to make money, and if there is nothing prohibiting them from dumping all of their detritus into the ocean, an estuary of a river or on the land, that is exactly what they will do. No one should accuse them of wrongdoing because they have not been given prescribed conditions under which they can operate. Once again, the tooth fairy has landed with another mac truck loophole.

• (1630)

During all the years I have been in the House, and long before I was elected, the Conservatives always argued against Governor in Council regulations. Yet Bill C-75, introduced by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski), has no regulations. We will only see those regulations after Parliament has passed that legislation. We are seeing the same red tape that the Tories campaigned about at each election, saying: "Vote for us and we will cut the red tape. Don't worry, we will do it for you". However, since September 4, 1984, as much if not more red tape has been created than I and I am sure most Canadians have ever seen.

An Hon. Member: It's blue.

Mr. Fulton: That is right. As my colleague points out, blue ribbon is the new fantasy of the day, certainly as it pertains to Bill C-92.

Let us examine Clause 100 dealing with regulations. It states:

The Governor in Council may make regulations for carrying out the purposes and provisions of this Part and, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, may make regulations

(a) prescribing the powers, duties and functions of the Registrar and Deputy Registrar for the purposes of this Part and the time when, and manner and circumstances in which, they are to be exercised, and providing for the designation by the Minister of any person or class of persons to exercise such powers and perform such duties and functions as may be specified in the regulations;

That long paragraph of nonsense comes from a Government that promised faithfully to get away from the gobbledegook, in terms of the Income Tax Act, new laws and how Parliament would be run, and would bring in regulations along with the Bills. Once again, however, there are no regulations in the Bill. They will be produced by bureaucrats, ferreting away in their dark corners, typing Governor in Council regulations so that the Cabinet can decide exactly what they will mean.

I am sure that British Columbians assume that they will be directly involved in the panels and boards that will be set up, particularly those concerning environmental matters. I am sure that the Indian, Inuit and Dene people north of sixty, as well as Yukoners and those who live in the Northwest Territories believe they will be involved in these panels and boards. I am sure that Canadians from Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec believe that the new Conservative Government will involve them in these issues.

However, let us look at Clauses 75 to 83 with regard to membership on the environmental studies management board. That membership is restricted to employees in the Public Service of Canada. The same bureaucrats who will be making the regulations that do not appear in Bill C-92 for our consideration will sit on the board to interpret what other studies should be funded or considered. The tooth fairy has truly landed for the oil companies. Not only do they get everything they want in Bill C-92 because the Government discarded everything they did not like in Bill C-48, but everything that the Government and the oil companies are afraid to tell the Canadian public will be produced in regulations later on. The same bureaucrats, under the same government administration and listening to the same corporate boardrooms will make the decision as to what happens. The Conservatives who campaigned on open Government are closing the doors even faster than their Liberal pals ever did on Bill C-48 and other legislation. It is enough to make one want to throw up. I suppose it is still parliamentary to use the word "crap" to describe this and, as a westerner, that is the message I will deliver far and wide.

Anyone who wants to be thoroughly nauseated should read Bill C-92. It is so full of regulatory loopholes that it would make one dizzy.

Let me move on to look at what happened with the Beaufort panel. Northerners were encouraged to participate in this hearing. They came from communities far and wide to express their concerns about the environment, land use, employment and their involvement in businesses associated with the oil patch. They were interested in getting a heritage fund and participating as provincial members in Canada's Confederation. The Conservatives, in the same fashion as the Socreds or the Liberals, set up these panels and invited people to become involved. These ordinary citizens, whether they were local dry-cleaners or trappers, used all their energy, working on their own time, to appear before the panel and make their views known. However, after all of that energy, has been expanded, as happens every time, the report is published and then sealed away in a secret area in Ottawa where these kinds of studies are tabled and kept in perpetuity.

Many northerners hoped that at least some parts of the evidence brought before the Beaufort panel would ultimately find its way into legislation. However, with three Tories representing the North, there was not a peep, a word or a ray of light relating to the Yukon becoming a province, the Northwest Territories being divided into two provinces or there being sovereignty for northerners, particularly the Inuit, and Indian and Dene people.

Let us examine what happened in British Columbia. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) just tabled a report on the West Coast offshore. All Members know that Petro-Canada promptly withdrew from those hearings when it realized that the amount of accurate scientific information it had on drilling in areas such as the offshore of the West Coast was totally inadequate. However, Chevron continued to participate in the hearings and dilly-dallied along.

The information contained in Chevron's environmental assessment was preposterous. One piece of evidence that was tendered to the offshore panel comes to mind when I see the kind of jurisdictional grab that the Minister is interested in taking in this legislation. The evidence that was tendered originally to the offshore panel indicated that drilling would be safe in the Hecate Strait because it was protected from the open Pacific by the Queen Charlotte Islands. Obviously, someone took their pudgy finger and pointed at the map and saw that there were some islands and only 70 miles of water, which would make the Hecate Strait the same as a lake.

The fact is that drilling has taken place in the Hecate Strait and waves close to 100 feet high were breaking over the deck of the boat that was trying to drill at Cape St. James. There was a 20 foot chop on top of the waves that were breaking over the top of the boat. Members opposite cannot believe that but they probably believe the evidence of the oil companies that the Hecate Strait is flat, calm.

This legislation is unacceptable. The same Tories who used to accuse the Liberals of taking a grab from the public of Canada are doing the same thing, along with their friends south of the border and the oil companies in Canada.

The Conservatives said that the 25 per cent back-in was a preposterous rip-off. They should consider how almost every other state in the world protects the public interest and not always the interest of the oil companies. We should protect the public interest to make sure that all Canadians, young and old, whether from the East, the West, or the North, get a fair rate of return from an energy source that we all own.

• (1640)

The Conservatives seem to forget that we all own the gas and oil. Whether it is on land or offshore it belongs to all of us and we deserve a fair rate of return from it. This Bill strays very far from that, and I condemn most strongly its inability to understand the importance of environmental concerns. The board will be composed of bureaucrats, all appointed from the Public Service, with perhaps a few members from the provinces. There will be no opportunity for native people to be involved, nor for environmental groups. There will be no opportunities for the fishermen of Prince Rupert. There will be no opportunity for any of those groups which have a lifelong abiding interest in what happens to the environment. If the fish go, they have no livelihood. If the kelp or the shellfish go, they have no livelihood. Entire communities can vanish, and all of the effort put into the panel hearings in British Columbia and in the Beaufort in the North has come to nil. Bill C-92 is a disaster for the average Canadian. It is a Mac truck tooth fairy dream.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) for the usual way in which he lays it out as it is.

Mr. Fulton: Objective and scientific.

Mr. Waddell: Objective and scientific as well. There was one small inaccuracy and that is when the Hon. Member referred to me as having raised the matter of native rights. I believe it was the Hon. Member for Kenora—Rainy River (Mr. Parry). Apropos of that, since the Hon. Member did deal in his speech with aboriginal rights and with environmental matters in some depth—which I have not heard too many other Hon. Members do—I want to ask him about Clause 3, which states:

> Nothing in this Act abrogates or derogates from any aboriginal title, right or claim that pertained to the aboriginal peoples of Canada prior to the coming into force of this Act.

The Hon. Member might think this is a phoney question or I am trying to pull something on him, but if I was going to ask a question, it would be, who is worse as far as aboriginal people are concerned, the federal Conservative Government or Premier Bill Bennett of British Columbia? It is like choosing between being hanged and being drawn and quartered. At least Bill Bennett spells it out that he is against aboriginal rights, refuses to live up to the Constitution of Canada and will not deal fairly with native people. But it is beyond me why the Conservative Government has thrown in Clause 3. Either we are prepared to recognize aboriginal people's rights and are prepared to deal with them or we are not. This clause is like a Bill to expropriate a house. We are told that nothing in the Bill is going to affect our quiet enjoyment of the House, and then the rest of the Bill goes on to say that the House is going to be flattened and all our property is going to be taken away from us.

Could the Hon. Member who represents the Nishga's, the initiators of aboriginal rights, explain to the House and to the public why it is that this is not satisfactory? What do the aboriginal people want when they want their rights respected in a Bill which deals with resources and so much of the territory, especially in the North, to which they lay claim?

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for the question because it really is one of the keys to what is wrong with this legislation because of what is said in Clause 3. It basically maintains the status quo. There have been no serious negotiations with aboriginal people regarding resources in British Columbia or, to a great extent, north of 60. All Clause 3 says is that that is going to continue. One has to look at what has been going on since September 4, 1984, to get an idea of why aborigal peoples are becoming so rapidly disillusioned with the new Government. One must look at the Buffalo Jump, the 1980s Cabinet document which came to light just a year ago, which indicated the desire of the Government to move down the same road which was stopped by the famed Calder case before the Supreme Court of Canada in 1972. What happened there was that the then Liberal Government was proceeding down the road known then, and still known through the White Paper, as the "assimilation model", that was to try to get Indian, Inuit and Dene people from across Canada to move into urban centres and away from their traditional homelands where they had historically lived, not just for centuries but for thousands of years. One must put together the pieces such as the Buffalo Jump of the 1980s, the Nielsen Task Force report on funding to Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the debate going on, at least in the mind of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Crosbie), on the question of extinguishment.

Rather than proceeding as is recommended in the Coolican report, the Minister and the Cabinet seem to be seized with the inability to understand why we cannot simply extinguish aboriginal title and rights. It is something that would take far longer in terms of time than I have available to explain everything which has gone on in terms of the Calder case and the initiatives taken by groups such as the Nishga for more than a century. They have travelled here to this Parliament and to Great Britain and have met with every panel and every forum. They have taken advantage of every legal opportunity, but they are still stonewalled.

Bill C-92 is a challenge to the living title of aboriginal people, particularly from where I come, and I am referring to the Haidas, their claim to title and their sea claims around the Queen Charlotte islands, which is jeopardized by this kind of legislation, which is neither constitutionally nor legally sound for the reasons outlined in this House the debate on the Constitution, and the inclusion therein of the existence and affirmation of aboriginal rights which flow from the title. In terms of the coast and the A-B line debate, there is something very fuzzy in the Bill which I am sure the U.S. State Department is examining now that it has appointed Mr. Derwinski to look at the 141st Meridian in the Beaufort where it leaves lands end between Alaska and Yukon and goes north, the A-B line at the southern extremity of the Alaska Panhandle.

This Bill is very fuzzy. It claims jurisdiction to the Continental Shelf but does not delineate under what precise legal principles we are going to extend our boundary from Cape Muzon to the 200-mile limit nor in terms of the Strait of Juan de Fuca boundary, the 141st Meridian, the eastern perimeters of the Arctic Archipelago and our offshore on the East Coast. This is a Bill which is fraught with difficulties and, as my colleague has said, it shows a lack of understanding of the issues which aboriginal people want to see dealt with in fairness. They want to have negotiations on the sharing of resources because access, control and ownership of resources is what gives us sovereignty, and that is what the aboriginal people are asking for.

Mr. Foster: Mr. Speaker, I have just a short question. I know the Hon. Member is interested in the job side of the whole energy legislation. The Government when elected was determined to create some 100,000 to 300,000 jobs in the energy field, so we were really shocked on March 21 to read in The Globe and Mail that Imperial Oil was set to slash 1,800 jobs because of oil prices and chemical glut cited. I was especially concerned because it was just about this time that Algoma Steel started laying off some 300 or 400 workers at its tube division at Sault Ste. Marie, which is really dependent on the oil industry because the tubes it produces are used in oil and gas exploration and drilling.

There were some comments made by the Parliamentary Secretary, that the worst was over, that oil prices had rallied from $11 to about $17 over the weekend. Yet in The Globe and Mail today, exactly two months after those first indications of lay-offs by Imperial Oil, there is a report that Occidental Petroleum in Los Angeles is cutting 2,000 employees from its payroll in order to reduce its 1986 spending budget. The same article in this morning's Globe and Mail business page indicates that Exxon Corporation of New York, the largest oil company in the United States, shocked Wall Street recently when it offered a voluntary resignation program to 40,000 of its employees, about 27 per cent of its world-wide staff or 59 per cent of its domestic staff.

• (1650)

I would be interested in hearing the comments of the Hon. Member from British Columbia. I know that oil and gas exploration is important there and in the North as well. The Western Accord and the frontier legislation brought in by the Government is really not adequate to deal with the kind of oil price drop which we have seen. One short paragraph about violent fluctuations in oil prices just does not seem to be adequate, and certainly those articles about Imperial Oil and Exxon indicate that there are a lot more people in this industry to be laid off. Certainly that will be harmful not only in B.C. but in the North as well because of the lack of government policy.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Member for the question. I want to make it clear from the outset that what is happening in the oil patch cannot be placed entirely on the back of the new Government. At the same time, the Parliamentary Secretary cannot pop up every time someone speaks to say that the new drilling opportunities that occurred last year were all due to the new Government's policies. He cannot have it both ways. If he is going to take credit, he has to carry some blame.

I think the point made by the Hon. Member who just asked the question is something at which the Government ought to take a close look. Lay-offs in big companies in the oil and gas industry and the chemical industry are tough. In those cases, hundreds and thousands are laid off. However, when a small Canadian producer in northeastern British Columbia, Alberta or Saskatchewan lays off half a dozen employees, the whole company is gone. Then those interests are very quickly picked up by the big players who still have the internal ability to create capital and pick up those operations.

Rather than addressing the serious problems facing all of the companies in the industry, and particularly the Canadian ones, the Government is dreaming and spinning its wheels. It is bringing in tooth-fairy legislation designed for the boardrooms when it should be doing something not only to help consumers but to help small Canadian drillers and operators in the oil patch.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on Bill C-92. First of all, I must say that, once again, the little guy is going to be the loser.

Mr. Speaker, if we look carefully at Bill C-92, we could say this is a typically Tory piece of legislation, because here again, big business—the big oil companies—is going to reap the benefits.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this Bill is to regulate interests in petroleum in relation to frontier lands, and "frontier lands" mean lands that belong to Her Majesty in right of Canada, or in respect of which Her Majesty in right of Canada has the right to dispose of or exploit the natural resources and that are situated in the Yukon Territory, the Northwest Territories or Sable Island, or any other off-shore areas.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk to you about a trip I made a week ago, when I spent a week or so in Canada's North, and I am referring to the Arctic. I must say that this trip made me discover this vast country and its people, and I was very impressed to see the kind of facilities that exist in the North. However, what really struck me during my trip is that in every community there was this almost exclusive dependence on oil for electric power and for heating purposes. In those communities, the people have yet to benefit from the drop in world oil prices, for the simple reason that their oil is shipped in bulk at least one season in advance, and there have been no shipments yet for this year.

Well, they are certainly in for a surprise, because even if they hear about falling oil prices and the fact that there has been a substantial drop, they will soon realize that they will not be able to take advantage of these lower prices. They will certainly have a few questions to ask the Government, such as why they can't benefit from this drop in the price of energy.

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that they need this energy daily and they have to pay for the energy they use.

In the course of our hearings, we met many residents of those vast territories who had some very interesting stories to tell. At one hearing in one particular town, where a Minister of the Government of the Northwest Territories testified—the purpose of our hearings was to examine deregulation of transportation in Canada's North—one question led to another and the subject of energy came up. At this point, a Government Member who was indulging in a bit of partisanship, which I think we can tolerate from time to time, Mr. Speaker—in fact, I do this myself occasionally—this Member asked the Minister whether the National Energy Program had in any way contributed to the development of the Northwest Territories. The Member, who was expecting a negative reply, was of course astonished when the Minister answered that if it had not been for the NEP, our northern regions would certainly not have experienced all the development that has taken place since the program came into effect. This, of course, led the Member who asked the question in the first place to change the subject—

Mr. Boudria: And talk about the weather.

Mr. Robichaud: No, he started talking about a mosquito control program, because it seems that if they could find an effective mosquito control program for the North, a lot more people would go up and visit them, and it would be very good for tourism.

Speaking of tourism, this afternoon the Minister rose in the House and said that Canada was going to have a tremendous tourist season. Bravo! And bravo for the industry, because it has been waiting for this kind of season for a long time.

However, I must say that if we do have a tremendous season, it will certainly not be thanks to the policies of this Government.

Mr. Speaker, you are signalling that my time is almost up. I shall be delighted to get back to this debate later on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

AGRICULTURE

SUGGESTED TABLING OF REPORT ON DROUGHT IN WESTERN CANADA

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved:

That an humble Address be presented to Her Excellency praying that she will cause to be laid before this House a copy of the report presented to the Prime Minister pertaining to the drought in Western Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, last year we know that a very serious drought affected part of our country. Of course its effects were particularly harmful to farmers of Saskatchewan and parts of Alberta. We also know that those farmers were asking for aid from the Government.

I should like to draw to the attention of the House an article which appeared in the December 24, 1985 edition of the Leader-Post entitled "1985 was a killer year for farmers". In part it read:

To say that 1985 was a poor year for most Saskatchewan farmers would be an understatement.

It was the year when the farm economy plunged from the drought induced doldrums of 1984 into depression.

Not only was there another drought in the south, but almost biblical numbers of grasshoppers, weak grain and livestock markets and wet, cold weather at harvest compounded the problem.

Production of everything from wheat to honey was below normal.

Because of the very grave conditions described in that newspaper article, and presumably because of representations made by some Hon. Members of the House, we were led to believe that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) appointed the Hon. Member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson) to prepare a report. We were told that the report would deal with the issue, but we are not quite sure because most Members of the House have never seen it.

My motion reads as follows:

That an humble Address be presented to Her Excellency praying that she will cause to be laid before this House a copy of the report presented to the Prime Minister pertaining to the drought in Western Canada.

Of course I was speaking of the report prepared by the Hon. Member for Assiniboia. We do not know what the Hon. Member recommended in his report, but we know that the Government offerred assistance in the order of somewhere between $5 and $11 per acre for the people of western Canada. We also know that many people had asked for assistance in the order of $40 to $50 per acre.

All Hon. Members on both sides of the House, such as the Hon. Member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers) and others, want to know just what the Hon. Member for Assiniboia recommended to the Prime Minister. I presented my motion asking for Her Excellency to cause this report to be tabled so that we could all share in its contents and find out whether the Prime Minister lived up to the requests of the Hon. Member. We do not know whether the Prime Minister lived up to them. I see a nod on the part of a Conservative Member across the way, indicating that the Prime Minister did exactly what was asked. I hope that this is not the case, because what was provided was insufficient. If the Hon. Member is saying that the Hon. Member for Assiniboia got exactly what he was looking for, I do not think the people of his riding would like it very much. Perhaps we should wait for the Hon. Member to speak in this debate. Perhaps he will seize this occasion and read to us the entire text of the report in the 10 minutes allotted to him. We do not even know whether the report contains one sheet of paper or 45 volumes like the Nielsen Task Force report. We do not know what it looks like. All farmers in western Canada, particularly those in Assiniboia, want to know whether the Hon. Member did his job.

Some Hon. Members: They know he did.

Mr. Gormley: What a joke! How many Grits are there in Assiniboia?

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, the Conservative surfer on this side is asking how many Grits there are in Assiniboia.

Mr. Gormley: You don't even know where Assiniboia is.

Mr. Boudria: What the Hon. Member is telling us is that a Member of the House has no right to ask questions of the Government. The Tory attitude is that members of the Opposition do not have the right to question the Government. It is typical Tory attitude once again displayed before you, Mr. Speaker. I am sure you are insulted by that kind of nonsense. Mr. Speaker, I am sure you hope, as I do, that he will apologize to the House later for being so partisan. I was only asking for a very distinguished Hon. Member of the House to table his report so that we can all view it. Is that abnormal?

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure that if the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria), a self-proclaimed drought expert from the edge of Ottawa, really wants to find out, he will sit down and give the Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister (Mr. Gustafson) a chance to tell his story.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is not a point of order.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, obviously that is not a point of order. It is another abuse of time by a Conservative Member.

It is our duty as opposition Members to ask questions on behalf of Canadians. I do not apologize for representing a riding which has a little more rain than some of the ridings in western Canada. I am very proud of the riding which I represent in the Parliament of our country.

I should also like to refer to an article which appeared in the August 16, 1985 edition of the Star-Phoenix entitled "Tory Drought Aid a Sleazy Operation".

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Boudria: Those are not my words. In case anyone here thinks I may be partisan, if there is such a person, let me read something far more objective by a very distinguished reporter. It indicated that the Saskatchewan Government announced a drought assistance plan on August 9, promising livestock producers in severe drought areas $60 per head for beef, dairy cattle and horses, and $12 for sheep and goats. It also indicated that in moderate areas the payments would be $30 and $6. As the press release indicated, the Saskatchewan Government committed $60 per head. Further on the article indicated that the Hon. Member for Assiniboia was appointed by the Prime Minister to head the drought task force with a mandate to determine how best to assist farmers. That is why we are here today; we are here to determine how those farmers should have been assisted or what is the best way of assisting them today.

Mr. McDermid: We did.

Mr. Boudria: I hear a Conservative Member across the way from the agricultural riding of Brampton saying: "We did".

Mr. McDermid: Brampton—Georgetown has some of the most productive farms in Canada.

Mr. Boudria: How do we know that they did? We want to find out what was in the report. We want to determine whether in fact the Hon. Member for Assiniboia provided a report which fulfilled the needs of the farmers of his community. Deep down inside we think he did just that, and the Prime Minister did not listen to him. That is what I contend. If it is otherwise, let us see the report.

I thank the House for giving me the opportunity to speak on this very important issue.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, indeed it is a pleasure to be given an opportunity to speak and give an account of the actions of the Government with regard to the drought of the past summer. At the outset I want to say that it became evident that for the third year in some areas a drought was inevitable. Immediately upon learning that, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) if he would go to western Canada and look at the situation. The Hon. Minister of Agriculture visited different parts of the serious drought areas both in Saskatchewan and in Manitoba. He observed the dilemma of the drought. He proceeded to take some action. He asked if I would chair the task force on drought, and from that task force we made recommendations to the Government.

• (1710)

I want to say at the offset that no Government and no Prime Minister in the history of the country since the days of John Diefenbaker have taken more interest in agriculture and in the problems farmers face, particularly when it comes to drought, than the Prime Minister and the Government do today and daily.

Mr. Foster: You don't believe this.

Mr. Gustafson: The Prime Minister asked us to report to him, which we did. He has been very sensitive.

Mr. Boudria: Do you phone him in the morning before breakfast?

Mr. Gustafson: The Prime Minister met recently with some 25 farm groups across Canada in Vancouver. I heard farm group after farm group commend the Prime Minister on the actions that he has taken and which the Minister of Agriculture has taken on behalf of agriculture.

What is the situation in the drought area? I have a letter in my office that I would like to show to the Hon. Member who just spoke. It is from one of the most severely stricken drought areas in southern Saskatchewan. The letter commended me personally and the Government for taking the action that was taken.

Let us take a look at the crop insurance and what a farmer would receive in the most severely stricken drought area in southern Saskatchewan or Alberta. Say a farmer was insured for $20 an acre. He received close to $80 an acre for every acre in the drought area that he had seeded. You will say: "Well, the Government had nothing to do with that". Let me tell Hon. Members that the Government contributed $570 million to crop insurance, $350 million attributed to drought and, in addition to that, $150 million that was recommended. The Member is leaving the House. The $150 million was recommended by the task force and paid by the Government.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sure the Hon. Member is well aware of your very distinguished ruling in the past when you have ruled on many occasions that it is out of order to refer to the presence or absence of any Hon. Member. As we know, all Hon. Member are present in the House as we are speaking now.

Mr. McDermid: It is your motion. Stay in the House and listen.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have not heard anyone mention the presence or the absence of a Member. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister (Mr. Gustafson) has the floor.

Mr. Gustafson: The Minister of Agriculture immediately responded.

Mr. Boudria: Is he present in the House? Tell us.

Mr. Gustafson: We had a recommendation that went forward and brought $48 million of relief to the cattle producer, the sheep producer and to the livestock producer across western Canada.

Mr. McDermid: He is leaving the House again.

Mr. Gustafson: I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the recommendations made and the actions fulfilled by the Government, that this Government takes no lessons from the past administration. It was the Leader of the Party to which the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) belongs who told the farmers across Canada, not just the farmers of western Canada, to sell their own grain. Our Prime Minister told Canadian farmers that we will sell their products to the world.

What happened just a few days ago, Mr. Speaker? The Prime Minister of Canada at the Tokyo Summit gave top priority, number one priority, to the pressing needs of agriculture across the nation.

Mr. Boudria: It wasn't even on the agenda.

Mr. Gustafson: The Prime Minister called a meeting of First Ministers in Saskatchewan. He called a meeting of First Ministers in Halifax. What was top priority? It was agriculture, Mr. Speaker. We have seen a Government that has acted. I could read the list.

Mr. Foster: Table the report.

Mr. Gustafson: To the western producers approximately $550 million was allocated in crop insurance; $350 million attributable to drought; $48 million in assistance to western livestock producers; and $552 million was granted under the Western Grain Stabilization Act for the 1984-85 crop year.

Mr. Della Noce: Give us more.

Mr. Gustafson: You may say the former administration brought in that Bill. Let me tell you that this Government had not been elected for many weeks when it brought forward an amendment which allowed for an interim payment under the Western Grain Stabilization Act. Farmers are appreciative of the Government's direction.

I spoke recently to a meeting of farmers in Weyburn, Saskatchewan. It was made up of the Farmer's Union, the Farmer's Survival Association and of people facing problems. We recognize that there are problems. I am not telling you today, Mr. Speaker, that all is roses in the farm community. We know that. We have done a lot as a Government and there is much more to do and this Government will do it.

On this side of the House we have a broad representation of agriculture. I do not know the numbers. We could have 75 Members representing agricultural ridings. I want to say that the agricultural meetings both in this House and in committee, as was the case under the program for drought, are the best attended. Both the Minister of Agriculture and the Prime Minister have listened to recommendations. The farmers' interests are voiced here in this House, and the actions are here to prove it.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise to interrupt this debate between two Montreal Members across the floor.

[Translation]

Excuse me, the hon. Member is not from Montreal, he is from New Brunswick, Mr. Speaker. But in any case—

[English]

I want to say that the most important point about the debate this afternoon is to call upon the Government to make public a report done by the Hon. Member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson). That is the only question. The Member for Assiniboia has failed to answer the question why his report was not made public by his great and esteemed leader. The Member from Assiniboia is a gregarious, happy-go-lucky, good Member of Parliament who understands and knows farming very well.

Mr. Foster: On division.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nystrom: I am sure his report was a lot better than what the farmers of western Canada received in drought assistance. I see him nodding his head in the affirmative.

Mr. Gustafson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just want to clarify that I was nodding very affirmatively that the task force recommendations were followed. The Government did respond affirmatively to the recommendations.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to tell the Hon. Member that that is not a point of order.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, on another supplementary point of order, maybe he could tell us why the task force report was not tabled. What is the Government trying to hide? I have been here a while, Mr. Speaker, and I have seen great Members of Parliament like Ged Baldwin, Walter Baker and others campaign for years for freedom of information in the House. They talked about how secretive those terrible Liberals were. The Hon. Member remembers that. He was voting Liberal in those days. My friend from St. Catharines agrees that they campaigned hard for openness, freedom of information, and for access for the public to what goes on in the Government. In fact, when Joe Clark was Prime Minister of the country he tried to change some of that. He brought in a Bill for more freedom of information. Yet, with the new Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) from Baie Comeau in office it is more of the old Liberal Trudeau-style of government.

• (1720)

Mr. Boudria: Whoa, whoa, whoa.

Mr. Nystrom: Somebody says: "Whoa, whoa, whoa". I ask you, what is the difference? They are probably even worse. At least the Liberals did not promise freedom of information and more openness in government. The Conservative Party promised that. I am sure that Ged Baldwin, a very distinguished member of the Conservative Party, as he watches this place now, must be upset to see that his Party will not even make public a report made by the very distinguished Member for Assiniboia. The people of the country have a right to know. They have spent thousands and thousands of dollars helping the Member for Assiniboia prepare that report. I think they have a right to know what is in it. If they do not have the right to know what is in that report, why did the Party across the way campaign so hard for openness and freedom of information? It is no wonder, when the Government breaks promise after promise, that it is falling faster in the polls than any Government in this country has fallen since the Gallup poll first started many years ago.

Mr. Towers: You went down four points yourself in the last poll. Don't talk about polls.

Mr. Nystrom: The last poll issued on the weekend showed that the New Democratic Party is at 24 per cent, which is up 5 per cent from the last election campaign. The Conservative Party is at 38 per cent, which is down 12 from the last election campaign. I do not mind that kind of mathematics. Unfortunately, the Liberal Party is going up as well.

Mr. Foster: What do you mean by "unfortunately"?

Mr. Nystrom: One reason for this shift away from the Government is that it is breaking its promises. When you stand for something in opposition you should make sure to bring it in once you are in government. I am really surprised that an Hon. Member like the Member for Assiniboia, who is a progressive red Tory, a positive Tory, would stand for the Prime Minister of the country not making his report public when he stood for freedom of information in opposition. I am really surprised. I know that he must be embarrassed by this kind of secrecy by the boy from Baie Comeau who seems to be so afraid of making things public. It is time for members of the Conservative Party from Saskatchewan to get up on their hind legs and show some leadership and courage—

Mr. Gormley: We have been for years.

Mr. Nystrom: —and insist that this report be made public. My friend, the Member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake (Mr. Gormley), is an outspoken man. Perhaps he will get up in a few minutes and insist that this report be made public. His constituents have the right to know what is in that report. His constituents have a right to know whether or not the Prime Minister followed the advice of the Member for Assiniboia. Perhaps I am defending the Member for Assiniboia a little too much, but I think that he, too, after doing the work, has the right to have his report made public. That is all we are asking for in the House today. That is not too radical.

I understand that the Member for Assiniboia made a number of recommendations in his report which were not listened to, but I do not know that. I do know that about $150 million was or is being made available to farmers through drought assistance. About one-half of that, approximately $70 million, is in the Province of Saskatchewan. In the fall there was an initial payment of $39.8 million. A second payment of $29.9 million is now being made.

In my province approximately 40 per cent of the wheat-growing area is designated as being able to benefit from this special drought assistance. There is an argument that that is not enough, that the Government was too severe. A lot of farmers that had problems with drought are not receiving payments, and other farmers who had drought assistance are receiving payments. My understanding is that the average pay-out per acre is $6.88. If that is not correct, perhaps the Member for Assiniboia can put some facts on the record. The average pay-out per farmer is approximately $3,800.

Another interesting point about this most recent issue in terms of the drought in the grain belt in Saskatchewan and Alberta is that this money is now being sent directly to the farmers. Last summer the money for a livestock payment was sent to the Saskatchewan Government. The Government of Saskatchewan did not give credit to the federal Government or the federal Parliament. This time around I see that the federal Government is a little wiser. It does not trust Grant Devine and is making the pay-out directly to the farmers of Saskatchewan.

I would like to make one or two more points before my time runs out. Tomorrow there will be an article in the Leader Post written by a journalist named John Miner.

Mr. Della Noce: How do you know that?

Mr. Nystrom: I have very good sources. He is the agricultural reporter for the Regina Leader Post, a very, very good reporter. John Miner has tried, through the access to information laws of the country, to get a copy of the report of the Member for Assiniboia. He has tried to get other documents relating to drought relief in Saskatchewan and Alberta. He has been denied a copy of that report under the access to information laws of the country.

Tory times are secretive times, Mr. Speaker. Tory times are tough times. The agricultural reporter for the Regina Leader Post, the biggest daily in rural Canada, is being denied access to this report which affects the livelihoods of all kinds of people.

Some 12,000 farmers have appealed that they were not fairly treated by the federal Government with regard to drought assistance. Twelve thousand farmers have said that they were denied coverage because they are not in the drought area and that they did not receive a large enough pay-out for the losses they suffered due to drought. It is almost unheard of for 12,000 farmers to appeal. Yet the Government across the way denies the farmers of Canada the information in the report of the Member for Assiniboia. It denies the farmers of Canada their basic and fundamental democratic right—freedom to information. They have paid for that report. They have spent their hard-earned tax money which the Government took from their pockets, and now the Government is not even letting them see a copy of the report.

To top it off, so far this afternoon Conservative Members have not risen in this House to say why they have denied that right to the farmers of western Canada. Why do they not listen to farmers? Why do they not give the farmers access to their own report? Why do they not in government stand for what they stood for in opposition? We need freedom of information in this House. The public has the right to know. They paid the bill and they have a right to have a copy of that report. This strikes me as being very, very strange. Perhaps there are recommendations in that report which the Prime Minister turned down and now the Government is embarrassed to release it publicly.

There are all kinds of things we could talk about, Mr. Speaker, but the basic principle of the debate today is freedom of information and access to information. The Conservative Party promised this. Walter Baker, Ged Baldwin, and the Member who is now the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) campaigned on this, but the new boys who took over are continuing in the old Liberal tradition of secrecy. Everything is in a tiny, isolated place in the Prime Minister's office and no one else has the right to know. That is not good enough. It is about time that Conservative Members in the House rebelled, followed their convictions, and insisted that this report be made public.

Mr. John Gormley (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on the motion of the Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria). The Member made some very interesting points in his earlier remarks. The dialogue of the long-time Member for Yorkton—Melville (Mr. Nystrom) will shed some interesting light on the way in which the people of Saskatchewan view their Government and the way in which the Government views the people of Saskatchewan.

I would like to begin with the intent of this motion. Obviously it is politically motivated in the crassest sense.

Mr. Boudria: There is no room for politics in the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Gormley: I use the words "politically motivated" because it is really twofold. First, it is inspired by mischief. If this Member really believes that what the Government has done for my home province of Saskatchewan and all of western Canada was insufficient, perhaps he would be brave enough and man enough to stand and say, first, that he believes it is insufficient, and second, with clearly articulated ideas, why he believes it is insufficient. Instead, he tries to summon forth certain papers on a technical motion. Obviously we see this for the crass political mischief it is.

• (1730)

The Hon. Member goes back many years in provincial politics. He is one of those Members who is called Dave Peterson's revenge. He fled the Ontario provincial scene for federal politics just in time. In any event, as a long-time MPP he knows that when a Prime Minister and his Cabinet ask for information and charge a senior Member of Parliament with the responsibility of obtaining that information, he obviously wants to be able to act on the information and get the job done for Saskatchewan farmers, indeed all farmers across Canada. When the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell asks "Did he live up to the report of his task force?" The answer is that obviously he did. The Hon. Member overlooks the political process by saying that this is somehow a secret.

I come from Saskatchewan, as does the Hon. Member for Yorkton—Melville. However, the person speaking on behalf of Saskatchewan farmers for the Liberals comes from the outskirts of Ottawa. He represents the same Party that during the 1984 election made all sorts of campaign promises regarding agriculture. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Turner) and others went into the flood of areas of Saskatchewan, which are much closer to my home, and made all sorts of promises unbelievably stretching credibility. If you look at the number of votes given to the Liberal candidate in that area, you will know just how we in Saskatchewan regard the Liberal Party and how credible anything his Party says about agriculture in Saskatchewan really is.

The Hon. Member for Yorkton—Melville talked about the number of farmers who feel aggrieved. Obviously there will be people who say their areas should have been covered. Their area should have had more consideration. Obviously the Member is well aware, and equally obviously he would not point it out because he is a Member of the NDP, that the Minister announced the establishment of a review board with a mandate to hear from producers in areas in which feel they should be included. I thought his figures were interesting. He mentioned 12,000 farmers. I am not sure that this is an accurate figure I thought it was interesting because for years I saw 70,000 Saskatchewan farmers concerned about every single act of omission on the part of a Liberal federal Government. We would not have had farmers with these kinds of problems if we had had a Government in Ottawa that cared or even knew the faintest thing about Saskatchewan agriculture.

I do not want to get overly political, Mr. Speaker. You know it is not my nature to be political in this Chamber.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gormley: I just want it on the record that when I hear a Liberal talking about Saskatchewan farmers I really must express my outrage. The Liberal Government in Ottawa for all these years did precious little, arguably nothing, to help the Saskatchewan farmer.

In appointing his Parliamentary Secretary as the individual responsible for formulating a response to the drought, I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) showed remarkable insight. He showed it in his faith in the system and in having a Member of Parliament head the task force. He also showed his insight by appointing a Member who knows what it is like firsthand. I think the Prime Minister showed a refreshingly clear and different way of addressing the problem.

Mr. Rossi: Ask him why he does not table the report.

Mr. Gormley: That Member has given us a three-phase approach to the drought problem. The first phase, which was quickly acted upon, dealt with livestock drought assistance. This program earmarked some $48 million—

Mr. Nystrom: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House is whether or not this report should be made public. Should the Member who is speaking now not be talking to the motion, which is whether or not this document should be made public?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sure the Hon. Member will speak to the motion.

Mr. Gormley: Hearing a New Democrat invoke the rule of relevance stretches credibility again. I am talking about drought assistance, and particularly why the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, the great Saskatchewan agronomist, desires these documents. If he looks at the result of the recommendations to the Prime Minister he will see that the prairie farmer, the Saskatchewan farmer in particular, is being dealt with in a compassionate, understanding and realistic way. We had the Livestock Drought Assistance Program involving $48 million. This was the first program addressed in the recommendation of the task force to the Prime Minister. Phase 2 involved $150 million under the Crop Disaster Assistance Program. The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell did not say that today, May 20, 1986, the final portion of that $150 million is going to be paid out to farmers, amounting to some $64 million. I did not hear that from the Hon. Member.

The third phase involved a long-term method of dealing effectively with drought and, for that matter, all other natural disasters. Just two weeks ago the Provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, along with the federal Government, made the announcement that there would be a means to deal in the long term with natural disasters such as drought in the farm economy. When this report was made to the Prime Minister we had to take into account what the Province of Saskatchewan was doing. That was a hard act to follow. The Province of Saskatchewan allowed a $125 per head cash advance of livestock. It had a $60 a head grant for livestock producers in severe drought areas. It had a $25 per cultivated acre loan for all Saskatchewan farmers. There was a gas tax rebate when the province, as everyone knows, with a Conservative Government, eliminated the gas tax. Grant Devine is a farmer. Unlike any other Premier in Canada, I think he has a sensitivity to farmers and this was a difficult act to follow. However, the Hon. Member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson) advised the Prime Minister on three recommendations which the Prime Minister followed, and these are accommodating the concerns of Saskatchewan farmers.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) has put before the House an excellent motion calling on the Government to table the report of the Hon. Member for Assiniboia which he prepared for the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) I have had an opportunity to visit that province and others in the West and people there really want to see the report. They want to see it because there were, as the Hon. Member mentioned, reports in the papers, such as The Star-Phoenix of August 16, 1985, which said, "Tory Drought Aid a Sleazy Operation". I knew that could not apply to the Hon. Member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson). I have known him for years and I know that he was one of the 19 people who supported the Prime Minister in the leadership race. I knew that had nothing to do with his being appointed Parliamentary Secretary. I knew it was his qualities of leadership that counted. That is why I was very upset when I read this article by Nancy Russell in the Star-Phoenix. It said the following:

• (1740)

(PC-MP Assiniboia) was appointed by Prime Minister Brian Mulroney to head the drought task force, with a mandate of determining how best to assist farmers.

While it has been obvious from his lack of answers in the last few days that Gustafson has little clout in Ottawa, it was clear the federal Government planned to do something for farmers.

Then it goes on to say the following:

Agriculture Minister—put on quite a show Wednesday. The media went wild reporting on this $30 per head, $48 million lifesaver, of which Saskatchewan will receive $16 million. Wise took credit for saving farmers from extinction while his provincial counterpart welcomed the news.

Wise and Ottawa haven't done a thing to improve upon what farmers have already been guaranteed by the province, while Hepworth and Saskatchewan have done half of what they said they would do. The $30 per head from Ottawa is going into the province's pocket, while the $60 per head from Saskatchewan is now only $30.

I think it is because of that, sort of a double shuffle, that the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell wanted to give the Hon. Member for Assiniboia a chance to vindicate himself and to lay this on the table as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Prime Minister of Canada.

A lot of people say very disparaging things about the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Nielsen). They call him things like Velcro Lips. Can you imagine the Hon. Member for Assiniboia being called Velcro Lips or Velcro Products? They do not want to use terms like that against him.

I would really hope that the Hon. Member would table this document, because that is what is before the House today. The Hon. Member for Yorkton—Melville (Mr. Nystrom) has outlined how the Member, when he was in the opposition, was a stalwart advocate of freedom of information, lay it all on the table. When the Prime Minister, as the Leader of the Opposition, spoke in Kingston, he said that he would have an open Government. Documents of this nature would be laid on the table automatically. The Member for Assiniboia cheered because he was supporting him in the leadership, and that was the kind of leader he wanted to go forward with. He knew that if he supported him and nominated him at the leadership convention, he would be chosen Parliamentary Secretary, and sure enough, he was. There was some discussion as to why he was chosen.

Every reputable farm organization, certainly the Saskatchewan pool and all of the big organizations, were recommending something like $45 or $50 an acre. We all knew on this side that the Hon. Member for Assiniboia would never make a recommendation as low as $5 or $10 per acre.

The Government was not going to be paying out all of its money that it is required to pay under the Western Transportation Act, the $658 million, so we thought that since they were not paying out all of that money under the Transportation Act they would probably come clean and make a larger amount available.

The Government was not going to make applications available until January, and they were only going to pay out $95 million in the first three or four months of 1986, and they were not going to pay the rest of it until the next fiscal year. We knew he would never recommend anything as low as $5 or $11 an acre.

At the time of this drought, the worst in western Canada certainly in a generation, the farmers of western Canada were facing the wrath of that boiling hot sun day after day in their fields and their crops were withering up. Families in Saskatchewan were applying for social assistance from their welfare agencies.

The Government was imposing a 2-cents-a-litre harvest tax for every litre of gasoline or diesel fuel that they bought. The Hon. Member knew that the Government was welching on a promise with regard to fuel tax, and so obviously he would have recommended more than that.

I certainly hope the Hon. Member, later on today, will come clean and announce that. I know he is very embarrassed. I am not sure that he attended the economic summit in Washington on March 18 and 19. Normally, I believe, he travels with the Prime Minister on events like that. I know he had nothing to do with the printing of this document, the background papers, because in that document there is nary a mention of the United States farm Bill, a farm Bill that will reduce the net farm income of western farmers by at least 30 per cent right across the board. All farmers in the country will see their farm incomes drop by an average of 20 per cent, and nary a word is there in this document mentioning the United States Farm Bill, which is going to have a great impact.

This document outlines all of the problems which Canada and the United States have, such as softwood lumber, fish countervail, steel, Section 21, asbestos, shingles and shakes, electric razors, castings, forklift arms, and all of those things—there is nary a word.

The Prime Minister went to Washington to deal with the difficult problems facing Canada and the United States, and nary a word is there about the United States farm Bill, which is having a devastating impact.

Before he went to Japan the Prime Minister discovered that there was a farm problem. He made a great flourish here in Ottawa, flew over the Prairies, waved as he went by, but did not leave much money, and landed in Vancouver to open Expo before going on to the summit.

Finally he made the announcement that stopped the larceny which he started last September of 2.5 cents a litre on gasoline. He picked up another half a cent in January in sales tax. He stopped that larceny, and we are thankful for that. We wish he would make that retroactive so that while the farmers are suffering the worst drought in history—the Hon. Member for Assiniboia was preparing this report—he would not actually be able to say that in the future he did not impose that 2.5 cents per litre.

The rest of the announcement was for the consumers to pay for, if the Government decides to do that, only increasing the range, and the feed freight rate freezing, of course, was strictly a charade, a rejuggling of the figures of the volume of grain to be shipped. The question about the price range is something the Government still has to decide about in the future.

The Parliamentary Secretary has told us about how the Government has not welched on paying crop insurance. They have not welched on the western grain stabilization payments, and we are pleased about that. Those are programs for which the farmers pay a premium and surely they are entitled to a benefit if they have a loss, and the Government has done that.

Just to keep the reputation of the Hon. Member for Assiniboia in-tact, I think it is essential that he come forward to prove to the farmers of his constituency that he is not Velcro Lips, he is a person who wants to put everything on the table. I hope he will table this report before six o'clock this afternoon.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Blais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first I would point out that if there was applause on the Government side it did not come from Government Members. Simply to complete what my colleague from Algoma (Mr. Foster) has just said—and I am proud to take part in the debate this evening—I would say that as usual the Hon. Member for Algoma displayed his selective memory. He talked about cut-backs and taxes on gas, but he forgot the billions of dollars his own Party cost our agricultural producers for years on end with their interest rates ranging between 18 and 20 per cent. Ours have been outstanding achievements under current economic conditions. I think my colleague should refresh his memory.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Algoma and the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) are again asking for the tabling of the report, but I have no idea how they developed such a habit. Probably during the twenty dark years they made us live through, when they got used to produce reports on just about anything. What really matters to Canadian agricultural producers, Mr. Speaker? Not reports, but facts, data, results. And results we have produced, millions of dollars, very quickly.

My colleague from Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson) was given specific responsibilities and looked after the matter with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney). Decisions were made immediately: $150 million. Payments for the remaining $64 million were announced today. Decisions have been made very rapidly. Reports are not important. What matters is results.

Since it is an Ontario Member who raised this issue, it must be some kind of an obligation because the Liberal Party has never been a truly national Party, and they are not about to improve their performance either. The Progressive Conservative Party which now forms the Government is indeed a truly national Party. This is precisely what makes us different from our colleagues because this Government is taking positions which farmers and Canadians generally can accept as being fair and reasonable.

Naturally, our Liberal friends cannot understand because theirs is a regional party. They have Members in a couple of provinces and a few others here and there in Canada in regions like that of my Hon. friend for Yorkton—Melville (Mr. Nystrom), but of course, in the case of the New Democratic Party, its members can promise anything. They may have gone up in the polls, but they always promise what everyone wants. It is easy for them because they know that they will never form a Government. There is no danger of that.

Mr. Speaker, of course, I sympathize with the Opposition; I also sympathize with my friend for Algoma. It is not easy to be agriculture critic for the Official Opposition. Is is very difficult in view of what we have done for agriculture in the last 18 months. I would not want to change places with him. It is very difficult for him to rise today and try to find fault with the policy of this Government on agriculture. It is a very difficult thing to do. The same goes for his assistant from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, who cannot find much to say either.

We just have to look at the figures, at the hundreds of millions of dollars allocated following the drought in Western Canada, we have only to think about the 40,000 farm producers in British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan who benefited directly from the action taken, we have only to think about the $700 billion in crop insurance payments made to over 80,000 farm producers. This money was spent for Canadian agriculture. It adds up to nearly $4 billion in 18 months. That is action.

What they would like, what they have been used to, what they have shown us for 20 years, is more reports. Let us write reports and shelve them. Let us appoint others to write more. Let us ask our friends to write some reports. Then, let us take these reports and shelve them. That is all we want. That is the only important thing. Positive results are not important. But all that has changed. For our part, we want positive results, that is fewer reports and more money spent directly for the producers and put directly into the economy. That is the policy of our Government, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, if we look at the results, we find that there has been consultation between the Federal Government and the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. That is practical action and that is important.

I would still have a lot to say, Mr. Speaker, but I shall leave the floor to my colleague—

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, we have two or three minutes left. Is the Hon. Member willing to answer a question?

• (1750)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I gather that the Hon. Member is asking for unanimous consent?

[Translation]

The Hon. Member requests the unanimous consent of the House to put a question to the Member. Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No. Very well. The Hon. Member for Bellechasse (Mr. Blais) may continue his speech.

An Hon. Member: The Hon. Member may continue.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Could the Hon. Member for Bellechasse continue his speech?

Mr. Blais: Yes, Mr. Speaker, of course, but I was waiting for my hon. friend from Yorkton—Melville (Mr. Nystrom) to sit down. After all, he has 18 years' experience in the House, and I am very inexperienced at this sort of thing—

Mr. Nystrom: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Blais: If it's a point of order, I will wait—

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, this is a point of order.

Do we have the unanimous consent of the House to ask a question?

Some Hon. Members: No!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Unanimous consent has not been given, and we shall therefore resume debate with the Hon. Member for Bellechasse (Mr. Blais).

An Hon. Member: Only two minutes left—

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, for the sake of courtesy, I mentioned before that . . . Probably my hon. friend from Yorkton—Melville (Mr. Nystrom) was not listening . . . I had a lot to say but had some other colleagues who were anxious to add a few comments. I think my hon. friend from Swift Current—Maple Creek (Mr. Wilson) will take over now, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague who was kind enough to cede me the remaining bit of time. I am somewhat disappointed that so little time remains because I represent a riding—Swift Current—Maple Creek in the southwestern corner of Saskatchewan—that I believe has suffered more than any other in the past several years owing to drought, grasshoppers, high winds and so on. It is a riding with some 55,000 residents, most of whom either farm or certainly owe their living directly to agriculture. Consequently, the topic before us is of extreme importance.

I listened with some dismay earlier to my hon. friend, the Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), the opposition agriculture critic, with whom I have had the opportunity to travel across the country recently on the domestic wheat price committee. That is another agricultural initiative put forward by the Government which impacts very heavily on grain farmers in this country.

Mr. Boudria: Not true. It is an initiative by the Member for Swift Current—Maple Creek (Mr. Wilson). Don't let the Tory Government take credit for that.

Mr. Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek): I think the Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) is complimenting the Government on that initiative, and I certainly thank him for it.

We are talking about a report, but I will suggest that action speaks louder than words. What we have put forward as a Government is action upon action upon action.

I ask the Hon. Member for Yorkton—Melville (Mr. Nystrom) what he considers to be so secretive about the Western Grain Stabilization Plan and the contribution that the Government has made to assist western agriculture to the tune of some $580 million recently and of over $500 million last year. Is that a secret?

Let us talk about the contributions to federal-provincial crop insurance programs. According to Saskatchewan Wheat Pool figures, something in excess of $300 million each year is put into that program by the federal Government. There is the drought relief programs announced last year, with $48 million toward livestock relief. There is $150 million toward crop disaster relief. I suggest that this is a direct result of the outstanding efforts of my colleague, the Hon. Member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gustafson).

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member. The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m., at which time the House will proceed to the question of the forest fire situation in Atlantic Canada.

At 6.02 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 29

FORESTRY

FOREST FIRES IN ATLANTIC CANADA

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Leave has been granted to the Hon. Member for Fundy—Royal (Mr. Corbett) to move the adjournment of the House pursuant to Standing Order 29 for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the forest fire situation in Atlantic Canada.

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal) moved:

That this House do now adjourn.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to raise in the House, under Standing Order 29, the provision which allows for an emergency debate, a situation of very critical importance to the Atlantic regions of Canada. The matter I am raising is in reference to the tremendous blazes which have enveloped Atlantic Canada, particularly the provinces of New Brunswick and Newfoundland, over the past five or six days. As you are well aware, Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 29, the subject matter of an emergency debate must be within the administrative competence of the Government and, in my considered opinion, it is within the administrative competence of the Government to deal with the issue directly forthwith, and if not that, to at least consider the matter with due haste.

The subject matter of the debate centres on the disastrous situation which has developed in Atlantic Canada during the past week as a result of major forest fires. The fires have been particularly devastating in New Brunswick and in Newfoundland, provinces which are extremely dependent upon the forest industry for their well being, the employment of their people and the maintenance of their economy. Because of my direct knowledge of the situation in New Brunswick, I ask that you give me your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, if I tend to deal with the situation in New Brunswick in greater detail than the situations in other parts of the region. This does not diminish the importance of the forest industry to all of Atlantic Canada.

To date it is estimated that some 130,000 acres of prime woodland have been burned over and destroyed in New Brunswick alone. This is prime woodland and, although all fires at this moment, to the best of our knowledge, are under control, there are still a number of fires which continue to rage. I would like to take you back a little in history, Mr. Speaker, and inform you that the last great fire New Brunswick experienced was in 1944 at which time approximately 170,000 acres burned. In 1934, ten years previous to that, a major fire destroyed something in the vicinity of 184,000 acres. As a result of those fires, great economic difficulties were imposed on the economy of New Brunswick. Although both of those fires created economic difficulty which had an effect nationally, they did happen in times when the region was economically much less dependent on the national economy than it is today.

I think it is important that I put the matter in perspective. The annual harvest in New Brunswick is approximately 170,000 acres. It is now likely that more than 170,000 acres will be destroyed in the fires which have already consumed a substantial portion of prime forest land in the province. This will drastically affect the economy of the province. The fires which have been burning in the rest of Atlantic Canada, particularly those fires in Newfoundland—Newfoundland as we are aware, depends to a subtantial degree upon the forest industry for its economy—as well as the fires in Prince Edward Island and to a lesser degree in Nova Scotia, will have a direct impact not only on Atlantic Canada but on the entire country as a whole. The forest industry is one of the country's most significant economic bases.

I think it is important at this time to point out that the Government has created a new Ministry of State for Forestry, recognizing the contribution of the forest industry to this nation's economy. I am sure you are aware, Mr. Speaker, that it is the largest employer of people in the country. One out of every seven jobs in the Province of New Brunswick, for instance, is directly attributable to the forest industry. One out of every 10 jobs in the nation as a whole is attributed to the forest industry. Our national export of forest products earned more in foreign exchange earnings than oil, minerals, fish and agricultural exports combined. This is a tremendously valuable asset. It is a renewable resource which has signficant impact on all regions of the country, particularly on Atlantic Canada.

The creation of the new Ministry of State for Forestry by the present Government has been a breath of fresh air to an area which is strongly dependent on the forest sector economically and has provided Atlantic Canadians with a new hope of recognition for this particular sector. Atlantic Canadians feel that the establishment of the new Department of Forestry will provide them with a renewed status in Confederation. The tragedy of the situation is that this is now very seriously threatened.

The impact of the forestry sector in this nation is felt in every Canadian home. I want to re-emphasize that the forest industry is our greatest foreign exchange earner and is one of the largest purchasers of manufactured goods in Canada. I can assure Hon. Members that with the current very critical situation economically in Atlantic Canada, and with the plight of the unemployed youth in that region, this tragedy is something which is going to be widely felt in the area.

The hope of a new attitude on the part of the people of the area toward this most valued industry is the hope of thousands of young people in Atlantic Canada. I think it is necessary to point out that there are few job-creation programs that are as valuable or as cost efficient as those that hire young people to plant and manage this nation's forests.

Canada is an exporting nation. With the renewed commitment to an enhanced trade agreement with our neighbours to the south, this has become even more predominant and important. Atlantic Canadians look forward with enthusiasm to the opportunities that enhanced trade would provide us as a natural north-south trading partner. Our geographic proximity to the New England states with its vast market of 48 million people was and continues to be of tremendously exciting potential. Obviously our natural forest products upon which we are so dependent would play a major role in that trade.

In the over-all context, it was not a tremendous amount of acreage that was affected. It probably amounts to something like less than 4 per cent of the acreage in New Brunswick and significantly less than that throughout the Atlantic provinces. Nevertheless, we must recognize that any imbalance in the delicate economic situation that exists in Atlantic Canada and the individual Atlantic provinces will have a devastating affect on the lives of the people. After all, we as a Government are concerned about the welfare and livelihoods of the people we represent.

I would suggest that those of us who have not had an opportunity to visit those areas cannot begin to imagine the devastation that exists. I had the opportunity to visit there. I live in proximity to one of the major fires in the Camp Gagetown area, something about which I will speak in a few moments. It really shocks the soul, to say the least, to drive through an area that the week before was a beautiful, green area with marvellous foilage, and see it turned into something reminiscent of Dante's Inferno. It is so very shocking to see.

In the few brief moments I have, I would like to show how integral the forest industry in Atlantic Canada can be to the economy of the nation as a whole. As I have stated, and it is important that we recognize the significance of this to Atlantic Canadians, Canada's forest industry across the nation from the Pacific to the Atlantic is a multimillion-dollar concern. It is the single largest industry in New Brunswick and is obviously essential to the economies of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Quebec, northern Ontario and the northern parts of the prairie provinces.

The forestry sector is the single largest employer in Canada. It employs 450,000 employees directly and indirectly with annual wages and salaries that total in excess of some $10 billion. It is our biggest foreign exchange earner. A serious setback such as the one we have experienced in Atlantic Canada will be very difficult for us as a nation and a Government to address. It provides unimagined setbacks to our economic renewal. The dollar value of this setback is, at this particular stage, very difficult to calculate, but the one thing of which we are sure is that the economic impact will be significant.

The New Brunswick forest industry accounts for some 16,000 jobs directly and another 20,000 jobs indirectly. As I have mentioned, that is equal to one in seven jobs in the Province of New Brunswick. The industry is worth in excess of $1 billion to the province.

I feel that the losses we have incurred should be brought into perspective with reference to the recognition of how long it takes a forest to grow. I mentioned two major forest fires which occurred previously. One of the tragedies of this situation is that the forests that were devastated in 1934 and 1944 were just about to come into production. Part of those lands have again been burned.

It would be remiss of me not to mention the very substantial efforts of the thousands of people and the volunteer fire departments across Atlantic Canada which have assisted in extinguishing these blazes. They have risked their lives this past weekend. In New Brunswick alone, hundreds of people reacted to this very serious and risky situation without thought to their own personal safety in order to save homes, property and, no doubt, even lives.

As I mentioned before, I have been there. I have seen it; I was in the middle of it. I was in a community where an evacuation order had been put in place. In the Gagetown area from where I come, it has been recognized by the military that that particular fire started as a result of live shelling. This afternoon I called upon the Government to accept its responsibility and ensure that the residents of that area, some of whom lost homes or hundreds of acres of woodland, are adequately and fairly compensated.

I appreciated the response of the Associate Minister of Defence (Mr. Andre), although I was somewhat concerned by his remarks to the effect that: "if the Government accepts responsibility for that". There has been a statement by Department of National Defence personnel indicating that indeed the military was responsible for starting those fires. How this will be addressed over the coming days and weeks remains to be seen. However, I hope that the Government will act with compassion and respond positively to the concerns of these people due to the utter devastation they are personally experiencing.

Again, I reiterate that this situation is a very difficult thing for us to imagine. If it were not for the volunteer fire departments, 18 of which came from my constituency and surrounding areas, which responded to that fire in the Gagetown region, it is difficult to imagine the sort of destruction and havoc that would have been wreaked upon the area. When I drove through the area I saw an A-frame house in the middle of the woods, obviously placed there because of the solitude and tranquility of its location, and this house was not touched or scorched by the fire. However, all around it charred trees stood en masse. There are several examples of that sort of thing. It was only due to the heroic efforts of volunteer fire departments that that real property was saved. Unfortunately, that has changed an entire way of life.

I am sure that tonight some people are sitting in their homes amid charred exteriors thinking that they probably would have been a whole lot better off if their homes had gone up in flames to begin with. It is a fact of life, however, that people are prepared to accept what happened. They now expect that the Government will respond in a fair way. I am certain that is the kind of response these people will receive.

The economy of the Atlantic region is delicate at best. A catastrophe of this proportion drastically affects our economic wellbeing. I call upon the federal Government and upon provincial Governments to initiate joint action to put forth programs which help Atlantic Canadians adjust to the very difficult situation they have now experienced and are still experiencing in some parts of Atlantic Canada.

• (2020)

The Government should address the fact that Atlantic Canadians are now faced with additional economic difficulties which they do not need in an area of the country where unemployment is unacceptable at best. I assure the Government that we in Atlantic Canada are not looking for handouts. However, we require policies which will help sustain the Atlantic forestry sector and subsequently the national forestry sector while we have an opportunity to recover from the difficult situation in which we find ourselves. Without Governments at all levels addressing this issue, we will not be able to deal with it on our own accord.

I appreciate the opportunity to bring this matter before the House, and I look forward to the comments of my colleagues from Atlantic Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland—Kent): Mr. Speaker, thank you for this opportunity to take part in this important emergency debate on the forest fires that have ravaged the Atlantic provinces.

First of all, I want to congratulate the Hon. Member for Fundy—Royal (Mr. Corbett) for asking the House to consider his motion to have an emergency debate on the situation in the Atlantic provinces.

I fully support his motion, and I hope that the other Members from New Brunswick and the Atlantic region, and all the Members of this House, will give their support as well.

Mr. Speaker, we obviously have here a very urgent situation that has required and still requires constant co-operation among the various groups involved, to keep the situation from getting worse. Even if the fires have now lost their intensity and the situation seems to be under control, nevertheless, the situation that prevailed during the past week can still be labelled as disastrous.

Mr. Speaker, it is a disaster. In the province of New Brunswick alone, 140,000 acres were destroyed by over 65 forest fires. One hundred and forty thousand acres is 25 times as many fires we had last year. One hundred and forty thousand acres represents almost a year's harvest, the harvest of an entire year. So we can say we have lost the equivalent of all the wood that can be cut in a year, which represents millions and millions of dollars for the economy of the province of New Brunswick, and of course thousands of jobs. I am sure that the fires that raged in Newfoundland were similar in their impact to those in New Brunswick.

Mr. Speaker, this debate is of primary importance for the province of New Brunswick, because the forestry industry is one of the most important, if not the most important industry in that part of the country.

I would like to give a few statistics, as did my hon. friend from Fundy—Royal, to show how important this sector is to us. First of all, 33 out of 67 industrial communities depend on the forestry sector. New Brunswick has the highest percentage of land in forest production of any Canadian province. In fact, the province has 6 million hectares of forest, which represents 58 per cent of the province's total land area. Forty-nine per cent of that are Crown-owned lands, including 2 per cent belonging to the federal Government. Eighteen per cent of forest lands belong to major companies, while private individuals own 33 per cent of the lands, which is quite a lot by any standards. With so much forest lands, Mr. Speaker, you can appreciate that this sector is vital to New Brunswick.

From an economic viewpoint, the total output of the forest industry is 515 million cubic metres: 55 per cent softwood and 35 per cent hardwood. There is no denying that the forest industry ranks first in New Brunswick.

The over-all production gross value is over $1 billion, which is close to 25 per cent of goods produced in the Province of New Brunswick.

In terms of exports, the forest sector accounts for 39 per cent of the province's total export trade. These enlightening statistics give a clearer picture of the devastating impact of these many fires which have damaged a significant part of this natural wealth which is so essential to the economy of my province, an economy that is faltering at times, like that of the three other Atlantic provinces.

As you would know, Mr. Speaker, regional development is not a new problem in Atlantic Canada. Our economy depends heavily on Government assistance. This year, unfortunately, we have had a streak of bad luck, as if we could afford it.

Our unemployment rate is still 15 per cent, and no progress has been made in that respect over the past year. Youth unemployment is even higher than the 15 per cent adult population unemployment. According to the latest figures, about 30 per cent are unemployed. It is totally unacceptable. It is not only forests which have been lost in New Brunswick because of the many forest fires, but also jobs and houses. Families have also been dispersed.

Since the forest industry is so important in New Brunswick, many jobs are directly or indirectly related to it. We can just look at the figures. Forestry alone represents 16,000 jobs. Another 20,000 jobs are indirectly related to this industry. In other words, in New Brunswick, one out of every seven jobs is related to the forest industry. That means that one out of every seven people works in the forest. That is a lot. This industry represents $250 million in wages each year.

This loss, especially in wooded acres, represents the loss of hundreds of jobs, and this is certainly no laughing matter if we look to the future. In view of an unemployment rate much higher than the national average, a rate which is the second highest in Canada, the future looks far from promising. I must admit that there is nothing that would tend to contradict this outlook.

• (2030)

Recently, the federal Government reduced its allocations to employment strategy programs. No funds were allocated for this fiscal year. The funds are frozen even though hundreds of projects have been submitted. People want to work. These are good people who only want to work.

Many of them and many communities are just waiting for their projects to be accepted to create these jobs, but the Government does nothing. Why is the Government waiting? For the unemployment rate to go even higher? It is already unacceptable.

In view of the recent disaster in New Brunswick, I explicitely ask this Government to act as soon as possible, and I ask the Members Opposite to put pressure on the Government in this regard. Incentives must be provided immediately. The employment problem in New Brunswick . . . I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I have a bad flu coming on; it has nothing to do with the forest fires. I was saying that the employment problem in New Brunswick requires immediate action and the recent disaster makes us realize that we have to create jobs because an unemployment rate or 15 per cent is much too high and these people have to be put back to work.

Also, the consequences of this disaster were not limited only to its impact on the economy, for there was also an impact on several affected families. As a matter of fact, several houses, buildings, barns and private wood lots were burnt to the ground. Mr. Speaker, we must ask ourselves if the Government should not come to the aid of these families. We could compare fire with other natural disasters such as floods and storms for which the Government has often provided assistance. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask the question: Will the Government in this case provide some assistance? I sincerely believe that it should do so and surely my honourable colleagues from New Brunswick believe so too. The federal Government should indeed discuss forthwith this matter with the provinces to determine an action plan, for the situation is most urgent.

On the other hand, the Government appears to be responsible for the action of the military at CFB Gagetown who started one of the biggest fires in the province. Now, I think that the military authorities have admitted and accepted the responsibility for this fire which burnt the facilities on the base and several homes to the ground. This afternoon, we were told in the House that there would be an investigation to determine who was responsible. I sincerely wish that this investigation will take place as soon as possible and I suggest it would be fair for the Government to offer right away some support to these families, because they are homeless, their homes having been burnt down. I believe therefore that we have a responsibility and that we should consider helping them.

But this fire in Gagetown was only one among 60 others. Near my riding, a fire started in the Kouchibouguac National Park, an area which attracts visitors by the hundreds of thousands every year. Fortunately, this fire was brought under control before it had time to cause too much damage. Yesterday, I flew over that region and I could appreciate the good work the volunteers have done fighting the forest fires. The situation in the New Brunswick forests was explosive. I could see from high up in the air where the fire had burnt and, in several places, where it had jumped 100 metres and even more.

I mention this to underline that the people fighting the fires were risking their lives. Most of them were volunteers. I should like here to pay tribute to these people for their work, dedication and willingness to leave their homes and try to save the New Brunswick forests at their own risk.

I should like also to thank the other provinces which have come to our assistance, as well as the State of Maine. I can assure you that the people in Atlantic Canada will not forget this assistance, this gesture made in friendship.

Since several of these fires were caused by human errors, probably neglect, should we not better educate the public? During a week-end broadcast, I heard people say that they did not really mind the forest being destroyed, since it belongs to big corporations. I suggest we should take this opportunity to tell people that the forests belong to us. It is part of our heritage. We should preserve them. Above all, we should use them to create jobs.

I mentioned a while ago that our unemployment rate is very high. That is true. That is unacceptable. Why not take this opportunity to establish new reforestation programs? We hear people say: The forest does not provide as many jobs as it is believed because the whole cutting process is made with machines. Well, we could decide that the whole reforestation should be handmade and not machine-made. That is what people want. They want jobs. They want to contribute to the economy. They are not satisfied with staying home and collecting unemployment insurance or welfare benefits. They want to work. Perhaps we could draw a lesson from this situation, a disaster just the same. Perhaps people could benefit from it.

I urge therefore the Government to set up reforestation programs to make it possible for people to work and try and save the wood which has not been destroyed, because I believe that some of the wood can still be saved.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that the time has come for the Government to act. Empty promises are not enough. That simply will not do. It must act, find a way to recreate what we have lost while providing jobs for people living in Atlantic Canada.

Also, I am happy that this debate took place and that I could contribute to it together with my colleagues from New Brunswick and the other Atlantic regions, no matter their political affiliation. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, if we can achieve something here tonight, make the Government face up to its responsibilities and react promptly to this situation, we will have done a lot. If I think we can do something here tonight, I tell myself that we will be ready to launch another debate of great importance to New Brunswick, a debate on the Moncton CN shops which provide work for 1,200 residents of the southeastern region. I feel confident that my New Brunswick colleagues will then rise again to defend the interests of our province.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, this is a time for action and the Government has several options. With sound planning and especially financial assistance, one is justified in believing that everything is not lost by any means. What is needed is political will, the kind of political will which so far has not been particularly obvious, almost missing in fact.

If the interest of the Atlantic provinces is a priority of this Government, Mr. Speaker, now is the time to prove it.

• (2040)

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will recognize the Hon. Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Andre).

Mr. Murphy: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The precedent of this House is that on any type of debate each of the three Parties is allowed one speaker at the very beginning. After that you may recognize the Members as you prefer. However, there has not yet been one speaker from the New Democratic Party. The Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton) was definitely on his feet seeking recognition.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is no order of precedence for speakers in this House, as the Hon. Member knows. It is entirely within the discretion of the Chair which tries to balance the list of speakers according to the issue and the numbers present in the House from each political Party. It is the intention of the Chair to recognize the Associate Minister of National Defence and then the Hon. Member for Skeena.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the very serious and, in many ways, tragic events of the last few days in Atlantic Canada, particularly in New Brunswick and Newfoundland, are of grave concern to the Government and members of this Party. It is significant that, given his unbelievably heavy schedule, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) alone amongst the Party Leaders, has viewed this as serious enough to be in the House this evening to participate in this debate.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. One thing I am aware of that pursuant to the rules of this House, regardless of your previous ruling, it is inappropriate for Members of this House, Ministers or otherwise, to comment on the absence or otherwise of Members of the House.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Member, of course, is correct. The Associate Minister of National Defence has the floor on debate.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is right. I hope he will remind himself and members of his caucus of that during Question Period when he frequently has reason to make those kinds of observations. I think it is significant to note the presence of the Prime Minister and his concern about this very important natural tragedy which has occurred in Atlantic Canada.

With the exception of federal lands such as the Northwest Territories, forest fire control is a provincial responsibility. However, our experience over the past decade has taught us that forest fires are a national problem. Furthermore, the Government has recognized that the need for a sustained wood supply and improved forest management are matters of national concern.

We and the provincial governments, as well as the forest industry, are spending large sums on forest management. Over the next several years through joint federal-provincial Forest Resource Development Agreements we will spend about $1.1 billion on forest management across Canada. This is a major investment and if we are to realize our present and future forest production goals we must significantly reduce our forest fire losses.

Accordingly, the federal Government has provided substantial assistance for provincial forestry programs such as the Forest Resource Development Agreements, the purchase of water bombers, and support for the Canadian Interagency Forest Fire Centre which is headquartered in Winnipeg to share information and resources to better fight forest fires. The provinces contribute two-thirds of the agency's cost and the federal Government contributes the remaining third. During fire emergencies in one province the agency arranges fire fighting aid from other provinces. During last week's Gagetown fire in southern New Brunswick, for example, two CL 215 water bombers from Quebec were involved in the aerial assault on the fire.

Incidentally, there is also a formal agreement between Canada and the United States which allows individual provincial and federal agencies to deal directly with American federal agencies as the need arises without going through complicated channels of approval every time. That led to the State of Maine providing water bomber assistance to New Brunswick. The Canadian Interagency Forest Fire Centre co-ordinates these across-the-border exchanges of resources.

We are also strengthening our aerial fire-fighting capability through a co-operative program with the provinces which will provide 29 CL 215s by 1988, 12 for the provinces and 17 for the federal Government. Four of the federal water bombers will be based in the Northwest Territories and the remaining 13 federal planes will be leased to appropriate provinces for a nominal sum. All provinces have agreed to share their water bombers during forest fire operations, a sharing that the Canadian Interagency Forest Fire Centre will co-ordinate under the Mutual Aid Resources Sharing Agreement.

During the past two weeks we have witnessed a real tragedy. Dry, hot weather has resulted in an extremely high incidence of forest fires in the two provinces mentioned. Not only have we witnessed the destruction of thousands of acres of forest, but also of homes and personal properties. As well, lives and towns have been threatened by the ravages of fire. We are indeed fortunate that there has been no loss of life, even though I know the sorrow that is being felt by those who have witnessed the destruction of their properties.

Canadian Forces Base Gagetown had to contend with two major fires in its training area last Thursday. The most serious one managed to jump the fire breaks at the training area and threatened the village of Upper Gagetown. One thousand people were evacuated from the village. Finally, through the combined efforts of some 400 military personnel, many local civilians and provincial water bombers the fires were brought under control on Saturday allowing the residents to return to their homes.

Another major forest fire in the Tracadie area burned out of control for several days destroying some 60,000 acres of forest. To help in bringing this fire under control military assistance was sought. A 200-man force from the 2nd RCR, Gagetown, was dispatched last Friday. Over the weekend that portion of the fire which was threatening populated areas was brought under control. At CFB Chatham Base fire fighters assisted local fire fighters to contain a fire threatening the village of Douglastown and at CFB Moncton a small fire near the Town of Dieppe threatened the supply depot at the base. The base commander mobilized his base defence force until such time as the fire was brought under control.

In Newfoundland last Friday, when a fire threatened the towns of Grand Falls and Windsor, residents most threatened had to be evacuated. At the request of the RCMP local militia assisted in traffic control and security of vacated homes and buildings. As well, a 50-man force from the Grand Falls company of the 2nd Royal Newfoundland Regiment was deployed and assisted police until Sunday when the fire was brought under control. I am proud of the efforts of our Armed Forces personnel in helping in this way.

There has been much discussion about the cause of the fires at CFB Gagetown, two of which were serious, the most serious of which leaped a fire break and threatened the town of Upper Gagetown. Upon hearing this I immediately ordered an inquiry. The fire marshall had already left mobile command headquarters St. Hubert for Gagetown to personally investigate the cause of the fire. I have given orders that a board of inquiry be set up immediately and that it proceed with dispatch to deal with the causes of the fire as quickly as possible so that any compensation due any of those who suffered personal losses as a result of a fire can be dealt with expeditiously and, as I indicated earlier today, with generosity.

• (2050)

I suppose it is with some embarrassment that I have to admit we have some experience in this sort of thing. There have been times when actions taken by the military while on mobilization have caused personal property damage. We have a procedure in place involving boards of inquiry. I am especially interested that this board of inquiry not take a lot of time or be involved in unnecessary legal wrangling. The money spent should go to the benefit, if appropriate, of the people who have suffered damages and not be used up by legal fees through endless weeks and months of wrangling.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: I am assured that that will not happen and I commit to the House that I will keep the situation under active observation. I do not want to prejudice the inquiry with respect to what it might find other than to indicate that I have instructed the military not to find legalistic ways to avoid their responsibility. On the other hand, they have to conduct a fair and proper inquiry. I am not asking for patience. If the Hon. Member for Westmorland—Kent (Mr. Robichaud) or my colleague, the Hon. Member for Fundy—Royal (Mr. Corbett), because of their proximity to the situation, have information which would be useful to me in pursuing the objective we all share, I invite them to contact me. I think we have similar interests in this regard.

The only other comment I would like to make at this time is with reference to the existence of a disaster financial assistance arrangement between the federal and provincial Governments, and I bring this to the attention of the House. It is administered by Emergency Planning Canada which, although a separate agency, does report to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Nielsen) and for which I am responsible. This arrangement has been in place for some 15 years and is there to provide assistance when dealing with damage to property or individuals as a result of natural disasters. There is a cost-sharing formula. The first dollar of costs, on a per capita basis, are the responsibility of the provinces. In other words, for New Brunswick, the first $750,000 in costs would be the responsibility of the provincial Government. The next $2, or $1.5 million in total, is shared 50/50. The next $2 above that, or $1.5 million in total, is 75 per cent federal and 25 per cent provincial. Anything above that is 90 per cent federal and 10 per cent provincial.

There is a reasonable and fairly generous, indeed unlimited in total, plan in place for financial assistance in case of a natural disaster. The initiative rests with the provincial Government. They must make a request for such assistance. There is a provision for an interim payment until the final amount is determined and all requests are submitted as a consolidated claim and then subject to audit by the Department of Supply and Services. The provincial Government is well aware of that arrangement. The Minister responsible, Mr. Jackson, will be examining his alternatives in that regard, I am sure. I simply want to point out that we have used this arrangement on a number of occasions, most recently for a flood in the Northwest Territories within the last month. It is there and available to help.

Natural disasters are just that, disasters. We wish they did not happen. We are grateful that in this instance there was no loss of life. We are sorry about the loss of property. I hope and believe that we have taken all necessary action to ensure that the damaging effects of the loss of property are ameliorated to the best of our ability. I think this Government's commitment to forest industries is demonstrated by the existence of the Ministry of State for Forestry and the very generous forest management funds which will be spent in the next few years, as well as our ongoing commitments to forest fire-fighting equipment. This is an important part of the forest management program.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the issue of the fires burning over the past week in eastern Canada is most serious, and I am pleased that we have an opportunity for an emergency debate on it. There has been an enormous loss of our national forests, provincial forests, and in many cases private woodlots. The fires have primarily been in Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Newfoundland has had the worst fires in 25 years. Some 17 major fires have burned over 81,000 hectares of forest land. That is in excess of 300 square miles, which is larger than some countries.

The worst fires on record in Newfoundland were in 1961 when 4 per cent of the province was razed. Some 400,000 hectares were lost and 8,600 people had to be evacuated as their homes were endangered by the fires. The worst fires have been near Great Gull Lake and Westport on the northeast coast of Newfoundland. Water bombers have been sent from as far away as Saskatchewan to assist in putting out some of these very large fires. This past Saturday some 1,000 or more people were evacuated from their homes in Grand Falls and near Windsor in Newfoundland, and also at Gander and near Baie Verte.

At the same time, in New Brunswick, over 1,000 people were evacuated from the nearly 100 forest fires burning in the region. In New Brunswick the fires have claimed close to a full year's harvest, and 25 times as much forest land has burned this past week as was lost in the whole of last year, some 40,000 hectares, or over 150 square miles. As one Member who spoke previously pointed out, many more tens of thousands of hectares of brush and scrub land have also been lost. There have been about 50 fires in New Brunswick, 11 of which were out of control at one point or another over the weekend in the areas of Newcastle, particularly near Tracadie, which was levelled by fire in 1935. Many of the trees burned near Tracadie had reached the stage of maturity and were about to be harvested.

Great efforts have been made by forest industry workers, government workers, volunteers and the Salvation Army. There have been many heroes, yet unsung, who put their lives on the line to protect homes and property and in an effort to put out some of these large fires. Ontario sent a Canadair 215 water bomber to New Brunswick. Other planes, 35 in total, have been there fighting the fire, including some from Quebec and, as the Associate Minister of Defence (Mr. Andre) pointed out, through our agreement with the U.S., from the State of Maine.

One of the questions which remains unaddressed by the Government so far is what is going to happen to private woodlot owners. This is clearly and primarily a provincial responsibility and we can only hope there will be an early joint statement from the federal and provincial Governments, particularly regarding reforestation of some of those private lots and Crown lands which have been so severely damaged.

One thing I find peculiar is that the companies have been making statements, today and yesterday, indicating they can continue their harvesting simply by altering their cutting plans. This is not possible for many of the small private woodlot owners and I certainly understand that. Although my grandfather moved west around the turn of the century from New Brunswick, for the century and a half before he moved his family operated, and continue to operate a furniture factory that required the operation of a number of woodlots to provide the hardwood. I know how deeply the loss of private woodlots can affect individuals.

The Minister indicated there are plans under way to compensate those affected as a result of the Gagetown accident and that he has initiated an investigation and board of inquiry to look into it. It is clear that the fires were due to shelling, apparently from a misfired missile. We have to look at the evidence given by Captain John McComber, who is reported to have known the fire danger was listed as very high, and that during target practice last Tuesday, they continued to use high explosive live ammunition, for the reason he gave publicly, so that the shells being fired some 10 to 15 kilometres away could be viewed through binoculars.

• (2100)

Under further questioning, it is interesting to note that Captain McComber pointed out that during conditions which are listed as extreme, the target practice is halted and they use white phosphorus ammunition only, which has no incendiary capacity, as did the highly explosive ammunition that was used on Tuesday, which caused an extremely damaging fire in the Gagetown area.

In that fire, 1,000 people had to be evacuated from their homes in and around Upper Gagetown and Burton. On Friday the Moncton airport had to be closed for about an hour. There had been millions of dollars of damage in that immediate area to the forest, to say nothing of the wildlife, the dozens of homes, barns and cottages that were lost.

In Nova Scotia over the weekend, and in the last few days of last week, there were 36 fires, six of which got out of control. The largest was in Guysborough County near Waverly. In Prince Edward Island, there had been some small fires which are now under control. The largest fire was near Antigonish.

I come from an area of the country where fires are a severe problem. As you move west from the Maritimes and Ontario, since April 1 there have been 350 small forest fires, fortunately all of which have been put out without a great deal of damage. It raises some questions this House should be addressing itself to during an emergency debate as to what we should be doing as a country. I will come to that in a moment.

The majority of the fires have been caused by human carelessness, most of them started as brush fires, people burning off grass or brush land, and garbage fires. That raises one of the issues we should be addressing, which is in terms of public education on fire safety itself. I am sure television and radio stations throughout the country would be eager to accept quality, small, to-the-point ads produced by the Canadian Forestry Service or Environment Canada, or by the provinces, that could be put on the air prior to the forest fire season, advising people of the dangers of small brush fires, garbage fires, chimney fires, and so on, and what the effects can be.

It is only in a country so large geographically as ours that we could possibly stand to lose the hundreds of thousands of hectares we lose every year, hundreds of millions of dollars in good standing forests that are lost. In my area and in some areas of Ontario, these fires are simply left to burn themselves out. No serious attempts are made to put them out simply because we have a lot of rural forests we do not yet have under any form of logging or harvesting.

In looking at these kinds of emergency situations, we have to look at some examples of the tragedy which occurs. Ken Banks near Upper Gagetown is an example of how the tragedy only strikes home when you look at what has happened to someone such as him. Mr. Banks, 58 years of age, was employed as a carpenter and a part-time farmer. He lost his century-old family home and all of his farm outbuildings to the fire that started near Gagetown. In Catamaran Provincial Park, 15 cottages were razed. Local wildlife officers flying over could see the moose being burned in the fire, to say nothing of the tens of thousands of birds and small animals that would have perished in these extremely hot and fast moving fires.

On the issue of Gagetown and the military accident, the Associate Minister of National Defence has promised a full investigation on compensation. It raises an issue that requires something further. For someone to have been in charge of that base and to have allowed that kind of high explosive artillery shelling to have been going on when the fire risk was very high raises some very real concerns in my mind about what kind of safety precautions have been discussed at that base, and perhaps at other bases.

I have touched briefly on the issue of better public education, and I will come back to that in a moment. I want to spend a moment talking about the need for more water and chemical-carrying aircraft. Something this House should look at, both during this debate and in committee, is the need to have a centralized co-ordinated force.

During the last Parliament, there was an opportunity for provinces to enter into a joint financing project between the federal and provincial Governments to provide water bombers that were made here in Canada. I know some provinces participated. My own Province of British Columbia did not fully take advantage of the program as I think it should have. In many, many cases the huge fires that occur in my constituency, which is 750 miles one way and 400 miles across the other, with very few roads going into areas where there are often fires, fighting by helicopter and aircraft is really the only way to adequately fight the fires.

We need to co-ordinate, perhaps through the Department of National Defence and the Canadian Forestry Service, a team with state-of-the-art equipment that can link properly into satellite technology, which is now available, infrared photography from high up in the atmosphere indicating where fires are moving, the intensity of the fire, where the nose of the fire is so you can get down and attack it properly with chemicals and water, where you cannot get at it with heavy equipment or ground crews. We need to look at that much more seriously than we have in the past. If we do not learn from these terrible tragedies, they will continue to repeat themselves time after time. We should not forget that a fire as recently as 1961 in the Province of Newfoundland consumed 4 per cent of the land base of that province in huge fires that managed to get out of control.

I call on the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Nielsen) and the Associate Minister of National Defence to take time to draft some kind of optional plan where they can look at the resources available presently in terms of Transport Canada, from people to helicopters, to the Department of National Defence, to various aircraft through the provinces, privately and so on, and come up with a co-ordinated approach.

They do trade equipment. As we have learned in this situation, equipment from Ontario, Saskatchewan, Quebec and Maine, has moved into these areas to assist. Looking over the longer term at the hundreds of millions of dollars in lost forest lands, the enormous amount of wildlife that is damaged and lost, the enormous property loss, I think it is the responsibility of the Government to take a close look at that kind of an approach and bring forward a national plan that is an investment in protecting the country, rather than dealing with it as we have to this point.

A point I have raised many times in this House is the need for a full federal ministry of forests. It was a promise during the last federal election. There is a hard-working Minister holding the portfolio, the Minister of State for Forestry (Mr. Merrithew) from New Brunswick, but he simply does not have the support to do the job. He does not have a full Deputy Minister. He is forced to work out of Agriculture Canada in a dark room in the basement. He has very few staff and almost no budget. It is really only a ministry in name.

Although the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) attended this debate earlier, it is the kind of thing he should be actively considering, which is making a Minister for Forestry responsible for this industry to all of Canada, a full Minister, as he promised during his campaign. This is the largest industry in Canada. It employs 300,000 Canadians directly and 600,000 indirectly. The losses we have sustained in these recent fires are only part of the over-all losses that affect us every year right from the West to the East.

One of the other matters that was not touched on by the two Government speakers this evening is the necessity for some special reforestation efforts. I was hoping, in having forced an emergency debate, there would have been somewhat more thought and examination put into what should really be done, rather than perhaps using this evening as a public relations exercise, as we learned with the previous speaker. We should look at reforestation, how to deal more effectively with the issue of chemical and water bombers, how to more effectively make use of the Department of National Defence and our Canadian Forest Service. One would hope these kinds of issues would have been the subject of the Government side in terms of making those proposals.

To give an example, the amount of money proposed by the Minister of State for Forestry to advertise that there is a federal Minister of Forests, $4 million between now and this fall, is enough money to plant 9.5 million seedlings, something which clearly is now required in the Provinces of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick.

It is that kind of announcement that I and, I know, viewers from the Maritimes would have hoped would be coming, rather than this type of public relations exercise in which the Government indicates there will be a board of inquiry and there will be compensation. Maritimers are told that the first $750,000 will come from their province, the next $1.5 million will be split 50/50, the next $1.5 million will be split 75/25 and 90 per cent of the balance will be paid by the federal Government.

That does not address the serious concerns of people like Ken Banks, who lost a century-old family home and all of his farm buildings. He was preparing for retirement and he fully expected, as did many Maritimers, to know how the federal Government will respond. They want to know if funds will be put forward for reforestation.

What about those who have lost their homes and have no insurance? Will they have to go through the courts to determine who will cover the cost of lost and damaged equipment?

It was my hope that these questions would have been more thoughtfully examined by the Government because it has literally hundreds of thousands of public servants at its beck and call to assist it in preparing information for a debate such as the one taking place this evening. I am sure that those who have lost their cottages or homes have many questions they want answered.

In conclusion, I want to deal with the issue of wildlife. One of the Departments that was most savagely sliced and hacked in the Budgets of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) last year was the Canadian Wildlife Service. The fact that an incident such as this, that kills and maims enormous amounts of wildlife and displaces wildlife to other areas that are not their traditional habitat, raises the concern of Canadians from coast to coast about what kind of specialized efforts can be made by the Canadian Wildlife Service. That service no longer has the only wildlife pathologist it had because that person was dismissed last fall.

What are the terms of reference of the Canadian Wildlife Service? There are many people, such as bird-watchers, who are interested in the environment and would have liked to hear the Minister of the Environment (Mr. McMillan) address this issue.

I am pleased to have had an opportunity to express some views in this debate, but I must say that I am somewhat saddened that government Members, including the Minister who spoke, chose this as an opportunity for a public relations exercise so that the headlines in the Maritime newspapers might read: "Emergency debate forced: Prime Minister was present". I suggest it would have been more appropriate to have taken some time to find real answers for people like Ken Banks who lost everything he owned.

Mr. Albert Girard (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my hon. colleagues in the House in deploring the substantial losses caused by forest fires in my province.

I was listening earlier to my hon. colleague from Westmorland—Kent (Mr. Robichaud), when he said that we had no political priorities. I think the presence here this evening of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and five members of his Cabinet shows that our party has a political priority and that the forests in the Atlantic provinces are very important, and at this point I wonder where the two Opposition party leaders are.

However, I would also like to comment on the action taken by the federal Government, with the provinces, to help develop and protect our forests.

The federal Government has spared no efforts to provide assistance to the province of New Brunswick throughout this very difficult period. I need hardly recall the primary importance of the forestry industry to the economic well-being of the entire Atlantic region. In New Brunswick, the industry is responsible for 23 per cent of the province's total production of raw materials and for two-thirds of its exports. Furthermore, 85 per cent of our forest lands are considered to be productive. As a result, forests provide the feedstock for the province's main industry. More than 36,000 people in New Brunswick depend on our forests for their income. The wage bill for forestry work represents $250 million. The gross value of the province's forestry products exceeds one billion dollars annually.

The federal Government has signed a five-year reforestation agreement with the province of New Brunswick, which expects to spend more than $77 million. The federal contribution will be $42 billion. Moreover, the Federal Government has allocated over $56 million to the Hugh John Flemming Forestry Centre now under construction in Fredericton. This will be one of the most advanced centres for scientific research in the world. After completion, it will employ over 400 workers. The Conservative Government is therefore doing something to help the people of New Brunswick.

The Canadian Forestry Service has also contributed over $2.4 million to build an auxiliary research centre in Edmundston. Located in one of the major forestry areas of the province, this centre will assure a federal presence which will give the various users of this service greater access to technology.

In addition, the federal Government administers a Maritime Forestry Centre in Fredericton, where researchers try to improve forestry management for the entire region.

The federal Government has also signed similar agreements with all other Atlantic provinces. Nova Scotia receives over $79 million, Newfoundland, over $48 million, and Prince Edward Island, $20 million. These amounts represent the combined federal-provincial contributions.

Since 1982, the federal and provincial Governments have decided to join their efforts at the request of the Canadian Resources and Environment Ministers Council. This is how the interservice Canada Forest Fire Centre was created. Its purpose is to coordinate and support forest fire fighting agencies throughout Canada. And here is a policy that has been established by this Government, Mr. Speaker.

The Centre's purpose is not to fight forest fires directly, but rather to monitor the forest fire situation in Canada. It also coordinates the allotment of water-bombers used to that end and other resources from either Canada or the United States. Earlier, a number of speakers referred to the resources supplied by the United States and other provinces—this is thanks to the Centre, that was planned and set up by this Government. The Centre also will play a very significant role in coordinating the distribution of the national fleet of CL-215's as soon as they are operational, under the terms of a co-operative, federal-provincial purchase agreement reached in 1984.

The governments participating in the Centre's programs include the Government of Canada through the Canadian Forestry Service, Parks Canada and Northern Affairs, and every provincial Government. The Federal Government is responsible for one-third of the Centre's operating budget for 1985-86. The remaining portion is covered by the provinces, in proportion to their productive lands surveyed within their respective juridisdictions.

The Centre is the hub upon which depend all established programs to control forest fires in Canada. Today, the situation in New-Brunswick is viewed as serious, according to data supplied by the Canadian Interservice Forest Fire Centre. The most significant fire was in the area of Tracadie. It destroyed more than 40,000 hectares. Another raged in the Newcastle area, and finally there was another fire at the Canadian Forces Gagetown Base, where some 6,000 hectares have already been destroyed.

The people in those areas had been evacuated, but those who lived there have now been able to return to their homes. Some buildings have been destroyed, but as of now we have no details on the extent of the damage. All fires are now under control because of favourable weather conditions in the last 24 hours. The situation is now generally stable, although firefighting will continue for a few more days.

In Gagetown, the Canadian Forestry Service provides integrated forest management and firefighting services to the Canadian Forces base there. Fire detection is done from four watch towers. Fire fighters include military personnel from the base and CFS employees. Fires on the base are fought by the army, with technical advice from the CFS.

Fires that extended outside the base were first fought by the army with the CFS's technical support, before a general alert was sounded.

Mr. Speaker, since forests are under provincial jurisdiction, I hope that my province of New Brunswick will request federal assistance to cope with this economic disaster because our forests are vitally important for us.

On Prince Edward Island, the fire risk was also extremely high. Several homes and buildings have been destroyed. Some areas were evacuated and several roads were closed. Things have now greatly improved due to better weather conditions. There remain only two fires which are also under control.

Nova Scotia experienced 40 fires last week and they are now all under control.

Similar circumstances were also found in Newfoundland where three large fires threatened the communities of Grand Falls, Windsor and Brown's Arm-Porterville. Several areas were evacuated while the fires were blazing during the weekend, but finally the people were told that they could return home. Conditions have greatly improved but supervision will be carried on for a few days.

As for the CL-215, some provinces have bought them under the terms of the federal-provincial agreements and they have already put these water bombers at the disposal of the provinces requesting them for emergencies. Quebec has provided water bombers to fight fires in New Brunswick, and Saskatchewan has also sent two planes which unfortunately had to land in Ottawa due to bad weather. I would now like to thank the province of Quebec for its great help in this economic disaster.

When all provinces take an active part in this co-operative program, Canada will have at its disposal a fleet of water bombers which will effectively fight any fire, anywhere and whatever its extent. Canada is at the forefront of that kind of control and many countries are interested in such a program. For example, Chili has borrowed our water bombers to control fires in large forested areas in the Galapagos Islands.

The Canadian Forestry Service, through the technological transfer centre set up in Maniwaki administered by the Société de conservation de l'Outaouais has now other important tools to be used in fire control. As a result of computerized research, we will soon be in a position not only to deal effectively with fires but also to anticipate them so that firefighters be on the site at the outset.

The federal Government is ready to take its responsibilities following those natural disasters and will never hesitate to support the provinces and protect our forests against the elements.

Mr. Speaker, I should also point out that men and women have given their time and their assistance to fight those fires and we were terribly lucky in New Brunswick because there was no casualty. It is true that some material things are irreplaceable, but it is much more important to avoid all loss of life. Therefore I should like to thank all those who have helped New Brunswick in one way or another. I would even say that the Tory Government of Canada is taking all necessary steps to make sure that the economy of the various areas remains intact.

[English]

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join with my colleagues on all sides of the House to participate this evening in this emergency debate. May I begin my remarks by complimenting the Hon. Member for Fundy—Royal (Mr. Corbett) in writing to the Speaker to request this emergency debate this evening. It is not only appropriate but gives Hon. Members, particularly those Hon. Members from the forest-producing regions, an opportunity to rise and speak about the disastrous consequences of the forest fires which have raged over the last several weeks in Atlantic Canada and to remind Members of Parliament of the importance of that industry to our respective regions. I also compliment the Speaker on his wisdom in understanding the importance of the forestry sector to our regions and granting this debate tonight.

In my own Province of Newfoundland over the last week, some 80,000 hectares of forest land have been burned and destroyed. Some 300 square miles of forest land are lost to the pulp and paper producing industries of our province and ultimately are lost to those people who depend upon that resource for employment. There have been equally disastrous consequences in the Province of New Brunswick where approximately 40,000 square hectares of forest land have been lost.

I want to say I am pleased that the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Andre) during his remarks a few moments ago indicated he would move quickly to ascertain whether or not the Department of National Defence is responsible for the fire in the Gagetown area because of the use of live ammunition during the course of practice at a time when no live ammunition or fire practice should be carried on because of forest fire conditions. I am pleased to see he has responded to the representations made by Hon. Members of the House from New Brunswick. The Hon. Member for Fundy—Royal and the Hon. Member for Westmorland—Kent (Mr. Robichaud) have been vocal in insisting that one cannot assign the case of the Gagetown fire to an act of God or a natural disaster. Certainly it was exacerbated by the weather and by conditions. Nevertheless, the fire started because of a decision to proceed with target practice in what were already untenable conditions in the forest fire season in New Brunswick.

It is regrettable that sometimes it takes a disaster for Members of Parliament and, indeed, Canadians, to pull together, but that is what has happened over the last period in Atlantic Canada and that is what is happening tonight in this Chamber. Forest firefighters from the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec have dedicated their experience, knowledge and resources to combating the natural disaster in Atlantic Canada. That has also occurred in New Brunswick where Quebec waterbombers have been battling blazes in that province. It has occurred in Newfoundland as well where the Province of Quebec has provided men and equipment to fight its forest fires. I believe that speaks to the nature of this country. Despite our diversity and differences we can, when challenged, work and pull together for the betterment of all.

I want to take a moment to pay tribute to all of those firefighters, the professional fully paid fire-fighters, the pilots and crews of the Canso waterbombers and the people at the Department of Forestry in New Brunswick and Newfoundland. More importantly, I want to pay tribute to those volunteers who for no other reason than a sense of community and provincial pride, and sense of wanting to protect and preserve the resource so important to the affected provinces, took a tank up over their shoulders and went out into the bush to work at trying to bring those blazes under control.

In my own province, communities were perilled by the danger of fire. Citizens were faced with the threat of losing their homes. But they kept their heads and worked as a tightly controlled unit through endless days with very little sleep. Some of the fire-fighters took only three or four hours sleep over several days and nights in order to battle those blazes.

I want to pay tribute to the 700 residents of the small community of Brown's Arm, about 40 kilometres from Grand Falls, who kept their heads and worked with the fire-fighters for three days battling the blaze that threatened to destroy their community; to the people of the community of Porterville, faced with evacuation of their community as well; to the people of the twin towns of Grand Falls and Windsor who were faced with the same kind of conditions; and to the fire boss in that particular region, Clarence Fudge, who, with only a number of hours' sleep over several days, managed to keep coordinated and together his team to launch an effective battle against the blaze that was threatening homes and property in that part of the province.

I said a moment ago that sometimes it takes a natural disaster for us to learn to pull together and to set aside our differences, whether partisan and in the House or provincially. Maybe that spirit of unity and of shared values is what we should reflect upon tonight, not just in paying tribute to those brave people who fought the disastrous blazes in New Brunswick and Newfoundland, but in reflecting upon capturing and keeping that spirit and asking ourselves what we can do as Members of Parliament to make better the tremendous losses that have been suffered.

In the case of Gagetown, if the military is responsible, the Minister has told us that the military will pay and pay quickly. We welcome that, but not all fires were caused by the military. Many of them were acts of God or perhaps acts of carelessness. Nevertheless, there is no one to point a finger at.

What can we do for Newfoundland where 300 square miles of a resource that is essential to the operation of three pulp mills has been lost? I suggest and only suggest—I demand nothing— that the Government consider in a non-partisan way the following suggestion. In Newfoundland, New Brunswick and perhaps British Columbia as well, notwithstanding the recovery generally seen across the country, the unemployment rate remains high. The Province of the Hon. Member for Fundy—Royal, my province and the Province of British Columbia have not shared in the recovery touted across the land.

I suggest that the Government look seriously, given these losses, at a program of massive forestry investment, a program that would save many Canadians who find their way on federally sponsored job-creation programs that last for a short period of time and are sometimes of questionable value, though many of them are excellent. Let us use that money and manpower and reinvest it in our future.

Given the tremendous losses in provinces where these resources are vital, let the Government come forward with a plan that will have two effects. On the one hand, it will alleviate the high, crushing level of unemployment and on the other it will invest, just as farmers invest in their crops every spring, in a resource that will give us a yield four, five or six generations from now. For every 10 cents that is put into a tree today, down the road that 10 cents will yield a return of tens and tens of dollars.

Given these massive losses, this is indeed the time for the Government to consider this kind of program. The prototype of this program has already been worked out. I mentioned earlier that water bombers from Quebec came to the aid of New Brunswick and Newfoundland, but the prototype of the program about which I am speaking has been developed in British Columbia.

The mayors of Vancouver Island put together a proposal saying to the Government: "We need employment on Vancouver Island. Our unemployment rate is high. All we ask the Governments for are the tools. We are not going to try to develop a silicon valley on Vancouver Island, we are not going to try to develop a manufacturing industry where one currently does not exist, we are not going to try to turn Vancouver Island into a suburb of Toronto, we are only going to enhance our natural resource, the forest. We want to put people to work and we want to give them the dignity of a job but we want an investment in our future at the same time". That is the kind of innovative thinking that should be occurring now. It should involve not only the participation of the Government of Canada but the active participation, financially and otherwise, of the Governments of the affected provinces.

If the forested land, much of it prime timberland, is not replaced, it cannot be harvested later. That means, as sure as we sit in this House, that jobs in the future will be lost because the trees simply will not be there to be cut. These are not hypothetical trees. These trees have to be replaced.

The only way New Brunswick and Newfoundland can continue with their current levels of production is by overcutting 10 or 15 years from now. The only way they can overcut is by dramatically increasing silvaculture programs so that downstream there will be an even greater amount of timber to be harvested than would have otherwise been the case.

This proposal I ask the Government to consider is not one that will simply create short-term jobs, though it will do that. It is not one that will simply invest in our future, though it will do that. It is one which is necessary to maintain Canada's place in the world pulp and paper markets.

We talk about unemployment so much in this place that we lose our ability to see the human face of unemployment. We tend to think about 9 per cent, 12 per cent and 14 per cent unemployment rates, 29 per cent in my riding and only 16 in another riding. We read the unemployment numbers as if they were pieces of paper off the stock exchange telling us which way the stocks went, up or down. We forget the human face.

This weekend I was in a little community in my riding called Lark Harbour. I met a gentleman in Lark Harbour who has maintained his family in that small fishing village for most of the last 20 years by going away for six months of the year and working. This man had always been proud of himself because, despite the fact that he lived in a place of high unemployment, he did whatever he had to do and went wherever he had to go to have the dignity of a pay cheque, to know that the sweat of his brow went into earning that pay cheque so that he could maintain his family. That was important to him. Sure there was a social agency that would have looked after him had he stayed at home, but he always travelled and he usually went out West. He told me that this was the first year that he had travelled and come up empty handed. He could not find a job. It was not good enough for him that he could go home and have someone look after him. What was involved for that gentleman was the dignity of a job and the self-esteem and sense of worth that comes with work.

Once in a while, all of us need to be reminded of what we mean when we talk about the unemployed. Even though I live in a district which has unemployment that is much too high, and even though it is probably a terrible admission for an Hon. Member who comes from an area with high unemployment, as I left that community and drove away, I had a new sense of urgency, which had been personalized by an individual, about the ugly side of unemployment and how shattering it is.

I urge the Government and all Hon. Members to try to find the seeds for something good within the disaster we have just experienced and are still experiencing. At the present time seven fires are out of control in my province. I ask them to respond to that disaster by more than just words, as all of us have expressed, admiring the heroics of the people who fought the fires. They should ask for more than support, help, and empathy for those people who lost property. Property has been lost in Newfoundland as well. They should look upon this as an opportunity to put the gentleman in Lark Harbour back to work. He wants to work. He wants the dignity of a job. He wants to know that he is investing in his province. I urge them to put him back to work and to build upon our forestry resource.

Those are my comments. I hope Hon. Members of the House can take that idea and run with it. I hope it can be our contribution of gray matter as Members, as humble as it might be, to a solution to unemployment in a hard-pressed region which dedicates some resources as an investment in the future. I hope tonight will be the beginning of a regional approach by Members of Parliament, irrespective of party colour, so that we will do in the final analysis what we were sent here to do, that is, represent the interest of our constituents and make a contribution to Canada at the same time.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Morrissey Johnson (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, my first duty, as I rise to speak this evening, is to thank the Hon. Member for Fundy—Royal (Mr. Corbett) for seeking this opportunity to debate the devastating forest fires which have ravaged the Atlantic provinces for the past several days. Also, I should like to congratulate all Hon. Members who have spoken previously in this debate. I especially congratulate the Hon. Member for Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin). In fact, he very eloquently described the situation as it pertains to Newfoundland. As a result, he somewhat lessened the time that I will take this evening to speak a little about what has occurred in terms of the forest fires in Newfoundland.

Most generally when we speak of industries in Newfoundland, everyone automatically thinks of the fishing industry. The fact is that the forest industry is equally as vital to our provincial economy as is the fishery. In 1984, the forestry processing sector accounted for about 25 per cent of all manufacturing employment and income in Newfoundland. I suppose we have about the same amount of gross national provincial product from the fishery and slightly more from mining, so we see how important the forestry industry is to Newfoundland.

Over the past several days Newfoundland, like the other Atlantic provinces, has been severely hit by numerous fires. I believe at the present time there are somewhere in the vicinity of 13 fires still burning in Newfoundland, seven of which are out of control. This evening I checked with the Hon. Leonard Simms, Minister of Forest Resources and Lands for Newfoundland, and was appraised of the situation to date. At this time it is difficult for anyone to ascertain exactly how much merchandisable forest has been destroyed. Many of the fires have burned over bog lands, and it is almost impossible to ascertain how many trees have been destroyed.

I wish I were able to be as happy this evening as I was slightly more than a month ago when I was in Newfoundland and had an opportunity to witness the signing of a forestry agreement between the federal and provincial Governments. At that time I was enthusiastic about this year's reforestation program in which approximately $12 million will be put into forestry activities. I am sure there was no one present then who anticipated the big losses which have now occurred as a result of the forest fires. This year forest fires are approximately three weeks or more ahead of what they would be in normal weather conditions in Newfoundland. This is mainly because we had a low winter snowfall and windy spring weather with record-breaking temperatures. The land or the forest floor has dried out earlier than usual.

As the Hon. Member for Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe stated, up to this point in time approximately 1,300 square kilometres has been burned over. Not only has there been damage to trees and so on, but there has been also been some personal property damage. I believe two homes were destroyed around the Grand Falls area. Also in that same vicinity I believe 31 summer cabins, a warehouse and an unoccupied residence were destroyed. As well, two provincial parks have been damaged.

There was a time just last week, on Saturday, when fire caused damaged to transmission lines in the Bay D'Espoir area, resulting in power outages all over the eastern part of Newfoundland. Several communities had to be evacuated, and of course some were put on evacuation alert. As I said earlier, the total cost of protection efforts to this point in time cannot be ascertained, but I assume that they will be very high.

As well as congratulating the people who have spoken in the debate, it would be remiss of me if I did not refer to the personnel who fought the fires, including provincial service fire fighting ground personnel and the hundreds of volunteers who gave of their time and risked their lives to try to suppress the fires against high winds and extremely warm conditions.

To set some people a little at ease, let me say that cool temperatures and scattered showers overnight have eased somewhat the fire situation in Newfoundland. I am sure all of us are encouraged by present weather conditions, but are somewhat concerned about an approaching high pressure system which will influence Newfoundland weather later this week. We hope that with the wet spell we are now experiencing in Newfoundland that those who are fighting the fires will be able to put them out, that the ground will remain moist so we will not have a recurrence of what has happened in the past few days.

• (2150)

I want to reiterate what other Members have already said. This is a special case. The provinces will need, and I am sure they will be seeking, federal assistance. To give you an idea, Mr. Speaker, for the past few years the Department of Forestry, Resources and Lands, has budgeted $1.5 million each year for forest fires. In 1985-86, $2.5 million was spent and there were only three large fires with which to contend. That is nothing compared to what has happened this year. We did not have nearly as many fires during the whole of last year as we have had to date this year. You can see how this will affect the provincial budget.

Approximately 20,000 people derive a portion of their income from the forestry sector in Newfoundland. I would think those who are familiar with the Newfoundland employment scene would agree with me when I say that approximately 50,000 Newfoundlanders depend on the forestry sector, either as wage earners or dependants.

You can see how serious a situation it is when large amounts of money that would be put into new seedlings and so on will now have to go into efforts to fight forest fires. No one wants to lay the blame on anyone until all of the fires have been investigated. As the previous speaker said, some of them started through natural causes and perhaps some might have been prevented if a little more care had been taken by those utilizing the beauties of our forests. Regardless of the cause, these fires have occurred and the damages have to be taken care of in the best way we can. Considerable amounts of money will be needed for proper reforestation in the countryside that has been burned.

I can only appeal to the federal Government, as have previous speakers, to try to alleviate some of the financial burden which the provinces in Atlantic Canada are experiencing because of damages to our forests as a result of fires.

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it is with some pleasure I have the opportunity to speak in this debate, not that the topic itself is pleasurable but the opportunity to speak in Parliament on any topic of importance is a pleasure for Members of this House.

I suspect that anyone who might be watching or listening to this debate rather than watching or listening to the hockey game will probably wonder why Parliament is talking about something over which Parliament has little ability to control or why we would be having an emergency debate on forest fires in Atlantic Canada when we have not had emergency debates on other matters. That is not a criticism of the Speaker's ruling, but it is somewhat ironic that we are in a situation when nature is dealing with the forest fires by heavy rain which is now falling in most of the region.

I would like to add my words of condolence to those affected by the forest fires. As someone who comes from a riding in northern Manitoba, two-thirds of the Province of Manitoba, the region I represent, has had many forest fires over the years. I know the hardship those fires create for people through loss of business, homes and, in some cases, loss of loved ones. My personal condolences go to those affected negatively by the forest fires.

In my introduction I said that we are debating something over which Parliament or Government does not really have any control. Forest fires for the most part are started by nature. It will require nature and people in Atlantic Canada to put out these fires. That is self-evident. However, there are things that can be done. We would like to see the Government and Parliament act. We should make sure that we have trained volunteers in place and that there is a quick exchange of equipment from one province to another, from one region to another, when there is a forest fire. Sometimes this has occurred, but on occasion there have been road-blocks, and I hope they can be eliminated.

It is very important that we have a full Ministry of Forestry. Previous speakers have alluded to the need for a Ministry of Forestry, which has been an election promise in the past. It is a promise that should be kept.

Let me point out to Members that we have a Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) and a Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon), so we do have full ministries for other important sectors for our economy. It is ironic that forestry, which is so important to many regions, has only a Minister of State responsible for it. That is not to degrade the Minister, but by the structure of the Cabinet and the position which the Minister of State for Forestry (Mr. Merrithew) holds, he does not have the staff, the resources or the political clout to do the types of things that can be done by other Ministers with full Departments and support. It is obvious to anyone in this House that the Minister of Agriculture, because he has a full Department with a Deputy Minister, associates and assistants as well as full-time resource people, is able to do more for his sector than someone who, through no fault of his own is just strictly a Minister of State responsible.

Other Members have stated earlier that forestry is a major industry for many Canadians. It is a major industry in my riding, and I am sure it is a major industry for most of the people who are still in the House tonight. It is time that we came to grips not only with forest fires in Atlantic Canada, which is more specifically the topic tonight, but with the whole cycle in the forestry industry. We have yet to develop an adequate reforestation program. We will not have an adequate reforestation program until we say that a tree cut down must be replaced by a new seedling, that a tree lost through natural occurrences should be replaced by some mechanism, whether through nature or some program.

A couple of weeks ago members of the NDP caucus remarked that it was National Forest Week. We talked about the fact that other countries have reforestation programs which are much superior to ours. We talked about the fact that there is an industrial strategy for the forest industry in other countries, which is not the case here. Due to the fact that we do not have a reforestation program and the fact that we do not have an adequate industrial strategy for the forest sector, forest fires, wherever they occur, create a further burden for the people of the region. Already we cannot guarantee that we will have the trees to provide the lumber, pulp and paper that we need for our industries. We have known for years that we have not come to grips with this very serious problem.

Other Members who spoke during the first two hours of this debate indicated the number of acres that were burned in the last three or four days. You have heard estimates of how many jobs that will cost in those regions. Some of those jobs would have been lost anyway, but some of them would have been saved if there was an adequate reforestation program in the country. Some of that loss could not be controlled, but some of it could be. That is an issue which should properly be before this Parliament.

Other Members who spoke earlier talked about laying the blame. They mentioned that some of the fires were created by nature, that some were created by carelessness, and that some, or at least one, may have been caused by the activities of the Forces base at Gagetown. As the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Andre) indicated, we do not want to prejudge that situation. However, military officials are on record as indicating that they probably did cause the fire in that region.

For the most part, we cannot prevent fires caused by nature. Over the years the country has tried to deal with the problem of fires caused by carelessness. There have been advertising programs from time to time. We have had programs in the schools. As a teacher I can remember asking my students to draw posters illustrating what we can do to prevent forest fires. For the most part Canadians, because they love their woods and natural resources and because they are concerned about what they do to both nature and humanity, are fairly careful. There will always be exceptions. There will always be those who smoke when they should not and are careless about where they put their butts and matches. There will always be those who will start a grass fire in their backyard and the fire will get away from them. Those things should not happen, but they will happen from time to time.

Once again, we do not want to prejudge the case of the Gagetown incident. However, I can speak from my own experience having spent a summer at Shilo, Manitoba. We did not take tank gun practice when the weather was dry. We knew that that was not an appropriate time to be engaged in that type of practice and we engaged in other activities at that time.

I wish the Associate Minister of Defence were still in the House. I would like to ask him to look into whether or not the Forces at Gagetown were responsible for the fire in that region and the loss of houses and other buildings there. I would also like to ask him to ensure that there are standards in place which the military across the country will follow closely to ensure that their actions do not create adverse conditions such as forest fires.

It is not my intention to speak at any length in this debate. We have indicated, through our spokesperson, the Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton), that we are very concerned about the forest industry and the individuals who have been affected by the fires in Atlantic Canada. It is more than a matter of concern. In addition to that, we would like the Government to come up with a concrete plan for what it is going to do with the forest industry. I spoke earlier about the need for a full Minister. I think it is essential to ensure that there is a Department with the political, economic, and research clout to ensure that we can develop and maintain our forest industry.

The forest industry is one of the major employers in my riding. There are people employed in the woods, in the sawmills, and in the pulp and paper mills. It is a major industry in my area and in other areas. The present Government has been no better than the previous Government with regard to coming to grips with this industry. We know that the industry is in danger. One very serious concern which the House has to deal with is the free trade talks and various actions which are being taken in the United States by various Congressmen and American industry representatives at the present time. There is also a concern that our own nation is not developing the wherewithal to ensure that we have a strong forest industry in the future. That issue must be addressed.

If nothing else, this emergency debate on forest fires in Atlantic Canada has given us the opportunity to think again about how important our forestry industry is in the country and how necessary it is to have an insurance policy against the fires and also against the other uses which we make of our forests. In other words, we must have a future to continue the industry which is so important to many of us.

Mr. Pat Binns (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join in this debate this evening which was promoted by the Hon. Member for Fundy—Royal (Mr. Corbett). The forest industry is a major component in the economy of New Brunswick. I congratulate the Hon. Member for having brought this debate forward in this forum at this time since it gives the House an opportunity to consider fully the ramifications of what is happening in the Atlantic provinces at the moment.

Most people probably would not think of my province of Prince Edward Island as being a forestry province. However, approximately 48 per cent of the Island's land area, some 700,000 acres, is in fact covered by woodland. That is significant because, not only is roughly half the land area covered by woodland but almost all of that woodland is owned by individuals. That is a quite different situation from that in most regions in Canada where most of the woodland is owned by the Crown. Very little is owned by the private sector.

The history of the development of Prince Edward Island is one of small farms being carved out across the Island of anywhere from 50 to 100 acres. Generally speaking, half of the area of those farms has remained in woodland. The back half of each farm is in fact a significant woodlot which is part of the economic viability of a particular farm unit. The woodlot has always been a very important part of the farm in Prince Edward Island. The annual harvest on the Island is approximately 333,000 cubic metres of wood. We have excellent tree growth simply because of the climate. We have very fertile soil and an excellent environment for growing trees to produce lumber. Our growth rate of tree fibre is among the highest in Canada. I suppose British Columbia is ahead of us, but by silvacultural practices of thinning and cleaning and so on we have seen very significant stand development.

The forest sector on the Island currently employs about 400 people in logging, sawmilling and forest management. It will come as a surprise to many that we have 50 sawmills in operation presently. They are generally family-owned and concentrate on custom production. The woodland is of course very important to sustaining that industry which is in production at present. Sawmills produce 16 million board feet annually. Of the annual forest harvest on the Island, 20 per cent is exported to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as pulpwood. Fuel wood is another large part of the annual harvest and many Islanders burn fuel wood to heat their homes in winter. In fact, there have been major conversions to fuel wood by industry over the last few years, so I would not be surprised if somewhere in the vicinity of 70 per cent or 80 per cent of heating requirements are now met by woodlots on the Island. A survey in 1983 indicated there was an annual consumption of 264,000 cubic metres of fuel wood. That is just a little bit of background to indicate to the House how significant the forest industry is in Prince Edward Island.

At the present time our province is something like a matchbox and at any time another fire can start. We have had over 50 fires this year to date and some 333 hectares have been burned. There have been four major fires which burned 200 hectares, roughly 50 hectares each, of mainly woodland. To date we have been somewhat fortunate that there has been no loss of life but we have lost some buildings, relatively few because many were saved. We have lost four cottages and some barns with a total value of approximately $150,000. This is the first time we have had any structural loss from woodland fires since 1978. It was only yesterday that there was a major fire in my constituency. A dairy farmer was tending to his cows in his barn and it just happened that the local fire chief in the St. Peter's area was passing by the farm and noticed smoke in the woodland behind the farm. He stopped to see where the owner was and they quickly went out to see what was happening. By the time they got to this fire it was no longer a small bit of smoke, it was exploding into a fairly major fire. Four fire departments, including the department of forestry, responded relatively quickly and they were able to contain the fire to about 100 acres of woodland. Of course, that woodland was lost in a relatively short period of time. If it had not been for the tremendous effort made by the local fire departments, provincial forestry department and concerned citizens, certainly my constituent and his family stood to lose their whole farm. As I pointed out, because the woodlots in our province run parallel to each other, next door to each other in fact, with farms very close together, the possibility existed that the whole community would have been cleaned out. It was of course very much appreciated by that family and its neighbours that the fire was contained. Therefore I think I have to join with others this evening who have already commended the valiant efforts of volunteer firemen and fire departments and those communities in general who have responded to this crisis. I know that something in the order of six or seven hundred people have been actively involved in fighting those 50 fires on the Island which have developed over the last week or so.

There has been some suggestion here this evening that woodlots and forests are under provincial jurisdiction. While I would be the first to agree that this is the case, I have mentioned that many of our woodlots are privately-owned. I think the federal Government, along with the provincial Governments and municipalities, have some responsibility to ensure that the needs of people who have suffered major losses are met. There are things we can do. For instance, I think Governments can help those private woodlot owners with things like stand replanting, and perhaps programs to help clean up the burnt-out areas. I would think that our federal-provincial forestry programs, perhaps under the job creation category with the sponsorship of the Department of Employment and Immigration, can offer some assistance to woodlot owners who have suffered losses.

I could go into more detail on other fires but I know some of my friends have been amazed that they or their neighbours have not lost their homes and other buildings because of these fires. Recently a friend of mine was trying to get home from Charlottetown only to discover that the road was blocked by fire equipment while fire-fighters and some of his neighbours were trying to put the fire out. He took a back road to get to his farm. By the time he got there, all he could see was smoke.

He could not see his barn, his buildings or anything else. As he drove up the lane trying to get closer to see what was going on, he saw huge flames jumping up over the top of the barn. However, by some miracle the wind shifted at the last moment and the fire retreated instead of engulfing his farm property.

You can imagine the concern and fear that he or any other person would have felt in the circumstances, only to find that his farm was suddenly saved. Fortunately we have had many instances of that kind of thing rather than total losses. However, I point out again that we have lost something like 1,000 hectares of woodland in Prince Edward Island already. We are urging people to be very cautious in the next number of days until we get some rain to help ensure that the current crisis passes.

On Friday morning I was still in Ottawa before returning to my constituency and I was watching Canada AM on television. I was rather intrigued, if not a little bit disappointed, by a map depicting the Atlantic region used by the television network which carried Canada AM. New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland were in full evidence. All the waters making up the Gulf of St. Lawrence, along with Anticosti Island, were vividly displayed. Unfortunately, Prince Edward Island was missing. I quickly got in touch with the broadcaster, reminded him that Prince Edward Island was still there and that we had some fires as well. I am sure they are moving to correct that particular art work. I did not plan to bring that into the debate this evening but I think that it is important to show that no tragedy of this kind can be more significant to one area of the country than to another.

• (2220)

In Prince Edward Island we have had over 50 fires already, we have lost a thousand acres and have had four cottages and some farm buildings burned. Fortunately we have not lost any houses.

I want to recognize those who are making a contribution to prevent fires, our provincial fire chief, our provincial Department of Forestry, our firemen, our fire departments, volunteer fire-fighters, community groups, organizations, individuals, anyone who has helped in this very serious situation.

I feel that the Government has some obligation here and I want to bring some attention to the situation in our province. We will be looking for the full co-operation of all levels of Government, federal, provincial and municipal, along with individual woodlot owners to see that everyone fulfils their obligations.

In closing I would like to congratulate the Member for Fundy Royal for having brought this matter before the House under emergency debate provisions.

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to join other private Members in this debate on the fires which have been devastating various parts of Atlantic Canada, particularly New Brunswick and Newfoundland, but which have not left areas of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island unscathed.

The loss which has been suffered in the way of forest destruction is a significant one, and it is one which will be a loss to private owners and to large companies. It is a loss to the societies of each of these provinces. It means lost opportunities for employment, greater challenges for reforestation and for the maintenance of the forest industries of Atlantic Canada. Being a Member from northwestern Ontario, Thunder Bay—Nipigon, an area in which forestry is also very important, I would like to use my opportunity this evening to say something about the importance of dealing with the needs of the forest industry in which fighting the ravages of fire is one of the important challenges that faces Governments in their responsibilities for Crown lands.

I would also like to use the occasion to recognize other problems that face us. I might say, on the matter of fires themselves, that I remember very well in the spring of 1980 when we in northwestern Ontario had similarly hot, dry weather, unseasonal weather in the late days of May. Fire devastated various areas, particularly that very large fire in the Kenora area which destroyed such large stands of timber at the time. Those experiences of fire in our part of Canada certainly sensitize one to what has been experienced lately by the people of the four Atlantic provinces. I share with them the satisfaction that no lives were lost while, of course, feeling the loss of property, in addition to forests. I am happy that rain has come to various areas and provided assistance to the fire-fighters.

In dealing with these challenges we need more than just speeches by private Members. We have not heard from any of the Ministers from the Atlantic provinces. I expect that the Minister of State for Forestry (Mr. Merrithew) is otherwise occupied and regrets the fact that he has not been able to be here and address this issue. The Minister of State for Forestry is himself from New Brunswick and must have felt very keenly the ravages of fire in these last days, having had responsibility for natural resources in the provincial Government, and realizing what the significance of this loss would be.

My friend from Skeena has suggested this evening that Government should take a leadership role in ensuring that there are adequate resources to fight fires, ensuring that we have the aircraft and the supplies needed, certainly in chemical firefighting, aside from the use of water bombers, helicopters and so on.

It is suggested that there should be a leadership role taken by the Canadian Government in ensuring that equipment is available to be moved across the country as the challenge of the forest fire arrives. Fires do not usually sweep every part of Canada at the same time, but there are other times when the threat of forest fire is a decidedly regional matter when the very great danger that occurs calls for the resources of other provinces. There is some co-ordination and movement of equipment as the communications media have been pointing out to us. Equipment has been moved from as far away as the Province of Saskatchewan to Atlantic Canada to ensure equipment would be available.

Surely here is an opportunity for the Government to do more than just join in a debate on this. It is an opportunity for private Members, particularly from Atlantic Canada, to express their concerns about these problems and to do something in the way of taking action that will ensure when the problem arises again that Canada will be better equipped to deal with it.

The reality is that fires will occur, and unseasonably dry and hot weather makes the danger all the greater. The vast majority of forest fires have natural causes, and they will occur. They will occur in areas far removed from human habitation. Given that kind of challenge what we need is equipment.

In northern Ontario, of course, as in the Province of Quebec, we can go back to the 1920s to discover that the history of Canadian civil aviation finds a significant place for the use of aircraft in both scouting for fires and in fighting them. That underscores the argument my friend from Skeena, our spokesman for forestry, was making in saying that the Government should play a leading role.

I think too of the terrible fires that ravaged British Columbia forests last summer which became worse because the provincial Government, in a short-sighted move to save money, cut back on expenditures and disposed of firefighting equipment. People found themselves in the interior of the province, in the East Kootenay region without the equipment that was required to fight fires as they spread.

It is imperative that even in the midst of our attempts to reduce the deficit, to try to get control on government spending, as the Conservative Members here would surely say, it is imperative to realize that we have to have equipment at hand. We must remain in battle-ready condition so that we can deal with the challenge of forest fires when they occur.

While private Members have made good speeches tonight, Ministers have not addressed these matters and come to grips with the problem. I challenge the Government to ensure that in its pursuit of deficit reduction it does not sacrifice the future of the forests by not taking a leadership role.

Members have already indicated this evening that there is a need to maintain forests and develop forestry in Canada. Of course, this calls for a full-fledged Ministry and I, along with others, can only regret intensely that the Government has failed to estalish such a Ministry. While there is a Minister of State for Forests, there is no full-fledged Ministry of Forests and I think it is incomprehensible that the Government has chosen this route.

It seems ironic that the Diefenbaker Government recognized the importance of forestry by creating a full-fledged Ministry. As years passed, the Liberals cut back on that Ministry until it eventually disappeared and offices were established within the Department of the Environment as it was and is presently within the Department of Agriculture.

This is an important industry. The federal Government has a significant number of employees in this sector along with a substantial responsibility for it. One need only look at the activities of the Canadian Forestry Service at its various stations across the country to realize that the federal Government is involved in various areas of forestry, including research and support for regeneration activities in northwestern Ontario and other parts of Canada. The federal Government is concerned about these matters and recognizes this as an important industry.

The export of forest products is one of the most important industries in Canada and is surely no less important than agriculture for which there is a full-fledged Minister and another Minister of State responsible for the Wheat Board. Surely forestry is no less important than the fishery which has a full-fledged Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. This country requires a full-fledged Department of Forests with the authority it has in Government to ensure that this classic industry of renewable resources can provide employment for thousands of people across the country. This is an industry which can maintain medium and small communities all across the country. Surely it is of enough importance to have a full-fledged Ministry.

We were pleased that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) was here for about an hour and graced this debate with his presence. We would have liked to see him when we were debating the attack on Libya but he declined to attend. While we were pleased that he was here tonight, we need his decisions rather than an hour's presence with private Members from his Atlantic caucus who are making speeches that will look good in their home constituencies. We need action from the Government far more than just an indication from the Associate Minister of Defence (Mr. Andre) that an inquiry will investigate the extent to which the Armed Forces were responsible for one of the fires in New Brunswick. We need far more from the Government than an indication of what the Government can provide through agreements in response to the larger disaster.

The lack of involvement in this debate by Ministers from Atlantic Canada is surely a part of the failure of the Government to deal with forestry as it should.

I share with all my colleagues a concern about what has occurred in Atlantic Canada in these last days. I share their relief that there was no loss of life and I share the regret that property losses have occurred. I share in rejoicing in the co-operation of the weather late on the weekend which has made it possible for the threat to be better dealt with. I respond as a Canadian and a human being to the adversities that face other human beings.

However, as a Member of Parliament with a constituency which is one of the large Schedule 3 constituencies in which forests have enormous importance, I am dissatisfied and angry when I see the Government patronizing in debate and doing nothing more than allowing a debate to take place. I have constituents who are concerned about the ongoing situation in the forest sector and the extent to which the forest industry can prosper and continue through the next 30 to 40 years. We agonize over the lack of regeneration activities in years past. In light of these facts, I expect far more from the Government than we have had tonight or up to this point. I trust that the Prime Minister is thinking about these things and considering the advisability of establishing a full-fledged Ministry of Forests as in the days of John Diefenbaker, which could meet the enormous challenges that face us in ths primary industry.

I am pleased to have this opportunity to lay these matters out before the House and my constituents.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, let me begin my participation in this emergency debate on the forest fires by underlining a statement by the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Andre), that forest fires are a national problem. I think that should be the focus and purpose of this debate. We can use the situation that has evolved in Atlantic Canada to point out to all Canadians that forest fires are a national problem and it is appropriate to debate that matter in this national forum.

My socialist friend from the New Democratic Party made reference to the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker. I should hark back to his words that when one is on the trail of big game one should not be influenced by rabbit tracks. For a Party that has a monopoly on patronizing attitudes, let me condemn the Member for patronizing those from Atlantic Canada who would bring forth to this national forum a matter of grave and great importance to their communities across Atlantic Canada and one which affects the whole nation. For him to suggest that a number of Members here are not able to project that great interest and to ensure that their projection of that interest will achieve some national attention is an insult of which only a socialist from the New Democratic Party is capable.

Having disposed of those who follow rabbit tracks when there is a national interest, a national goal and a national subject to be pursued, let me begin by giving full credit to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Fundy—Royal (Mr. Corbett), who took the personal initiative to bring this matter to this national forum.

Last Thursday, on returning to my constituency of Halifax West, I had the opportunity, as I do on a weekly basis, to fly over the Province of New Brunswick. As I was travelling at some 30,000 feet, I saw below, from the jet on which I was travelling, what appeared to be a plume of smoke and a fire which, from that distance, did not appear to be of great concern. However, as we travelled across the Province of New Brunswick there appeared to be several plumes of smoke with apparent fires. When I arrived home at Halifax I received the news that a catastrophe was taking place in the Province of New Brunswick and that almost one year's production of timber lands was being destroyed. I am sure that my colleague from Fundy—Royal reacted in the same manner as any of us hopefully would in that situation and asked what could be done about the matter. What my colleague did at the first opportunity was to bring the matter of the situation in New Brunswick and across Atlantic Canada to national attention through this political forum which allows us to consider the devastation which has been wreaked in Atlantic Canada in the light of the whole problem of forest fires and, hopefully, to seek new ideas and solutions to remedy what has been our failures in the past. I think we all owe a debt of gratitude to the Hon. Member for Fundy-Royal for giving the opportunity to Members of Parliament to involve themselves in this debate in the hope it will accomplish some good.

My second point is to examine not only in the national context, but in the world context, the importance of the forest industry to Canada and particularly to the Atlantic regions. I had occasion to read an article in the Winnipeg Free Press which focused attention on the world problem in relation to the preservation of the forest resource. It pointed to a survey by the World Bank which resulted in a determination that at current rates of exploitation, the world forest cover will be reduced by 50 per cent by the year 2000. The Science Council of Canada has done a survey to indicate the dire situation which exists in Canada with respect to the preservation and enhancement of our forest industry. So we do not have any doubts in our minds that the forest industry involves a resource we have to protect with immediate and important action not only in Canada but throughout the world.

In Canadian terms, the forest industry is one of our most important industries. It accounts nationally for over $13 billion in exports. It employs approximately 300,000 persons and involves the employment of another 600,000 persons. One out of 10 Canadians is affected in terms of employment by the national forest industry. It is interesting to note that the same statistic is reflected in the Province of Nova Scotia where 12,000 Nova Scotians are directly employed in the forest industry and another 18,000 are involved in occupations affected by the forest industry. Again, almost one out of 10 employed Nova Scotians has an interest in terms of employment in the forest industry. So we do not have to underline the importance of the industry to the Atlantic regions, to Canada and, indeed, to the world.

I would like to examine very briefly, because other Hon. Members have touched on this subject, the steps being taken to advance the interests of the forest industry nationally in Nova Scotia and the other Atlantic provinces. One of the first steps taken by the Government of Canada was to establish a separate Ministry of Forestry. I have heard Hon. Members comment that this is not a sufficient step, that there ought to be a separate Department to deal with the forest industry. But as one astronaut said: "One small step at a time". The Government under the Right Hon. Prime Minister took this step to establish a separate Ministry for Canada's forest industry, and I believe there is no person in this House of Commons, or elsewhere, better able to judge the need to progress from there than the current Minister of State for Forestry (Mr. Merrithew). The important thing is that the first step has been taken. There have been a number of other initiatives in terms of program funding and federal-provincial programs which I am sure will be processed and enlarged upon in the future.

There is always a grave and great connection between our forests and the environment. I think that one of the important aspects of the Canadian forest industry is to protect the environment. The Third World countries which have been required to use forest products for heating and other purposes have virtually destroyed that resource and have created a great deal of environmental damage in terms of soil erosion and so on. We want to avoid that kind of problem in Canada. The point is that we proceed with all due haste but have particular concern about the environment and the effects of rapid expansion of forest production on the environment. I think all of this has to be taken in balance and I believe that is exactly what the Government is doing. It has proceeded in the right direction and I think we can look forward to continued progress.

The Province of Nova Scotia has taken a special interest in the forest industry as well, and I want to give public credit to the Hon. Kenneth Streatch, Minister of Lands and Forests, who just recently published a new policy for Nova Scotia in relation to forestry. Part and parcel of that new policy is to double the forest production in Nova Scotia over the ensuing years and decades. I think this is a achievable goal which will result in relatively dramatic increases in employment and economic opportunity for Nova Scotians. The new policy which has been advanced by the Hon. Kenneth Streatch contains general principles which involve scheduling of harvesting, allocation of stands, increased market activity and, most important, a continuing and vigorous sylvaculture program to replace the forest as it is being put into production and productive uses. So we have at both levels of Government, national and provincial, activities focused on forest development. I think we can look forward to an increase in employment and economic products as a result of these efforts by Governments at both levels. I know that what is taking place in Nova Scotia is reflected in the other Atlantic provinces, particularly in New Brunswick and Newfoundland.

Let me return to what I have said is the subject of this debate, namely, the national problem of forest fires. We have already indicated the importance of the forest industrty to Canada. We know that attention has been given to the forest industry by the Government of Canada and by the provincial Governments. Let me review very briefly some aspects of this national problem of forest fires in the context of Atlantic Canada. I do not think it is necessary to outline again the devastation which has been wreaked in the Province of New Brunswick by the proliferation of forest fires. I understand the loss is equivalent to one year's production, and that is very substantial when one considers the effect on the economy of the Province of New Brunswick where over 21,000 New Brunswickers are employed directly by the forest industry and many others are affected by it. In the Province of Nova Scotia the actual loss through forest fires has been limited to 200 acres at this point in time. However, as we know from the New Brunswick experience, as soon as we have dry weather in the spring, the risk of forest fires immediately arises. In fact, last week in the Province of Nova Scotia, the Minister of Lands and Forests had to declare a red alert. Fortunately for the forest industry and unfortunately for vacationing Nova Scotians, there was a subtantial rain storm over the next few days and the alert was withdrawn. But there is always a risk of a forest fire hanging over the heads of all people in the forested parts of Canada.

When one reviews the national media coverage of the situation which existed in New Brunswick, one can see immediately the work done by the volunteers. Those volunteers are not only members of the volunteer fire departments from the communities across Atlantic Canada but are persons who allow themselves to be recruited for the specific purpose of fighting the fire. While I give great credit to those who are involved in volunteer fire departments not only in relation to forest fires but in relation to the community activities in which they are normally involved, I want to underline the credit I wish to give to those Canadians without the experience and training of a volunteer fire department member who become involved in fighting a forest fire. Their inexperience can sometimes lead to risk taking that could result in serious injury and even loss of life. The heroes of the day are those who volunteered, the good Samaritans who came to the aid of those in need.

One also immediately sees the need for very substantial equipment both on the ground and in the air. Water bombers look almost puny compared to the massive fires that are burning on the ground. One can readily understand the need for more and better water bombing equipment. When one sees an ordinary fire hose being used to fight a blaze 18 miles in width, one realizes again the need for very substantial equipment.

I am pleased to note that the Associate Minister of National Defence has indicated the federal Government's involvement in equipping those who were involved in fire-fighting. The Minister referred to the work of the Canadian Interagency Forest Fire Centre. I think this kind of interprovincial and federal-provincial co-operation is the only sensible way to deal with the equipment problem on the ground and in the air.

I would like to deal very specifically with the human element of forest fires. I think a great deal has been said about the concern for the forest industry and the concern for the economic aspects of forest fires in terms of loss of property, income and economic opportunity. However, the important element is the very specific human agony and loss that is involved in forest fires. In that respect, I want to refer to two specific cases that arose from the experience in the Province of New Brunswick.

One might say that I have a good news case and a bad news case, Mr. Speaker. After all, our real concern is the human element. We can talk about equipment and about the economy, but our concern in this Chamber and indeed in the Parliament of Canada must be for the humans involved in these situations.

Nancy Thompson said that she left her home because she could not stand to watch as the fire approached. She returned later to find out that her home had been preserved through the efforts of the St. George Fire Department. This is very typical of the sort of thing we saw depicted in the media and elsewhere regarding the efforts made by those volunteers.

I would like to place on record at least one case of a home being saved by the specific efforts of the St. George Fire Department from Charlotte County, New Brunswick. I would like to point out that effort as being only typical of the kind of efforts that were made. However, I think it is worth-while to be specific about these efforts lest we get caught up in a sea of rhetoric and forget that there are real people helping real people in these situations. That is one situation in which the help resulted in the saving of a family home.

On the other side of the coin, let me refer to the case of Ken Banks who is described as a 50-year-old carpenter and part-time farmer. He lost everything he owned as fire raced through his neighbourhood near Burton last week. Mr. Banks's home was located in Upper Gagetown, which was at the heart of the most serious of the fires, and he lost everything. When Mr. Banks says he lost everything, he means everything. He was wiped out completely. He lost his home, and the woodlot from which he intended to get his winter firewood and earn money for the future was lost totally.

This brings me to the most difficult part of this debate, and that is, liability and responsibility for the forest fires. Mr. Ken Banks lived in the area in which the fire might be attributed to the actions of the military base at Camp Gagetown. I would not rise in the House of Commons to suggest that anyone at Camp Gagetown had done anything of a negligent nature, but the fact is that the Toronto Globe and Mail and other newspapers and media sources in Canada have made that allegation. It has not been denied and appears to have been confirmed that the fire was started as a result of activity at Camp Gagetown.

We in the House of Commons and the Government of Canada represent all the people of Canada. We do not have to defend or attack any particular interest. We can be fair judges of the situation, and all indications are that there may be a responsibility for this fire. If that is the case, I urge the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Nielsen) and the Government of Canada to acknowledge very quickly that responsibility and to take very expeditious action to remedy the harm that has been done. I am sure there is not one Canadian who would want to reject the idea of responsibility to an individual like Mr. Ken Banks who lost his home if there is any basis for liability on the part of the national Government.

This does not mean a condemnation of the Canadian Forces or anyone in the Forces. It is simply recognition of a fact of life. Harm has been done. If it can be compensated by the Government of Canada representing all the people of Canada, let us take that course of action. Let us take it quickly and let us mitigate the losses.

What we learned from these experiences is to look to the future with the resolve to correct the difficulties of the past and to make the forests of Canada safer places for the benefit of all Canadians. If in the course of that process we have to recognize that some wrongful act has taken place in the past, let us do that. Our future is in the forests but our future is also in the people and they are the ones who require the protection as well as the forests.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you for giving me this opportunity this evening to take part in the emergency debate on the tragic situation confronting Canadian men and women in the Maritimes. I say tragic, because it takes at least 30 years for a forest to recover from the disastrous effects of a forest fire. This evening, speaking on behalf of my constituents in the riding of Argenteuil—Papineau and on behalf of all Quebecers, I would like to express my feelings of sympathy to our fellow citizens in the Maritime provinces in these hours of anxiety and tell them that we share their concern.

I also wish to congratulate my hon. friend from Fundy—Royal (Mr. Corbett) for moving the motion for this debate. I think this is an example of what can be done under our new parliamentary reform, which gives the Speaker a chance to allow emergency debates for a limited period of time. I think it is the best way to deal with a topic as important as the one we are considering today.

Mr. Speaker, it is too bad that the Maniwaki Forest Fire Research Centre, announced by the Progressive Conservative Government in November 1985, has not yet opened its doors, because the new technology would help communities and firefighters to cope with this kind of problem. I believe our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has on several occasions mentioned how important our forests are to him, and he was the first person to endorse this project which at the end of May 1986 is now nearing completion.

[English]

The staffing for the centre is well advanced. A chief and three computer programmers were hired on March 1, 1986, and these people are now undergoing intensive training at the Centre de la Société de Conservation de l'Outaouais and at the CFS Petawawa National Forestry Institute. A search is also under way for an electronic engineer to deal with lightning detection systems, weather radar and radio communications. It is expected that this position will be filled this month.

The technology centre will be fully operational by June 1, 1986. The centre's efforts will be directed primarily at implementing, within all components of the Quebec forest fire control organization, other conservation societies and the provincial fire co-ordination centre computerized fire management techniques developed by the Petawawa National Forestry Institute. In time, the centre may also serve the needs of other fire management agencies across the country and perhaps, eventually, internationally as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the centre and the technology it will provide would have been very useful to the people of the Maritimes.

Mr. Speaker, I am also concerned about wildlife. Imagine the distress of wild animals and the irreparable destruction these fires will cause among wildlife in the Maritimes.

Mr. Speaker, I will never forget that when I was a child, there was a forest fire in my community, and things evolved the same as they did in the Maritimes. People got together and developed a very strong sense of community in the face of this disaster, and by working together they managed to control the forest fire, and that is the kind of thing we are still seeing today.

What is unfortunate is that it is impossible to erase this image unless you remove completely what was there before, because a forest fire remains in the minds of people for decades.

Mr. Speaker, my father taught me the importance of the forest when I was very young. I come from a modest family and my father was a farmer. Like all good Quebec farmers, my father worked as a logger during the winter and this was a major source of income for our family. In fact, it helped to pay for our education and little treats. When we were very young, my father taught us the importance of taking care of our forest because it is a national resource which is not inexhaustible.

Mr. Speaker, this stayed in my mind, and during the electoral campaign, even though it can be dangerous to make election promises, I made one in my own constituency, because as you know, the lands in Mirabel were expropriated and these included unique forest where both softwoods and hardwoods were well represented in an area called the Méandre de la Rivière du Nord. I said that the forest was important for me and for the people of my constituency who depend on it. Our forests are not that well-known even though they represent a major source of income, but they are slowly dying.

If we look around we can see that reforestation is badly neglected. Now is the time to take action if we want to have lumber to sell in the future. In 1986 I think we can see for ourselves that there has been a collective laissez-faire approach, perhaps without our predecessors realizing how important this sector was.

I must say that the Quebec Wood Producers Federation—which you know very well, Mr. Speaker—is made up of aggressive and very articulate people under the aegis of the Agricultural Producers' Union. They represent private woodlot owners who have decided to get involved and carry out their own applied research. They want to find ways to solve their problems. I had told them we would help, and that is precisely what we did.

In my riding last Friday, Mr. Speaker, I announced a $60,000 contribution under the farm land development plan set up by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. La Salle) and our Government. I managed to get $60,000 under this development plan by pointing out that farm development includes forests because all agricultural producers own lands where they fell trees. To me it was important that farm land development benefits private woodlot owners as well.

So they decided to prepare a small leaflet: Private forest research, action for our survival. And they will provide us within the next few months with a proposal for the area surrounding the meanders of the Rivière du Nord indicating the type of hardwood there is and what can be done for research. They will determine for instance whether softwood, a fir tree or a birch would grow faster in this and that environment, surrounded by fir trees or pine trees. What conditions make our softwood or our hardwood grow faster?

I am very glad, during tonight's emergency debate, to emphasize just how important our forests are.

I hope therefore that this tragedy which the Maritime provinces are living through today can be used as an example to other Canadian areas in demonstrate for instance to the Western provinces that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure, and also that they need to take preventive measures to avoid such disasters. As a colleague of mine was saying a while ago, there is no point in casting a stone at the responsible party, now that we must face the facts and find a solution. It is all very nice to say: If only we had avoided doing this or that . . . From now on, we should avoid all "ifs" and have a well established policy to prevent other similar tragedies, because we need to preserve our forests which are part of our national heritage.

We have solutions, Mr. Speaker. The Canadian people . . . We have the required technology, science and will. We need to put together proposals, and I am convinced that we will find ways to help substantially our Maritime taxpayers and fellow citizens. I think also that the federal Government has a responsibility when such tragedies occur because I am not sure that insurance companies would cover such Acts of God, including the losses incurred by a farmer such as those mentioned by the Hon. Member who spoke before me.

• (2300)

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I hope this debate will not only give rise to pious wishes or the expression of views on such a tragedy, but will also ensure that together, collectively, we find solutions to help people in the Maritimes. Looking at what Canadians could do for hungry people in Africa, I feel that very close to home, we will together find ways to help our fellow Canadians in the Maritimes.

I would be remiss if I did not refer once more, Mr. Speaker, to the volunteers, people in the area who spared nothing to control that fire. Fortunately, the Lord was there, and He told them: The rain must not fall on Quebec only! So he sent some rain in the Maritimes too, which was a tremendous help in bringing the fire under control.

I would therefore like to commend all the men and women who united in a common effort to tackle that problem, and those who helped firefighters, voluntary firefighters. I am certain they were first on the spot. Fire departments. Those are people whose work often is forgotten, and we seldom have an opportunity to mention their involvement in the community. Now we have an opportunity to do so, especially volunteer fire departments who are not paid for that kind of work, who do it on their own. I would like to take my hat off to them, as we say in Quebec!

I am therefore convinced that my Government, the Progressive Conservative Government, will find a way, in consultation with the provinces and our communities, to relieve the burden on taxpayers in the Maritimes as a result of this tragedy.

Mr. Speaker, thank you for this opportunity to express my views in this debate.

[English]

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, before making a few comments about the subject of forest fires in Newfoundland, I want to give credit to the Hon. Member who moved the motion and those Hon. Members who have spoken thus far on it. However, I caution people as far as fixing blame is concerned for any forest fire. In terms of the forest fire alleged to have been started by the Armed Forces in CFB Gagetown, I was thinking about the charge made by certain people. It is important that the people affected by any forest fire are compensated.

• (2310)

It is important that the people are compensated. If it means that the Armed Forces are to be blamed for a forest fire in order to get somebody compensated, then fine. I have no argument about that. It is very difficult for the Armed Forces personnel who are using shells that contain phosphorus. It is a constant problem for Armed Forces bases on any firing range. The Hon. Member from the New Democratic Party pointed out that they would make sure the Armed Forces would not fire the shells on fine days. They fire shells in the winter-time and in the summer-time, but that is not important. Wherever you have a firing range, you always have the danger of a fire. You are never certain you are going to prevent a fire from starting.

It is a common fact that if a firing range is used in the winter-time and some of the powder from the shell is smothered under the snow, come the spring a fire will start in that area. The danger is always there. It is very difficult if you have been fighting a forest fire to be sure that the fire is out. You can dump tons of water on a particular hot spot and find two or three days later that the flame will re-ignite.

I caution Members and the media about fixing blame for a forest fire. It is important that people be compensated for a loss of property or for the loss of forests in an area. The only formula to deal with that in the federal Government is what is commonly referred to as a natural disaster formula.

If there is a natural disaster in a province, the provincial Government puts up $1 per head of population first. Then the federal Government moves in with about a fifty-fifty split. The federal Government pays for 50 per cent of the additional dollar, and on it goes. It then pays 75 per cent of an additional dollar and then 90 per cent of an additional dollar until it reaches the point where the federal Government pays most of the cost. That is why provincial administrations have been hesitant about applying for money under the natural disaster formula unless the disaster is truly massive. In other words, it covers much more dollars than there is per head of population.

This natural disaster formula is administered by the federal Department of Finance. It is triggered by a request from the provincial Government. The federal Government, to my knowledge, has never turned down any such request by a provincial Government.

Having said that, and having said that it is very important that those who lost property be compensated if at all possible, let me also mention that perhaps more should be done in the co-ordination of water bombers and the establishment of new water bomber fleets throughout the country. As well, Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Armed Forces should examine the possibility of making more use of Armed Forces personnel in fighting forest fires, as they did years ago. Twenty and 30 years ago, as I recall, one of the regiments called the Van Doos would participate frequently in fighting forest fires throughout Canada. The natural disaster formula should be instituted in this case in Newfoundland, in New Brunswick and in Prince Edward Island. As well, thought should be given to greater presence of the Department of National Defence.

I want to make brief reference to the Hon. Member for Carleton—Charlotte (Mr. McCain), who is about to speak in this Chamber in the debate. The Member from Carleton—Charlotte, I believe, will address the Chamber in a few moments and will talk about the cause of forest fires throughout Atlantic Canada. The Member for Carleton—Charlotte is perhaps, and I do not think I am stretching it very much, the most knowledgeable person on the government side in the area of forests and forest management.

Mr. Nickerson: Even further than that.

Mr. Baker: I would say he is perhaps the most knowledgeable person. His knowledge surpasses that of the Minister of State for Forestry (Mr. Merrithew) by a long shot. I say that because I have listened to him over the years in the standing committee. Don't get me wrong, Mr. Speaker. I do not agree with everything he says. In fact, I am not going to agree with what he is about to say in this Chamber. I have listened to him for 13 years and he will put forward a very serious argument that because the Governments of Canada have so restricted the use of insecticides, it has caused a destruction of our forests. Basically that is what the hon. gentleman is about to say. His contribution will perhaps be one of the more important contributions to the debate this evening.

I want to point out to the Member that there is one thing wrong with the argument that he is about to present. What if the Government of Canada had followed through and allowed the amount of insecticide required to kill the spruce budworm, the balsam woolly aphid or the hemlock looper and the one here in Ontario, the gypsy moth? I have no argument against the Ontario Government using Bacillus theringensus, or BT for short. However, I have a serious argument with the Government of New Brunswick and the Government of Newfoundland using the types of chemicals they have been using. The argument is this, and the Hon. Member will say, that because the Government has been so restrictive, forest insects have eaten the forests, causing the trees to dry, causing a natural phenomena to be present whereby forest fires are very easy to start.

If you want to start a small camp-fire, you break off a piece of dry wood, that is certainly not alive. That is what causes, or certainly encourages, forest fires. I will agree with the hon. gentleman if he says that we have been so lax in forest management that we have dead trees lying around throughout the forests in Canada. In the forests in Newfoundland, you do not have to chop down trees to get enough wood for your stove. You can just pick it up along the side of the road or anywhere in the forest.

Over the years the hon. gentleman has put forward a very solid argument with which I disagree. He says that even with our present technology, forest fires will continue to be a threat which will, indeed, continue to get worse. In New Brunswick, in 1957 and 1958 they used DDT without much control. They then used fenithrothion and Matricil. We progressed up the line until the Canadian Forestry Service discovered BT in the Quebec region. Until that was used, I cannot see where there was any great effect in getting rid of the spruce budworm or any other forest insects. They are still there.

The Government of Canada and the provincial governments say they were only trying to control the population. Still, the forests were dying, the trees were drying up, and forest fires were starting very, very quickly. I am not talking about a shell from Armed Forces Base Gagetown. I am talking about a potential shell right around the forests in New Brunswick, Newfoundland, Quebec, and the northern part of Ontario where the infestation of forest insects is a very serious problem.

I have told you approximately what the hon. gentleman is about to say, Mr. Speaker. I believe that he will put forward a very strong argument on a very sensible subject which is well founded in fact, but I strongly disagree with his logic, and I believe that there are other solutions.

The Government of Canada has been lax throughout the years in that it did not pay enough attention to finding a solution to chemical insecticides. The Member for Carleton—Charlotte will have to agree that we do not permit anyone to spray large forest lands with an amount of chemical insecticide sufficient to kill the forest insects. They were never killed and they will not be killed in Newfoundland this year through the use of fenithrothion. They will not be killed in New Brunswick by using whatever they are about to use. I look forward to hearing the Hon. Member for Carleton—Charlotte put forward his argument, which will perhaps be one of the better arguments put forward here this evening.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I suppose that is the price you pay for associating with people whom you might otherwise call friends. I do consider the Member for Gander—Twillingae (Mr. Baker) to be a constructive Member of this House most of the time. I have enjoyed his remarks and his predictions are, in part, correct. I will address them from the beginning.

At no time has the Government of Canada ever devoted the necessary research to the preservation of the forest structures of Canada. That is because we assumed that we had enough wood that we could waste it, burn it, and pillage it in our silvaculture practices. Our supply problem was never recognized in New Brunswick until some time in the last 15 years. We have known that our cut has exceeded the growth in the forests of New Brunswick. Even though we have established a level of allowable cuts, we have still exceeded the growth of our forests in the province. We must put that against a background in which we never even approached the production of the forests of New Brunswick as long as the budworm did not exist in a serious way, although it has always existed. As long as that forest was effectively sprayed, we still had growth exceeding the cut. It was effectively sprayed in the 1950s.

I am not saying that we should go back to DDT. I am saying that when all the scientists in Canada get together and give a convincing argument that BT will never mutate and never attack anything except spruce budworm, I will be much more prone to the use of BT than I am now.

I happen to have a sick grandson in the hospital at the moment. He has an infection which has developed an immunity to the drug which was being used. He has been seriously ill. The only way that that could happen is because of a mutation of the virus present in his little system today. There must have been an element of mutation, an adjustment to the environment in which it has thrived, namely the human body, so that it resists whatever drug was used to fight it. There is ample proof that those little critters which infect the health of birds, animals or insects do indeed have a mutative capability to develop an opportunity to survive in the presence of pesticides. It has happened in agriculture so many times that one could make an endless list. When the scientists of Canada promise me that there will be no mutation in BT, I will give it my wholehearted support. However, they must explain why other organisms do, in effect, develop resistance to the drugs which mankind has made for control.

There are biodegradable pesticides on the market which would be effective. When they become biodegradable, the residual effect and impact of them is negligible if at all important in the environment in which they exist and in which they will be sprayed. The trick is to learn how little we can use to control the population, how little carrier or solvent we need to distribute the insecticide, and how often we have to spray for it to be effective. These are the things which the Government of Canada, the pesticide corporations, the pulp corporations and the provinces have never intensively attacked.

For instance, not long ago I read in one of the Ontario papers that 57 million acres of forest in the Province of Ontario is infected with budworm to one degree or another. That is probably more forest land than all of Atlantic Canada can claim. That is a multibillion dollar capability for economic benefit of the country which is threatened if it is not addressed in some way. We are farming the forests of this land and if we are to maintain the economic viability of the industry, we have to address it as a farming operation from here on in. This is particularly true in New Brunswick which, for somewhere between 10 and 15 years, has been cutting more than natural growth has regenerated. We are looking at losing a billion-dollar industry in that province, or at least a significant part of it, if we do not have policies which are going to guard the value of that forest land and keep it growing.

We may attack the spraying program of the 1950s but it killed at least 95 per cent of the bugs. When that was done the forest needed spraying only every three to five years. We do not know what percentage of the bugs is being killed by existing sprays, and this is carelessness on the part of Government, regardless of who is the Prime Minister of the day. We do not know the degree of control we are getting because we are not monitoring as effectively as we did in the 1950s. This is not acceptable.

My plea is that we now address the issue of how we can protect the environment in every way. Flora and fauna have been mentioned in the debate tonight. What flora and fauna is there in those burned-over acres in New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island or Newfoundland? There are a lot of dead bodies, a lot of burned-up blossoms and no birds. We have to find a balance between the ecology and the economy. We have to get to a position where we respect the flora, the fauna and the economy. I am convinced that this can, should, indeed must be done. The corporations, the provinces and the Government of Canada must join forces.

This tragedy is not over tonight even where the fires are out. The tragedy continues in a province which is deficient in wood production and has now lost a full year's production. We are one year closer to the critical point where unemployment starts to occur. Do we know what trees should be planted in these burned-over areas? Do we know how much of the soil has been destroyed? How can the soil be restored? Are we going to plant a tree in soil which will grow a 10-inch pine stump in 75 years? I have seen one of those stumps in an area of New Brunswick which had been burned over after the budworm infestation of the early 1930s. Fire swept through New Brunswick at that time, too. There was a 75-year old pine about that big when it should have been much bigger. The soil would not produce effectively the pine species on that burned-over land.

The Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker) is not very far away from where I stand on this. He gave my speech for me. He mentioned Matricile, a biodegradable pesticide. It is effective and has little if any residue. Some of the others he named are not acceptable to me or the ecology groups who are so adamantly against spraying. I do not know about the rest of Canada, but there has been roughly $3 billion in gross product loss in Atlantic Canada. These fires have been fed in part at least by the kindling left behind by the budworm. They created an inferno which was virtually unstoppable. The wood was absolutely dry and ready to burn. Another reason is that the ground was not covered by the foliage which ordinarily grows there. The soil dried out far earlier than it otherwise would have. Now this fire has destroyed the soil as well and I do not know how long it will take to replace that growth.

In conclusion, I want to congratulate my friend and colleague from Fundy—Royal for moving the motion and the Speaker for accepting it. I think it is a very critical moment. Perhaps it is a disaster only in Atlantic Canada at the moment, but it can be a disaster in any province in Canada. It is a situation which demands an outright attack on the silvaculture policies of this land and the preservation of the forest for future generations. We cannot continue the silvaculture practices that were in use when we had wood running out of our ears, wood far in excess of our needs. That situation no longer exists in Atlantic Canada. We are getting close to a shortage in other provinces in Canada. We have to look at how many water bombers we need, what research we need, what kind of forest protection and silvaculture practices we need. We have not done this in the past and I am very disappointed that we have not attacked it up to this point in time.

It has not been a political discussion this evening and I commend those who have discussed the matter in this debate for their constructive ideas. Those who have suffered losses have my sympathy. Not all of them are in Gagetown and they have little if any hope of compensation. They have my sympathy. To those fire departments which worked so hard in New Brunswick, whether it is Saint John, Gagetown, St. George or wherever, it made no difference. They worked on behalf of their fellow man to the very best of their ability and, in many instances, at the risk of their lives. To all those I offer my sincerest congratulations.

Mr. Lawrence I. O'Neil (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Hon. Member for Fundy—Royal (Mr. Corbett) for moving this motion, as well as Members of Parliament from Atlantic Canada for their fine comments on the importance of our forestry sector. It is a $30 billion industry in Canada and accounts for more than $500 million of the gross provincial product of Nova Scotia. Forests cover three-quarters of the Province of Nova Scotia, and 92 per cent of that is considered productive. That is nearly 3.8 million hectares of usable forests. For every thousand cords of wood harvested and processed in Nova Scotia, we get approximately five direct jobs and up to 10 more are created elsewhere in our economy. Obviously, to get the maximum return from the development of our forests, we must manage them properly.

Our Government has made a concrete commitment to Canadian forestry and its improved management. We have named a Minister of State for Forestry (Mr. Merrithew) to ensure that the industry has a voice at the cabinet table. We now have in place across Canada more than $1 billion in federal-provincial agreements for forest management activities. In the case of Nova Scotia, more than $18 million has been spent to date for forest improvement under the current Canada-Nova Scotia forest resource development agreement. In Cape Breton this represents $2.5 million in forest management activity. That is a wise investment in an important resource. Recently we announced that $10 million under a special Nova Scotia-Canada agreement would be directed to the Cape Breton forests alone.

One of the vehicles we have been using in Nova Scotia to improve management of our forests is the group venture vehicle. It began in 1975 with a group of interested citizens who formed a limited company to prepare and implement forest management plans on the company's shareholders' properties. In 1978, eight group ventures were operating, and today 16 such group ventures are operating covering more than 60,000 hectares and involving 900 members.

• (2340)

This year these groups received $1.7 million in forest improvement assistance from the Canadian Forestry Service. These groups are funded under the FRDA group venture program. Each will receive approximately $200,000 in federal support and another $100,000 in provincial funding by 1987. It is hoped that each of these groups will provide about ten to 13 permanent jobs.

These programs are different in that they bring together private woodlot owners and give to them the responsibility to manage their lands to ensure that the maximum economic and social benefits accrue to their communities.

In my riding, in particular, we have a large pulp and paper producer who is really an important part of our economy. This industry employs 800 to 900 people directly, both on the plant site and in the forests. This company has been a leader in forest management techniques imported from Sweden, such as silvaculture techniques. This company has been a leader in dealing with badly infected hectares resulting from spruce budworm, which devastated the Highlands area of Cape Breton and eastern Nova Scotia over the last decade.

It is the success this company has shown which has permitted the federal Government to work with the province to put in place many more initiatives that will result in a far healthier resource, and one from which we can get long-term benefits.

I know there are many other Members from Atlantic Canada who wish to comment on our forestry industry, and for that reason I will close now and emphasize the importance of the Government responding to the compensation needs of the land owners and people affected by the recent disastrous fires in Atlantic Canada.

Mr. W. R. Bud Jardine (Northumberland—Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I also welcome this opportunity to say a few words at this late hour in the emergency debate. It is something that has affected all of Atlantic Canada. The hockey game is over, it is a quarter to one in Atlantic Canada, and most of the people are asleep. It is the sleep of peace, Mr. Speaker, because in the last few days very few of them enjoyed it. My riding of Northumberland-Miramichi is the largest geographical riding in the country and the forest fires threatened literally the length and breadth of the riding.

I had the opportunity yesterday of being airborne in a helicopter and had a chance to see, firsthand, the damage and the devastation that a forest fire can cause, not just in one location, but in many up and down the river, the homes that were destroyed, the fishing camps, the lodges and the cottages. People had to evacuate communities like Newcastle, Douglastown and Northumberland-Miramichi. There were people who did not want to leave their homes and the mayors literally had to go out and force them out in order to protect their lives. We are grateful, of course, that there was no loss of life. When people did get back and looked at their property, the lucky ones saw that, indeed, the fire on many occasions encircled them, and others came back to see nothing but ash.

One would be remiss if one did not speak of the co-operation that took place during this crisis, the co-operation between people in Lands and Forests, Natural Resources and the Department of National Defence. I would have to mention names like Hayward Sturgen, who was responsible for co-ordinating the over-all firefighting effort. I was airborne with Bill Stewart, Department of Natural Resources who, for the last 72 hours or so, was able to subsist on four hours of sleep at night. I flew along with him as he surveyed from the air the continual flare-ups. He co-ordinated the over-all attack, landing here and there to help direct the fire-fighting effort on the ground. Without the co-operation of the base commander, Canadian Forces Base Chatham, without the use of his equipment, the foam trucks, many, many homes would have been lost. Some of the areas affected by the fire were Newcastle, 13,000 plus acres that had been burning out of control; Kirkwood in the Barnaby River area, 1900 acres; Trout Brook, over 80,000 acres; Quarry Ville, 500 acres; Barryville, 5 acres; Burnt Church, 150 acres; Otter Brook, A. Daigle, Escuminac, Eel River, Kouchbouquac Park, Carrigan, and the list goes on and on.

There was devastation, the loss of future income that was affected by this, not just the private woodlot owners, and, indeed, that is a serious consideration, but also the angling, the camps, the outriggers, the Tabusintac River where so many camps were lost, and these people depend on that kind of livelihood at this time of year for the sports fishermen who come to that particular area. It is very, very difficult to assess in dollars what the total impact and loss will be to them individually and collectively. A lot of the fowl and wildlife was also affected.

I know the Minister of State for Forestry (Mr. Merrithew) would like to be here to participate in this debate. I know how close he is to the forestry, not only through the entire country, the province, but in my particular riding. He is in Scandinavia on important business.

The warm response received by the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Andre) from all Members of the House will be noted when he said, in conjunction with the statement about the fire at Gagetown, that after the findings of the board of inquiry compensation for those affected would be dealt with expeditiously and with generosity. In that regard I would hope that in the Government's generosity the same consideration and assistance will be forthcoming to those in the rest of the province. The Government has concern and compassion for the people.

In closing, I would like to say that it was heartening to see not only the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), but six or seven other Ministers in the House. Much has been said about the lack of attention from time to time that the Government has shown Atlantic Canada, and I think in the time of crisis we know who is in support and behind Atlantic Canada, it is the Government of Canada.

Mr. Bob Brisco (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to express my appreciation to the Member for Fundy Royal (Mr. Corbett) for bringing on this emergency debate on the fire situation in the Maritimes. I heard one critic earlier on say that this was an intrusion into Hockey Night in Canada, but I am sure those of us here tonight are quite prepared to speak on a matter of this importance.

• (2350)

Last summer in British Columbia, certainly in Kootenay West, we saw the same type of forest holocaust that is currently affecting the Maritimes. Certainly because of the size of the province, the nature of the terrain and the size of the timber, the fires were greater in their magnitude and their fury. However, a forest fire is still a forest fire and the absence of underbrush, the terrain, the weather and a host of variables can either make it strong or weak.

The fires in British Columbia last summer were uniformly strong. In that context, I want to express my appreciation for the advancement in the reporting system of fires and fire strikes that have been put in place in British Columbia and other areas of Canada. I want to speak specifically about the sophistication in British Columbia because I recall last summer, at the height of the conflagrations, being at a mill office in Slocan when a thunderstorm rolled in. Within minutes, there was a telephone call indicating that there was a strike at one location, a strike at a second location and a third strike at another location. The sophistication was such that up to 100 lightning strikes could be indicated in given areas as well as which ones generated a fire. It is that kind of sophistication, which can indicate precisely where those strikes occur, that is needed at least to help fight a fire.

The ultimate task falls upon the technology of men, women and their muscle in combination with the experience of foresters and the sophistication of the equipment.

I had ample opportunity to talk to those who were on the fire lines. As well, as a young man I experienced it myself. I spent three useful, worth-while, healthy and sometimes hazardous summers fighting fires in British Columbia. It is an experience I will not forget and one that I am pleased to have had because it taught me a great deal of respect for both my colleagues who were fighting the fires and for the hazards associated with fighting forest fires.

There is really nothing quite like a forest fire. Fire-fighters are sometimes engulfed in smoke. They have to put up with the intense heat and the very hot sun, the dirt and dust as well as a terrific thirst. Perspiration runs down their eyes, and I swear that one's tongue hangs out a yard. Fighting forest fires requires a system of supply to keep these men in reasonable comfort under the circumstances. They need spare clothing and fire-fighting equipment. Such an operation involves a massive investment in order to make fire-fighting equipment available. The marshalling of men in camps must be made very quickly, with foremen doing a first-class job in setting up tent towns, bringing in cooks and food and arranging a supply line. All the while, they never know what kind of fire it will be, where it will take place and whether it will be on such a steep slope that it will simply have to burn.

During that period last summer, in the heat and intensity of those fires, I talked to those men who were covered in dirt, charcoal, sweat and burns. Their first dedication was to the job. It is important to note that some of these men were taken from the mines, the forests and other jobs in order to fight the fires. They did not complain because they knew a job had to be done. However, some of these men had seasonable employment which, in many cases, paid UI benefits. They were put on a job which is described in the Province of British Columbia as a disaster response with no UI benefits. There were also volunteers on that fire line who were receiving UI benefits and others who had no UI benefits.

I expressed the view that these men and women should be covered by unemployment insurance benefits because they were doing honest work in a dedicated fashion. It was suggested that such a step would only encourage arson. There was only one proven case of arson in all the fires that swept through British Columbia last summer.

After my discussions with these fire-fighters, I approached the Department of Revenue and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) in the middle of the summer. I also expressed my concern to my caucus colleagues from British Columbia, which they accepted and supported. The Government's response was quick—I would venture to say in the space of two weeks—and it was to amend the regulations under the Unemployment Insurance Act so that forest fire-fighters who were brought on to the fire lines by the provincial departments of forestry would be covered under the UIC.

The only problem is that this is a co-operative venture and that some of the provinces—British Columbia in this case—have not accepted that proposal. I cannot for the life of me understand why it has not accepted this proposal because it is the Government of Canada that is paying the bill through the taxpayers of Canada. Perhaps the provincial Government is concerned that including all of these additional people in its Department of Forestry will inflate the numbers in its books and will be challenged in the provincial legislature for having more man-years than it planned. However, what opposition Member would challenge the Government on that basis when it is clear that the reason for these increased man-years is the need to provide UI benefits for those fire-fighters who are put on the workforce of that particular Department?

In conclusion, I want to thank the Hon. Member for Fundy—Royal for bringing about this debate. It has given me an opportunity to put on the record of the House of Commons the dedication of the men and women who fought those fires last summer, the response of my colleagues to a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, and to indicate the outstanding speed with which the matter was addressed by the Minister of Revenue (Mr. Mackay) and the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Finally, it is time for the provinces, along with the Government, to begin a co-operative venture so that each province will have the same provision for UI benefits.

Mr. Fennell: Mr. Speaker, I believe the House would give unanimous consent to permit the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) to talk for up to 10 minutes and to extend the time from 12 o'clock to 12.10 a.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to not see the clock—

[Translation]

—to allow the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme) to continue his speech for ten minutes?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to thank the chief Government Whip for letting me join all my colleagues in speaking here this evening. I think it is appropriate that all Members be given a chance to take part in the debate, irrespective of the region they come from, because after all, this country draws its strength from the solidarity of the provinces.

When everybody is happy as they are now in Vancouver because of Expo, all Canadians rejoice. When tragedy strikes as is the case now in the Maritimes, in Atlantic Canada, the whole country suffers. That is what our Confederation is all about. That is what makes us proud to be Canadians.

I want to thank my friend the Hon. Member for Fundy—Royal (Mr. Corbett) who raised this issue, and Mr. Speaker who agreed that it was an urgent matter to be debated this evening. For having spoken to you, Mr. Speaker, I know that as the Member for Verchères you too would have liked to join in the debate and add a few comments to what has been said tonight, but your important responsibilities prevented you from doing so since you must listen without getting involved.

In my opinion, this is one of those rare occasions when I can speak for the Chair and all my colleagues, as they may have spoken for us at times, for nobody can remain insensitive to this kind of tragedy. And I would like to remind Quebecers—

[English]

I would also like to remind Canadians in other provinces that this is the time for solidarity. It is not the time for partisan politics. It is a time when we can show that a tragedy taking place in one part of Canada affects us as much as if it were taking place in our province, in which case it would be a tragedy in which the Hon. Member for Fundy—Royal (Mr. Corbett) would feel he must participate and give his time and effort in order to make his own province understand that there is a solidarity we have to exercise with each other.

I listened to most of the speeches tonight and, because of the hour, I do not believe I can add very much except to say that we must be prepared at all times with all of our know how, technology and manpower to assist when a tragedy of this kind takes place in Canada.

With respect to world tragedy, I was saying recently that we should have a prepared team to assist in the kinds of tragedy which take place in the world and especially the kinds of tragedy which take place in Canada. Forestry is one of our greatest riches. That was said well in the letter sent by the Hon. Member for Fundy-Royal to the Speaker, and it has been said tonight by all Hon. Members who spoke in the debate.

We in this great vast land have been blessed by God with much and we should be ready to help any individual province. We must not hesitate. We must immediately get on the phone and say: "Mr. Premier, is there anything we can do? We are ready right now". Our Armed Forces should do the same, not only because it happened to be an army base which was involved. Our Armed Forces in Canada would be delighted to be on the alert for this kind of tragedy. They could be ready and waiting for the signal by the Minister, the Associate Minister, or the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) at the request of a province.

I will not abuse the privilege given to me to speak after the hour, but as a Canadian living in Quebec, I have to say at least a few words to let the House know that my province deeply regrets this tragedy and is ready to join with the rest of Canada to help. After all, it is not the maritimes which is attacked. It is all of Canada. In the name of Canadian solidarity, we have to be ready to make the necessary sacrifices if need be in order to help these people in the Atlantic region. Many of them lost almost everything they owned. Many of them lost what is best in life, a job. Losing everything on their land is losing everything they own.

I want to again thank my colleagues who made it possible to have this debate tonight, and I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for your patience in listening to all of us so late. As Chairman of the Members' Services, I would like to thank the very able staff who stayed with us so late, and I see that everyone still has a smile. They are saying: "Yes, we do not mind staying because we are showing Canadians that at times we can put aside the division of our political Parties". Tonight it was a Canadian show of solidarity for people who suffer in this country, and I really wanted to be part of it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour being midnight, pursuant to Standing Order 29(13), I declare the motion carried.

This House stands adjourned until later this day at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

The House adjourned at 12.08 a.m.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

TORONTO TELEVISION STATION TAKEOVER APPLICATION

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the CRTC is about to decide whether the takeover of the Toronto multilingual television station, MTV, by Rogers Cable Television should be approved. MTV has become an institution in Toronto. It has served exceptionally well not only the ethnocultural community but also the community at large. It has fostered a better understanding between people of all races. It has allowed a sharing of the rich multicultural beauty of Canada.

The Rogers Cable takeover of MTV raises a number of serious questions. The takeover may present a threat to the very purpose and raison-d'être of MTV.

I would hope that the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Jelinek) has obtained assurances that the multicultural mandate of MTV will continue and be strengthened. Control of MTV should not be transferred to those who lack complete understanding of multicultural television. If the transfer of MTV to Rogers is approved, I call upon the Government to ensure, at the very least, that the current application before the CRTC on the national multilingual television network is held in abeyance pending further—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Sixty seconds.

EMPLOYMENT FUNDING FOR NON-PROFIT GROUPS IN WINNIPEG

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, over the last few weeks a coalition of non-profit groups has emerged in Winnipeg. It is concerned about being left out of the employment funds allocated by the Government under Challenge '86 and the Canadian Jobs Strategy. This group called FACE represents some 75 to 100 groups, being a cross-section of the community, including native people, women, disabled, and those involved in day care. They have been waiting for answers for funding under the Canadian Job Strategy since last October. What they see happening is an arbitrary allocation of funds. Some groups get money, others don't. A lot of the money is going into the private sector now. In the past these groups got money under Canada Works. Now the money is having to be shared with private consultants and the private sector.

• (1405)

If the indication of spending over the last year is any benchmark, there is less money for non-profit groups, and these groups—

RAILWAYS

FUTURE OF CN SHOPS AT MONCTON

Mr. Dennis H. Cochrane (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, for the past year the CN shops located in my federal constituency of Moncton have been the subject of an internal assessment conducted by CN regarding its maintenance capacity. The study supposedly involves Montreal and Winnipeg as well as Moncton, but fears exist that CN's attention is centred only on the Moncton facility as the location to be closed or downsized.

The Moncton shops are the largest single industrial employer in the Province of New Brunswick, employing approximately 1,000 people and injecting over $70 million annually into the Atlantic economy. Their existence is of vital economic concern to the Province of New Brunswick and represents a major federal contribution to the economy of Atlantic Canada.

It is past time that a clear signal be sent by our Government to Canadian National that closure or significant lay-offs by CN at the Moncton shops is totally unacceptable and will not be tolerated. The Government of Canada has a responsibility to Atlantic Canada and Atlantic Canadians, and must ensure that CN continues to operate its shops in Moncton at viable employment levels. I urge the Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) to take immediate action in order to live up to our federal commitment to Atlantic Canada by instructing Canadian National—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Sixty seconds.

SHIPYARDS

FUTURE PROSPECTS

Mr. Édouard Desrosiers (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): For several days now, Mr. Speaker, Opposition Members have been trying to intimidate Quebec shipyard workers by making every kind of unfounded allegations concerning our Government's plans about the survival of this major industry.

As a responsible Government we have decided to give serious consideration to this matter and to launch a consultation process involving all participants. Unlike the Liberals who for 20 years ignored the shipbuilding industry and let it go down the drain, we in the Conservative Party want to make sure it will survive to become a strong and prosperous business.

Mr. Speaker, my riding is home to Versatile Vickers, one of Canada's most productive and efficient shipyards. The workers need not worry about the ongoing process because the shipbuilding industry can indeed look forward to a promising future throughout Quebec.

CHALLENGE '86

EMPLOYMENT FUNDING OF NON-PROFIT ORGANIZATIONS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we were treated to the spectacle of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) defending government policies which mean this summer there will be hundreds, if not thousands, of children in camps for the mentally retarded who will be denied service, denied a chance to go to camp. At the same time the Government is funding projects like running rides at La Ronde, working in 7-Eleven stores, and stocking shelves for the Oshawa group.

I think it is an outrage that the Government's quota system for the private sector has meant that many, in fact thousands of good public and non-profit projects have been turned down or have been cut back. There has been a 44 per cent cut in the city of Toronto. At the same time the private sector is getting funded for projects which will never lead to any kind of professional development.

We do not need funding for 7-Eleven stores in this country. We need good non-profit funding, the kind that was delivered under past Liberal Governments and will be delivered in the future if we get a chance to cut back on this Government's private sector privatization fetish.

FRANCOPHONE COUNTRIES

UTILIZATION OF FRENCH LANGUAGE COMPUTER SOFTWARE

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): In Montreal recently, Mr. Speaker, after the francophone summit in Paris, the Governments of Canada and Quebec played hosts to officials responsible for data processing in francophone countries.

Under the theme "The computer and its applications in francophone countries", the Agency for Cultural and Technical Co-operation invited member States to a one-week seminar.

The objectives were, first to consider problems related to the development and use of French language computer software and, second, to draft strategies for data processing projects. One of the central issues was the advent of a new kind of international co-operation based on a spirit of partnership.

We urge all participants to continue their efforts to promote wider use of French language computer software.

VISIBLE MINORITIES

INTERNMENT OF JAPANESE CANADIANS DURING WORLD WAR II—COMPENSATION ISSUE

Mr. Ernie Epp (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend the National Association of Japanese Canadians stated that $25,000 for each surviving internee and a $50 million community fund would represent appropriate compensation for wartime losses. The Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Jelinek) has talked carelessly in the past of redress demands which might exceed $5 million. He has rejected the Price Waterhouse calculations of $443 million. Now he is critical of the NAJC proposal which would cost no more than $300 million.

The time has surely come for the Government to review negotiations with the NAJC. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) promised the Japanese Canadian community a redress settlement. Does he think a $6 million human rights foundation represents adequate redress? Is he going to continue letting a flippant Minister pursue this issue in his own divisive way? When will the Prime Minister demonstrate his grasp of proper redress by sending Government representatives to negotiate with the NAJC?

CANADA POST CORPORATION

LACK OF HOME DELIVERY SERVICES IN NEPEAN—CARLETON CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Bill Tupper (Nepean—Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian postal system daily touches every home and business in Canada. Canadians expect and depend on good mail service. My constituents in Nepean—Carleton are growing increasingly frustrated with the current postal system. Given that the urban component of the riding is growing rapidly, hundreds of new home owners do not receive home delivery. Many travel several kilometres to pick up mail at postal outlets on busy arterials, with limited and inadequate parking. My constituents who use public transit for work or shopping, the poor and the elderly, find it next to impossible to visit these postal outlets regularly. This is an intolerable inequity which I hope will be quickly rectified.

I urge the Government to reverse years of deterioration in mail service and to deliver to Canadians a mail service that they once knew, one that is efficient, reliable, equitable, and respected.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NUCLEAR POWER PLANTS—NEED FOR INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION AND CREATION OF PUBLIC INFORMATION CENTRE

Mr. Guy St-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Chernobyl disaster in the Soviet Union and the world nuclear situation give us all cause for concern. The future of Abitibi and Canada is at stake, and I am thinking not only of human beings but all living things on this planet.

This disaster should mark the beginning of a new era in international relations, and although I am not criticizing nuclear power programs, I must say I prefer hydro-electric projects such as the James Bay project in Quebec.

We should ask for an international convention and create a public information centre that would be open 24 hours a day, because we know now the world has already had ten nuclear accidents that were not revealed to the public.

MARINE TRANSPORTATION POLICY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, today, 2,000 people from the Sorel area have come here again, to demonstrate like the people who came from Montreal and Quebec City. They have to come begging for jobs because of the injustice perpetrated by this Conservative Government.

Mr. Speaker, during the election campaign, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and his Members promised us a marine transportation policy and jobs. Today, they have given the competition a mandate for rationalizing and phasing out shipyards.

I hope the Conservative Members from Quebec will wake up, so we will not get the same raw deal we got when the Gulf refinery was shut down in Montreal East.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT'S PERFORMANCE

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, in this morning's Globe and Mail, the editorial page was very positive about the achievements of our Government.

In major areas, the ideas, achievements, actions and changes that have been made by our Government deserve applause. Our economic policies have contributed to prosperity and begun to yield significant results in restoring public finance and controlling the deficit.

Our tax and trade policies which welcome investment and our deregulation policy have helped to bring down interest rates and sustain the value of the Canadian dollar.

Our rapprochement with the provinces and with the United States has reduced obstacles to economic growth and reinforced national unity.

Our foreign policy has shown more energy and consistency than we had ever seen under the previous Government. We have reformed our parliamentary process, which has helped to improve Government management.

Mr. Speaker, those are concrete achievements that were publicly recognized today, May 21, 1986, by the Globe and Mail.

HOUSING

RESIDENTIAL REHABILITATION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of this House and the people of Canada the disgraceful actions of the federal Government and the Minister responsible for housing with regard to the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, or RRAP as it is widely known.

The actions of the Minister have resulted in less money being allocated, fewer people being given assistance, and the criteria for eligibility being tightened beyond any reasonable conditions. The consequence of these ill-advised actions is that people who would have received funding last year are now going to receive absolutely no funding whatsoever.

The Minister has quite simply abdicated his responsibilities and set those Canadians in need of housing assistance adrift with little or no hope of receiving much needed Government assistance. The conclusion one must draw from all this is that the Minister must be removed if he is not going to protect the interests of those who desperately need his help.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It is no coincidence that today, at the outset of negotiations for free trade with the United States, the U.S. Secretary of the Treasury, James Baker, sent an ultimatum to Canada to raise the value of our dollar. Does the Prime Minister feel that the U.S. can continue to put this kind of economic pressure on our country as part of the price for free trade? Will he not make it clear that his Government is not going to be pushed around in order to keep these negotiations going?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, that is a preposterous point of view. The Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition knows full well that Secretary Baker delivered himself of a response to a question that was, as far as we are concerned, rather academic. We are members of the—

Mr. Waddell: It is always academic.

Mr. Mulroney: Absolutely. We are grateful for the rise, but it is quite academic because Canada, as the Minister explained, is a full partner in G-Seven now and we will work with all of our partners to strengthen our national and international economies.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): The question is not academic at all. When the American negotiators start looking at our $22 billion trade surplus with the U.S., they will look at the value of our dollar as part of the price. It is not academic at all.

[Translation]

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER TELEPHONE UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the United States, which has been attacking our forestry workers, our farmers, our social programs, our cultural identity, has now launched an attack on the value of the dollar.

Will the Prime Minister finally decide to call up his friend, the President of the United States, and tell him he is going too far?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is quick to turn into a demagogue. After all, the trade talks are only starting—

Mr. Malépart: And the Canadian Constitution!

Mr. Mulroney: If it isn't the constitutional expert from Montreal—Sainte-Marie again!

The trade talks are only getting started today. In fact, these negotiations will provide the basis for discussions between our two countries, in order to take a serious look at certain problems and deal with them. And that is what we are doing today: Ambassador Reisman for Canada and Ambassador Murphy for the Americans. There will be quite a few problems to discuss before the final settlement, and we will have to come to terms with certain realities. We are going to have a mature discussion about our various problems with a view to creating a national and international climate that will result in a new dimension of prosperity for Canada and new jobs for Canadians.

LUMBER EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has taken the position that the President of the United States has nothing to do with the current American attack on our lumber exports, this despite a clear letter from the President to Senator Packwood. Is the truth not revealed in that letter where the President promised to play tough with our lumber industry in order to get the free trade negotiations on the rails? Will the Prime Minister call his good friend President Reagan and say "Back off, back off on our lumber exports"?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): There are too many Edward G. Robinson movies being watched over there.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: If the Americans—

Mr. Axworthy: It is better than watching the Keystone Cops over there.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: "You dirty rat, you".

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: I missed that, and I missed the gymnastics lesson last week by the Member for Hamilton East.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think I will go to the next questioner.

APARTHEID

SOUTH AFRICA—ATTACKS ON NEIGHBOURING COUNTRIES—CANADIAN POSITION

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Secretary of State for External Affairs told us that he would take no further action with respect to South Africa until he had consulted with our ambassador and our friends in the Commonwealth and elsewhere. What further action, beyond attacks and acts of war on three adjacent states by the South African regime, is necessary before Canada decides to terminate its diplomatic relations?

• (1420)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would hope that all Members of this House would want to give our priority to using every instrument we have to ending apartheid in South Africa, and not simply direct our attention toward attracting headlines in Canada. I would hope that would be the premise of the policy of the Liberal Party, as it is the premise of our policy and, I believe, from the tone of the questions by the Leader of the New Democratic Party yesterday, the approach being taken by the NDP.

We have been in preliminary consultation with High Commissioners of the Commonwealth countries who are in Canada. Roy McMurtry is meeting today in London under the auspices of the Commonwealth group in the subcommittee dealing with South Africa. I have called home our ambassador, and we will be getting his direct information on the situation in South Africa. We will be meeting Archbishop Scott, who has been a member of the Eminent Persons Group. We are seeking evidence of ways in which we can bring action and influence, either alone or with others, against apartheid. That is what we intend to do.

[Translation]

REQUEST THAT CANADA SEVER DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH SOUTH AFRICA

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri—Westmount): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. We quite agree with the spirit of the answer, but what else will South Africa have to do for Canada to decide to break off diplomatic relations with this country? He didn't answer that question.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canada is now proceeding to consider, with other Commonwealth countries, the feasibility of effective action within the Commonwealth. It is very important for all of us to maintain the effectiveness of this institution. And that is why yesterday, the Prime Minister of Canada telephoned to consult directly with the President of Zambia, Mr. Kenneth Kaunda. And that is why today we are continuing our consultations. It would of course be easy for us to take some kind of action against South Africa. However, to us, it is not a matter of making a gesture. What we want is the end of the apartheid system, and that is the objective of this Government and the Commonwealth.

TRADE

COMPOSITION OF TEAM NEGOTIATING FREE TRADE

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. In Ottawa today, talks are beginning with the Americans on the subject of free trade. According to the Minister, the Government intends to talk about Canadian realities. Does the Minister really believe that Canadian realities are accurately reflected in this important negotiating team that has only one francophone and one woman?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer is no. Ambassador Reisman's team is a preliminary one. We must point out that sitting at the table for Canada today we had Mrs. Sylvia Ostry, an internationally respected economist, as well as a francophone woman responsible for legal matters. However, we read the comments in the press today and we agree that the Canadian team should reflect Canadian society more accurately.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, one would have hoped the thinking would have gone on before the mistake was discovered.

[Translation]

But I am very pleased the Minister intends to change the team. That is a good thing.

LAUNCHING OF COUNTERVAILING ACTION BY U.S. LUMBER INDUSTRY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): I have another question to direct to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Considering the countervailing action initiated Monday in the United States against Canadian softwood producers, who thought they were producing already under a free trade agreement in this sector, could result in the loss of up to 45,000 jobs in British Columbia alone, I want to ask the Minister if Mr. Reisman was instructed today to say to the Americans that they cannot have it both ways. If they want the trade talks to continue they have got to stop the countervailing actions in the United States now.

• (1425)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Minister for International Trade made it very clear in the House yesterday, as he, I, and others have on several occasions, that the purpose of these negotiations is to bring to an end, or at least substantially modify, a situation where Canadian interests can be threatened in the way they are being threatened now by countervailing action. We hope that these negotiations may lead to an alternative. The NDP wants us to stop the negotiations before an alternative can be found.

Mr. Broadbent: The New Democratic Party wants the Government to stand up for Canadian jobs for once. That is what the NDP wants.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, considering that all the men and women working in this industry in British Columbia already thought they had a free trade arrangement, and that the Americans are trying to stop their imports, and that we are beating them at their own game, will the Minister now stand up for Canadian interests and tell the Americans that if they want free trade negotiations they have to practise what they preach and cancel the countervailing action?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as is well known, the New Democratic Party stands up for what the Canadian Labour Congress tells it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Try that in British Columbia. Go to B.C. and say that.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): With regard to jobs, the Leader of the New Democratic Party should know that since this Government was elected some 630,000 Canadian jobs have been created. With regard to the future it is crystal clear that in order to maintain security for Canadians, opportunities for Canadians and growth in jobs, then we have to change our trading situation in the world. That is what we are trying to do.

The NDP can stay mired in the 1930s if it wants, but that is not good enough for this Government.

SALE OF U.S. BARLEY TO SAUDI ARABIA

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade. It involves another example of the deteriorating relationship in our trade with the United States.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: The Conservatives laugh when the western farmers are losing their markets to the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Axworthy: I want western farmers to know what they are laughing at.

Some Hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would like to be able to hear the question.

Mr. Axworthy: While his colleagues are laughing about it, I will direct my question to the Minister for International Trade. The Americans are undertaking subsidized sales of barley to Saudi Arabia, which is a prime Canadian market, thereby encroaching upon and transgressing the assurances they gave that their subsidy programs would not move into Canadian markets. Will the Minister take any action to protest this latest American announcement? Will the Tories stop laughing and start doing something about the fact that we are losing our western grain markets?

Mr. Crosbie: You lost your marbles.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, when the Hon. Member was a Minister of the Crown of Canada, claiming to represent a western Canadian seat, his Government consistently let down western Canada, including western Canadian agriculture.

Some Hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): This Government and this Prime Minister, at the Tokyo Economic Summit—for the first time in the history of the summits—raised the question of how we break the cycle of subsidy that is creating such problems for Canadian farmers across the country.

Mr. Orlikow: What is the answer?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): It is not enough simply to stand up and demonstrate that one is anti-American. We know that of the Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry. We need to break the cycle of subsidy, and we began that process at Tokyo.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear! More, more!

Mr. Axworthy: The Minister is only demonstrating that he either does not understand or has been insensitive to the plight of western Canadian farmers.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: We never let prices drop 30 per cent in one year and he knows that.

• (1430)

REQUEST FOR EXPORT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Will the Government take some action and protest the American initiative, and begin providing some export assistance to Canadian farmers so we can compete against unfair trade practices by the United States?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, just to name a few of the things, interest rates are down, fuel costs have been dealt with, the Minister responsible for the Wheat Board will be meeting with—

Mr. Axworthy: World prices are down 30 per cent for the farmers.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry can try to shout me down if he wants. He has asked what action we are going to take. I am indicating some of the action we have taken and are taking. The Minister responsible for the Wheat Board will be meeting with representatives of grain producing countries in Vancouver so we can—

Mr. Axworthy: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): The Hon. Member disparages meetings. He would sooner shout at people—

Mr. Axworthy: No, I want some action from you guys.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —than sit down and reason with them—

Mr. Axworthy: Let's have some action and less words. Come on. Let's see what you can do and stop talking about it.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —so we can make progress together in the interests of Canadian farmers.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: You're a big mouth, Clark. All words, no action.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Axworthy: More public relations, no action.

U.S. BARLEY EXPORTS TO SAUDI ARABIA

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. This is a very important issue because the Americans have just decided to use their Export Enhancement Program to try to sell an extra 400,000 tonnes of barley to Saudi Arabia. Last year we sold around a million tonnes, about a quarter of our export market, to that country. Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs speak directly to his American counterpart and tell him to back off from using this subsidized program to obtain Canadian markets which are so important to our farmers?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I think the Hon. Member knows because he follows these questions regularly, not like the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Take that, Lloyd.

Mr. Rodriguez: That's true.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —I think the Hon. Member knows that we have already made representations to the Americans with regard to the use of their new program. More importantly, we have begun to take an initiative which we hope with success will have the effect of breaking a cycle of subsidy which has led to the subsidization of agriculture in the European Community which, incidentally, is now the main supplier to the Saudi market, which has led to the U.S. Farm Import Bill which creates such very serious problems now for Canadian producers. We are dealing with individual action by the Americans.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): We are dealing with the general problem.

INTERNATIONAL WHEAT COUNCIL—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT LODGE COMPLAINT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, this is the thirty-first time the Americans have used that program. In the interest of protecting Canadian farmers I want to know if the Government is willing to lodge a complaint with the International Wheat Council that this is a violation of orderly marketing in the world. Will the Minister do that on behalf of the Canadian farmers?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have previously expressed to the Americans in the case of other markets our disagreement with their action.

Mr. Broadbent: You're not getting very far.

Mr. Axworthy: Lots of results.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): If there is indeed a threat to existing Canadian markets in Saudi Arabia we will do that again with regard to existing Canadian markets. But I make the point that what needs to be broken here is the cycle of subsidy which has grown up over so many years.

Mr. Deans: What about now?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): There is some chance now that it can be broken. That is the best hope for Canadian farmers, and this Government has taken the lead in bringing that matter to international economic councils.

SHIPYARDS

VISIT TO OTTAWA BY SOREL REGION PEOPLE REQUESTING WORK

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wish the Prime Minister would answer the question instead of asking the Minister to reply for him. Mr. Prime Minister, today 2,000 Sorel area residents are here begging for work. A month ago it was people from the Montreal area, and six months earlier it was people from the Quebec City area. Does the Prime Minister find it normal that Quebec residents should have to come here seeking justice, begging for work and asking for jobs in Quebec shipyards?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I can see why the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie was booed outside the House by Marine Industries Limited workers. Now we understand why. He thinks Quebecers are beggars. Quebecers are not beggars, they are very proud individuals. In fact 630,000 Canadians found jobs since this Government was sworn in. And there will be many more, including Marine Industries workers who have been seriously harmed by the unkept promises of the Liberals. The Conservatives will honour their promises.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER MEET PEOPLE FROM SOREL

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, it is scandalous and demoralizing to see how far the bush-league Prime Minister can stoop. If the Prime Minister is not totally spineless after closing down Schefferville, let him show he has the courage to join me outside and address those 2,000 men. Will the Prime Minister meet with these people and promise them jobs? Yes or no?

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): I did go outside!

Mr. Speaker: Order! Order!

Mr. Bissonnette: Mr. Speaker, I did go outside and say that the Hon. Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie was a liar. I said that the only one here in Ottawa who spoke about shutdowns is the Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie. Other than the Member for Montreal—Sainte-Marie, nobody here in Ottawa has been talking about closing down the shipyards.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Hon. Members are complaining about language heard on the other side, expecting the Chair to be able to hear it despite the fact that side is making so much noise the Chair cannot hear it.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I think I heard through the noise the Hon. Minister refer to the Hon. Member for Sainte Marie—

[Translation]

—as being a liar. If he said that he must withdraw the word.

Mr. Bissonnette: Mr. Speaker, I said—

[English]

Mr. Speaker: No. Order, please. The Hon. Minister will please resume his seat.

Mr. Nunziata: Bounce him.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member for York South—Weston will please keep in his seat.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Wednesdays are always my favourite day.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Minister knows that if he has said that he must withdraw it and do nothing but that. I must hear that, please.

Mr. Bissonnette: I withdraw the word, Mr. Speaker.

RATIONALIZATION OF QUEBEC SHIPYARDS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion.

Today on Parliament Hill, the Minister of State for Small Businesses made it clear that Mr. Peter Paul Saunders of Versatile Industries had no mandate from the Government to rationalize shipyards in Quebec, while yesterday, the Acting Minister said the exact opposite, namely that the Government was trying to rationalize the industry.

Could the Minister explain this contradiction and inform the House whether the position of the Minister of State for Small Businesses is also the Government's position?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Acting Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I said yesterday that the Government was taking action to deal with the problems and the plight of the shipbuilding industry not only as it exists in Canada but as part of the world-wide phenomena. What the Government is attempting to do is to provide a secure and stable future for the shipbuilding industry in Canada.

[Translation]

FUTURE PROSPECTS FOR MARINE INDUSTRIES LIMITED

Mr. Mike Cassidy (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

I would like to put a question directly to the Acting Minister: Is the Government prepared to guarantee that Marine Industries Limited can continue as a shipyard with a sizeable share of this industry? And will Marine Industries Limited have the right to tender for all federal shipbuilding contracts?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Acting Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member, if he were honest with the situation, would recognize there is over-capacity and that is one of the things that is recognized not only by the Government but, indeed, by the shipbuilding industry itself. To the extent it can be rationalized and consolidated, the Government will certainly aid in that process. But I should remind the Hon. Member that MIL currently has work going on with two Coast Guard vessels. It is heavily engaged in the Canadian Patrol Frigate Program and will he able to compete for vessels which are going to be called for shortly under the TRUMP Program. So it certainly has a pretty optimistic future, I would suggest.

DE HAVILLAND SALE SEQUEL—CREATION OF JOBS IN WINNIPEG

Mr. George Minaker (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion. It has been several months since de Havilland was privatized and sold to Boeing. At that time both the New Democratic Party and the Liberal Party strenuously opposed such action, stating that several hundred jobs would be lost to the United States. Can the Minister advise the House whether or not that is true or, in fact, has the opposite occurred?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Acting Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion): Mr. Speaker, first I should point out to the House and the people of Canada that my friend and colleague was certainly a very ardent supporter of the privatization process. It has paid off. Just today Boeing announced that it will be building a major structural wing component of the Super 747 in Winnipeg which will create some 250 jobs—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Briefly, please.

Mr. Mazankowski: Not only is that good for Winnipeg, it is good for Canada. That is standing up for Canadians and Canadian jobs.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CHOICE OF GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVE

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. the Prime Minister.

A moment ago we heard the Minister of Transport say that efforts must be made to rationalize the shipbuilding industry. The Minister of State for Small Businesses, widely known as the strong-arm man, went and told him that Mr. Saunders had no mandate to talk about rationalization—

Mr. Speaker: Question, please.

Mr. Lapierre: I would like to know whether or not his Government gave Versatile Vickers President Saunders a mandate to negotiate the rationalization of the shipbuilding industry? If so, can he explain to me why he chose to put Dracula in charge of the blood bank?

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to repeat again the same answer I gave four times last week. No, nobody has been given a mandate to rationalize or shut down anything whatsoever.

The one thing I can tell you is that the federal Government is anxious to continue the discussions with all industry representatives so as to draft a national shipbuilding policy.

SCOPE OF MANDATE

Hon. Jean Lapierre (Shefford): Of course, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of State for Small Businesses was not even invited to the meeting.

I direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who was there. Can he confirm that he and his colleague have given Mr. Saunders a mandate to meet with the provincial Minister and other shipbuilding industry officials to end production at Marine Industries?

Hon. André Bissonnette (Minister of State (Small Businesses)): One more time, Mr. Speaker, no, Pierre Paul Saunders was not given a mandate to rationalize or shut down any industry, either in Quebec or elsewhere.

LUMBER EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES—INVITATION OF COUNTERVAIL PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I think he is aware that on May 8 President Reagan wrote a letter to Senator Packwood regarding Canadian softwood lumber in which he stated:

—I intend to press for an expedited resolution to this problem independent of comprehensive negotiations.

I am sure the Prime Minister is aware that President Reagan controls the acceptance or rejection of the countervailing action through Secretary of Commerce Baldrige. Has the Prime Minister himself, through his office, by phone or by letter, contacted President Reagan and asked that this countervailing action be stopped?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no. I think I responded to that question yesterday. We are satisfied that the mechanisms in place are designed not only to eliminate problems but to create a climate of confidence within which these problems can be resolved. That is exactly what we are trying to do—not by yelling at the problems, not by denigrating anyone, but by sitting down in a reasonable, positive, and strong way to resolve these problems on behalf of Canadians.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL AID FOR LEGAL ACTION

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister is prepared to accept a double-cross from President Reagan on a clean launch for the free trade talks, will he stand in the House today and commit funds to the Canadian forest industry so that it can at least prepare its legal defence against this unfortunate countervail action?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the allegation of the Hon. Member is denied by the words which he has quoted. The letter he has quoted from the President of the United States made reference to the fact that, as this House has been seeking, and as the New Democratic Party has been insisting, there would be a clean launch. That is what the word "independent" means.

Insofar as the question of legal support for the defence of Canadian interests by Canadians is concerned, as the Minister for International Trade made clear in the House yesterday, we intend to support the Canadian position and support Canadian interests in every way we can. If it is necessary for us to commit legal funds, that too will be done.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CHALLENGE '86

EMPLOYMENT FUNDING FOR NON-PROFIT COMMUNITY PROJECTS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. As a result of her $19 million cut for student summer employment this summer and her quota limiting non-profit community projects, many excellent community services for the aged, the disabled, and youth, will be eliminated. While there is still time will the Minister restore the budget for Challenge '86 to the same level as last summer and eliminate the quota on non-profit community projects?

Hon. Andrée Champagne (Minister of State (Youth)): Mr. Speaker, there have not been any quotas put on either private sector jobs or jobs provided by the public sector. Some 35 per cent of the applications last year came from the private sector. This year it was a greater amount. However, this year the private sector will only receive 36 per cent of the funding and the non-private sector will receive 64 per cent of the funding. I do not see how the Hon. Member can say anything against that.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, the Minister is misleading this House, if not lying to this House—

Some Hon. Members: Order, order.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Out, out.

Some Hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Allmand: I will not withdraw that.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member knows that I must ask him to withdraw at least part of that. Therefore he should do that and then put his question, please.

Mr. Allmand: I will not withdraw. We are being told all over the country—

Some Hon. Members: Out, out!

Some Hon. Members: Withdraw!

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member will resume his seat, please.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): And John Turner smiles!

Mr. Speaker: I must ask the Hon. Member to withdraw at least the allegation he has made. I think he knows that is the parliamentary way, and he should then put his question.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to tell a lie to the House. She is misleading this House.

Some Hon. Members: Order, order.

Some Hon. Members: Out!

Mr. Ouellet: That is his right.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member is an experienced Member—

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Will the Hon. Member for Bourassa at least have some sympathy for his colleague, if not for the House?

I must ask the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East, who knows our practices, to withdraw the implication that the Minister is lying. I must ask him to do that. Will he please do that now?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, if this Question Period is to have any meaning, we have to expect Ministers to tell the truth in answering questions—

Some Hon. Members: Order!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have no choice, then. I am given no choice. I must name Mr. Allmand and ask him to leave the House.

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES—EXCHANGE VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): My question is for the Prime Minister. Not content with telling us what to do in our lumber industry the United States has now told Canada to look at raising the value of our dollar in order to ease trade problems between the two countries. In view of this will the Prime Minister request the resignation of his Minister of Finance—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Langdon: —since, quite clearly, Washington has decided to direct our financial policies in the future?

• (1450)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): That is a challenging question, Mr. Speaker, a real tough one. I will think about it, but I think the answer is no.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

STATEMENTS ATTRIBUTED TO MINISTER

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, does the Prime Minister not in fact recognize that we have opened ourselves up to pressure from the United States on our exchange rate by the statements of the Minister of Trade who said that this would be a subject for discussion in the trade talks which opened today? He talked about exchange rates in those terms.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is the vicious "supps" which kill me. The fact of the matter is that the Secretary of State—

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Oh, come on. The guy asked you a decent question.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: The Leader of the Opposition defending the NDP—

Mr. Axworthy: That is right. He is a Member of Parliament.

Mr. Mulroney: Sweethearts on parade again.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): A Member of Parliament deserves an answer.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): But the Leader of the Opposition will not defend the Speaker. Shame.

Mr. Speaker: Does the Prime Minister want to complete his answer briefly, please?

Mr. Mulroney: Sir, it should be noted that the Leader of the Opposition will defend an NDPer but he will not defend the Speaker against a vicious attack by—

Mr. Ouellet: Withdraw that.

Mr. Guilbault (Saint-Jacques): Withdraw that remark.

Mr. Ouellet: Just a minute!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Nunziata: That's the new civility!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Of course the comments about the Chair are out of order, but there is nothing unparliamentary requiring the Chair to have anything withdrawn.

ABORTION

HOSPITAL ABORTION COMMITTEE PRACTICES—INQUEST JURY'S RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. John Oostrom (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Recently an Ottawa coroner's jury condemned the abortion practices of the Ottawa Civic Hospital when that particular hospital apparently approved an abortion after the abortion had taken place, and it cost the young lady her life. Will the Minister initiate an investigation into this serious breach of procedure? Are any changes being contemplated on the basis of the jury recommendations to the Minister?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the case which the Hon. Member cites is a very regrettable situation. A similar question was also answered by the Minister of Justice earlier. The recommendations, as I understand them, go to the Health Minister and Attorney General of the province, in this case the Province of Ontario. I think all of us in the House, regardless of what side of that difficult social issue we might be on, expect those committees to function within the ambit of the law. That was not done, and I would hope that the people responsible for those committees will take note of the coroner's report which was very specific.

PUBLIC WORKS

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENTS ATTRIBUTED TO MINISTER'S ASSISTANT WORKING IN MONTREAL

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In an interview on the TVA network on May 15, the Minister of Public Works said, in referring to contracts, that he had no hesitation in showing his gratitude to the people that deserved it. Can the Prime Minister confirm that Mr. Lessard, the Minister's political adviser who works at the Montreal office, was put there to do just that: to show gratitude to Conservatives who deserved it, in other words, to those who contributed to the Prime Minister's election campaign and to those who followed the procedure recommended by the Hon. Member for Quebec East? Is that what he is supposed to do?

[English]

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the question which the Hon. Member asks was answered yesterday by the Minister of Public Works. If the Hon. Member refers to page 13412 of Hansard he will find the Minister of Public Works was pleased to inform all Members of the House of Commons who were having to cope with the lack of information and often inadequate services that he had decided to post a departmental representative in Montreal who will be able to provide more and better information and services for all Members. I am sure all Hon. Members appreciate more information and more services being made available on behalf of the Government by the Minister of Public Works.

MINISTER'S ASSISTANT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, that is interesting. I wonder whether the Acting Minister could respond to the comment of Mr. Lessard in an interview when he said that there were 57 Conservatives who knew nothing about the routine of the federal Government and that it was his job to help them. Does he think that that follows through on what the Minister said yesterday? Will he not admit that he is a political hack? Will the Prime Minister do the right thing, dismiss the individual, and tell the Minister of Public Works to get his hands out of the taxpayers' cookie jar?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member makes aspersions about contracting and tendering done by Public Works. If he really cares about how contracting and tendering are done, he could refer to Chapter 310, Appendix F of the Treasury Board Administration Policy Manual, the same policy manual used by the previous Liberal administration.

APARTHEID

SOUTH AFRICA—BRITISH POSITION ON IMPOSITION OF SANCTIONS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Mrs. Thatcher is quoted as saying that she does not believe sanctions are any more likely to succeed now than before the raids. Given the leadership role played by the Prime Minister in the Commonwealth, and given the dangers to the Commonwealth posed by a failure on the part of Great Britain to act, has the Prime Minister been in contact with the Prime Minister of Great Britain within the last 48 hours to convince her to change her mind?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. I am aware of Mrs. Thatcher's point of view with regard to sanctions. It is not one that I share. It is one that she has explained and defended. I understand her point of view, but I believe that the Commonwealth is inclined to come to another point of view in the event of a failure of the Eminent Persons Group mission. We believe there is still a possibility for success. I will be meeting with the Archbishop on Friday in this regard. Pending that, Canada will continue to seek further information. However, we have not moved from the position set out by the Secretary of State last autumn with regard to the ultimate action that Canada will take if we are incapable of persuading South Africa to rid itself or rid the world of the evil of apartheid.

THREAT TO COMMONWEALTH

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. Given the threat to the very existence of the Commonwealth which this situation poses, how can the Prime Minister explain not even having made the attempt to contact Mrs. Thatcher to convince her to change her mind?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the Hon. Member, who has a genuine interest in this question, was absent from the House earlier when I indicated that I had met yesterday with the High Commissioners of various country members of the Commonwealth, including Great Britain. While there was disagreement in that room, naturally, about the measures which should be taken now, there was general agreement about the importance of maintaining the integrity and the strength of the Commonwealth as an institution. That is a position which we are pursuing. That is a position which the Prime Minister advanced materially in his call yesterday to Mr. Kuanda, to indicate the continuing solidarity of Canada with the citizens of Commonwealth countries which were attacked, and our continuing determination to play a leadership role in any way we can—our sanctions if necessary, and working in the Commonwealth, if that will work, to bring an end to apartheid.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

HAITI—FREE ELECTIONS—CANADIAN POSITION

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. With Canada's reputation for conducting fair and free elections, and with a number of Canadians having acted as observers of elections in foreign countries, could the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicate what initiatives he is taking to export democracy and, in particular, whether he has had any discussions with the Government of Haiti in respect to its objective of developing free elections in that country?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have indicated publicly our—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I cannot allow that.

Mr. Ouellet: Imputing motive. Withdraw.

Mr. Axworthy: How do you withdraw pomposity?

GRASSY NARROWS AND ISLINGTON INDIAN BANDS MERCURY POLLUTION CLAIMS SETTLEMENT

TABLING OF MEMORANDUM OF AGREEMENT

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table in both official languages copies of a Memorandum of Agreement between Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada, Her Majesty the Queen in right of Ontario, the Islington Indian Band, the Grassy Narrows Indian Band, Great Lakes Forest Products Limited and Reed Incorporated.

This Memorandum of Agreement establishes the terms of a settlement between the Parties for claims arising from the mercury pollution of the Wabigoon and English Rivers.

TABLING OF ESCROW AGREEMENT

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I also table an Escrow Agreement, dated as of December 16, 1985, between Her Majesty the Queen in right of Ontario, Great Lakes Forest Products Limited, Reed Incorporated and the National Trust Company.

The terms of this Escrow Agreement were approved of and consented to by the Grassy Narrows Indian Band, the Islington Indian Band and Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada.

Hon. Members have been given notice of the intent to introduce a Bill to approve, give affect to and declare valid these agreements.

IMMIGRATION

REFUGEE DETERMINATION SYSTEM

Hon. Walter McLean (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this Government, I welcome this opportunity to announce to the Members of this House and to all Canadians the details of the proposed new refugee determination system for Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the Government has the honour of announcing to the Members of this House, and to all Canadians, a new refugee determination process.

[English]

There is agreement that claims to refugee status should be treated fairly, humanely and expeditiously. I want to assure you today, Mr. Speaker, that this Government has given very careful consideration to all the views expressed by refugee aid groups, church groups and ethnic organizations across the country. These groups help to identify those who need our assistance, they sponsor about one-quarter of the flow of refugees to Canada and they are invaluable in helping refugees integrate into Canadian society.

I want to state also that the Government is indebted to the invaluable contributions of Rabbi Gunther Plaut and the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration. I believe that all those who have studied the system and proposed reforms will see reflections of their ideas in the model I am proposing today.

The refugee determination process, like the definition of a refugee itself, is dynamic and evolving. I do not see these measures as the end of the journey we have travelled together, but they are steps in the right direction.

[Translation]

As a Canadian, I am proud of our humanitarian tradition. Over one half million refugees have settled in Canada since World War II.

[English]

As a Canadian, I know we can proud of our tradition of humanitarianism. More than a half million refugees have settled in Canada since the Second World War. For the past six years, over 125,000 refugees and designated class immigrants have found new homes in Canada. Thousands of others have been helped by humanitarian measures developed to deal with special unexpected circumstances in the volatile world in which we live.

The new refugee determination system will continue this humanitarian tradition of our nation, Canada. In a time of restraint, our Government is allocating substantial new resources to the system. Over the years, however, all levels of Government will be saving millions because nothing could be more expensive, or less effective, than our present system. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, Canada as a prosperous and fortunate country must continue to do all it can for refugees seeking protection at our borders while continuing our program of resettlement from abroad in consultation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

[Translation]

Canada will continue to do everything in its power to help refugees who ask for our protection.

[English]

In formulating our proposals, we have been mindful of our international legal and moral obligations as a signatory to the United Nations convention as well as Canadian standards of justice as set out in the Canadian Bill of Rights and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We have taken a cumbersome and elaborate system, an outdated system which caused tragic delays for genuine refugees and months of uncertainty for others, and we have streamlined it. I believe we have made it essentially more fair and more efficient.

The highlights of the new refugee determination system are as follows. First, an oral hearing on questions of merit for all claimants; second, independent and well-informed decision-making; third, a new Convention Refugee Determination Board with full and part-time members to meet the ebb and flow in this volatile situation. Fourth, we will have a non-adversarial format, moving human rights away from the immigration mode and its legal mode so as to see the refugee stream more in the broad humanitarian and human rights tradition. Fifth, we will have a two-member expert panel. Any split decision, if one happens, will go in favour of the claimant. Our system will be a generous one. Sixth, we will have an appeal by leave to the Federal Court of Canada. Seventh, in order to meet the needs of those bona fide refugees, those most in need, we will have limited access controls such as for those exceeding the time limits, for those granted protection already in another country and for those who are making repeat claims. Eighth, we will have a legislated requirement that claims be heard expeditiously so that those whose lives have been turned upside down will not find themselves faced by interminable delays.

In addition to the details of the proposed system, I am announcing today that a case by case clearance of the backlog will commence July 15, 1986. Further, I wish to inform the House and Members of the public that those individuals whose claims have not been initiated prior to this date, May 21, 1986, will have their refugee claims dealt with swiftly. This will enable the Government to assist genuine refugees in getting on with the rebuilding of their lives. It will ensure that those whose claims have no merit will be promptly removed from Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, with these conditions in our new system, the Government will be able to continue to assist those who are genuine refugees.

• (1510)

[English]

Through this proposed system my Government is continuing to do what it always intended to do, that is, to help those who genuinely need protection and discourage those who seek to use the system for purely economic reasons.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to respond on behalf of my Party to the statement of the Minister. Over the years and under successive Liberal Governments Canada has been a leader within the international community regarding the issues of human rights and immigration policies and our role in resolving the crisis of world refugees. Our traditional instinct throughout in such dilemmas was to act compassionately, progressively and with a vision that was to be respected world-wide. We in Canada took our international obligations seriously and played our part just as well as did any other country.

Canadians do not want people to be sent back to countries where they will be persecuted, suffer loss of freedom, or face sure death. At the same time, particularly during recent international incidents of terrorism and conflict, Canadians are concerned that the huge backlog gives rise to an increase of bogus refugee claimants to the detriment of legitimate refugee claims. The backlog weakens Canada's acceptability of making our rightful contribution to the plight of refugees. What better way of convincing the public and politicians to not allow refugees to seek protection than by pointing to the illegitimate refugee cases which are abusing our regulations, using our health and social services, working at jobs that would otherwise be available for Canadians and generally clogging up the system. Thus, a reformed and improved refugee determination system would cater to these two aspirations of Canadians. The present system is inadequate and gives rise to a grey, middle-of-the-road approach which does not meet these two fundamentally important expectations.

When you stip away the public relations aspect of this particular policy you will see that the Conservative Government's new policy is a regressive move which tarnishes our proud tradition. One of the major flaws in this particular piece of legislation is the Government's willingness to limit access to the refugee process on the grounds of the claimant's country of last sojourn. The vast majority of refugees must escape their country of persecution into a secondary country before coming to Canada simply because persecution cuts off direct access to Canada.

This decision by the Minister lacks morality and integrity and, in essence, is washing the Government's hands of the obligation to the refugee reality. It is intellectually dishonest. It runs counter to the spirit of the 1951 U.N. Convention and the subsequent protocol of 1967. It runs counter to the recommendations made by every single group and witness that came before the committee.

Another major flaw is the appeal procedure. The Minister suggested that appeals should be to the Federal Court of Appeal with leave. Once again, the Liberal Party strongly disagrees and believes that the entire refugee determination procedure is only as effective and fair as its appeal process. The Liberal Party favours an oral appeal to a three-member refugee appeal board before proceeding to the Federal Court of Appeal. An additional level of appeal to a specialized body would ensure and safeguard claimants' rights.

It should be noted that the Federal Court lacks the expertise in refugee law and understanding of international and individual country situations. Also, its mandate precludes it from receiving new factual evidence and reassessing the credibility of the claimant. It is unrealistic to expect that changes and reforms in the Federal Court will take place in the foreseeable future. A competent and specialized appeal body, as advocated by numerous witnesses, must be part of the process and would place an appropriate priority on the important issues of the right to life, liberty and freedom, the absence of which has given rise to the refugee phenomenon.

Another fall-out from this piece of legislation is the silence on the right to legal counsel from the initial stages of the process. The Government does not feel it is necessary or practical to provide individuals with the right to counsel prior to an inquiry. The Liberal Party disagrees once again. We believe that it is necessary to give counsel to all refugees. From the refugee's perspective especially, where his or her liberty or security is in jeopardy, this right becomes all the more important.

Moreover, it is incorrect that some information collected prior to the inquiry, without the presence of counsel, can be used against the claimant. The Liberal Party does not believe this practice to be right or constiutionally fair. Therefore, we ask the Minister to change this very serious flaw.

In his prepared statement the Minister made the decision to slap visa requirements on Portugal. It is amazing that the Government decided to impose visa requirements. Fortunately, due to pressure, it decided to reverse itself at the eleventh hour. Notwithstanding this decision, I believe the Minister has besmirched the good name of an ally and owes the Portugese-Canadian community an apology.

In short, if the process limits access to the process and denies a refugee claimant the right to counsel, and if the process does not, from beginning to end, provide an appropriate and strong appeal for the refugee claimant, how fair is that process? How have we as a country helped the claimant seek refugee status in this country?

In conclusion, I would like to quote from the report of Rabbi Gunther Plaut. He said:

> The number of refugees we are asked to admit, and especially the number of inland refugee claimants, is small when compared to the vastness of our land, the wealth of its resources and the peaceful internal and external conditions which are Canada's. To be sure, like everyone else we worry about our own well-being but our adherence to the U.N. Convention, and the incorporation of its principles into Canadian law, are flags we have run up on our pole of moral purpose, and there they must continue to wave.

It is my humble submission, Mr. Speaker, that that flag has been pulled down the pole of morality. This policy is bankrupt of any morality and discussions which have been held over the last number of years. First, there is an absence of right to legal counsel. Second, there is the question of limiting access to the refugee process. Third, there is an absence of a strong and genuine appeal body. Once those three elements are stripped away there is no longer a legitimate, genuine, and effective process which will protect the rights of individuals who are escaping torture and death. It will not protect the interests of Canadians and Canada. I hope that these elements will be changed.

In addition to the legislative changes, I hope that the regulations which the Minister has highlighted will be subject to a parliamentary debate so that we can expand on our principles on the floor of the House of Commons, thus informing Canadians of what really lies behind the ten-page statement we just heard from the Minister.

Mr. Dan Heap (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party I am happy to respond to the Minister's announcement. I welcome the fact that he has made an announcement, although it is a matter of great regret that there has been so much delay. I am personally satisfied that it was possible for me to withdraw my legal action which would have required the Minister to respond. I am very pleased that he has now finally responded.

After a long delay we have a report by the Government which contains about five good points and about six serious flaws. The report of Rabbi Plaut, which is universally praised, was due in December of 1984. It was received by the Minister before April, according to what the Minister said in a committee. It was not made available until the end of June. Then of course it was referred to the standing committee for consideration. There was a half-year delay. Then the reports of the standing committee were tabled in November and December, and neither of them had the substantial response required and envisaged by the rules, until at least a month or two later. We are told now that the program will not begin until mid-July. However, we at last have something in front of us.

As I say, there are five good points. I believe they will be unanimously supported by all sides of the House because they were unanimously supported by the standing committee. There is the matter of an oral hearing for all claimants, as the Supreme Court required more than a year ago, although it has not yet of course been put into action. We are told, however, it will be at some point. There is the matter of an independent and well-informed decision-making body. This is true up to a point, according to the Minister's announcement, but only put to a point. I will come back to that and the matter of the very shabby appeal provision. There is the matter of the new convention refugee determination board with full and part-time members. That is also good. There is the matter of the non-adversarial format for the hearings which was also asked for. There is the matter of a two-member expert panel, requiring one to find in favour, but both if the decision is to be against the refugee's claim. These are points strongly supported by all the public witnesses, church representatives, the Bar Association, and refugee serving organizations which came before and were unanimously supported by the committee. I believe there should be no difficulty in putting these into effect through this House.

However, there are, as I say, serious flaws in what the Minister has proposed and I hope he will give them further consideration. The appeal system is not satisfactory. There was a Justice of either the Federal Court of Appeal or the Supreme Court who told a gathering in Hart House in February of 1982 that the Federal Court is not the place to handle refugee questions. It has neither the time nor the expertise. Furthermore, since the question in a refugee claim is almost always one of credibility of the claimant, and that is the very question which is almost entirely excluded from the jurisdiction of the Federal Court of Appeal, an appeal will be almost entirely useless for most claimants who may seek one. It is in that respect that I say the independent and well-informed decision-making process is only partly present. It is present, I hope, in the board, but there is no provision for making it present in the Federal Court of Appeal.

My second concern is that the limitation on access is very loosely handled in the statement we have where it says "Those granted prior protection in another country". It is not at all clear whether we are talking about a country which according to its laws has solemnly granted that protection and that protection will not be reversable. It is not clear whether that is what we are talking about or whether we are talking about some official at an airport who says "You came from such a country and we are going to send you back, you have prior protection".

Third, there is a harsh time limit considering that the right of counsel is still denied at the port of entry. It is not at all clear that a refugee will have a reasonable time to prepare his case.

Fourth, there is the question of the backlog and who is eligible. That is not defined here. It may be made clear later on but it is not defined on page seven. It says individuals whose claims have not been initiated, and so on, will have their refugee claim dealt with swiftly. That is a very vague statement. Furthermore, we are not told how it will be handled swiftly and whether they will have a proper right of appeal.

There is also a very ominous statement in the original draft, which has perhaps now been dropped, that a visa requirement may be imposed suddenly on a country to serve as a prompt deterrent to further abuse when there is an increase in claims. In other words, the Minister is taking the view that as soon as there is an increase in claims it is an abuse. If there was a right-wing coup in Chile and refugee claims rose, then that would be considered an abuse and a visa would be slapped on. The same in El Salvador and Guatemala and other countries. In other words, genuine refugees are then suggested to be abusers.

In conclusion, I want to say that the many Canadian citizens who the Minister has acknowledged, citizens who helped to settle about a quarter of all the refugees, who have helped at all stages of the process, those who asked for a better report than this on the six points I have named, should be heard because they are the ones on whom the Minister says he depends for help in settlement. They should be heard through the medium of a debate in this House and in its committees. In particular, the regulations on the backlog which have not been spelled out in any kind of detail must be heard in a committee, or we will find ourselves with the same system of injustice from which we are trying to escape.

PETITIONS

USE OF PENSION INCOME IN CALCULATION OF UI BENEFITS

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty and privilege to present a petition signed by many residents of Stratford, Ontario; Halifax, Nova Scotia; and Calgary, Alberta. They are protesting changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act which see pension income treated as earned income for unemployment insurance purposes. The petitioners call upon Members of Parliament and this House in particular to rescind that iniquitous provision in the Unemployment Insurance Act.

CANCELLATION OF UI BENEFITS TO ARMED FORCES

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I, too, wish to present a petition in this House on behalf of numerous citizens of this country from British Columbia and Alberta. They are very seriously concerned about the removal of unemployment insurance benefits for currently active and retired Armed Forces members. This Government has, without consultation, changed the ground rules and the petitioners urge the Government to reconsider this position, play fair with them, and reinstate their benefits.

DECOMMISSIONING OF LIGHTHOUSES

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox—Powell River): I have a second petition from numerous people who live and work on the coast of British Columbia. It is the intention of the Government to automate lighthouses and remove their capacity to provide search and rescue communications and accurate weather briefings. Many fishermen and mariners have lost their lives on the coast of British Columbia because of a lack of this information. The fact that the Government is willing to shut these down will wreak great hardship on those who must live and work on the coast of British Columbia and depend on marine and air services, which in turn depend on the services provided by lighthouses. The petitioners urge that these lighthouses not be decommissioned and turned into automated lights and fog-horns.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Ron Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Questions Nos. 546 and 547?

[Text]

INCIDENTS AT EMBASSIES IN NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

Question No. 546—Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton):

1. Since 1960, have violent incidents taken place at embassy locations within the National Capital Region and, if so, which embassies were directly affected and on how many occasions?

2. Since 1960, how many threats of violent incidents were received within the National Capital Region and directed at which embassies?

3. What amount is spent annually by the RCMP to protect embassy locations within the National Capital Region?

Mr. Gordon Towers (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Yes, the following incidents took place at embassy locations within the National Capital Region since 1960:

Date	Victim/Target	Incident
1961	Indian First Secretary	Assassination
1966	Cuban Embassy	Bombing
1967	Yugoslav Embassy	Bombing
1969	Lebanese Embassy	Occupation
1972	Cuban Ambassador's Residence	Bombing
1972	Cuban Embassy	Bombing
1972	Israeli Officials	Bombing
1974	Cuban Embassy	Bombing
1977	Indian High Commission	Bombing
1981	Iranian Embassy	Occupation Attempted
1985	Turkish Embassy	Armed Takeover
1986	Bahamian High Commission	Hostage Taking

In answer to Part 2, we are unable to answer this question for security reasons.

In answer to Part 3, the figure for the total cost administrative and operational for the fiscal year 1984-1985 is $7,037,000.

For 1985-1986, the cost figure from April 1, 1985 to February 28, 1986, for administrative and operation expenses is $6,596,000. Total financial figures for the year 1985-1986 are not yet available.

SITE OF NEW U.S. EMBASSY

Question No. 547—Mr. Turner (Ottawa—Carleton):

Did the United States State Department indicate that the proposed Ottawa site for the new U.S. Embassy on Sussex Drive was unacceptable and, if so, on what date and for what reasons?

Mr. Ron Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): On December 10, 1984, the Acting Chargé d'Affaires of the U.S. Embassy in Ottawa informed the General Manager of the NCC in writing that the U.S. Department of State had determined that the proposed site for the new U.S. Embassy on Sussex Drive had very serious shortcomings from a security standpoint. In subsequent discussions with U.S. officials, it was learned that the State Department no longer considered the Sussex Drive site acceptable due to the fact that this site no longer met the State Department's increased security requirements, in particular with respect to setbacks of the building from the nearest public road.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Ron Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, this day's sitting will be extended by 25 minutes.

CANADA PETROLEUM RESOURCES ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Tuesday, May 20, 1986, consideration of the motion of Miss Carney that Bill C-92, an Act to regulate interest in petroleum in relation to frontier lands, to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and to repeal the Canada Oil and Gas Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I cannot say I am pleased to stand today and participate in this debate on Bill C-92, because I believe that Members of Parliament have a responsibility to deal with matters in this House that are relevant, contemporary, and have an impact on Canadian society now or in the future.

The dilemma I have in holding Bill C-92 in my hand, which received first reading December 2, 1985, a scant five months ago, is that I have the overwhelming impression that I am dealing with something pulled off a dusty shelf in a long forgotten museum. We are often told that a week can be a lifetime in politics. I am sure the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Miss Carney) is feeling that 20 weeks has represented many lifetimes for her.

This Bill is no more relevant to what is currently happening in Canada's energy patch today than is the horse and rider relevant to the way in which we try and deliver mail today. The Bill is out of date. It does not deal with the reality of Canada's energy patch, May 21, 1986. That Bill was brought in in the Government's great attempt to deregulate the energy industry, in the words of the Minister, to set it free, in the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney), to introduce a brand new day to Canada; in the words of the Minister, to set free the entrepreneurial spirit and create 300,000 jobs; and in her words, not to treat the industry as the proverbial milk cow. All of those words may have been highfaluting, sounding quite immpressive five months ago when this Bill was brought in, but today this Bill simply will not wash.

What has happened over the last 20 weeks in this country? What kind of industry is it that the Minister has set free to exist entirely at the mercy of the vagaries of the market? What kind of industry is it today? Is it the big powerful, bruising, bullheaded oil and gas patch that we knew in Canada six months ago? Is it the industry where they really meant it when they said "what's a million" and, more importantly sometimes, "what's a billion"? Is it the industry that last year saw 14 rigs operating in the oil and gas sector in east coast Canada, and tens of thousands of jobs? Is it the industry that the Premier of Newfoundland said would foreshadow the great day of the economic renewal that would happen in the Province of Newfoundland? Is it the industry that built up a multibillion dollar heritage fund in the Province of Alberta?

The answer to all those questions is no. It is not the same industry for which the Minister designed this Bill. That is why the Bill is irrelevant and should be withdrawn.

We know by looking at the numbers over the last 20 weeks that things have dramatically changed. Twenty weeks ago, 30 weeks ago the oil and gas industry was talking about $11.2 billion in expenditures in 1986. That projection has been revised down to $6 billion, a reduction of $5.2 billion in expenditures, service industries and associated jobs. According to public announcements to date, personnel reductions will exceed 4,000. I am not talking about 4,000 seasonal jobs or 4,000 part-time jobs about which the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Miss MacDonald) likes to beat her chest. I am not talking about 4,000, 10-week jobs that the Government puts together through its job development program. These reductions involve 4,000 full time, highly paid, highly skilled jobs that are essential for providing long term maintenance of this industry. Not only are those people unemployed, the best of them are taking their talents and skills out of the country.

• (1540)

The Government, when confronted with a $5 billion reduction in investment and a cut in 4,000 man-years of employment, holds up Bill C-92 that it introduced 20 weeks ago as its answer to the problem. The Government is frozen to its commitment to something that no longer exists. It wants to live in a world of an energy patch that is no longer relevant and ignore an almost 50 per cent cut in investment and a reduction of 4,000 personnel. That is simply not acceptable.

I suggest that Canadians have expressed clearly their belief that since oil and gas are their natural resources the Government of Canada should make a number of provisions for the oil and gas industry in Canada. It is a crucial industry that is as vital to the future prosperity of this country as the blood that beats within all of us is vital to our own individual health and welfare. Canadians demand security of supply. They do not want to be subject to the whims of the OPEC cartel. They demand that our country have enough energy resources to meet our needs so that we will not be subject to blackmail. While Canadians are demanding security of supply, the Minister has said that this goal is as irrelevant as her Bill.

Canadians demand an element of Canadianization because the decisions about Canada's oil and gas industry ought not continue to be made in the boardrooms of other countries. Canadians ought to have a say about our oil and gas industry which provides the energy that drives the engine of growth in Canada. The Minister's view of Canadianization is that any find discovered before 1982 can be managed in its production stage entirely by foreign companies.

Canadians are familiar with the prospective finds at Hiberia, Beaufort and off Nova Scotia. All of these were initiated previous to 1982 which means that the Minister's irrelevant legislation guarantees that the production timing for all of those finds is in the hands of those who sit in the boardrooms of the tall office towers overlooking expensive real estate somewhere outside this country.

I do not blame those in the corporate boardrooms for relishing the thought that the Minister has given them that power. They are not in the business of building the long term interests of Canada, they are in the business of making a buck for their shareholders. They are as amazed at their good fortune as Canadians who fully understand Bill C-92 are chagrined at knowing that again this country has been sold out to the financial power players outside of our borders who treat us like another piece on the monopoly board. That is the effect of Bill C-92 on Canada's oil and gas industry.

Canadians demand that they receive a measure of benefit not only in the revenues from the resource but in the exploration and production phase. Bill C-92 makes clear that the exploration side versus the production side of oil and gas development in this country may be handled entirely by foreign interests, whether the finds take place before or after 1982.

I believe in the free enterprise system. We ought to reward success in this country because it generates the most wealth. A free enterprise system with a social conscience and a Government that is prepared to intervene when necessary can be the nucleus for creating the best society possible by giving the greatest opportunities to individuals. Having said that, I do not envisage Canada as a real estate commodity. Oil and gas are more than a stock to be traded on the stock exchange, they are important resources to be used to build our nation and develop a sense of unity and sharing in our country. Bill C-92 will not accomplish that because it treats this industry solely as a monopoly piece.

We are aware of the severe and tragic impact of low world oil prices on the Province of Alberta. What is happening in Alberta is nothing less than tragic, but the Government says that the free market shall determine what happens to the tens of thousands of good people in Alberta who are either unemployed or facing unemployment.

What is happening on the East Coast? While we do not have a mature oil and gas industry, we have the potential to develop one. Over the last 10 years, skilled personnel have been drawn together, training has been provided and exploration work has been carried out. We have spent billions of dollars and are on the threshold of being able to give something back to the country though the development of those offshore resources. This is not a pipe dream or an instant solution to all our problems, including high unemployment. We have the ability to develop our own tools and give our provinces the income so that we do not become the proverbial orphan of Confederation, constantly putting a hand out for a subsidy from our fellow Canadians.

Let me explain what has happened in my area. We have gone from 14 rigs off the East Coast of Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, involving multimillion dollar operations employing thousands of people, to 2 rigs off Nova Scotia and 4 rigs off the Province of Newfoundland. The reason for this drop is that the Government changed the fiscal regime. It eliminated the petroleum incentive grants and did away with the notion that Canadian participation is important in the development of the offshore. It brought in a new regime, something called a 25 per cent exploration tax credit under the new frontier energy policy. That is what was introduced 20 weeks ago in this irrelevant document.

What has happened? We have seen a dramatic decrease in exploration in East Coast Canada. We have seen a dramatic decrease in the amount of Canadian participation in the development and ownership of a Canadian resource. We have seen only those players, big enough on the international scene to sit on that resource and, if necessary, leave it capped in anticipation of a better price down the road, active in the offshore and on the East Coast of Canada, particularly in the Provinces of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

Walter Deboni, the Vice-President of Bow Valley called the exploration tax credit a "PIP squeak", a mere, pale, flimsy shadow of the kind of fiscal regime which was in place before the Minister cancelled out the PIP program and brought in this tax credit. The new tax system means that instead of receiving $40 million in PIP grants for every $50 million spent in the offshore, these companies will receive $4.5 million. That is a reduction of $44.5 million on a $50 million expenditure.

Those people sitting in the galleries and those people watching debate on television might say: "That sounds good. For every $50 million spent, we give $4.5 million versus $44 million. That sounds like a good deal". But what those people do not realize is that in addition to cutting back on the grants available to make exploration happen in frontier areas, the Government gave back to the oil and gas companies, foreign and domestic—and in particular, foreign, because it is mostly foreign—a 25 per cent share of those discoveries which were owned by the people of Canada.

There used to be a provision that any oil and gas found on Canada Lands, particularly in the offshore, belonged to the whole country, to all 25 million Canadians no matter where they live in the country. We have given our 25 per cent share away. We have given back to the oil companies the PGRT tax worth billions of dollars.

What have the international conglomerates given us? What commitment have they made to security of supply? What commitment have they made to developing frontier lands which are expensive, which are non-conventional? I will tell you the commitment, Mr. Speaker. We have gone from 14 rigs to four rigs. What commitment have they given the people of this country that a workforce which has been trained and assembled over the last 10 years will be maintained through this period of recession? None. They are laying them off by the tens of thousands.

If that is the Government's view of what the free market-place is, and if its view of this country is that it is but a piece of real estate, a chip to be played on the monopoly board of the international market-place, I can tell the Government that is not the view of Canadians. Even though one feels like a voice in the wind trying to impress upon the Government the reality of this country, I again beg Hon. Members opposite, who know and understand what I am saying is true, to reconsider this slavish commitment to a free market system which may well serve only those people who occupy boardrooms outside of Canada. It is a system which, in the currently recessed market of world oil prices, is not serving this country well. I beg Hon. Members to make the commitment to see that Canada not only prospers but that our resources serve our people, not only in terms of revenue but in terms of jobs and a technology which otherwise will be lost.

Mr. Waddell: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member speaks eloquently but I sometimes wonder exactly what he is getting at. At one point I heard him say he was much in favour of free enterprise. He said: "I am a free enterpriser". But at the end of his speech he seemed not quite in favour of free enterprise. He is worried about this Bill. He quite correctly perceives that this Bill will feather more nests in the boardrooms of this country—and I would not even limit it to this country. It will help Mobil Oil and the large American multinationals, and the Canadian Oil Companies will get frozen out of the frontier where, under the Liberals' National Energy Program, they had just begun to appear.

I have two questions for the Hon. Member. First, if he is such a fervent free enterpriser and wants to leave it to the market, what does he think that will do to Newfoundland? If we had a completely free market, without any use of the federal state, the state of Canada, it seems to me that Newfoundland would go from 15 per cent or 20 per cent unemployment to 60 per cent or 70 per cent unemployment. Is the Hon. Member not being hypocritical when he waxes on about his commitment to free enterprise? Is he not, in a typical Liberal fashion, trying to walk both sides of the street at the same time? That is what the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie) likes to call a "mugwump". That is a guy who sits on the fence and has his mug on one side and his wump on the other and tries to sit there so he does not have to come down on either one, which is modern day Canadian Liberalism. That is my definition of "mugwumpery".

My second question is in a little more serious vein. The Hon. Member is from Newfoundland What does he advocate for the oil industry in Newfoundland? I know a succession of provincial politicians have held out the sort of pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. I am from British Columbia and I would like to see Atlantic Canada, especially Newfoundland, prosper.

Mr. Tobin: We would like to see B.C. prosper.

Mr. Waddell: Yes, I know the Hon. Member would like to see us prosper. Some of my best friends are Newfoundlanders. How would the Hon. Member propose to keep Hibernia going in this time of low oil prices? At $15 U.S. a barrel, there is not going to be any Hibernia in the immediate future. Let us face facts. Would the Hon. Member keep the oil going there or would he forget about that? The Hon. Member is from Cornerbrook, the forestry and fishing area, the traditional strengths of Newfoundland. Would the Hon. Member keep going with the oil industry? Let us be honest. Would the Hon. Member tell us what he really thinks? Don't be a Liberal for a moment. Tell us what you really think. How are we going to deal with this oil boom? Are we going to keep it going or not?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I am always delighted when the young fellow from British Columbia gets up and asks a question because it gives us humble, quiet spoken and articulate people from Newfoundland, who look as often as we can for an opportunity, to explain the concept of Liberalism to Hon. Members in this House who otherwise may be confused. The very nature of the question asked by the Hon. Member points to the need for a vibrant and moderate Liberal voice in this country. The Hon. Member asks if I am a free enterpriser—and one can only be a free enterpriser— or am I socialist—and one can only be a socialist—because one cannot be a free enterpriser and have a social conscience. The question illustrates best what is so sad and tragic about a Party which initially found as its raison d'être the notion of reform of the political system. The Hon. Member shows the contemporary face of the New Democratic Party which has become more conservative in terms of its doctrine and philosophy than the Conservatives. The Conservatives have a fixation that the free market system, and the free market system only, should provide all goods and services. Despite its earlier reformist roots, the New Democratic Party has a firm fixation that government and government only should provide all goods and services.

• (1600)

Being a person from a young part of the country—in fact, the newest province which only joined Confederation in 1949—I have discovered that rather than being married and slavishly loyal to a philosophy either left or right we ought to take what is good about social policy and what is good about the free enterprise system and marry the two. That is called a pragmatic approach to society. It is one which recognizes that there is a place for the free enterprise system, an important place. It recognizes as well that because of its small population and overwhelming landmass there is a need in our country to ensure fairness and justice. It recognizes that there is a need for Government intervention and a good social conscience. If the Hon. Member cannot understand that then he is part of the problem and not part of the solution.

The Hon. Member's second question with respect to whether we want an oil industry in Newfoundland or whether we want to go back to fishing and forestry is just another example of the Hon. Member's mental block. This block does not enable the Hon. Member to be more progessive in his views. He wants to tell Newfoundlanders that they must be either quaint fishermen and hewers of wood or that they can make the dramatic leap into the 1980s and try oil and gas. Newfoundlanders believe that they are sound enough in their appreciation of their heritage and culture to maintain the forestry and the fishery as the backbone of their economy. They can maintain it competitively enough to reach out and to participate fully under the proper conditions in the oil and gas industry. We do not feel a need to make a choice. In Newfoundland we have decided to retain what is unique about our province and to participate fully in all that Confederation has to offer the citizens of our province. If the Hon. Member does not understand that then it will be a long time indeed before we elect a New Democrat in the great Province of Newfoundland.

Hon. William Rompkey (Grand Falls—White Bay—Labrador): Mr. Speaker, that will be a hard act to follow.

One of the communities to which I feel close is Fort McMurray in Alberta. The reason is that if one takes the Fort McMurray phone book and goes through it one will find the names of my constituents throughout. Out of the 28,000 people in Fort McMurray there are between 5,000 and 6,000 Newfoundlanders. There are Rumboldts from Labrador, Walshes from the Island, Russells and Clarks. If one were to go through the phone book, as I did when I was there, one would find the names of a great many young Newfoundlanders in Fort McMurray. They are there because that is where the jobs were. These are young Newfoundlanders who went to Alberta looking for jobs when there were not enough of them at home and when, in fact, there was no hope that there would be any. That was many years ago.

When I was visiting Fort McMurray a couple of years ago, after the meetings we had during the day I went to a pub where a nice Irish band was playing. I talked to some of my fellow countrymen who were there. Some wanted to stay in Alberta since they were Canadians and not museum pieces or quaint folk from the outback, as my colleague, the Hon. Member for Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe (Mr. Tobin), pointed out. These are young mature Canadians whose country this is in the full sense of the word. They wish to stay in Alberta to make their living there. However, there were a great many others who had a strong attachment to our province and who wished to return home. They saw that Hibernia was coming. They knew that the skills they had developed in the oil patch would be of great value to them and to their province in the development of Hibernia. Many of them wanted to return home.

Those who wanted to return home were the ones to whom my colleague referred a few moments ago when he spoke about the thousands who will now be unemployed in western Canada. Some of those thousands who will be out of work in western Canada will head back to the Atlantic provinces to join the many more unemployed who are already there. These are people who had also hoped that Hibernia and Venture would go ahead, as well as other oil discoveries. These projects are now on hold. The dream that we had is quite rapidly being put off to another day. I agree with my colleague from Humber—Port au Port—St. Barbe when he says that we do not want to depend only on oil and gas, but that it is a very important, meaningful and real option. It is an option which is now fading farther back into the mists of the future because of the policies which have been put before us by the present Government.

I do not wish to repeat the arguments put forward by my friend from Newfoundland who quite lucidly, clearly and correctly pointed out the effect we are now seeing in terms of developments off the East Coast.

To divert for one moment, am I to understand that there is a 20-minute time limit on speeches?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I recognized the Hon. Member on a question or comment. If he now wishes to enter debate he may do so.

Mr. Rompkey: It was my understanding that I was taking part in debate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will allow the Hon. Member to continue on debate.

Mr. Rompkey: I asked Your Honour if I could continue my remarks since I saw you gesticulating. I was not quite sure whether we were playing football or whether we were still in the House of Commons.

I would now like to talk about why we thought Hibernia was going ahead. We knew that the National Energy Program encouraged exploration off the east coast and that it encouraged Canadian companies. I remember the deals and contracts we signed with companies to explore off the east coast. Built into those agreements was consideration for Canadian companies, smaller companies, Canadian workers and Canadian goods and materials. All of these items had to be guaranteed by the various companies which were exploring off the east coast. My understanding is that that is no longer the case. That is something for which the National Energy Program provided and that is why there was exploration. Those provisions are no longer in place.

The hundreds and possibly thousands of local people who obtained jobs through those companies now find themselves in jeopardy, as well as their jobs. My hon. friend from Newfoundland correctly pointed out that the number of rigs operating off the east coast has been drastically reduced, not to mention the danger in which Hibernia stands at the moment. The National Energy Program encouraged exploration, Canadian companies, local workers and local companies. As a result there was increased employment. In St. John's, and in other cities, small local companies which could provide a service to the offshore grew up. These companies are now in jeopardy.

The latest news from the East Coast is that the petroleum industry has signalled its growing disenchantment with low oil prices and risky East Coast exploration by bidding low at the first federal oil acreage staged under the Atlantic Accord. That is something which was reported in the evening Telegram. I think that clearly sets out the reaction not only of Governments but of the oil companies.

What the Government has done is throw us back wholly and completely on the mercy of not only private enterprise but of the multinational oil companies. We are now completely at the mercy of those multinationals. It is all very well to let the private sector do the job, but there has to be a time for the Government to intervene, as my colleague pointed out. I think that the Government should now be intervening, as it did in the past, to ensure the security of supply and to ensure those jobs off the east coast.

We must care about Canada and about Canadians. Again the Government has shown that it does not favour Canadian companies and that it does not favour Canadian people by ensuring that their rights in the Canadian offshore are protected. Previously there was a 25 per cent Crown share, which has now been done away with. Companies do not own that acreage; the people of Canada own that acreage. There should have been a preservation of that Crown share in the future as there was in the past. As a matter of fact, it was one of the strong points made continuously by the Government of Newfoundland in its negotiations with the Government of Canada. I note in passing that the Government of Newfoundland is now noticeably silent about doing away with the Crown share.

What we have is a reduction in drilling and a putting off of Hibernia for some time to come, basically because of the tax regime and the fiscal regime which the Government introduced. The Government will say that it signed the Atlantic Accord with Newfoundland. That was signalled by the Government of Canada as a great step forward for the Province of Newfoundland. We turned down offers, which included a Crown share as well as a more fruitful and lucrative fiscal regime for the province, in favour of the Atlantic Accord.

What do we have now? Yes, it is true that the Government of Newfoundland has control. However, over what does it have control? Control of nothing is still nothing. At the moment there is no Hibernia. The Government of Newfoundland can have all the control it likes, but if nothing is happening there is nothing to control.

The Government of Newfoundland also has royalty rights, but royalties on what? A percentage of nothing is still nothing. Nothing is happening at the moment. No money is coming in and there is no prospect of any that I can see. I do not want to be one who instils doom and gloom, but from the observations I have heard through the media and in the industry, the reality is that Hibernia has been put off well into the future, unless the Government of Canada does something about it.

This brings me to what the Government of Canada should be doing. The reality is that Hibernia cannot go ahead at the present price unless the Government of Canada intervenes. Why should it intervene? It should intervene because of security of supply. We should have security of supply in this country. The Government of Canada should take steps to ensure that we have security of supply and therefore that Hibernia goes ahead. However, the power of the Minister to do that has been reduced in the Bill.

As well, the Government of Canada should ensure that Hibernia goes ahead for the purposes of regional industrial expansion. We have always been a country of regions. Some regions have been more equal than others. Some have been more powerful, more rich, and have had larger resources available to them, such as some of the regions in the industrial heartland where we stand now. Historically other regions have needed help from the Government of Canada both in law and in finance. That is still true. The Government of Canada should ensure that Hibernia goes ahead because of the necessity for regional economic expansion.

The Government of Canada is prepared to put $1 billion into the Atlantic Enterprise Program. I predict it will draw on very little of that. However, it is not willing to put funds into supporting either a guaranteed price or some other mechanism to ensure that Hibernia goes ahead. The Government of Canada has to build in incentives. The only way we were able to develop Canadian companies, to encourage them to drill in the offshore, and to take that oil field to the point where it is now, was by building in incentives, biases and special attractions for Canadian companies. That must be done again. Whether it is in taxes or grants it does not really matter; the Government of Canada has to do it.

It may be expensive to be Canadian but I think it is worth while paying the price. I think most Canadians would agree. If we look at a number of different areas of the country, we see that it will cost us to be Canadian. It is a price we are prepared to pay. I think we should be paying that price in the Atlantic offshore as we have in other areas of the country.

At the same time as the Government of Canada changed its tax structure and oil policy, it cut back on Government programs available to our province. We are suffering from a double whammy, and I think the people of Canada should realize it. Not only is Hibernia not going ahead in the future, which will rob us of jobs we thought we would have, but Government programs have been slashed. Many jobs in the Public Service and in other areas of our province upon which we depended for a livelihood for some time have been cut back. There have been lay-offs in the fisheries and in transport. Other policies have been introduced, such as wharfage fees for fishermen. That kind of policy or kind of cost recovery is having a damaging and tragic effect upon the economy of the Atlantic provinces. The Government of Canada has changed its policy on oil, its fiscal regime, and its tax structure ensuring that projects will not go ahead. At the same time it has cut back on Government services upon which we have historically depended over the years.

It is a bleak day for Newfoundland. The people in my province had hoped for good times ahead. Now those dreams are beginning to fade. The Government should wake up and see the reality of what is happening. It should take steps to change its present policy. We require special incentives for Canadian companies. We require a mechanism in place which ensures that Hibernia and other projects can go ahead. Indeed, some of those steps have been taken by the Government of Canada and, for example, by the Government of Alberta. However, more of that needs to be done. Not enough has been done. The process has to be accelerated and expanded.

I say to my colleagues opposite that if that does not happen, if the Government does not step in, if the Government does not take steps to ensure that Hibernia goes ahead and that oil fields produce not only oil but jobs, there will be a time of reckoning for them. It will be, if not before, in the next election. The people of my province are seeing a Government which does not care; a Government which is not concerned about their welfare, their livelihood, and their future; a Government which does not care about their future with the Canadian companies they built. Again I plead with the Government to change its policy and to put in place a mechanism which ensures real jobs in the offshore and in Newfoundland and Labrador for the future.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, I enjoyed, as I always do, listening to my hon. friend. He made some very constructive points, but I am interested in understanding a couple of items.

The Hon. Member talked about the importance of bringing Hibernia onstream for the purpose of security of supply. I do not quite understand how bringing it onstream assures security of supply. If we know the oil is there, and if we know the amount that is there, surely that is security of supply. I was somewhat confused by his comments in that regard and I would like some clarification of them. I can see bringing it onstream for the economic good of his province; that is fair enough.

He also talked about initiatives and incentives to bring Hibernia onstream. Could he give some concrete ideas of what he has in mind? Could he be a little more specific about what he feels the Government should do? I would be very interested in hearing his ideas.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the Hon. Member's first question, we do not know exactly what is the field in the offshore. The reason many companies wanted to do more drilling was simply to verify exactly what was there. We have an idea, but we do not know specifically how much is there. It would be very useful to know exactly what is there in the offshore.

We were told about the number of rigs which would have been operating this year. Bob Blair, Chairman of Husky, said that because of the financial support system they could not do the work they were to do. They wanted to get out there; they wanted to verify what was out there. That is one thing the Government should be doing.

• (1620)

Let me go back to a previous policy. I recall that part of the National Energy Program was a made in Canada price. That sort of thing could be explored again. I recall that we had a price for old oil, a price for new oil and a combined price for Canadian projects. Why can the Government of Canada not look at that again? It was a policy before. I suspect the same bureaucrats in the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources are the ones who helped to put that policy together in the first place. If it made some sense then, why does it not make some sense now when the world price of oil has dropped? Let us look at a Canadian solution. Sure the oil is there offshore, but multinational companies are bringing oil in from outside the country. It is cheaper for Esso to bring oil in from elsewhere than to use resources in Canada.

I am not the Government, Mr. Speaker. Members on the other side are. Our job is to say what the Government is doing and how it affects Canadians. If the Government is looking for solutions, perhaps Government Members could look again at the solutions proposed earlier on, look at incentives to drill to verify oil fields, and to look at a made in Canada price for the production of those projects.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, it did my heart good to hear the Hon. Member for Grand Falls—White Bay—Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) tell about the hundreds of Newfoundlanders who were finding work in Fort McMurray and in Alberta. I have visited Fort McMurray many times. I have seen young people, young men, older men and women from all parts of Canada who were doing well. But what killed the industry in Alberta was the National Energy Program. The Member says it was good for Canadians. It was good for some Canadians, but it literally destroyed the oil and gas industry in Alberta and part of Saskatchewan. It drove hundreds of our rigs and people with expertise out of the country.

An Hon. Member: Rubbish.

Mr. Rompkey: You are the Government now.

Mr. Taylor: It brought on an artificial depression. That is what the National Energy Program did for Alberta. Had it not been for that program, we would not be in the position we are in today in the Province of Alberta.

The situation today is entirely different. It is not an artificial depression. We have a depression. There is a surplus of oil in the world. We have an international situation. The Government had nothing to do with that. It is an international situation and we are suffering along with every other oil producing country.

Mr. Deans: We are suffering.

Mr. Taylor: When the Member talks about security of supply, where were Members of the Liberal Party when they brought in the National Energy Program that literally stopped production in Alberta and Saskatchewan, certainly in Alberta? I saw hundreds of vehicles leaving the province. Hundreds of our people were out of work and hundreds went back to their own provinces because of the policies of the National Energy Program. It was an artificial situation created by the previous Government. As some people say, it was a policy to try to destroy an industry in one part of Canada. I hope we never have that kind of a policy again by any Government.

We have to deal now with an international situation and deal with it as effectively as possible. There will be better times in the oil industry.

I remember when we were looking for people in 1940 to help us develop the oil industry in Alberta. We could not get one red cent out of the Liberal Government at that time. We had to go out of the country to get finances, without which we would not have an oil and gas industry today.

Why did the Liberal Government introduce a policy like the National Energy Program? It destroyed the industry in Alberta and drove many hundreds of people out of the country entirely.

Mr. Rompkey: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has to remember that he supports the Government now. We are not here to debate the pros and cons of the National Energy Program. I would be quite happy to do that, but under the National Energy Program we had rigs off the east coast. Under the National Energy Program we had young Newfoundlanders employed, and under the National Energy Program we had small Canadian companies that were servicing the offshore. Now we do not. That is the reality, Mr. Speaker. Members over there have to deal with the situation. There is a world-wide problem and it is the Government's job to come up with answers to what is happening in Canada. We are not here to fight the battles of the past. That Party is now the Government and it is responsible for finding solutions to the situation in Canada.

People back home in my province and my colleagues and countrymen in Alberta will be laid off because the Government is not doing anything about the situation. If the Hon. Member wants to make his mark he should be talking to his Cabinet colleagues asking them how they are going to deal with the reality of today. Never mind the National Energy Program. We know what the National Energy Program did and did not do. There were jobs, there were rigs and there were companies operating. Now there are not. The question is not, what was the National Energy Program all about, but what is the Government doing about the situation today. That is the question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The question is as follows. Miss Carney, seconded by Mr. MacKay, moves that Bill C-92, an Act to regulate interests in petroleum in relation to frontier lands, to amend the Oil and Gas Production and Conservation Act and to repeal the Canada Oil and Gas Act, be now read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the Members.

The House divided on the motion (Miss Carney) which was agreed to on the following division:

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DISPOSITION OF BILLS C-93 AND C-110

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations between the Parties with respect to the business for the remainder of the day. The agreement arrived at between the Parties will involve unanimous consent of the House.

We want to deal with two Bills today. The first one is Bill C-93 respecting the Sechelt Indian Band. This matter was reported from the committee yesterday but there is a disposition, by unanimous consent, to deal with the Bill now at report stage and third reading. I simply ask you to get confirmation from the opposition Parties as to that understanding.

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, for this Party, we have had discussions about Bill C-93, the Sechelt Indian self-government Bill, and we are quite prepared to give consent that this Bill move toward final reading this afternoon.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I understood that we were going to deal with two matters and would deal with both before the House rises at 6.25 p.m. However, I do seek from all Members of the House agreement that we try to share the time reasonably in order that those who want to speak to either or both Bills will have the opportunity to do so and still complete the business.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to confirm the understanding that we will seek an equitable sharing of time.

I should mention that the second Bill we want to deal with, even though it was introduced only today, is the Bill introduced by my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie), with respect to the settlement with the Grassy Narrows Indian Band.

Mr. Penner: Mr. Speaker, with respect to the second matter, we see this as an agreement that has been negotiated between the Indian people of Islington and Grassy Narrows, and Parliament is, in fact, validating it. We are prepared to go through all stages this afternoon and see that Bill passed.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SECHELT INDIAN BAND SELF-GOVERNMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-93, an Act relating to self-government for the Sechelt Indian Band (Title changed from An Act relating to the establishment of self-government for the Sechelt Indian Band), as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development.

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that the Bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Crombie moved that the Bill be read the third time and passed.

• (1710)

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would first like to thank all Hon. Members of the House from all Parties for their consideration in allowing us to proceed with this Bill and the second Bill later on today and, given the constraint of time, I would simply like to make one or two remarks. I would like to indicate that this Bill is notable for a number of reasons. First, it is notable because it has the agreement of the federal Government, the Province of British Columbia and all political Parties in this House. Indeed, even more significantly, it has the consent of all federal Departments in Ottawa. It is no mean task to achieve all of that in this country with so many varied opinions and views. I might say that the credit for all of that goes to the people of Sechelt. They have kept the negotiations going at every turn of the road when it looked as if they were going to be frustrated. I was with them recently, as was the standing committee. If we have any sense of the feeling of what this Bill means, it is from listening to what the Sechelt community has to say. They have a big banner and T-shirts. On the T-shirt it says: "C-93 will make us free". It is a small event in many ways but it speaks volumes about the ability of this House and this system of Government to move forward in a way which fits a very small number of people of very ancient heritage.

I want to conclude by simply saying, thanks a lot to the House and thanks a lot to the people who put it together, particularly, the Sechelt people.

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I will speak only briefly on Bill C-93 and indicate, as the Minister himself implied, that in a national sense, perhaps in terms of the recommendations of the Committee on Indian Self-Government, in terms of constitutional recognition of aboriginal rights and the definition of those rights, including that of self-determination, we would have to say that the Sechelt Bill is one small step in the right direction towards aboriginal self-government. I think all Hon. Members know that no longer are we speaking in the realm of theory. We are now talking in a real world. Most of us will see self-determination for aboriginal people become a significant reality in Canada within our own lifetime. As the Minister so well said, for the people of Sechelt this is a major leap forward. I was there recently with members of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development. The feeling and spirit of the community was one which really should be experienced by all Hon. Members. If we believe in Indian First Nation autonomy, if we accept the fact of diversity in the Indian community, and we really have no choice in that regard, then we certainly have to accede to the wishes of the Sechelt Indian people. They have hoped much and have worked very hard. The Bill we are passing this afternoon incorporates what they want, not what someone else wants. They collaborated in the drafting of this legislation, which is certainly a monument to Chief Dixon, to his advisers and to the people he leads.

The Minister knows I have some lingering concerns about the Bill. I wish the funding provisions were stronger. They rely to a significant extent upon the good faith of Government and we just hope that that good faith will be evident. I wish the Government of British Columbia had been willing to leave the Sechelt lands unencumbered. I wish the resource control legislation on the lands which will go to them in fee simple had been lifted. Chief Dixon knows of these concerns and we hope there will be that kind of response from the Government of British Columbia.

I will conclude by saying that when we were in Sechelt, Chief Dixon reminded us that we live in the real world, not a world we would structure if we could, not an ideal existence we would plan for ourselves. So my best wishes today are for Chief Dixon and his people. I am convinced that the people of Sechelt with this Bill will build a much better world for themselves. I commend them for what they have done and I commend the Minister for his co-operation in helping this come into being in a relatively short period of time.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to lend my voice to the kind of atmosphere of co-operation in this House today and thank the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie) and Hon. Members of the Liberal Party for bringing together their efforts today to pass this piece of legislation. I think it demonstates the kind of co-operation we can obtain in a legislature. We often see conflicts arise in the House and those are the things which are highlighted in the public eye. Today has been the culmination of an act of co-operation in which Hon. Members of the House developed the wishes of a group of people who live in British Columbia, the Sechelt people.

It has been a long and difficult task. It was not put in place over a short period of time. The task took something in the order of 15 years after it became apparent that the band could not live under the Indian Act, that it could not grow and develop in the way the Sechelt people desired. At that time they began to struggle and look for solutions. It was a task which was begun well before the present Chief and Council were in place. Previous councils of the Sechelt people began the concept, developed it and passed it on to the next council which developed it even further. I think Chief Dixon and his Council must be very proud today to have put in place a historic piece of legislation. It is legislation in which the Sechelt people are free of the Indian Act. They are free now to set out on the course of social and economic development which I am sure will be a glowing success.

The Sechelt people make it very plain that this is only one step. They are now free of the Indian Act. Certainly there are many problems and challenges which face them from here on in, but they have succeeded after 15 years of planning in getting this particular legislation in place, and we have not seen the last of the Sechelt people and their representatives. They will move on with other Indian people in this country to build the kind of place in Canadian society that they wish and we wish for them. I would like again to congratulate Hon. Members of the House, the Sechelt Council and Chief Dixon, and all of those who have made this the success it is. I wish them well in the future.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development mentioned that there were many symbols developed by the Sechelt people. He mentioned a Sechelt T-shirt which says: "C-93 will make us free". With your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, this T-shirt says: "The Sechelt is free of the Indian Act", and I would wish the Minister to have it.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member knows why I must interrupt at this point.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say a couple of words, but not to repeat what other Hon. Members have said. As Chairman of the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs and Northern Development, I want to congratulate the Minister and his Department for the manner in which they put the Bill together, the Government of British Columbia for the manner in which it has co-operated on this project, and the standing committee which worked on this matter for some time.

I can recall the Special Committee on Indian Self-Government. The Sechelt people appeared before us some years ago and put forward an excellent plan which has been carried out fairly today. I want to thank the members of the committee for putting forward a first-class piece of legislation for the Sechelt people. I wish the Sechelt people well.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the third time and passed.

GRASSY NARROWS AND ISLINGTON INDIAN BANDS MERCURY POLLUTION CLAIMS SETTLEMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development) moved that Bill C-110, an Act to approve, give effect to and declare valid certain agreements between the Government of Canada, the Government of Ontario, Reed Inc., Great Lakes Forest Products Ltd., the Islington Indian Band and the Grassy Narrows Indian Band, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to the Committee of the Whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would again like to thank Members of the House. I would like to thank you as well, Mr. Speaker, for your fast-track approach. You should be negotiating with the Americans.

Bill C-110 deals with a matter which, as some people know and remember, has been around for years and years. I guess it has been around in the order of about 15 or 17 years.

Mr. Penner: Sixteen years.

Mr. Crombie: Sixteen years.

We arrived at the essentials of an arrangement between the Grassy Narrows Indian Band, Whitedog, the corporations and the Province of Ontario last fall. Since that time we have been trying to ensure that the arrangement stays together, if I can put it that way. There are a number of people who have significantly contributed to this arrangement, not the least of whom was Mr. Justice Emmett Hall, now retired but still going strong, who is so good at these matters. It also took the act of support of opposition Parties and, in particular, their northern members.

I might say that in a sense this brings to a close a very sad and bad chapter in this province's history with respect to native people. Indeed, it spawned a number of essays and a number of books. It taught many people something which we perhaps too often forget; that is, that native people live in a world which is sometimes not clearly understood by non-Indian people. We tend not to spend enough time trying to learn about it. Perhaps I should not make such a comment at the second reading stage of this Bill, but on the weekend when I was dealing with the matter in Winisk I noticed that it did not receive nearly the attention it should have received even though there was a loss of life, one person missing, and an entire community of 125 people destroyed. The matter was sort of put into seventh place in the news. In a sense the legacy of Grassy Narrows and Whitedog is still with us.

In conclusion, this is the last page of the bad old way on the matter of Grassy Narrows and Whitedog. Hopefully, it is the first page as well for a new future for both these bands. Anyone who has had experience with the episode of the mercury poisoning in the English and Wabigoon Rivers and how it affected those communities will know that, in a way, we will never be able to rectify what was done. This is at least a small way in which to begin a future with a new generation of people in these two communities.

I wish to thank again those who have given their consent for this matter to go ahead today. I welcome the comments of others.

Finally, I wish to say that the negotiations were difficult but the next 20 years will be the most difficult for these communities. I hope that the arrangements we have made will be sufficient for the task.

Mr. Keith Penner (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, in commenting briefly on Bill C-110 I would like to say to Hon. Members who are concerned that a Bill of this nature is to go through all stages in a relatively short period of time that they should be aware that what we are in fact doing today is ratifying an agreement. We are validating a settlement which will confer benefits on people who have suffered terribly because of the effects of pollution. The fact that this Bill will not go to a legislative committee should not be distressing or disquieting to any Hon. Member since it would not be possible to amend it anyway. If people wished to amend a Bill of this type it would have to go back to all the parties.

When I note that the hand of Justice Emmett Hall is in this agreement it gives me great confidence that this is the best possible agreement that could have been reached since he has such an outstanding reputation in this country. He is surely one of the greatest humanitarians in the entire history of Canada.

I wish to say that the problem with the Grassy Narrows Indian Band and the Islington Indian Band touches me personally. I was a resident in the community of Dryden at the time it was learned that mercury from the pulp and paper mill had polluted the English and Wabigoon Rivers. There was evidence early on that people were suffering in terms of health. Later on that suffering became much more than just a matter of health. It became a serious problem of social dislocation. Serious psychological problems arose. It spelled the destruction of a way of life of a people, a people in this country whom, as the Minister has said, few of us appreciate, understand and even care a small amount about. I am talking about the Indian people of the country, the aboriginal people. Some day it will dawn upon the consciousness of Canada that we owe a huge debt to the first citizens of this country, a debt that can never be paid. However, we can certainly work actively and diligently toward the justice which the first citizens of Canada deserve. After all, we are the beneficiaries of those first citizens, the aboriginal peoples of Canada. Most of us are the descendants of newcomers to this country. We have profited from the land which was derived from reaching agreements, in certain cases treaties, which were never in my view honoured either by letter or in spirit.

With respect to the Grassy Narrows Band, the Islington Band and the community which was once known as Whitedog, I think there are some lessons which have to be learned. One of the lessons is that when environmental matters are raised in the House of Commons they can never, ever, be taken lightly under any circumstances. When we hear references to toxic substances in the Niagara River system we cannot say that it is just another issue which Members who live there or members of the Opposition are concerned about. I say this because I learned from the English and Wabigoon Rivers' problem and the effect it had on the Indian people that those environmental problems are real. They are not esoteric or theoretical. They are real. They touch people where they live, how they earn their living, their health and their well-being in every single respect. When we neglect serious environmental concerns in the country we are simply inviting tragic consequences. There is no more tragic consequence that I am aware of than that at Grassy Narrows and Whitedog.

As I have said, these people have suffered terribly. In reaching this settlement, which I welcome, I wish to say that my confidence in certain aspects of our society over that 16-year period has been very sorely tried. For example, my confidence in the goodwill of the corporate sector of the country has been sorely tried. I do not think, in the history of Canadian corporations, that any company involved in this problem with the people of Whitedog and Grassy Narrows can take any pride in it at all. It is really a shameful part of our history. My confidence has also been sorely tried in the ability of Government to move with a sense of haste and urgency in dealing with serious and obvious cases of injustice. It is a crying shame that it has taken 16 years to reach nothing more than a monetary settlement with these people. A settlement has been reached; certainly it is long overdue. There will be no delay from myself or from members of my Party. We want this settlement ratified and put into effect very quickly.

• (1730)

In conclusion, I want to indicate that the compensation package for these Indian people is only a very humble attempt to correct a wrong. It seems that all we can do is to offer money. That money will be well used. It is required and necessary. However, let the House know that in no way can we heal all the wounds or undo all the harm. In passing this measure with a minimum amount of debate, I can only say that it is the very, very least we can do.

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to add today some brief comments to the consideration of Bill C-110, as we move toward passing it and ratifying the agreement which has been accomplished between the Government of Canada, the Government of Ontario, Reed, Great Lakes Forest Products, the Islington Indian Band at Whitedog, and the Grassy Narrows Indian Band.

As the Hon. Member for Cochrane—Superior (Mr. Penner) rightly observed, this is but a partial restitution for the tragedy. It is not my intention today to go into a lengthy exposition of the nature of the tragedy. While it certainly bears repetition, reiteration and holding up as an example to Hon. Members of the House and indeed the people of the country, to do so in the House of Commons at the final phase of the ratification of the agreement would not be appropriate. I would rather charge every Member of the House, and indeed every citizen of the country, with studying the tragedy of Whitedog and the tragedy of Grassy Narrows. They should vow to themselves that such tragedies should never be allowed to happen again.

As most of us are the descendants of newcomers to this country, we should appreciate the legacy the native people of Canada, the Indian and Inuit alike, have given to us. There are those of us who are newcomers to the country. I hope I speak for the majority of us when I say that we appreciate that we are, in a very real sense, enjoying what the Indian and Inuit people of Canada have granted to us freely and in a spirit of goodwill, brotherhood, and co-operation, which we unfortunately have been somewhat tardy and somewhat inconsistent in returning.

I first made the acquaintance of the people of Whitedog, the Islington Indian Band, and the people of Grassy Narrows approximately a decade ago, almost to the month. In 1976, I had the privilege of visiting their communities. At that time I was struck by the air of desolation and by seeing a dog limping crazily and zig-zagging down a dirt road. Obviously the dog had been affected by the consumption of mercury contaminated fish and presumably had a very short life because of it. I was also struck, even then, by the spirit of the people. That is what sticks out in my mind as I address the Bill today. I was struck by their spirit and their determination not to be ground down by the force of circumstance or by the blind, ignorant damage of an industrial system from which they never benefited and which they were totally unable to influence at the time.

I should also like to mention some of the outstanding people who, by personal commitment, made it possible for Whitedog and Grassy Narrows to reach the situation of today, the ratification of the agreement. Of course these are mostly people from the communities themselves, but there were some who were outsiders to the community and should be mentioned, for example, Bruce Crofts, John Olthuis, and retired Justice Emmett Hall who was mentioned by the Minister. More particularly I should like to refer to the leaders of the bands—former Chief Steve Fobister and present Chief Arnold Pelley of Grassy Narrows; former Chiefs Isaac Mandamin and Roy McDonald, as he was at the date of the signing of the agreement, and present Chief of the Islington Band at Whitedog, Anthony Henry. These are the people who will carry forward the torch for their communities and for their peoples. These are the people who will play the leadership role in taking this compensation which, while I would not term it token, can never compensate for all the damage done to those communities. I know it was not designed with the idea that it could totally compensate.

Let us merely say that the compensation which has been granted to the people of these communities is relatively modest, or very modest indeed, in comparison with the assistance and the guarantees which the damaging parties have received, and of course in comparison with the profits they have made. That is not said in a spirit of meanness or revenge with regard to those parties. I believe that it is by partnership in the future that the situation of the communities of Whitedog and Grassy Narrows will be improved. It is by co-operation based upon an understanding, an awareness, and a resolve by the people of the country, by the leaders of industry and by those who bear responsibility for environmental regulations, that this type of tragedy, which we take a small step toward correcting today, shall never happen again in this Canada of ours.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join in the debate this afternoon. As the Minister indicated during his opening remarks, there are some people who have been involved in one way or another for a number of years.

The problem started back in 1970 with the discovery of mercury contamination from the Reed Mill in Dryden. That was before the time that I became involved in politics, but it became an issue of which I was very conscious as a resident of northwestern Ontario. In 1975, as a Member of the Ontario Legislature, I found myself having to deal with that issue in a general sense in the House and in committee. I find it ironic that today, 16 years later, we are closing a chapter of the book relating to the history of Whitedog and Grassy Narrows. I also find ironic the way in which white society in Ontario has treated our native brethren, our original residents of the country. Nothing could be clearer than taking a look at that very small corner of northwestern Ontario to see the dual approach—and I say it frankly—which the Government of Ontario took in dealing with those residents.

In the community of Minaki, the Government of Ontario spent over the last 16 years upwards of $50 million in the redevelopment of a luxurious resort facility designed to attract people from outside the area and to stimulate the economy. On the other hand, a small native community a few miles up the road and its neighbour, the second community we are debating today, received only talk from the Government of Ontario for most of those 16 years. All they got from the corporations was talk. All they got from the federal Government was talk.

I want to compliment the Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs (Mr. Crombie) for having the willingness and the fortitude to get something done. I want to compliment the new Government of Ontario for deciding that it was time we had a settlement and that we had to work collectively instead of fighting over whose jurisdiction it was. I compliment the patience of the bands. My colleague, the Hon. Member for Kenora—Rainy River (Mr. Epp), mentioned the leaders of the two bands who have participated over the years. I compliment them on their patience. Perhaps that is one of the lessons they can teach us as a result of this process. When you are dealing with the white society you must have patience because we are not prepared to act quickly to respond to specific needs. This should not have taken 16 years, at least not to provide the kind of compensation finally reached. It should have been a matter of course.

Whether it was the federal Government or the provincial Government, it should have met with the bands in a short period of time, worked out what their economic needs were and what they needed to replace their livelihood, which was based on natural resources, particularly the fishing industry and the wild rice industry that was destroyed by Ontario Hydro. That is what we should have done. Either the federal Government or the provincial Government should have taken the companies to court. Why let the natives, who have been suffering because of Minimata disease and because of the loss of their traditional livelihood and forced onto welfare and into alcoholism, do it? We as a society had the responsibility. We as the federal Parliament had the legal trust for those reserves. We should have taken that action and done on behalf of natives what they have taken 16 years to accomplish, the reaching of a settlement that allows them to have the economic wherewithal to begin re-investment in the future, to encourage new development, new industry, any industry, and new employment opportunities to re-orientate and look into the long-term health ramifications. That is what we should have done, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately we did not. We as a society must accept the shame of that but we must learn from it.

As we are moving into an era that will see an evolution of self-government for our native people, we must keep those kinds of things in mind. We must ensure they have the wherewithal and the mechanisms to react. We as a society must continue to ensure that our native people are not faced with the situation in northern Canada seen in the last three or four months of mercury contamination in the Churchill, Hudson's Bay area and the finding of high levels of toxins in our wildlife. We must react and react quickly to protect the peoples and to ensure that we can replace their traditional livelihoods if those livelihoods are threatened or destroyed. We must do something that makes sense for them and is done in concert with them.

I am pleased the Bill is before us today. It is the closing of a chapter. I hope it leads to a very successful sequel to the residents of White Dog and Grassy Narrows so they too can rejoin the rest of Canada in having the right to a job, the opportunity for a job, the opportunity for an appropriate lifestyle conducive to the natural environment. Maybe some day we may even find that the English-Wabigoon River sytem having purified itself will once again be available for the harvesting of fish and thus return the traditional lifestyle to the native populations.

I congratulate the Minister for bringing this legislation forward. I know that, relatively speaking, the work the Minister has done has been done in a most compressed time. I compliment him for that. I compliment too members of the Fisheries and Forestry Committee who last year dealt with this issue and had the chiefs of the two bands before them. I would like to think that, along with the work of the Minister and the work of Mr. Justice Emmett Hall, that committee had some weight behind it to bring forward this agreement we have today together with the acceptance by companies of their responsibility to the peoples of north western Ontario. Congratulations, Mr. Minister. Thank you.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Penner: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to debate this at all, but just for the information of the House, since this is the appropriation section and monies for the two bands are to be appropriated from the Consolidated Revenue Fund, can the Minister say whether he is able to advise the House as to the method in which these monies are to be paid? Will they be put into a trust fund in total at one time or is it to be over a period of time? If the Minister could provide that information to the House, we could then pass the Bill.

Mr. Crombie: Mr. Chairman, it is a staggered payment, the specifics of which I can give to the Hon. Member in the standing committee later this evening. Perhaps I could provide the information at that time.

Mr. Penner: Mr. Chairman, that is acceptable. Thank you.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. President of the Privy Council (Mr. Hnatyshyn) has designated this coming Friday as an allotted day. Therefore, there will be no Private Members' Business. INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-109, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to speak on second reading of Bill C-109, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act. Bill C-109 relates to the controversial scientific research tax credit program introduced by the previous Government. The scientific research tax credit was designed to allow corporations to transfer the benefit of tax deductions and credits to outside investors. This tax was equal to the SRTCs sold and is refundable as the corporation actually performs research and development. This tax is provided for in Part VIII of the Income Tax Act and is payble 30 days after the end of the month in which the SRTCs were sold.

The purpose of Part VIII tax is to protect the Government from corporations which would drain the public purse without actually doing any research and development. I agree with the purpose behind these provisions. I would inform the House, however, that this intention has been undermined by recent and conflicting case law. Notwithstanding that Part VIII tax is payable within 30 days after the end of the month in which an SRTC is issued, one judicial authority has held that it cannot be collected as it becomes due but, rather, can be collected only after the corporation has filed its income tax return for the year in which the SRTC was issued. This could be up to six months after the corporation's year end.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, at this point I do not intend to recall the ways in which this program was abused, which led to the program being abolished in the May Budget. However, I may remind the House that the transitional relief provisions that followed the program's abolition allowed for issuing a certain amount of scientific research tax credits until the end of 1985.

Mr. Speaker, it is therefore essential that Bill C-109 be adopted quickly, to avoid a situation where the Government would have to refund taxes collected under Part VIII of the Income Tax Act, which might prove difficult to collect later on.

[English]

In the absence of these amendments $225 million of Part VIII tax previously collected as the result of 576 audits, mainly by legal action, seizing assets or accepting security, may have to be refunded by Revenue Canada. In addition, Revenue Canada cannot proceed with the collection of 866 additional assessments now being monitored, nor can assessments be issued for approximately 100 SRTC designations received since the court decision. These amendments are not controversial, nor do they change the intended application of the Part VIII tax as approved by this House.

[Translation]

These amendments should therefore receive the support of the House, since they are in line with the objectives we had in mind when the Part VIII tax was adopted by this House.

[English]

Bill C-109 also excludes the Part VIII tax from the taxes in dispute legislation contained in the Income Tax Act. The taxes in dispute legislation was introduced as one of the first acts of the Government in order to protect taxpayers who have legitimate disputes with Revenue Canada as to the amount of regular income tax owing. This is not appropriate in the case of the Part VIII tax however, as this tax merely offsets credits already issued by the corporation, which credits the Government is bound to honour.

Bill C-109 ensures that corporations cannot delay the recovery of Part VIII tax by the simple act of filing a notice of objection to an assessment. It should be noted, however, that Revenue Canada's practice is to collect Part VIII tax during the course of a corporation's taxation year only when it has reason to believe that the SRTC funds will not be expended on research and development.

The amendments proposed in Bill C-109 are not retroactive but are effective for assessments made after March 28, 1986, the day on which these proposals were announced. Nevertheless, in cases where Government funds are at risk, new assessments can be issued and Part VIII taxes collected as soon as is appropriate in the circumstances.

I need not dwell on the abuses that have been reported on this program. It is for this reason that the SRTC was discontinued in the May 1985 Budget. Nevertheless, under transitional relief provisions it was possible for some SRTCs to have been issued up to the end of 1985. It is imperative that Bill C-109 be implemented quickly in order that the Government not find itself in a position of having to refund taxes collected under Part VIII which may be in danger of not being subsequently collectable.

It is with anticipation, therefore, that I seek the co-operation of all my colleagues in the House in the speedy passage of Bill C-109.

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the scientific research tax credit is a mechanism used by a company which carries out research in Canada and which may not have to pay taxes because it is not a profit-making business—for instance a company just beginning to develop a new product or a new technology—so this tax credit is a mechanism through which it is allowed to transfer its tax incentives to outside investors. We are talking about a company which does research and needs money to carry out its work a company which would normally be eligible for the scientific research tax credit but which cannot avail itself of the Income Tax Act provisions on research funding because it is not making any profit and does not pay corporate taxes.

The scientific research tax credit was a way to enable such a company to transfer its tax incentives or tax credits to outside investors like profitable businesses prepared to lend or invest money in the company. In turn these investors could claim the tax credit normally available to the company doing the research work.

This mechanism was first unveiled in the April 1983 Budget of Finance Minister Lalonde, and it was set up after lengthy consultations with the interested parties from whom this proposition originated in the first place. These were private sector interests, people doing research who claimed it was imperative to find a way to fund research projects.

[English]

We are all well aware of some of the abuses involving the scientific research tax credit which led to its eventual elimination. The Bill we are studying today, Bill C-109, would give the Government the power to collect advance payment of taxes questioned under certain court rulings recently. Therefore, our Party supports the legislation. It is intended to make one aspect of the Government's monitoring and collection system enforceable. However, we do not support the outright elimination of the SRTC as announced one year ago by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson). We feel it should be maintained with appropriate controls. In spite of the abuses the SRTC was subjected to, its basic principle was valid.

As I mentioned earlier, the industry was highly supportive of the credit. Original estimates by the Department of Finance in the Budget of June, 1983, were that this tax credit would generate about $100 million of additional expenditures on research and development. That forecast was proven wrong both because the program was more successful than expected, and because of the abuses mentioned. The safeguards initially designed by the Department of Finance against abuse were clearly inadequate. However, I would point out that the Conservative Party supported the SRTC when it was introduced. Indeed, the former Minister for Science and Technology sitting here this evening, now the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. Siddon), was his Party's critic on science and technology at that time. He commended the initiative in the House on December 13, 1983. He even said the measure was inadequate. In retrospect it is amusing to look back on the comments he made at the time. For purposes of debate I would like to read—

Mr. Siddon: Read the whole thing.

Mr. Berger: —what the Minister said. I am not going to read his whole speech.

Mr. Siddon: Read the good parts.

Mr. Berger: I will read the relevant parts. At page 145 of Hansard of December 13, 1983, he said:

> —when I deal with the specific increases in R and D tax credits, I will point out the tremendously inadequate level of support they represent to a very important sector of our economy.

He went on to say, as reported at page 147:

> What the income tax amendment to the R and D tax credits does is to increase the incentive to do research in the private sector by something in the order of one one-hundredth of what is required. The amendment is only 1 per cent as powerful and significant as what is required to get the private sector really rolling along and doing much more research and development in the country.

I do not know if the order of magnitude was right, but certainly the thrust of his comments was right. Even with the SRTC and some of the good research it produced I submit we still have not found the answer to getting the private sector really rolling along and doing much more research and development in this country. Indeed, the committee concerned will be hearing tomorrow from Douglas Wright, the President of the University of Waterloo, who has some very serious concerns to raise about the subject of university research and the Government's proposals in the February Budget to provide matching grants for contributions by the private sector.

I would like to emphasize again that considerable good investment did occur as a result of the SRTC. I have articles here going back to 1983 and 1984 where it is pointed out that companies like Pratt & Whitney Canada obtained some $165 million through this incentive. We are all well aware of the kind and quality of the products that company has produced, and the resulting economic benefits. The same is true of Mitel Corporation. That company has had some financial difficulties, but with the recent purchase by British Telecom it will hopefully be able to see its way past those difficulties. It raised money for research under the SRTC program as well.

In addition, I would like to refer to a recent meeting of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts which dealt with this question on March 11. The Deputy Minister of National Revenue gave a number of examples of qualifying research projects under this program. He could not name companies because of the confidential nature of the information under the Income Tax Act, but he mentioned some research being done on a computerized security system. He said that, if successful, this system will be substantially advanced over the systems available today. Potential buyers in both Canada and the United States have already expressed an interest. Another example he gave was the development of an interactive computer graphics technology to integrate the work of multidiscipline teams in the exploration area. The main purpose of the project was to increase productivity of such teams by 30 per cent and, if successful, the program had a potential world-wide market. Another example concerned the development of new products.

The scientific research tax credit incentive was sufficient, it was observed, to entice a foreign commpany to move its research facility to Canada. The research has since been successfully concluded and the company is in the planning stages of setting up a production facility at the same location. There are several other examples of Canadian companies which plan to set up production facilities as soon as the research projects have been completed.

It is quite clear that considerable good research took place as a result of this program. I asked a question in the Public Accounts Committee a year ago. I asked the representatives from the Department of National Revenue, the Department of Finance, and the Comptroller General's office what percentage of the spending or what percentage of the research conducted under this program was good and what percentage was bad. We all know that it is the abuses that get the attention. One individual decides to spend the money that has been raised ostensibly for research on buying a Ferrari, investing in real estate transactions or something like that, and it makes headlines right across the country. Are these headlines and this anecdotal evidence representative of all of the research that took place under the program? I asked the department officials, is this 10 per cent, 20 per cent, or 50 per cent? They could not tell me. Even today you cannot get a straight answer when you ask that particular question.

I think we can arrive at some kind of a conclusion if we look at the figures provided by the Deputy Minister of National Revenue in the Public Accounts Committee on March 11. He pointed out that the Part VIII tax that is anticipated to be uncollectable is something in the order of $900 million. The total Part VIII tax liability is $2.8 billion.

If you look at it in those terms, the uncollectable amount is approximately one-third of the total Part VIII tax liability. Part VIII tax liability, to try and translate that into understandable terms, is the amount of the tax credits that have been given by the Government for purposes of research and development. A tax credit, as those who are familiar with the Income Tax Act may know, reduces tax otherwise payable. When $100 is spent on R and D with a 50 per cent tax credit, a 50 per cent tax credit reduces government revenue by $50. When the tax credit is given to the investor under the scientific research tax credit, the Government is out of pocket by that $50 until the research and development is actually performed, which then extinguishes the liability. The amount the Government is out of pocket initially, as I said earlier, is $2.8 billion. Of that $2.8 billion, some $900 million is believed to be unrecoverable.

If we can conclude from that that two-thirds of the research that was done under this program is legitimate, it tells us that the abuses are, perhaps, less than may initially meet the eye. I do not know if one can conclude that two-thirds of the research will actually produce something of benefit for Canada, something of benefit for the company, or lead to a successful company, because by the very nature of it research is a hit and miss operation. Some companies may conduct dozens of research programs, and only a few may lead to a successful invention or lead to a product which is marketable by the company. I felt it important to try and put this whole debate into a certain sense of perspective.

In its pre-budget submission to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) in December of 1985, the Canadian Advanced Technology Association, which represents a number of Canadian-owned and controlled high technology companies, made the point that considerable scientific research spending in Canada occurred under this program that would not otherwise have taken place. They stated it is clear, therefore, that markets are responsive to government incentives to encourage risk taking. While this program was seriously abused, the Canadian Advanced Technology Association says—we are not in any way trying to defend those abuses—the ability to flow through R and D tax benefits to individual investors did result, as I said earlier, in considerable scientific research spending in Canada that would not otherwise have taken place.

They went on to recommend that the Department of Finance officials examine the possibility of structuring a new flow-through mechanism for scientific research and development expenditures structured along the lines of the flow-through share arrangements currently in place in the mining industry. They point out in their pre-budget submission to the Minister of Finance that this would differ from the SRTC Program in several important ways. There would be clear risks to the investor. Second, shares would not be issued to the investor until R and D expenditures had actually taken place. Third, due diligence would be enforced on all the players. They offered to volunteer the resources of their association to work with the Department in assessing the merit of developing a new policy instrument along these lines.

Unfortunately, the Government did not respond to this request from the Canadian Advanced Technology Association in its last Budget. Our Party has taken the position that it is necessary to have this kind of a mechanism to provide financing for high risk research, for start-up companies which have difficulty raising research moneys and investment under the current tax incentives.

I would also like to mention that there is considerable concern in the high technology community that the abuses which occurred under the scientific research tax credit program are going to seriously damage the Government's new investment research tax credit, which was introduced in the Budget of last May, in which the Government stated its intention to broaden the definition of research and development. Revenue Canada issued a paper in which it undertook to consult respecting the preparation of guidelines on the subject of scientific research and development.

• (1820)

The Standing Committee on Reseach, Science and Technology had a meeting last week with the same Canadian Advanced Technology Association. The members of that association expressed a number of concerns. They were not allowed to participate in the process of preparing guidelines which, up to now, seem to have been prepared by academics, auditors or accountants. There has been a lack of representation by people in the private sector who actually do research and development in the preparation of these guidelines.

In addition, the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Mackay) has refused to make draft guidelines public. This is very difficult to understand. The previous Liberal Government and the present Government have talked about improving the regulatory process for a number of years. In fact, I participated in a task force on regulatory reform several years ago.

One of the cardinal rules of effective consultation is to publish draft guidelines to give those affected by these regulations the opportunity to comment on them and ensure that they are appropriate to the every day reality of the private sector. It is difficult to understand why the Minister has refused to make these guidelines public when we have been talking about the definition of research and development for the past three years.

The only justification given for not publishing these guidelines is the necessity to adopt them quickly. However, I suggest it would be foolhardy to adopt the guidelines at this point if they do not meet the needs of the private sector. Therefore, I urge the former Minister for Science and Technology, the present Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, to speak to his colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, and suggest that these guidelines be published to meet the very minimal request of the members of the Canadian Advanced Technology Association.

Another concern is that the abuses of the scientific research tax credit will result in the Government and Revenue Canada officials going overboard and making it very difficult for small business research and development performers. I also understand that Revenue Canada is planning to audit 100 per cent of claims for the refundable investment tax credit before these tax credits are issued. We were told in the committee last week that this could lead to delays in small companies obtaining tax credits which they desperately need to stay alive and that this over-zealousness could lead to several companies going into bankruptcy.

In conclusion, we support this technical amendment which will allow Revenue Canada to exceed the 120 day limit in collecting tax at an early stage from people who owe tax under Part VIII. However, I want to re-emphasize that the whole question of a flow-through mechanism for funding research and development has not been satisfactorily answered by the Government. On the other hand, there is a concern that the abuses of the SRTC will result in greater hardship in the application of other programs for small businesses which conduct research and development.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, May 21, consideration of the motion of Mrs. McDougall that Bill C-109, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I take this opportunity to say a few words about the great Liberal research scam. In January, 1984 the then Liberal Government made amendments to the Income Tax Act, providing a scientific research and development tax credit program. The program was introduced to make tax incentives of more immediate value to companies performing research and development and to facilitate the financing of research and development. The program was specifically designed in such a way that investors were able to realize quick no risk profits by a procedure known as the "quick flip". This caused a significant overrun in the cost of the program.

I agree the Bill needs to be put in place and it should be supported, and that it should not take too long to pass through the House, but we need to have learned a lesson from the program. This scientific research tax credit program is only part of a $30 billion to $50 billion tax expenditure system being delivered through the tax system. The program is an example of the problems of tax expenditure in general.

The Auditor General in his statement to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts on May 30 suggested that this program was something the Government should be looking at and that there was a great possibility for misuse of taxpayers' money by the particular process of tax expenditures. It is the method by which the corporations in most cases, individuals in some cases, are given tax relief. This is money which is not collected by the Department of National Revenue but left with the taxpayer without a great deal of accountability.

• (1110)

Under these programs you get relief from taxes and can spend money which you never have to account for. This is another way of passing out funds to corporations. Normally if an individual or organiztion receives funds from the Government they are expected to account for how those funds are spent. If they are spent incorrectly, they would be asked to make restitution for the expenditures. Under the tax expenditure program, that is not necessary. When you get a grant from the Government through a tax credit there is no way the Government can check on how that money is expended. In fact, the Income Tax Act protects the spender from being publicly investigated.

In his 1984 report the Auditor General pointed out that the scientific research tax credit program had been implemented without adequate safeguards over public money. I will spend a few minutes explaining the history of this.

In April of 1983 the Hon. Marc Lalonde, then the Minister of Finance, indicated that the cost of this program would be approximately $100 million in the first year and probably an equal amount in the second year. That was to be an expenditure through foregone taxes rather than actual grants paid by the Government. That is what makes this particular type of expenditure so insidious. It does not appear as an item in the Estimates. It does not appear as an expenditure of the Government. It is foregone income which the people of Canada are passing out to corporations and individuals which take advantage of it.

We have been told that foregone taxes to date amount to $2.8 billion. The $100 million program which the Minister of Finance announced in 1983 is already up to $2.8 billion. In addition, there is the cost of administering the program. The Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall) told the Public Accounts Committee recently that the cost of administering, investigating, and taking the necessary actions to collect some of the $2.8 billion would be at least an additional $12 million.

There are some very interesting facts with regard to this particular grant. For example, 1,810 corporations filed designations for these tax credits. Of these, 1,204 were involved in the "quick flip", a procedure by which they could get the money very quickly without actually expending any funds for research. Those corporations "flipped" more than $5.6 billion. In the process of this "flip" they pocketed $2.2 billion. In other words, of that $2.8 billion of funds foregone by the people of Canada, $2.2 billion was retained by the corporations which had committed themselves to do research. That left a shortfall of $3.4 billion. In other words, the commitment to do $5.6 billion worth of research was entirely lost because $2.2 billion went into pockets and there was a shortage of $3.4 billion which had been committed to do research. A good portion of those corporations took the money and left the country. They sold their commitment to do research and left the country.

I can give you examples of things which have happened. Many Members may have seen The Fifth Estate last week. It was about a corporation called Canada's Tomorrow which established itself to do some research. It collected $25 million from the Government to do research in oceanography in Chile. There are now 67 students stranded in Chile because the money is gone and the Chilean Government will not allow them to go home until the costs they incurred there have been paid.

There is also a local research program which is causing a considerable amount of controversy. This is the so-called Dreamstreet program which is supposed to research the difference in productivity between red and white holsteins and black and white holsteins. The provincial Ministry of Agriculture in Ontario and the federal Ministry of Agriculture have indicated that this is absolutely useless research, but it got money through this program.

It seems incredible that any government could be so inept as to allow this kind of legal scam to be perpetrated on the people of Canada. There was no suggestion of the type of research to be done under this three-year program. Although the program was cut off last year, it is still costing us money. There is nothing in place to monitor the quality of the research to be done. The Dreamstreet program and the Canada's Tomorrow program are two examples which are producing nothing.

This also brings into focus the need for information to be given to the Cabinet for it to make its decision. Information should be available to the people of Canada and the Members of this House. In that way, when a decision is made to establish this kind of program, we can question the decision-making.

• (1120)

I questioned the quality of the advice given to the Hon. Marc Lalonde when he made the decision to put this program in place. People should have questioned that and the extent to which the effects of this program had been researched. Someone should have questioned how a so-called $100 million program suddenly costs $2.6 billion. Someone should have questioned how people who took part in this program could make money without any effort at all. The quick flip allowed at least 5 per cent of the money supposed to be used for research to be pocketed by someone who had no intention of doing any research in the first place. If it increased the amount of research done across Canada there might be some justification. However, StatsCan informs us that the amount of research done in Canada over the three years covered by this particular scam did not increase to any justifiable extent.

This program has cost the taxpayers of Canada $2.6 billion plus. It will probably be closer to $3 billion by the time we are through. The present Government, of course, took fairly quick action to eliminate the program but it was also grandfathered so that anyone who had established a program could continue. Neither was a monitoring system put in place which would allow the Government to stop the program if necessary.

It is good that we are finally doing something that will allow the Government to recover some of the money that has been fraudently taken from the pockets of Canadian taxpayers. At present there are some 55 projects under investigation for fraud. Only 172 audits have been completed so we have a very limited understanding of the size of the program and how badly it has been used. We have taken just a small look at it. The approved value of research is over $7 billion and the value of the quick flips was $5.6 billion. That left a real shortage in the amount available to be spent on research.

I can only suggest from that, that when this type of program is established, the information put before Parliament should be adequate for us to judge properly. Obviously we cannot trust the quality of the advice given to the Minister. Therefore, someone or something else should have a look at it, and that should be the House of Commons. We should take a good look at the whole process involving tax credits.

The Auditor General has estimated tax expenditures at somewhere between $30 billion and $50 billion. That is money delivered to corporations and individuals in the form of tax credits. It is not $32 billion or $36 billion, but somewhere between $30 billion and $50 billion. That is a broad gap. It shows the inability of the Government to determine exactly how much is being delivered in the form of tax credits. As the Auditor General has suggested, we should put in place a system of reporting the tax credits being collected by people, not only in this research and development scam but in all other areas as well.

This Government has spent a lot of time, as have other Conservative Governments across the country, talking about the amount of welfare given to people out of work. They have talked about how unemployment insurance should be cut back because people will then try harder to find jobs. However, there is another kind of welfare, corporate welfare. Corporations get taxpayers' money and do not have to account for it. We do not even know if they need it. They get money through the system without having to convince anyone that they need it.

We need to look at the whole structure of tax expenditures through these credits. We need to put in place an evaluation system. During his appearance before the Standing Committee on Public Accounts the Deputy Minister of Finance, Mr. Cohen at the time, suggested they had no real system in place which evaluated the effect of tax credits. He also admitted that they had no real evaluation of the amount of research this particular program was going to provide. In fact, the Government, before it put this program in place, did not have any indication of how effective it was going to be.

As I said before, the program was announced in April of 1983 and passed in January of 1984. However, in the fall of 1983 the accounting profession had already recognized this was going to be a scam and were publishing information on how to take advantage of it. This was already common knowledge across Canada in October and November of 1983, a couple of months before the Bill was passed. When that was brought to the attention of the Hon. Marc Lalonde, he decided to go ahead with it anyway and it was passed in January of 1984.

We support this Bill, Mr. Speaker. It needs to be put in place. However, we hope the Government recognizes the lessons learned here which have cost us something over $2.6 billion with very little return. We hope the Government has some understanding of how the taxpayers of Canada were ripped off by a procedure which was not researched well enough. The Government did not know what the effects were going to be and was unable to stop the ripoff even after they recognized it. I hope the particular subject of this Bill will bring to Canada a better financial structure for these kinds of taxations in the future.

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in this debate, because when the Bill in question was amended by Mr. Lalonde, I was the Minister responsible for Science and Technology.

[English]

I have a rather special interest in this Bill. I would caution my friends on all sides of the House in their use of hindsight in terms of criticizing and attacking the provision as it was introduced in 1983.

We all know that the Income Tax Act suffers from a number of serious weaknesses, complexity and inequity. I had hoped that during our period in government we might have made more progress in bringing some coherence to this tax system in this country, but, caught up as we were with the worst recession since the 1930s, inflation, high interest rates, constitutional debate, the Government can only take on so many major issues in the course of its mandate.

We attempted in a number of areas to improve the tax system, but did not have the opportunity of coming to grips with the tax system as a whole. Hence, efforts were made in specific discreet areas, such as scientific research and development, to meet the needs, the challenges of particular sectors.

Now we have a Government with 211 seats that is engaged in tinkering with the system, that has done very little, in fact nothing to improve the system, which has added complexity, and added inequity. I need only refer to the $500,000 lifetime capital gains exemption. I am reminded, when I look at this Government, of the statement of some wag, "You know, if Thomas Paine thought taxation without representation was bad he should see it with representation", because that is what we have today. We have over representation and the tax system continues to deteriorate. The great tinkerer, as he is becoming known, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) has not helped.

All that being said let us put partisanship aside for a moment and look at Bill C-109 and the background of this provision. The ingredients of economic growth have changed dramatically over the last century. When some of us were young, I suppose even before most of us were young, growth in an agricultural economy—and I grew up on a farm, Mr. Speaker, as perhaps you did—was brought about by the marriage of those three classical elements, land, labour and capital. As we moved into the industrial age the accent moved more to technology and to resources. Labour became as significant, and capital became particularly significant during the smokestack industrial generation of industries.

Now we have moved into the so-called post-industrial period. The accent is on knowledge-based industries. Growth is brought about by the marriage, primarily of capital and technology. Labour has assumed a lesser role. Land and resources, of course, have also assumed lesser roles. Witness the remarkable growth of Japan after World War II, a country effectively without a natural resource base, but money was placed in developing intellectual capital, developing technology and in applying technology. Most of it, in fact, in the case of Japan was foreign technology.

The Government in the early period of the 1980s, as I mentioned earlier, was fighting on many fronts, wrestling with the worst recession since the 1930s. As we began to emerge from that recession there was a recognition that to spur the growth, to build on the economic recovery it would be necessary to take certain steps to, if you like, have an accelerated recovery, to absorb those jobs that had been lost during the recession. That meant, and in recognition of the evolution that I referred to, the accent had to be on technology, and to ride the great wave of the technological revolution that was sweeping through our society.

Mr. Lalonde, in 1983, in consultation with the business community of the day determined that it was important to facilitate that marriage between entrepreneurs, who are the catalysts between technology and capital.

We hear much about the fact that there is a lot of capital available, and that Canadian savings were running at the time around 12 or 13 per cent. The high interest rates, of course, had driven people largely into debt instruments, as you will recall. Of course, while those savings were high and remained high, in this country, unfortunately, they are largely institutionalized, Registered Retirement Savings Plans, for one, in pension plans and so on.

Where does the entrepreneur, that great catalyst that brings about the marriage, if you like, between capital and technology find the mate. If the technology is there and more research and development is required to build on that technology, or to create technology, where does he find the mate in that marriage, namely, the capital? It was that challenge that Mr. Lalonde faced in 1983, and that is why the scientific research tax credit was introduced. It was to allow individuals and investors to go out to the community at large and attract capital for the purposes of research and development in this country by permitting a flow-through of credits to those individual investors.

Now, we have heard of abuses and, indeed, I would be the first to condemn those abuses. Perhaps the program had not been adequately developed by officials. In fact, again with the benefit of hindsight, it seems clear that it was not. There were benefits derived from that program. We have testimony to that effect. I understand that the Canadian Advanced Technology Association made a pre-budget submission to the Minister of Finance in December of 1985 and stated the following:

—it is clear, therefore, that markets are responsive to government incentives to encourage risk taking.

This can be illustrated by reference to the SRTC program. While this program was seriously abused, and we are not in any way trying to defend those abuses, the ability to flow-through R and D tax benefits to individual investors did result in considerable scientific research spending in Canada that would otherwise not have taken place. The same association recommended that some flowthrough mechanism be developed in order to encourage such research and development, of course in the absence of the abuses to which I have made reference.

[Translation]

I may add, Mr. Speaker, that at the time, the Conservatives supported this policy and the amendment proposed by Mr. Lalonde. And as I said before, it is easy to criticize with the benefit of hindsight. Nevertheless, the association acknowledged this measure had a beneficial impact, and now we have eliminated the abuses, and we have also eliminated the beneficial impact. We must find other ways to stimulate research and development in this sector.

• (1140)

[English]

I suppose the comment I have made invite the question, where do we go from here? I ask my colleagues on the Conservative benches how we solve the problem of the basement entrepreneur who finds technology, must conduct further research and development but has no capital? Where will we find the risk takers and what incentives will be offered to them? I am talking about companies in their embryonic stage which have the potential of becoming a Mitel or a Gandolf. What kind of mechanisms do our friends on the Government benches suggest would be appropriate to supply capital to those companies? Of course, Members who live in the Ottawa region are especially familiar with the successes that have been brought about by operations which began in a garage or a basement.

I talk about these garage and basement operations to underline the fact that there may not be any one approach to this problem. The capital needs of corporations, businesses and individuals who are involved in research and development vary to a great extent.

The Government must address the issue of grants versus tax credits. For years, arguments have been made that tax credits are more beneficial because they give more play to market forces and enable businesses and entrepreneurs to make their own decisions. It is also argued that tax credits do not discriminate among recipients of the taxpayers' largess, if you like, as do grants if they are delivered in a discretionary fashion.

All of those are legitimate arguments, but it seems to me that the Government must bring forward some rational approach to solve the problems of those research and development enterprises that begin in the garage or basement and move on to become slightly larger firms that can attract money from individual professionals, co-workers or other small entrepreneurs or adventure capital firms. This rational approach is needed to allow those firms to move on to become threshold-sized firms, as they are sometimes called, with established management procedures and relatively good financial connections but which are not yet in the position to tap major Canadian capital markets in the intermediate stage or, as in the case of Northern Telecom, tap world-wide markets.

There are risks in this whole area of research and development. How do those investors hedge against those risks and what kind of incentives should those investors receive? At the same time, how do we eliminate the abuses of the kind we have witnessed in the case of the scientific research tax credit? Those are the challenges facing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson). We on our side of the House will be bringing forward ideas and suggestions both here and in committee as to how these objectives may be accomplished.

Make no mistake, the future of this country lies very much in the marriage of technology and capital. The Government has brought forward some provisions to monitor this process and some provisions to stop it, in the case of the SRTC, but it has yet to bring forward anything to facilitate that marriage. It has not yet shown us how it will play the role of matchmaker in this very important relationship.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, in the more than 20 years I have been here there has not been one year in which the Government of the day has not set forth in its Budget plans the notion that providing another tax break, another concession or another loophole to the private sector will somehow persuade it to put more effort into research and development. Yet, in 1986, we still have the second worst record of any country in the OECD in terms of percentage of our Gross National Product being devoted to scientific research and development.

I have several questions for the Hon. Member for Saint-Henri—Westmount (Mr. Johnston). Mr. Lalonde, who brought this proposal forward, was supposedly one of the best Finance Ministers we ever had and the Deputy Minister, Mr. Mickey Cohen, rated on a par with our "great" free trade negotiator, Mr. Reisman. When this proposal was brought forward by the Hon. Member's Government in Mr. Lalonde's Budget, they told the people of Canada and Parliament that we would lose $100 million in revenue a year for three years. However, now we are told that it will cost the taxpayers of this country $2.6 billion. Will the Hon. Member explain to the House how the Department headed by Mr. Lalonde and Mr. Cohen could have been so wrong?

Second, why were the tax lawyers and tax accountants of this country able to find so quickly holes in the tax system that were so wide one could drive a tank through them? They were able to advise their clients—those who had money—how to use this tax loophole to save that huge amount of $2.6 billion. Furthermore, not only did they save that money,in the process very little of that $2.6 billion really went to scientific research and development. Surely the Hon. Member's Government and the Department of Finance should have been able to find a system that would ensure that if people received tax advantages by putting money into such a project the money actually went into scientific research and development rather than into their own pockets.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the intervention by my hon. friend, the Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). I do not think I detected tongue in cheek when he referred to the qualities of Mr. Lalonde as Minister of Finance, or the quality of Mr. Reisman, interestingly enough. The Hon. Member asked why the estimate was so wrong.

Mr. Blaikie: It is a good question.

Mr. Johnston: It is a very good question and I think we should get to the root of it. Why has the Deparment of Finance and the Econometric projections been so wrong in many instances? Why have we worked on misinformation in many instances? I can assure my hon. friend that Mr. Lalonde was not in a position as Minister of Finance, to sharpen his pencil and go through the Income Tax Act and all the related provisions of other laws related to it to determine what kind of abuses might take place. That is the job of officials. That job requires analysis. With the benefit of hindsight, it is perfectly clear that the projected revenue losses were wrong by a degree which is staggering to behold. I accept that and I am sorry about it.

• (1150)

With respect to why tax practitioners and others find these tax loopholes so quickly, it is an unfortunate consequence of our tax system that we have effectively given birth to a generation—succeeding generations, if you like—of experts who spend their time saving money through the arrangement and rearrangement of assets and taking advantage or provisions of the Income Tax Act. That is totally unproductive time.

Mr. Orlikow: Maybe we should hire some of them.

Mr. Johnston: We have hired some of them. That goes to the point I raised during my comments. Our tax system has to be simplified, rendered less complex and equitable. Until that happens we are going to continue to see the kind of unproductive activity which is brought about by these people, who I do not criticize. I was one myself for many years. It just seems to me when we look at the record of Japan in terms of the ratio of lawyers to engineers and scientists as compared to U.S. and Canada ratios, something is seriously wrong. I accept that as well. Why these people find the tax loopholes so quickly is because they are competent and they get at it immediately. Their job is to basically advise their clients as best they can and devise techniques to take advantage of the provisions of the law, which is a legitimate tax avoidance.

I do think the Hon. Member has been somewhat unfair in his assessment of this situation. First, approximately two thirds of the funds invested, we understand, went to valid research. Second, I would point out to the Hon. Member that during our tenure we tried to move to a research and development figure of 1.5 per cent of GNP. We had moved from 1 per cent almost to 1.5 per cent when the Government changed. If we fall off now, please do not point your finger at Liberal Governments. We have a strong commitment to research and development in our Party—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry.

Mr. Johnston: Can I finish?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Go ahead and finish. You still have a couple of minutes.

Mr. Johnston: I would just like to make one last point, namely, that we stand on that record. There are a lot arguments we can get into here, such as, wouldn't it be great to be 3 per cent of GNP, but there is the issue of how it is spent. The quality of research and development spending is more important in many respects than the quantity. There is no point in throwing money at things. The issue that the funds, which the Hon. Member argued, have been squandered in fact demonstrates that point. To a degree they have been squandered. But a very substantial portion of the funds did find their way into important research.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the Hon. Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) still has a very short question and I am sure the Hon. Member for Saint-Henri—Westmount (Mr. Johnston) would like to rebut.

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, I would like the Hon. Member to justify the statement he just made, because in 1983, $4.8 billion was spent in research. In 1984, $5.5 billion was spent in research. That is an increase of $700 million. In 1985, $5.8 billion was spent in research, an increase of $.3 million over the year before. If we assume the research stayed the same, there was an increase of $1 billion in research over those two years. That cost the taxpayers $2.6 billion and a good portion of it went down the drain. The kind of research which was counted was of little value. I think the Hon. Member's suggestion that it increased the flow of money into research is for the birds.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member takes issue with the assocation which testified to the effect—

Mr. Orlikow: It has an interest in protecting itself and its members.

Mr. Johnston: The Canadian Advance Technology Association has numbers which say it was valuable. However, the Hon. Member just underlined the other point I made, on which I thought he was going to comment. In 1983 it was $4.8 billion. In 1984 the Government empowered, I think it was September 18, $5.5 billion, and then under a Conservative Government we moved from $5.5 billion to $5.8 billion in a period of strong economic growth. Measure that as a percentage of GNP, Mr. Speaker, and see where it gets you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the Hon. Member for Stormont—Dundas (Mr. Warner) had a short question.

Mr. Warner: Mr. Speaker, I have a very brief comment. The Hon. Member for Saint-Henri—Westmount (Mr. Johnston) is an acknowledged tax expert and I was surprised at his remarks with respect to the equity of the capital gains tax exemption. He knows this initiative is certainly one which is encouraging people to invest in high risk areas. He has identified scientific research as an area which does involve a higher degree of risk than most investments. I am also surprised that the Hon. Member would suggest that this has a certain amount of inequity when most of the capital gains over the last two or three years have been really inflation and very little has been real income. I would suggest that perhaps this initiative not only serves investment well in high risk areas but also provides a much higher degree of equity to our tax system.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the Hon. Member have a rebuttal?

Mr. Johnston: Just a comment, Mr. Speaker. I believe my friend is the victim of his own propaganda. He is an experienced businessman. He knows the capital gains tax exemption is applicable to assets sold anywhere in the world. It is completely unfocused. I know many people who have taken advantage of it. They have sold assets, they have gotten out of the market, and some have sold out of the Canadian market and moved into the United States market. What that does for Canadian research and devlopment is indeed a mystery to me.

I believe it is one of the silliest, most counter-productive measures, and it is complex as one can see from the new bulletins which have been introduced—which we said would be the case—to prevent abuses arising. There are things to do on the capital side, I acknowledge that, but this is certainly not the answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The period for questions and comments is now terminated.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Surely Bill C-109 stands as an indictment, first, against the former Liberal Government for the program it introduced, the sloppy way in which it was thought through and its inability to control and stop the hemorrhaging of public funds even though that became known before the act was actually proclaimed. It stands as well as an indictment against the present Government which sought to stem the hemorrhaging of funds shortly after it got elected when it introduced a moratorium on, I believe, October 10, 1984, and yet allowed a grandfathering clause where continuing cases of abuse occurred.

As well, Bill C-109 stands as an indictment against the "free enterprise" notions of this and the former Government. It is the notion that if we just shovel money to the private sector it will know what to do with it, will put it to good use and everyone will benefit. As well, it is an indictment against the Government's attempt to reform the tax regime in Revenue Canada.

What does Bill C-109 allow the Government to do? It allows the Government to perform assessments and collections immediately as they relate to deductions made under the scientific research tax credit scheme. The rights of those involved not to pay the taxes until their return is filed, and the right to have their cases heard are being removed. In other words, the whole question of the taxpayers' bill of rights is disappearing.

Bill C-109 is being introduced in order for the Government to have the full legislative authority to assess and collect immediately taxes owed from those who have made use of the scientific research tax credit program which is Part VIII of the Income Tax Act. The need for this was expressed in the Department's press release of March 26, 1986, which referred to two circumstances which have prompted this legislation.

The first circumstance concerns two Federal Court cases which have resulted in conflicting decisions. The first case involved Bechtold Resources which had objected to the ability of Revenue Canada to assess and collect some $16 million in Part VIII tax prior to the filing by the corporation of its tax return. The court found in favour of Bechtold. The second case involved Western Technologies Inc. On this occasion the Federal Court found that the Department of Revenue was within its rights to both assess and collect Part VIII tax prior to the filing of a return. Both cases are currently under appeal.

The second reason cited in the March 26 press release was the evidence that individuals who controlled corporations utilizing the SRTC program were immigrating with those funds without paying the Part VIII tax owing. Once out of the country it is impossible for Revenue Canada to collect the taxes. In other words, Bill C-109 is an attempt by the Government to capture some of those revenues which have been lost because of this program. In the process of so doing it is certainly contradicting past-stated Government intentions to reform Revenue Canada and tax collection in Canada.

What is being set aside in Bill C-109 constitutes one of the basic principles which the Conservatives fought to have enshrined in legislation namely, the right of taxpayers prior to the payment of any taxes they may dispute to have access to a fair and impartial hearing and to the courts if necessary. The need to collect as much of the taxes owed from this program has become paramount to the rights those involved would normally enjoy under the Income Tax Act.

What we find here is that the Conservatives in their task force on Revenue Canada prior to the election demanded a different code of conduct. I would now like to quote from the Conservative's task force report which states in part:

> When an assessment is issued a taxpayer should not have to pay taxes which are in dispute until the time for a formal objection has passed. If the taxpayer appeals, no payment of those amounts should be required until the appeal is finally resolved.

The declaration of taxpayers' rights issued by the Government declares: "You are entitled to object to an assessment or re-assessment if you think the law has been applied incorrectly." It goes on to state that the individual has the right to withhold amounts disputed in formal objections until an impartial review by the Department or the courts has been completed.

Bill C-109 clearly violates the letter and spirit of these commitments and is therefore testament to Government inaction which extends back to the time the legislation proclaiming the SRTC program was put in place. The present Government certainly has nothing to be proud of with respect to cleaning up this program, and certainly not for this Bill.

I would now like to deal with some of the history of the Bill. It was introduced in the Lalonde Budget. It was meant as a quick fix in order to obtain an instant infusion of capital funds into research and development projects. In many ways the intent of the legislation is noteworthy. To attempt to encourage research and development through the taxation system certainly created some problems for smaller firms. To give special deductions and encouragement through the taxation system to those doing research and development only helped those corporations which had income on which to pay tax from which they could deduct these tax credits. Thus the Government of the day devised a scheme by which it could sell these tax credits so that small research and development companies could sell their losses to other companies and other business people, therefore gaining some revenue for themselves with which to finance part of their research efforts.

What the business community found was the attractiveness of the "quick flip". Perhaps the best description of how the "quick flip" works was given by the CBC's Fifth Estate on January 26, 1986 which provided the following description of the program:

> Let's pretend a scientist has a $100 project but no money. What he can get is a $50 tax credit from Ottawa just for his $100 idea. But our scientist doesn't have any money. So he goes to a rich guy, or a big company. The credit's worth $50 at Revenue Canada when it comes time to pay your tax. The scientist sells the credit for $40. So after the quick flip of the tax credits, the scientist does have $40 for his project—all Ottawa's. And the big guy has saved $10 or maybe $10 million on his taxes without any real investment in the project at all. With alchemy like that, who needs science.

Were the "quick flip" provisions foreseen? The Auditor General stated the following in answer to this question:

> —we were told by the Department of Finance that the 'quick flip' arrangement was clearly envisioned from the outset of the program to make the incentives of immediate benefit to firms.

This was later confirmed by Finance officials who appeared before the Public Accounts Committee. So there was an awareness that the "quick flip" would be in operation.

In fact, first reading of the Bill was given in December of 1983 with Royal Assent being given on January 19, 1984. As of December 31, 1983, the program had become so popular that $542.3 million in tax credits had been claimed even though the original intention of the program was a loss of some $100 million in tax revenues to the Government. By the end of 1983, before the Bill or this provision had received Royal Proclamation, $542.3 million in tax credits had already been claimed.

The concern about the excessive use of the program prompted the Department of National Revenue to issue a statement on January 30, 1984 which stated that along with the Department of Finance "monitoring of the effectiveness of these new SRTC provisions to ensure that the intent of the legislation would be achieved and there would be no abuses."

Yet when the issue was raised again in the House by my Leader on June 4, 1984 the program had now cost the taxpayers 10 times what had been estimated—$1 billion. The Minister of Finance at the time, Marc Lalonde, interpretted this financial loss to the taxpayers as an indication that R and D was being heavily financed. Even at this point there was no way of telling if any R and D was being done.

The next day, June 5, the Department of National Revenue issued yet another press statement indicating that it was going to "establish an appropriate monitoring system". In other words, on January 13, 1984 the Departments of Finance and Revenue had stated that they would begin monitoring the program. We found out on June 5 that they did not even set up a monitoring program.

This brings us to October 10, 1984 the old Government having been defeated and the new one put in place. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) rose in the House of Commons and introduced a moratorium on the "quick flip" provisions of the program. However, much to the objection of members of my Party he allowed and provided for a convenient loophole; that is, a grandfathering clause for those still interested in the "quick flip". The press statement at the time had this to say:

• (1210)

In order to ensure a fair transition, agreements in writing entered into on or before October 10 or arrangements evidenced in writing and substantially advanced before that date would be allowed to proceed.

In other words, agreements in writing on backs of envelopes would qualify under these terms.

Later on the Calgary Herald of October 29, 1985 reported the following:

As a result (of the moratorium) accountants, lawyers and freelance money men worked through the night to substantially progress or work up agreements on millions of dollars worth of issues on the East Coast—where midnight strikes earliest—and working west.

The lack of meaning of the moratorium imposed by the Government on October 10 becomes evident when one examines how many SRTC designations were approved and to whom they were given after the October 10, 1984 moratorium. Before the moratorium, some $4 billion in transactions had been approved. After October 10 an additional $3 billion received approval. Of these, $1.8 billion worth was submitted to Revenue Canada by various corporations to ensure that they met the grandfathering provision of the moratorium. The remaining $1.2 billion were ultimately approved without having been submitted for security.

Even after the program was terminated on May 23, 1985, $600 million of the $3 billion in designations were approved. In other words, after the moratorium of October 10, 1984, $3 billion in transactions were still being approved. The Government claimed that it plugged up the loophole but it plugged it up with a sieve. It still allowed some $3 billion in designations to be approved.

The level of losses compared to recoveries is indeed quite staggering. Of the 1,810 corporations filing 8,872 designation applications, the total taxes foregone are estimated at $2.8 billion to $3 billion. Of the 1,810 corporations filing for SRTC designations, 1,204 were involved in the "quick flips". Only 75 corporations have voluntarily paid their Part VIII taxes, amounting to only $63 million. Another 35 corporations have had taxes collected as the result of legal action, amounting to some $55 million. Another 15 corporations have provided security voluntarily, amounting to $76 million. Fourteen corporations have had their assets attached, amounting to $34 million. The total Part VIII taxes recovered or secured amounts to $228 million.

The Department of National Revenue now estimates that the $900 million owed by 313 corporations will likely have to be written off as being uncollectable. Of the 172 corporations already audited, 55 have been referred to the Department of National Revenue's special investigation unit. Within that group of 55, there is about $500 million worth of tax at risk, included in the uncollectable estimate of $900 million. This is according to the Public Accounts of March 11, 1986.

Which corporations took advantage of the SRTCs and the "quick flips"? Dreamstreet Holsteins of the U.S. received some $10 million in tax credits to compare red and white and black and white Holsteins. The Government gave that company $10 million in tax credits to compare red and white and black and white Holsteins. That is a great piece of research that certainly deserves some $10 million in tax credits.

International Electronics received tax credits of some $34 million for energy projects. Funds were spent on real estate and on a $2-million mansion. Apparently Imperial Oil thought it had a pretty good project going because it made a fast $2 million profit from the quick flipping of the money. In fact, Imperial Oil flipped about $400 million, thus helping the corporation reduce its own taxes.

Fitch Research Corporation received $5 million in tax credits for computer chip development. In fact, real estate was purchased and the company president is now a promoter in Hong Kong. Bechtold Industries received $16 million in tax credits. It made massive real estate purchases with that money. Inex Technologies Inc. received $32.5 million in tax credits and bought condominiums and a $55,000 Lotus sports car along with other real estate purchases.

DWS Naval Research & Design received $2.7 million. I raised this matter earlier in the House of Commons. This corporation was supposed to be making miniature submarines. In fact, it was demonstrated that the chief promoters of that program were drug smugglers and gun-runners and in no way were they capable of producting miniature submarines. Yet DWS Naval Research & Design got its SRTC approval after the moratorium of October 10, 1984. In other words, it was the Conservative Government that thought this company was okay and should get those tax credits to develop miniature submarines. Those are the horror stories. These horror stories were initiated by the Liberals and fumbled by the Conservatives.

Finally today we are being asked to approve a Bill that breaks the Government's own commitment to tax reform and a taxpayers' bill of rights. Now, after the horse has left the barn, the Government is very anxious to get back as much of the money lost to begin with as possible. The Department of National Revenue will now be allocating some $12 million to audit and collect the taxes owing from the SRTC program. By next year, some 115 person-years will be dedicated to achieving this end. This allocation does not include the additional costs resulting from eventual court challenges which will not be resolved for up to four years.

There have been some pretty brazen acts on the part of Revenue Canada. Earlier this year I raised in the House the case of Vancouver revenue collections officers seizing the very bed of a woman who was recovering from surgery. I understand that the bed has now been returned to that woman. So desperate is Revenue Canada that its officials went to the house of a woman who was in bed recovering from major surgery, propped this woman up in a chair against the wall and took the bed away. That is how desperate the Government is now to collect back on what it lost on the SRTCs.

It is with great regret that we will support this motion. We know that there has to be some damage control. The amount of revenue being lost is just staggering. Unfortunately, what is being lost as well is the whole principle of the taxpayers' bill of rights.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to inform the Hon. Member that his time has expired. Questions or comments.

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask my learned colleague, the Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong), to outline for us the way in which the Government has breached its taxpayers' bill of rights in the case of the scientific research tax credits.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, very simply, the essential notion of the taxpayers' bill of rights is that a taxpayer is innocent until proven guilty. In other words, if the Department reassesses the taxpayer, he does not have to pay that reassessment if he is going to appeal it. He will go through the due process until a final decision is made. Of course, Bill C-109 does not provide for that.

Bill C-109 assumes that the taxpayer is guilty until proven innocent. Bill C-109 will have Revenue Canada do the assessment and collection of taxes before the company files its income tax return. It is in fact the very opposite of what the Government had proposed in its taxpayers' bill of rights. It is the opposite of what the Progressive Conservative Party had promised during the election campaign and had outlined in its tax report prepared after Conservative Members went all across the country investigating abuses by Revenue Canada. It goes against everything the Progressive Conservative Party had claimed it stood for before the election and when it was involved in the task force on Revenue Canada. Now we see the heavy hand of Revenue Canada under a Conservative Government throwing taxpayers out of their beds in order to claim those beds. This is as bad as anything the Liberals did in their day.

While I have the opportunity, and I know it is not directly connected to my colleague's question, but I wanted to put on record the comment of the Minister of Finance in response to a question by me in the Finance Committee on April 22, 1986. Remember, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of Finance and the Government are great champions of the free enterprise system. What an indictment in the sadness of the Minister's tone and voice when he told me:

> I see this whole SRTC episode, particularly after we made the change, as an area where the private sector was its own worst enemy—we tried to make the amendment on the basis that only permanent capital would come into the company—the private sector then proceeded to do things under the guise of it being permanent capital, but in essence a quick flip.

The Minister was really disappointed in the workings of capitalism. He was surprised and hurt that people interested in profit would go out and try to maximize their profits. What a discovery that must have been for the Minister of Finance. In the lessons that we learned from the SRTC, and there are many, I hope that the Minister of Finance has a little less naivety about the workings of the market-place and that the golden rule of maximization of profit still exists, regardless of the Government's best intentions.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard—Anjou): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to comment on Bill C-109. First of all, I do not intend to talk about the Bill as such and about the Scientific Research Tax Credit, since my hon. colleague from Saint-Henri—Westmount (Mr. Johnston) has already covered the ground very well. I would like to start by expressing my apprehension about the impact this Bill will have on the tax system in this country. Now, in order to grasp what the ultimate impact of this Bill will be, we must realize that the Canadian tax system is based on the voluntary filing of returns by each taxpayer, and once the returns are filed, the Department of National Revenue issues an assessment, and it may then claim amounts payable or amend the return, while the taxpayer is entitled to appeal procedures at various stages.

Last year, the newly elected Conservative Government—after all its rhetoric, and I think many Canadians still remember the Conservative Party's task force on the tax system and how to collect our taxes—the new Government announced the declaration of taxpayers' rights. At the time, that was a step ahead, involving voluntary returns with assessments, notices of appeal, and so forth. According to the declaration of taxpayers' rights, a taxpayer is innocent until proven guilty. So he could appeal the department's notice of assessment without paying the amount assessed, while previously, the taxpayer had to at least make arrangements for paying the amount or actually pay the full amount, and of course if the taxpayer won his appeal, the department had to refund the amount, with interest.

Mr. Speaker, there is not necessarily unanimous support for the new charter of taxpayers' rights. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, that hardly a year ago, the Conservative Government, claiming that it was faced with this situation—I know there have been a number of problems as a result of this program, there has been some serious abuse, but the Conservative Government is totally ignoring, not just taxpayers' rights but it is going even further, because now it can claim amounts payable and seize assets even before the taxpayer has filed his return. And that is what we must watch out for, Mr. Speaker. We are about to introduce new provisions in our tax system which, through Bill C-109, at least once the Bill is enacted, will give the Government, the Department of National Revenue, the authority to collect taxes and even to seize assets before the taxpayer has filed his return. That is the problem.

Of course during the election campaign, the same party that has now formed the Government made it quite clear. It promised that a taxpayer would always be innocent until proven guilty. And to keep that promise, it announced and proposed and put into effect a charter of taxpayers' rights, and now, a year later, it has decided to go in the exact opposite direction and has taken a very extreme position, Mr. Speaker, and now we have a situation where the Government, the Department of National Revenue, will actually be able to demand that taxpayers pay these amounts and do so even before they have had a chance to file their returns. So there is an immediate presumption of guilt, and the case is closed. Mr. Speaker, the situation is the exact opposite of what it should have been according to the charter of taxpayers' rights.

Mr. Speaker, as a result of abuses in the case of this particular program, the people at National Revenue have taken a position which I consider to be absurd. Under Canadian legislation and in keeping with our customs and traditions, one is always presumed innocent until proven guilty. True enough this program was seriously abused but now all businessmen, corporations and individuals that have filed applications under the scientific research tax credit program are automatically deemed to be guilty. Mr. Speaker, I think this is a regressive step. Until now every individual case has stood on its own merits. Each case was just that, one case, but now they are going to be lumped together by sector. That is bound to create problems because good and bad apples alike will be thrown into the same basket. That is a warning I would like to sound, Mr. Speaker, and I hope that once this Bill becomes law—unfortunately, we must support it because there have been abuses—the Government will not blindly wield the axe and will continue to examine each individual case.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the case of a Canadian taxpayer whom I would rather not identify because his family has already had to put up with enough prejudice. I simply read one paragraph from his letter dated April 9, 1986:

[English]

I am forwarding information concerning SRTC and as well as conduct of the Department of the Revenue Canada.

It is my intention to pursue both issues to the end. There is no doubt that I have been done wrong and my family has suffered a great deal as a result of the actions of National Revenue. The conduct and personal behaviour of some of the agents of this Department have been abusive and intimidating.

I would also like to report the abuses in the SRTC and the fraud committed by the accountant who put together my contract.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Saint-Henri—Westmount did point out that such was the very commendable purpose of this program. But as it turned out a few unscrupulous professionals who had immediately spotted the loophole advised a number of people to take advantage of the system, to the extent that we are now grappling with a thorny issue and being forced to amend the Income Tax Act, change our traditional and time-honoured Canadian approach whereby everybody is innocent until proven guilty.

Mr. Speaker, those unscrupulous professionals ended up making more money than the corporations or businessmen that simply wanted to benefit from the program.

And now those professionals are getting away scot-free, not even subject to a department audit. Yet there are people like this man who just wrote a letter to tell me he lost his house and everything he owned, his family is in the street because Revenue Canada officials simply assumed that all cases are identical. The moment a company or individual applied under this program, it, he or she was deemed to be guilty.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prolong the debate, for I know the Government wants this Bill passed as soon as possible. But I also know that abuses by certain individuals have created emergency situations, so I hope that once the Government is empowered to act under this legislation it will review each case with understanding and compassion.

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, in addressing ourselves to Bill C-109 today we are esentially participating in the final burial of one of the worst boondoggles which Canada's income tax system has ever seen. I dare say that if we set aside those which are openly and intentionally instituted and which function in a simple and understandable fashion, even though it might be unfair, this probably is the worst boondoggle that the Canadian income tax system has ever faced.

It might be out of order for me to comment, but I find it interesting that we are discussing this measure in the entire absence of any representation from the Liberal Party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is improper.

Mr. Parry: Oh, it is. Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I think that is entirely appropriate under these circumstances. The Liberals would have done well had they deliberately absented themselves entirely. Frankly, they should collectively and individually blush with embarrassment at what their measures inflicted on the country and the mischief that was done to Canada's tax system, the compromising of what remnants of integrity that tax system still possessed. Frankly, the institution of this type of system could only be described as rewarding misbehaviour and providing quite modest rewards for correct behaviour.

I think it is a sad comment on what sometimes happens in this country when we see misbehaviour and error so richly rewarded. After all, where today is the Prime Minister under whose regime this boondoggle was introduced? Where today is the Minister of Finance who introduced it? They are both comfortably and happily practising law in Montreal at elevated salaries which we can only suppose are even higher than those they received as Ministers. Meanwhile, the Canadian taxpayer is bearing the brunt of the billions of dollars of foregone taxes which their miscalculations have added to the country's national debt.

I think it is passing shameful that we do not have in front of the bar of this House the real culprits in this measure to examine on what they inflicted upon the Canadian public.

Instead, we now have a former Deputy Minister of Finance in charge of free trade talks, for those who believe that free trade is anything different than a free lunch. He is being paid $1,000 a day. Let us just hope that that unit, with its incredible expense, luxurious office space, chauffeurs and cars, comes up with something better than a vast give-away of the Canadian economy, as was the scientific research tax credit a give-away from the exchequer.

The Government has had the sense to move to eliminate the Scientific Research Tax Credit and the widespread abuse of it by killing off the entire program. The way in which the Government moved was unfortunate and certainly less drastic than we in the New Democratic Party would like to have seen. Bringing in a Bill which has as its basic premise the idea that those who have used the program cannot be trusted to stay in Canada with the funds is probabably sound under the circumstances, but I think it should give the Government cause to consider some of the fulsome rhetoric which the Government employs when addressing itself to innovation in the private sector. I hope it will serve notice on the Government that reasonable care must be exercised and that the private sector, while it is of course the engine of the economy, and while the small business sector is the major creator of jobs in this economy, is not something which we can put on a pedestal on the assumption that everyone operating therein, whether from inside or outside Canada, is functioning in a completely straightforward and honest fashion.

I guess that one of the reasons we have this measure is the conflicting judicial decisions in this matter, both of which are under appeal at the moment. I would like to pick up the question of the moratorium which preceded this legislation. Of course, the moratorium was very necessary. I would like to echo the comments and, indeed, the very trenchant and telling criticisms of my colleague, the Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong), who mentioned the way in which the so-called grandfathering provision was introduced. That, as we now know, set the stage for an incredible flurry of applications for the scientific research tax credit. It is very clearly arguable that because of the moratorium the purse of the taxpayers of Canada has been burdened with an even higher proportion of questionable, and some fraudulent, applications during the post-moratorium period than was the case even during the pre-moratorium period.

I have noticed that when a member of the Government is under attack during Question Period the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) is very quick to criticize the practice of pretrial hanging. This Bill, of course, does the same thing, although not in a context of which I would be outwardly critical because there is obviously a need for drastic action in this particular case.

I think one of the saddest, most reprehensible and most regrettable aspects of the scientific research tax credit was the "quick flip". Perhaps the worst of the many negative aspects of this practice of quick flipping was the fact that the Government had apparently foreseen the way in which the "quick flip" could be used to provide a quick profit.

I have a little chart which is very enlightening. It provides a telling indictment of the hell for leather sloppiness which the previous Liberal Government practised when it designed this program. According to this chart, and I am sure it is correct, the investment of that $1,000 produced an immediate $50 profit to the investor. As soon as it utilized the $500 tax credit the company ended up receiving $450 with which it was supposed to perform the $1,000 research. That, after all, is a subsidy rate of 45 per cent which is not at all unreasonable. However, there was so much chicanery and so many loopholes built in on top that many companies must have ended up with their research being subsidized on even more favourable terms. That is talking about only the companies which actually did the research. They really had a very good ride at the expense of the taxpayer.

• (1240)

Now we come to the "quick flips". I have a couple of quotations here which I think are exceedingly enlightening. This is the Deputy Minister of Finance in front of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts on May 30, 1985. He said:

> The basic concept of the SRTC program was that it would be "pre-funding" arrangement for R & D. "The policy judgment was—let us put that credit up front so if you went to the bank and borrowed 50 cents and asserted that you were going to do the R & D you would get 50 cents of tax credit and then you had $1 to go out and do the R & D."

He conceded that it was the pre-funding mechanism that really, in some sense, opened up the abuse. Well, it opened up the abuse on a scale totally unprecedented in the history of our country's tax system, on a scale which I think frankly scandalized every thinking Canadian, certainly those who follow the tax system, and called that system into disrepute.

I spoke earlier about the moratorium. I heard my colleague from Regina East mention some of the more fanciful examples of applications under the SRTC. What they really show, is that officials in Revenue Canada who were reviewing the applications really had no power to reject any scheme on the basis that it was illusory or simply a tax avoidance or tax elimination mechanism. They did not have any power to reject any scheme on the basis of it being fanciful, unscientific, duplicating previous research, or simply set up to syphon money out of the country. No, the certificates were docilely signed and we know the results.

I think the Dreamstreet Holstein project was mentioned, that being the comparison of milk production from red and white Holsteins with that of black and white Holsteins. That apparently was little more than an attempt by a fairly large U.S. corporation to penetrate the Canadian market. There might indeed be a difference in the milk productivity of those two kinds of animals, but that of course was not the objective of this particular SRTC boondoggle.

The U.S. Senate is a real, live, elected and democratic Senate, in marked contrast to the institution with which we are encumbered. There is a senator there who has something known as the "Golden Fleece Award". He makes the award to companies or individuals who produce mostly research proposals into things that he feels have very little need of research. While we should always be aware that today's conventional wisdom can be tomorrow's folly and that research done with very little apparent hope of learning anything useful does sometimes turn up something, in the manner of wildcatting for oil and random prospecting for gold, I think if we were to document all the schemes funded under the SRTC we would give that U.S. senator some very telling ammunition to use for weeks and months on end.

Given the Lotus sports car, the Mercedes Benz that were purchased, I think four or five by one company, the real estate that was purchased and the residences of the people who acquired these tax credits and cash bonuses, frankly I think I should contact the Government in order to obtain the film rights. It is too good a story. I hope the NFB will make it into a tragi-comedy, because that is what it is. It is a comedy of errors upon errors by the previous Liberal Government. The amount of money syphoned out of the Canadian Government, and therefore out of the pockets of Canadian taxpayers, by this tax credit scheme is a tragedy. None of us, certainly no Member of the two Parties represented in this House right at this moment, would want to forget this scheme. It is an object lesson on the way in which hastily drafted schemes designed to meet political rather than national policy goals can go astray and result in the people of Canada being held to ransom.

Since I am sitting down anyway, I say shame on that Liberal Government, shame on those Liberals who are not here at the moment. Shame on them. As the Hon. Member for Regina East said, we do not feel the Government handled the shutting down of this scheme properly but we are glad to see it nevertheless.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the comments by my colleague. I share many of the concerns he raised. Perhaps the hub of the problem here is that the SRTC really sort of exemplified the attempt to institute social and economic policy through the tax system. The Government of the day thought that research and development needed a sort of quick fix, an infusion of capital. It wanted to see private capital doing that. It realized that many of the smaller firms did not have great amounts of taxable income, so giving tax deductions to them did not mean very much. What they needed was new capital. The Government devised this scheme through the tax system so that small firms would be able to pick up, through these tax credits, some instant cash, so to speak.

The problem, perhaps, is one of inflexibility of income tax systems. When you implement social and economic policies through a tax system you are never quite certain that you are going to do what you intend to do. There are all sorts of improbables and unpredictables which come into play. Once you create a certain tax provision, anyone and everyone can apply. All at once you have tax experts and tax lawyers coming at it from all different directions and different companies trying to find ways to use a given new provision. No government bureaucracy can totally foresee all the possiblities once you introduce this kind of tax scheme.

It has been said that there are really only four people in Canada who understand the Income Tax Act. They are two tax lawyers in Toronto who find the loopholes, and they are most probably brothers or sisters to tax experts in the Department of Finance who are always trying to plug up those loopholes. It goes back and forth and we end up with a very complicated tax regime. Part of the problem is in using the tax system to help finance research and development, rather than giving direct grants to companies where it was appropriate, the way the National Research Council does, with a very successful program. In that way you can customize where your support is going to be. You can minimize the types of abuse.

This is the question I wish to address to my colleague. Are his comments and his thoughts in favour of using the tax system for social and economic policies, or policies like the SRTC for encouraging research and development, as opposed to a granting system.

Mr. Parry: Mr. Speaker, I am always tempted when I am addressing any income tax measure to get into the theoretical side of income tax and embark on an examination of the effects and also the principles which either do, or in many cases fail to underlie the measures that are being proposed.

I think what I would say to my colleague from Regine East regarding the applicability of the income tax system for the pursuit of social and economic goals is that in order for any income tax system to function effectively it has to function in a universal manner. It has to function in a manner that is perceived by the vast majority of taxpayers as being fair. It has to function in a manner which is understandable. When we have an income tax system we do need people to apply it, and we do, after all, need the understanding of the taxpayer of the way in which the income tax system functions in order to have some degree, I guess we could call it, of allegiance from the taxpayer to the tax system.

In many ways the Canadian income tax system is a good, such as the self-assessment principle, which is after all absent in many other countries, the manner in which allowances are granted to assist the individual in pursuing those goals, not only individual goals but also societal goals. For example the raising of children and the support of a spouse who is not employed outside the home for that reason are worthy goals and ones which are pursued by individuals, and are of course, endorsed by society. I think the key thing to remember is the way in which those goals and those measures can be related to very objective criteria.

For example, it is fairly easy to verify whether or not a particular taxpayer is supporting a spouse who is not gainfully employed outside the home, if that particular taxpayer is supporting children or donating to charities, which are goals approved by society.

Where the tax system starts to come apart is when there is no consensus within society, or even within the Government, as to the goals that are being pursued by the tax system. That is where the SRTC surely did come unstuck, because there was no consideration given, when this "quick flip" was introduced, to the degree of acceptance of the so-called research, even to the degree of acceptance within the scientific community of what might be legitimate research and what might not be legitimate research.

The results are obvious. We had a lot of research that really could not, by any stretch of the imagination, be dignified with the appellation of scientific research. It obviously was not, in small, if any tangential way, related to research or scientific research at all.

There are other examples of tax exemptions, tax loopholes in the system, which really are quite flagrant and notorious. A little while back I recall that my colleague from Kamloops—Shuswap (Mr. Riis) was reading portions of Canada's Income Tax Act in this House for the edification of Members, and to illustrate to them the convoluted language, and if I could use the term, gobbledegook, that Act is made up of in many particulars. I recall that by doing so my hon. colleague from Kamloops—Shuswap was driving the poor translators to tears because they did not have the French version in front of them, and it was, therefore, totally impossible for them to translate past the first clause because of the nested, convoluted and reversed nature of the phrases employed.

My colleague from Regina East was very generous in his assessment of how many people understand Canada's Income Tax Act. His estimate was four. I am not sure; but I think perhaps I should be calling upon him to justify why his estimate was that high. So far as I am concerned I could not say with any certainty that I could identify four people in Canada who fully understood the Income Tax Act. It is hard enough, after all, to master the basic principles upon which the Income Tax Act is predicated, and those principles which this scientific research tax credit—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the Hon. Member's time has expired. Questions and comments are now terminated. It is debate. The Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell).

Mr. Parry: No Liberals?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. There are other Members than those belonging to that Party in this House. The Hon. Member did the very same thing three times during his speech. He knows he should not comment on who is in the House and who is not in the House. I will leave it at that.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this Bill, and I have been so involved in social policy areas that I must confess that I have not really studied it. After hearing the debate this morning I must say that I think there is a very definite relationship between the very negative impacts of the scientific research tax credit, which costs Canadians so much money, and the fact that we have not had adeuate funding for social programs. In the few minutes that are left before lunch I would like to mention two or three things.

Many Members, and you, Mr. Speaker, will know that the child care task force, a special committee, has been travelling across Canada over the last few weeks, and we have several weeks to go. We have heard from hundreds and hundreds of witnesses. I think all of us, regardless of our political biases, have a very deep concern about what is happening to Canada's children. This is happening because our whole family structure has changed. The economy of Canada and the cost of living in many cases is forcing two parents to work. In many other cases there is only a single parent in the home. As a result of there not being adequate affordable child care for these families children are being left in very precarious situations, at considerable risk. I would not be exaggerating to say a very major proportion in the next generation could be damaged by very negative child care arrangements.

The reason I wanted to raise this is that, as I understand it, close to $3 billion have been literally wasted over the past two to three years through the SRTC under which a bonanza was given to entrepreneurs supposedly for research. There was no guarantee that research would be carried out or that this research would be of benefit to Canada. We want to put a stop to that kind of thing. Both the Liberals and Conservatives bear a responsibility for this extremely irresponsible kind of tax policy.

What I want to advocate though is that if we are going to save $3 billion by changing this policy, why could we not take this money and invest it in children, which is a true investment in the future and would begin to provide over the next ten years, the kind of viable child care system Canada needs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I call it one o'clock I would like the Hon. Member to know that she has 17 minutes remaining for debate, plus ten minutes questions and comments. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

LAKE HURON BOATING ACCIDENT—DISCONTINUANCE OF SEARCH

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, the Associate Minister of National Defence (Mr. Andre) is presently conducting an inquiry into the failure of the search and rescue operation to locate a Kitchener, Ontario couple, Arthur Simmons and Julie Schneider, after their boat capsized on Lake Huron last November.

This investigation will not deal with the real issue in this tragedy, which is the role of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Nielsen) and the judgment exercised by him. The Minister of National Defence remained passive, unbending, and unmoved in the face of pleas from the family, the Minister of State for Immigration (Mr. McLean), and other Conservative back-benchers that the search be continued. The search was reopened for a brief five hour period two days later and only after a Liberal Member of the Ontario Legislature joined in the outrage.

The judgment call made by the Minister of National Defence is the real issue here. I call upon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) to initiate a full and complete inquiry into the manner in which the Minister of National Defence handled or mishandled this entire and most unfortunate incident.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PROCESSING OF STATUS REINSTATEMENT APPLICATIONS

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, last night in committee the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Crombie) informed Canadians about the progress being made in processing reinstatement applications for those now eligible for Indian status under Bill C-31. If the Minister's figures are correct—and I assume they are—it will mean delays of between four and six years for those who have already applied for reinstatement. With current staffing levels, it means that the Department may even be falling behind further as new applications arrive.

Many native people have waited a long time for their rights to be recognized through Bill C-31 and they do not deserve to be kept in the dark for another half decade due to insufficient staffing in Ottawa. We do not expect pensioners, the disabled, the sick or unemployed in Canada to wait for four or five years for the Government to process forms, and Indian people do not deserve to be subjected to those delays either.

On behalf of the approximately 50,000 native people who are in one of the longest line-ups in the Government's history, I call upon the Government to commit the additional resources necessary to ensure speedy reinstatement for these native Canadians.

WOMEN

PRESENCE OF WOMEN AT ALL POWER LEVELS

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Argenteuil—Papineau): Mr. Speaker, a number of recent articles have pointed out the absence of women on the steering committee of the office of trade negotiations with the United States.

The presence of women at all levels of power is not an exclusive concern of Governments, for it relates to the attitude and behaviour of each individual. Apparently the views of women do not carry much weight. Yet, Mr. Speaker, the feminine outlook does strike a proper balance in any discussion. A committee such as Mr. Reisman's will sorely miss the contribution of women.

In this day and age, Mr. Speaker, women have very few incentives to share power with men. Be it in the family, at school or in their own environment, women are often cast as stereotypes which confine them to traditional roles that the majority finds reassuring. The few women who do manage to achieve power are nothing more than the alibi of a system geared to a man's viewpoint. Women epitomize emotion and sensitivity, values which do not quite go hand in hand with firmness and negotiations.

No, Mr. Speaker, our society still cannot adequately prepare women to assume power. So we should not wonder if some of them would rather not contribute under such conditions, and if a few like Mrs. Sylvia Ostry must bear alone—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Sixty seconds.

REFUGEES

INITIATION OF NEW DETERMINATION PROCESS

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, throughout our nation's history, millions of men and women have come to Canada from troubled lands to begin a new life in peace and freedom. In the past few years, however, our system of refugee determination has become backlogged, inefficient, and often unfair. Therefore, I congratulate the Minister of State for Immigration (Mr. McLean) for initiating a new refugee determination process that will uphold the principles of justice and compassion that all Canadians share.

S.O. 21

Canadians feel a profound sense of responsibility for genuine international refugees. However, our country has lost patience with the current system that encourages false claims and damages our reputation as an international safehaven. We need a refugee system that is fair, fast, and effective. That is precisely what the Government is proposing.

CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

APPLICATION TO CHANGE OWNERSHIP OF TORONTO TELEVISION STATION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, MTV, the full-time multicultural and multilingual television station, is the only multicultural and multilingual television station in Canada and operates from Toronto.

Since its inception MTV has successfully offered leadership and given practical and valuable application to our country's multicultural policies. The station is presently applying for a national multicultural network which would be an historical and cultural achievement in the field of television broadcasting. However, the possible acquisiton of MTV by Rogers Cable Television which is presently before the CRTC offers some concern. It is incumbent, therefore, upon the Government, particularly upon the Minister of Communications (Mr. Masse) and the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Jelinek), to ensure that multiculturalism programming will not suffer in any transfer of ownership.

It is clear that this assurance must be given strongly so that Canadians from one coast to another will not lose what has taken a great deal of work, effort, and sacrifice to build up over the long years.

CHILDREN

MISSING CHILDREN—MEASURES TO LOCATE AND SAFEGUARD

Mrs. Mary Collins (Capilano): Mr. Speaker, Sunday, May 25, is Missing Children Day. Voluntary organizations across the country will be undertaking activities to highlight the social tragedy of the thousands of children who go missing each year through kidnapping, parental abduction, or as runaways.

Our Government has undertaken strong initiatives to support these community efforts. On July 15 the RCMP Central Registry will come into operation so that police across the country can get the information they need on missing children. At the First Canadian Forum on Missing Children, sponsored by our Solicitor General (Mr. Beatty) in April, over 200 interested individuals came together to share information and they resolved, with the help of the federal and provincial Governments, to establish a National Missing Children Information Centre.

As a mother I know the fear and tragedy which are felt each time a child goes missing. I, and all Canadians, salute those who are making the commitment to find each missing child and to safeguard our children from becoming victims.

HEALTH

BIRTH CONTROL PRODUCTS

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, while Canadian women travel to the United States to obtain abortions, U.S. women come to Canada for IUD contraceptives, which demonstrates the primitive and unconcerned attitude of both Governments toward the need for safe, effective methods of birth control. Our Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp) leaves it to multinational corporations to provide evidence that birth control products are safe, while in the U.S. these risky products are withdrawn.

The Minister has shown no concern for reproductive health and the need for sound, safe family planning in Canada. His personal biases overrule sound health policy. He has slashed funding for birth control research and has cut funds to planned parenthood while increasing funding to an organization which teaches only natural birth control methods.

The Government is doing a great disservice to Canadian women and potential families by undermining positive family planning and safe methods of birth control.

TRADE

FREE TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday marked the beginning of negotiations on the most important issue of the '80s, free trade. I have every confidence in the Canadian team whose leader is a very skillful and competent negotiator. You know, Mr. Speaker, free trade detractors will simply have to coin new expressions, for otherwise their negative approach will confine them to repeating themselves. As a rule, their judgments are not very constructive and will not promote Canada as a viable competitor on international markets.

[English]

Completion of a successful new trading agreement with the United States will be an important step for Canada, important not just for protection of where we are, but for where we as a nation must go. Our destiny is to be a peaceful and prosperous country.

THE ECONOMY

BANK RATE REDUCTION

Mr. Reginald Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, the Bank of Canada has just announced that the bank rate this week will be 8.43 per cent.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stackhouse: That is a drop of 16 basis points, despite all forecasts of the opposite. It is recognition of the strong Canadian dollar, which has been constant and firm. It represents a drop of 4 per cent in the bank rate since the Government was elected in September, 1984, and fulfils the commitment of the Government to lower interest rates as one of the four pillars of economic policy.

This drop in interest rates will lead to economic growth and increased employment. Once again it is being shown that economic growth, not government growth, is the way to prosperity.

AGRICULTURE

SITUATION OF MARITIME FARMERS

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Westmorland—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform this House of the contents of a letter I received from the Maritime Farmers' Council.

• (1410)

[English]

Please be advised that the following resolution has been unanimously adopted by the 1986 annual meeting of the Maritime Farmers Council—

S.O. 21

WHEREAS during the past year the Federal Government instituted a policy of "cost recovery", and

WHEREAS part of this cost recovery program has resulted in potato producers paying a major portion of inspection services, as well as additional costs to producers for inspection of meat and dairy products, fertilizer and seed inspection, ice-breaking and harbour dredging, etc., and

WHEREAS these additional expenses are very unfair

Be it resolved that the Maritime Farmers Council strongly recommend to our Members of Parliament that steps be taken immediately to remove this additional burden on our farmers' production costs.

THE ECONOMY

GOVERNMENT PERFORMANCE

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, our Government's economic renewal program has led to a drop in interest rates and an increase in business investment. Since the February Budget, interest rates and five-year mortgages dropped 1.5 points. The bank rate has fallen 3.1 points and interest rates on five-year loans from the Farm Credit Corporation 7/8 of a point. For the first time in years, the deficit is going down, and by 1990, the Government's financial requirements will have been reduced by two-thirds. Furthermore, the job creation rate in Canada is higher than in any other major OECD country. During the past year, jobs were created twice as fast in Canada as they were in the United States. In fact, 630,000 jobs have been created since we were elected in 1984, and in April, the unemployment rate was 9.6 per cent, the lowest rate in four years. Finally, our Government intends to pursue its action plan which, need I say it, has brought economic stability and progress back to this country.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

ESTABLISHMENT OF JAPANESE AND KOREAN PLANTS IN CANADA

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) has returned from his vaunted Asian tour involving consultations with the Japanese and South Koreans from which there is little evidence of accomplishment. While the Government has failed to respond to the concerns of the Canadian Motor Vehicle Manufacturers' Association about the unrestrained growth of the offshore auto industry, it flaunts the establishment of Japanese and South Korean assembly plants in Canada. Yet these assembly plants will bring in only 3,500 jobs while taking 30 per cent of domestic sales, which could effectively kill the Canadian auto industry which counts for upward of 200,000 jobs, since estimates indicate that as many as 10 times as many jobs are provided by domestic manufacturing as are provided by assembly plants.

The Government's behaviour is idiotic and damning when one considers that Government claims of job creation and export growth are almost wholly attributable to domestic auto production under the Auto Pact from which offshore companies are unfairly exempted. When will the Prime Minister come to his senses, put jobs above short-term politics, and implement a level playing field for the entire Canadian automobile industry?

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

ACID RAIN—APPROVAL OF BILL BY UNITED STATES CONGRESSIONAL SUBCOMMITTEE

Mr. Alan Redway (York East): Mr. Speaker, the Opposition and many members of the press and the public were quick to ridicule the agreement which was reached by President Reagan and our Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) last March on the subject of acid rain. Now, two months later, a subcommittee of the United States Congress has approved a Bill to control and reduce acid rain. No other congressional subcommittee has ever approved an acid rain Bill before. "It's history in the making," said one Congressman. "It's a very important hurdle to clear and the size of the vote in favour is cause for optimism," said Michael Perley of the Canadian Coalition on Acid Rain.

No one would suggest that the problem has been solved, but this is another giant step forward. I personally believe that our own Prime Minister deserves an awful lot of credit for it.

FIREARMS

MEASURES AFFECTING RECREATIONAL FIREARMS COMMUNITY

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, Canada's recreational firearms community has been ignored in decisions affecting firearms control. All measures which have been taken seem to be designed to make it more expensive and more difficult to own or deal in recreational firearms. Even gunsmiths have been refused permits to take restricted firearms to a range for test-firing or sighting-in, or to pick up firearms for repair under warranty.

People who own muzzle-loaders or FN FAL rifles for recreational purposes cannot organize "shoots". Some small advances have been made. For example, late in September of 1985, owners of MG42's held a legal shoot in southern Alberta for the first time in two years. It seems that for every small advance, however, the recreational firearms community must take a step backward.

• (1415)

It is not as if permits for muzzle loaders or FN FAL rifles are going to encourage crimes. Neither of these guns would be used by criminals because of their size and weight. They are of interest for recreational purposes only. I recommend that the House work toward the decontrolling of—

TRADE

CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS—RELEASE OF BACKGROUND STUDIES

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs and concerns the release of the Government's so-called background documents on our negotiations with the United States. For one, bright, shining moment, I thought that the Government of Canada was finally going to be open and honest with the Canadian people. However, before publication the background studies were culled, clipped, and cooked.

Canadians cannot have an informed opinion about the free trade negotiations with the United States unless they have the benefit of the full facts. Why did the Government even bother releasing the documents if the documents were not going to be open, clean, and uncensored?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, let there be no doubt about what the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition is proposing. He is proposing that, as we enter negotiations with the United States, we should publish and hand directly to the Americans all of Canada's confidential information. That would mean that Canada would be bound to lose in these negotiations. Perhaps that is the way he negotiated for the leadership of the Liberal Party of Canada. That is not the way we intend to negotiate a trade arrangement that will bring benefits and job security to Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the right hon. gentleman that I am not going to negotiate myself out of the leadership of the Party like he did.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Axworthy: Remember Winnipeg, Joe?

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Supplementary question.

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know the precedents to follow and the precedents not to follow. We do not want to know the Government's negotiating position. We do not want to know about the cards in the Minister's hand, if he thinks he has any. However, Canadian people are entitled to know the basic underlying facts. They are entitled to know about the cost-benefit studies. They are entitled to have the benefit of an enlightened public debate on the advantages and disadvantages of the negotiations. That is all we are asking of the Minister. Will he come clean with the Canadian people?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the first part of the response of the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition, I will wait to hear it from the Hon. Member for York South—Weston.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): With regard to the second part, serious requests were put forward in the House by the House Leader of the New Democratic Party that we make available, on the same basis as we had to the provinces, information that would inform debate in the House and allow informed consideration in the country of aspects of the trade negotiations. We have done that.

I must say that when the Minister of International Trade and I first began to look at these questions, there was a relatively small group of documents which the Public Service, in its traditional way, was prepared to put forward. We went through them paragraph by paragraph, word by word, and we made available to the House of Commons everything we could that would not be prejudicial to the interests of Canada in the negotiations. We have respected Parliament and we have respected Canada.

• (1420)

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have looked at these documents—perhaps we ought to table them—but they are just a series of blank pages. This is what the Canadian people have been given by the Hon. Minister.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): They are blank pages from an empty Government.

INQUIRY WHY GOVERNMENT CENSORS CERTAIN DOCUMENTS RELATING TO FREE TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Right Hon. John N. Turner (Leader of the Opposition): In any case, the trade documents released by the Government are worthless. I want to ask the Minister: Why the censorship? Why the paranoia? Why are Canadians being denied the right to know the cost and the benefits of free trade talks with the United States? I shall wait until the Prime Minister has had time to advise the Minister on his reply.

[English]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I presume the blank pages are part of the continuing saga by the now Member of Vancouver Quadra on how he kept Canada out of the G-7.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, today we released a major part of the studies carried out by the Canadian Government, in order to provide Canadian citizens and the Members of this House with a broader knowledge of all the details and implications of a truly historic and important undertaking. We have not released documents that might help the United States in these negotiations because, to us, the country to be helped with these negotiations is Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[English]

PROJECTED JOB LOSSES

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. A little fact that was stuck in between the blank pages highlights that between now and the year 2000, 112,000 net jobs will be lost in the manufacturing sector.

Has the Government prepared a strategy to offset those job losses? Is it looking at the proposal made by the Macdonald Commission for a foregoing dollar transitional adjustment program, something that would help workers in those communities which will be drastically and devastatingly affected by his proposed free trade negotiation?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, already 630,000 new jobs have been created since this Government came to office.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: This very afternoon the bank rate was down again. It is now at its lowest level since April, 1978.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: The trade initiative is designed to create a climate within which new wealth and new jobs can be created. Obviously there is going to be some dislocation as you examine something this complex. There will be safeguards built into the process, but this is designed and will bring about new wealth and new economic opportunities for Canadians to enhance the growing strength of the Canadian economy.

FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg—Fort Garry): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question to the Prime Minister, his own studies by his own Government indicate over 112,000 jobs will be lost to manufacturing alone. In view of the call made publicly today by Premier Getty on behalf of the provincial Premiers that there be a First Ministers' Conference within the next two weeks, can the Prime Minister tell us whether he has agreed to that conference, and will he ensure this question of major job loss in every part of Canada will be the number one item on the agenda for that meeting?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman has his facts wrong. I suggested the conference in a call to Premier Getty. We are arranging now to get together in a meeting. There is your policy adviser, up there in the gallery.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, that had to be one of the more informed answers we have had from that side of the House.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): That was very helpful.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will he confirm that even the heavily censored studies which have been released today show that between now and 1995 we will have a net loss of 131,000 jobs in Canada, the powers of the Wheat Board will be gutted, that we will lose millions in tax revenue and, to top it all off, the power of the United States to take countervailing action against Canadian exports is almost certain to remain? When the Minister confirms all this, will he also explain to the House of Commons and Canada why he is getting us into this incredible mess?

• (1425)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if this is allowed under the rules of the Canadian Labour Congress, but I would hope that the Leader of the New Democratic Party would read and cite all of the information that was released today rather than trying to mislead people—

Mr. Broadbent: What was misleading?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —by references which are out of context. We have published the information. We hope it will be used broadly across the country to inform Canadians about the debate.

Mr. Fulton: You're the one who is misleading, Joe.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): We believe that is a substantial step toward ensuring that there is informed public debate in the country. I hope the Leader of the New Democratic Party will also do what he can to contribute to informed debate and not misstate facts.

Mr. Broadbent: If the Minister is saying that I have misled the House, he should get up and say that. Everything I quoted to the Minister was out of the reports.

Mr. Fennell: And out of context.

POSSIBLE LOSS OF 130,000 JOBS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Everybody knows that economic forecasts, particularly the long-term variety, are practically always risky.

Is the Government telling Canadians that it is prepared to live with the loss of these 130,000 jobs, naively hoping that more jobs will be created in the long run?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic leader . . . Should one say New Democratic or Neo-Democratic?

An Hon. Member: Old Democratic—

Mr. Clark: Yes, Old Democratic, they are indeed of the last.

Mr. Speaker, what he has just done was to quote figures out of context, and I regret that. As far as the objective of the Canadian Government is concerned, we are here to create jobs in Canada. Since this Government was elected we have already created over 600,000 jobs in Canada.

I can tell the Leader of the New Democratic Party that this Government is prepared to sign an agreement with the United States, on the one condition that the agreement will create employment in this country.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, this is rather bad for the former leader of the Conservative Party.

[English]

U.S. POWER TO IMPOSE COUNTERVAILING DUTIES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): The Government has rested virtually its whole case, whether with regard to softwood exports, pork exports, or fish exports, on removing the U.S. power to take countervailing action against Canada. The documents which the Government released said that almost certainly the U.S. will never give up that power, which is exactly what we have been saying for months. Therefore, will the Minister guarantee Canadians across the land who are concerned about their future that the Government will not accept any deal with the U.S. on free trade unless that countervailing power is gotten rid of by the United States?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on the question of the predictions of the New Democratic Party, on November 8, 1984, the Member for Oshawa—

Mr. Broadbent: Answer the question.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —suggested that the economic program brought in at that time would result—

Mr. Orlikow: Answer the question.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —"in a net loss during the next fiscal year from this program of between 50,000 and 100,000 jobs". In fact—

Some Hon. Members: Answer the question.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —we have created more than 600,000 new jobs.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Axworthy: That's disgraceful.

Mr. Broadbent: Deal with the question. Get out of here.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): That indicates how unreliable the projections of the New Democratic Party are. What we have done here—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Broadbent: What about countervail?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): —as well as taking an historic—

CONSEQUENCES FOR CANADA OF FREE TRADE

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, according to a study by the University of Maryland that was released yesterday, Canada may lose as many as 131,000 jobs as a result of free trade, and owing to its industrial structure, Quebec will be the biggest loser among the provinces. Furthermore, the President of the Union des producteurs agricoles in Quebec pointed out a few days ago that accepting free trade would, to all intents and purposes, spell the doom of Quebec agriculture. Do you have to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please! A question.

An Hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I could understand the Member from la Mauricie, but I am afraid I did not quite get the Hon. Member's question.

POSSIBLE LOSS OF 131,000 JOBS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): It was my first question. What action does the Government intend to take to prevent this impending loss of 131,000 jobs, most of which will be in Quebec as indicated in the studies?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there will be no such loss. And if the Hon. Member wants to read part of the document . . . He has an obligation to the House and the people of Canada to read the whole document. Because it is quite clear.

Mr. Turner (Vancouver Quadra): It's censored.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I understand why the Right Hon. Leader of the Official Opposition is nervous, but it is still quite clear. Yes, the Leader—

Oral Questions

LUMBER EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In committee this morning the Department of External Affairs Director for U.S. Trade agreed with the conclusions reached by Dr. Michael Percy for the Economic Council of Canada that the effects of countervailing duties on softwood lumber will be devastating for British Columbia. Mr. Waddell confirmed that the U.S. duty could be in place by July 4. Knowing that, and knowing that only one-half of the duty applied for would cost 130,000 British Columbians their jobs, what steps will he be taking in getting in touch with the President of the United States to stop this action?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, first of all the Hon. Member knows, and we all know he knows, that this action has not been launched by the U.S. Government but by the U.S. lumber industry. Secondly, he knows that our case is strong. Thirdly, he knows this Government has indicated that it intends to defend Canadian interests in every way available to us.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER CONTACT UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister because only he can do something about it. The only political window open to stopping this action is the one between now and June 2. The duty could be in place by July 4. Will he be contacting the President of the U.S. before June 2, or does the B.C. softwood industry not matter?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is one thing that is absolutely certain. No one in Canada, the Government or anyone, needs any direction at all from a bunch of socialists on how to protect jobs in this country.

[Translation]

PRICE OF DRUGS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my, the Prime Minister is corny! My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

[English]

Can the Secretary of State for External Affairs explain how, two months ago, he told this House there was no relationship between free trade talks and a possible Canadian move to hike drug prices in Canada when documents released yesterday show that one year ago his own Department had commissioned a study to examine the relationship between, among other things, drug prices and free trade?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. McCurdy: Just say "They are a bunch of Liberals" and sit down.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): No, I will try to make a serious question out of it and answer it. The Hon. Member, I believe, is confusing—

Mr. Parry: Try and give a serious answer, you patronizing—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, if I—

An Hon. Member: A patronizing what?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am prepared to let the Minister answer, but it would be helpful if I could hear it, too.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Perhaps I would be better off just publishing my answers, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. Member for Hamilton East is, I believe, confusing a relation between two matters in a trade negotiation which I said does not exist, and a study into a relation which she is quoting.

UNITED STATES POSITION

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, is it not true that another document in this same package showed that the U.S. has refused to sign a bilateral agreement with Mexico until drug profits for American multinationals are improved? Is it not also true that another price for the so-called Canada-U.S. free trade agreement is going to be the gouging of Canadian consumers to pay off American multinationals, as indicated by the Minister's own study?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, that is not true and it is irresponsible in the extreme for the Hon. Member to use her position to create false fears among the people of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FORECAST OF JOB LOSSES

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote to the Secretary of State for External Affairs directly from his own report which indicates: "Thus, the net employment loss attributable to the complete removal of the post-Tokyo round tariff rates by both Canada and the U.S. amounts to 131,000 jobs by 1995." Is the Minister even aware of that conclusion in his own report? If so, why is he prepared to take us on this course of ridiculous, risky, potential job loss for thousands of Canadians?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not only aware of those reports, I am aware of where the figure came from and how it was qualified in the report. It was qualified by the report making very clear that that might be the result if there were no adjustment policies, and if there were no phase-in policies. I think the Hon. Member, knowing there are going to be adjustment policies, knowing there is going to be a phase-in program, owes in simple honesty to the House of Commons to quote the whole document, not parts of it.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, the Minister might well have won the respect of this side of the House if he had released the paper on adjustment which was part of that package. It was not released.

UNITED STATES COUNTERVAILING POWER

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister also aware of the conclusions of his Department's study concerning countervailing action which said it is very unlikely that the U.S. would accept a blanket exemption for Canada from its countervailing duty and anti-dumping processes?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Langdon: If he is aware of it, why—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some Hon. Members: Sit down.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the part of that question I heard was: Was I aware of it? Yes, I am aware of what was in the documents we released. The Hon. Member will know that the question of countervailing action is one of the matters which will be at issue during the negotiations with the U.S. I hope he will also agree that it is very much in the interests of informed public debate that we not only publish information but that it be quoted accurately and not in a way designed to mislead.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS INQUIRY

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, presumably by now Mr. Reisman and Mr. Murphy have determined the shape of the table. They have suggested some of the things on the table, but what Canadians are worrying about is what is under the table.

Some Hon. Members: Liberals!

Mr. Baker: So I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs what these negotiators mean when they say "Only social programs that affect trade will be on the table"? What social programs are they talking about? Surely it is not Mr. Reisman's Canada pension?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the other day in committee we had a Member of the Liberal Party leaping over the table.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1440)

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Now we have a Liberal Member of Parliament who wants us to conduct negotiations under the table. All I can tell him is that, as he knows, he is misquoting the statement by Mr. Reisman.

CONTENT OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, we have to accept the word of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We conclude the gentleman who was on television on Sunday night was, in fact, an imposter who called himself Simon Reisman, looked like him, and spoke like him. The Minister of Justice should find out who that imposter was.

Are any of the income support programs that are given to Canadian fishermen, which formed the basis of the duties imposed by the United States over the past year on fish, are any of these income support programs, like unemployment insurance, on the table, under the table—probably we need a glass table?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The Hon. Member lives in a glass house. The answer is no.

CANADIAN CULTURE

FREE TRADE—CANADIAN POSITION

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and concerns studies prepared by the C.D. Howe Institute on the subject of culture and free trade. Why did the Government order these partisan studies on free trade and culture if it does not intend to conduct negotiations in this area? And why does the Government agree to consider the broadcasting and publishing industries only when the industries or the Americans want to take a bigger share of our market?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the studies published today were written for partisan purposes, I fail to understand why the anti-democratic party is raising these questions about the documents. As far as culture and cultural industries are concerned, we have said many times that cultural issues are not on the table in our negotiations with the United States.

[English]

REQUEST THAT STUDY'S CONCLUSIONS BE REJECTED

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister declare a total rejection of the conclusions and the premises of this study, including the position that Canada cannot ask for a blanket exemption of culture from free trade discussions but would have to negotiate each item separately, items such as advertising for our magazines, Canadian content in television, advertising content, Telefilm Canada, and the possibility that there would be an exemption for French films but not for English films?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the position of the Government of Canada is clear with regard to cultural industries. The question of culture is not at issue in the negotiations. We have had some studies conducted. We believe in making available to the Parliament and people of Canada as much information as we can that will not prejudice the negotiations with the United States. The point is quite clear. Those studies represent the opinions and the advice of consultants with whom contracts have been entered into by the Government of Canada. They do not reflect the position of the Government of Canada. What they reflect is a determination to try to contribute to an informed debate. I would hope that Hon. Members, when looking at this, would cite the whole report and not just the parts they prefer.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is long.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

WEST BANK INDIAN BAND, B.C.—REQUEST FOR PAPERS

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, my question concerns my three-and-a-half-year-old quest for papers relating to the operation of the West Bank Indian Band in British Columbia. In view of the fact that an extremely reliable source in the Department has informed me that these papers were translated and ready for me in January of 1985, and in view of the fact that the Minister, on six separate occasions, has promised me these papers, why have I not received them?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to receive the question. It gives me an opportunity to answer it. I want to assure the Hon. Member that the information is available. Some information has already been sent to the Hon. Member, and more is coming. I will see to it that it is sent to him as soon as I receive it.

PROVISION OF INFORMATION

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo—Chilcotin): In the words of the Minister of Justice, I have not received one jot or one tittle from the Minister. When can I expect to receive some information on this very critical issue?

Hon. David Crombie (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I had been advised that some information had already arrived. I think that I can assure the Hon. Member that the information will be there, jot, tittle, and all.

REFUGEES

NEW DETERMINATION PROCESS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Immigration. The consultative process on a new refugee policy was virtually unanimous in proposing that claimants have a right to legal counsel, unrestricted access, and a fair and specialized appeal process.

Given that yesterday he announced a system that fails miserably on all three counts, I would like to ask him why he betrayed the volumes of unanimous submissions from church and community groups on these three grounds? Will he not agree to reconsider the proposals in these three areas so that Canada can have a refugee determination process that is fair, effective, and humane for refugees?

Hon. Walter McLean (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the Hon. Member that with the policy which I announced yesterday we are fulfilling the fundamental principles as outlined by Rabbi Gunther Plaut in his report, and the fundamental principles of the Standing Committee.

There is at the present time, as the Hon. Member will know, counsel available which is subsidized by the federal and provincial governments. Second, there will be provision in the new guidelines for counsel to be available. The Hon. Member's fears in this regard are not founded.

PORTUGUESE VISAS INQUIRY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, the Minister is talking through the top of his hat and he knows it. He should give answers that reflect reality.

Yesterday he claimed that slapping visas on Portugal was only an extreme and last resort. I would like to ask the Minister how he can explain that in his original text at eleven o'clock in the morning he and his Government were prepared to put visas on Portugal effective May 26, and why did they risk an international and political embarrassing position vis-à-vis a NATO ally and a western European country?

Hon. Walter McLean (Minister of State (Immigration)): Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that the Hon. Member would have been joining others across the nation in saying this Government is dealing with 20 years of Liberal neglect.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McLean: We have inherited a backlog. We have inherited a system which was not overhauled and was open to abuse by the previous Government. Let the Hon. Member ask his colleagues why did they not, when they were in Government, act on these matters. Let him ask his colleagues where were their plans in this regard.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member for York West, order, please.

UNITED STATES GRAIN PRICES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I was able to confirm this morning through the Washington office of Senator Robert Dole of Kansas that the United States is seriously considering lowering, once again, its loan rate under the U.S. Farm Bill, which, in effect, is the world price for grain. It is considering lowering it from $2.40 a bushel to $2.10 a bushel. Is the Minister aware of this, and has he made representations to Senator Robert Dole and Agriculture Secretary Lyng of the United States, saying that this will be devastating for the farmers of western Canada if it is dropped by another 12.5 per cent?

• (1450)

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of State (Canadian Wheat Board)): Mr. Speaker, we were aware of many of the provisions in this U.S. Farm Bill long before it became law in December of last year. The Member should know that those provisions will not come into effect unless the administration decides. There are some parameters and percentage considerations under which the Secretary of Agriculture in the United States can act. We are aware of those concerns and are addressing them by staying in constant touch with the U.S. administration, letting them know our views in this matter.

Mr. Nystrom: We cannot afford another drop of 12.5 per cent in the price of grain.

EFFECT ON CANADA'S TRADITIONAL MARKETS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, is the Minister also aware of the talk in grain circles in the United States that they may also use their export enhancement program of export subsidies to cut into two of our traditional markets, namely, feed grain in Mexico and feed wheat in South Korea? Is he raising that issue with the United States by telling them to keep their hands off our traditional markets?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of State (Canadian Wheat Board)): Mr. Speaker, we are aware of and have been raising those issues for a long time. If the Hon. Member has those concerns, I would have thought he would be congratulating the Prime Minister for raising those issues at the Tokyo Summit.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mayer: I would have thought he would be congratulating Canada for calling together the five major grain exporting countries and hosting a meeting in Vancouver in June. He should be congratulating us for doing some of those things, instead of getting up and complaining all of the time.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

DAMAGE CAUSED IN RIVIÈRE-DES-PRAIRIES NEIGHBOURHOOD OF MONTREAL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Ms. Carole Jacques (Montreal—Mercier): Mr. Speaker, this week, the neighbourhood of Rivière-des-Prairies in my riding has been seriously affected by the discovery of a large tar spill covering an area of 40,000 square meters, which has caused considerable damage to property and to the fauna and flora. Mr. Speaker, my question is as follows:

Does the Department of the Environment intend to get together in some way with the provincial government in order to clean up the spill?

[English]

Hon. Tom McMillan (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has a right to be concerned. The Municipality of Montreal is the jurisdiction that has the primary responsibility for this particular pollution matter. I have had an indication from the Province of Quebec that, for its part, the province will invoke the relevant environmental quality law to take any necessary action against the polluters. As a result of the Hon. Member's early expression of concern about the problem, I, for my part, have given all the relevant jurisdictions an indication of my Department's full technical and scientific support.

CHALLENGE '86

EMPLOYMENT FUNDING FOR COMMUNITY PROJECTS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for summer employment. Yesterday, after the Minister said there were no quotas limiting community service projects, she went on to say that 36 per cent of the budget would be allocated to the private business sector. If that 36 per cent is not a quota, how would she describe it?

[Translation]

Hon. Andrée Champagne (Minister of State (Youth)): Mr. Speaker, I said that among the projects which have been accepted so far only 36 per cent were submitted by private interests and 64 per cent were projects related to other sectors, meaning municipalities and non-profit organizations.

[English]

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, I will restrain myself, but how can the Minister justify that this set percentage, whatever she wants to call it, must go to the private business sector when it is being used to deny essential community services while business activity, which would have gone ahead anyway, is being funded? How can she justify that?

[Translation]

Hon. Andrée Champagne (Minister of State (Youth)): Mr. Speaker, I was referring to things that have been done, not objectives that have been achieved. I find it rather deplorable that the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce—Lachine East should be against jobs for ergotherapy students, for Concordia University physiotherapy students, among others, for Henri Bradet Centre gerontology students in his own riding. He is against that? I fail to understand.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INTEREST RATES CHARGED BY BANKS TO CREDIT CARD HOLDERS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Although the Bank of Canada interest rate is the lowest since 1978—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: I am happy to hear that applause because it leads right into my question. The holders of bank credit cards continue to pay 18 per cent to 21 per cent for Visa and Master Card charges. If interest rates on bank cards dropped 3 per cent as other interest rates have dropped, these consumers would have saved $200 million on their cards. When will the Minister take steps to ensure that this $200 million rip-off of bank card holders will stop?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Canada Post): Mr. Speaker, I answered the question before, and I said that the interest charges billed by these financial institutions also included service charges, and that more than half of Canadian credit card users pay the charges on these cards on a monthly basis. Consequently, this becomes an area where there can be more competition among these financial institutions. The department's monitoring of the situation is quite adequate.

[English]

INCREASE IN VISA CARD INTEREST RATE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, of course middle-income and upper-income Canadians can afford to pay their bills every month. It is the lower-income people who cannot afford it. Will the Minister tell the House why the Royal Bank has increased its Visa card rate by 1.2 per cent to 18.6 per cent when interest rates are coming down? Will he tell the House why bank card rates are so market insensitive, or does the Minister not care about these kinds of credit costs that are hurting so many Canadians?

[Translation]

Hon. Michel Côté (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Canada Post): Mr. Speaker, I think I could add to this that credit card fees have also dropped somewhat in recent months, thanks of course to the economic policies introduced by this Government which have had an impact on our financial institutions as a whole.

EXTERNAL AID

ETHIOPIA—CANADIAN DEVELOPMENT POLICIES

Mr. Reginald Stackhouse (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The head of Ethiopia's relief and rehabilitation commission has defected to the United States. In a telephone conversation he claimed that Ethiopian government policies, as much as drought, were responsible for the food crisis last year. In view of that, what action can the Minister take to be sure that future Canadian development policies in Ethiopia will listen to the voice of dissent as well as to the Marxist government line?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister for External Relations): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the Hon. Member for his continued concern for Ethiopia and the difficult situation confronting the people of that country. We know for a fact that the present famine is due to drought and weather conditions generally. I agree that a number of governments have not helped to improve the situation. That is why two weeks ago, I launched the Africa 2000 operation, because we want to help find a solution to these problems. I am ready and willing to hear from any agencies that can advise me on the subject. We will listen, and we will try to find the right solutions.

SALE OF UNITED STATES BARLEY TO SAUDI ARABIA

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns our trade relations with the United States. Members of the western wheat pools have expressed extreme concern about the action by the United States Government to sell 500,000 tonnes of barley to Saudi Arabia, a quarter of which is provided free by the U.S. bonus program. Is the Minister prepared to meet with Secretary Shultz on this matter in order to have the U.S. withdraw this subsidized sale of grain to Saudi Arabia, Canada's traditional market for grain?

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of State (Canadian Wheat Board)): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member should know that the reason why Saudi Arabia was targeted by the BICEP program in the United States is not because of Canadian sales but because of a very recent sale there by the European Community. That issue will be raised when our Secretary of State for External Affairs meets with his American counterpart.

Mr. Foster: It seems to me that that will be a little late.

CANADA-UNITED STATES TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—MARKETING BOARDS

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, in January the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that marketing boards like the Canadian Wheat Board would not be on the free trade negotiating table. In light of the documents which were released yesterday, will the Minister assure our farmers that the Canadian Wheat Board and other marketing boards in Canada will not be included in the free trade negotiations?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, just to alleviate any concern about lateness, I will be meeting Secretary Shultz and other foreign ministers when they come to the NATO meeting we are holding in Halifax next week. I will certainly raise that matter with him, and not for the first time. We have raised it on a number of occasions.

The Hon. Member will know that the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board has convened a meeting of major grain producing countries precisely to begin dealing with these questions. Our assurances with regard to marketing boards stand.

POINT OF ORDER

ALLEGED MISQUOTATION

Mr. Speaker: I am in receipt of a notice of a point of order from the Hon. Member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon) for three o'clock.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, during Question Period, I believe the Minister of State for External Affairs stated that the quotation I used in my question was misquoted and designed to deliberately mislead the House. I can give you the quotation, exact as it is, Mr. Speaker. If my hearing was correct, I believe the Minister should withdraw those words.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I will check Hansard, but certainly I can assure the House and the Hon. Member that if I did inadvertently suggest he was deliberately misleading the House, I would withdraw that. It is an unparliamentary term.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Government House Leader, or in his absence the Parliamentary Secretary, about the business the Government intends to call. If he is not ready, I am sure we can ask the question later in the afternoon.

Mr. Doug Lewis (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there were discussions yesterday during the House Leaders' meeting, and tomorrow, as the House knows, has been designated as an Opposition Day. We will be back to the House Leaders of the two other Parties to advise them as to the business to be called on Monday and Tuesday.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I want to put on the record a problem which is starting to develop for which I earnestly seek a solution. This is now the second Opposition Day which has required the cancellation of Private Members' Business. On two of those days the Private Members' Business to be considered were motions by Members of the New Democratic Party which were votable motions. To this point there does not appear to be any satisfactory way of getting that Private Members' Business back before the House of Commons expeditiously. As we know, this is now the end of May and the House rises at the end of June. We will not, therefore, be able to deal with what was drawn as votable motions in the draw for Private Members' Business.

I am not laying the blame at anyone's feet. However, I am asking quite earnestly that an accommodation be found to allow Hon. Members, who had the good fortune of having their private business drawn for debate and vote, to be given the opportunity to have that done.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the House Leader for the New Democratic Party is absolutely right. There have been certain kinks, one might say, in Private Members' Business which have caused problems such as referred to by my hon. friend. There is no question that Hon. Members on all sides want to see some adjustments to the rules which will take care of that problem. I can assure the House Leader that we are drafting some suggestions which will be made available to the House Leaders of both Parties so that this inconvenience will be overcome. We will definitely make sure that the problems to which he refers are looked after. There is no question about that.

Mr. Speaker: May I simply say to the House, because the House should know it, that the Chair is hoping, as the Parliamentary Secretary has indicated, that this matter can be worked out through consultation. That seems clearly the preferable route.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, it is indeed the preferable route. I am willing at any time to sit down in order to find a way to deal with the problem. You can appreciate, Sir, that it would be possible for Private Members who went into the draw in good faith, and who were fortunate enough to have the business they were promoting called as a votable item, to lose that opportunity in any session of Parliament by virtue of the way Opposition Days happen to fall. I do consider that that would not be consistent with the new reform or with the will of Parliament.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs. McDougall that Bill C-109, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Speaker: The Hon. Member who had the floor when the House rose at one o'clock is not here. Resuming debate?

Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Lewis: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: On division.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried. Accordingly, the Bill stands referred to a legislative committee.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT, CRIMINAL CODE, PENITENTIARY ACT AND PRISONS AND REFORMATORIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, April 30 consideration of the motion of Mr. Beatty that Bill C-106, an Act to amend the Young Offenders Act, the Criminal Code, the Penitentiary Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Gordon Towers (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity of leading off the debate on a very important Bill. A number of Hon. Members are very interested in this Bill and a lot of questions have been asked by the Hon. Member for York East (Mr. Redway), the Hon. Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Horner) and the Hon. Member for Don Valley East (Mr. Attewell). It is the Minister's hope and trust that the Bill itself will be handled very quickly in the House of Commons as well as in committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. If there are conversations, I would appreciate they take place behind the curtain or in the lobby, where they should be at this time. I am trying to listen to our colleague, the Hon. Member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers), the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General. I would appreciate if Hon. Members would listen to him.

Mr. Towers: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The Young Offenders Act is the product of a lengthy and detailed examination of juvenile justice. When proclaimed in force some two years ago it saw the repeal of the 75 year old Juvenile Delinquents Act and the introduction of wide ranging reforms in juvenile justice. The principles on which this new legislation is founded reflect our contemporary social values and aspirations rather than those of the Canadian society at the turn of the century.

At the turn of the century it was recognized that children and adults who committed crimes could not be handled in the same manner. It was believed that the young required special treatment consistent with those values. Accordingly, Parliament adopted legislation in 1908 which required the court system to deal with juvenile delinquents as children in need of society's protection, not as criminals requiring punishment. Today we recognize that young people, although they may not be fully adult, are not innocent of their illegal behaviour.

In 1982, Parliament in passing the Young Offenders Act declared as a matter of principle that adolescents are responsible for their behaviour and accordingly should be held accountable for those acts in a manner appropriate to their age, maturity and independence.

Not only does the Act give recognition to the principles of responsibility and accountability, it has clearly acknowledged the irrefutable right of society to protection from illegal behaviour. The interests of irresponsible individuals cannot supersede the fundamental rights of society. Society must ensure its integrity and security.

In recognizing the rights of the community and the responsibility of young people, the Act has maintained the balance which is vital to our concept of justice, the commitment to fairness and justice which serves as a hallmark of free and democratic societies. In protecting itself, society must also protect the rights of those individuals who are suspected of crimes and deal sensitively with the special needs and circumstances of youth, youth who are in the process of transition from childhood to full maturity.

When the Hon. Member for Wellington—Dufferin—Simcoe (Mr. Beatty) assumed the responsibilities of Solicitor General of Canada he was already aware that this new legislation had been widely criticized. To examine those criticisms in detail the Minister consulted with Canadians who daily face the challenge of dealing with young people who have offended our laws, as well as with representatives of the communities that are affected by both crime and the criminal justice system. These consultations, and others which he had with his provincial colleagues, confirmed that the principles upon which the Young Offenders Act had been founded are widely supported. In fact, the Solicitor General found that the most adamant critics of this legislation were often equally as firm in their commitment to its basic principles. It is apparent that police, correctional authorities, citizen groups, youth service agencies, and many others, are not opposed to the Act. Rather, they are anxious to ensure that it functions in the way that Parliament intended.

Concerned professionals and citizens have identified a variety of problems and offered suggestions for change. The Solicitor General has been impressed that these actions have been taken with the hope that changes will aid us in achieving the goals of the Act's declaration of principles. It is in this same spirit that the Minister has tabled for the consideration of Hon. Members a series of proposals for amendments, amendments which will serve to enhance the ability of the juvenile justice system to meet demands for public safety and reinforce the values that are fundamental to the high standards for which we strive, including the full recognition of the special needs and circumstances of youth in contemporary communities.

The Solicitor General urges the House to support these amendments. They will modify existing provisions that limit the ability of law enforcement and justice agencies to achieve the principles of the Act. They will not alter the principles but rather ensure their proper administration.

Among others, the amendments which have been proposed, if adopted, will accomplish the following. The Juvenile Delinquents Act, the predecessor of the Young Offenders Act, established principles which resulted in the juvenile justice system being treated as private and confidential, with no publicity of any aspect of the process permitted. Two provisions in the old Act accomplished this. The first required that all juvenile court hearings be held in camera with no public participation. The second banned the publication of the name or identity of any child who was accused of a crime.

By comparison, the Young Offenders Act has brought the juvenile justice system into public view, opening the courts to public attendance and broad media coverage. However, the Act has continued to prohibit the identification of young people in published reports. In the past year many people have urged that the absolute ban on publication be modified to permit police authorities to seek public assistance in the apprehension of dangerous young people who are at large and a threat to community safety.

In response to this concern the Bill which the Solicitor General has tabled makes provision to permit the police, with the prior authorization of a youth court judge, to release for publication the name of or the identity of a young person who is at large and dangerous to public safety. The amendment also provides young people who are offenders, victims or witnesses appearing in youth court, with an opportunity to request that the court remove the ban on publication in their own cases if they wish to make themselves known publicly.

The amendments will also introduce changes which will enable authorities to deal effectively with young offenders who violate probation orders or other non-custodial dispositions. Currently, the Act relies on a review process to deal with breaches of such court orders, a process which has been found to be generally inadequate. The amendments will streamline the process and allow quick police and correctional intervention by way of arrest and detention where there has been a breach of a non-custodial disposition. The modifications will mean that the juvenile justice system and the adult system will deal with probation breaches in the same way. When young people are involved in street crimes, drug abuse, prostitution and the like, the ability of police to arrest may be a crucial factor in preventing crime and in ultimately helping a young person to achieve a different lifestyle.

The amendments will address concerns that the Act's records provisions are excessively cumbersome and restrictive, thus impeding the adminstration of justice. Specifically, they will ensure that the management of young offenders who are acquitted by reason of insanity will not be hampered by the lack of records. The new records provision will also ensure that police are not prevented from discharging their responsibilities for law enforcement and investigations.

There has been a fear that the so-called "Fagins" will be able to commit crimes and avoid prosecution by using children. An amendment to the Criminal Code will ensure that individuals who counsel or aid children under the age of 12 to commit crimes will be liable to criminal prosecution. While there is no evidence that there has been any increase in the incidence of crimes in which children are abused in this way by adults, the Solicitor General wants to ensure that it will not happen. Similarly, proposals to enhance the protection of children who are victims of pornography and prostitution are being examined by the Government.

There is no doubt that the commission of serious crime by young persons, indeed, by people of any age, is a cause of concern to Canadians. In responding to concerns and criticisms of the Young Offenders Act, however, we should note that the majority of young persons dealt with by the Act are not involved in the type of serious criminal activity which has dominated juvenile justice headlines from time to time. There are a number of options open to courts faced with youth who have been charged with such offences.

For the most serious of cases the Act permits the court to transfer charges to the adult court. Where a transfer is ordered, the accused will be subject to all of the penalties that an adult would face, up to and including life imprisonment. This provision, when applied for, has proven to be an effective means of dealing with serious, violent criminal acts, without requiring that we abandon the hope that should motivate juvenile justice.

Generally, the sentencing options available to the youth court appear more than adequate. In the past, 16 and 17-year-olds rarely received sentences of imprisonment longer than two years; and the average sentence was less than five months. Most important, the youth court can exercise considerable flexibility in imposing sentences which reflect the necessity of protecting society. The significant difference is that those sentences will be served in a correctional system which is separate from the adult system and composed of programs designed to respond to the particular needs of young people.

However, in one set of circumstances the provisions of the Act were found to be inappropriate and ineffective. An Ontario court found that a young man who had escaped from prison and committed a series of offences could not be given a proper sentence for the escape and new crimes. The reason was that the Young Offenders Act imposed an upper limit of three years on any aggregate sentence. Obviously, this is contrary to public interest and the Solicitor General is proposing an amendment which would allow courts to impose consecutive sentences for new crimes committed prior to the end of a disposition for an earlier offence. This new measure will result in an aggregate sentence of more than three years in some cases, thereby ensuring that the youth court is able to order appropriate sanctions under certain circumstances. In other cases, the new crimes may justify the transfer of individuals to the ordinary court.

The changes introduced by the Minister will help resolve difficulties in the custody provisions and emphasize that custody is a disposition of last resort intended to enhance the protection of society. Similarly, a general restructuring of the pre-trial detention Sections will resolve procedural problems that have imposed unnecessary burdens on police and in some cases have caused difficulties for young people.

These changes will continue to adhere to the principle that young people and adults should be kept separate and apart from one another in detention and custody. However, the amendments will provide for extended periods of time during which an accused may be kept in the hands of police authorities and will provide for other procedural improvements.

While the Young Offenders Act is sound legislation which enjoys broad support, it is, unfortunately, a law that has been found wanting in several ways. The problems are sufficiently large that a failure to respond to them quickly and seriously will impede the flow and effect of implementation of otherwise praiseworthy concepts. These amendments speak directly to the legislative weaknesses and limitations that have caused frustration among Justice officials and deep concern among citizens across Canada. The Solicitor General hopes that these necessary changes will enjoy speedy passage so that the benefits of the Young Offenders Act can be quickly and more fully enjoyed by Canadian communities.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the Government has finally chosen to call this Bill for second reading. I wish it had done so weeks ago, particularly since the Government is asking us to proceed with it quickly. It is hard to understand why this legislation was not brought forward a month or even longer ago, and I will illustrate that in points I wish to make. Bringing the legislation forward sooner would have allowed for the kind of hearings at committee stage which would assist us in dealing with all of the problems that have been raised during the course of the rather short life of this very important piece of legislation.

I take a particular interest in this legislation and the amendments that are now before the House because, as Hon. Members are aware, I was the Solicitor General who introduced this legislation and defended it on second reading, although I had an excellent Parliamentary Secretary like the Parliamentary Secretary to the present Solicitor General (Mr. Beatty). I came to the House to present the Bill myself and I regret that the Minister is not here himself to do so. However, his place has certainly been very well filled by his Parliamentary Secretary.

I thought that the legislation had a very healthy birth. It was one of the few pieces of legislation that had the unanimous approval on third reading of all Hon. Members of the House of Commons. I considered that to be an excellent launch for an important piece of legislation that represented a major reform of the juvenile justice system. However, very soon that piece of legislation nearly became an orphan. Its difficult period lasted until very recently. I put a certain amount of the blame, though not all of it, for the lack of support the law had at the time it needed it on the present Government.

The former Solicitor General who is now the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. MacKay) signalled in one way or another that the Bill was back on the table and that its fundamental philosophy, the age limits, the various dispositions provided and virtually every aspect of the Bill were under consideration and that in fact it might be repealed. This had a very troubling effect on the application of this law throughout the country.

For one reason or other a few provinces were urging the Government to take precisely the step indicated, and in the hope the Government would do so they were failing to make some very fundamental decisions that were required so that the Bill would have a healthy introduction into the Canadian criminal justice system. Complementary provincial legislation was needed and some provinces did not pass it because of the signals they received from the first Solicitor General of the Conservative Government. The decisions about which Departments inside the provincial Governments were to take responsibility for the various features of the legislation were not made, again because of the signals that were being received indicating that the legislation might be repealed. Forms that needed to be printed were not being printed. Educational programs that were largely paid for by federal taxpayers were not being delivered, again because of the uncertainty the Government created by indicating that the Bill might be completely abandoned.

I do not want to harp on that. I am glad at the result, that the Government decided that the Bill is essentially a sound one, that its philosophy is correct, that the age limits are proper and that it should be uniform across the country. In other words, after a period of mixed signals and wrong signals the Government is now back on track and wants to make the Young Offenders Act work. I am very happy about that because we in our Party supported the Bill as did the present Government and we want it to work as well.

We turn now to the next chapter in the life of this legislation. What has happened since the Government made the decision that the Bill was basically sound but that some fine tuning was required? No one recognizes more than I that fine tuning of this legislation is required. In fact, when some early decisions were made that put the effectiveness of the Bill in jeopardy, I was perhaps the first person who rose to ask the Solicitor General to quickly bring in amendments to the very legislation that I had taken through the House. I wanted to see the Bill corrected so that the problems that were appearing would be solved, and so that those problems would not continue unduly and thus damage the effectiveness of the legislation. The Government refused to respond in that way. I received a good, smart-alecky put down. I was asked why I was complaining when I was the one who brought the Bill forward. However, that was not my point. My point was that the legislation existed and the courts and officials were interpreting it in a way that limited its effectiveness. I felt that we should correct it and get on with it.

The Government said it wanted to have a period of consultation so that it could hear from all of the sectors of Canadian society affected by the legislation, and then it would bring in a package of amendments which corrected the Bill and set it on a proper course for the future. If that had been done, I would be agreeing to the Government's timetable. I would be saying, "The Government has consulted, it has put forward amendments, let us get them into law and let us get on with it".

However, I have learned that those consultations have not really taken place and that the amendment package which the Government has brought forward is only a very small part of the story that needs to be told in the House of Commons and in the parliamentary committee before we can really do the job of fine tuning that is required to make this legislation work for the future of the criminal justice system. In saying this, I am recognizing something that I was always prepared to recognize, and that is that the legislation is not perfect and that in the two years it has been working we have learned a lot about its problems.

Why would I challenge the Minister on his claim that full consultations were held? I have been invited to speak on the Young Offenders Act at many conferences around the country. I have spoken to more than 10 groups from one coast to the other and I have done so at the invitation of a great variety of groups. I have spoken to Family Court judges and to assessment officers, the ones who write the assessments that are submitted to a judge when there is the issue of a young person having psychological problems. I have spoken to gatherings of police across the country about how the legislation is going and what the police think should be done to make it work more effectively. I have talked to youth groups about this legislation. For example, I spoke to a very interested group of Boy Scouts in my constituency. They made it a project to study the Act and how it would affect them, their classmates and friends. Like the claim of the Minister, I have tried to get to the grass roots and to all levels of the community affected by this legislation.

• (1530)

As far as the Minister's so-called consultation is concerned he has only talked to the provincial Governments and to the police to a certain extent. Beyond that there has been very little consultation which has been confirmed by some of the groups to whom I have spoken. I asked groups the Minister should not have missed whether they had been given any opportunity to send in an account of their experiences to the Solicitor General, whether they had heard from them and did they know an amendment package was being prepared. It came as news to quite a lot of people. I fault the Minister for limiting his consultation to the provincial Governments, as important as they are, and to some of the leading spokesmen for the police across the country. Those consulations have been pretty good. The amendments that have come forward, which the Parliamentary Secretary described very adequately, covering their concerns are good amendments. By and large we on this side intend to support them.

I am not saying we are going to support all of them or that we do not have some further amendments to make to try to make them more effective. I am sure the Government will accept our amendments in the spirit in which they are intended to improve the legislation, as the Government said, to make sure that the philosophy with which the Government agrees, as we do, is reflected in the way in which the Act is going to work.

Many more aspects of the legislation need to be looked at. I shall not give a long list of them. I will cite just one. Then I will propose a formulation to the Government as to how we might proceed in committee. I hope there will be some favourable response so we can get on with doing what is necessary to the Bill so that it will work.

The one example to which I thought I would refer in some detail is the problem that has arisen with the requirement of Section 22(1) of the Act, namely, the requirement that before treatment is ordered by the court, the young offender having been convicted, has to give his consent to that treatment.

A group of family court judges took me aside, not to discuss a particular case but to discuss the way in which this requirement was going. They told me that it is a very poor idea to ask the young person for his consent. Contrary to the system under the old Act where treatment could be ordered by the judge and a fair number of young people were ordered to have treatment, this is not so under this legislation. The consultation I had was in London, Ontario. The judges said that in some courts the number of cases for which treatment is ordered is down to less than one-tenth of what it was under the old Act.

I know the Parliamentary Secretary and the Solicitor General (Mr. Beatty) would agree that treatment is a highly desirable disposition for young people in conflict with the law. If there is a recommendation that there be treatment and a capacity of the provincial Government and the court officials to deliver that treatment, surely we ought to do everything we can to encourage the young person to submit to that treatment.

What kind of a handicap or bar does consent present? Young offenders tend to come in groups. They know the court is open. In a lot of cases friends are present. I am told by the judges in the family and the youth courts who deal with these cases that young people do not want to acknowledge in front of their friends that treatment is an appropriate solution. When I was preparing this legislation and the policy issue arose, it seemed to me like a good idea to require the consent of a young person. I thought, and this was the argument of my officials at the time, that if the young person does not consent to the treatment, it is a waste of money and effort. Without a person's consent to being treated, it is obvious that treatment will not work. I agreed with that line of argument, but in light of the experience with the Act I would like to see a change. I would like to see that provision removed.

I know some argument will be raised about the rights of the individual in connection with this issue of treatment. Should a person not have the right to refuse to have treatment if they do not want it? I think that is a misapplication of the issue of the rights and wrongs or the legal rights of a young person in court. After all, if the judge is going to sentence a young person to be incarcerated for a year or sentence a young person to pay a fine of $1,000, the judge does not ask the young person whether he consents to that disposition. The young person is obliged to accept the disposition whether he likes it or not. It is the judgment and the order of the court. We have, however, built into the law a requirement of consent for treatment. I think that consent should be eliminated. I do not have any hang-up that eliminating it removes some freedom or right a young person has. A young person should not be able to pick and choose among the dispositions that the court, for the person's good, imposes. With the two years of experience we have had to the effect that treatment is being neglected because young people do not agree to it or are unwilling to agree to it in front of their friends, and given the kind of values that gangs of young people in conflict with the law have, I think it is time for us to look at this requirement again.

You may ask how the treatment will work, Mr. Speaker. This is what I asked the judges. How can a treatment work on a young person if that person does not consent to it? Incarceration works because there the person is. A fine works because the bailiff or the sheriff is there to collect the money. The argument is that the treatment will not work if a young person does not consent. Here is where the wisdom of the people working in the field is very useful. They say that eventually young people will want to contribute to the treatment, that young people will want to make the therapy and treatment work. If only you can get them started on it, in most cases or in enough cases they will quickly come to recognize that this is something with which they should play ball, that it is something of which they should try to make a success so as to get themselves into a better value system and into a better lifestyle.

I feel that a mistake was made and experience has shown it. The Minister did not look into this aspect in the course of his consultations, from what I can see, and I think we should not let pass this opportunity to look into measures like this. Perhaps as many as a dozen others might be brought forward, looked at by the committee, witnesses called and the measures included in the amending package. I want to put it to the Government that there was a limited nature to the consulations in which it engaged, and let us as a committee hear from all of those who work with the Act, not just provincial Governments, and of course the police but not just the police, to try to iron out a lot of little difficulties, such as the one I have just described.

I have limited myself to one example, but if I did speak about another one, I would talk about the review of dispositions problem under Section 33. I talked to people about that in Alberta, Ontario and Quebec. I found a different application in all three provinces, which is normal in a country like Canada, but in some of the provinces it is not working. Provinces are urging us to make an amendment so that an alteration or review of dispositions will not be, as it is becoming in some places in Alberta, for example, a whole new trial of a young person when you are really just seeking a review of dispositions.

I could go on at great length about the kinds of areas not addressed by the Bill that should be addressed by the Bill, but I won't. I wanted to mention the one I have because I am anxious to demonstrate to the Government that there are serious non-partisan reasons for us to slow down in the committee. We should look at a number of concerns and make the amendment package into a really good and useful one.

• (1540)

As an expert on the rules, Mr. Speaker, you know better than any of us that the Opposition will require the Government's support to deal with issues that are not addressed in the series of amendments which we have been given. The chairman of the committee is responsible for ensuring that the committee deals with the measures presented by the Government, and not with measures around it. Therefore, I must ask for the support of the Government for all members of the committee to allow us to widen the scope of our consideration to include all the other questions which I know are important. I think I can convince the Government Members of that if we are given the opportunity to allow these witnesses to speak. Many of these witnesses have not come forward because they did not know that the committee would be holding hearings right now.

That is my position and plea on the Bill. I want to add only one other point. I am not the spokesman for our Party on this legislation. My colleague, the Member for York South—Weston (Mr. Nunziata), is the spokesman but, like the Minister, is not able to be present in the House for this important stage of the legislation. He has some specific concerns about some of the amendments which are actually in the Bill before the House. I do not want to create the impression that the amendments which are there are perfect. I want to hear from the Minister about the provision which can result in a youth court giving sentences of longer than three years. I realize that the background for concern is that in a certain Ontario case a young person drew only a three-year sentence for the crime of murder which was the maximum a youth court could impose.

I do not think that that regrettable result is a bad reflection on the legislation. It was a result of the way the case was handled. The Minister knows about the case and has talked about it. To try to remedy the non-problem by giving the youth court the power, in certain circumstances, to impose longer sentences violates a fundamental principle of the legislation, that cases of serious criminal activity which require long sentences should not be dealt with in youth court at all. I am afraid that if we put the accused in front of youth courts into the jeopardy of receiving a very long sentence, the youth courts will lose some of the informality and therapeutic dimension which now distinguishes them from adult courts.

After all, if you are a lawyer appearing for a young person who could receive a sentence of seven, eight, or nine years, which is pretty serious, even though you may feel that the young person could benefit from some of the treatment which he would receive in a disposition like that, you would handle the case differently than if you knew that the maximum possible sentence was much less. I think that every aspect of the court procedure would be affected by this measure of providing for very long sentences.

As I said, I am not unwilling to listen to the arguments. I thought the Parliamentary Secretary gave a very good reason for handing down a sentence of longer than three years in the circumstances which he gave. If an individual who is serving a three-year sentence escapes and is brought back to the youth court, he cannot be given any additional time because he is already serving the maximum sentence. Obviously some amendment ought to be introduced to deal with that particular case. However, I would worry about a change in the law which would give a youth court the power to impose such a terrible sentence on a young person. As I said, it might change the way in which the court operates.

I think there are many young people who should receive long sentences for the things that they have done. There are a lot of hardened criminals in the 15 to 17 year old age category. However, the solution within the law, which is quite a good solution, is to transfer that case to adult court. That is almost invariably what happens. It did not happen, although it should have, in the case which the Solicitor General put on the record. I would rather have a solution to that problem than change the whole basis of informality and therapy, which is such a strong, important, and useful characteristic of the youth court as we have continued it under the Young Offenders Act.

I can tell you the good news, Mr. Speaker, that we are only going to have one speaker on second reading of this Bill. I have spoken for my colleague as well as myself. We are anxious to have these amendments passed. We regret that the Bill has been held up like this for no good reason until the last minute. We have been given a short deadline. We do not accept the deadline, but we certainly do accept a limited second reading debate in the hope that the Government and the members of the committee which is to be struck will agree to inviting witnesses to come and tell us how they feel about the whole law rather than just about the particular amendments which the Minister has been persuaded to bring forward at this time.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to participate in this very important debate on the Young Offenders Act and the amendments which have been proposed to it by the Government. I had the privilege of participating in the debate at both second and third reading stages of the Young Offenders Act when it was originally proposed as Bill C-61 in 1981 and 1982. I also took part in the proceedings and deliberations of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs before which the then Solicitor General, the Member for York Centre (Mr. Kaplan), appeared to defend the legislation. We had a very thorough opportunity in the course of those hearings to make improvements to the legislation.

I would remind Members of the House that the legislation, as originally presented to the committee, did not make provision for a uniform upper age in the definition of a young offender. I give credit to the Member for York Centre for having brought forward an amendment at an early stage in the committee proceedings to provide for a uniform maximum age of 18. I think that was an important concept and we supported it. I am pleased that the Government has resisted pressures from some provinces to lower that uniform age to 17 or even to 16. That is particularly important when one considers that in the Provinces of Quebec and Manitoba the maximum age has been 18 for a number of years. Were that maximum age to be lowered, the attempts of those provinces to deal with young people within their jurisdictions under that special regime would have been subverted.

I want to indicate my concern that second reading of this legislation has been delayed until this late date when there is less than a month until the House rises for the summer recess. At the time that the Minister introduced this Bill for first reading in the House I and my colleagues in the Official Opposition indicated that we were prepared to give the Bill careful study but certainly not to delay in any way committee study of the legislation. Having left second reading of the legislation until this late date, it is quite clear that the chances of the Bill being dealt with before the summer recess are very, very slim indeed. It will certainly take some time to give the opportunity which we must give to groups which are active in the field of juvenile justice and should be consulted. We will have to make the time in order to carry out those consultations properly. As I said, Mr. Speaker, that does not mean undue delay. It means doing our job properly as Members of Parliament to give an opportunity and a forum to those groups which are interested in and concerned about this legislation.

I say that partly because it is quite clear that there are a number of concerns which have been raised by these groups and by individuals who are active in the field of juvenile justice which have not been reflected in the amendments which were tabled by the Minister. My colleague, the Member for York Centre, has raised a couple of these concerns. I would like to touch on two or three other areas of concern as well. For example, the Young Offenders Act does not allow for the disposition of a conditional discharge with a probation order. That is a denial of equality to young people because it is available to adults charged under federal statutes, including the Criminal Code. I suggest that in the course of our deliberations we remedy that oversight. As well, we have to look very seriously at Section 22, the treatment section. Members of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General have received representations from the London family court clinic. They indicated that the provision with respect to consent of a young person before treatment can be ordered is one which has not worked out in practice. We are going to want to hear very careful evidence, not just from that London group but from others who are knowledgeable in this field, particularly those who made submissions to the committee three years ago urging that there be a requirement for consent. My recollection is that the Canadian Psychological Association urged that treatment not be imposed but ordered with the consent of the young person. This provision has not worked in practice. In Ontario, for example, during the first two years of implementation of the Young Offenders Act, only six young people consented to their own treatment needs, which allowed the court to provide them with the most appropriate court intervention. There were only six people. Clearly it was not the intent of the legislation to reduce the number of people who receive treatment. I say "treatment" because that can apply to a whole range of concerns, whether it be learning disabilities or psychological or psychiatric disorders. Those are areas in which proper resources should be devoted, and clearly we are going to have to examine with care the representations made on that particular point.

As well, there have been some court decisions which have brought into question certain provisions of the legislation. For example, in Manitoba a court held that a young person was not able to instruct counsel independently of his or her parents. That decision has been criticized by many people involved in juvenile justice as being unreasonable. An example might be that of a 17-year old charged with impaired driving. To suggest that that individual is not free and able to instruct counsel is not reasonable. Yet there is no provision in this amending legislation to deal with that concern.

Those are some of the areas faced by individuals in the field which have not been addressed by this legislation. Certainly there are others which have been addressed. In some cases we are going to oppose provisions in this Bill vigorously. They are a step backward. For example, while the adoption of the Act in 1982 represented a significant step forward, and it was unanimously approved by all Parties in the House, there were a couple of areas in which we actually moved backward from the days of the old Juvenile Delinquents Act. I want to give a couple of examples because it is precisely in those areas where the Government is suggesting that we further weaken the protection for young people. Under the provisions of the Juvenile Delinquents Act, enacted in 1908, it was impossible and illegal for young people aged 12 or 13 to be locked up with adult prisoners. It was recognized that it would be fundamentally wrong to mix young people at that age with adults in adult prisons. The Young Offenders Act, in Section 7, allowed that to take place. Many witnesses spoke against it. I proposed an amendment to the earlier legislation, but it was defeated. In the Bill now before the House the Government would go even further to dilute the protection available to young people and allow even more of them to come into contact with young adults. We believe that is a regressive step.

As well, the Juvenile Delinquents Act made no provision for transferring young people over the age of 18 from youth correctional facilities to adult jails. The former Minister, in his wisdom, decided to erode those provisions of that Act, so in 1982 he allowed young people originally sentenced as young offenders to be incarcerated in adult jails. That again was a step backward. What the Government is now proposing in this amending Bill is to allow young people to be incarcerated not just in provincial jails but in federal penitentaries. Surely that is not a move we can accept as being a step forward for young people and juvenile justice in this country.

Many of us were relieved when we saw that the Government did not attack the fundamental principle of the legislation. The underlying philosophy of the Young Offenders Act was an enlightened and progressive one. However, as the head of the Criminal Lawyers Association in Toronto, Earl Levy, said, it has its warts. All of us recognize that there is room for improvement. One of the major areas of concern, one which has been of greatest concern to those involved in the field, is the extent to which custodial sentences have greatly increased under the Act. Instead of this Act resulting in a reduction in the number of young people sentenced to custody, whether it be secure or open, we have seen a quite dramatic increase in young people subjected to custodial sentences. In Ontario there was an increase of some 200 per cent.

Another disturbing trend in this legislation is that 16 and 17-year old offenders are getting longer sentences now as young offenders than they would have received in an adult court for the same offence prior to the adoption of the Young Offenders Act. Ironically, legislation intended to reduce the jailing of young people and encourage the provision of alternatives has resulted in a dramatic increase in the number subjected to custodial sentences. One of the amendments proposed by the Government attempts to address this problem, but there is a more serious and fundamental reason for the imposition of these custodial sentences which I would like to address at this point. The scheme of this Act relies very much on provincial co-operation to provide alternatives to incarceration. Those alternatives have simply not been provided. The resources so essential to ensuring that imprisonment is only used as a last resort, in order to ensure that it is effective, have not been made available to the juvenile justice system. When a judge is faced with a young person charged with an offence under the Act, in many cases he has the alternative of either sentencing the person to custodial care or releasing him on probation. That subverts the underlying philosophy and intent of this legislation. That is a very, very serious condemnation of the legislation, one which cannot be addressed directly by this House or the federal Government. Certainly I hope the Government would recognize this problem and work in concert with the provinces and territories in putting additional resources into alternatives. In too many cases lip service is paid to the rule of custody as a last resort.

Another concern is the very heavy workload of probation officers. This really precludes effective intervention in economic, social and family problems. The underlying concern, however, is that the provinces are not yet offering a range of alternatives aimed at the rehabilitation of young people.

• (1600)

I would note as well that it is essential in this whole area of juvenile justice that we not deal just with the front end of the system, as it were, but that we recognize the essential objective in the area of young people and the law, and young people in conflict with the law, which is to prevent them from coming into conflict with the law. We recognize, as a society, many of the reasons for which young people break the law. Yet we refuse to take action and to deal with those concerns. We refuse to take the preventive steps, which have been identified time and time again, to prevent crime among young people.

There have been many studies done. I would point to one, the study of the Senate Committee on Health, Welfare and Science, which produced a report called Child At Risk. It identified a whole series of steps which we could be taking to prevent crime among young people. It notes, for example, that we have to look right back to the prenatal stage. We have to look at malnutrition of the pregnant mother, the question of intrauterine abuse, the fetal alcohol syndrome, the effect of smoking, the effects of prenatal emotional stress and, of course, diet and possible metabolic disorders.

It is also essential that we examine carefully the resources that are available to deal with learning disabilities. How many young people who are incarcerated in youth custodial facilities are there because no one has detected a learning disability which has driven them, in many cases, to the point of frustration and despair, and finally lashing out and breaking the law?

The Senate study documented very clearly the effects of emotional deprivation. Study after study of adult offenders has shown that, almost without exception, violent offenders have been shuffled between foster homes, have come from broken homes and simply have not had adequate resources when they were young. They were unwanted at birth in many cases, they had frequent placements in infancy, and in almost all cases they graduated from minor offences to major crimes.

There is the whole question of child abuse and how we as a society deal with the sexual and physical abuse of young people. We put totally inadequate resources into identifying child abuse and, having identified it, into treating it. Our resources in the area of child care are grossly inadequate. I know my colleague from Vancouver East, who is in the House today, has been doing an outstanding job in urging the Government to move forward to recognize the implications of a lack of resources in the area of child care for our young people, and ultimately for our juvenile justice system.

What about the whole question of violence in the media, violence on television, and violence in video games? I am sure that the Speaker has been into these video parlours where young people stand in front of machines and mindlessly shoot away like young Rambos at other human beings. What kind of example does that set? Surely to goodness we have to recognize that these machines, which award bonus points for bonus deaths, should not be encouraged in our society, but rather should be discouraged.

It has been estimated that an average child, during his or her childhood, will see on television some 13,000 or 14,000 deaths, whether it be on cartoons or other television shows. I was shocked recently to see the so-called professional wrestling on television in which big hulks take great pleasure in jumping up and down on one another and battering their heads into submission and beating one another up. What kind of example is that kind of mindless violence to our young people? Is it any wonder that there is a great deal of violence in our society when that is promoted on prime time television?

Finally, we have to look at the underlying economic causes of crime, particularly crime among young people. There is no doubt whatsoever of the link between poverty and juvenile delinquency. I could give many illustrations of this, but I would like to quote from a report called Poor Kids. I cited from this in my speech at second reading of the original Bill on April 15, 1981, as reported on page 9319 of Hansard. It states the following:

> To be born poor is to face a greater likelihood of ill health—in infancy, in childhood and throughout your adult life. To be born poor is to face a lesser likelihood that you will finish high school; lesser still that you will attend university.
> To be born poor is to face a greater likelihood that you will be judged a delinquent in adolescence and, if so, a greater likelihood that you will be sent to a 'correctional institution'. To be born poor is to have the deck stacked against you at birth, to find life an uphill struggle ever after. To be born poor is unfair to kids.

Truer words have never been spoken. We talk about reducing the level of violent crime among young people, and yet we refuse to attack the causes of that crime. We refuse to recognize that poverty itself is a crime which is being inflicted on the poor of this country.

I want to make particular note of the appalling conditions facing native young people in this country. Members of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General received a letter from Chief Edward Anderson who is the Chief of the Anishinaabe Child and Family Services Inc. in Manitoba. Chief Anderson points out that native young people are disproportionately represented among the ranks of the accused and the incarcerated, both within the juvenile justice system and, of course, in the adult correctional system. Youth correctional facilities, jails and penitentiaries are filled with Indian people. As Chief Anderson points out, very few people relate these disproportionate levels of incarceration to the history of Indian peoples.

The chief notes that during the last four generations Indian children in large numbers have been placed in residential schools, medical foster homes, group homes, child care institutions and detention centres. It is time that we dealt with realistic alternatives for native young people. Native people, when they come into contact with the justice system have to deal with non-Indian prosecutors, non-Indian lawyers, non-Indian judges, and non-Indian probation officers. Then they are sent away to non-Indian open custody and closed custody institutions.

As Chief Anderson points out, too often these institutions, instead of instilling a sense of respect for law and order in native young people, engender bitterness and hostility. Over the years native people have made numerous requests for more culturally appropriate agencies and services, but so far those requests have been ignored. I believe it is essential that we hear from Chief Anderson and other representatives of native people in Canada to express their concerns about the failure of the justice system towards native people in this country.

There are other areas of concern that have been raised by some of the major groups that are active in the field of juvenile justice. The Canadian Council on Children and Youth, while it has expressed qualified support for the amendments to the Young Offenders Act, has recognized a number of serious concerns. They suggest, for example, that we have to look very seriously at this question of the right of a young person to retain counsel without the intervention of an adult. They have voiced concerns as well about the lack of adequate programming for young people, particularly to deal with the special problems of female offenders.

The John Howard Society has noted a couple of areas of concern with respect to this legislation, while once again supporting, in principle, the over-all thrust of the Bill. They have raised concerns about the provisions that allow consecutive sentences totalling more than three years to accumulate for a young person who commits subsequent offences while still subject to an earlier sentence. The John Howard has expressed concern about the direction to determine more formally which young offender cases should be reviewed to assess the need to try the young person in adult court.

One of the other concerns which I would like to raise, which does not flow directly from the legislation but, rather, from the administration of the legislation, is the practice of at least two provinces, the Province of Ontario and the Province of Nova Scotia, to separate the treatment of young people aged 16 and 17 from the treatment of young people below the age of 16. That has given rise to two standards of justice for young people. Once again, that subverts the principle and the objectives of the legislation.

There are other specific concerns with this legislation that certainly the committee will be dealing with in greater depth once we hold hearings. I want to put the Government on notice very clearly that it must get rid of the very offensive provision in the legislation that would do away with the requirement that a young person must waive in writing his or her right to counsel. According to the present wording of the amending legislation, that basic protection of the rights of young people is being eroded. Certainly that is a provision that we will strenuously resist.

I want to note as well that we are pleased that the Government has brought forward an amendment that would remove the requirement for corroboration of the evidence of a child under the age of 12. Of course, that requirement is not one which applies in the case of adult offenders under the provisions of the Canada Evidence Act. This can and indeed has given rise to problems in the case of a young person who may be charged with an offence against a person under the age of 12. In the absence of any medical or other evidence to corroborate the child's story, the case had to be thrown out of court. For example, if a young child 10 or 11 years old is sexually molested by a teenager, in the absence of any corroborating evidence there is absolutely no opportunity for a conviction in those circumstances. Therefore, I am pleased that the Government has moved forward with an amendment in that area.

Finally, our Party calls on the Government to make adequate resources available to the provinces to ensure that there are real alternatives to incarceration. As I have said, the underlying philosophy of the legislation, which would effectively reduce the number of young people who are incarcerated, has been subverted by provinces that are not prepared to put funds into resources. I reiterate the concern that we must deal with prevention and must not take steps that effectively would undermine the over-all principles of the legislation, which is basically progressive legislation.

There is provision to deal with young offenders who have committed very serious offences, who are not appropriately dealt with under the Young Offenders Act, for transfer to an adult court. In effect, that is the safety valve of the system, and it has not been suggested that this safety valve in any way be removed. Certainly for those young people who are being dealt with under the provisions of the legislation, we do not want to erode the protections.

Another concern about the legislation is that the record keeping provisions, which already were heavily criticized in the previous legislation, are being eroded even further, such as in the area of fingerprints and photographs. We will want to hear evidence on that point as well.

I cannot think of many pieces of legislation that are more important or have a more significant impact on the people of this country than the Young Offenders Act. For decades, indeed hundreds of years, there has been concern about crime among young people. I note that as long ago as 2,000 years, Socrates wrote:

> Our youths now love luxury, they have no manners, they have disrespect for authority, disrespect for older people. Children generally are tyrants. They no longer rise when adults enter the room . . . They gobble food and tyrannize their teachers.

These concerns have been expressed for a long time. I hope that as Parliament and as a country we recognize that there can be no task more important than dealing with the priorities of our young people. We in this Party will do everything we can, in the review of these amendments now before the House, to bear that objective in mind. Certainly, we will be proposing amendments in order that that objective can be realized.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT, CRIMINAL CODE, PENITENTIARY ACT AND PRISON REFORMATORIES ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Beatty that Bill C-106, an Act to amend the Young Offenders Act, the Criminal Code, the Penitentiary Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions among the Parties with respect to the balance of the day. All those interested have been notified. I suggest that if you were to seek unanimous consent to call it five o'clock, we could move to Private Members' Business and proceed thereon.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, it appears that the Government is giving a higher priority to Private Members' Business than has been done in the past. Here we are at 4.15 p.m. proceeding to Private Members' Business.

It is interesting that the reason we are proceeding to Private Members' Business is that we have run out of government business. With all of the things—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Kaplan: —that the Government said it would do when it came to power, here we are in the middle of a good working day with no matters on the legislative paper that the Government is prepared to bring forward. I provide my unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, with respect, we have dealt with two items of business today; the Income Tax Act and the amendments to the Young Offenders Act. We could have debated it at length, but we felt it was important to get that legislation to committee.

We were prepared and are still prepared to proceed with Bill C-98, the duties relief Bill. However, we thought it was fair to consider the two Bills today and not call that legislation because it requires someone with a knowledge of that area of the law. We did not want to abuse our privilege by doing so. That is why we are moving to Private Members' Business.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being five o'clock p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS--MOTIONS

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

ADVISABILITY OF RESTRUCTURING DEBT LOAD

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should consider the advisability of amending the Farm Credit Act to allow the Farm Credit Corporation to restructure the debt load of those Canadian farmers, that can be shown to be good managers, and who are facing difficult times because of acts of God or because of extreme economic conditions beyond their control, by:

1. Allowing the Farm Credit Corporation to set aside a portion of the debt held by the Corporation, of proven farm managers, for a set period of time without interest or charges; and

2. Allowing the Farm Credit Corporation to issue loan guarantees to private lenders, provided the private lender writes off a certain minimum amount of the debt it holds and can show the farmer's cash flow is sufficient to meet the new lower payments that result from the lowered principal.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate on my motion, which primarily is designed to deal with one element of the agricultural problem, namely, the whole area of farm debt. I brought this motion forward because the agricultural sector, certainly in the Peace country and, I know, in much of Canada, is facing very serious difficulties. These difficulties can be roughly divided into four causes. First, we recently had a drought in the Peace country and parts of western Canada. The farmers in that region had very poor crops. Their cash flow and income was down, leaving them in a rather naked position.

The federal Government has taken steps in this area and has provided assistance on an acreage basis to many of our farmers in the Peace country. While that aid has been of great assistance, it could have been more. Personally, I would have favoured more assistance, as would the farmers. I know that the Government would have liked to give more assistance. The fact is that the farm community recognizes that the Government has been concerned about these problems and has been taking steps to address them.

The second problem facing farmers in my area and elsewhere is somewhat more difficult because it involves the whole question of international prices. The problem essentially involves the current battle taking place between the European Economic Community and the United States Government over subsidies for agricultural producers. The net result has been that the prices of agricultural commodities have plummeted and, once again, our farmers are faced with a very serious situation. Last year they had the drought. This year they have a problem with prices. Obviously, that paints a picture of a very serious situation for many of our farmers.

The third element which comes to mind is in the area of input costs. Farmers have been faced with rising costs for fertilizers, chemicals and various pieces of equipment and machinery. If we take the whole series of input costs, add it to the international prices and then add it to the drought conditions we experienced last year, the bottom line is a very difficult situation for many of our farmers. In the Peace country, in particular, we find that indeed to be the case.

The fourth element I want to touch on is the issue with which my Private Members' motion really deals, that is, the whole problem of the debt load of many of our farmers. Just a few years ago, in the late 1970s, in my region we found prices were going up quickly. The picture looked very good. As a net result, many of my farmers were asked to expand their operations. There was no shortage of money. The banks and the Farm Credit Corporation were there with funds available. As a result, many of our farmers proceeded to expand their operations, get themselves into a pretty heavy leverage situation with a very high proportion of debt, which I suppose would have been fine if inflation had continued and prices of farmland had continued to grow. The farmers could have continued on with life as it had been with probably not too many serious difficulties. But shortly after 1980, prices took a dramatic downturn. Instead of the prices continuing to climb, as many of our farmers had gambled they would do, prices began to drop. So there were dropping farm prices, high input costs, which were continuing to rise, and international prices which have dropped recently. What we end up with is a very serious situation which threatens many of our farmers.

There is no doubt that the Government has attempted to address the problems we are facing. It has talked about drought assistance. In addition to that, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) recently raised the matter of international prices as his topic at the summit meeting, which, of course, was the first time, to my knowledge, that this has ever been done. As a result, we are seeing the whole profile of agriculture raised in this House and in the minds and hearts of Members of Parliament and the Government of Canada. That is encouraging. It is the kind of thing I certainly want to see continue.

The Government as well has tried to deal with the whole matter of input costs. It announced as recently as last month the elimination of the federal sales tax and the excise tax on fuels. That is a buffer for the farmers. Essentially what we have is a Government which is attempting to address a serious problem. It is moving in a number of directions. It is trying to address input costs and international prices. It is trying to deal with acts of God, as it did recently with the drought program. In addition to that, the Government is now looking at the whole business of crop insurance and trying to make adjustments there. We know that those discussions are going on with federal and provincial Governments as well as with the farm community.

That leaves one area about which I am concerned, and that is the whole area of farm debt. That is the reason I came forward with this particular motion. We can address some of the causes and some of the problems, and we can move in different directions with solutions, but, unfortunately, what we are faced with is a large number of farmers who still will be saddled with tremendous debt and in the present circumstances will continue to look at a very bleak future. They will take advantage of some of these programs which will help them to a certain degree. However, as long as they have these massive debts, they will continue to be locked into a very difficult situation and many of them will likely face bankruptcy, receivership or, in some way, be forced off the farm.

What I have presented to the House today is a motion which really has two elements. The first element is essentially a system of set-asides which would kick in in certain cases. I specified those cases. The reason I did so is that I do not think any Government should be involved in looking after a farmer who is not managing his operation properly, who is not doing what he should do or that which is necessary to accomplish a turn-around. But that kind of individual is in the minority. The truth is that the vast majority of our farmers are good managers. They are hard-working people who are doing the best they can to get their operations going in spite of difficult circumstances. Essentially what I propose is that the Farm Credit Corporation be allowed to set aside a portion of the debt it holds for a particular farmer for a period of time with no interest and without any carrying charges until the farmer's situation improves. That set-aside amount of money then comes back into the formula and the farmer begins again to pay interest and charges and so on which are incurred on his debt.

My motion reads in part that the Government allow the Farm Credit Corporation to restructure the debt load of those Canadian farmers who can be shown to be good managers and who are facing difficult times because of acts of God or because of extreme economic conditions beyond their control. So it is a fairly limited exposure. The reason for that is that it is not the Government's business to get involved with farmers who are not managing their own affairs.

The second element is that many of our farmers do not deal exclusively with the Farm Credit Corporation or do not have knowledge of farm credit but are still faced with the same debt situation. What I have proposed that the House should consider is that the Farm Credit Corporation come up with a form of loan guarantee to allow private lenders to enter into the same sort of arrangement. The reason for this motion is very simple. We face a difficult situation. Farmers are being hit on all fronts. I know the Government is addressing as many of these fronts as it can and it is doing a good job. However, there are still a couple of areas which I would like us to give a hard look, and one of those fundamental areas has to be the whole area of farm debt.

I see my time has expired. I want to make sure that other Hon. Members have a chance to participate in this debate. I am pleased to have had the opportunity to put forward a proposal which I think will provide some help and assistance to many of the farmers in our area and, in fact, across western Canada.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the debate this afternoon on the motion before us as proposed by the Hon. Member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper). There are two items in the motion, first, to allow the Farm Credit Corporation to set aside a portion of the debt held by the Corporation. I am sure you will recall, Mr. Speaker, that the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) brought a very similar motion to the attention of the House some time ago. Unfortunately, it was talked out by the Conservative Party. We hope the motion before us today indicates a change of heart on the part of the Government and that, indeed, the Hon. Member's Conservative colleagues will not do what they did then and will allow this very good motion to come to a vote so that we will be able to pursue this matter further.

The second item in the motion is to allow the Farm Credit Corporation to issue loan guarantees to private lenders for private lender write-offs of a certain minimum amount of the debt, and so on. Although this seems favourable as well, there are a few problems I would like to place before the House. First, we should all remember that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) not that long ago brought in a Budget in which he introduced what he considered to be a revolutionary measure known as "the commodity-based mortgage". We can all recall that during the budget debate, when the Minister of Finance announced that there would be a measure known as the commodity-based loan program and that it would solve a whole number of agricultural problems, all the Tory Members applauded. I am sure that Your Honour must recall that day. As it turned out, the commodity-based loan program was a flop. I think I am being complimentary when I say that. Because of the rules concerning parliamentary language I cannot use the term it appropriately deserves.

• (1630)

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture published a backgrounder with respect to the commodity-based loan program. It is a very complete document. I would like to tell Hon. Members that the federation does not deal favourably with this measure. I would like to read a few sentences of the backgrounder to Hon. Members. It states:

—the Commodity Based Loans program is not really a form of debt relief to the least privileged farmers.

That is funny since that is what the Minister of Finance said it was. Finally, the backgrounder states:

The funds provided in the February 26, 1986 budget for the FCC program, in reality, hardly provide farm financial assistance. The system contains a loan program within a loan program, where in all other but the worst scenarios, the debts are called in at the FCC rate plus 2 per cent.

I have reached the conclusion this afternoon that the Hon. Member for Peace River is totally repudiating the commodity-based loan program since it was supposed to solve all the problems outlined in the Hon. Member's motion. I am glad to see that it was not only members of the Opposition who had the foresight to call this commodity-based loan program what it really was—a whole bunch of hot air and not much else—but that the Hon. Member for Peace River agrees that the measure is totally unsatisfactory. I am glad he shares that view with my colleagues and me.

Mr. Speaker, you will probably recall that the Leader of the Opposition—

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) and I work together on a regular basis. He is a very capable individual. My concern is that what he is now doing is adding to my words much more than what I have put into them. I wish to bring that to the attention of the Chair and to the attention of the Hon. Member. He is really taking the words I have used and adding just a little bit of distortion to them.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): A very liberal interpretation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will leave the matter at that.

Mr. Boudria: I am sure Your Honour recognizes that the point the Hon. Member raises is not a point of order, although it is an interesting point. I gather he is saying that he is not totally dissatisfied with the commodity-based loan program. I contend that he is not totally supportive of it since he thinks we need all these new measures which he has brought to our attention today in the form of his motion. I agree with him; we need the measures which he suggests. The reason we need them is that the Minister of Finance failed so miserably in his Budget to address those selfsame problems.

Hon. Members will probably recall that last year the Leader of the Opposition formed the National Liberal Caucus Task Force on Agriculture. The task force, under the very able leadership of the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster), toured the country and made some reports. I would like to share with Hon. Members the report of the Ontario section of the task force wherein it states:

The majority, or 16 farm groups, recommend low and/or stable long term farm loans as the solution to the large farm debt problem. County Federations of Agriculture comprise the majority of the groups that specifically recommend low and stable rates. Another three farm groups recommend that the term of farm loans be required to match the time and length of the associated production period.

So in spite of the fact that the Minister of Finance has brought in two Budgets and has patted himself on the back, with a little help from Tory back-benchers, the measures he introduced did not solve the financial problems of the farm sector. Members of the Opposition are not the only ones who think that much more needs to be done, since what the Government has done is clearly insufficient. We are glad to see that the Hon. Member for Peace River is on our side in stating that the Government's actions have been insufficient thus far. We really hope that he will have better luck than we have had at convincing the Government to do what it should have done a long time ago.

Hon. Members will probably remember that in January of 1985 the Department of Finance published a document entitled Tax Issues in Agriculture. In that document the Minister of Finance stated that farmers were receiving a lot of breaks, that they were not really in much more difficulty than anyone else and that they were doing quite well, thank you very much. This is a policy paper with which many of my colleagues and I strongly disagree. From what I know, many Conservative back-benchers also disagree with it.

The Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs presented a report to the House in which we responded to the Department of Finance document. In the report of the committee, of which I was a member as were many other distinguished Members of the House, some of them Conservative, we unanimously recommended that some farm debt relief measures be introduced. Several pages in the report are devoted to the measures which we feel are necessary to deal with the situation. For instance, we suggested that we need an agri-bond program to solve the farm debt crisis and to assist farmers in difficulty. The Government did not listen to that recommendation. It did not listen to the members of the committee. We see that some very distinguished Members of the House, some of them Conservative, and others, were not listened to by the Government. We certainly hope that the Hon. Member for Peace River will have better luck than did his colleagues who tried to convince the Government that we need help for agriculture. Unfortunately, our report was not listened to by the Minister of Finance. I wish better luck to the Hon. Member for Peace River. I certainly hope that he will be successful in convincing the Government to do the things which it has so badly neglected thus far.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but his time has expired. The Hon. Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo).

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, first, I must congratulate the Hon. Member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) for recognizing that there is a problem. In the process of recognizing that there is one, he has put his name on record to suggest that the Government do something about it. However, I must also suggest that his is not a serious motion. What he states in his motion is mere rhetoric. He places before the House and before the people of Canada a motion stating in effect that he recognizes the fact that the Government is not doing enough about financing in agriculture. It is not a serious motion in any way at all.

The first part of his motion requires a set-aside provision, which is already part of the Act. This is something which the Farm Credit Corporation already has the right to do. The legislation allows the Farm Credit Corporation to set aside a portion of the debt of proven farm managers held by the corporation for a period of time without interest or charges.

The second part of the Hon. Member's motion is with respect to a write-down provision, which is not a guarantee to farmers and which is something which may not even help them. It is a guarantee to private investors. I must suggest that although the Hon. Member recognizes the problem, he does not recognize that the solution he is putting forward is not a serious one at all and cannot be of value to the farmers of the country.

There are solutions that would help. The Hon. Member's suggestion deals with only one of the causes of the disaster in the farming community and does not really deal with one of the causes at which we must look the hardest. There is no good solution to the problem of farmers other than the establishment of commodity prices which pay the farmer for the cost of production, the land, labour and machinery. Such a parity price structure would make it possible for any farmer with management skills to survive and prosper. The Hon. Member very carefully worded his resolution to mention farmers who have shown themselves to be good managers.

A parity price structure does, of course, ignore some of the situations which have developed in Canada and the world over the last few years. There is the problem of the world market and of other countries subsidizing products and dumping them on the world market at prices too low to enable a farmer to raise grain. The fact that there is intermittent over-production in the world drives the prices down. These are situations with which we are faced today and with which we should deal.

I wish the Hon. Member luck in sensitizing his caucus colleagues to the problems of the farm structure. As well, I wish him luck in his attempt to stabilize farm input so that farmers will know that we are looking at the structure of farm financing.

If the Government were to guarantee all of those loans, it would cost the Government something like $28 billion, and to some extent, that is what the Hon. Member is suggesting if he is suggesting that all private loans be backed and guaranteed by the Government. With wheat on the Prairies going for $3.50, there is not a bank in the market that will back a loan but will not accept the backing which is suggested here.

The Hon. Member makes good management a condition of the resolution. I wonder if he would want to be the judge of good management. If a farmer who has been farming for five years has not had a crop for five years and consequently goes out of business, does that mean he is a good manager if his neighbour went out of business one year earlier? If he has survived at all, does that mean he is a good manager? How exactly do we decide which farmers are going under because of bad management and which are going under because of other factors over which they have no control?

The Hon. Member is challenging the financial structure of the country. That needs to be done, and I congratulate the Hon. Member for doing so. The financial system skims off the top of the fruits of labour and productivity. The financial system does not contribute to the process of farming. Financial institutions put nothing into farming, no labour, no sweat, no seed, no machinery. They just skim off the top through interest rates. One of the greatest reasons for the elimination of producers in the farming industry right now is the financial structure and the fact that financial institutions are skimming off the top when no one else is getting any profit from farms.

It has always been a mystery to me that we in Canada have allowed a situation to develop which would make money the most important input in the production of grain and food. It is more important than fertilizer, chemicals, seeds, machinery or labour. The most important factor seems to be the money that is lent and the interest on that money. That is the only thing that is guaranteed. The financial structure ensures that the person who lends money will collect his interest on it.

The Hon. Member is shaking up the financial structure by suggesting that there be write-downs, even if the write-downs are to protect the investor and not the farmer, and that there be set-asides as far as interest rates are concerned. Both of these are foreign to the financial structure which this Government and the previous Government have gone to great lengths to protect. Consequently, I hope that he is sensitizing his caucus colleagues to this particular problem.

On March 6, 1986, I asked a question of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) about the need for establishing a debt review which would allow for write-downs and eliminations. He promised, as he did before Christmas, after Christmas and at Easter, that he would do so. However, when I suggested that the Bill he was to bring before the legislative committee would have no teeth, he said, "There will be teeth in it, just wait and see. We are doing just that." It seems inadequate to suggest that a motion put before the House at this time will replace the legislation we have been promised four times in the last year.

[Translation]

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take part in the debate on the motion introduced by my colleague from Peace River (Mr. Cooper) who advocates more flexible financial structures to help farmers.

It is easier to appreciate the gist of this issue if we consider the role played by the Farm Credit Corporation, namely to provide funds and financial advice to farmers to help them build up economically sound businesses. Such has been its role since it was created in 1959. Never in 27 years did the Farm Credit Corporation have to face the kind of challenge now confronting it. Never before have its human and financial resources had to cope with so many help requests from the farming community.

Low prices paid for agricultural products, declining land values, drought conditions, and the impact of American policy and high interest rates all represent as many obstacles to be overcome. The Government is fully aware of the daily struggle of cash-starved Canadian farmers trying to stay in business.

Through the Farm Credit Corporation the Government has approved interest deductions for 5,600 FCC borrowers who were paying between 14 and 16.75 per cent interest on long-term loans. These borrowers were saddled with loans maturing in 25 years or more at unprecedented interest levels. Their interest rates have been lowered to 12.75 per cent over five-year terms.

We have also widened the mandate of the FCC appeal boards so they might review the cases of farmers against whom the FCC was about to initiate liquidation proceedings.

[English]

Last September, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) announced a moratorium on farm foreclosures by the Farm Credit Corporation. That moratorium remains in effect today until programs are in place to assist these financially distressed farmers. One of the programs is already in operation. The commodity-based loan program which was first announced in the February Budget was launched two weeks ago. This is a new approach to farm financing which could help between 4,000 and 5,000 Farm Credit Corporation borrowers who are unable to meet their financial obligations. It will give those in low equity positions another chance to rebuild their businesses. Under the program, loan payments are tied to the farmer's ability to pay and borrowers can pay as little as 6 per cent interest.

• (1650)

The unique feature of these loans is that payments will vary according to what happens to commodity prices. If commodity prices decrease, the principal owed by the farmer will also decrease, as will the payment. If prices increase, greater revenues will be generated and the farmer will be in a better position to handle increased payments. If a borrower stays in this program for the full 10 year term and commodity prices do not improve substantially, the total amount he or she pays will be less than under a conventional mortgage.

If a borrower decides to opt out of the program, the difference between what has been paid under the commodity-based payments and what would have been paid under a conventional mortgage will have to be repaid. However, there is a cap which limits the amount borrowers would have to pay if they choose to opt out of the program or if commodity prices increases sharply during the term of the loan. The cap is 2 per cent above the 10 year rate, which means that at current rates a farmer would never pay more than would be required under a 13 per cent mortgage. In effect, commodity prices would have to increase 7.5 per cent every year for 10 years to reach this cap over the 10 year period of the loan.

[Translation]

It is a program that is not easy to explain, but the Corporation has organized information sessions across the country for groups of producers and representatives of the media. As more people understand how the program works, they will be in a better position to appreciate its merits.

We have received some very encouraging and very positive comments from farmers who initially had some reservations. We think that at least 5,000 borrowers from the Farm Credit Corporation should be able to benefit under this program.

[English]

Commodity-based loans will help farmers deal with the risks involved in commodity price fluctuations.

A year ago the corporation introduced another program which was intended to help farmers deal with the risk of interest rate fluctuations. That was the shared risk mortgage program, and it has proven to be very popular with FCC clients. In fact, 20 per cent of the FCC loan approvals during the 1985-86 fiscal year were under this program. Interest rates for the shared risk mortgage are adjusted annually. Increases or decreases are shared equally with the corporation, but clients would never have to pay more than a 2.5 per cent increase during the six year term of the loan. These two programs are indications of the efforts the Farm Credit Corporation is making to provide lending programs that help farmers deal with risk. Two fronts have been addressed: commodity prices and interest rate fluctuations. On other fronts, the questions of crop insurance and stabilization programs have also been addressed.

The Farm Credit Corporation is also monitoring its loans closely so that problems can be identified and solved before they become serious. As well, close to 3,000 borrowers are taking advantage of the advisory services program under which they receive regular financial counselling to help them establish viable farm businesses.

[Translation]

The purpose of these measures is to help FCC borrowers succeed. The effort being made by the FCC is considerable: it is currently carrying more than 17 per cent of these accounts in arrears. Meanwhile, the FCC grants loans for debt consolidation and reschedules others when this can help farmers.

We are aware that the farming community is going through a very difficult period, and the time has come to take a different approach to the problem. That is what we have done, and that is what we intend to go on doing, as long as the situation has not improved. Simplistic answers, such as subsidized interest rates and indiscriminate partial write-offs, would provide only temporary relief for those who really need help and might worsen their position in the longer term.

What we need are long term solutions that will strengthen Canadian agriculture.

[English]

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, apart from the question of debt set-asides, which the Hon. Member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) has introduced today, the FCC has served farmers well. FCC was created to help all farmers, not only those in extreme financial difficulty. I believe the Farm Credit Corporation has done its share to help most of its borrowers to succeed, and FCC pays special attention to the needs of its borrowers in financial difficulty. I know farmers in London—Middlesex on FCC borrowing will be pleased to see the reduction in the interest rate this week for the second time in two months.

As we are speaking today, I have no difficulty in believing that FCC is doing all it can under the circumstances. Over 17 per cent of FCC accounts are in arrears at this moment. It means that those farmers are facing real difficulties. The private lending institutions are reporting that the number of their non-performing loans has increased 100 per cent to 6 per cent.

I think FCC shows a lot of flexibility when it carries a farmer in arrears for a long period of time. When the debt structure of a borrower is not adequate, FCC does not hesitate to help out and reamortize what needs to be and can be reamortized.

There is more than one way to help farmers facing financial difficulty. Not being in a position to allow debt set-asides, FCC had to rely on its ability to manage in a very innovative and empathetic way. When a farmer has some equity left and when he or she works out a repayment program that is realistic, FCC tries to accommodate that borrower. This approach is successful in many cases. Unfortunately, when it is not, the corporation has to take a greater loss. That is a chance FCC is willing to take to help a farmer on an individual basis.

The Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) should know, and he did not say it today, that since last year FCC has come up with very innovative ways to work as a lender in the agricultural field. I am thinking here about the shared risk mortgage that was introduced in April 1985. The objective of this type of loan is to lessen the impact of volatile interest rates on a farming business. It was designed to share the risk equally between the farmer and FCC. It was new, it was different, and it was innovative.

There is a market for this kind of program. It was well targeted and it paid some dividends for farmers. During the 1985-86 fiscal year, more than 20 per cent of all FCC loans were shared risk mortgages. The farm community responded very well.

This month, FCC introduced its commodity-based loan. Here again is an attempt to serve the farm community better by offering a program that meets the specific demands of a well defined group. There was a lot of criticism of this program due to misunderstandings about its real value. It is now on the market. It seems that many farmers think that this program can help them.

FCC employees came up with innovative programs and they are still testing new ideas. Equity financing is one of them. Many groups in the farming community had a chance to offer their opinions in this area. As I said earlier, the Government will make some funds available to FCC so it can work with the debt review boards. This decision is the result of many discussions and consultations with farm organization. In my home province of Ontario, the Grey-Bruce county had debt review board experience.

On December 10, 1984, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) supported the debt review board pilot project that was established in Bruce-Grey counties in Ontario. He fully supported the participation of FCC on this project. In May of last year, the debt review board presented its report. While the experience provided us with a very interesting insight on how such a process could work, it failed to establish a consensus among its participants. The concern of the board was to help farmers stay in business if they thought there was a chance for survival and financial recovery. This exercise was not done in vain. In fact, the report of this pilot project and the discussions the Minister had with FCC's appeal board chairman served as a basis for the introduction of what was announced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) in his February 26 Budget.

The Budget included $65 million this year and $130 million next year for a total of $195 million over two years to help

Canadian farmers. We think that this is quite an allocation. It included provisions to allow FCC to launch its innovative commodity-based loan program that will help up to 5,000 Canadian farmers. It also addressed the question of those having to phase out of agriculture to seek alternative employment. This program has been very useful in the farming of tobacco in London—Middlesex.

The Government is committed to introducing legislation to establish farm debt review panels to provide advice and assistance in restructuring farmers' debt. We also think that this will have an effect on private lenders. So far the complaint has been that nothing could be done because FCC would not move and would not accept any compromise. Now it will be different.

FCC has a lot of experience in working with independent groups like the debt review boards. FCC has its own network of appeal boards. Those boards are composed of farmers and they can make recommendations to FCC about specific cases which are presented to them. Working with debt review boards will put FCC on the same footing as other lenders. I think its influence will be positive on the over-all process of debt revision. FCC will be able to accommodate all sorts of recommendations from these boards and set-asides are only part of what can be suggested to lenders. I am sure that the Hon. Member for Peace River will be happy to hear that.

There are also write-offs, debt forgiveness, interest reductions and anything positive that is acceptable to both lenders and borrowers. Debt review boards will greatly help farmers facing insolvency. If there is a realistic and feasible solution, they will try to use it. This is very important because the farmers of the country know that the Government is developing plans and wants to listen to them. They will be looking for voluntary arrangements between farmers and their creditors. The Farm Credit Corporation will lend its full support and expertise to this new process to ensure its success.

I thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity to speak today on behalf of the farmers of Canada who know that the Government is providing leadership for them.

Mr. Rossi: Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the Hon. Member for London—Middlesex (Mr. Clifford) probably, but not intentionally, misinformed the House when he stated, while reading his text word for word, that the Hon. Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria)—

[English]

—whom he hasn't seen in the House today—

[Translation]

—was present—

An Hon. Member: He isn't in the House.

Mr. Rossi: This is a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It's in the blues.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please.

Mr. Rossi: Just ask the Member if he said it. Ask the Member.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please!

Mr. Rossi: The Member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) was here and he spoke during Private Members' Hour, too. He was not absent all day. The Member said that he had not seen him all day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. Order!

Mr. Rossi: Check the "blues".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): If the Hon. Member for London—Middlesex (Mr. Clifford) did say that, it is improper. However, I will check the "blues" and I am sure that we can resolve this.

Mr. Clifford: I did not say that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the Hon. Member for Humboldt—Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) on debate.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Humboldt—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, Private Members' Hour is a time when private Members bring forward ideas on which they hope the Government will pick up. That is what the Member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) has done today through the motion which we are debating. The motion has two parts and I would like to review them. The first part is asking that amendments be made to the Farm Credit Act to allow the Farm Credit Corporation to set aside a portion of the debt held by the corporation, of proven farm managers, for a set period of time without interest or charges.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. The day was wonderful until just a few minutes ago. I do not know what has happened. I hope that the House will listen to the Hon. Member for Humboldt—Lake Centre (Mr. Althouse) who, I know, has a few choice words to contribute to the debate.

Mr. Althouse: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. This is a two-part motion, as I was saying. The first part calls for an amendment to the Farm Credit Act to allow the FCC to set aside a portion of the debt held by the corporation, of proven farm managers, for a set period of time without interest or charges.

I have some doubt that this kind of amendment is necessary. Section 11.(1)(e) of the Farm Credit Act provides that the Farm Credit Corporation may:

—make compositions or schemes of arrangement, grant extensions of time, accept other security in substitution for any security held by the Corporation and revise, amend or re-negotiate any mortgage or other agreement;

I think that in those broadly stated objectives, purposes, and powers, the corporation already has the power to do the kind of thing which the Hon. Member for Peace River indicates in his motion he wishes it to be enabled to do. However, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) and the Cabinet have not seen fit to provide, by regulation, the power to carry out that part of the corporation's mandate. That is really what is at issue. In fact, that is what has become the issue throughout the farm financial crisis in Canada for those farmers who are borrowing money from the Farm Credit Corporation. The fact is that the Government has not lived up to promises as expected. It has not provided the services which it promised during the election. It has not put real action behind its words.

We were promised that there would be debt review boards. There was a debt review process in Bruce County and, as a result of that, we discovered that lending institutions could not agree on what sort of debt review process should be followed. As a consequence, nothing has happened. According to the Act, the Minister could provide regulations to enable the corporation to make compositions or schemes of arrangement, grant extensions of time, accept other security in substitution, etc. The Minister prefers, instead, to do nothing.

A very good job has been done of making politics out of the issue. Some 40,000 farmers in Canada are under the gun, being faced with foreclosure or being pushed off the farm. FCC has been instructed by the Minister to put a moratorium on those foreclosures pending the action of the Minister and the Government. In several speeches the Minister promised action on the debt review process. He promised that the legislation would be before the House and dealt with before Christmas. That was in the now famous speech in which he said that it would be good legislation, that it would address the problem, and that it would be legislation with teeth.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) took up the clarion call when he brought down the Budget. He said that it is the intention of the Government, under the Budget, to put before the House a system of debt review panels to handle the problem of farmers facing bankruptcy and to provide for composition of debt, etc. That was part of the budget statement. So we had the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Finance both reiterating a campaign promise. At the end of April we had the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) jumping into the act with his now famous agricultural statement which included a promise that the legislation would be in place not before Christmas but before June. Today we are debating a motion presented by an equally frustrated Member of Parliament, another private Member of this House, a Member from Peace River who is, as we are, getting a little tired of waiting. I think he hopes that with his motion he might twist the tails of the three very reliable gentlemen I have just mentioned so that we will have legislation in time to act before the end of June.

It is not that the House is overburdened these days. We are going to be running out of business some three-quarters of an hour before the normal time today. However, it is very difficult to deal with a piece of business that has not yet been drafted and placed before the House. If the Bill is going to be drafted properly to deal with the whole range of financial problems farmers face, it will have to deal with much more than just farmers who have loans from the Farm Credit Corporation. It is going to have to deal with farm loans from all kinds of credit institutions. It is going to have to treat farmers in a manner not too much different from the way it treats the rest of society so that we do not have unnecessary conflict between sectors. It has to be fair and presented in time for a thoughtful response, not only from Parties in the House but from the farmers affected and the lending institutions as well.

This issue has been before the House for the last six or seven years. A couple of Ministers responsible for consumer and corporate affairs were going to include a system of handling debt review for farmers and fishermen as part of the new revised bankruptcy law. An agreement was reached just before the last Parliament ended which seemed to have the acceptance of the financial community and others concerned. However, that legislation has not been reintroduced and I think we would be better served, even though I understand the frustration of the Hon. Member for Peace River, by some real draft legislation presented to the House in time for us to give it the thoughtful consideration it needs so we can act instead of continuing to talk about this particular issue.

Mr. Roger Clinch (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the motion put forward by the Hon. Member for Peace River (Mr. Cooper) reflects his great interest in the farming community, not only in Peace River but across the country. His motion calls for amendments to the Farm Credit Act to allow the FCC to set aside a portion of the debt owed to it by farmers. Farm finance, as you know, has been a priority for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) since he took office. His actions have been a reflection of this concern. The FCC will be given the ability to set aside a portion of debts.

On April 30, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) himself stated the Government's commitment to the question of farm bankruptcy. He said the Government would introduce legislation on this matter. The same day the Minister of Agriculture emphasized that commitment and added that he was determined to get Royal Assent for this legislation before the end of June.

This legislation, which has been worked out in co-operation with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Côté), will allow for the creation of debt review panels across Canada. Those panels will be composed of financial and agricultural experts. They will advise farmers on the reduction of their debt and help them make alternative arrangements with their creditors. Estimates are that between 4,000 and 8,000 farmers will benefit from the establishment of such farm debt review boards.

There are many other things I would like to add in this debate but my time is very limited. In closing I will add that the FCC will not only be able to set aside a portion of these debts, but it will also be able to accommodate most of the recommendations made by the debt review boards. The FCC will not act alone, but its ability to meet the recommendations may be an incentive for private lenders to be more flexible.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 42(1), this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 66 deemed to have been moved.

MINES AND MINING—GRIFFITH MINE CLOSURE—INVITATION TO MINISTER TO VISIT EAR FALLS. (B) EMPLOYMENT PROSPECTS IN AREA

Mr. John Parry (Kenora—Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, my submission in the adjournment debate today arises from a response by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) to a question I posed to him on April 28. Before I go into the specific points of dissatisfaction with this response, I think it will be valuable to place on the record the background and subject matter of my question.

Briefly, it concerns the denial of a tax remission to the laid-off workers of the Griffith Mine, particularly those living in the Ear Falls area. The fundamental dissatisfaction those people have lies with what the Government had promised, quite unsolicited, and which is now being left undelivered in this particular case. I would like to quote a couple of statements by the Minister of Finance because I think they are germane to the matter and relevant to a full understanding of it. In the November 8, 1984 Economic Statement, at page 101 of Hansard, the Minister of Finance stated:

> The consequences of closures are particularly severe for workers in communities where alternative employment opportunities are limited or simply do not exist.
> We intend to offer tax relief for termination benefits in these circumstances and will consult with those affected before determining the precise form of assistance.

Further to that, on November 16, 1984, I directed this question to the Minister of State for Mines (Mr. Layton):

> If in fact the mine does close, will the Government ensure that assistance similar to that given to the mines recently closed in Quebec will be given to this area?

The reply by the Minister:

> Without question, Mr. Speaker!

Quoting now from the Budget Speech of May 23, 1985, the Minister of Finance reiterates the basis for granting tax remissions in closure situations of isolated communities. At page 5017 of Hansard he said:

> Tax relief for severance compensation will be offered on a case-by-case basis, to employees affected by a company closure in isolated communities.

• (1720)

This was essentially a reiteration in a slightly different form of the Minister's previous commitment. Late in March of this year, when in Hamilton in the middle of a media scrum, the Minister was asked by a CBC reporter as to whether the Government was granting the tax remission to the laid-off Griffith Mine workers. The Minister stated, in that most inappropriate forum, that no, the Government had no plan to grant such a remission.

Following that surprising revelation, which went completely contrary to everything that the Minister's officials had communicated to myself and to my office up to that time, I attempted on, I believe, three occasions to get a commitment from the Minister to reconsider that decision, as it apparently was, in light of the facts. I had great difficulty securing that commitment, and, in fact, only yesterday did I secure the commitment from the Minister in a meeting.

The reply of the Minister to a question by my colleague, the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) contained some enlightening statements. The Minister cited Campbell Red Lake Mines as being an employer in the area that could be expected to employ people being laid off at the Griffith Mine. The fact was that, having done a survey of the major employers in the area, we found that Campbell Red Lake Mine was planning to employ, at most, two people in the next year or so.

That indicated to us that the Minister had been misinformed as to the facts. After a question in the House, and after questioning the Minister at committee, he finally did put down the criteria under which he rejected a remission for the housing compensation at Ear Falls. It was in the form of a letter to me, and not in the form of a copy of any policy or regulation formally adopted by his Ministry.

Understandably, people do, in good faith, rely on statements made by Ministers. The people at Red Lake and Ear Falls were very angry about the refusal to grant this submission. They sent an invitation to the Minister to come and see their area and to point out to them where the employment opportunities were. I think they have been as irritated, as I have, by the Minister's refusal on two occasions to answer the particular question as to whether he would accept an invitation, and also by the feeling that misleading information was given concerning employment prospects in the area. That is what we would like an answer to.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in response to the Hon. Member for Kenora—Rainy River (Mr. Parry), perhaps we should look at the situation from a different angle. First of all I would point out that earlier this week the Minister, along with the Hon. Member, spoke to some of the employee representatives about tax remission for severance benefits.

Mr. Speaker, let there be no misunderstanding about the situation of the Griffith Mine as compared with what happened in the town of Gagnon, and about what the Hon. Member said a moment ago. We indicated in various documents and publications that a community widely affected by economic woes might be eligible for tax relief for severance benefits. And the town of Gagnon, as the Hon. Member for Kenora—Rainy River certainly knows, was destroyed not by fire, but by bulldozers. In my opinion, this is completely different from the situation, which is nevertheless unfortunate, of the workers of the Griffith Mine.

In December 1985, 66 employees of this mine had already found work either in Ear Falls or in neighboring communities. The economy of those municipalities is healthy. The situation of the Griffith Mine workers is therefore completely different from what was expected and described in certain documents in November 1984 or at other times.

Mr. Speaker, I think that we have to differentiate between the two situations. The Income Tax Act already contains specific provisions for severance benefits.

You are indicating that my allotted time is over, Mr. Speaker, and I thank you.

ROAD SAFETY—SCHOOL BUS EQUIPMENT AND STANDARDS

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Last April 8 I asked the Hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski):

What part does the federal Government play with regard to the safety of equipment on school buses which carry Canada's greatest treasure, namely, our girls and boys? Is any co-ordination being carried out leading to uniformity in equipment and operations in the provinces?

The Hon. Minister of Transport replied:

—Transport Canada provides the design, manufacturing and functioning standards for school buses in Canada. There are some 35 standards. They are monitored and inspected on a regular basis by the Transport Canada Road Safety Directorate. As far as provincial safety equipment is concerned, that is co-ordinated under the CCMTA—

I commend Transport Canada on the standards for design and manufacturing of school buses in Canada. The Canadian system of federal standards for bus construction is the envy of our neighbours in the U.S.A. where standards are set state by state. As a matter of fact, accident data indicates that school buses are the safest means of transporting students to and from school. The latest available Canadian analysis entitled "School Bus Accident Study" concluded that a student is eight times more likely to be injured while travelling to and from school in a vehicle other than a school bus.

The 35 federal safety standards referred to by the Minister include the assurance that the school buses are constructed with increased body joint strength, improved window retention, better fuel system integrity and improved occupant protection.

Today, however, I would like to deal with the other aspect of school buses, namely, their operation and what happens outside of the school bus: things like the best known method of loading and unloading school children, school bus driver training and optional safety lighting systems that would enhance the safety of school children and the drivers who drive in front of or behind school buses. Every province has its own method of protecting the boys and girls who ride in school buses. In Alberta, school jurisdictions have autonomy in public transportation. Some other provinces have a central authority with a mandate to address school bus safety. Consequently, there is a lack of uniform operating procedures within the provinces. This is in contrast to the United States where there have been several federal initiatives to standardize bus operations and to institute driver training programs.

Standardizing bus operations is at least as important as standardizing bus construction. U.S. accident statistics show that for every child killed as a bus occupant, three children are killed outside of the bus, either by the bus itself or by a passing motorist. Canadian accident data collected by an organization known as "Bus Us Safely" show that on a percentage per capita basis, Canadian school children have twice the fatality rate of their American counterparts.

Our provincial Governments are doing something about this; for instance, in Alberta the Hon. Marvin Moore, Minister of Highways, gave notice in 1985 that while the school bus driver improvement program was voluntary, it would be made mandatory if sufficient numbers of drivers do not receive the training. It is already mandatory in Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and perhaps in other provinces. The Department is examining the proposal of a film to increase the awareness of the student's responsibility while a passenger on a school bus and when leaving a bus.

The penalty for offences relating to school buses varies in Alberta and in other provinces. It is the Government's intention to ensure that the penalties for infractions are realistic. There is also a requirement that a school bus operator, wherever the bus stops to load or unload passengers, must activate the flashing lights, and the only exception to this is in large cities where the matter is under the jurisdiction of the city council. A number of provinces only have the four light system.

• (1730)

While the Canadian Conference of Motor Transport Administrators endeavour to co-ordinate matters, there is a limit to their authority. There is a place for the federal Government to provide leadership by co-ordinating the areas of operations as has been done in the area of construction.

As I said at the beginning, our school buses carry the most valuable cargo in Canada—our boys and girls—and we should go the second mile to make sure that not one of these children is killed or injured unnecessarily.

Mr. Bernard Valcourt (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the expression of concern about this important area of safety is appreciated. The opportunity to report on the status of school bus safety is most timely in view of current public interest in this subject.

Accident data indicates that school buses are the safest means of transporting students to and from school. The 1978 Transport Canada report entitled "School Bus Accident Study", concluded that a student is eight times more likely to be injured while travelling to or from school in a vehicle other than a school bus.

There are, at present, a total of 35 federal safety standards which are applicable to school buses. New safety standards for school buses were introduced in 1980. These ensure that school buses will be constructed with increased body joint strength, improved window retention, better fuel system integrity and improved occupant protection. Because of the special nature of the passengers, that is the physical size range, the protection of children in an accident is accomplished by passive means and depends on high, padded, energy absorbing seats to provide a safe compartment for the child. It should be noted that the safety standards apply to new school buses at the time of their original manufacture.

The on-road use of the buses comes under provincial jurisdiction and usually encompasses items such as driver training, bus maintenance and loading and unloading procedures. Federal and provincial school bus regulations are co-ordinated through the Canadian Conference of Motor Transport Administrators. This organization formulates policy recommendations for adoption by the Council of Federal and Provincial Ministers responsible for Transportation and Highway Safety.

The safety of school children while riding a school bus is of the utmost importance. Transport Canada continually reviews and revises, when necessary, any regulations that could improve this safety. The Department is also conducting research programs, including full scale crash tests, to investigate potential means of upgrading the safety of school bus occupants.

NATIONAL REVENUE—HOLSTEIN RESEARCH PROJECT EXPENDITURES. (B) APPROVAL OF PROJECT

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on May 16 I put a question to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. MacKay), asking why the Government of Canada continues spending $10 million through the Scientific Research Tax Credit to Dreamstreet Limited, a group of wealthy Wall Street investors.

This research project has been soundly condemned by the Holstein Friesian Association of Canada which says that it is not acceptable. The University of Guelph has turned it down. I have a letter signed by Dr. Kenneth E. Leslie, the Ontario Ministry of Agriculture Food Dairy Co-ordinator. He reviewed the Dreamstreet Redgen project for determining the physiological differences and profitability of the red and white Holstein 1986. He said:

> Generally, the protocol has poorly defined objectives, superficial background documentation, inadequate experimental methods and an ambiguous approach to analysis.

He goes on to say:

> The motives of this project clearly extend beyond the objectives of the study and the methods are very suspect.

• (1735)

Beyond that, the Co-ordinator of Research for the Government of Canada has condemned the project as being something from which people would only walk away. The Ontario Minister of Agriculture and Food has also condemned the project as useless. The question is who has put the pressure on the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Wise) to cause the Government to continue the spending of $10 million? By some reports it may be as high as $50 million over the next 10 years for this project, which seems to have no scientific benefit. People in the dairy industry are offended. They just cannot believe that at the same time the Government is making cut-backs on scientific research by the Agriculture Canada Research Establishment, it is doling out at least $10 million to a group of wealthy investors, supposedly for some purpose, perhaps to raise operating funds for Dreamstreet International, which seems to be having some financial cash flow problems.

I tried to find out from the Minister of National Revenue who is putting the pressure on the Government to keep this thing going and who put the pressure on the Government to get the project approved in the first place. The information we have is that the project was turned down by the Department at least three or four times before it was finally approved by the Minister last November. There seems to be a great deal of political pressure either from the Minister's Office, or from some place, but the Minister essentially just stonewalled. He said he could not give me the information because of the confidentiality of the Income Tax Act. We are not asking about the financial details. We are asking about the scientific value of this project.

The Canadian dairy industry, especially in southwestern Ontario, is really getting fed up with the way in which the Government is handling this affair. It is doling out millions of dollars for a research project which is of no scientific value, yet it is cutting back on Government-sponsored research. The Standing Committee on Agriculture has decided to proceed with hearings. We hope to subpoena Frank Wood, the head of Dreamstreet, who is obviously running this project, as well as other Government officials. I hope in responding tonight the Parliamentary Secretary will be able to clarify these points.

Why does the Government support this project? Why is it spending millions of dollars to establish the largest dairy herd in Canada, which will be paid for by the taxpayers of Canada and ultimately owned by a group of wealthy investors in New York City? It just does not make sense for our Government to do this. The farmers in southwestern Ontario are very upset when they see these moneys being spent for some purpose, we know not what, other than scientific research and the production of dairy cattle.

It is up to the Parliamentary Secretary to lay it all out, to explain exactly who put the pressure on the Minister to get this project approved originally and who keeps the thing going. Obviously the scientific community and the dairy industry are very unapproving of this project, yet the Government continues to spend taxpayers' money on it.

Mr. Bernard Valcourt (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, it takes some gall for a Member of the Liberal Party to rise in this House today and criticize the Government for having to apply the SRTCs which have ripped off Canadian taxpayers of hundreds of thousands of dollars. If the farmers of southwestern Ontario are upset about this research, perhaps the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) could tell those people that it was his Party, while in Government, which introduced those SRTCs. That is the short answer to the Hon. Member's question.

• (1740)

The long answer is this. There is no one placing pressure on the Minister. The point is that when we took office, we had to deal with this terrible and incomprehensible device of the Liberal Government.

With respect to research being conducted under the SRTC program, it was not possible to cut off that research and grandfather the program for those conducting legitimate research. The way the Hon. Member speaks, it is as if he wishes to undermine this program. That is what he seems to be saying. The Hon. Member knows full well that provisions of the Income Tax Act preclude the Minister, or anyone in his Department, from talking about individual taxpayers. Therefore I cannot say that what the Hon. Member suggests is in fact happening. It is not a matter in the public domain.

What I can tell the Hon. Member is that under this program which the Liberals devised, and which we had to stop, it was not necessary for taxpayers to seek approval for projects, although they could request an opinion or a binding advance income tax ruling based upon plans prescribed by them. Such requests would be dealt with on an impartial basis between the taxpayer, or his representatives, and the Department. I must stress that the program was structured to encourage research without pre-approval by any ministry.

In the great wisdom of the Liberal Party, it should have foreseen this when we established such a law. To ask today that we put an end to it completely and thereby punish legitimate researchers is something we cannot do.

When the Deputy Minister, Mr. Rogers, appeared before the committee, he explained what had been done in terms of the measures taken to protect Canadians. That includes placing funds in escrow, since these matters will keep cropping up in years to come because research is still being carried out.

The short answer to the question is that there is no one putting pressure on the Minister. We just have to live with this Liberal strategem which has ripped millions of dollars off Canadian taxpayers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 3(1).

TRADE

NECESSITY FOR GOVERNMENT TO PUBLISH ALL DOCUMENTS CONCERNING FREE TRADE NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): The day before yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the Government released part of the studies on the negative and positive consequences of the free trade negotiations.

Mr. Speaker, the document reveals that one of the consequences would be the loss of 131,000 jobs over the next ten years.

The consequences would be negative over the next ten years, particularly in Quebec, owing to the province's industrial structure and the fact that the Government would stand to lose $3.5 billion in revenue which it would have to offset through higher income taxes.

But what is most scandalous about these documents is that the Government has chosen to suppress and hide some of the significant information which Canadians have the right to know.

Mr. Speaker, all Members of the House of Commons ought to demand that the Government table these documents and let Canadians know exactly what the positive and negative consequences might be.

Mr. Speaker, it is nonsense to claim that the Government, anxious to withhold information on the negotiations—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The sixty seconds have expired.

APARTHEID

SOUTH AFRICA—CALL FOR ACTION BY COMMONWEALTH

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, the softly-softly, quietly-quietly, and completely inappropriately named constructive engagement approach has not worked with South Africa. There can no longer be any doubt that Mr. Botha intends to defend the racist system of apartheid at all costs. The Commonwealth could receive no clearer message than was provided this week with the attacks on Zimbabwe, Zambia, and Botswana, and the promise of further action.

Canada and all Commonwealth countries must act now with strong measures that will leave Mr. Botha with little doubt that freedom-loving people will no longer tolerate his racist regime. If the Prime Minister's (Mr. Mulroney) fine words of last October are to mean anything, in the face of Britain's obstinate refusal to act Canada must provide the leadership necessary for the Commonwealth to develop a timely and forceful response, even if without Great Britain.

INSURANCE

DIFFICULTIES IN SECURING LIABILITY COVERAGE

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, the difficulty some companies and public sector organizations are having in obtaining liability insurance is by no means unique to Fraser Valley East. Many organizations throughout the country appear to be having similar problems. Possible solutions most frequently mentioned to alleviate these problems are Government actions to limit court awards, to control premium rates, and to enter into the reinsurance or insurance business directly.

Many people look to the federal Government to take action on this serious problem. However, due to constitutional decisions, the role of the federal Government in the regulation of insurance is limited to establishing financial and solvency standards for federally incorporated or registered companies. Matters such as contract provisions, their interpretation, and regulation of premium rates fall under provincial jurisdiction. I urge the federal Government to continue its co-ordinating role in bringing together the provincial Governments in order to deal with this important issue.

AGRICULTURE

GOVERNMENT PERFORMANCE

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, our farmers have been faced with major problems for many years. However, since the election of our Government, they have regained confidence in the future and they are looking forward to the coming crop year with unprecedented optimism.

They are right to be optimistic as our Government continues to take action to put back the farm sector back on a solid base. This week, the Farm Credit Corporation announced the second reduction of its interest rates in two months.

Farmers in Canada and the Beauce can now benefit from five-year fixed term loans at a rate of 10.75 per cent. For ten-year fixed term loans, the rate has been reduced from 11.5 to 11 per cent. Finally, shared risk mortgage rates have also been reduced.

Mr. Speaker, many Beauce farmers have told me that this Government has done more to help farmers in 20 months than the previous Liberal Government had done in 20 years. We shall continue to work tirelessly for our farmers. The Conservatives view agriculture as a priority in Canada.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

JAIL SENTENCE IMPOSED ON COMPANY PRESIDENT FOR DUMPING TOXIC CHEMICALS

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, it is important to put on record the fact that two days ago the president of a plating firm in North York was sentenced to a year in jail for dumping toxic chemicals and warned he will face a penitentiary term unless he moves immediately to stop polluting the Metropolitan Toronto sewer system. In convicting Jetco and its President, Keith Alexander, Mr. Justice Montgomery said he was issuing a clear message to this and other polluters—clean up or close up. Judge Montgomery fined Jetco $200,000 and said that, in addition to the one-year term, Mr. Alexander will face an additional month of imprisonment for every day he delays a decision to undertake a major works program to comply with the law and the order of the court, to a maximum of 15 months.

Noting evidence that Jetco had already been fined $97,950 for 69 convictions of breaking Metro's anti-pollution by-law, Judge—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Sixty seconds.

FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

REDUCTIONS IN INTEREST RATES

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Mr. Speaker, the Farm Credit Corporation just announced a further reduction in its mortgage rate. For the second time in less than two months these rates have been cut back as a direct result of the Government's economic policies. Under the Commodity-Based Loan Program, the rate on partially indexed loans will be reduced from 8 3/4 per cent to 8 1/2 per cent. On fully indexed loans the rate will remain at 6 per cent. Farm syndicate loans are available at 10.75 per cent instead of 11 per cent.

Earlier this month the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) again confirmed the Government's commitment to agriculture with his announcement on immediate aid to farmers. At the same time we are world leaders in working toward long-term solutions to the international farm crisis. This Government has done more for farmers in 20 months than the previous Government did in 20 years, and we will continue to work for our farmers for many years to come.

STATUS OF WOMEN

ANNIVERSARY OF SECURING FRANCHISE

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow marks the sixty-eighth anniversary of Canadian women winning the federal vote. This anniversary of women's suffrage is a time to celebrate women's achievements, it is also a time to reflect on the progress our society has made toward the goal of equality between men and women.

There have been some improvements in the status of women and Canadian women are proud of their accomplishments. Women fought for and won the equality provisions in the Charter of Rights. Women have emerged as a driving force in the creation of jobs in the small business sector. Women now occupy positions of influence in the professions and politics.

However, these gains will remain symbolic as long as average Canadian women continue to face inequality in their daily lives. Parliament must pursue the principle and the promise of equality vigorously. There can be no further delay, there must be action for equality now. One challenge that all three Parties must meet is to elect more women to Canadian Legislatures.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

STRUGGLE AGAINST ACID RAIN

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday, the Special Committee on Acid Rain heard the evidence of Mr. Paul Hansen, Environment Canada acid rain advisor who also works for the Isaak Walton League, one of the most respected environmental groups in the United States.

Before the Members of the Committee, Mr. Hansen stated that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) had done a lot to make the issue of acid rain progress politically in the United States. He also added that the battle against acid rain will be won only when American public opinion realizes the seriousness of the problem.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, I ask that, during the coming summer season all Canadians who visit the United States or who receive American tourists tell our southern neighbors about our concerns in this regard and point out that their intervention is essential if we want to win this fight and improve the quality of life for the citizens of both countries.

THE ECONOMY

BANK RATE REDUCTION

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Bank of Canada announced another reduction in its bank rate. Today the rate fell by 16 basis points and is now fixed at 8.43 per cent. This represents a drop of nearly 4 per cent since the election of our Government roughly 20 months ago.

Events are now unfolding as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) said they would. Interest rates are down, unemployment is down, the dollar is strengthening, and the economic outlook for Canada has not been this good in years. Yesterday's further drop in interest rates will be welcomed by the business community, by consumers, and by Governments, all of whom have seen their borrowing costs reduced dramatically since the election of our Government in September, 1984.

The Opposition doomsters and gloomsters can holler and criticize to their hearts' content. The Canadian public has shown more sense and has chosen to participate in this recovery rather than wallow in criticism and faultfinding, as do the Liberals and the NDP.

EXTERNAL AID

AFRICAN RELIEF—SPONSORSHIP OF RACE RUNNERS

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, in Ottawa this Sunday, under the aegis of UNICEF, a special run will take place. A Race Against Time/Sport Aid will raise money which will go to organizations involved in African relief. One-shot deals to relieve African famine are not enough. We need to have long-term plans which we can work out with the people concerned in Africa.

I hope Members of this House will agree to sponsor one of the many runners and will pledge some money here on the Hill. The organizers of the race will select a young student for Members who will carry their pledges through the course. If Members are on the Hill this Sunday morning at 11 a.m., they can then pick a winner and run the race. If not they can join the Minister for External Relations (Mrs. Vezina) and sponsor her racer. Members may join her on Monday at three o'clock after Question Period, with that student.

HEALTH

PHARMACISTS QUIT SELLING TOBACCO AND CIGARETTES

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, we have witnessed one more example of co-operation between the private sector and our Government. In line with the concern expressed by the Hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Epp), some well-advised business people from the Quebec city area, more specifically one of our oldest pharmaceutical supply distribution companies, have decided to stop selling cigarettes and tobacco.

Our Government has stated emphatically everywhere, supported by many Canadians, that tobacco use is detrimental to health. Our initiative will benefit the Canadian public generally, Mr. Speaker. It will reduce the costs incurred for hospitalization later on and help us reduce the deficit we have inherited from the Liberals.

We are a multifaceted Government: no area escapes our scrutiny. This is the way we are planning to overcome the Liberals' stagnation. I say thank you to the corporations which trust and support us. Our congratulations to the Brunet pharmacies in the Quebec city area.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

PROMOTION OF SLOWPOKE NUCLEAR REACTORS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, at a time when public consciousness around the world has been dramatically alerted to the hazards of nuclear power generation Atomic Eneregy of Canada has been promoting the use, particularly in small northern communities, of its Slowpoke reactor energy system.

John Hilborn, designer of the original Slowpoke, speaking at a 1981 meeting of the Canadian Nuclear Society, said the following:

It is now well known that people will accept frequent, small disasters more readily than rare catastrophes.

• (1115)

In line with this twisted reasoning, AECL is now attempting to flog the Slowpoke energy system, with reactors some 100 to 1,000 times the size of the prototype model, as able to operate for weeks at a time without human supervision.

The sheer idiocy of even considering the commercial operation of such generating reactors, with fallible pumps, valves, and plumbing, without constant human monitoring and attendance, shows how far AECL officials have divorced themselves from reality in their desperate scramble to market their wares without concern for public safety.

TRADE

IMPOSITION OF U.S. TARIFF ON CANADIAN CEDAR SHAKES AND SHINGLES

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, this situation is utterly ridiculous. At the very beginning of trade talks with the United States, the Prime Minister's friend, President Reagan, by his own act and his own hand, imposes a 35 per cent tariff on cedar shakes and shingles from Canada. This is putting $250 million worth of exports and perhaps thousands of jobs in British Columbia in jeopardy. Will the Prime Minister tell us, in view of his relationship, whether he had advance notice of this action by the President and, if so, what steps were taken to head it off? If he did not, how can that be explained?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the action announced by the U.S. administration is, in our judgment, unfair and unjustified. The action taken by the administration is at variance with all the undertakings provided by President Reagan at Quebec City and in Washington. As my hon. friend knows, I have tried to place Canadian-American relations on a friendly footing and I will tell my hon. friend that actions like this make it extremely difficult for anyone, including Canadians, to be friends with the Americans from time to time.

REQUEST THAT FREE TRADE NEGOTIATIONS BE SUSPENDED

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to hear the Prime Minister's response. Now I suggest that that rhetoric has to be backed up by some action. Surely the immediate retaliatory action would be to suspend the bilateral negotiations until this tariff is removed. Would the Prime Minister not agree that that would be the appropriate remedy?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): No, I do not, Mr. Speaker. That would be an action inspired by petulance. This is too serious a matter to respond in that way. I have conveyed to the President of the United States the view of our Government, and I am sure of all Canadians, that the action he has taken is pure protectionism, exactly the thing that he undertook to fight against in Washington and Quebec City, and in all his statements affecting Canada.

It is bizarre that this action should have been taken as we are honestly and openly trying to initiate what could possibly be the elimination of tariff barriers between our countries with a view to bringing about mutual benefits for both our nations. Therefore, this action by the United States of America is very, very inappropriate and totally inconsistent with what the President and the administration have said vis-à-vis Canada. We will provide an appropriate response.

Mr. Johnston: It is not pure petulance to take steps to protect the interests of the Province of British Columbia.

EFFECT ON BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister not agree that, if this action remains in place, British Columbia will become the artificial lamb on the altar of free trade in these negotiations?

• (1120)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there will be no "lambs", artificial or sacrificial, on the table of any negotiations. In point of fact it is our hope that the broader bilateral table of negotiations will allow both sides to conduct themselves in a non-protectionist mode.

My hon. friend is aware of the grievous pressures which have been building up in Washington, a vote yesterday in the House, debilitating protectionist initiatives by the droves, by the dozens down there, many of them designed to hit other countries but specifically impacting negatively upon Canada and Canadian jobs. It is because this kind of action can have such a damaging effect in British Columbia and elsewhere that we have initiated a broader scope negotiation designed to free both countries from these kinds of incidents which impact so unfavourably on both of us.

I can tell my hon. friend that we are examining very carefully all actions designed to help British Columbia and Canada which can be taken in this area.

[Translation]

FREE-TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—PARTICIPATION OF PROVINCES—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. Following the conference held in Halifax last November, a press release was issued by the Prime Minister's Office indicating that the Ministers had agreed to implement, within 90 days, the principle of full provincial participation in the process of free-trade talks. It will soon be 180 days since the conference was held. Could the Prime Minister inform the House why the federal-provincial conference, called as a result of pressure by the provincial Premiers, is 90 days late, and why the federal Government has allowed negotiations with the United States to begin, without first deciding on the formula or mechanism for full provincial participation in the negotiating process?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the Hon. Member has been following developments with respect to federal-provincial consultations on international trade, he must be aware that there have been five meetings of officials of the various governments, where considerable progress was made and a substantial consensus was reached on the approach to these negotiations and on certain substantive issues. There will be a meeting between the Prime Minister of Canada and the provincial Premiers, because we have now reached the point where we believe that a discussion with the Premiers is likely to result, for the first time in Canada's history, in an effective mechanism for full provincial participation in a negotiating process.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is becoming long.

INQUIRY WHY GOVERNMENT BEGAN NEGOTIATIONS WITHOUT PARTICIPATION OF PROVINCES AND WHETHER CONTRIBUTION OF FRANCOPHONES WILL BE INCREASED

Mr. Raymond Garneau (Laval-des-Rapides): Mr. Speaker, since, according to the studies that have been tabled, free trade may prove to be a disaster for Quebec as far as jobs are concerned, could the Secretary of State for External Affairs inform the House why, in that case, the Government has started negotiations without having either Quebec or the other provinces at the negotiating table or involving them in the process, and when he is going to meet the commitment he made to increasing francophone participation on the federal negotiating team?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the studies published by the Canadian Government have clearly shown that various results are possible with these negotiations. We have indicated that if there were to be a loss of Canadian jobs, no agreement will be signed by the Canadian Government. We are here to ensure that we will have a situation where, first of all, Canada is protected against actions such as the recent action taken by the President of the United States, and second, where we can provide the basis for a flourishing economy and provide job security for all Canadians, in Quebec and elsewhere.

[English]

IMPOSITION OF DUTY BY UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It goes back to the incredible decision made by President Reagan himself to sacrifice some 4,000 jobs in British Columbia as a result of an unfair duty imposed by the President himself. Considering that the duty had nothing to do with unfair trade practices and that it was imposed by the President himself, and having nothing to do with Congress, is the President not sending a clear message to the Prime Minister, namely, where Americans cannot compete with Canadians, then Canadians will not be allowed by the Americans to have access to their market?

• (1125)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would not disagree with that construction.

REQUEST THAT FREE TRADE TALKS BE DISCONTINUED

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the Prime Minister, perhaps belatedly, now sees that the Americans are tough bargainers and have been getting away with much too much in the past year in dealing with the present Government of Canada.

Is the Prime Minister now inclined to agree that the position taken by President Reagan is in fact a complete denial of all the promises that he has made to the Prime Minister which will result in the loss of 4,000 jobs, according to industry spokespersons in British Columbia with whom I spoke this morning? Will he not get on the phone today to the President and, in firm but minimal language in terms of rhetoric, say to the President: "We will not continue with free trade talks as long as this kind of hypocritical action remains in place"?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not learn belatedly that the Americans are tough bargainers. I have known all my life that the Americans are tough bargainers. We finally have a Government in Canada which is a tough bargainer itself.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: We know that. I have said many times that I expected all kinds of difficulties to emerge during the life of these negotiations. With $150 billion of commerce back and forth every year it could not be otherwise. We will have difficulties from the beginning to the end. The easy thing would have been not to initiate these kinds of negotiations. The difficult thing is to embark upon this kind of challenging negotiation which will have its pitfalls and its disappointments, to be sure. I agree with my hon. friend that this one today is an unfavourable signal.

This morning I sent back a clear, direct signal to the President of the United States in regard to the deep concern and the unacceptability of this action to the Government of Canada, as did the Secretary of State for External Affairs confirm the same in a telephone call which he had with Mr. Shultz a few minutes ago.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIME MINISTER'S MESSAGE TO UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, I want to get it clearly from the Prime Minister. Is he telling the House that he spoke directly to the President of the United States? Did he make it clear in that conversation that he regarded this decision by the President of the United States himself to be totally inconsistent with what he had promised he would do? Will the Prime Minister tell the House what the President's reply was? Did the President of the United States say, yes, he was mistaken and he would take corrective action consistent with his public commitment to free trade?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this morning, after meeting with the Archbishop in regard to the South African initiative, I immediately conveyed our views to President Reagan. The Secretary of State for External Affairs spoke directly with Secretary Shultz. We have conveyed our views, and we will be doing so again. We hope that we will be able to take some actions ourselves.

I wish to point out to my friend that the easy thing—and this is not to diminish in any way my disappointment as a Canadian in regard to how this action affects us as it does—is to ask whether this kind of action would affect a Third World country and whether protectionism itself is designed to debilitate economic progress. Protectionism is the refuge of someone who does not ultimately believe in free and freer trade.

Mr. Deans: Are you surprised?

Mr. Mulroney: We believe that freer trade will bring about greater economic opportunities, which is why we will resist this type of protectionism. We will try to prepare an appropriate response for the American administration which will convince them of the folly of this kind of action directed either against a great friend such as Canada or anyone else. This kind of thing is bad news.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADA-UNITED STATES AUTO PACT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, bearing in mind that the Government seems to want to persist in carrying out these negotiations in spite of the American President's blow to the B.C. lumber industry.

The Minister has often claimed that the Auto Pact will not be on the free trade negotiating table, yet yesterday he stated: "We have not released documents that might help the United States in these negotiations". If the Auto Pact is not on the negotiating table, then why has the Government blanked out page after page in the findings and conclusions of its study on the Auto Pact?

• (1130)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will have to find out precisely why those paragraphs were omitted. I cannot recall them precisely. I cannot confirm whether or not they related to the Auto Pact. I can repeat the position of the Government of Canada which is that we have in the Auto Pact an arrangement that works and we see no reason to change it.

REQUEST FOR RELEASE OF FULL STUDY

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, the study in question is entitled "The Automotive Agreement in a Canada-United States Comprehensive Trade Arrangement". Will the Secretary of State undertake to release all the information in those blank pages? The people in the auto industry have a right to know what is on those pages. Will he not agree to this so that we can make sure that those workers will not be sacrificed as the Government seems to be on the verge of sacrificing workers in the British Columbia forest products industry?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will give the Hon. Member two assurances. One is that an arrangement will not be entered into between Canada and the United States that will cause Canadians to lose jobs. The second undertaking I will enter into is that I will not be publishing in the House of Commons information which, if it went into the hands of the Americans, would damage the case of Canada.

I read today in The New York Times that the colleague of the Hon. Member, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Fort Garry, is in active collusion with Members of the United States Congress who are trying to stop the passage of an acid rain Bill.

Some Hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I believe that kind of conduct to be inappropriate to Members of the House—

Mr. Deans: You can't say that.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CANADIAN SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the rhetoric is getting somewhat excessive, I must say. When an Hon. Member is accused of being in active collusion, that is certainly a most unusual way of putting a point of view.

Let me ask the Prime Minister a question about what is now happening. Given yesterday's decision by the President of the United States, is it not now necessary to get a clear, unequivocal, unambiguous statement from the U.S. President with regard to what he stands for, and if Mr. Murphy, his chief negotiator, speaks for him when he refuses to accept Canada's position that our social policies are not on the negotiating table?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Canada's policies are not on the negotiating table. My hon. friend knows that, the House knows that, and the country knows that. We do not have to return to that.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Murphy doesn't know that.

Mr. Mulroney: Well, then, I give you the responsibility of educating Mr. Murphy.

Mr. Broadbent: That's your job.

Mr. Mulroney: That is not my job. My job is to state exactly what I have stated on behalf of the people of Canada which is that the social programs of this country are not on the table, Murphy or no Murphy.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, is it not also the job of the Prime Minister to make sure that, before negotiations start, the people with whom we are negotiating understand and accept that those policies are not on the negotiating table?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, not at all. I am surprised that my hon. friend, who has the same kind of background as I and who is not unfamiliar with negotiating, would make that kind of an assumption.

Mr. Deans: You don't sit down and negotiate with someone who disagrees profoundly with your view.

Mr. Mulroney: That is a school of thought. I am not in any way surprised that the negotiator from the other side would, at the beginning of the negotiations, throw out opinions or—

Mr. Deans: In the context of what he did yesterday.

Mr. Mulroney: —or make statements such as that.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Mulroney: I can simply tell my hon. friend—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Questions and answers should be questions and answers and not discussion.

Mr. Deans: Given that Reagan has lied, given that Reagan has lied to us all the way through—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

U.S. PLAN TO RESUME PRODUCTION OF CHEMICAL WEAPONS

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Associate Minister of National Defence. On January 27 the Secretary of State for External Affairs wrote a letter stating the following:

> Canada's first priority in relation to chemical weapons continues to be to pursue actively at the Conference on Disarmament (CD) in Geneva the conclusion of a complete and verifiable ban on all chemical weapons.

At a NATO meeting in Europe yesterday the Minister of National Defence went along enthusiastically, we are told, with a U.S. plan to resume production of chemical weapons. How can the Minister of National Defence have taken such a decision with no debate in the House and no discussion in committee, at a time when it flies in the face of the responsible decision taken by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to pursue the chemical weapons issue actively at the Conference on Disarmament in Geneva?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the position of this Government on chemical weapons is exactly the same as the position of the previous Government. We fully endorse the position taken in 1970 that Canada will not have chemical weapons, will not use chemical weapons, will not produce them, and will not keep them in store. That remains our position. We adopted that position after the position adopted in 1969 by the United States unilaterally to stop the production of new chemical weapons. In the meantime the Soviets continued with production and have built up their chemical capabilities.

In order to maintain the deterrence which is what NATO is all about—to avoid war—it is deemed prudent by all NATO countries that the U.S. increase or modernize its chemical capability for the maintenance of that deterrence and peace. There is no inconsistency at all. We are carrying on the policies of the previous Government which were endorsed by the Hon. Member.

REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY DEBATE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, Canada is a party to the 1925 Geneva Protocol banning the use of chemical weapons. That was a policy of the previous Government as well. Since the Government has failed to bring forward a White Paper on defence policy, will the Associate Minister of National Defence commit himself and the Government to a debate in the House on such major international issues as this one so that Canadians may learn what is going on?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, there has been some very significant reforms of the rules of the House. There are all kinds of opposition days available, and there are opportunities in committee. I would welcome a debate on defence at any time. If the Hon. Member would approach his House Leader or the members of his Party who deal with these matters, I am sure he would find co-operation on our side. The resistance to which the Hon. Member refers is fictitious.

TRADE

U.S. DUTY ON CANADIAN CEDAR SHINGLES AND SHAKES—CANADA-UNITED STATES NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, this morning the Prime Minister used very frank and tough words about Mr. Reagan's decisions. I have to ask how we are to continue to negotiate free trade with the United States in good faith based on Mr. Reagan's promises when the U.S. President has reversed himself so fundamentally on those promises in the decision he has made?

[Translation]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is highly regrettable that the U.S. Administration should have decided to take the kind of action that was announced late yesterday by the President, because this action is a complete reversal of the policy announced previously in Quebec City and Washington by President Reagan.

That being considered, we intend to look at all the options available to the Canadian Government in the circumstances, and we shall advise our colleagues at the appropriate time. Quite frankly, I must admit that the isolated action announced yesterday by President Reagan is a reversal of all the commitments and measures announced by the U.S. Administration with respect to the Canada-U.S. bilateral trade talks.

[English]

REQUEST FOR DISCONTINUANCE OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, it is not just an isolated example. In fact it is an example of a constant pattern this week of American aggressiveness with respect to our trade position.

[Translation]

And that being considered, I want to ask the Prime Minister: Is it not necessary to do something here in Canada, not just talk but take specific action, such as telling the President: We cannot continue these free trade talks when this kind of decision is being made?

• (1140)

[English]

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend knows that in point of fact this is essentially an isolated action vis-à-vis Canada undertaken by the administration. I think he is aware of the fact that there is in the neighbourhood of a $150 billion to $175 billion, and growing, trade deficit in the United States. President Reagan is indeed a free trader, a defender of free trade down there. He is under enormous pressure and attack every day. It is particularly disconcerting that protectionism appears to have become an issue on which the Democratic Party, or many members of the Democratic Party, will choose to take a stand. Notwithstanding that set of circumstances, this action taken by the President against Canada, for whatever reason, is unjustified and unacceptable and will not be accepted by the Government of Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST THAT REGULATION CHANGES BE REVOKED

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Prime Minister. In view of the hardships suffered across Canada, and in view of the reported suicide of a 32-year army veteran who cited the unemployment insurance changes as one of the reasons for this unfortunate act, would the Prime Minister now agree that the time has come, and the only solution is, to revoke the unfair and cruel changes in respect of unemployment insurance which his Government has brought in?

[Translation]

Hon. Andrée Champagne (Minister of State (Youth)): Mr. Speaker, this is indeed a very sad story, but is it directly related to a Government policy? This has not been proven. In any case, I will take the question as notice and advise my hon. colleague accordingly.

However, I think everyone is aware that the decision was announced in November 1984 and was not implemented until January 1986, and that the policy was referred to the Forget Commission which will be submitting a report to the Government. We shall see what transpires at that time.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also directed to the Prime Minister, because he and his Government changed the legislation in the Budget of the Minister of Finance.

[English]

REQUEST THAT CHANGES BE SUSPENDED

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Given that in the suicide note the unfortunate veteran asked his wife to fight like hell to get changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act, I want to ask the Prime Minister the following question in all sincerity. Until the Forget Commission comes out with its final report, will he agree in the interim, over the next number of months, to revoke the unfair changes?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course I deeply regret any loss of life for whatever reason and would not care to comment beyond that, as my hon. friend will understand. The Government, in co-operation with the Forget Commission, is doing what it believes is appropriate. With regard to any loss of life, obviously my hon. friend would not want to tie it into any action taken by any Government anywhere.

CANADA PENSION PLAN

INTRODUCTION OF CONTRIBUTION RATE CHANGES

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. When will the Minister introduce changes to the Canada Pension Plan contribution rate, as recommended by the Chief Actuary of Canada and as agreed to by the provinces last December?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the legislation is in the process of being prepared. I would hope that we would be in a position to table it in the House sometime in the middle of June.

NORTH ATLANTIC TREATY ORGANIZATION

PRODUCTION OF CHEMICAL WEAPONS BY UNITED STATES

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Why has Canada so enthusiastically supported U.S. plans to produce new chemical weapons? Why has Canada not joined the six NATO countries which have expressed serious reservations about these plans to produce new chemical weapons, or the seventh, Italy, which also has reservations about them? Why have we been so enthusiastic?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it would leave an impression that is contrary to the facts if we suggested that Canada was enthusiastic about the failure of the world to come to agreement on a means to control and eliminate the use of chemical weapons. Canada is working very hard in various committees, particularly in the Committee on Disarmament, to try to move forward an agreement which will be binding upon everyone and accepted by everyone. The difficulty we now face is that for more than the last decade the United States has refrained from the production of chemical weapons, but the Soviet Union has not. That leads to a situation which can be very destabilizing. Obviously the preferred solution of Canada would have been an agreement. In order to reach an agreement, we require some reasonableness on the Soviet side with regard to verification. That has not occurred.

Ms. Jewett: I disagree. That is not the problem.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Ms. Pauline Jewett (New Westminster—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, basically the Minister is saying that the talks are momentarily stalled so let us keep them permanently stalled; that is what he is saying by his enthusiastic support for chemical weapons.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Jewett: Given what the Government has said about its arms control objectives, including a global ban on chemical weapons, how can we believe anything the Government says about its objectives when its actions so belie its words?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, of course the Hon. Member is entitled to say whatever she believes. I think upon reflection she would find it rather extreme to suggest that I enthusiastically support the use of chemical weapons, and I would hope she might reconsider that statement. She is quite right in one part of what she said. We are looking for a global ban. In order to get a global ban there has to be a system of verification which will work in the Soviet Union. If the events at Chernobyl showed us anything, they showed us how deeply ingrained in the Soviet character is an insistence upon secrecy. That is the problem with verification. We would be fools if we turned a blind eye to that reality.

INQUIRY WHETHER PRIME MINISTER TELEPHONED UNITED STATES PRESIDENT ON SUBJECT OF LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell us whether he has spoken personally to the American President, his friend Mr. Reagan, about his decision of yesterday to take action to protect the American lumber industry, which will have disastrous effects on the Canadian industry?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already said that I did not talk to the American President this morning, that I immediately sent an urgent message and that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has spoken to Mr. Schultz. I think that this is the second time I mention it.

REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER TELEPHONE UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Montreal—Sainte-Marie): I have a supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister not believe, in view of the urgency of the situation, that he should speak personally to the American President? Second, can the Prime Minister explain how it is that he has not yet been advised about the changes in the American policy even though he himself has given up everything to negotiate free trade?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): That is ridiculous. It is a vulgar and inaccurate statement which should be withdrawn. The fact is that the negotiation process undertaken for Canada not only protects completely the rights and jurisdiction of Canada, but also puts us in a position of strength compared with our counterparts and that this will enable us to make an agreement which will favour both sides.

I know—

Mr. Malépart: The other side is not keeping its commitment!

Mr. Mulroney: I know. If my colleague asks me whether the statement or action of yesterday . . . and we had apprehended all sorts of initiatives of this type because of the enormous pressures put on the American Congress.

However, if my colleague is asking whether this action contradicts the statements made by the President of the United States, the answer is yes.

Mr. Malépart: He has betrayed you!

FINANCE

PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It concerns the burden which small oil companies are required to shoulder by paying the PGRT. Is there any relief in sight for them?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member is aware that there was an announcement on April 30 to the effect that the PGRT credit for small producers would be increased from $500,000 to $2 million. We are proposing to broaden that to include the royalty treatment for people from $10,000 to $40,000, a comparable increase which will be made concurrent with the change in the PGRT credit for small producers.

TRADE

U.S. DUTY ON CANADIAN CEDAR SHAKES AND SHINGLES

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I will try to be as fair as I can in presenting the question.

Mr. Gormley: The NDP fair? That doesn't fit.

Mr. Waddell: The Prime Minister has given so much to the Americans, from the dropping of the National Energy Program to the changing of FIRA. What can I tell my constituents in British Columbia, many of whom will lose their jobs as a result of this action by President Reagan yesterday? What do I tell them that Canada got in return?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, let me just deal with the premise that Canada gave so much—the NEP and FIRA. The NEP and FIRA were debilitating Canada. We got rid of them, not to do a favour to the United States but to do a favour to Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: With regard to specific industries, we will take the action which is appropriate and persuade the United States administration that its kind of action, isolated though it has been with regard to the Hon. Member's constituents and perhaps others, is unacceptable. This is at variance with every statement that the President of the United States has made with regard to undertakings given on behalf of his administration to the Government of Canada. This is unacceptable. We hope to persuade and convince the Americans that it is in their interest not to proceed with these kinds of unacceptable measures affecting the interests of Canada directly and unfairly.

Mr. Waddell: I will remind the Prime Minister that it was he who put all his eggs in the American basket.

PRIME MINISTER'S CONTACTS WITH UNITED STATES PRESIDENT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Vancouver—Kingsway): Would the Prime Minister tell the House whether he was in touch with President Reagan before this morning, as he was asked to be by Canadian industry? Was he in touch with his friend, President Reagan, before today to tell the President not to take this kind of action? Did he do that on behalf of Canadian workers and business?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I signed the document at Quebec. The President gave further undertakings in Washington in March. This is exactly the antithesis of what we discussed at Tokyo.

Mr. McCurdy: The man can't be trusted.

Mr. Mulroney: This is exactly the case that Canada has been making.

Mr. Waddell: What's your influence then?

Mr. Mulroney: My hon. friend says: "What's your influence?".

Some Hon. Members: None.

Mr. Mulroney: I am sure that when an action like this takes place it is as dispiriting to the Hon. Member as it is disappointing to every Member of the House. One must realize the context in which it takes place, which does not make it any more acceptable. These are pressures that the President is under and we feel that he ought not to have responded to those pressures—

Mr. Ouellet: You're even scared to call him personally.

Mr. Mulroney: —because they contribute to the growth of protectionism which hurts us all.

My hon. friend said that we put our eggs in the American basket. We did no such thing. We put our eggs in the Canadian basket—

Mr. Ouellet: They're all broken.

Mr. Mulroney: —and we are ready to make fair and honourable deals with anybody, including the Americans, who will increase prosperity in this country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

HEALTH

PRESENCE OF TOXIC SUBSTANCES IN FOOD CHAIN

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As the Minister well knows, Canadians are preoccupied by learning that traces of dioxins, dibenzofurans, and other toxic materials are being found in food and the food chain. In light of the recent study which has just been published, what plans does the Minister now have to intensify research on toxic substances so as to protect public health?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the protection of public health, and with specific reference to the Toronto study to which the Hon. Member refers, there is no doubt that a number of points on the very complex issue have to be raised in an attempt to answer the Member.

First, there are two regulations under the Food and Drug Act, which I will not list for the Hon. Member, which pertain primarily to dioxins in fish. We have been considering whether those regulations can be extended to include other foods. Second, with the type of sensing equipment that has been developed we are finding trace dioxin levels which previously hereto could not be found or traced.

The third point I would make, without trying to deprecate the report, is that foods were tested which were not washed. Therefore, they were testing trace elements which appeared as dust on the surface of the food without having washed it first. Obviously, common public health for everyone would indicate that food should be washed first.

REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF INFORMATION

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, will the Minister ensure that the information known to his Department will be made public on this specific matter which is so delicate, in view of the fact that his colleague, the Minister of the Environment, stopped the circulation of a publication called Storm Warning which was produced by the Department of the Environment on the very same subject?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would have to look at the specific request. However, the general principle on which I function, which applied to radioactivity in Chernobyl, is that if we have information which should be given to the public to reassure them that their food is safe and their health is not in jeopardy, it will be made available as quickly, fully, and expansively as possible. I will check the specifics, but that is the general principle by which I am guided.

TRADE

BENEFITS OF FREE TRADE FOR BOTH NEGOTIATING PARTIES

Mr. Gabriel Fontaine (Lévis): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. the Secretary of State for External Affairs. With respect to the Canada-U.S. bilateral trade negotiations, and keeping in mind Quebec's industrial and manufacturing structures, did the Minister make sure that Quebecers too will benefit from these agreements, notwithstanding the statements made by the Hon. Member for Laval-des-Rapides who keeps saying that Quebecers lack entrepreneurial skills?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I greatly appreciate the interest of the Hon. Member who is as intent as we are on holding negotiations which might be of significant benefit to the people of Quebec. We have set up a consultation process with business circles, unions and other Canadians to make sure that the particular viewpoints of each industry and each region of the country can be readily accessible to our negotiators.

NATIONAL SECURITY

CLEARANCE PROCEDURES FOR CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. I have before me a confidential transcript of a SIRC hearing at which an officer of CSIS reveals for the first time that CSIS tape records, secretly and without consent, all voluntary interviews with civil servants seeking security clearance. Will the Prime Minister immediately order a full investigation into the nature and extent of this reprehensible taping of thousands of federal public servants without their knowledge or consent?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Solicitor General I will have to take notice of the Hon. Member's statement and have the matter checked into.

REQUEST THAT TAPE RECORDING OF INTERVIEWS BE HALTED

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, this secret taping is a major assault on the privacy of all federal civil servants. Will the Minister give the House an assurance that pending the inquiry which I have sought there will be an immediate order issued to CSIS to end forthwith this secret taping of federal public servants seeking security clearances?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member would be more convincing if he made his charges in a more measured way. These allegations will have to be checked into. If the Member was really concerned about the matter he would have given some notice so it could have been checked into before he asked the question. However, I will see that the matter is looked into.

NATIONAL REVENUE

PREPARATION OF GUIDELINES—EFFECT ON RESEARCH

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister promised open government he forgot to tell yet another Minister, the Minister of National Revenue, to whom I direct my question. The Canadian Advance Technology Association has told the Science and Technology Committee that Revenue Canada is preparing guidelines which may seriously handicap research in Canada. Why has the Minister followed a secret process in preparing the guidelines? Why has he excluded industry representatives from the committees which are drafting those guidelines?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I want to tell my hon. friend opposite that this allegation is speculative on his part. If there is any substance to it, I will get back to him and report in due course.

• (1200)

ASSOCIATION'S REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF DRAFT GUIDELINES

Mr. David Berger (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, the letter from the Association is far from speculative. Will the Minister accept the request of the Association to publish these draft guidelines for comment and feedback from the industry? This would respect the Government's own guidelines as far as publication of regulations are concerned.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I will take this as a representation from my hon. friend and consider it in due course.

THE LATE DAVID COOK

Mr. Speaker: I am in receipt of a notice of a point of order from the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez).

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, by now Members of the House will be aware of the death of Mr. David Cook, one of our long-time committee clerks. We extend our sincerest sympathy to his family.

Mr. Speaker: I think the House would want to know that I have expressed condolences on behalf of the entire House.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, we in the Official Opposition associate ourselves with the expression of sympathy concerning the late Mr. Cook.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Government House Leader what business he intends to call for next week.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, today is of course an allotted day. On Monday I want to proceed with Bill C-94, legislation concerning the Atlantic Accord. I hope it will receive expeditious treatment on second reading. I want to thank the House for the manner in which it has dealt with business in the course of the last few days. I hope we can continue that with this particular Bill so it can receive the attention in committee that it deserves.

Following that will be C-98 concerning duties relief. At three o'clock on Monday I want to move to concurrence in Ways and Means Motion No. 43 tabled on May 21, 1986, to amend the Customs Tariff.

Discussions have been ongoing with Opposition House Leaders and we are looking at the sequence of other legislation which might come forward. I will continue to have consultations so that all Members will have adequate notice in order to deal expeditiously with the legislation.

TRADE

CANADIAN CEDAR SHAKES AND SHINGLES

Mr. Speaker: I am in receipt of a notice of a desire to raise a point of order at this time by the Hon. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent).

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Mr. Speaker, in view of what happened in the U.S. yesterday, and in view of the responses on both sides of the House in Question Period today, I think you will find there is unanimous consent to accept the following motion. I therefore ask you to seek the consent of the House to move the following motion:

This House urges President Reagan to take immediate action to reverse yesterday's decision to impose an unfair 35 per cent duty on British Columbia cedar shakes and shingles.

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if I may have your indulgence, there have been consultations between the Leader of the NDP, myself and a representative of the Official Opposition House Leader. In light of the fact that this matter is of some concern to the Government, and the motion itself is very supportive of the direct communication which has taken place between the Prime Minister (Mr. Mulroney) and the President of the United States, as well as representations by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark) to Mr. Shultz, we are quite prepared to support this motion. We appreciate this support of the Prime Minister and the Government. This is on the understanding, of course, that the matter is dealt with by unanimous consent without debate because we do have an agenda.

With your further indulgence, I want to indicate that the message from the Prime Minister to the President of the United States, which has been conveyed today, is as follows. This will give a context to the motion. It says:

Dear Mr. President,

I want to convey to you the profound disappointment of my government at the action you announced yesterday regarding softwood shingles and shakes. The imposition of a 35% tariff is a punitive measure against Canadian products. This unjustifiable action is all the more appalling in the context of freer trade negotiations between our two countries having been officially initiated this week.

This American initiative is pure protectionism, the precise thing you and I pledged, in Quebec and Washington, we would seek to avoid. Canada is now placed in the position of being forced to consider an appropriate response.

I deeply regret this action of the Administration.

Yours sincerely,
Brian Mulroney

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I take it that was consent for the introduction of the motion.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I want to say on behalf of the Official Opposition that we are very desirous of having a unanimous expression of the will of the House, without reference to differences of view which undoubtedly exist among the Parties, that what President Reagan has done is unacceptable to Canadians. Therefore, we share in unanimous consent to have this unanimous expression of the will of the House on this matter.

• (1210)

Mr. Speaker: I take it the House is giving its unanimous consent to the waiving of the usual notice for the introduction of the motion. It is understood the motion may therefore be introduced. The House has heard the terms of the motion. Shall the motion carry?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Carried and so ordered.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 82—CANADA POST—REQUEST FOR OPTIONS AND STUDIES

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That this House demands that the Government require Canada Post to immediately provide, for tabling in the House, all of the options and the studies related thereto that are currently being considered for the future operation of the Corporation, in order that public opinion and especially input from seniors, the disabled, consumers, small business and rural and remote communities can be considered prior to any decision being taken.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am happy that we are having this Opposition Day today, particularly because it means the whole question of postal services is beginning to receive the attention it deserves. It is beginning to get the priority that is required in order for people to get decent, reliable, and timely postal service in this country.

The motion is worded in such a way that it calls upon the Government to make available its plans and its options with regard to postal service. The motion was deliberately worded that way because we have been unable up until now, and ordinary Canadians have been unable up until now, to get the information needed with regard to the future plans for the Post Office.

One thing we do know about the post office is that this Government has set the objective of what it calls financial self-sufficiency within two years. This objective was set out in the Budget. What Canadians need to know is how the Government intends to reach that objective in two years. What options is it considering? We need to know whether financial self-sufficiency can be realized in two years. Is it practical in two years? Not only is it practical and can be realized but is it desirable? We also need to know whether or not there is an alternative to the approach that the Government is taking. Is there an alternative to continued service cut-backs? Is there an alternative to continued Post Office deficits? Is there an alternative to the slow and inadequate mail delivery that Canadians have to put up with today?

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, today's debate is important because mail delivery is a service that concerns all Canadians. It is an essential service, a most important one in such a large country as Canada. The Government has set up the objective, the goal of making the Canada Post Corporation financially self-sufficient within the next two years.

Mr. Speaker, we have to discuss that objective because we have to know what kind of actions the Government will consider and is considering in order to reach that goal.

Mr. Speaker, we also want to know if such a goal is realistic, if it is worthwhile. Finally, it is essential for all Canadians to know whether there is an alternative to reducing current services, another option for the Post Office.

[English]

The Government has clearly set out in the Budget the goal of financial self-sufficiency in the Post Office within two years. The Government is looking at the Post Office from the perspective of the national budget, the national accounts. It is doing this rather than looking at the Post Office as a service on its own merits, looking at what kind of strategy could be put in place to make that institution work and making that service reliable for Canadians.

The Government can perhaps justify its actions in its own rhetoric and from its own philosophical perspective by saying that if reducing the subsidies for the Post Office reduces the federal deficit, then we will be enhancing the Canadian economy. There is another perspective on that. The Government could, in fact, hurt the Canadian economy by reducing the service which the Post Office provides to business in this country by damaging the communications capacities which pulls the Canadian community together. Through the Government's ill thought out attempts to reduce the deficit at the Post Office through service cut-backs we may, in fact, end up with larger deficits and poorer service. This could have a negative economic impact. Therefore, the objective with the Government has set out and the perspective by which it is looking at the Post Office needs to be re-examined.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) is really pulling the strings of the Minister responsible for the Post Office. This Government has the President of the Post Office on a very short leash. When the President of the Post Office came before a committee, he was unable to share any information with Members of Parliament, or with the public, with regard to the Government, or the Corporation's intentions for the future of the Post Office.

Before those meetings, he failed to meet with the workers and unions of the Post Office after repeated attempts to meet with him to discuss future plans at the Post Office. Not only did he fail to meet with the unions at the Post Office, he has failed to meet and discuss future plans for the Post Office with the public, seniors, disabled, and with the residents of new suburban developments. All this from a Government that promised openness in government.

The Minister has been silent with regard to his policy for the Post Office. He had been silent up until the leak with regard to the option that he has admitted to be considering, which is alternate day delivery of mail, where today we have five day a week delivery of mail. Once it became public, he acknowledged that he was considering this option. Since then, however, the Minister reponsible for the Post Office has stonewalled and refused to make available to Canadians the information regarding the options that he is considering for the future of the Post Office. He has simply indicated that he will inform us after he has made a decision some time in late June.

• (1220)

It is not acceptable for the Minister to inform Canadians about the plans for the Post Office after the decision has been made because Canadians must have an opportunity to have some input into the future of the Post Office. The Government promised to run an open Government when it came to office and to allow people to participate in Government. The Government should live up to its promise and develop Post Office policy in an open and democratic fashion.

We know that the Government is considering alternate third-day delivery. In acknowledging that it is considering this option, the Government has unified the entire Canadian community in a struggle for better Post Office service. It has unified organized workers in the Post Office, consumers who use the Post Office, small businesses that are frequent users of the Post Office as well as seniors and disabled people in forming one voice against this option of third-day alternate delivery of mail.

What other options for the Post Office is the Government considering? Let us examine other service cuts by the Post Office. For example, new suburban developments do not receive door-to-door service as is supplied to other urban residents. The Government has failed to extend this service to those new urban communities even though, only a block away, residents in older communities receive door-to-door delivery. While the Government attempts to justify not delivering mail to those new developments, those residents are angry about the unfairness of this policy which denies them equal service. They want to be treated equally since they pay the same taxes.

This lack of service in urban developments threatens the value of homes in these areas. Furthermore, it is inconvenient to certain residents, such as older people. We have even been told of a developer in the Windsor area, Mady Leaseholds, that has indicated that the lack of mail service in that area is affecting its capacity to build and sell houses. The lack of this standard essential service has threatened the capacity of at least one builder in this country to market homes.

What other options is the Government considering in its drive for financial self-sufficiency in the Post Office? Can it achieve this goal without cutting service or will it continue a policy of closing rural routes and rural post offices? My colleagues will speak to this aspect of service in more detail.

As a result of the Government's policy of slow and tardy delivery of mail, there are cases of people receiving their mail in 10 days or two weeks rather than one or two days. Let me give an example. Harrow is a small community near Windsor. The mail that is destined for delivery in Harrow, rather than being sorted there and reaching its destination on the same day, is sorted in Windsor, then returned to Harrow for delivery. This situation exists in other communities near Windsor, including McGregor and Amherstburg. This situation exists in communities all across the country as a result of Post Office organization. The Government must address these problems in the Post Office rather than simply focus on financial self-sufficiency.

We want to know whether the Government intends to increase postal rates in its drive to achieve financial self-sufficiency for the Post Office within two years. Does it intend to impose another increase on its last round of postal increases for such things as cards for forwarding mail? I have been informed that there are low income people in my riding in Winnipeg who receive the family allowance and who cannot afford the $9 for such a card. They would rather take the time to return to their old residence and wait for their family allowance cheque. What kind of service is that?

We need to know the options being considered by the Government in its goal of financial self-sufficiency for the Post Office so that we can determine whether those goals are reasonable or even desirable. Two nights ago in committee, we examined the figures put out by the Post Office. Those projections for future revenues and volumes were overestimated because they were based upon estimates of its volume and revenues rather than actual figures. The Government should make public whatever figures it is using as a basis for setting out this goal of financial self-sufficiency.

We question whether service cut-backs will actually reduce costs at the Post Office and, therefore, achieve financial self-sufficiency or whether they will simply result in reduced revenues and an increasing deficit because people will cease to use the Post Office. We have to accept that the Post Office is a public service just as other means of communications such as highways, railroads or airports. All of these means of communication receive subsidies in some form or other. We have to start by accepting that the Post Office is a public service. If we want to cut the federal deficit, we must do that by cutting out wasteful spending and not by cutting into a service which ties this country together, a service which all Canadians need and value.

• (1230)

Perhaps the true motivations of the Government are not financial but ideological. It would prefer to have any public service downsized and turned over to the private sector. Our Party is worried that the Government is moving toward privatization of the Post Office, which in the end would mean two levels of service for Canadians, one for those who are well off and another more costly and less reliable for the rest of us.

The important question we have to ask the Government is whether it has examined an alternative approach to the Post Office. Has it examined thoroughly methods of improving postal service in order to bring up volumes and increase revenues? Has it examined an investment in the Post Office so that it can move aggressively into markets where it can earn revenue and use that revenue to cross-subsidize the essential service, the delivery of regular mail? For example, if the Government were to actively invest in the Post Office, or allow the Post Office to invest in electronic mail and parcel delivery, which are multimillion dollar markets, the Post Office could get its share with proper management and strategy. It could then earn revenue, and that would help the Post Office with its financial problems.

In summary, what we need to do in terms of the Post Office is take a new and positive look from the point of view of improving service rather than cutting it. We have to look at the Post Office from the point of view of expanding its activities into revenue generating areas. We have to accept the Post Office as a public service like other communications services. We need to have good labour relations and management. These relations will underpin continued and improved services. It is time to move forward with the Post Office rather than back. It is time to deal with Post Office policy in a public open debate rather than developing the policy behind closed doors.

It is a shame that the Minister responsible for the Post Office could not be bothered to be here to participate in the debate today. We challenge the Government to make clear its options and to share those options with Canadians who are now clamouring for some input into the future strategy and policy of the Post Office. Canadians have a right to have input into the direction of the Post Office service. We call upon the Government to be open in its policy to development rather than closed as it has been up until now.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Gatineau (Mrs. Mailly) for a question or comment.

Mrs. Mailly: Mr. Speaker, I would like first to suggest to the Hon. Member that the Minister in charge of the Canada Post Corporation (Mr. Côté) is in Montreal today, because he is meeting with the provincial Minister—

Mr. Parry: He was here this morning.

Mrs. Mailly: Just a minute, Mr. Member for Kenora—Rainy River (Mr. Parry)! ... because he is meeting with the provincial Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on a matter of major importance for which he had been preparing for a long time.

Unfortunately, this day was allotted after the Minister's appointment was arranged.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Member who has just spoken. Does he not agree that the self-sufficiency objective for Canada Post was set at a time when it was changed from a department to a Crown corporation? This was part of course of the terms of reference of the new Crown corporation, Canada Post Corporation, which was to become self-sufficient within a number of years and that it is still part of the terms of reference of the Corporation which were spelled out at the time of the change and were then accepted by the unions representing the Canada Post employees.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, the Member has mentioned the Minister. During the Oral Question Period, I phoned his office and I was told he would be in the House during that period.

I think that mail delivery is as important as any issue in the public domain. Moreover, Canada Post is important to all Canadians. It is also very important that we have in this House the Minister who is responsible.

The Hon. Member has asked me whether I agreed about the self-sufficiency of Canada Post.

Mrs. Mailly: Excuse me, Mr. Speaker

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre yield the floor for the Hon. Member for Gatineau to complete her question?

[Translation]

The Hon. Member for Gatineau.

Mrs. Mailly: Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member did not catch the meaning of my question. I asked him if he knew that self-sufficiency was a prerequisite of the terms of reference of the Corporation. This is quite an important difference!

An Hon. Member: When it was established.

Mr. Keeper: I know about the Canada Post Corporation's terms of reference and I would like to ask the Hon. Member whether she is aware that they include the providing of quality service to the public, that that aspect of the terms of reference takes precedence over the self-sufficiency concept, and that this Government goal is to attain self-sufficiency within only two years. And the Government's policy does not include helping the corporation grab its share of markets like parcel delivery.

Mrs. Mailly: That was not included in the terms of reference.

Mr. Keeper: The Government's suggestions to date do not indicate it is considering investing over a significant period of time to enable the corporation to compete on the parcel delivery market.

This is an area where the corporation can make money and use a new strategy to achieve self-sufficiency.

But, finally, and more importantly, the Government's policy is hard to tackle when it is not even willing to be open and to share information with this Parliament and the Canadian public.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Gatineau on a supplementary.

Mrs. Mailly: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, the Hon. Member is mistaken. He is saying what the President of the Canada Post Corporation answered when the question was put to him the other evening in committee. The Hon. Member asked the President whether he was willing to divulge details of a new operating plan. The President answered that he could not let him know about the new plan until the details had been worked out and the project had been formulated and had been submitted to Cabinet.

Mr. Speaker, I think the Hon. Member will have to admit that the President was not hiding anything but was simply acting like any president of a Crown corporation would act. He cannot reveal parts of a plan that will enventually be submitted to the Government, before the plan has been submitted to the Minister in due form.

That is my first comment.

The Hon. Member also mentioned that financial self-sufficiency was something we had set as a goal to be achieved within two years' time—

Mr. Keeper: Yes, it's in your Budget.

Mrs. Mailly: —but he is mistaken, Mr. Speaker. He said earlier that it was part of the mandate the new Canada Post Corporation received in 1981, when the Department became a Crown corporation. That mandate included three major objectives—

Mr. Keeper: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker, will the Hon. Member leave me enough time to reply to all her comments?

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will make sure the Hon. Member gets time for a response.

[Translation]

The Hon. Member for Gatineau.

Mrs. Mailly: Mr. Speaker, the new corporation had three objectives in its terms of reference: improved service, improved labour relations and financial self-sufficiency by 1987. The terms of reference imposed to the Canada Post Corporation were not ours; they were inherited by the Corporation when it was created.

What I would like ask the Hon. Member is this. He has suggested ways to increase the revenues of the Canada Post Corporation. For instance, he has mentioned the parcel delivery service. Could he tell us whether the postal unions are willing to show some flexibility in their methods of work to allow Canada Post to get a share of this new parcel delivery market, which would require a change in the work habits of the employees?

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has said that the President of Canada Post could not share this information because he had not yet submitted it to the Government.

Mr. Speaker, we know that the Government will make decisions and develop a new policy. It is necessary for the Government to share the information before making a decision and to be open about the options being considered. That is a basic principle in all democracies, but the Government has refused to apply it until now. Moreover, the Minister has said in this House that he will make these matters public after he has made a decision. That is confirmed in the record of the House.

Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member has said that self-sufficiency in two years is not part of her policy. Yet, this objective is included in the Conservative Budget and it was set by the Minister of Finance himself.

Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member questioned me about parcel delivery and asked me whether the unions would be as flexible as necessary to get involved in such an area. That is a good question, but the main issue is this: Is the Government willing to develop a policy to allow Canada Post to have a share of these markets? To gain such a share of the market, you need to invest and you need specific objectives. It is not enough simply to question the position of the unions. It is not the right time to try and blame the unions. We have to develop an effective policy for Canada Post. That is the purpose of my motion today.

[English]

Mr. George Baker (Gander—Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to assure the hon. gentleman who just spoke that the objective of the postal corporation to break even is certainly not a new proposition. In fact, it was the intention when that corporation was formed.

I would also remind Hon. Members that everyone agreed with the formation of Canada Post, including the unions. At that time the stated intent of the Crown corporation and its duties were agreed to by everyone. However, matters have now changed as a result of the Government saying to Canada Post: "You must cut x number of dollars from your budget". The Post Office did so without really knowing what effect these cuts would have on its service.

I believe the Post Office arrived at that point about one and a half or two years ago. It discovered some of its cuts were having an extremely detrimental affect on postal service and that it was time for the Post Office to backtrack and change some of the things it had done. For example, actual cuts with regard to the collection of mail during the week were implemented.

I recall that it was decided last May that a letter placed in a red mailbox on a street corner at noon on Friday would not be collected until the beginning of the next week. This was a measure which did not receive a great deal of attention. If someone was lucky enough to put a letter in a mailbox before nine o'clock in the morning, then it would be sorted during the weekend. As I said, this measure did not receive a great deal of attention. Only those to whom the mail was addressed were aware of it. Thus changes were made to try to rationalize sorting whereby, for example, if a heavy load of mail came into the Ottawa mail station, then that mail would not be sorted in Ottawa. It would be put on a truck, sent to Montreal, sorted in Montreal and sent back to Ottawa for distribution. These were detrimental changes in terms of good postal service.

A few years ago one could mail a letter and if by chance it was insufficient in terms of postage by one cent or two cents, the letter was still delivered and perhaps a collection was made at the other end. However, the return-to-sender policy initiated by the Post Office disallows such delivery now.

So there is nothing new about the postal corporation having to break even. As a philosophy, most people might think that it is a good position to take. Personally, I do not think so. I question the philosophy of the Post Office if in carrying it out service is destroyed. As an Hon. Member pointed out one day, a fire brigade in a local community is not operated as a break-even service. Medicare is not operated as a break-even service. Thus the Post Office should not be operated as a break-even service or as a money-making service. So there is a problem which we run into in terms of philosophy when one talks about balancing the books of the Post Office.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) is perhaps the gentleman who should bear the brunt of our criticisms here today, aided and abetted by his colleague the Minister of State for Finance (Mrs. McDougall). The reason I say that is because the Minister of Finance, whose head is on the chopping block here today, stated that following upon discussions with the President of Canada Post, the Government requested a new operating plan to improve productivity at Canada Post so that the corporation could reduce its operating deficit to zero by the end of fiscal year 1987-88. The Minister of Finance stated that the Government was confident that by taking further steps to improve productivity and efficiency, Canada Post and its workers could meet the objective of self-sufficiency while improving reliability of service to the people of Canada. That was the order that came down from on high to the Minister responsible for Canada Post. It came from the Minister of Finance or, in other words, from the Government of Canada.

• (1250)

The Minister in charge of Canada Post publicly stated the other day that the operating plan requested by the Minister of Finance would be released before the end of June. That is only four or five weeks from now. He said publicly that as one of the options, he was looking at reducing the frequency of mail delivery across Canada. He said that we could talk about three days a week or we could talk about four days a week. Those were the very words he used publicly. That is why we are having this debate today.

Someone listening to the Minister of Finance say that Canada Post should improve productivity and efficiency would wonder what the Minister responsible for Canada Post (Mr. Côté) was talking about when he said that in order to increase productivity and efficiency, he would reduce the frequency of the delivery of mail. That does not make sense. How can he increase productivity by reducing labour? How can the Post Office increase its productivity by cutting back on mail delivery? Of course the answer is quite obvious and quite simple. In the eyes of the Minister of Finance, increasing productivity means laying people off.

There are two ways to look at this situation. The new President of Canada Post, Mr. Lander, has a background with Chrysler and has had great associations with Lee Iacocca. He worked with some great corporate people who looked at the balance sheet. To him, increasing productivity as demanded by the Minister of Finance means making sure that revenues exceed expenditures. He looks at the balance sheet to see how he can increase productivity. He figures that if he is making money where he was losing money before, then he is increasing productivity. The problem with that is that every single Canadian across the country will look at that change and see that productivity has actually decreased.

Looking at this from the point of view of the Canadian public, it is an absolutely outrageous, stupid, idiotic suggestion. I do not know how many adjectives one could use to describe such a stupid suggestion made by the new President of Canada Post and passed along by him to the Minister in charge of Canada Post. This suggestion is now being discussed in the federal Cabinet.

How can Canada Post change the way mail is delivered in this country? The President of Canada Post says that mail will be delivered on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays one week and on Tuesdays and Thursdays the next week. How is that going to be done? Is Canada Post going to deliver mail on Monday, Wednesday and Friday to the even numbers on a street one week and Tuesday and Thursday to the odd numbers? Is Canada Post going to have a lottery every Sunday to figure out who will get mail delivery on Monday, Wednesday and Friday or Tuesday and Thursday? It raises all kinds of stupid possibilities.

The most important thing that is being forgotten is that there are people in society who depend on the mail more than others. Members of Parliament are flooded with phone calls whenever Canada Pension cheques do not arrive on the day they are supposed to arrive. If disability pension cheques do not arrive on Friday and the recipients have to wait until Monday to receive them, the offices of Members are flooded with phone calls on Friday afternoon. That is the missing element in this productivity argument and in the discussions taking place on alternate-day delivery.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, those who receive welfare have to go personally to welfare offices to receive their cheques in most provinces. However, those who receive Canada Pension cheques and disability cheques have to wait for the mail to deliver those cheques to them. This is where the option of alternate-day delivery really falls down.

Imagine the situation of two people, both receiving pension cheques. One lives on one side of the street and the other lives on the other side. The normal day for receiving their cheques is Friday. The one whose address contains an even number receives mail on Friday one week but the other one received mail on Thursday. Obviously that is not going to work. It cannot work. That system cannot be implemented by the federal Government. The Government cannot agree with that option presented by Canada Post, one of the options which was demanded by the Minister of Finance.

We have a very large quarrel with the options presented to the Minister. That is why I suspected that alternate-day delivery was held out by the Minister responsible for Canada Post as a red herring. That was done so that everyone in Canada would say: "Well, what a stupid thing for the Government of Canada to do. It can't do that to the Canadian people". Then I thought that maybe the Minister responsible for Canada Post would, in four weeks' time, announce that he had decided on another option which was not quite as bad as alternate-day delivery. However, after listening to the President of Canada Post who spoke before the Standing Committee, I now believe that alternate-day delivery is an option that is under serious consideration by the Government. The only other option that seemed to meet the requirements was to increase the rates. However, in handing down his demand, the Minister of Finance did not mention increasing rates. In fact, he made sure that nowhere in his direction to Canada Post was there one mention of increasing rates. Therefore, that option really cannot be considered at all.

The bottom line is alternate-day delivery in Canada. It might work on the balance sheet. It might look good to the President of Canada Post and the Government that mail carriers are being laid off. It might look good to them, but it will never wash with the Canadian public and it will not wash with those particular people who depend on the mail to receive their cheques on a particular day because until they receive them, they cannot afford to buy food for their children.

When we talk about productivity, efficiency and reliability, we sometimes forget about the people involved. The President of Canada Post is going to have to keep in mind that there are a great many Canadians—I have only two minutes left, Mr. Speaker? I have not begun to talk about what I wanted to talk about.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member. It being one o'clock, the Hon. Member will of course continue at two o'clock.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate with the Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker).

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying before the luncheon break, the Minister responsible for Canada Post says that the productivity of the Post Office can be increased by reducing the frequency of mail delivery and agreeing to alternate day delivery. If one thinks that reducing the frequency of mail delivery in any way thereby increases productivity in the Post Office, that person is a strong believer in the pony express. Perhaps we could return to the days when mail was delivered by canoe on the St. Lawrence River; then we would have a productive postal service in Canada.

Mr. Keeper: It would be faster.

Mr. Baker: I hear the Hon. Member from the NDP. It reminds me of a joke which I heard a moment ago about the speed of the postal service. Apparently a murder took place and a lady telephoned her boss and said: "I made sure I put the body in a place where they would never find it, and that was in Priority Post".

In any event, the postal service in Canada has deteriorated very quickly over the last two years or three years.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker: I believe that deterioration was caused by the cuts imposed upon the postal corporation by this Government of Canada. It was imposed at a time when the Post Office discovered that it must backtrack on some of the cuts that had already taken place.

In conclusion, let me indicate that mail delivery involves the delivery of unemployment insurance, disability, Canada Pension, and old age pension cheques. No one in any Government, in any political Party, in any union or in any postal corporation has the right to interfere with the frequency of the delivery of such cheques. This is why alternate day service will not work. Even if one accepted the principle, one would realize that the postal corporation would lay off mail carriers and people who sort mail. The effects of such a move would be felt in rural areas in terms of when mail would arrive. It would not wash with the Canadian public. It brings into question whether there is a philosophy on the part of the management in the Post Office which maintains that the Post Office is a vital element in society, just as important as medicare and anything else.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Hon. Member. Often the Liberals are effective in opposition—they point out the inadequacies of the day almost as well as we do. Also, in office they did some good things, when they were forced to do so by the New Democratic Party. However, I cannot sit here in silence and listen to my hon. friend saying that the postal service deteriorated over the last three years only. The Liberals had 20 years or a couple of decades to put in place a postal service which would work, would deliver mail, would ensure that it arrived on time, and would ensure that everyone received adequate and fair service.

How can the Hon. Member substantiate the notion that the postal service has only deteriorated over the last three years? I would like people who are watching to think back and ask themselves whether the mail service was any better three years ago. How long has this deterioration been going on? Why did the Liberals put up with it? Why did they not deal with the problem by putting in place a postal service which would function and deliver mail?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, I would love to hear the hon. gentleman explain to us exactly the type of postal network which he thinks would be effective in delivering mail in Canada. We can all remember when we did not have to wait two weeks for a letter to get from Newfoundland to Ottawa. We can all remember when it did not take two weeks for a letter to get from Quebec City to Ottawa. That was not too long ago. It was not too long ago when you could at least get it within a few days.

• (1410)

Mr. Keeper: It's been more than three years.

Mr. Baker: I am saying that when the five-year plan was initiated and the postal corporation was invented, all political parties and everyone concerned heralded a new and bright day. You can have all of the good intentions in the world, but when you see that the changes which are taking place are deteriorating mail delivery in Canada, you stop, back up, and change directions.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I am totally amazed at some of the statements I just heard from the Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker), although I really should not be. It is absolutely ludicrous for him to say that he is totally against self-sufficiency in the Post Office and to compare it to the fire department and a lot of other things, but it is the typical Liberal solution of throwing more money at a problem. That money will have to come from taxpayers.

The Member talks about reducing mail service. I will talk about that for a moment. Some day the Member should take a trip to Mississauga North. In that riding, about 50 per cent of the residents do not get any mail delivery. Would they ever love to have alternate day delivery. I have met with the residents associations from Meadowvale, West Credit, and Streetsville. They tell me that they would love to have alternate day delivery and would be well satisfied with it. When you consider it, Mr. Speaker, does it really matter whether you get your bills on Monday or on Tuesday? You will probably not pay them until pay-day anyway. What about the ads and junk mail? Most of it goes into the garbage anyway. However, Canada Post makes money on that. I support alternate day delivery. However, the Government is not going to be stampeded into making policies. It will consult, as it is doing, with all of the people.

Mr. Keeper: How about sharing information?

Mr. Horner: Sharing information is the subject of the motion.

Mr. Keeper: Put your options on the table.

Mr. Horner: We will put the options on the table when the time comes.

Mr. Keeper: After the decision. What about before?

Mr. Horner: Not after the decision. We will put them out for you to have a look at.

Mr. Parry: You should be a Parliamentary Secretary, Bob.

Mrs. Champagne (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot): Patience, patience.

Mr. Horner: It is strange to see a bit of a lovers' quarrel going on between the Liberals and the NDP.

Mr. Keeper: What do you know about love?

Mr. Horner: I know more about love than you do. It costs $113 per household per year for door-to-door delivery. It costs $83 for delivery by postal employees to group and community mailboxes. Can the Member explain why, when you take away the unions which his Party supports, it only costs $35 to service those mailboxes? I find that very, very strange and I would like an answer.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, we certainly do support the union members and the unions in some of the demands which have been made by some of them. The Hon. Member just said that he supports alternate day delivery. He really means that he supports alternate day delivery if the people in his riding, who do not now get daily delivery, get daily delivery because of that policy being brought in. He asks who cares if the bills are received on Monday or on Tuesday. No one cares. In fact, it would be great if they were received on Friday. I was talking about the cheques. It makes a considerable difference if you get your cheque on Monday or on Tuesday. I am not talking about Members of Parliament, lawyers, or doctors. I am talking about people who need their cheques.

The Hon. Member said that I am advocating the throwing of money at problems. Yes, throw money at medicare, the fire brigade, and the Post Office. Why not? It is a vital service in the country. That is my firm belief.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, we have heard comments about no public input. The Marchment committee travelled across the nation, stopping in all major cities. The public had a chance to appear before the committee. We have all of their opinions in here and by the end of June we will have all of this, plus all the other studies, condensed. We will lay our proposals on the table at that time.

Mr. Keeper: No, you will make your decision first. The Minister said that. Why were you not at committee?

Mr. McKenzie: We have heard the comment that it is impossible for the Post Office to be self-sufficient. The Post Office was self-sufficient before under a Conservative Government. In 1960 there was a deficit of $4.7 million in the operation of the Post Office. By 1961-62 that deficit was reduced to $1.2 million. By 1962-63 the Post Office made a profit of $3.486 million. The Post Office was directed to manage properly and it did not do that by reducing services in the 1960s. Therefore, the Post Office can be made self-sufficient. There are all kinds of recommendations in the Marchment report for management to improve the operation. This is what Mr. Lander and company will have to do. The theory that everything is being operated at 100 per cent efficiency is absolutely wrong.

The Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker), the spokesman for the Liberal Party, probably knows that there are 30 recognized bargaining units in the Post Office and eight unions. This coming Tuesday the Canada Labour Relations Board is going to have hearings before which the public will be able to appear to discuss reducing the number of unions in the Post Office. At the present time, management is bargaining all year long. This has caused a serious problem in the Post Office. It cannot operate efficiently while bargaining all year. Does the Liberal Party support the reduction of the number of bargaining units and unions in Canada Post?

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, to answer the question very simply, it would certainly make matters simpler if there were one settlement for a period of 10 years. I do not think that makes much difference. However, when one looks at the agreements reached by the inside postal workers, for example, one can see that they are certainly not receiving some of the benefits which they should receive.

In response to the hon. gentleman's remarks, yes, the Post Office was very profitable 50 years ago. As I pointed out before, so was the Pony Express. The point is that when you have improved mail delivery in the far-flung regions of the country, it obviously costs more money. In most of the communities which I represent, the Post Office is in the porch of someone's house. With regard to reducing the frequency of mail delivery, if the Government changes the system so that mail is not sorted on time and people get their unemployment and Canada Pension cheques on Friday instead of Monday, it will be the one in trouble.

• (1420)

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate.

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Canada Post): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start with a definition of what I consider this exercise to be about. We have to try and get this debate on a constructive level. All Members of Parliament are, I think, trying to do probably six things. The debate revolves around how to best accomplish those objectives. If anyone disagrees with any of these six objectives, I would be pleased to discuss them in detail at any time on behalf of the Government. Or, I would be pleased to respond in the 10 minutes allocated at the conclusion of my remarks.

We have to somehow or other improve mail delivery service, in whatever form that service takes. I think we all agree on that. Second, we have to seriously look at a faster and more reliable delivery service. Third, I think everyone in this House would be happy if we could put a freeze on postage rate increases. I do not think anyone here is saying we need to pay more for a stamp in order to accomplish any of the objectives of the three Parties. Fourth, there has to be a reduction in the Canada Post deficit. It is an old story. Future generations are going to live with a legacy of bad management and poor fiscal responsibility left by Members of Parliament of all political faiths if we do not get the deficit under control.

Another point is the elimination of postal strikes. The postal service is an important and integral part of a successful business community. It is a necessary service for those who require cheques on time. It is a vital service to those who have to get their message out, whatever the message might be. Finally, all of us in this House desire a competitive and profitable postal corporation. That is difficult but not impossible.

All of those things are a problem today. Why? I suggest the principle reason is because of politicians. It is not unions, not management, but politicians who have not over the years sent out a clear message to the Post Office on exactly what they want. Given that, I would like to hear constructive proposals from both the NDP and the Liberals on how we might arrive at some of these collective objectives. I say "collective" because the Post Office is ours.

I am not proud of the record of Canada Post. No one in this House is. I am not proud of the way the former Government dealt with it. No one in this House is. Even the Liberals are changing their position on some of the objectives they set. Whether that is because they are in Opposition or because they have reassessed the objectives they set in former years, I cannot say. However, we need to know because we cannot solve these problems unless we are going in the same direction. We have Crown corporations we are proud of. They have done a good job for Canada. Yet, how many in this House over the last 20 years have been proud of the record of Canada Post? This is not to blame the unions or management. Rather, it was the policies which have come down the tube from politicians.

In my short time in this House, the last seven or eight years, I can remember one time when all three political Parties agreed to follow one course. That course was to create a Crown corporation where Members of Parliament would stay at arm's length and let the corporation manage its own show. We all agreed there was an alternative. The Marchment report indicated there were alternatives if that did not work. The Liberals had all of these alternatives available over the last five years if it did not work. They spoke about them in the House of Commons during debate on second and third reading.

Therefore I fail to see how Members of the Opposition are able to determine at this stage that we have failed; that we have offered solutions that do not work. In reality we have taken what we found in 1984, did a study on it, and paid a great deal of attention to the recommendations tabled late in 1985. We are discussing absolutely nothing at all that is not in those recommendations. Therefore I fail to see why the Opposition is so upset when we talk about reliable service. If we are not getting reliable service, I challenge the Opposition to tell us why. We have been saying that we have not been getting reliable service for 30 years.

What can we do to improve the service? Here we have the report. There are 43 options in that report. Where did anyone over there get the bright idea that our Government suggested alternate day service as a solution? I fail to see it. I have never said it. The Minister has never said in this House that he supports alternate day service. I refer Hon. Members to page 13316 of Hansard, May 15, 1986, where the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Canada Post (Mr. Côté) responded to a question by the Hon. Member for Beaches (Mr. Young) concerning alternate day service. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, I think I have already answered that question in the last two days. I have said that we are examining alternatives in order to come to self-sufficiency in the next two years. In all honesty we have to examine all possible alternatives—

That alternative which we are discussing today at great length with one Opposition Party present in the House was not this Government's alternative. I have serious concerns about the viability of alternate day service. We have to satisfy ourselves as individual Members of Parliament whether alternate day service will really improve efficiency and service. I have heard arguments that it will not. I welcome those arguments. The Minister welcomes those arguments. Any responsible Member would welcome any comments about alternate day service. Where did we get alternate day service? We got it from this report, recommendation number 8:

> Communities in urban areas which do not enjoy daily door-to-door delivery be consulted with a view to offering the choice between alternate day letter carrier service or daily mail service through the use of group, community or post office boxes.

That is only one. Let us get it up on the table and look at it. Is it a service to people in North Mississauga? The Member for that area said it would be a service for his riding to have alternate day service. He is not prepared at this point in time to say that that is the answer. What we are looking at are the options.

• (1430)

Some of the other rather controversial proposals in this document are ones like "membership of the board of Canada Post be drawn from senior and experienced executive persons". I do not find any difficulty with that. That is a constructive recommendation. "The responsibility of the Chairman of the Board be modelled on the standards of the private sector in regard to representing the corporation to its shareholders, and with respect to the level of participation in the operation of the corporation". Another one, "management be fully accountable to the board for its performance". I think that would be a terrific idea. I think it would be an excellent idea if the management of Canada Post was accountable to the board.

Let us look at some of the other Crown corporations we have in this country. Do we sit here in this House of Commons and try and determine whether Air Canada is going to fly to Peterborough, Mississauga or Barrie? Do those operational activities of Air Canada concern every Member in this House? Do we expect these Crown corporations to wait for the direction of politicians?

I remind the members of the Opposition that is why we have a Crown corporation. I remind them that in this same Marchment report, in a later recommendation that if, by a certain period of time, and they use the year 1990, Canada Post has not reached a point of self-sufficiency we, as Members of Parliament, would be urged by the Marchment committee to look at areas for privatization. The red flags go up, the lights flash and the NDP get concerned about privatization. It is not a dirty word. Privatization means there are certain facets of our economy and business that can be better handled in the private sector.

We are not saying to Canada Post that we are going to make it a private sector operation. We are saying to Canada Post—we have said it, the Liberals have said it, and any sound person discussing economics as it pertains to Canada Post would say the same thing—that if the public sector cannot do it, then we should look at the private sector. I would point out to members in the Opposition that a large percentage of Canada Post's operation is now performed by the private sector.

I would like to deal with this matter of the deficit, because I think it is key to sound economic management of Canada Post, as it is to any other Crown corporation or private company, families or our own personal businesses. We need to operate on a sound financial basis or we will not be there long, either as a country or as a business.

Let us see what has been done since we all agreed to make Canada Post a Crown corporation. In 1981 the Bill was passed here in the House of Commons, and no one voted against it, to my knowledge. At that time the deficit was soaring. It was $608 million in 1981. The former Government gave it a five-year fiscal mandate, that at the end of five years it wanted a deficit of zilch, no deficit whatsoever. In 1982 it dropped, under a Crown corporation, to a loss of $262 million from $608 million. The next year it rose slightly to $305 million. In 1984, the last fiscal year of the former Government, it rose to $350 million.

We heard before committee just this past week—not much of a headline in any of the daily papers, I do not recall hearing it on any of the national TV networks or any of the radio syndicated programs—that Canada Post, according to Mr. Lander, the new president, is looking forward to a loss this year, unaudited figures, of perhaps lower than $200 million.

Does that mean anything to the citizens in Canada, to the ratepayers, to the shareholders? It means that in four and a half years, Canada Post has dropped from a $608 million loss to less than $200 million. It did that as a Crown corporation. It did that without the interference of Government. I am a strong advocate that the more we get involved, the more we get blamed, and the more politicians get involved in the private sector, the more money we lose.

Let us give it a chance. Let us not be prepared to condemn Canada Post. Let us leave the decision-making process on the expenditure of funds for operation up to Canada Post. Let us stay out of its business as much as we can. I agree with both opposition Parties that service is crucial if it is to be an important integral part of carrying on business here in Canada, personal or otherwise.

I remind Members that the more we get involved, the more apt we are to get into trouble. We had a lesson in economics earlier today on business management. I suggest that perhaps some of the members of the opposition would do well to take a current course put on by the Federation of Business Development people in Canada on what is the true economy of scale. What is true productivity? When they say that Canada Post does not attain any levels of productivity, that the service is lessening, I suggest that they should read some of the current information from Canada Post, audited, which is available at any time for anyone who wants to read it.

Canada Post volume has increased some 16 per cent since it was incorporated as a Crown corporation. There has been no equivalent increase in the workforce. That will interest the Members from both Winnipeg North and Gander-Twillingate because they are interested in productivity.

An Hon. Member: Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Domm: Winnipeg North Centre, the same gentleman has spoken out in support of improvement in productivity.

Given that as a guideline, let us look at some other figures. Let us consider that the amount of funding required from the Government has declined dramatically. I have already pointed that out. That must be good news to both Parties of the opposition. CPC, Canada Post Corporation, is serving approximately 150,000 new addresses, points of call per year, that it was not servicing in 1981. CPC works closely with the private sector. I wonder how many people realize that more than 2,100 sub-stations are operated in Canada by the private sector. There are more than 4,000 postage stamp agencies in Canada operated in the private sector. There are more than 5,000 rural routes operated now in the private sector. Canada Post Corporation is one of the major users of transportation services, both private and Crown.

Let us talk about postal rates just for a moment. From April 1, 1983, to March 31, 1986, three full fiscal years, postal rates, basic, first class rates, have only increased 6.3 per cent. In the same period, water bills to consumers in Canada went up 20.5 per cent. Fuel oil went up 23.3 per cent, local and commuter transit went up 29.8 per cent, rail transportation 18.9 per cent, cable TV, 29.6 per cent, and Consumer Price Index services went up 13.9 per cent. All items went up 14.7 per cent. I think we owe a word of congratulations to Canada Post in being able to keep its index lower than all of the national suppliers of services, to my knowledge, in Canada.

I would like to spend a little time discussing unions before I conclude. I think it has already been mentioned that we have gone through a period in Canada Post where, and I can say this from my own personal experience in Peterborough, Canada Post deliverers of the mail are very highly thought of. We have not had a major strike in Canada Post since it formed a Crown corporation. We had thousands of lost days and hours prior to that through strikes. I think what we have now is a situation where the unions and management have been able, through the collective bargaining process, to negotiate satisfactory arrangements that have pleased both parties; keeping the costs of Canada Post down, increasing productivity, while at the same time servicing the people of Canada with at least 50 per cent of Canada Post delivery in the public sector, and the other 50 per cent in the private sector.

• (1440)

There are different systems of delivery in Canada today. We must assess those systems from a productivity standpoint and look to Canada Post to supply some of the answers for these problems as they arise from time to time. I appreciate this opportunity to speak in support of continuous harmony between labour and management at Canada Post while accomplishing maximum service at minimum cost at the same time in order that we can continue to be proud of Canada Post as one of our Crown corporations that has made success out of a bad situation in years gone by.

Mr. Keeper: Mr. Speaker, I want to make a number of comments on the Hon. Member's speech in which he set out a number of objectives.

It is tragic that the Parliamentary Secretary is here to lay out Government policy rather than the Minister. As I listened to his speech, I wondered whether his statements are Government policy.

One of the objectives which he set out is improved service. If the Hon. Member had attended the committee meeting a couple of nights ago, he would have realized that the President of Canada Post described community boxes in suburban developments as improved service or alternate means of service. The Hon. Member should ask the people living in those communities whether that is improved service because they will say that it is an unfair reduction in service.

He set out the freezing of postal rates as another objective. Is the Government making a commitment that it will freeze postal rates?

We want to know what options the Government is considering for Canada Post, but it has refused to make those options public. The Hon. Member suggested that there is nothing we are discussing here that was not mentioned in the Marchment report. While that report can be of benefit, we want to know the Government's plans for Canada Post before any final decision is made. All Canadians who will be affected by these policy decisions want to know. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg—Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) said earlier that the Government would make its proposals available, but the Minister clearly said in the House that he will make those proposals available after he has made a decision. That is not good enough.

The Hon. Member said that the Government inherited a mess and challenges us to outline how it has failed with Canada Post. While it is true that it did inherit a mess, the Government has the opportunity to do something about it. However, it has failed as a result of not informing Canadians about its plans and options for Canada Post and not involving people in that process.

The Hon. Member said that the Minister never said that he supported alternate day delivery. However, on May 16, 1986, as reported at page 13359 of Hansard, the Minister said:

> Alternate day delivery is just one of the alternatives that is being examined. It may not be retained but it has to be examined.

The Minister acknowledged in the House that one of the options he is considering now is alternate day delivery, yet the Parliamentary Secretary said it is not one of the Government's alternatives. Is he speaking on behalf of the Government? Is he now saying that the Government has ruled out alternate day delivery? Is the Government ready to lay its cards on the table and inform Canadians about what options it is considering?

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, I suppose the best way to put it is that the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper) is up to his old tricks. He has again selectively quoted statements out of context.

I will repeat once more exactly what has been said. All of the options being considered by the Government are contained in a public document that was tabled in the House late in 1985. All of those options were brought forward in the Marchment report, including no postal rate increase, alternate day delivery, and improved service. He has a copy, and I refer him to pages 51, 52 and 53 where they appear.

The Minister said that the Government has not taken a position on alternate day service. I quoted from the same page in Hansard to which the Hon. Member is referring. There is no indication anywhere in Hansard that that is the Government's position. I am saying that we have not taken that position.

Mr. Keeper: What is the Government's position?

Mr. Domm: We are offering you, as a Member of Parliament, the option of saying whether you think the recommendations in the Marchment report are positive or negative in accomplishing the six objectives that I set out at the beginning of my remarks. If the Hon. Member believes that those recommendations are negative, he has an opportunity to express his view.

The Hon. Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Horner) pointed out that the people in his area welcome alternate day delivery. If the Hon. Member believes that alternate day delivery is not an advantage to the people in his riding and they would not welcome it, he has an opportunity to say so.

The Member should deal with the Marchment report and not tell us what our policy is because we have not announced it. That is the reason for the study and the reason why he has an obligation to his constituents and the Canadian people to tell us his views. Apparently you are not satisfied with union-labour relations, with the delivery service, or with door-to-door delivery as we find it in the cities today. The Hon. Member does not agree with productivity increases, the cut-backs and the deficit reduction. I disagree with the Hon. Member, but that is his view and it is his right to express his view. That is all I can say.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Domm). When he quoted some figures with respect to the increase in postal rates, he quoted the years 1982 to 1984. I believe that he was very selective in the years that he chose and would ask him to go back to 1981 when Canada Post became a Crown corporation and Mr. Michael Warren became its first President.

We recall those days in 1981 when postal rates were 17 cents. In 1982, those rates went up to 32 cents and 34 cents the year after. After a 2 cent increase from 15 cents, there was an average increase of 33.3 per cent from the years 1981 to 1983. The Hon. Member should not choose the low years in comparing the rates of increase and comparing them with water-beds, ptomaine poisoning, hair remover and those other items that he mentioned. He should not be so selective because the fact is that as postal rates have gone up, the services have plummeted.

Mr. Domm: Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with the Hon. Member that services have plummeted.

Second, let me point out that we took office in 1984 and I used 1983 as the bench-mark. I am not trying to justify the mess in which the Post Office system was in the 1970s or 1980s. As Parliamentary Secretary, I am responsible to respond for the Minister on matters pertinent to Canada Post in our term of office. I used 1983 as a bench-mark because we came into office in 1984, the next fiscal year. I am giving figures for the period in which we have been in office and I can tell the Hon. Member that the statements he is making are as misleading as those of his colleague in the New Democratic Party. Of course, that is not abnormal for your Party.

The Hon. Member says that he is not satisfied with Canada Post. I am telling him that it is a lot better today as a Crown corporation than it was in the 1970s. The Hon. Member will recall that the Post Office was in chaos in the 1970s, under the same Government that existed in the early 1980s. That is why his Party, and our Party agreed with the Liberal Party in 1981—which does not happen very often—that it should be made a Crown corporation. As a result of making it a Crown corporation, Canada Post is a more viable source of service for the country. I am looking forward to a break-even point by the year 1989, as has been stated in the House by the Minister on numerous occasions.

• (1450)

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak in the debate on the motion moved by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper) and remind Hon. Members that the motion calls for the Government to come clean with the Canadian people and Members of Parliament, to lay on the table all documents it has with respect to potential changes which will affect the Post Office.

I am glad the previous speaker did a little historical homework on the way the Post Office has developed. I remember that when I came here in 1972, we had in the House of Commons a Minister responsible for the Post Office. He was the Postmaster General. On site in the Post Office was a Deputy Postmaster General. That individual was responsible for the day-to-day operations of the Post Office.

The employees of the Post Office then came under the Public Service Staff Relations Act and it was absolutely chaotic. There were situations in the Post Office where workers had to negotiate with the President of the Treasury Board, yet in the House of Commons the Postmaster General was responsible for the Post Office. The Postmaster General at that time was responsible for the decision making in the long term. He was questioned in the House and was responsible in the House, but when it came time to negotiate wages, the Post Office workers did not deal with their Minister, the Postmaster General. They had to deal with the President of the Treasury Board. That is who sat across from them at the bargaining table. What we had was really a split jurisdiction which created a lot of problems.

Because the workers were under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, there were many things they could not negotiate with the President of the Treasury Board, such as occupational health and safety, classification, staffing and technological change. That led to a very major strike during the 1970s. The inside workers of the Post Office went on a strike which, I believe, lasted 75 days. The workers proposed, and it was recognized and pointed out by all Parties in this House, that we establish the Post Office as a Crown corporation and give it a president so that we could have unity of leadership in the Post Office and the workers could have a direct relationship with the person who was responsible for the operations of the Post Office. We all said that would be a good thing.

I think now of the Titanic. The first president of the Titanic who was appointed was Michael Warren. He thought he was the captain of the Titanic except that he jumped ship because, when the Conservative Government came to office, it decided it wanted to turn the clock back to the days of dual leadership of the Post Office. It wanted to go back to the time when the Government second-guessed managment.

The Government pulled the rug out from under the captain's feet, so he jumped ship. The Government then looked around for a new president. It offered the job to someone who would not take it because the guidelines were not acceptable, although the pay was all right. The ground rules were that the Minister and the Government would call the shots. What the Government finally got was a deck hand whose name is Mr. Lander. He has been busying himself rearranging the deck chairs on the deck of the Titanic. He said that the other night in committee. He said he cannot talk about the Crown corporation's future because the Government still has not told him what it wants him to do. He made it clear that politicians rather than postal managers will be responsible for the plan which emerges. He said: "This is not a Canada Post plan". The inference is that if it is not a Canada Post plan, it is a Conservative Government plan. That means we are back to the old days.

Mr. Lander said he submitted options to the Minister responsible for the Post Office, and I will call him the Postmaster General because that is what he is. Mr. Lander said: "The choice of options is up to Mr. Côté and his Cabinet colleagues, not the Canada Post management. I do not have a direction in relation to a plan". Furthermore, the plan is being assembled not by the Post Office but by several Government departments which he did not name. Why we are paying this guy the money we are paying him to be President of Canada Post? We should be paying his salary to the Postmaster General, whom we know as the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I think he should be getting Mr. Lander's pay. Mr. Lander is being paid a presidential salary, but is operating like a cook's help. That is what is going on.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister (Mr. Domm) talks about how we created Canada Post and separated it from Government. What the Conservatives have done is take us right back to the 1970s. We are going forward into the past.

The worst thing that can happen at this point in time is to have a Conservative Government with its mindset and its ideology responsible for what is supposed to be a service. We call it "postal service". The name itself indicates that we are talking about a service.

The Government is talking about privateering the Post Office. In this day and age, anyone in this room who thinks that 10 years or 15 years from now we will be sitting down to write our friends a letter, putting a stamp on it and sticking it in a mailbox is wrong. It is wrong to think that is the way mail is going to move and the way in which we are going to communicate. In every Hon. Member's office on the Hill at the moment there is something called "electronic mail". I suspect that will be the way of the future. In fact, the Marchment commission report recommends against the Post Office moving into the area of electronic regular and bulk mail. Do you know why, Mr. Speaker? Because the Conservatives want to leave that to their fat cat friends in the corporate sector. Conservatives want to hive that off for the corporate sector so that it can eat the meal, take the gravy and let the people of Canada get the scraps from the table.

The Hon. Member for Gander—Twillingate (Mr. Baker) made the comparison of the fire department. The fire department is a very good comparison. No one expects the fire brigade to arrive at the House which is burning down and start negotiating with the homeowner the price for putting out the fire. I sat on a municipal council for two years. We never said because the fire department has a deficit we have to cut services. We never considered selling off a pumper. We never said that. We recognized that it was a service. It is the same thing with our town police force. We never looked on the police force as some sort of opportunity for privateering or as a free enterprising operation. It is recognized that it is a service.

• (1500)

Talking about the fire brigade reminds me of Marcus Crassus in 300 BC. This is something which is recorded in history books. He lived in Rome at that time. It is reported that Marcus Crassus owned the only fire brigade in Rome. He was a senator, and not like the type we have in the other place. When there was a fire in Rome he would arrive at the fire and proceed to negotiate with the owner of the villa with respect to a price for putting out the fire. It is recorded that Marcus Crassus became the greatest land owner in all of Rome. That is just the type of thing that the Conservative Government will lead us into with its attitude, view and philosophy with respect to the Post Office.

I tell Hon. Members that the Government has the perfect yes man in the Post Office right now. He hears no evil, sees no evil and speaks no evil. The other day in committee we accused him of being as consultative as an oyster. To every question he was asked he would respond: "Ask the Minister". He told us that we should consult with the Minister. He said: "I don't run this show. I just take orders". That is not what we want at the head of Canada Post which is a Crown corporation.

The Marchment Commission Report points out that one of the biggest problems in the Post Office has been labour relations. The record in this regard is absolutely atrocious. As a matter of fact, the Marchment Commission Report states that labour relations were poisonous. I think that the relationship in the Post Office between management and workers is something like the relationship between a mongoose and a cobra. There is no doubt in my mind that to a large extent the problems with respect to labour and the way in which it gets along with the mangement is entirely due to the Neanderthal thinking of the management.

Take Mr. Lander as an example. Since he was appointed head of the Post Office there have been requests by the workers and their leaders to meet with him. He has refused on every occasion to meet with them. In fact, appointing Mr. Lander President of Canada Post is tantamount to asking the Dukes of Hazzard to park one's car. It will be disastrous. I tell Hon. Members that the situation will be exacerbated because no one is in charge on the deck.

The Government is acting in a secretive way. It has not tabled in the House the documents it has with respect to its plans for the Post Office. The Government has a hidden agenda. It would like to divert our attention with the issue of alternate day delivery. The Government has all of us focusing on that issue when in fact what it really has in mind is a move to group mailboxes. Instead of looking for ways in which to cut back services, the Government ought to be expanding the horizons of the Post Office. It ought to be looking into the area of telecommunications and into the parcel post market. It ought to look to the service centres, one of which has been established in the Rideau Centre. These are the innovative ways in which the Government could go. In fact, I suggest that this is a perfect opportunity to involve the workers, the management and the Minister in developing alternatives to the mess which exists now in the Post Office. As a matter of fact, I know on good authority that the workers themselves have approached management along those lines; but management has refused to respond. The new President of Canada Post will not even meet with them. Just the other day when he appeared before the committee he refused a request to meet with the leadership.

Someone who spoke earlier in this debate pointed out the number of locals which operate in the Post Office and the number of negotations which go on. In fact, it was pointed out by the Hon. Member that the management of the Post Office is constantly negotiating with these locals and that that takes a lot of time. The workers themselves are proposing before the Canadian Labour Relations Board ways in which they can amalgamate some of these locals so that there can be a smoother operation with respect to negotiations for new collective agreements. This would cut down on the amount of time involved.

One of the biggest problems with the Post Office since the time I have been here has been its relationship with its workers. For example, at the present time the Canadian Union of Postal Workers has referred 20,000 grievances to arbitration, some of which have been outstanding since 1981. In fact, the Canadian Union of Postal Workers has had a success rate of between 75 per cent and 80 per cent with respect to all its grievances which go to arbitration. Mr. Speaker, what do you think the management of the Post Office does when it wins a grievance? It appeals it to the Federal Court of Canada. So what the Canadian Union of Postal Workers is doing now is going directly to the Federal Court. In processing these grievances CUPW has had to spend three-quarters of a million dollars a year in arbitration costs, and they only pay half the costs. So one can imagine what it is costing the Post Office.

Surely Conservative Members of the House will complain loudly about the high rate of absenteeism in the Post Office. This high rate of absenteeism is due to the atrocious and abominable record of occupational health and safety in the Post Office. For example, the statistics for the first half of the fiscal year from April, 1985 to September, 1986 are in. Canada Post has a record of one injury for every 6.5 inside postal workers. If one considers just the big plants, that rate jumps to one injury for every three inside workers. Not even the mining industry has such a high rate of accidents. The Post Office now exceeds the mining industry in terms of injuries on the job. This is costing every single Canadian taxpayer not only in terms of lost productivity but in terms of LTD and any other benefits which have to be paid. The injuries are sufficiently serious that they cause long periods of absence from work. The average amount of time lost per injury to an inside worker is 19 days. At the bigger plants the rate goes up to 27 working days. The occupational health and safety of letter carriers has to do with lower back pain, slips and falls, particularly in the winter months and, of course, dog bites. Unions have shown good faith. They are willing to work with management to improve the workplace. Making the workplace safer results in economy in the running of the Post Office.

I would suggest that the Marchment Commission Report and any other documents or proposed plans should be referred to the Committee on Government Operations, if this is the way the Government is going to go. If the Government really wants to go that route, Members of Parliament ought to take a good look at all of those reports and documents and they ought to hear ideas from workers and management. Then parliamentarians will be able to make suggestions as to what elements should go into developing the plan. The public would be heard and when the plan was developed, I think we could safely say that it had input from all quarters. At the present time, it is a peekaboo operation that ought not to be allowed with the new element that is operating in the committees.

Mrs. Mailly: Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a contradiction between the motion presented by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper) and the speech of the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez). The motion asks that we table every single option presented to the Minister regarding the Post Office; yet the Hon. Member is telling us that in doing so, we would be getting too close to running the Post Office the way it used to be run when it was a government Department.

The Hon. Member's speech started off well enough, as always, but deteriorated into rhetoric at the end, as always. I attended the meeting of the standing committee at which the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre asked the President of Canada Post to table all the various options. I clearly heard the President of Canada Post say that he could not present in bits and pieces elements of a business plan because the normal practice for a Crown corporation is to present a business plan to the Minister responsible and then eventually to the standing committee. However, a business plan is first presented to the Minister responsible. This is why I say there is a contradiction in the speech made by the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt.

I have a question for the Hon. Member. He spoke with great passion about the role of the worker in the Post Office and about the bad memories of the time before the Post Office became a Crown corporation, as well as lingering bad memories of poor relations between management and workers. I wonder if the Hon. Member would consider the postal service to be an essential service. If it is an essential service, should the unions have the right to strike?

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, first I would like to clear up any confusion in the mind of the Hon. Member for Gatineau (Mrs. Mailly). She seems to have trouble hearing on Friday afternoons, and that is the time I usually make my speeches in the House. I distinctly said that we all agree that the Post Office should be a Crown corporation. The Hon. Member heard that very clearly. We feel that being a Crown corporation would give unity to leadership in the Post Office.

Of course, what has happened is that with this Government now in office, we have reverted right back to what the Post Office used to be, and I traced that history for Hon. Members. We have now gone back to having a Minister tell the President of the Post Office about the plan. I read what the President said before the committee. He said that the Minister will tell him what to do. The plan is not a Canada Post plan.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Mazankowski) does not direct the President of Air Canada. The President of Air Canada makes decisions along with his board of directors. They make decisions that they think are good business decisions. They do not come running to the Minister of Transport to ask him to give them a plan. They develop a plan themselves and put it into effect. The Minister of Transport can deal with deregulation but he cannot tell Air Canada that it has to put a service between Sudbury and Toronto. It is Air Canada that makes those kinds of business decisions.

In fact, there is no contradiction. This Government has put the Post Office back into a departmental position. If that is what the Government wants to do, it can do so because it has a majority. If those are the rules of the game the Government is now establishing, then let us do it that way. The only fair way to do it the Government's way is to come before the committee with all the documents so that we may examine them and make proposals to the Minister. Certainly the situation that exists in the Post Office now is that it is a no man's land.

The Hon. Member asked if the Post Office was an essential service and if the workers should have the right to strike. The Post Office is as essential as doctors in Ontario. Everyone will agree with that. Workers have the right to withdraw their services if that is the last resort. In my experience, workers do not simply run to the picket lines at every drop of a hat. I know from my previous time here that the postal workers were pushed and pushed until the final straw broke the camel's back.

Every single time the Post Office went on strike, postal workers ensured that arrangements were made so that pensioners could receive their cheques and people on unemployment insurance could go directly to the UI office to pick up their cheques. In fact, that has always been the case.

No one wants to have a strike in the postal service. Therefore, the onus is on all parties to arrange the workplace in such a way that a climate of co-operation is created. I suggested a tripartite approach to the plan, and the workers are asking for that.

Anyone using modern industrial techniques ought to recognize that workers have a role to play in determining a business plan. In fact, the best people to ask about the Post Office are the people who work there, not the Minister and not Members of Parliament. I will bet that those workers can show the Government ways to save millions upon millions of dollars. Why not ask them? Why not treat them with respect and talk to them about the issues? Oh, no, the Government is taking a top-down approach. It is an ex-management mentality.

Mr. Brisco: Mr. Speaker, I have real difficulty accepting that the Government has an ex-management mentality. The Hon. Member should know better than that. Let the facts speak for themselves.

I would like to draw to the attention of the Hon. Member a problem for the workers that he might have addressed but that has not been addressed, and that is, the problem of workers' compensation. If a worker is injured inside the Post Office, the provincial compensation claim is made but there is no provision for the provincial compensation board to bring in an inspector to look at the work site and make recommendations as to how that injury could have been prevented. If the Hon. Member were to read the labour law, he would discover that that is the case.

Right now, my office is preparing a private Member's Bill designed to get rid of that kind of nonsense, which is a denial of the expertise required to determine the cause of an injury and how often such injuries are occurring in a workplace. I have been inside post offices. I have looked at working conditions. I am sure the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) has likewise been inside and is probably aware of the hazards. I hope he knows something about the hazards associated with the monotainers and the lifting which is required out of those monotainers. They are ill-designed. I might add that I am proud of the fact that it took a chiropractor, one of my colleagues, to devise a letter-carrying bag which is now used widely in the Post Office, as they can afford to make them, because they distribute the load. We now find that letter carriers no longer have the kinds of problems with their neck and shoulders they had before from carrying loads which were too heavy and ill-balanced always on the same side.

• (1520)

I should like to refer to one occasion when I visited a post office in my constituency. In the parking lot I noticed a bumper sticker on the supervisor's car which read: "When you work with turkeys, how do you expect to fly with the eagles?". I could not help but to remark to myself, what an attitude with which to greet employees. I asked one or two employees if they had ever noticed the bumper sticker. Thankfully they had not, but I was somewhat embarrassed that I had drawn their attention to it. Can one imagine the impact of that kind of negative statement on the supervisor's employees, on our employees? That is the kind of problem we have to address. It is a management problem. We are prepared to address it as much as anything else.

I do not want to be hung with the claim that we are only concerned about the rights and privileges of management and not the problems of the workers, because that is ill-founded.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Speaker, it is not ill-founded. I do not know where the Hon. Member has been hiding—

Mr. Brisco: In the Post Office.

Mr. Rodriguez: If he had been hiding in the Post Office, he would be aware that occupational health and safety in the Post Office now comes under Part IV of the Canada Labour Code. There are inspectors in Labour Canada who inspect—

Mr. Brisco: How many?

Mr. Rodriguez: That is the Hon. Member's Government and Department. He should ask his Minister. I am not the Minister of Labour. He should ask the Tory Minister of Labour (Mr. McKnight). Who is running the show here? I would not mind running the show but I would want the Minister's salary. I do not mind answering questions for the Minister, but I want his salary.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Would the Hon. Member complete his answer, please?

Mr. Rodriguez: I was just about to complete it, Mr. Speaker. If the inspectors are not doing the job they should be doing in Labour Canada, it is the Hon. Member's responsibility as a Member of Parliament on the Government side because he has a pipeline to the Minister of Labour and can go after him. We are going after him. We are reminding him. If he does not have enough inspectors, he should hire more inspectors. However, the Government is in a cut-back mode. It is not hiring public servants; it is firing them or letting them go. What is happening in the Post Office? The management in Canada Post is being given the golden handshake. Their contracts are being bought out at $50,000 and $60,000. They are being given the golden handshake, and the lower echelon people are being fired.

Mrs. Claudy Mailly (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, Friday afternoons are always very interesting when our hon. friend from Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) is here. Since I had started discussing Crown corporations with him, I would like to finish what I was saying before going on with my speech.

I said there was a contradiction between the speech by the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt and the motion proposed by his colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Keeper), because a real Crown corporation submits an operating plan to the Minister responsible. This is part of the normal practice followed by a Crown corporation, while the motion by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre asks us to divulge the details of this plan bit by bit, and although the Hon. Member for Nickel Belt is right about the fact that the CBC and Air Canada are not subject to daily intervention by a Minister, since they are Crown corporations, the Minister responsible nevertheless receives the operating plans for these Crown corporations and has a responsibility to ensure that the Crown corporation—which is financed or was, initially, by the taxpayers and which is under the Government's jurisdiction since it is still a Crown corporation—that the Crown corporation, as I was saying, fulfils its mandate.

Mr. Speaker, it often happens, and that is the case at Canada Post, that when a Crown corporation is going through a development phase or is in difficulty, the responsible Minister is obliged to intervene more often than would normally be necessary, as in the case of a Crown corporation that is running smoothly.

Mr. Speaker, that is what the President of Canada Post said the other evening, when the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre put the question to him and asked him to reveal his operations plan bit by bit. The President of Canada Post said, in answer to my question, that the present circumstances were not normal ones for the Canada Post Corporation or for any Crown corporation. He said, Mr. Speaker—

"We are a fledgling corporation. We are going through a difficult period. I am the new President and therefore I have to present to the Minister responsible a new business plan. I must develop this business plan. It will include some options for the Government because I am living under a corporate plan which was adopted five years ago and is still running until the end of 1986".

Mr. Speaker, that is what the president of the corporation answered the other night when questioned by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre. So this is the context in which today's motion must be viewed, and more questions immediately come to mind: Is the mover of this motion, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre, serious when he talks about undue interference with Canada Post by the Minister responsible and when his colleague from Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) asks the same question?

Getting back to what I wanted to say before this very interesting exchange began, Mr. Speaker, all Canadians were looking forward to an early settlement of the various issues which eventually led to the Post Office Department being turned into a Crown corporation.

We had very troublesome labour relations problems. We had strikes. These strikes of course led to service breakdowns which were very hard on people who relied on postal services. The other serious problem was that deteriorating services were creating an unacceptable situation. So all Canadians, all parties and all political factions agreed that a postal Crown corporation was the answer.

Unfortunately, for a number of reasons, our dream to settle all outstanding problems and improve services did not become reality. Since then the Government has changed and the corporation is headed by a new president. Canada Post therefore is still in limbo, still far from being able to operate as a healthy Crown corporation.

Mr. Speaker, many of my Government colleagues and I share a common view: service has to be the main object of Canada Post operations.

When this Crown corporation was established the previous Government expected management to reach three objectives at the same time. The first objective was to improve the service; the second, to improve labour relations, and the third, to become financially self-sufficient, in other words, to eliminate the deficit of nearly $1 billion accumulated by the Canada Post Corporation, and to do so by the end of the 1986-87 fiscal year.

• (1530)

According to the vision of the president, those three objectives had to be attained simultaneously. I think that this may have been the beginning of the problem because it seems that, when Canada Post tried to improve its services, it had trouble meeting the objective of self-sufficiency within a period which the new corporation may gave found too short.

Second, Mr. Speaker, as a new Crown corporation without the financial systems required to operate in true autonomy, Canada Post could not even determine its revenues, it did not know exactly what were its expenditures, it did not produce an annual report, it had no financial system, it was not computerized, and moreover, it had problems with its mechanical operations, and labour relations, which people had hoped would improve, were now deteriorating. I believe that the objectives of the new Crown corporation were perhaps set too high or may have been too ambitious.

Today, Mr. Speaker, we find ourselves in a somewhat improved financial situation because, if we look at the financial statements and at the annual report which we finally have, we find that its deficit, which had reached nearly $1 billion, has gone down to approximately $200 million. How was this achieved? I think that that is the $64 question. The deficit was reduced to a great extent thanks to increases in the postage rates.

People may say that nowadays everything is on the increase. After all, 34c. for such a service is not paying much. Look at the way bus fares have increased, look at how much more we have to pay for laundry, cleaning, etc. But the paradox in my view is that the increase from 17 cents to 34 cents came up at the same time as the service deteriorated to a truly unacceptable level.

More so, we had hoped that employer-employee relations would improve with the Crown corporation concept since before that, workers had to face two or three different Ministers when the time came for negotiating a collective agreement. With a Crown corporation, we hoped they would be facing a single employer and the situation would improve.

The tragedy, Mr. Speaker, is that the malaise that existed with the Department endured with the Crown corporation and still exists now, although there has been a slight improvement in employer-employee relations. But the problem, which relates to worker alienation, to the size of the premises where workers must work all day, the lack of direct communication between supervisors and the people they have to supervise, that communication gap is still there. Moreover, a good many supervisors who are responsible for monitoring the work of employees on Canada Post Corporation's premises do not seem to have the training required to provide those workers with a kind of management that is both human and competent, using a simple psychology of respect for the workers. And those supervisors were of the old school which believed their job was to police groups of workers on Canada Post's premises rather than to instil in those employees the pride of belonging to a new Crown corporation: instead of that, the alienation has gone on and the lack of training among those supervisors has created other problems.
