The Orphan Boy.

"Why dost thou mourn so sad, my boy, And tears bedim thine eye; What sorrow clouds thy every joy And whence that heaving sigh ?"

O gentle sir," that orphan said, "My grief is sad to telk, For I have seen my parents laid Within their silent cell.

Oh! I have seen the pangs of death Steal slowly o'er their frame, And heard them with their parting breath, Pronounce my dear-loved name

And I have wept, and still must weep; I never can be gay,
For in my dreams as I do sleep,
To them I'm borne away."

"Oh, do not weep, my little boy, But wash thy tears away, For why should grief so soon destroy Thy pleasures, bright and gay ?",

But still that little orphian wept, And fast his tears did flow, While o'er his heart emotion crept In all the grief of woe.

"And they are gone," he said, "away To those bright realms and fair, Where all are probed in pure array,-Ah! would that I were there !

In the pro-cess of excavating the hill to supply the de-mand for plaster of Paris, vost quantities of bones of unknown animals were found; and these came under the observation of George Cuvier. This man (born 1763, died 1832,) who ranks as one of the greatest philosophers of any age or country, amongst his multifarisous pursuits, directed the energies of his mind to the facts of geology. A profound comparative anatomist, he was naturally led to study the remains dug out of the hill of Montmartre; and from him proceeded those beautiful illustrations of Mr. William Smith's idea, which at once exalted geology into a science. "It is not easy," says Professor Buckland, "to find a more eloquent and striking acknowledgment of the regularity and constancy of the systematic contrivances that prevade the animal remains of the fossil world, that is contained in Cuvier's Introduction to his Account of the Bones discovered in the Gypsum Quarties of the Neighbourhood of Paris. It affords, to persons unacquainted with the modern method of conducting physical researches, an example of the kind of evidence on which we found our conclusions as to the form, character, and habits of extinct creatures, that are known only through the medium of their fos-il remains. After stating by what slow degrees the cabinets of Paris had been filled with innumerable fragments of bones of unknown animals, from the gypsum quarries of Montmartre, Cuvier thus records the manner in which he applied himself to the task of reconstruct-
