POPULAR CHEMISTRY. HEAT.

Why are diving bells restricted in corr their descent to ten or twelve fathoms? Because of the density, and more es- cont pecially the heat of the air, although re- the newed by forcing pumps, becoming in- able supportable. Why does the bark of trees resemble RE

Because it allows the heat to pass from the tree but slowly, and secures, there- into fore, the temperature necessary to vege- frier table life.

Why does the effect of wind, or mo- For tion of the air, quicken evaporation ? Because it removes air saturated with the moisture, and substitutes air which invar is not, thus producing nearly the case of bolde the substance placed in a vacuum. Why do liquids evaporate neither so

Because the presence of the air impedes the spreading from the liquid surface of the newly formed vapor, and keeps it where its pressure resists the formation of vapor; and because the air cons in contact with a liquid, shares its higher temperature with the liquid. Still, in They the night on beds of twigs and straw, BARRISTER & ATTORNEY AT LAW, exhibit thin cakes of ice—and thus ice is produced in India for purposes of luxury.

Why do heated sea sand and soda form glass ? Because, by heating the mixture, the cohesion of the particles of each substance to those of its own kind is so diminished, that the mutual attractions of the two substances come into play, melt together, and unite chemically into the beautiful compound called glass.

Why is sand used in making glass ? Because it serves for stone; it being said that all white transparent stones which will not burn to lime are fit to make

Why is Electricity so called? Because of its origin from electron, the Greek name of amber-the phenomena displayed by rubbing a piece of amber, being the first physical fact recorded in the history of science.

The following is our Paris Corresponent's letter dated yesterday, 6 P The pacific rumors which circulated yesterday and some days previous were as might have been anticipated, much exaggerated, if not totally without foundation so far as they relate to overtures baving been made by Russia Prussia or Austria. The circumstance which gave rise to them was I have already said, the presence of several members of the German Cabinet simultaneous v in Paris: and it was considered that so unwonted and was not sufficiently explained by a desire on their part to visit the Exhibition However plausible the reasons assigned by the ingenuity of the curious, I am enabled to assure you that whatever be the real cause of the prudence of the German Statesmen in this capital no proposition no overture directly or adirectly, official or otherwise, for neace has been made by either of them to the Imperial Government. It is nevertheles looked upon and I think justly as an indication of an improved teeling in the German Courts that the very parties who were the promoters of the Conference of Bamberg—that miniature imitation of the important one of Vienna whose object was to proclaim to the world their servility to Russia, and who left nothing undone to render the accessign of the Germanic Confederation to the policy of the Western Powers impossible, should now be in Paris paying hommage to, and receiving comliments and attentions of the most flat. tering kind from the Sovereign of the country to which they have been in all but open hostility. Baron von der Pofrdten, of Bavaria, and Baron von Beust of Saxony, have worn the Russian uniform to tatters; they have laid it aside for the moment, but before they resume the ragged livery-should they really resume it-they will have occasion to consider whether a national uniform is not more becoming. A trade which attains such proportions—employing so great a capital—rendering productive so large and such varied industry, and extending over so wide a country, is assuredly deserving of no light consideration at the hands of the people of Canada and of the Legconfidence, I should sedulously advocate your claims to attention, while I should also endeavor to contribute to the adoption of such measures as would open up the markets of France and of the West Indian Colonies to our products. The Reciprocity Treaty will benefit one branch of the lumber trade, and I am persuaded that prompt efforts would have an important effect in the directions I have indicated. I am aware of the extent of that great tract of country, known as the Ottawa Valley, which has been estimated by competent authority to contain 80,000 square miles of territory.
