Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend was able to get out of his office I shall not have any difficulty in getting out of mine, because I have the same number of secretaries as he had, I think he had the same number of persons acting as secretaries though they may not have been so designated. The only difference between himself and myself is that I have designated the office of secretary as such. It is quite true that I have a secretary attached to the office of the Privy Council, and also to the office of External Affairs, but as my right hon. friend knows, External Affairs appropriation covers also the requirements of the Prime Minister's office, and I do not think that anyone in this House will for a moment think it extravagant to ask for two secretaries for the responsible position of Prime Minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly not, and I do not want to appear to dispute the word of the Prime Minister; but I cannot make his statement harmonize with the estimates. There are two secretaries provided for here in about the sixth item in the estimate. That is clear. Then going back to the Privy Council estimates, we find there are two more, or four in all. Now, I do not think that four secretaries can be efficiently used, but even supposing that they can, I do not understand the explanation that these are simply officers who formerly acted as secretaries and are now being only named as such. If so, the Prime Minister should be able to point out where there is a reduction from last year's estimate in lieu of the men who acted as clerks last year. A man may have served as clerk last year, getting $600 extra as secretary. Well, show where he goes off as clerk, in order that we may understand why he appears again as secretary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is hardly fair when he seeks to imply that there are four secretaries for this one office. As I explained a moment ago, two departments of the Government have been brought under one minister, and I cannot agree with the leader of the Opposition when he says that there are no duties attaching to the office of President of the Privy Council. During all the time that he was Prime Minister he had four secretaries but he had also a separate minister holding the position of President of the Council, and that minister had his staff with him. He had his secretaries, and evidently there was work then for them to do. There is work to be done to-day, and it is a very considerable work, as my right hon. friend would know if he had acted as President of the Privy Council. I appreciate the fact that he was not President of the Council and therefore cannot be aware of the work attached to the office. The President of the Privy Council found it necessary to have the staff I ask for here, and I confess that I find it absolutely necessary myself.

Mr. TOLMIE: I quite agree with the remarks of the leader of the Opposition regarding the hardships suffered by secretaries who on the expiration of the term of office of their ministers are thrown out of employment. Is it the aim of the Government on this occasion to find work for such secretaries at the salaries that they would have drawn, with the $600 secretarial allowance deducted?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There again, it is not a matter so much of Government policy as what the Civil Service Commission will permit. There are a number of positions in the Civil Service to which men may be appointed at the instance of the Commission. So far as it is possible to do so, the Government is trying to take care of the secretaries of gentlemen who held portfolios in the late government. For instance, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) has retained the secretary of his predecessor at exactly the same salary, and proposes to treat him in exactly the same way. That has not been possible in all departments, but we have endeavoured to look after those members of the service who were secretaries and to see that they receive the salaries that would be equivalent to what they earned previously in the departments. I think that a man who has served as an efficient private secretary to a minister of the Crown is likely to make the very best type of civil servant; he is apt to have much larger experience and wider information than any clerk, of the work of the Government departments except in special fields; and I should like very much if some way could be found to retain men who have given service to the country, not by day only but also by night, year in and year out, and who at the time of change of administration might otherwise not be retained in their offices. It cannot all be done in a day, however.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On the whole, I think the Government have acted fairly with the secretaries of the late ministers. I do not know that that statement can be applied absolutely, but speaking generally I think they have acted fairly. I simply want to understand the vote. I think I understand by the last statement of the Prime Minister that he has two secretaries as President of the Privy Council and two secretaries as Minister of External Affairs, making four secretaries in all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would state it in this way. I have one secretary as President of the Privy Council; he has an assistant. I have one secretary as Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs, and he has an assistant. As my right hon. friend knows, and this should be remembered, the difference between the office of the Prime Minister and that of other departments of the Government is that most of the work is necessarily carried on by the secretaries, not by a staff as in the case of other departments. Practically, the immediate personnel of the Prime Minister's office changes with a change of Government. That is not so to the same extent with regard to other Government departments.

Item agreed to.

High Commissioner's Office—salaries, $26,640; Contingencies, $76,586.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is exactly the same vote as last year except for the statutory increases.

Mr. HANSON: We have noticed through the press that a gentleman from the city of Toronto, a great personal friend of the Prime Minister, and a stalwart of the Liberal party, has been appointed to the very important position of High Commissioner for Canada at London. It seems to me that we might well have some statement from the Prime Minister as to any changes which he proposes to have made through that gentleman in the working of that office. I understand that it has been his stated policy that any announcement with regard to matters of policy, and I regard this as a matter of policy, shall be made to Parliament. I believe that principle has been honoured more in the breach than the observance by the present Prime Minister, because I notice that the present High Commissioner was banqueted on a number of occasions, on one of which at least I think the Prime Minister was present. I would suggest that this is an opportune moment for the Prime Minister to state to the House and to the country what changes he proposes shall take place with respect to the working of the office of the High Commissioner at London under the new incumbency.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may answer my hon. friend by saying that of recent years there have been representatives of different government departments in London, for instance the Immigration Department, the Pension Board, Trade and Commerce and other departments, each of which has carried on its work by direct communication with the departmental heads here, but there has not been supervision under one head, of all the government agencies in the Old Country. It is proposed that the High Commissioner who has just been appointed shall exercise supervision over all the government agencies in London, to co-ordinate the work as effectively as possible, and to be the one channel through which the departments of the Government will communicate with the Government offices in Great Britain. That is the one change, I think, of importance.

Another change that has been suggested is that in making further appointments to the office of the High Commissioner in London, an effort be made to secure Canadians to fill the vacancies that occur on the staff.

Mr. MANION: The Prime Minister has just covered the point I was going to raise. I have noticed at different times at that office in London that there were a great many on the staff who were not Canadians, and while I have no objection in any shape or form to British born being in that office, I believe that the Canadian office in London or anywhere else is one that should be filled by Canadians. I was going to ask my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to make a statement in regard to that, and I am very pleased to hear that it is the intention of the Government to fill that office as far as possible with Canadians.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am getting afraid of the overtime working of this word "co-ordination". I do not know what is meant by co-ordination now. Perhaps we had better defer these estimates. How are you going to co-ordinate the various offices in England, the Immigration Office, the Trade and Commerce Office, and all the others under the High Commissioner? The Trade and Commerce officers are officers of the Trade and Commerce Department and will be subject to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Immigration officers, Mr. Obed Smith and those under him, are under the Minister of the Interior. Similarly any officers that may be over there in the interests of the Railway Department will be under the Minister of Railways. How are they to be under the High Commissioner, and then each in turn under his minister here? That kind of co-ordination will simply mean chaos. It will simply mean a division of authority, a conflict of interest, friction and trouble, so if that is going to be the fruitage of all the promises made at these banquets I am afraid it would be better to eliminate co-ordination from the dictionary altogether. Would the Prime Minister tell us to what extent these men are to be responsible to the High Commissioner, and to what extent they are to be responsible to their ministers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I might tell my hon. friend that when Sir George Perley, who was High Commissioner under his government, returned to Canada to tender his resignation, he informed me that he thought it very important that in some manner the High Commissioner should have supervising authority over all branches of the Canadian Government in England. He stated that during recent years different agencies of the Canadian Government in England were becoming accustomed to taking up matters on their own account with the British Government without any knowledge on the part of the High Commisioner as to what was going on, and frequently this had resulted in two or three different departments of the government of Canada dealing with the Home Government without the knowledge of each other and with consequent confusion and a great deal of overlapping. He pointed out that from his view it was most important that, if possible, as had been originally intended, all communication between the Home Government and the different departments of the Canadian Government carrying on work there should be through the High Commissioner's office or with its knowledge. It was, I say quite frankly, on the suggestion and recommendation of Sir George Perley as the result of his experience as to what was best and most necessary in connection with that office, that the present Government was pleased to take the line of policy which it has taken, the advantages of which, I think, are so obvious as to commend it to everyone.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is a very different thing indeed to placing these officers under the High Commisioner. What Sir George Perley evidently intended was this, that in so far as these officers acting under the instructions of their respective ministers had anything to do with the British Government they should act through the High Commissioner's office, making that the medium between them and the British Government. But that does not place them under the High Commissioner in any way whatsoever. It merely makes the High Commissioner the agency of communication for all the departments. There is no supervision exercisable by him at all, nor is there any co-ordination. There is merely the ultization of the High Commisioner's office for the purposes of communication with the British Government. That is all I have ever heard Sir George Perley urge, myself, and that does not in any way detract from the authority of the minister over his officers or place any of the supervising power over an officer of a department in the hands of the High Commissioner in London. That, I should think, would be detrimental to the service, and I venture to suggest that if the High Commissioner asked for it, his request would not be endorsed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on the one hand or the Minister of the Interior on the other. To make him a medium of communication is wholly another thing. He is in no sense a supervisor of their work.

Mr. GOOD: I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question which applies not only to this department, but possibly to some others. As prices are going down, we ought to expect some reduction in the items included under the heading "Contingencies"—clerical assistance, rent, insurance, income tax, fuel, light, stationery, etc. I notice here, and I have noticed in connection with the other estimates we have discussed this evening, that no reduction in these items is indicated. I feel a little uneasy lest with the falling prices we are really enlarging or increasing our expenditures.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is very difficult to tell exactly how much will be required for this service during any given year. It has been found advisable to vote annually a certain sum, all of which may not be required. We are simply following that course: we are voting, in round figures, the same as was voted last year. If the full amount is not needed, the balance will be returned to the Treasurey, but if an insufficient amount were voted, embarrassment might result. With the business growing as it is, what is saved through reduced costs may be taken up in increased and extended duties.

Mr. GOOD: Well I do not feel quite satisfied with the answer, although it may be a sufficient one as applying to this particular item. If we vote more than will be required, we may be giving encouragement to extravagance, and surely that is something we ought to avoid. It might be that embarrassment would be caused if less than the amount required were voted. But if that applies to this particular department, it surely does not apply so much to the departments nearer home.

Mr. CRERAR: What is the salary of the High Commissioner?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am informed it is $10,000.

Item agreed to.

Civil government—Militia and Defence—salaries and contingencies, $615,577.

Mr. MEWBURN: I have a very sincere sympathy with the minister who is in charge of this very onerous department of government, and I commend his efforts to economize. I find that he has reduced the staff by nine, making a net saving of $925, which is very commendable indeed. I understand that the minister is going to "coordinate" several of the government services: militia, naval, police, and air services are to be merged. I think the items which have just been called ought to carry, but I sincerely trust that when the minister gets through with his efforts in the co-ordination of these four departments, there will be something left beyond air.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Militia and Defence): I may say that I tried to use the word "synchronize" instead of the word "co-ordinate," but it did not seem to fit in.

Mr. HANSON: The "syn" part is all right.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, some of us do inherit things. The estimates for civil government are practically what they were last year. We have reduced the number of employes by nine, but we are providing for $24,000 by way of annual increase according to the classification. If you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, I will read a statement which the officers of the department have given me; it will cover the case fairly and generally:

The original permanent civil establishment of the Department of Militia and Defence for the fiscal year 1921-22 (i.e., the year of readjustment after the war and after reclassification) numbered 441. The Estimates for that year were prepared in the fall of 1920 and were not submitted to Parliament till four or five months later. Owing to the rapid falling off of the work during that time, it was difficult to make any close or accurate forecast of the needs of the department for twelve to fifteen months in advance. Accordingly, when the Estimates were presented to Parliament it was thought that 42 of the 441 positions would not be required and, on the suggestion of the Minister of Militia, the money for these positions was not voted, leaving a net establishment of 399 persons.

Later in the year it was found that two of these positions would be required, and as the incumbents had been in the service for many years and there was a surplus in the appropriation, their salaries were paid, bringing the establishment to 401 persons.

During the year, a committee on reorganization, consisting of a representative of the Civil Service Commission, the Assistant Deputy Minister, and another general representative of the Department, together with the Chief of the branch being reorganized, found during their investigations that it was expedient to create fourteen new permanent civil positions in the various branches of the department, thus making the establishment 415, but, at the same time, this Committee recommended that 24 of the then existing positions should be abolished, reducing the establishment to 391. The recommendation to Privy Council for the new establishment embracing these changes has been put forward by the Civil Service Commission and is now before Privy Council.

One account clerk, a returned soldier, still suffering from wounds, is carried supernumerary to establishment but for which no vote is required, reducing the actual establishment for which Estimates are being put forward to 390 as compared with 399 for last year.

Attached hereto is a balance sheet showing the changes in the establishment since April 1st, 1921, and the money value of these changes.

It should be noted in connection with the total amount voted for the fiscal year 1921-22, $586,431, and the total amount required for 1922-23, $585,577, that although the saving of $854 seems small, the amount for the coming year includes provision for the annual increases in salaries of $60, $120 or $180 to 390 employes and had there not been savings as described above and in reclassification, the requirements for this year must have exceeded the vote for last year by the estimated amount of those increases, viz: about $24,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Tell us when the work of re-classification was undertaken.

Mr. GRAHAM: It was begun in 1920 and completed about three months ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see; we have at least enabled the Minister to effect such reductions as he has made.

Mr. GRAHAM: He had quite a willingness to do it before.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I notice that about 20 junior clerks have been released but that in place of them pretty nearly the same number of senior clerks have been appointed. How is that?

Mr. GRAHAM: In 1921-22 there were 27 junior clerks and in 1922-23 there were 16. Then of junior file clerks there were 33 in 1921-22, and 16 in 1922-23.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Further up the list there are three more junior file clerks, making twenty altogether that have gone, and on the other side of the page nearly the same number of seniors have been added. That is to say, on the one side about twenty juniors are represented to have gone, and on the other side some twenty seniors have been added.

Mr. GRAHAM: If we are to take all the good that is to come out of the Civil Service Commission we must accept the things to which we object as well. These changes are due to the re-classification made with the full consent and approval and with the assistance of the Civil Service Commission. Under that re-classification these changes were made. On the whole, my hon. friend will see that there is a reduction in the number of employees.

Mr. STEVENS: With the decrease of activity in my hon. friend's department, so widely advertised and so marked with the reduction of staffs throughout the country, why is it necessary to have three purchasing agents instead of one? I should think with the reduction of activities throughout the country, one junior purchasing agent would have been able to carry on without adding two more to the staff.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is the exact number the department had before the war. Under the re-classification the staff has been reduced to a pre-war condition.

Mr. STEVENS: But the number has increased.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is no increase anywhere except through re-classification.

Mr. STEVENS: Then this is a case where figures lie.

Mr. GRAHAM: I wil not give the reverse statement. I might say this, Mr. Chairman, in reply to the remark of my hon. friend as to decreased activities: During the war period a great many hundred temporary employees had of necessity to be taken into the department. The estimates of this department ought now to be credited with a further reduction of $600,000; instead of the reduction being $1,100,000 it actually is $1,700,000. These temporary employees were engaged after the war and they were paid out of Demobilization Vote, consequently their names, or the amounts paid to them, do not appear in the Civil Service list. But the reduction that takes place in the Department on March 31st, of 400 employees—which reduction I dislike personally very much to make—means a saving of $600,000 more than appears in these estimates. In other words, had not that reduction been made the vote under War Claims, which appears in another place, would have been $600,000 larger than it is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I notice it is now a good deal larger than last year.

Mr. GRAHAM: The War Appropriation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, I tell my right hon. friend, since he insists, that if he had not taken $3,000,000 out of the Demobilization Fund to give it to the Dominion Steel Company we would have paid a lot of these debts this year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And I tell the minister that with that taken out, an obligation which undoubtedly rose from the war, there was still a large balance over, and the whole amount asked for last year was for a sum much less than the sum asked for this year, although we are a year further from the war. I would like to ask the minister how much of this reduction was effected or provided for in the year 1921 in sums that are attributable to and paid out of demobilization or, as it is called now, "Adjustment of War Claims"?

Mr. GRAHAM: These included in the $600,000 have been made since the present Government came into office and are to take effect from April 1st, the beginning of the next fiscal year.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think this item should carry, although we have had some usesful discussion on it. In the absence of the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) who was Minister of Militia in the late Government, and who will be back, I think, to-morrow—at all events by Wednesday—I think the item should stand.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am not going to press for its adoption but we will have all the other Militia estimates open for discussion, and I would like to say that I would have had my bill for uniting the different defence departments under one head up to-day had it not been at the request of the ex-Minister of Militia who asked me to defer it until he came back. He raised no objection to going on with the estimates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it is correct that the hon. member for Wellington made that request—I know he mentioned to me that he would ask that the bill should stand over—but his request would have had just as much application to these estimates. I do not suppose he anticipated the estimates would be gone on with, there are other estimates that can be taken up.

Mr. CRERAR: Before we pass from this item may I ask the minister if this sum we are voting here will cover the administration of the co-ordinated departments after the co-ordination takes place?

Mr. GRAHAM: No. It is a difficult situation to form an opinion as to the various departments as the amalgamation is not completed and each department is asking for its own estimates; but in the other departments we expect to have a saving—in some of them at least—much more than will appear on the surface. Under the heading of Civil Government, part of the estimates we are asking practically total the same amount as before till we have an opportunity, after the bill for the amalgamation goes through, to find out just where we can make a saving. It is confidently expected, for instance, that the executive work of the Air Force and the Militia can be merged; I am afraid it will become necessary to make a large reduction in the number of temporary employees on the staff of the Air Board—in fact I know it will have to be done, much to my regret. Then we have the Naval Service which we hope to amalgamate as far as possible—the purchasing department and the departmental services as we might call them. In the mounted police, which has always conducted its departmental services separately, we hope to make quite a large saving; but what these savings will be I cannot tell from the estimates for Civil Government until I have had an opportunity to bring the different departmental staffs together. I shall then be able to tell what the actual saving will be in that respect. As I say, each department, at the present time, is asking for its Civil Government estimates practically the same amount as before. When I get the amalgamation into one department effected, I hope to be able to make quite a saving in Civil Government, as well as in the other branches. It must be remembered that a great deal of what we call temporary services, although they are not perhaps paid for out of that vote, always have been carried on by temporary and not by permanent employees,

Mr. GOULD: If we can point out to the minister when he brings his bill down where a million or two can be saved in this department, he might not need all the money asked for in this item.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am afraid it would not interfere with the civil staff very much, if any. It is like a business. You have your organization and a great deal of the work is carried on by temporary employees. So far as the permanent employees are concerned, unless we drop the organization altogether, I am afraid we need not expect much reduction in the civil staff.

Naval Service, salaries, $215,220.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is an increase over last year of some $5,130.

Mr. GRAHAM: The increases are all statutory.

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: One would think, with all the co-ordination going on, that there might be a diminution.

Mr. GRAHAM: The only reply I can make to that is that the Civil Service Commission is responsible for every increase there.

Mr. CRERAR: They are the customary statutory increases?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the whole staff to be continued? The minister had not the privilege of being here last session and the previous session, or he would understand my amazement now in finding the civil list added to even in this awful department of Naval Service.

Mr. MANION: Suppose the work of the department were wiped out altogether, would the minister say that, because the Civil Service Commission had made appointments to the staff and the staff had been organized, it would therefore continue in perpetuity? If the work is cut down, does not the staff come down, even in spite of the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. GRAHAM: I will explain that we do not expect to have a saving until we get our reorganization effected. That is one of the difficulties of reorganization. We are not just in a position to say how great the saving will be. These estimates do not all belong to the naval service proper. These include very many other services besides what is sometimes called the Naval Service. They include fishery protection, which is undertaken by the British navy to some extent. They include the wireless telegraphy, the hydrographic staff, the tidal surveys and so on. Several items are put under the naval expenditures which are not justly chargeable to the naval service at all, and I might point out that notwithstanding the criticism that, while last year the naval service estimates for the naval service alone, without the other services were $2,500,000, this year I have reduced them with one stroke of the pen to $1,500,000.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend did not answer the question I asked. I wanted to know, as a general question, not dealing with his department more than any other, though it does deal with his department; when the work of a department is cut down, is it prohibited by the Civil Service Commission, as implied by his own remarks, that the organization should be cut down at the same time? Is the cutting down absolutely prevented by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not think so.

Mr. MANION: His remark suggested the question. If the minister says it is not prevented, and he has cut down the estimate a million and a half—

Mr. GRAHAM: A little over a million.

Mr. MANION: That must mean the cutting down of the work of the department to a great extent. It would seem to me, that under those circumstances, that would permit of the cutting down also of the headquarters staff.

Mr. HANSON: Will there be two deputy ministers of this department of defence? There is the Deputy Minister of Naval Service, the Deputy Minister of Militia and the Deputy Minister of Fisheries. Is the hon. minister going to have three or four of them?

Mr. GRAHAM: I will explain that situation more fully when I get my bill for the amalgamation of the different services.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Does the minister think we ought to consider that item before he knows what he wants? He apparently does not know what he wants, and apparently cannot give any explanation as to what he wants. Why should we consider this matter till the bill is brought down? Referring to another matter, he says all the changes are the result of the action of the Civil Service Commission. I never knew the Civil Service Commission created vacancies or positions, nor do I think they are doing it now. We are going to have the work of the department cut down to a very large extent, but I see we have one inspector where there was none before. We have one accountant in grade 4 where there was none before, and six head clerks at headquarters where there were formerly four. We have an accountant in grade 2 where there was none before. Then, we have two new secretaries to the executive, whatever that is; I suppose that is to keep track of the contractions that are going to be made in the service. We have two secretaries to the executive to work out the reductions that the hon. gentleman is going to make; we have six senior account clerks as against five before; we have six senior clerks as against five; we have sixteen clerk stenographers as against eleven; five clerk typists as against one, and seven file clerks as against six, and we are told this is all due to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. GRAHAM: Get down to the totals.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am taking the explanation of the minister. The explanation given by my hon. friend was that all these changes were made by the Civil Service Commission, and I am pointing out at a glance that he has not been quite properly instructed.

Mr. GRAHAM: Notwithstanding my hon. friend's wonderful information, he dodged successfully or unsuccessfully the Civil Service Commission while he was in office. We have the same number of clerks as before, and owing to re-classification, their status has been changed. If he looks at the totals he will understand it.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would like to call attention to the same thing that I had occasion to refer to a few minutes ago. There are at the foot of this list some fifteen or sixteen junior clerks who have lost their positions, and those positions have been taken by senior clerks at much higher salaries. Is that also under the commission?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is absolutely under the commission.

Mr. CHAPLIN: It is time the department of the minister took something into its own hands.

Mr. GRAHAM: Would the hon. gentleman vote for that?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes, I will vote for the abolition of the commission.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is my hon. friend serious in stating that the Civil Service Commission dismissed a large number of the more poorly paid clerks in the department? That was the question that was put.

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not say anything of the kind.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is the question that I understood was put by my hon. friend, and the answer was that they were dismissed by the commission.

Mr. GRAHAM: That was not the question nor the answer. My hon. friend is wrong both ways.

Mr. CHAPLIN: My question was quite plain. I inquired why it was that fifteen junior clerks had lost their jobs and senior clerks at higher salaries had taken their places.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is, I think, mistaken. He should not be led astray by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) who knows nothing about the Civil Service Commission. Of course, he had some branches under him, but they were not under the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I am asking a plain question.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is a reclassification of junior clerks into higher positions. The hon. member will probably find most of these junior clerks who, he thinks, were dismissed, occupying better positions owing to reclassification.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That is one reason why I am in favour of abolishing the commission. Let me just look into the explanation of the minister. There are five junior typists at a salary of $720. Does the minister mean to say that those men are now in amongst senior clerks at a salary of $1,140? That is a pretty big increase for one year. I do not think the minister has made a proper explanation, because these junior clerks are at such a low salary and the senior clerks at such a relatively high salary. As I understand the matter, the usual increase is only $120 a year.

Mr. GRAHAM: Most of these stenographers are ladies and not men. I say again to my hon. friend that as long as we have the Civil Service Commission, the departments are bound to carry out the classifications under the commission in this respect.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Is there anything in the Civil Service Act that would prevent the minister from reducing this staff? Another objection which I have to this proposition is this: The minister tells us that there has been a reduction in expenditure in the outside service of some million dollars. In other words, men in the outside service are losing their jobs, and yet the overhead of the department remains stationary. In ordinary business, when your business goes away from you, you must bring down your overhead to correspond.

Mr. CRERAR: What is the extent of our Naval Service in Canada? This, I understand, covers the fleet which, if newspaper reports are true, is somewhere out in the Atlantic at the present time; but beyond one cruiser, two destroyers and two submarines, that, I think, constitute the fleet, what is the Naval Service of Canada? I was going to add—and, perhaps, the minister could give the explanation when he rises to answer my question—that it seems to me that 125 of a staff in the head office of the Naval Service is quite a considerable staff to run our limited Naval Service.

Mr. GRAHAM: As I pointed out a moment ago, that would be what the country understands as the Naval Service, but the Naval Service includes probably half a dozen other branches. It includes the Fishery Protection Service, in which we have six fishery protection vessels. It also includes the Hydrographic Survey in which we have five vessels. Then, under the arrangement with the British Admiralty, when we passed the Naval Service Act in 1910, we have to provide for the care of the docks at Esquimalt and Halifax. We have at the present time a school at Halifax and a school at Esquimalt in addition to the ships to which my hon. friend refers. These ships were presented by the British Admiralty to the Dominion of Canada through the late government, and they were accepted by the late government.

Mr. CRERAR: A great mistake.

Mr. GRAHAM: I shall be prepared to discuss that, but not on the civil estimates. That is the situation, and these two destroyers, two submarines and one cruiser are now the property of Canada on account of the presentation made of them through the late government to Canada.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: It appears to me that the same objection might be made to passing this estimate as was raised to the militia and defence estimates. If it is intended to co-ordinate the three branches of the service, it seems a strange procedure to continue the appointments under the head of civil government, to pass the three civil government estimates, and then later on to have an explanation by the minister as to how these savings are going to be made. It would be more satisfactory to know what the Government proposes to do in the matter before we pass all the estimates for civil government. It may be that many of these officials will not be required. If the Government cannot do anything themselves in making an adjustment on account of the Civil Service Commission, there is something radically wrong. I quite appreciate that, where three branches of the Government are to be co-ordinated and brought under one head, a minister would naturally desire to have some reforms made. If it is owing to the fact that the Civil Service Commission exercises so much control over him that his hands are tied, something should be done about the matter. Surely if those three branches are brought under the one department, some very radical changes can be made and great savings effected. It has been intimated that there is going to be a very large saving made in the Air Force, the Naval Service and the Militia. If that be the case, surely as the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) has pointed out, there must be some reductions made in the overhead charges in connection with this, as there would be in any business that was carried on on a business basis. It seems a most unusual thing to pass all these items under the head of civil government, and then to discuss how these reforms shall be put into effect. This item could surely stand along with the other two to which the same complaint might be raised.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is, perhaps, not quite clear on this point. These services must be continued, because any changes that are made cannot be completed for perhaps three months. The bill may not pass. Indeed, my bill would have been before the House instead of these estimates, if it had not been for the Opposition. This is not my fault. It is necessary to pass these estimates in order to carry on the work as we have it, until we can complete the reorganization, and I am inclined to believe that the shortest period in which we can get the reorganization effected is three months. It is not an easy matter to get together four different departments, and to undertake to say what the adjustment is going to be until we get them together. We may find that one man will answer where we have two now. I do not know which man, I do not know what salary, and until we can get the amalgamation effected, which will take some months, we must have estimates passed to carry on with our staff.

Mr. BOYS: In the Department of Naval Service there is a deputy minister at $6,000, and an assistant deputy at $4,200; under Militia and Defence a deputy minister at $6,000, and an assistant deputy at $5,100. In the Air Board the total is given as $75,000. I presume the Chairman of the Air Board has the same status as a deputy minister?

Mr. GRAHAM: The minister is chairman of the board and he gets nothing in addition for it.

Mr. BOYS: But I thought there was a Chairman of the Air Board too.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is a Deputy Chairman, General Gwatkin.

Mr. BOYS: I presume he gets $5,000 or $6,000. His salary would be part of the $75,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: General Gwatkin is a military man, but at my request he is acting as Deputy Chairman of the Air Board at the present time. Colonel Biggar was Deputy Chairman and he got no salary whatever; he acted for nothing. General Gwatkin was Inspector General of the Air Force, and, as I say, is Acting Deputy Chairman of the board. I may add that the Acting Deputy Chairman is retiring after a few months'leave of absence.

Mr. BOYS: As it stands, I presume he receives $5,000, or possibly $6,000. Turning to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Controller, I take it, would receive $5,000 or $6,000. We have, all told, seven or eight highly paid officials, and if there is to be a co-ordination it is to be presumed some of the officers must be dispensed with. Surely it is important to know if that is to take place before we are asked to vote these salaries. If you are to have only one deputy and one assistant deputy under the co-ordination, then a lot of salaries will not be needed, and we ought to have some knowledge on that point before being asked to vote these items. The same line of reasoning no doubt applies to clerks and other officials in the various branches of the service, but for convenience sake I single out the most highly paid officials in order to ascertain the minister's views. I appreciate what he says, that it will take a little time to effect the reorganization, but perhaps it would be well to let the Estimates stand until the bill is before the House. If the bill does not pass I can understand that all these officers will have to be kept on. If, on the other hand, the bill passes and there is a co-ordination, most of these salaries would not be required for more than three months at the outside.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is a difficulty in dropping these Estimates until we know how we are to make the reorganization. The hon. member possibly thinks that it is an easy matter to get the different staffs to work in, but until I have the full authority of Parliament to commence the work of reorganization I do not know just what may be done. It will take months to work it out exactly in detail, and in the meantime we have assured the House of our intention to cut down expenses, by cutting down more than $1,000,000 in the Naval Estimates. That is good evidence that we intend to make reductions. Of the civil government expenditures, only 46 per cent refers to Naval Service at all; 54 per cent is for other services. When hon. gentlemen talk about cutting down on civil government, they are talking about something which they cannot grasp; nor can I grasp it fully until I have had a chance to take off my coat and go into it and decide what I am to do. Not a dollar of this money that is not absolutely necessary will be expended, but in the meantime the staffs have to carry on until we can effect the amalgamation.

Mr. BOYS: A 25 per cent vote would take care of the situation for at least three months. I think the Estimates should stand and the minister could go on with the bill. Upon the result of the bill we could deal more intelligently with the items.

Mr. LOGAN: I endorse what has been said by the hon. member. We are absolutely in the dark to-night. Let us have the bill, and we can intelligently discuss the Estimates. Discussing Estimates for three or four departments that are to be co-ordinated, seems to me rather ridiculous. Why cannot we wait until the ex-Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) returns, have the bill presented by the present minister (Mr. Graham), and then approach the Estimates in an intelligent and satisfactory way? We all desire to carry on the affairs of the country, but we are rather in the dark at the present time, and if the minister is at sea we are out in the ocean.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Does the reduction of $1,000,000 which the minister refers to apply to the Naval Service proper or to other branches connected with it?

Mr. GRAHAM: It applies to Naval Service proper and to other services too.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister says that 46 per cent of the activities represented here are concerned with the Naval Service. What becomes of the other 54 per cent? I think my hon. friend has made a serious charge in connection with the Civil Service Commission. I do not profess to have looked into the matter as he has done, but for the purpose of appreciating the facts, I would ask him to give me the names of the junior clerks who were reclassified and promoted, showing from what ratings they were promoted and what ratings they were given, and when that was done.

Mr. MANION: While the minister is looking up the information, I should like to emphasize a fact stated by previous speakers. I was one of the first to mention that I did not see any reason why the Civil Service Commission should be permitted to keep the overhead as high as it was, when the rest of the staff had been cut down. In looking over the details I find that it is as high as it ever was. Take the Department of Militia. There are 390 employees provided for this year as against 399, a decrease of 9; but in the Royal Northwest Mounted Police there is an increase of 8—22 as against 14; while in the Department of Naval Service the number is absolutely the same as it was before. So that with one exception, there are the same number of employees in the three departments as there were under the expensive operation which the late government carried on, according to my hon. friend. Certainly, with the cutting down that he is doing—and I have no reason to doubt that he is cutting down—I think there will be plenty of opportunity for him to reduce the staff. Seeing that he is reducing the outside staff he might effect economies in the inside service, and I agree that this vote should be held until we can get more details. At the moment the minister is not in a position to tell us what he is going to do. To keep him in good humour I might remind him that last year I well remember sitting behind the minister when his Estimates were up, and when hon. gentlemen opposite who were then on this side of the House took up very much more time discussing Estimates than we have done, sometimes even prolonging the discussion for a week or two; so we have a long distance to go before hon. gentlemen opposite are equalled in their blocking tactics of last year and the year before.

Mr. GRAHAM: In reply to my hon. friend's question as to General Gwatkin's salary, he receives a pension from the British Government, and I am informed that the amount he receives from us is $3,500. I might say, so far as giving details is concerned, that it is impossible for me to give them now. The best I could do would be to make a blind guess. It will take three months to make the amalgamation, and if Parliament takes the ground that it must know all the details before we proceed with the work, I say that that is a very unbusinesslike stand to take, and that nobody would take it in their own private business. We cannot proceed to amalgamate these branches until given authority to carry on.

Mr. MANION: But under the amalgamation we should not need the same amount of money. My hon. friend admits that he will probably cut the staffs down, but here we find an increase in the Estimates of three different branches. We should not be required to vote an equal or greater amount than was voted last year.

Mr. GOULD: It seems to me that the minister is asking us to construct a large frame work into which can be fitted the various organizations that have existed in the past. If the bill he proposes for the co-ordination of the various branches should pass the House, the structure we are now building by the passing of these Estimates will have to be wrecked to a certain extent. It does seem to me that the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) expressed the proper view, and that the minister should bring his bill before the House and give us at least some idea of what he proposes in the way of co-ordinating these various branches. Then the members of the committee would be in a better position to make suggestions to the minister as to how the moneys required for the administration of this amalgamated department could be provided. I hope the minister will see his way to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Cumberland.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before the committee rises I would like to say a word in regard to an impression which I think the committee has gained from the minister. I do not think he intended to give a wrong impression, but I think the committee got the impression that the Civil Service Commission is responsible for what they are not responsible for at all. Notwithstanding the Civil Service Commission and the Civil Service Act, as the minister well knows—I do not think he tried to mislead the committee or had any thought of doing so—the Government can make any reduction that it sees fit. The Government may accept the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission as to what organization is necessary for a certain work, but the responsibility of accepting it is on the Government. The Government can dismiss as many officers as they desire. If there were anything in the act restraining or abbreviating the right of the Government or the authority or responsibility of the Government in respect of the public service, I would feel, like the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), that the time had come for an amendment, but that is not in the power of the commission at all. That is not its responsibility; that is the responsibility wholly of the Government. I commend the attitude of the minister in allowing this item to stand.

Mr. GRAHAM: I have no objection to letting it stand. I was just saying that I cannot tell what is going to happen until I have the authority to have it happen. Let me point out to my right hon. friend that I did not make any suggestion that the Civil Service Commission dismissed people. He was listening to his desk-mate, not to me. I fully explained that probably none of the junior clerks referred to were dismissed, but simply became seniors in the re-classification. The ex-Minister of Finance put his own interpretation upon that. He was the one to talk about the commission dismissing them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that the committee got the impression, not that the commission dismissed anybody, but that they prevented the minister from dismissing them.

Mr. GRAHAM: I never suggested that. It was the ex-Minister of Finance.

Mr. BROWN: I would urge upon the Government the necessity of giving consideration to the demand which exists throughout the country for a reduction in the staffs of the Civil Service. The impression prevails generally throughout the country, and is shared in by myself to a very large extent, that civil servants are treading on one another's toes, so tremendously is the Service over-manned. To what extent that is true we are not in a position to say, but since coming here we have not seen anything that would tend to dispel the impression that we had when we came. If the Government could do anything to dispel the impression that the service is tremendously over-manned or over-womaned, as the case may be, or could do anything to reduce the overhead expenditure, I am sure it would receive the commendation of the people of this country.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before moving that the committee rise and report progress, I might perhaps explain the position in which the Government is placed in regard to this vote. To-day is the 27th of March, and in four days we shall have entered upon a new fiscal year. Unless the Government is to dismiss immediately all employees whose services it will not be necessary to retain; once this amalgamation takes effect, these amounts will have to be voted to cover the interval at least, and all the Government is asking at the present time is to allow the vote for civil government to go through so that the clerks at present employed in these different positions may be retained until the minister has had time to effect the reorganization proposed under the new bill. Before that bill becomes law it will have to receive its three readings in this House, and then pass the Senate; and until that has been done it will not be possible for the minister to begin the work of consolidation. That is our only reason for seeking to get through these votes as they stand.

Mr. BROWN: My remarks applied not merely to the Militia Department but to all departments of the service.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Government is in hearty agreement with my hon. friend in its desire to prevent any overlapping.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 10.51 p.m.

Tuesday, March 28, 1922

The House met at three o'clock, the Deputy Speaker in the Chair.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT REPEAL

Mr. JAMES S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 18, to repeal the Military Service Act.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S REPORT

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before the Orders of the Day are called I would like to put my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) right respecting a matter that was referred to yesterday. In the course of my remarks I mentioned that the Auditor General's report had been laid in full on the table of the House on one of the early days of the session. My right hon. friend stated that he thought I was incorrect in that statement.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought the fourth volume was not down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He said the fourth volume was the most important. I desire to let him know that the entire report is contained in three volumes. Last year the fourth volume contained the war expenditures separately. This year they have been included in the last of the three volumes.

JUDGES' ACT AMENDMENT

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, SASKATCHEWAN COURT OF APPEAL

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved:

That it is expedient that an additional judge of the Court of Appeal for the Province of Saskatchewan be appointed at an annual salary of nine thousand dollars.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General has been informed of the subject matter of this resolution and commends it to the consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to and the House went into Committee on the Resolution, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Before this resolution is adopted, we ought to have some information under several heads. We should know, first of all, what the present composition of the Court of Appeal of Saskatchewan is in point of numbers, the composition of the Court of King's Bench, and secondly what reasons there are for the conclusion that an additional judge of the Court of Appeal is necessary. Are there any arrears of business? Has there been a demand from the people of the province, or what is the real purpose of the addition to the Court of Appeal? We should know, as well, how the number of judges in the Court of Appeal in that province compares with the number on the Court of Appeal of provinces of corresponding size. Our chief concern is to ascertain whether there is any real need for an additional judge. Under our constitution, of course, we all know, the province itself constitutes courts, and declares the number to compose the court so constituted. The Dominion Government, on the other hand, makes the appointment and the Dominion treasury pays the salaries and all expenses. Under that procedure which the British North America Act lays down, there is always a temptation on the part of the provinces not to exercise the utmost care to avoid, in the first place, over-constituting the courts and in the next place, over-composing them. We ought to be very careful in this and in every case, to see that the province, inasmuch as it is in no way responsible for the extra expense involved, is animated only by a desire to have the number of judges which is absolutely essential, and no greater number, to constitute the court.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: In answer to the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) I may say that the Court of Appeal of Saskatchewan now consists of four judges, one chief justice and three puisne judges. As to the necessity of adding to the number of judges we find it in the legislation which was passed by the province of Saskatchewan. As it was said, and rightly said by the right hon. gentleman, the courts primarily are created by the provinces under section 92 of the British North America Act. The judges are appointed by the federal authorities. It has been the rule, I understand, in the Department of Justice, to always supplement the legislation which was adopted by the provincial government. Sometimes it would take six months and sometimes it would take three or four years, but always the appointments which were asked by the local governments were made by the federal government. In this case a statute was passed at the last session of the legislature of Saskatchewan adding another judge to the Court of Appeal for that province. We have received the statute, and we propose the present bill to carry out the purpose of that legislation. The right hon. gentleman says that we should make sure that there is real necessity for the increase in the number of judges. I am not certain that we should go that far, unless we are of opinion that the provinces are negligent in the administration of justice. Unless we have good ground to suspect their motives in legislating as they do, I do not see that we should insist on a special report on such questions. At any rate, in this case we have that statute. It was sent to our department, and we ask the House now to supplement that statute. If my right hon. friend desires further information that I do not possess now, and insists on an adjournment of the consideration of this resolution, I would be willing to try to give him all the information he desires.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not quite correct to say that vacancies that exist by reason of provincial legislation are filled merely automatically or as a matter of course by this parliament. I remember well when I was Acting Minister of Justice declining to fill such in the province of Ontario and effecting an arrangement with the Attorney General of that province, that, in the event of vacancies in county courts being created or caused by death, those vacancies would be filled by appointment of junior judges out of other counties where there was not only a senior but a junior judge and insufficient work for the two. In that way a very considerable saving was made. I am afraid, though, the Government now in office has not followed up that good precedent. I can recall cases even now in which to meet political exigencies, they have filled vacancies from the outside, instead of filling them by appointment of junior judges who are virtually out of work in different counties of the province, which would mean a saving to the country of several thousand dollars. It is with the idea of saving, and nothing else, that I ask in this case whether inquiry has been made to ascertain if there is real need; whether the demand comes because of the need of an extra judge, or for some other reason.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I must say that I was told by the Attorney General of Saskatchewan that there is need of such an appointment. As to the position my hon. friend takes with respect to Ontario, it is quite different in this respect: in that instance there was no discussion between the Attorney General and the Minister of Justice, or between the provincial government and the fédéral government. Both agreed that there were too many judges and that no more should be appointed, but in this case we have a request from the provincial government that an additional judge be appointed for the Court of Appeal. Unless we are to say to the Saskatchewan government that we cannot accept their representation as to the need for such judge we have to make the appointment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is mistaken in regard to Ontario. No request at all came from the Attorney General of Ontario to the effect that a stay be made in the appointment of judges. The action was taken wholly at Ottawa, by the Justice Department,—by myself when I was acting Minister of Justice. The Attorney General of Ontario had acquiesced in the movement on the part of members of the Bar for the increase of salaries. I refused to consider the matter of increases, until I obtained his acquiescence in the policy of appointing no more members of the Bench and of providing, by legislation in Ontario, to fit in with our policy that new appointments would not be made, but that junior judges would be appointed to fill vacancies, and the position of junior judge in the county from which such a judge was appointed would be done away with.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: And he agreed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But the initiative was taken here. I ask now merely whether a similar initiative has been taken in this case by the Attorney General's Department.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: If we were merely asked to fill a vacancy in Saskatchewan or any other province, we would probably act in a similar manner; but, in this instance, we have a statute passed by the Saskatchewan legislature providing for the appointment of an additional judge for a court in that province, and we are now implementing that legislation. I do not see how we can refuse to do so.

Mr. CRERAR: How many judges constitute the Court of Appeal in Alberta, and how many the Court of Appeal in Manitoba?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: There are five judges in Alberta and five also in Manitoba.

Mr. BAXTER: It is very easy for the provinces to put forward requests of this character, and of course, it is easy to say that these judges are required. I do not assume, merely because the request is made, that the additional judge is not required; neither do I take the request coming from a provincial government as being absolutely conclusive proof of the necessity. Very often in the provinces another element enters into the matter. One province sees a larger number of judges in another province, and the tendency is to say: "Why should we not have as many highly paid officials receiving pay from the Dominion Government as some other province? It will cost us nothing." We have, in the city of Ottawa, a court which, I think, I can fairly describe as being absolutely overburdened with work. I think there is no harder-working court in the British Empire than the Supreme Court of Canada; their work is almost monumental. I should like, before making up my mind in regard to the matter now before us, to compare the number of cases passing before the Supreme Court of Saskatchewan in a single year with the number of cases that are dealt with by the Supreme Court at Ottawa. I should like to form some personal judgment regarding the matter, and perhaps other hon. members would like to do the same. It is a matter of no importance to this Government whether another judgeship is created or not; the question is whether there is a real need on the part of the people to have an additional judge to expedite the business. I should therefore be very glad if the minister would allow this matter to stand for a few days.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the hon. member think there should be three, five or seven judges in preference to two, four or six respectively, so that there would be a majority decision in all cases?

Mr. BAXTER: That is exactly my opinion. An odd number in the Court of Appeal is most desirable, and I cannot understand why the Court of Appeal in Saskatchewan ever came to be constituted with four judges. I would suggest that there is another way of getting around the difficulty. It would be easy, I should think, for the province of Saskatchewan to pass legislation for the reduction of the Court of Appeal to three judges, who could do the work just as efficiently as four judges, because they must all sit together, and the other appellate judge could go on circuit or be used in whatever other way judges are used. A matter of rearrangement would not involve any more expense to the Dominion. The real question is to find out whether there is work which is not being efficiently done for lack of another judge, and until that fact is established, I do not think any member can be in favour of the appointment being made. But the moment that fact is established, I would be very much surprised if any member of this Chamber would withhold his assent.

Mr. VIEN: It seems to me that we should not object to nominate judges when the provincial authorities have created the positions. Under the British North America Act, the creation and the organization of tribunals are vested with provincial legislatures, and it seems to me that when in the opinion of a provincial legislature the organization of a tribunal is fixed along certain lines, it would be a little improper to discuss the motives which might have prompted that legislature in its enactment.

My hon. friend (Mr. Baxter) stated that in many cases the provinces were prompted to a certain extent to create a position for a high official by the fact that his salary was paid out of the federal exchequer. I do not think it is fair to cast upon the legislative authorities of the provinces, which have so shaped their judicial organizations, such an imputation. The British North America Act having left it to the provincial legislatures to organize their tribunals, it seems to me that the only fair way to deal with the question is to appoint a judge when there is a vacancy on the provincial bench. The suggestion made by my hon. friend does not appear to be the proper way of dealing with the matter.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): Some months ago, before even the position was created by the Saskatchewan Government, this matter was drawn to my attention by some members of the legal profession in the city of Regina. I believe it was advanced as an argument by the Chief Judge of the Court of Appeal of Saskatchewan that the work was in arrears; that they could not possibly keep up with it; that there was an absolute necessity for the appointment of another judge to the Court of Appeal. this argument was put up to me, and I believe it was pretty well accepted in Saskatchewan some time before the position was created by the legislature of that province.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I question very much whether it can be urged with any degree of soundness that, as a matter of constitutional right, we in this Parliament can refuse to carry out the necessary implementing legislation providing for the appointment of judges by the federal authorities. The constitution of provincial courts is a matter entirely within the realm of provincial legislation. Under section 92 of the British North America Act we have no power whatever to interfere with any legislation that a provincial legislature may pass by way of rearrangement of or addition to the number of judges whom they require for the purpose of administering justice in their province. One might stop and consider for a moment what the result would be if the federal Parliament refused to act upon the authority that is vested in it of providing judges in any province in the Dominion, after a local legislature, having regard to their local necessities and conditions, had decided that the court should be constituted in a certain way, I am quite sure that never since Confederation has it been urged seriously that this Parliament or the federal government could refuse to pass this implementing legislation. It is not for us to say whether or not the provincial legislatures should have their courts constituted in this way or in that way, or should have three, four or five judges. That, under the Act of Confederation, has been left entirely to the discretion of the people of the several provinces speaking through their respective lgislatures.

Mr. BAXTER: It is a little difficult to tell, simply by looking at the index, how many cases are reported, because cases are often duplicated; but I think I am perfectly safe in saying that not more than 120 cases a year are reported in each of these volumes. Each volume covers a year, and the cases are not all cases of appeal. Some are decisions of judges of first instance, but I do not think that many of those are included in the reports, at least so far as I can tell from a hasty glance at the volumes. Now, as there are not more than 120 decisions in a year, I should have great doubt—

An hon. MEMBER: That is, 120 reported.

Mr. BAXTER: Reported, yes. The custom in all reports—I do not blame the bench or the bar, but I do blame the organizations that publish the reports—is to report everything whether it is reportable or not.

Mr. VIEN: Who is judge of the necessity for additional judges for any provincial court?

Mr. BAXTER: I would say that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Vien) himself is one of the judges, and his mind seems to be pretty well made up on the subject. I think that we are all here judges as to whether or not this country needs to pay $9,000 a year for further judicial services. The provincial legislatures can ask, and they very frequently do ask, without very much reason for doing so, to increase expenditures, and I know of cases where there has been an extension of the provincial bench without any business to justify it. I do not know whether or not that is the case in Saskatchewan, but looking at these two volumes of reports I am strongly inclined to think that there is no need for a further appointment.

Mr. LAPOINTE: By the British North America Act the organization of tribunals is left entirely to the provinces. There is no appeal from the decision of the provinces to this Parliament or to the federal Government; all we have to do is to implement their legislation by appointing judges in accordance with the organization of the courts by the legislatures. I think it is a bad tendency on the part of the central power to intervene in a matter that is left by the constitution to the provinces themselves. It is a dangerous tendency that has prevailed of late and it is high time it should be stopped.

Mr. McCONICA: I think it was quite well understood throughout the province of Saskatchewan that there would be a request for an additional Judge of Appeal for the bench in that province, no matter what party was returned to power as a result of the last election. The Estimates show that in Manitoba there are five judges in the Court of Appeal, in Alberta five, and in Saskatchewan four. I was formerly connected with the courts of Saskatchewan, and I am well advised that the Court of Appeal in that province is crowded. I am not sure that they are despatching the work as expeditiously as some other courts are doing, although I am perfectly sure that they think they are. I suggest to hon. gentlemen that if this Parliament could arrogate to itself the right to say that Saskatchewan shall not have this judge, then it would have the same right to stop the wheels of justice altogether in that province or in any other province. If we can refuse this request we can refuse to implement any other action which any province, under the constitution, has the right to take in matters relating to the administration of justice. I certainly think that the province should have the additional judge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I desire only to comment on the remarks of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), followed by the Minister of Marine (Mr. Lapointe). They suggest that it would be an invasion of constitutional right on the part of this Parliament to exercise any restraint whatever, or even to bring decision into play, in deciding whether to acquiesce in the request of any province. I cannot agree with that view at all. If the original intention of the British North American Act was that the request of a province is always to be met by the appointment by the Government of Canada of someone to fill a vacancy then there would have been no requirement in the Act for legislation on the part of this Parliament. All that the British North America Act would have said would have been this: "The Governor in Council shall fill any vacancy created by the province." To have taken that position evidently seemed to the Fathers of Confederation scarcely a right thing to do, and the act was so framed as to require federal legislation. I do not say that such legislation is specifically demanded by the terms of the act, but the act is so framed that legislation, as a matter of fact, is needed; otherwise, why have we legislation now?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): To get the money.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, but the act could have said that the necessary expenditure would be a charge on the Treasury, requiring no specific legislation in this Parliament for each vacancy. It would have been a serious thing to put it within the power of any province, without any restraint whatever, or even an opportunity on the part of the federal Parliament to exercise consideration of the matter, to write a cheque on the Dominion Treasury for just whatever number of judges that province thought it needed. That, I repeat, would have been a serious thing. We have confidence in the provinces, it is true; but the system of balance is such that they exercise their consideration first, and we here have restraint upon their request. I admit that we should not exercise any restraint upon the province without very considerable reason. We should have more than the ordinary weight of reason in our favour before interfering with the desire of the government and legislature of a province in this matter, and for myself, I would attach a great deal of weight to representations made by members from that province as to whether or not there is need for an additional judge in Saskatchewan. I thought that Alberta had four.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Four puisne judges and a Chief Justice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If there are five in Alberta and Manitoba, I should think there would be equal reason for five in Saskatchewan, but there would be more litigation in Manitoba than in Saskatchewan, notwithstanding that Saskatchewan has a larger population. Manitoba is an older province with a larger city, and would probably have more litigation. Prima facie also, there would be more litigation in Saskatchewan than in Alberta. All I wanted was to make sure that the minister had convinced himself that there was need for this additional judge. If he says he has, then I accept his opinion.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I am convinced that there is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A while ago the minister said that he had not inquired.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) argues that because the appointing power rests with the federal government, therefore, there must be some consideration given by the federal authorities as to the wisdom of action which has been exclusively committed to the provincial legislature by the Constitution.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not committed to them exclusively.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Exclusively, to the extent that under section 92 of the British North America Act the organization of the courts is committed entirely to the legislature of each province. I submit that the only reason why the appointing power was vested in the Dominion Parliament was the theory that the Governor General was the sole representative of His Majesty in Canada. Down to the time of the decision in the Maritime Bank Case the theory obtained that His Majesty was not present in regard to provincial legislation, and that consequently there was no power vested in the Lieutenant-Governor to make judicial appointments as the direct representative of His Majesty. Since then that theory has been held to be bad law, and to-day the right of the provinces to deal with matters entirely within their jurisdiction is unquestioned, and I think it is rather too late in the day for us to say that we have any reviewing power in such matters.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Sir LOMER GOUIN thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 19, to amend the Judges' Act, founded on the Resolution.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—AMENDMENT

Mr. ARTHURS' MOTION ON SOLDIERS' BONUS PLEDGE

On the motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding that the Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to resolve itself into Committee of Supply:

Mr. JAMES ARTHURS (Parry Sound): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair, I desire to call the attention of the House for a few minutes to a matter which arose yesterday afternoon while the House was in Committee of Supply and the Estimates of the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. Beland) were under discussion.

A few days ago we heard from the leader of the Government that we should pay little attention to political documents, especially those issued during an election. We did not believe then, Sir—I do not think any hon. member believed—that this remark also applied to the platform of a great party. Before an election each party issues a platform, and the difference between the respective platforms constitutes the issue before the people in that election. And not only that, but the party issuing the platform is of course pledged to substantiate its provisions by legislation if returned to power.

In 1919 the Liberal party held a great convention in this city, and a platform was then adopted which was the basis of their appeal to the country during the recent election. We have already had from the Government side a repudiation of many of the tariff planks of that platform, and the remaining planks are being carefully held in abeyance for the express purpose of securing a few votes from my hon. friends to my immediate left. But the most glaring case of repudiation occurred yesterday. In that platform, as enunciated in 1919, we find the following resolution:

> Resolved that this convention declares that the adoption of a system of cash grants to the soldiers and the dependents of those who have fallen is the most satisfactory and effective means of civil re-establishment—such grants to be in addition to the present gratuity and to any pension for disability resulting from service.

Yesterday the Prime Minister, and also the minister in charge of the estimates of this department, both declared that they not only do not intend to fulfil this pledge, but so far as the Prime Minister is concerned, he declared that he never had any intention of doing so. I believe that the majority of those who attended that convention in 1919 were honest men and went home firmly convinced that the Liberal party had pledged itself to implement by legislation every plank in that platform. According to the Liberal handbook this pledge was made in the most solemn manner. The men who attended that convention went back to the country and used every plank of that platform during the last election, and it is idle for the Prime Minister or anybody else to say that they did not use the particular plank to which I am now drawing the attention of the House. This was a solemn promise to the returned soldiers that the Liberal party, if they got back to power, would grant cash bonuses, and it was used in every constituency where there was a returned soldier. It was used by the followers of my hon. friend, the leader of the Government, in his presence, and he himself, in spite of what he said yesterday, did pledge himself to carry out this resolution, because he said that he endorsed every plank in the platform of 1919.

The attitude of the late government and of the party to which I belonged was well known. We were opposed to the granting of $2,000, or any similar bonus, indiscriminately to returned soldiers. We did not believe that that was the proper policy to adopt. But our friends opposite, by this plank in their platform, succeeded in getting thousands of votes, evidently under misapprehension and in spite of the fact that the present Prime Minister knew that his party would never implement that promise. While the Conservative party was opposed to any cash grant of this nature, it was not opposed to doing everything possible for the returned soldier. I have had the honour to be on the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment Committee for the last four or five years, and I have personal knowledge that the then government had no strings on that committee, that the members of that committee were perfectly free to take any course they chose. That committee, by their recommendations, and the late government by implementing those recommendations by legislation, have done a great deal for the returned soldier. It is not necessary at this time to go into details, but we know and, as Canadians, are proud, no matter whether we are on one side or the other, that Canada has paid the most liberal scale of pensions of any country that was engaged in the war. The late government directed its efforts toward bettering the condition of widows and orphans who had lost their bread winners during the war, and of men who returned from overseas unable to pursue their ordinary vocations through illness or wounds. But as I have said, we were faced throughout the country with this pledge made by the Liberal party under the conditions to which I have referred.

The leader of the Government, speaking of this matter yesterday, defended his position by saying that a course advisable at one moment may not be the best at another time. Assuredly this has a familiar sound to me; it is right in line with the general policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. They had not only a policy for Canada, but a policy for each province. And in the provinces you found the present leader of the Government supporting in one county a man who was a free trader, in another county a man who was a protectionist, and in another county a man who had no idea of tariff matters at all. In fact, that procedure was carried so far that the policy advocated in one polling subdivision was different from that advocated in another, and so on right along the line.

The leader of the Government says that conditions have changed; that at present we have a large debt, incurred through the railway situation. But he has forgotten to tell the people of Canada that during the last election—not in 1919, but in October, 1921,—a handbook was issued and placed in the hands of Liberal speakers throughout Canada bearing on its face the portrait of the present leader of the Government and subscribed to by him, in which his pledge to the returned soldier was reiterated and renewed; nor has it ever been repudiated by the hon. gentleman or any one on his side.

The minister in charge of this matter took a somewhat different stand; he declared that he had reason to suppose that the returned soldier would not accept $2,000. Now, Mr. Speaker, if you took a vote of the members of this House, or, say, of the members of the press gallery, on the question of whether they would accept a cash bonus of $2,000, I am sure they would all vote affirmatively; and I have not the slightest doubt that the returned soldier would do exactly the same thing. It is quite true that certain soldier organizations have passed resolutions advising against any request for a cash gratuity of $2,000. It is quite true that they have moderated their demands; but it is foolish to say for one moment that these men are repudiating a cash grant of any kind.

I have brought this matter to the attention of the House for the purpose of setting forth one of the reasons why hon. gentlemen of the Liberal party are sitting on the other side of the House. I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Stevens:

That all the words after the word "that" be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

The Liberal Party assembled in convention in August, 1919, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved that this Convention declares that the adoption of a system of cash grants to the soldiers and dependents of those who have fallen is the most satisfactory and effective means of civil re-establishment—such grants to be in addition to the present gratuity and to any pension for disability resulting from service."

That the policy embodied in such resolution so adopted was continuously thereafter held before the people of Canada, and in an official handbook issued in October, 1921, by the Liberal Party under the authority of its leader Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, the said resolution was quoted and reaffirmed, and the promise and the pledge embodied therein declared to be the policy of the Liberal Party.

That candidates contesting on behalf of the Liberal Party in the late election used widely such promise and pledge as the means of securing support.

That the Liberal Party having been returned to power, the refusal now by the leader of the Government and by the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment to fulfil such promise and pledge constitutes a repudiation of a solemn obligation and a disregard of political honour.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the custom of this House has been to extend to the leader of the Government the courtesy of permitting him to see, before the moment it is handed to you, Mr. Speaker, any amendment or resolution which is likely to be moved by a member of the House. Neither my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) nor the hon. member (Mr. Arthurs) who has just spoken has given me the slightest intimation that any resolution of the kind was to be submitted this afternoon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I be permitted to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am very sorry if my hon. friend did not receive a copy of the resolution. I instructed my secretary at one o'clock to send a copy, and I dictated an accompanying letter. I sent it also to the leader of the Agrarian party (Mr. Crerar.)

Some hon. MEMBERS: Shame.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If my hon. friend has not received it, I am quite prepared to let the debate adjourn.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no necessity for the debate being adjourned.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was quite unintentional on my part.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would simply like the House to know that the first intimation I had of this resolution was as I heard it read a moment ago.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I just read to the House the resolution of the Liberal Convention of 1919 and see exactly what it states? First of all, it is a resolution on Soldier's Civil Re-establishment. It reads:

Whereas, it is considered that the guiding principle for a permanent settlement of the problem of civil re-establishment should be equitable treatment to soldiers in all avocations, having regard to the length and nature of service,

Resolved that this convention declares that the adoption of a system of cash grants to the soldiers and dependents of those who have fallen is the most satisfactory and effective means of civil re-establishment—such grants to be in addition to the present gratuity and to any pension for disability resulting from service.

That resolution is not a pledge on the part of the Liberal party to give cash grants indiscriminately to all returned men. As I read it, and as the Liberal convention understood it, the resolution was a declaration that in the opinion of the Convention that was the most effective means at that time of dealing with the question of re-establishment. The resolution relates, as I have pointed out, to the matter of re-establishment, not to the granting of an indiscriminate bonus to every soldier who was overseas, simply as a recognition of his services.

What the convention believed, and I think rightly believed, was that if the government would adopt the policy with the returned soldiers of giving to them a cash grant of a certain amount, and allowing them to re-establish themselves with the aid of that money, that would be the most effective way of bringing about their re-establishment. It was felt that the government was proceeding under a policy of more or less obliging returned men to act in accordance with the wishes and under instructions of officers of the government, not trusting them to make use of sums of money, according to their own light, which would enable them with regard to what might seem to them to be the most effective way having regard to their interests and circumstances, to work out their own salvation, so to speak, in the matter of re-establishment. I think that if that point is perfectly clear, hon. members will see there has not been any attempt on the part of hon. members on this side of the House or of their supporters, in any way to repudiate any statement that appears in this platform in regard to the re-establishment of the returned soldiers.

I said yesterday, and I will repeat it now, because I believe it to be absolutely true, that what may have been the wise course to take at that time, when men were returning from overseas and seeking to return to their regular vocations, would not necessarily be wise or the proper course to take some years later, particularly after Parliament had met and after the House of Commons on two occasions, had discussed the whole question, in Special Committee, and had decided upon certain measures of re-establishment, and when the government were taking action in accordance with views which were unanimously concurred in by Parliament. Let me repeat, this statement in the Liberal platform is not a pledge of cash grants to all returned men. It cannot be so construed. It is a statement of what in the opinion of that convention at that time would have been the most effective way of dealing with re-establisment.

May I say this further? Hon. gentlemen opposite are given to use of extravagant language in criticising their opponents. They have on repeated occasions resorted to the use of terms which I think are a little stronger than is necessary, even for the political purposes they have in view. May I read the last clause of this amendment?

> That the Liberal party having been returned to power, the refusal now by the leader of the Government and by the Minister of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment to fulfil such promise and pledge constitutes a repudiation of a solemn obligation and a disregard of political honour.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members of the House of Commons, regardless of whether their references are to their political opponents or not, should be careful in imputing motives of political dishonour. I think hon. members on this side of the House are just as true custodians of honour as any hon. gentlemen opposite, 4 p.m. and I would ask the House, when voting upon this amendment, to consider that aspect of the question.

It seems to me, the point of material importance at the present time, is the attitude taken with respect to this question of cash grants by myself and others associated with me in the recent election campaign. I notice that this amendment is directed primarily against myself as the leader of the party, and for that reason it is proper I think that I should refer somewhat to my own attitude on this particular question.

Yesterday my hon. friend from Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion)

read to this House an extract from a speech made by Colonel Thompson, who was with me in our Canadian West during the course of the political campaign. My hon. friend said that the extract which he read, while it did not amount to a pledge, carried an implication to the effect that I was standing, because I was with Colonel Thompson at the time, in favour of a cash grant to the returned soldiers. As Colonel Thompson is not at present a member of this House and was therefore unable to speak for himself, I was about to rise and reply to my hon. friend when you, Mr. Speaker, as Chairman of the Committee, ruled the whole discussion out of order, and I permitted the incident to pass. My recollection is clear as to what took place at that meeting, and if my hon. friend will consult with those who were present at that gathering, or will read the full reports of it, he will find that Colonel Thompson said that while returned men might very well feel that their services were worth $2,000, the Liberal party did not propose to measure their services in terms of money, and was not standing for cash grants. That was the position he took.

Mr. MANION: The paper could not have quoted him correctly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend was ready enough to bring into this House a paper which had a partial reference to what was said at that meeting. He was careful to say that what he read did not constitute a pledge, but he did say that it carried a certain inference. Now I was present on that platform and I heard Colonel Thompson say to that audience that the Liberal party was not proposing any cash grants to the returned men. Not only did he say that on that platform, but he said it on a dozen other platforms on which he spoke when he and I were travelling together, and I submit that if we on this side of the House are to be judged in respect to our attitude toward the returned soldiers, we should be judged by what was said on the public platform as to what our attitude towards the returned men would be if we were returned to power, and not by any inference which hon. gentlemen may draw in regard to what may or may not have been said at a political meeting, or, indeed, by any misrepresentation of the purpose and spirit of resolutions passed at a general convention.

I think, Mr. Speaker, I may well leave the matter there. What I have said to different audiences, what I have said to every deputation of returned men whom I have had the privilege of addressing, has been this: That I regarded the old House of Commons as not being representative of the will of the people, that I felt the returned men could not expect to receive from a parliament that was not truly representative the treatment which they had a right to expect from a parliament that was truly representative, and that when the election was over and the new House of Commons had been formed, one of the first steps I would take would be to refer the whole question of the treatment of returned men to a committee of this House which would be truly representative of all shades of opinion in the country; that I would ask the committee to deal with the questions that came before them, and that the Government would be guided in its action in the light of the report made. That was the pledge I made during the campaign, and that pledge has already been fulfilled. My hon. friend the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. Béland) has already given notice of the establishment of that committee, and as soon as its members have an opportunity of meeting there will be placed before them the whole position in regard to the returned men. There is no reason why the committee should not consider, if it so wishes, the question of cash grants. As far as I am concerned, the broader they make the whole of their inquiry, the better.

The point that is of concern at this moment is this: This amendment is an attack upon the honour of myself and my colleagues as to our attitude towards the returned men. I am quite prepared, Mr. Speaker, to leave to the House, to hon. members who have heard the discussions throughout the election campaign whether in any particular, as the leader of the Liberal party, I made a pledge of cash grants to the returned soldiers generally, irrespective altogether of their need or their desire or their wish for such. I say again that the resolution of the Liberal Convention was an expression of opinion as to what seemed wisest and best at that particular time. I think in that respect the resolution was sound. In regard to the position taken during the general election, I have nothing to retract, and I am only too happy to leave it to this House to express its view as to the political honour of the gentlemen who sit on this side, by asking hon. members to reject this amendment.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): The resolution which has been placed in your hands deals with a principle somewhat broader than the very narrow and limited scope ascribed to it by the Prime Minister in his appeal to the House to reject this resolution. The object of this resolution is to meet the oft-repeated repudiation, by the Prime Minister in particular, and by others around him, of solemn pledges publicly given and written in the documents of the Liberal party to the people of Canada prior to the last election. It is, Sir, to bring before the House this point: whether or not a party—or a group, if you choose to use a more modern term—can go before the people of Canada, offering a written document stating their policy and their views upon important questions, which are bound to come before Parliament, asking the public to support them on that platform, and, after having received the support of the people and having secured the power to implement those pledges, can coolly tell the country that these pledges are light and frivolous matters, not to be taken too seriously, but, may be repudiated absolutely by those who made them. That is the principle which we call into judgment before the House to-day. We are asking the House to say whether or not they stand by an old practice of parliamentary procedure in the British Empire, namely, that groups of individuals, known in the past as parties, go before the country, issue their platform and appeal for support on a general policy, not on details of government; and if they do that, then they are bound, when they are returned to power, to implement those pledges by legislation. That is the affect of the responsibility we assume. Why, Mr. Speaker, while you were not in the House during the whole of last parliament, I think you were here long enough to remember that my hon. friend himself, the leader of the Government, and many around him, wanted my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) to resign and go to the country. Why? Because, forsooth, he had fulfilled the pledges he and the party had given. They said that we had discharged our mandate, that we had completed the pledges and promises we had given, and, therefore, we had no right to sit here any longer. But now we have the same hon. gentlemen coming into office and absolutely repudiating pledges. He says it is not a pledge. He says he made no promise of this kind as he went about the country. I asked him yesterday, and I ask him to-day, is this document an official document of the Liberal party or is it not? I hold in my hand the handbook of the Liberal party. Yesterday I invited the hon. gentleman to repudiate it, and he said, no, he would not repudiate it, nor will not repudiate it to-day. This document, Sir, contains, in its opening pages, the platform of the Liberal party. Is that platform a meaningless document? Or is it a document issued to the people of Canada upon which they are invited to support that party? I have here the platform, for the sake of comparison, of my hon. friends of the Progressive party. Will these hon. gentlemen say that in issuing their platform to the people of Canada they did not consider they are now bound in honour—that is what the resolution refers to—to support that platform to the limit of their ability? Every one of them who has spoken so far has given expression to that principle. As far as we are concerned, we stand exactly on that same principle. This platform of the Liberal party is issued with the imprimatur of the Prime Minister himself, issued by authority of the committee he had guiding him—he will remember that he told us the other day that he had adopted the course of being guided. I invite the attention of my hon. friend to this. I notice he is not giving me very much attention, but I would like him to do so. He said a moment ago that this pledge, which he chose to call a pledge, was all very well in 1919, under the conditions existing then. But, why, Mr. Speaker, did they reissue this pledge again in 1921? Why did the hon. gentleman offer it to the people of Canada during that three months up to December 6, 1921? If it was only intended for August, 1919, why did he issue it again last fall? If what he told us is sincerely true, that it was a pledge under the conditions obtaining in 1919, then exactly the same thing applies to every statement in this platform. I have them here. Let me give hon. members the headings. There are resolutions on finance, tariff, reciprocity, agriculture, labour, conservation of physical standards, soldiers' civil re-establishment, railways, national unity, Canadian autonomy, control of natural resources, elections, and so forth. Are all these resolutions just to be considered as they happened to apply in August, 1919, or do the principles contained in these resolutions guide my hon. friend in his leadership of his party to-day? That is the question that is before the House. Here is what my hon. friend says in this document preceding all these resolutions. Referring to the convention as a large and representative convention comprising 1,800 delegates, he says:

> The interest of the delegates in the policy of the party was evinced by a mass of resolutions from which those adopted were carefully selected by a representative committee. They express the idea of a great body of delegates of——the aims of the Liberal party.

That is set forth in this document. He himself says, as leader of the party, that these resolutions, the ones I referred to and others, were carefully selected and issued to the public as the aims and the platform of the Liberal party, not as something to guide the party in 1919, but for the guidance of the party in October, November, and up to December 6, 1921, for the winning of votes for the party. If this resolution is to be treated as my hon. friend desires to treat it to-day, I say to my hon. friends to my left, who have been very courteous to him in anticipation of a fair deal on the tariff question, that they can expect exactly the same answer from him in regard to the resolution on the tariff. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock), when he meets his fellow workmen in Toronto, will be able to say to them, in the words of the Prime Minister, when he is called upon to state why he did not bring in the eight-hour-day, as pledged in his resolution on labour, "Oh, that resolution was for August, 1919, and not for the present time." Either the argument made by the Prime Minister a moment ago in regard to this pledge is meaningless and a mere subterfuge, or the same language must be applied to every resolution in this platform; that is, that the resolution, the pledge, the plank in their platform, whatever you like to term it, is merely convenient to stand upon for the time being, and for the purpose of influencing the public, but was never intended to be implemented by legislation. That is the position.

My hon. friend made to-day, and has made on several occasions, quite a display over the promise that he gave to the returned men to the effect that he intended to refer this matter to a committee of this House, and that this committee would deal with it. In this same interesting book, the same piece of Liberal literature, I find pages devoted to this question. I draw the attention of the Minister of Health and of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr.

Béland) to this, because yesterday, when he was discussing this question, he took a a very strong stand. He said that personally, he had never supported the cash gratuity. That is correct, I think. He said that, as regards himself and those who were associated with him, the committee on Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment was a committee free from embarrassment and unanimous in its decisions. He does not contradict me, and I think I am stating the case correctly. But all the way through this literature, my hon. friends say that the only reason why Parliament did not give to the soldiers what they were demanding was—what? It was because the hand of the Government was over the committee and controlling it. That hand is now removed. My hon. friend knows that, and he and his friends take a great deal of satisfaction out of that fact. Let him and let his minister go before this committee, which is freed from this sinister influence which he says was exerted, and allow that committee to do what he says it was prevented from doing by the former government. That is what we ask him. My hon. friend knows perfectly well, and we know, that in making this pledge—we call it a pledge, and if it is not a pledge, his whole platform from end to end is meaningless, because there is nothing more clear in any of the resolutions than this—he had no intention of implementing it. If my hon. friend was sincere at all in making this pledge, he would implement it, but we know perfectly well that he has no intention of doing so. Indeed, we know, and we knew in the last parliament that such a pledge as this could not be implemented without serious difficulties in this country, and that is what made it so difficult for those of us who were supporting the late government, to make good in the last election, because of the conviction carried to the minds of many people by speeches and utterances of my hon. friend and his followers on such subjects as this. The people were told that it was possible to do things which my hon. friend and his followers knew it was not possible to do. We are calling upon him now to do one of two things, either to implement that pledge by legislation providing for cash gratuities, or to admit that his statement and the statements of his party were unfair to us, that they misled the soldiers in regard to the course which my hon. friend intended to pursue. Either one or the other is what we are asking; and in the absence of that,—and last night we were led to believe that we could expect neither—then we say this: This resolution having been passed, this is a repudiation of a solemn obligation and a disregard of public honour. It is that principle that we are bringing to the attention of the House; it is that principle that we are asking the House to pass upon on this occasion.

We believe that in this country public utterances and platforms issued by responsible leaders of a party should have a meaning. We believe our system of government cannot be sustained unless there be some regard for the pledges of a party when it is offering itself and its programme to the people. What position will this country be in if a party can go before the people of Canada offering to them a programme, and then after attaining its objective, can coolly tell the people: "It is not our desire to discharge that pledge"? That is the position in which the hon. gentleman finds himself to-day, and that is the reason why we move this resolution and invite the House to support it.

Mr. JOHN MORRISON (Weyburn): Mr. Speaker, this matter of the promises made by the present Government during the late election campaign in connection with giving a cash gratuity to the returned men, has been sprung upon us, and we have not had much opportunity to prepare evidence to the contrary. During the campaign, I was not out of my constituency, but I want to contribute my little bit of evidence as to what went on in Weyburn constituency. At only two of my meetings was this matter mentioned, and at one of those meetings I was asked, when on the platform, what my attitude was towards granting this cash gratuity. I had really not considered the matter very much, and I replied that I was not in favour of it. A returned soldier was helping me at the meeting that night, and I asked him what the boys would think of my reply. He said: "You are perfectly right, Mr. Morrison; the boys are not expecting it to-day; they were at one time, but that is not an issue with them any more." I do not know what promises were made in other constituencies; I can speak only for what occurred in mine. The chief issue there was not what we were going to do towards rewarding the returned soldiers; it was the record of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) in managing the business of the United Grain Growers. That was the chief issue and practically the only one. His record in this House was not touched on; the issue was the private business that he was conducting. The campaign in this regard was carried on very unfairly, and the issue was instigated by my hon. friends to my right. Those hon. gentlemen are finding very much fault with campaign matters, but to me their attitude looks like the pot calling the kettle black. They did their best; they did not regard all the finer rules of the game; they did everything to gain; and they lost. I think it would become them better if they would not say anything about breaking the rules of the game.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, in this amendment there is involved a policy which makes it necessary for me to make a few remarks upon it. I believe in the policy of the returned soldiers as it has been laid down by their organization, and I have been pledged, both by the organization which I represent, organizer labour, and by the organized soldiers, to support such a policy. I regret, however, to see that this question should have been so involved with censure of the Government, and judging from the sentiments which have already been expressed by the Opposition, I should say that they are more interested in getting a censure of the Government than in getting a bonus for the returned soldier. I personally find it very difficult to believe in the absolute sincerity of the hon. member who has moved the amendment. I hate to be a party to any imputation of false or biased motives on the part of the Opposition, but nevertheless I think that if they are absolutely sincere in this matter they should bring in a resolution or bill, as they please, dealing with the question specifically and not involving the Government or any individual in censure. I agree with the position as set forth by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I do not see how the political honour of the Government is involved in this matter at all, and while I am in sympathy with that which is alluded to in the resolution, in so far as the soldiers' bonus is concerned, at the same time I do not feel that it ought to be tangled up with any censure of the Government. I think that this is a case of using what would be more or less a popular issue for the purpose of getting a vote of censure passed on the Government. I am sure that if the hon. gentleman who is responsible for the resolution will bring in another one on the specific question which is before us, he will find a great deal of support in this wing, whereas I doubt very much whether he will find any sympathy for his motion as it stands. I cannot vote on this question because I do not want to vote against the bonus, and I do not want to vote for a censure of the Government.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): As an onlooker and a new member, I must say that this discussion, while illuminating and interesting, has not so far been edifying; and I agree with the member (Mr. Irvine) who has just sat down that it would be very much better if we could dissociate the specific issue under consideration from the question of censure of the Government. There is another question related to this one which occurs to me, and which was brought up some days ago in the House, and that is as to what would result if this group, to which I belong more or less independently, should vote against some Government measure. Now, I think it would be unfortunate that anyone in this House, not wanting to censure or to oust the Government, should be compelled by some custom, which I think surely is now obsolete, to vote contrary to his own conscience and opinion. And this is a case in point. If the Government could be convicted, on the present occasion, of dishonour and duplicity in this matter, and we in this section of the House should desire to censure them, I should hope very much that such a vote would not be carried too far; and I should be glad if some amendment to the constitutional rules could be effected which would leave greater freedom to an individual to vote according to his own conscience and his own opinions. I think that such freedom is necessary. I simply say, in conclusion, that so far as I am concerned it will be practically impossible for me to sit in judgment on this squabble between the two old parties. I do not feel that I can vote at all.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I desire first of all to say a word with regard to the objection taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the ground that the courtesy of sending him a copy of the resolution had not been observed. I have made inquiry and find that my instructions, given at one o'clock, were carried out, and that within a few minutes of one o'clock a copy of the resolution and a notification that it would be moved in amendment to Supply was delivered at his office, a similar copy having been delivered to the office of the leader of the Progressive party (Mr.

Crerar) who, being present, received it. The Prime Minister not being present apparently did not receive his copy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am sure my right hon. friend would like me to have the facts correctly stated. As he has just said his instructions were to leave the resolution at my office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: To be delivered to you.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As the right hon. member knows, I have an office in the House of Commons and one also in the departmental block, where I am obliged to be when dealing with business that appertains to the affairs of the Government. The leader of the Opposition knows that Council meets between two and three o'clock, and at that hour my place of business is in the East Block. The copy which my right hon. friend sent was taken to my office here, which I did not reach until three o'clock. My secretary sent it to me during the course of the debate with a message that it was found on the table, but evidently not delivered to any member of the staff.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not dispute the facts as stated by my hon. friend; I merely state that my instructions were to deliver the resolution to him. It was taken to his office here, and I only add that when similar notices were given me while I was Prime Minister they were delivered also to my office in this building, inasmuch as they had reference to House of Commons matters. Hereafter such notices will be delivered to the hon. gentleman at his office in the East Block. I am not finding fault with the Prime Minister at all. I want to make it clear that not only had I no intention of being discourteous to him, but I took the natural steps to notify him of the intention to move this resolution.

Now, what is before the House this afternoon is something which, if I am able at all to estimate the importance of matters that come before Parliament for consideration, is not of cursory or secondary, but of primary and first importance for the decision of hon. members. One hon. gentleman describes the debate as a squabble between one side and the other. Well, everything that comes up for debate in Parliament may be so described, but the question to which hon. gentlemen's minds should be addressed is this: What is the proper thing in the interests of Canada to do? What is the proper decision to give regarding the question propounded in the amendment that has been moved? It is a question of good faith of political parties; it is a question of the good faith of the House. That is what we have to consider. There is no question before us as to whether there should be a further gratuity to the soldiers of the country. If that were the question before Parliament I would vote in the negative. Is my sincerity doubted, or the sincerity of hon. members who sit around me? By whom is the question of sincerity raised? When we were in office were we or were we not frank with the returned soldiers? We told them definitely, once we had gone the extent we thought the country could go in the matter of cash gratuities, that we could go no further, and we took the penalty of certain hostility among them because of that candour. I put the course we pursued before hon. gentlemen to my left and hon. gentlemen in front of me, before both Oppositions, if you may call them such, en face et de coté, and I ask them whether that is evidence of sincerity or not. We are deciding in this debate, by our votes on this question, whether or not parties are to be held to their pledges. If this resolution is defeated, he who votes against it votes that he is not a supporter of the principle that a party in power is bound by the pledges by which it attained that power.

Now, what was the pledge? Let us inquire dispassionately what it was, and let us inquire, as to the value of the Prime Minister's explanation of the effect of his party's commitment in the terms stated in their platform as transcribed into the resolution. It was this:

> Resolved that this Convention declares that the adoption of a system of cash grants to the soldiers and dependents of those who have fallen is the most satisfactory and effective means of civil re-establishment—such grants to be in addition to the present gratuity and to any pension for disability resulting from service.

What is the Prime Minister's statement to-day? He says: There is not embedded in that any promise or pledge whatever. Not embedded there any promise to the five hundred thousand returned men that the Liberal party was committed to give them a further cash grant in addition to the then existing gratuity and pension! Well, all I want to say is this: that if what the hon. leader of the Government says is the only effect of this resolution, then the Liberal party stands under an indictment greater than that levelled against them in the resolution now before the House. Could any returned soldier in receipt of his gratuity and of his pension, having fought, as large numbers of them did, if not the majority, for a further recognition in cash, in the form of a general addition to the grant, could any returned soldier reading that, not come to the conclusion that the Liberal party favoured that for which he had fought? Can the hon. gentleman conceive that any one would come to any other conclusion? "Resolved that this convention declares that the adoption of a system of cash grants to the soldiers and dependents of those who have fallen is the most satisfactory and effective means of civil re-establishment—such grants to be in addition to the present gratuity and to any pension for disability resulting from service." Would not any returned soldier reading this at once think that the Liberal party is in favour of cash grants in addition to the present gratuity? Could any scheme to deceive and mislead the soldiers be more plainly devised than that resolution, if it means what the hon. gentleman says? If it falls short of a promise to the men of a cash grant in case the party passing that resolution is returned to power, then the indictment of deceit is as bad at least as the indictment of repudiation.

That is the resolution. "Oh," says the Prime Minister, "I went through the campaign and I did not promise any cash grants at all." Indeed, Colonel Thompson, who was with him, though he is reported to have made such a promise, actually said he was not in favour of cash grants. He said precisely opposite to what he is reported to have said. Well, are we concerned with Colonel Thompson? Was Colonel Thompson empowered to amend the resolutions of the Liberal party in convention assembled? I doubt, in fact I would question, were I a follower, the right of even the leader of a party to amend those resolutions, to take in his pocket the commission of his party and at his will alter it, whatever the circumstances might be. Colonel Thompson had no such right.

But the leader of the Government says, "I made no promise; I never stood on any platform and promised cash grants." Why, he did not need to do so. He had an official proclamation issued by a committee of which he was the chairman, more than a month before the campaign was launched, and he had commissioned every speaker for the Liberal party to make that promise under his authority. So he could well afford to be silent while he placed in the hands of every speaker who stood on the platform in his support a document with his photograph on the outside, issued by a committee of which he is declared to be the chairman, that declaration appearing on the frontispiece. That document contains this statement:

> That the platform as adopted and quoted below expresses the idea of the great body of delegates of the aims of the Liberal party.

And in that document he quotes the following, just as it is set out in the resolution before the Chair:

> Resolved that this Convention declares, that the adoption of a system of cash grants to the soldiers and dependents of those who have fallen is the most satisfactory and effective means of civil re-establishment—such grants to be in addition to the present gratuity and to any pension for disability resulting from service.

With that in the pocket of every candidate, with that authority to go and repeat the promise embedded in that resolution, what would be the need of the Prime Minister and leader of the party to refer to the subject at all? Nay, more, on platform after platform, men commissioned by himself, commissioned in writing to say so, proclaimed this to be the policy of the party, to be its promise and its pledge. And in my hands now I hold the proclamations, as quoted yesterday, that those candidates issued to the returned soldiers among their electorate promising that this was going to be done. I wonder if even the hon. member for the city of Ottawa, right in the city where we stand now, will say that he did not utilize that plank of the Liberal party? Yea, he utilized that platform in this city in association with the Prime Minister himself, and sought to obtain votes on the strength of the pledge contained in the document which I hold in my hand.

That is the condition of affairs that existed in the last campaign. It is not the conduct of elections that we are concerned with. The hon. Prime Minister says, "Oh, you did not do everything that was right." The Government in office in the last Parliament—and I appeal to the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) to say if what I speak is right or not—that Government in office, whether it was politically advantageous or whether it was not, set about to implement by legislation, and did one by one implement by legislation the pledges that it made to the people before being returned to office. Did any member of the late government stand in his place and say, "Oh, those resolutions were very good in the months of September and October, 1917, but now we are in power, and they don't apply once you get in power if it is two months later." Did any one hear that position taken? No. We set about the fulfilment of our promises, and we took the consequences of that fulfilment—and I want to say that those consequences were not always advantageous to us, and no one knows that better than the leader of the Progressive party. One by one we put those pledges into effect, one by one we fulfilled the contract which we made with the people—a contract which the people accepted when they put us in power, and expected us to carry out.

We were told yesterday: "Oh, the Great War Veterans at their last convention opposed the granting of cash bonuses. I do not know what could be advanced more false, more shadowy, more tricky than the argument that the policy of a great party is subject to alteration by the resolution of some organization in the country. But as a matter of fact there was no such resolution passed by the Great War Veterans. In 1920 they passed a resolution after the convention of 1919, to which I have referred, in which they affirmed themselves definitely in favour of cash grants and pledged themselves to secure such grants if they could. In the face of the position taken by the Great War Veterans the Government of the day declined their request, and said to them: We believe we have gone as far in the general cash grants as is in the interests of the country, and we think that anything further should be in the way of enabling the soldier to help himself through re-training, seeking out various ways in which specially disabled men may be helped in the struggle for life to overcome to some extent the handicaps they labor under as the result of their war service. That was the answer we made to those men. We took the responsibility and the discredit for the straight denial of that request. In the 1921 meeting no resolution was passed changing the position taken by the Great War Veterans in 1920. They passed a general resolution with regard to re-establishment, but took no special position one way or the other on the matter of cash grants. I examined their records in order to make certain of that. But I feel like apologizing, Mr. Speaker, for referring to the action of any association, however respected, however honourable, however worthy of deference its opinion may be; because I never knew a political party to be in a position of such desperation that it had to seek a loophole of escape from its own solemn pledges, from its own declared policy, by pleading the action and the opinion of some association other than that political party itself. Does the Great War Veterans' Association sit in appeal over Liberal policy? Are they a court of appeal empowered to amend, modify, strike out or enlarge any part of the Liberal platform? Well, possibly they could improve on it; I do not doubt they could. But I would not want to be the leader of the party that submitted to the jurisdiction of any court of appeal in relation to the policy that it puts before the people, save alone the court of appeal of the people themselves. The people accepted the pledge of the Liberal party, accepted the pledge of the Prime Minister, made two years and a half before the election, reaffirmed more than once in the meantime, and reaffirmed last of all in the most solemn way in the handbook of his party which he placed in the hands of all his speakers throughout the length and breadth of Canada with the authorization to make those pledges, to state those intimations, to declare that policy. That is the position the hon. gentleman is in to-day.

Now, is it a matter of no concern how we decide this resolution? I do not know that I am particularly concerned as to how others vote than myself. It is a vote of confidence in the Government; I seek no camouflaged position in that regard. If any hon. gentleman wants to say that this Government is to be open and free to repudiate the position it took prior to the contest; to repudiate its solemn pledge and policy and still enjoy the confidence of the House, then it is the right of that hon. gentleman so to vote. If there is anything of more conseqence to that hon. gentleman than the good faith of political pledges, than the good faith of political parties, than the honour of a political party in carrying out its solemn pledge, then the hon. gentleman is the judge of what is more important to him. But if this House is now to give a verdict of acquittal; if this House is now to declare that the platform of 1919 is a "scrap of paper," that it may be accepted as already annulled, abandoned and forgotten, then the consequences of that position must be faced. That platform contains other principles; it contains other policies than those we are discussing to-day. No matter what course the Government takes on any subject embodied in that document, on any subject referred to by them in this House through session after session, since and during the campaign, they can never take a position of more direct and defiant repudiation than they took yesterday in relation to this subject. If they are to be acquitted for so doing, then the hon. member of this House who seeks to hold them to their pledges, who seeks to hold them to their avowed policies, will already have cut the ground from under his feet, because he has acquitted them of the very same charge of which he seeks later to hold them guilty. I, for one, will not put myself in that position. I purpose to hold them to their whole chapter of pledges. I purpose to make solid my ground by my vote upon this resolution and through it to declare that I have not lost faith in the political honour of our country. I purpose by my vote here to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: "Oh, oh," say hon. gentlemen; I presume those are the hon. gentlemen who have lost faith, and they have good reason for doing so. I have a recollection of sitting through four sessions of this House when hon. gentlemen who now say "oh" were sitting opposite to me. Though they opposed us in many matters of policy; though they made very many charges against us, they sat through four sessions and never once declared that we had failed in fidelity to the pledges we made by which we obtained office.

Mr. VIEN: Will the right hon. gentleman permit me a correction? Does he not remember when we criticized his government for having repealed Orders in Council passed during the election of 1917 exempting farmers' sons from the application of the law? The repeal of those Orders in Council right after the election we interpreted as lack of good faith toward the farmers' sons.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government in office, in the spring of 1918, at a time when the war was at its worst, repealed Orders in Council—or, rather, enacted Orders in Council,—which took away the exemption of farmers' sons between the ages of twenty and twenty-three. That is quite true.

Mr. VIEN: After the election.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, after the election.

Mr. VIEN: Not before?

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, the Orders in Council were not in effect then. We removed these exemptions by special Orders in Council, and we did it in obedience to the pledges we made to the people of this country in pursuance of the fact that the throwing of the whole force of the country behind the war effort was the first mandate of the government.

Mr. VIEN: Will the right hon. gentleman allow me to make this correction? The Order in Council exempting the farmers' sons was enacted right before the election and repealed right after.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, I think my hon. friend is mistaken. The Order in Council was amended by a subsequent Order in Council with exactly the effect I have stated. We carried out the primary and major mandate, and we carried it out at all costs, knowing it was not popular. In the course we then pursued we had the co-operation and support of the present leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar), who walked that path with us, however difficult it was, and served his country by so doing.

That is the record of the late administration. But hon. gentlemen opposite would say: I agree with the declared policy of my leader in office that the declared policy of my leader out of office is something not to be taken seriously, is something that may be lightly abandoned without the honour of my party being at stake. The leader of the Government seems very much scandalized that there should be any impugning of the honour of the Government because on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, a solemn, clear, definite, and unmistakable resolution of policy, confirmed time after time and over his own hand on the very eve of the election itself, is openly repudiated in this House by his own voice and the voice of his minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. Where are we to-day in Canada if this is to go on? Where is the electorate of this country to stand if by resolution of this Parliament we declare that we absolve the Government from the pledges by which they obtained office? What is to be the position of the electorate when an appeal to them is again made? Hon. gentlemen will doubtless put out their platform; they will undoubtedly lay their proposals before the country. Will the leader of the Government be compelled to go upon the public platform and say: These are our proposals now, but when we get into office they will only be the proposals we made to get into office? They will only be the pie crust made to be broken. You cannot tell by what we propose what we will do, and we warn you not to take too seriously what we say when we ask for your votes for the purpose of getting into power. Will not that be the position he will have to assume, and will not hon. gentlemen who vote in his support, who vote in favour of the repudiation of policies and pledges and the sacrifice of political honour, will they not have to stand behind him in that thing, and say they have associated themselves with him and that that is what they believe should be the code of political honour in our country. For myself—and I make no appeal to others who may regard these things differently; for I let them do as they choose—I propose to show by my vote and by whatever influence I have that the time has not come for the sacrifice of pledges and policies in this country, that the people of this country demand of a government that it stand true to the proposals and the promises by which it obtained office, that it take the penalty of those promises if they were ill-advised or hastily made, and above all that the people of this country believe that the code of honour which a political party and the government have is more sacred to them, has more to do with our future and our weal, than anything else that may come before Parliament for discussion.

Now, I appeal to hon. gentlemen in this House, and I say, first of all, this is a motion of want of confidence. It is not because it is a motion of want of confidence that I ask for its support, but it is because it declares for a principle that is vital for our continued respect throughout this country as a Parliament. Those who have still confidence in a government that is guilty of what is alleged in this resolution are quite free to vote against the resolution. I myself have no confidence in a government that is guilty of what this resolution alleges.

Now, let us analyse and see if what this resolution says is true or not. Is it true that the Liberal convention, which named the hon. gentleman leader of the Liberal party, which commissioned the Liberal party to go to the people of this country with a policy there laid down—is it true that that convention passed this resolution or did it not? On that point there is no difference of opinion. All agree that the resolution was passed and became the policy of the Liberal party. Is it true that on the faith of that resolution the support of the people of this country was sought by means of the promises there made, or, as the hon. gentleman would perhaps put it, there implied? Of that there is no doubt at all. Is it true that candidates of the Liberal party in the last election took that pledge, made it their own, took it under the authority of the present Prime Minister of this country, and obtained the votes of the people of this country upon it? Can there be any doubt of that? Is it true that the present Prime Minister of this country extracted that resolution from the minutes of the convention on the very eve of voting in the last contest, made it and reaffirmed it then and there,

5 p.m. put it in the hands of his speakers from one end of Canada to the other, and commissioned them to make that pledge to their electors and get their support upon it? Is that true or is it not? We have the evidence of it all right before us, evidence in writing, evidence over the name and even over the photograph of the Prime Minister himself. Those facts are true.

Now, has that policy been repudiated or has it not? Did not the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment (Mr. Béland) stand here yesterday and declare that the making of further cash grants was no longer the policy of this Government, before one single cash grant had been made? Of that there is no question. Did not the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) stand in his place yesterday and declare that it was no longer the policy of the Government to make cash grants to soldiers? Of that there is no question at all.

Mr. BELAND: If my right hon. friend will allow me, I do not believe I made such a statement. May I repeat what I said yesterday?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. BELAND: I said that the veterans' organizations in Canada had declared themselves opposed to a cash bonus. That is the statement I made to the House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will read what the hon. gentleman said. After having declared that the veterans were opposed to the bonus, which by the way the veterans have never declared—I have their resolution here—my hon. friend said:

If my hon. friend wants to know what my attitude would be on the subject, it could not be any different from the one taken by the returned men themselves, and that is not to grant the cash bonus.

Mr. BELAND: Exactly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, what did I say? I stated that the hon. gentleman had stated his attitude to be—and I assume he spoke for the Government—not to grant any more cash bonuses.

Mr. BELAND: The difference between the right hon. gentleman and myself is that he wants to impose his own will, whereas I want to respect the will of the Veterans.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will leave the hon. gentleman's retort to answer itself. The point he rose to interrupt me upon was that I had misinterpreted his words. I have read his words, and they are precisely what I said. He announced as Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment his opposition to further cash grants, and the Prime Minister in his statement did the same thing. If, however, in the face of this debate, if in view of the position they are in to-day, the Government wants to recant or modify its position, there should be ample opportunity to do so. If they are taking the stand, no further cash grants, let them say so. If they want to change from their attitude of yesterday, let them make the change. If they do not intend to change, if they are against further cash grants, then why by interruptions lead any hon. gentleman to any doubt upon the question. They stated yesterday they were opposed to further cash grants. There can be no doubt at all about that. Those are the words of the Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, who presides over the department affected. Those are the words reiterated by the Prime Minister himself, and even in to-day's debate is there any hon. gentleman who would not take it, after the Prime Minister's speech, that his Government had definitely decided against further cash grants to soldiers as intimated in the resolution of the Convention of 1919? No. Of the repudiation there is no doubt. Of the making of the pledge there is no doubt. Of its reiteration there is no doubt. Of the authority of the Prime Minister for both the making and the reiteration there is no doubt. Of the repudiation we have had confirmation by one after the other in the debate yesterday. Now, is this Parliament to decide that the making of the pledge followed by its repudiation—the first step in relation to their platform since they came into power—is to go without the rebuke of this Parliament? Shall this House by its vote declare that that sort of conduct meets with its approval? This resolution is an opportunity for hon. gentlemen to say that it does not, and I shall vigorously support the resolution.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker: down in my old home town some years ago a worthy alderman won undying fame by a single sentence. He had been present at a discussion occupying considerable time, at which speeches had been made very much like the one to which we have just listened by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), and at last he said, "Mr. Chairman, I move that we quit nonsense and proceed to business." We have business to do in this Parliament, but my right hon. friend and his supporters seem to think that some good end will be served by interrupting business with the motion that has been made to-day, and I pay it a very excellent compliment when I speak of it as nothing worse than nonsense. Does my right hon. friend think any good purpose is to be served by constantly reviving the campaign issues? Does he think he can stand examination on these tests himself?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. FIELDING: I venture to say that if any one takes anything like the pains he has taken to look over the work and the speeches preceding the election, he will find cases where my right hon. friend has made statements which have not been followed by results.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I invite the hon. gentleman to pursue the inquiry.

Mr. FIELDING: My right hon. friend makes a serious denial. I will remind him of an incident in this House that most people will remember. The right hon. gentleman gave what was equivalent to a pledge that there would be no dissolution of Parliament until there had been a redistribution.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I invite the hon. gentleman to quote my words, and he will find that he is not correct.

Mr. FIELDING: I did not expect this "nonsense," and, therefore, I have not the quotation, but if this debate goes on, or perhaps a similar debate, I will produce the passage, and I will show what the hon. gentleman said in this House, at the opening of last session, during the debate on the Address, when he was asked to dissolve the House, and when it was argued that the government did not represent the people. The Montreal Gazette at that time endorsed the position of the right hon. gentleman and declared that it would be an outrage to dissolve Parliament until the West had obtained its representation. The hon. gentleman told us very truly that the West was going to be entitled to so many more members, and he said "If we were to dissolve the House on any issue in advance of that time we would be doing a great injustice to the western provinces." He has done that injustice. He has perpetrated what the Montreal Gazette declared would be an outrage by the dissolution of Parliament. We are going to have a period now of five years during which the western provinces are going to be denied proper representation. My hon. friend has asked for an instance, and I give it to him now. With further investigation, we might give him other instances. Soon after my right hon. friend became Prime Minister he went out west and in Calgary made his declaration in regard to the tariff policy, saying that the country had a right to know what tariff they were going to have, and declaring that before Parliament was dissolved they would have before them a tariff revision in black and white.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Better get the speech and quote it.

Mr. FIELDING: Does the hon. gentleman deny it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is not correctly quoting what I said.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was in the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. FIELDING: The Speech from the Throne promised tariff revision. So far as that is concerned, the hon. gentleman monkeyed with the tariff question for years. They had Sir Thomas White telling the House that the tariff revision was overdue and that it ought to come that year. but it did not come, and then another year passed, and it did not come. Then they had the Tariff Commission which wandered all over the country. They made a solemn declaration in the Speech from the Throne that during that session they would bring down tariff revision. Is that statement true, or do I invent it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon gentleman invites an answer, I will give it. The words he quotes were not used. What was stated was that a tariff revision would be brought down in due course. The interposition of the American situation on the tariff question was good and sufficient reason for postponing it.

Mr. FIELDING: The right hon. gentleman not only put in the Speech from the Throne that statement, but instructed the then member for Prince Edward Island, Mr. McIsaac, in moving the address, to declare that the tariff revision was imperative. It was said, "Now is the day of tariff revision." Was that true? With that promise in the Speech from the Throne they let the session go by, and dissolved Parliament without a tariff revision at all. What right has the right hon. gentleman to talk of the honour of Parliament in the way he does, after these two instances I have given? My hon. friend did these two things, and I have no doubt if we would make an investigation we would find many more. Again I say, he cannot afford to challenge discussion along these lines. The question whether that resolution with regard to the soldiers' bonus at the convention of 1919 was or was not a wise one, I am not going to discuss, but this I do say, that it was not an issue in the recent election. If it were correct that it was an issue affecting the elections recently held, there would be some ground for the hon. gentleman's complaint, but we all know that, whatever may have been said at that convention, at the time the election came on that question had ceased to be an issue in this country. I had the pleasure of taking some part in the election. I spoke at a number of meetings. I never mentioned the soldiers' bonus, and never heard it mentioned. My opponent never mentioned it. It never was an issue at all. So that I say, Mr. Speaker, that there is no reason in the world why that should be treated as an issue affecting the election.

My right hon. friend talks of the appeals to the people on which we won the election. He cannot talk on any appeal on which he won his election. Whenever he appealed he was met from ocean to ocean, to a degree that was never experienced before in the history of Canada, by a repudiation of his Government. The soldiers' bonus was not an issue in the election, so far as any knowledge of mine goes. I never spoke of it, and my opponent never spoke of it. I spoke at many meetings in many parts of the country, I never heard it mentioned. I was never asked a question about it. It may have been an issue in former times. The country accepted the judgment of the committee of the House, presided over by that excellent member, Mr. Cronyn, as a settlement of the soldier bonus question. Before that committee the door was opened to consider any matters that might arise in connection with soldiers. But when he says that was an issue at the last election, and that on that issue we came back to power, I tell my hon. friend he is entirely mistaken.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): I do not propose to detain the House for any length of time in a discussion of this matter which has been pretty vigorously threshed out by my hon. friends on both sides of the House. The crux of the amendment moved by my right hon. friend is that it levels the charge of insincerity and of disregard to the niceties of political honour against the Government and my hon. friends who sit opposite. That is a very serious accusation to level, and if I were convinced that it had substantial foundation. I would have no hesitation in supporting the amendment of my right hon. friend. But, Mr. Speaker, I am not so convinced, and I will very briefly give the House my reasons. I do not now propose to enter into any discussion as to whether the resolution dealing with this matter passed at the Liberal convention, 1919, was passed in good faith or not. I have no reason to believe that it was passed other than in good faith, and for the reason that every one in this House and out of it knows that at that particular moment, in the midsummer of 1919, our soldiers were being demobilized, they were being returned from Europe and there was a feeling throughout the whole Dominion, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, that everything we could do for the returned men who fought so gloriously overseas was only what Canada should do for them. That was the atmosphere at that time. But if I say to the Government, "Because you had a resolution approving the principle of a soldiers' bonus at your convention in 1919, you must disregard all that has taken place since then and implement that resolution," then I am going a little too far. That is the position I take in this connection, and let me very briefly state my reasons. The Liberal party then in Opposition in this House might be, and probably were, perfectly consistent at that time. But if public opinion throughout Canada has changed upon that question in the last three years since June, 1919, and if other things have intervened, then, in my judgment, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and my hon. friends opposite are not acting dishonourably in stating that the time has passed for the giving of a bonus to the returned soldiers. That is the position I take.

What are the reasons? We have our financial situation for one thing. I speak so much about it, I am afraid I make myself wearisome sometimes upon the point; but I think anyone who studies the financial position of Canada is aware that it is one of the gravest things facing this country. We know that the finances of Canada will not, at the present time, stand a vast contribution by way of a soldier's bonus. We recognize that fact; we recognize also the fact that three years ago a definite policy was followed by the government of the day, in my judgment a wise policy, a policy endorsed by Parliament at that time, for giving assistance to returned soldiers, and already a sum amounting to almost a hundred million dollars has been spent in the soldiers' land settlement scheme. My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) brought in the soldiers' land settlement scheme; I supported him at that time, and I think yet that, while the scheme may have had defects in its operation, it was soundly conceived. I am quite willing to admit that my right hon. friend, and the then government of which he was the head, endeavoured to administer that scheme in the best interest of the returned soldiers of this country. For these considerations, I cannot agree with my right hon. friend and the mover and the seconder of this resolution, that because the present Government, in view of changed circumstances, cannot come forward and provide a cash bonus for the soldiers, it is acting in bad faith or dishonestly. I am anxious, as I am sure all other hon. members are, that good faith in matters of public policy should be observed. I must, however, confess that I am afraid there is possibly a little bit more behind the moving of this amendment than the mere vindication of political honour in this House, and I am led to that conclusion by a statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) who spoke to the resolution. In that statement, my hon. friend said to the Government: "You should either implement the plank in your platform, or state that you took an unfair advantage of us in the election." That is placing the reasons for a consideration of this question upon altogether too low a level and, consequently, I cannot agree with my right hon. friend and his supporters in the amendment which they have moved. The amendment, as the leader of the Opposition has stated, is a direct vote of confidence in the Government—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Want of confidence.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, I would scarcely expect my right hon. friend to move a motion of confidence in the Government. It is a direct motion of want of confidence in the Government. What does that mean if we look at the situation fairly? If we carry the thing to its logical conclusion, it means that if this motion carries, this Government is out and we shall have another election. I do not think my hon. friends to my right for a moment expected or desired that this would be carried to that conclusion, and for that reason I shall oppose the amendment of the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs.)

A good deal has been said in the debate about the conduct of the election. I trust that in this House we shall soon get away from an examination of what happened prior to December 6. I could tell you, Mr. Speaker, in all confidence, and I will state it here for the full information of the House, that if I and my hon. friends around me desired to pursue that line, we could bring a very emphatic indictment against not only my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), but some of my hon. friends on the other side of the House. Possibly in the course of the election I may have said something; for in the heat of elections, we sometimes get beyond the bounds of political proprieties or what should be the political proprieties. But I cannot see that much good will come to this House from continuing these discussions.

As I have already stated, this Parliament has very serious business to do. Let us get down to the consideration of that business. When my hon. friends opposite are not pursuing a course that I conceive to be in the best interest of the country, then I stand here to tell them so, and to oppose them in that course. That is the angle from which I approach my duties in this House; and because the amendment moved by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs) approaches it from another angle, I cannot support him, and I shall oppose it.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, when this debate started this afternoon, I had no intention of taking part in it, and I would not do so now but for the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) brought in a statement which I made yesterday evening regarding what Colonel Thompson had said at Port Arthur. I was not, of course, present at the meeting of the Prime Minister; I think I was out in some section of my constituency or somebody else's at that time. But at any rate Colonel Thompson is quoted exactly as I quoted him yesterday evening, and I did the courtesy to the Prime Minister of sending him the paper in which the quotation was given. I might point out that this paper is not a political paper; it takes an absolutely independent stand. It did not support me in the election, so that I am quoting from a paper which is not a supporter of mine. If I wished to go on quoting—and I shall not take up any time in quoting anything—I could give a quotation from a speech of my hon. friend which might embarrass him severely in this House. As is reported in the Port Arthur press, he took the stand in that city that the government of Mr. Meighen at that time was committing the unpardonable crime of appointing its friends to the Senate. That was one of the statements quoted in connection with his speech, but I do not wish to deal with that. The hon. gentleman who leads the Government stated, in the speech which he made this afternoon, that this pledge of the Liberal party was wiped out because of the actions of the Great War Veterans. Then I ask, as has been asked before: Why do they include it in their platform in October, 1921? Their platform was sent out at the beginning of the election, and it would have been the easiest thing in the world to delete that part of it since my hon. friend says now that they had no intention of carrying it out. As a matter of fact, I hold in my hand what has been handed to me by an hon. member from Vancouver, namely, a statement put out in the press by three Liberals who ran for Vancouver, absolutely pledging themselves to a cash gratuity. There is no doubt they based that pledge on the platform of the Liberal party. The Prime Minister also said that in 1919—I think I am quoting him correctly; I hope he will correct me if I am not—when that resolution was passed at the convention, they favoured cash grants, but they have changed their opinion since. We were giving cash grants at that time to soldiers returning from overseas. Every soldier, who served overseas and who returned, received from the government that was in power at that time, a cash grant running anywhere, I think, from three hundred to six hundred dollars. So that we were giving cash grants; and unless that resolution meant a further cash grant it could mean nothing at all. I presume now that it might well be said to have meant nothing. My hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Irvine), I think, said that this was a camouflage motion, and that it really was not intended to get a bonus for the soldiers. I admit that very frankly. The party in this corner of the House, which were in power from 1917 to 1921, again and again refused to consider cash grants for soldiers. I made myself unpopular amongst some of the returned men by openly declaring my opposition to the principle. This resolution has nothing to do with any request for a grant, and so far as I am personally concerned I do not believe that the thing is possible. I think it is a financial impossibility to give $2,000 to each of the returned men. The only thing the resolution does is to condemn the putting into a platform, for political purposes, of a promise which the party that makes it has no intention of carrying out. The resolution condemns such unscrupulous tactics; it declares that pledges which are not intended to be implemented should not be exploited for election purposes. In other words, it is a condemnation of the breaking of faith with the people of the country after a party has been elected on a pledge which it has used during an election campaign. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is quoted as having said at one time, in a jocular way, that platforms were made to get in on but not to stand on, and it seems that that piece of pleasantry has become an established political principle. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) said a moment ago that he did not favour the resolution because it sought something that was not possible. Let me repeat once more that the resolution does not demand that the Government should give a cash bonus to the soldiers. It is a resolution condemning the principle, or rather the lack of principle, of advocating platforms in the country before election and refusing to carry them out afterwards. Now, my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) has been accused of having broken his pledges. Let me say that I got elected on a platform put forward by Sir Robert Borden in 1917, and that we carried out every one of the twelve planks of which it was composed.

Mr. GRAHAM: Including Sir Robert Borden.

Mr. MANION: Sir Robert Borden carried himself out, because he happened to be so unfortunate as to fall ill; and I would say in regard to the laughter which I hear on the other side that I have yet to see in this House, on either side, a man for whom I have greater respect than I have for Sir Robert Borden. I saw him in this House during the better part of four years, and I have—and I believe my hon. friends on the other side have—the highest respect for the attitude which that right hon. gentleman took on all questions. I have said it in private, and I say it in public now, since the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) has seen fit to interject the remark he has made, and his friends sneeringly approve it, that I have never seen Sir Robert Borden in the House of Commons, on any question that was discussed, taking what I considered to be a narrow or bigoted stand; and I think that is a tribute which can be paid with pride to any man who has sat in Parliament as long as the right hon. Sir Robert Borden did.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) dismisses this resolution as so much nonsense. He points out that my right hon. leader promised that there should be redistribution before an election and that he did not carry out that promise. Well, the Minister of Finance and his colleagues are in power now, and I do not notice any remarks about redistribution in the Speech from the Throne this year, although they have an opportunity of doing what they think we should have done. It has also been said that the bonus question was not an issue in the election. I grant that in many cases it was not; but it was made an issue by the platform of the Liberal party, and it was used by those members I have quoted and by some of the supporters of the men whom I opposed on public platforms. It was made an issue by the party opposite in various parts of the Dominion during the election and was used as a means of securing the soldier's vote. If the present Government had wished to be fair in regard to this question they would have deleted the pledge from their platform when they put that platform before the people. Now, Sir, I do not wish to take up more time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. RINFRET: Let us get down to business.

Mr. MANION: My last remark seems to please some hon. gentlemen. Well, I am glad to be able to please them to that extent at any rate, although some of them during the last four years were not so very considerate of the time of the House or so anxious to help expedite matters. Let me point out again that the resolution does not advocate a bonus for soldiers, but condemns the making of promises by political parties who afterwards refuse to carry them out. I do not believe in that type of political warfare and I shall vote for the resolution.

Mr. E. J. SEXSMITH (Lennox and Addington): I want to ask two questions, Mr. Speaker: Are we to understand from the mover of the resolution that there shall be given a cash grant to the returned soldiers?

Mr. ARTHURS: No.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Or does the hon. member imply that there has been an absolute refusal to assist the soldiers, and that the Government does not intend to give any further help to them?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Then we have lost three hours and a half.

Mr. DONALD SUTHERLAND (South Oxford): In view of the wording of the resolution I am somewhat surprised at the question asked by the last speaker (Mr. Sexsmith). The resolution is clear and definite. It is a condemnation of the principle of giving pledges, before an election, which a party has no intention of carrying out. As I listened to the various speeches I could not help thinking of an inscription on the walls of another chamber in this building, "The spirit of the printed word". I also recalled an address delivered in this Chamber a year ago in the debate on the address by the present Prime Minister, (Mr. Mackenzie King), and I am going to quote a few words from his remarks. What I am about to read was his carefully prepared peroration which he read to this House. He said:

> What is it, Mr. Speaker, that works havoc in human lives, that destroys the noblest of friendships, that blights all that is most sacred in our human relations? It is the loss of confidence that comes through disillusionment, through the broken pledges, the shattered ideals, the lost visions, the vanished faith. Cruel, indeed, it is when that breach in confidence comes between man and man, between friend and friend, between race and race, between nation and nation; but when it comes between a people and its Government, there is no saying what injury it may ultimately work.
> What we need to-day is to seek to restore to the people faith in our parliamentary institutions, through conceding their right of control over the Parliament of the country. We know that there are rights under the law; that there are powers under the constitution; these we are prepared to concede to the limit. But is there no such thing in our national economy as public morality? Is there nothing binding in conscience and in honour between those who rule a people and those who have permitted them to rule?

There are the words of the present leader of the Government on that occasion, and yet to-day he attaches no importance to the promise that was made a part of his platform, which was re-affirmed, and, as has been pointed out, circulated throughout the Dominion in the handbook of the Liberal party during the election of 1921. I know that in my constituency twenty-four pamphlets were circulated by the Liberal party, being placed in the mail boxes throughout the rural districts after dark presumably so no one might know who was doing it. And this was one of the pledges made to the people, which the people had a right to believe would be carried out by those who were appealing for their support.

I was a little surprised at the statement made by the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) this afternoon. "Why," he said, "this stuff is all nonsense. We are just wasting time. Why do you pay any attention to things embodied in platforms, election addresses and promises?" It seems to me that I heard the hon. minister make a similar statement some time ago. He was quite frank and candid. This was before the election. Speaking in this House on May 18, 1920, he said:

> Now, responsibility generally sobers men.

Yes, responsibility sobers men, and he is evidently sober now. The hon. gentleman who leads the Government is also evidently sober to-day. I suppose that would imply that they were not sober when these statements were made to the people. What else did he say on that occasion?

> I think myself that we will find that we are all prone in framing platforms to put things perhaps a little more strongly than is wise and we all find when we come to the responsibilities of office that we may have to modify our views.

He said we may have to modify our views. I am not going to take up the time of the House in quoting from the Liberal platform, but I do want to call attention to something else. The hon. Minister of Finance has stated that the leader of the official Opposition (Mr. Meighen) did not keep the pledges and promises which he made to the people, and he referred to the revising of the tariff and other matters. What happened in regard to them? Just about a year ago, on February 15, 1921, we find that the present Prime Minister moved a resolution in this House in amendment to the Address in the following words:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's present advisers do not possess the confidence of this House or of the country, and that their retention of office constitutes a usurpation of the powers of popular government.

This is all he had to say on the matter: We are not going to discuss tariff, redistribution or anything of that kind; the Government has no right to legislate, and its retention of office is a usurpation of power. The right hon. leader of the Opposition, who was then Prime Minister, went to the people, and he had to deal with the promises and platforms made by the then leader of the Opposition, now Prime Minister of this country, who to-day asks hon. members assembled here, the representatives of the people of Canada, to attach no importance to promises and pledges that were made while his party was in opposition. Has our public life become so degraded that this is the lesson we are to teach the youth of our country? Is this the ideal we are to set in public life—that we are to repudiate promises made to the electors of Canada. I say it is an insult to any hon. member to ask him to disregard the pledges and promises which he made to his electorate.

Now, Sir, this is not a new policy which has been developed by the Liberal party. Eleven days after the armistice was signed, in fact the ink was scarcely dry on the signatures, when an organization meeting of the Liberals of Western Ontario was held in the city of London which was addressed by the leader of the Liberal party of that day (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). Reference was made to this matter at that time, and a resolution was passed that our soldiers' claims would be one of the first things that the Liberal party would deal with if returned to power. When I came into the House last night and heard the Prime Minister and the Minister of Soldiers Civil Re-establishment (Mr. Béland) repudiate these promises, stating, "We do not intend to do anything with them," I immediately recalled the statements that were made upon that occasion. I hold in my hand the London Advertiser of November 20th 1918, the official organ of the Liberal party in Western Ontario, then as it is now. Two things featured the speeches then made. One was referred to by the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Vien) relative to promises which had been made to the farmers of Canada regarding exemption from militia service. It was taken up by Sir Wilfrid Laurier on that occasion and he condemned the Government of the day for having violated its promises, and I am going to read from the official organ of the Liberal party exactly what he did say. Here it is:

> Delegations of farmers came to Ottawa, thousands of them, to ask the Government to be as good as its word. They were told no, it could not be done, and the reason the Government gave was that the military situation was serious. The military situation at that time, that is about the month of May, was certainly very serious, but sir, are we to believe that the men who introduced that policy, who told us that it was absolutely necessary that we should have this compulsory recruiting, that it should be universal—are we to believe that when they made that promise, are we to suppose that they believed that this war could be fought without reverses? Did not they know last fall that we were to have a last offensive of the German armies in France; did not they think it was possible that these armies might suffer reverses of their own; and that when they gave that promise they might meet with a situation such as this? If they did, then sir, there is only one of two things, they made the promise to the farmers in ignorance or they made it in bad faith. I know what their motive was.

This matter has been referred to so often in this House that I am afraid hon. members opposite have not followed the course of the war with any degree of care. It is very easy to look backward and see where you have made mistakes and where you might have done better; but when we are subject to censure by hon. members opposite, in view of what has happened and it is on record, I say that it ill becomes any hon. member to your right, Sir, to taunt the Government of that day with having put in force the law which was then enacted. If hon. members will refer to the report of General Allenby, Commander-in-Chief of the Egyptian Expeditionary Forces, to the War Office, issued from his general headquarters on September 18th, 1918, they will find that he states how his army had been depleted by reason of the situation which had developed on the Western Front, and he points out that in the first week of April 1918 the 52nd Division had been withdrawn and hurried to the Western Front, that in the second week of that month the 74th Division had also been withdrawn and hurried to the same destination. Those withdrawals were followed by nine yeomanry regiments, five and a half siege batteries, ten British battalions, and five machine gun companies. In May fourteen battalions of British infantry were withdrawn, and he had to fall back until his depleted forces were made up by fresh recruits from India. I mention this to show the desperate situation on the western front at that time, and the need for men to justify the cancellation of exemption from military service at that time. It was not until after troops had been sent him to take the place of those that had been removed to the western front that he achieved the victory which was the deciding factor in bringing the war to an end. Now, this is a matter which has apparently escaped the observation of some hon. gentlemen opposite; yet they readily point to the cancellation of the farmers' exemptions as a justification for the attitude of this Government and of the Liberal party to repudiating one of the pledges contained in their platform.

This resolution has been referred to by a number of speakers in the party to my left as one that should not be taken very seriously. It struck me that they were very anxious to find some excuse for not supporting a vote of censure upon the Government with regard to its attitude on this question. The one who considers himself the alpha and omega of the Farmers' movement in Ontario, the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Good) says that the discussion has not been very edifying. Well, I do not think that he added very much by the remarks which he himself made. I followed him closely; I believe it is the first time he has spoken in this House. He has written most voluminously in regard to the movement of the Farmers' party in Ontario, but when his constituents and the people of Ontario read Hansard to-morrow I fear they will not be very much edified by his contribution to the debate. Other hon. members to my left have made some observations. But I want to point out that a violation of pledge of this kind recalls to one's mind the justification of the allied countries for taking the action they did in August, 1914—the repudiation of a solemn obligation by Germany, an obligation which they characterized as a "scrap of paper." Many sacrifices were made in that war; millions of lives were laid down for a principle; yet in this Parliament to-day we are calmly asked by the Prime Minister and his supporters to attach no importance to pre-election promises. Conditions, they say, have changed since they adopted that plank in their platform. But have they overlooked the fact that the policy in question was reaffirmed by them during the recent election campaign with a view to getting the support of the soldier electors? If they knew they were not going to put it into effect, then they deliberately set about to deceive the very men who made such tremendous sacrifices that we might be permitted to assemble here in Parliament this atfernoon.

Mr. JOHN L. BROWN (Lisgar): The hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Sutherland) has seen fit to criticise the remarks made by those who sit in the Progressive group. I have been brought up to believe that we should be able to give a reason for the faith that is in us, and it is incumbent upon me to be able to give a reason why I shall vote as I intend to do upon this resolution.

I am not very greatly concerned in coming to the defence of the Government in this matter. I am not greatly concerned in what may have been their attitude before the election and how it squares with the position they take now, any more than I am with the attitude taken by the official Opposition, either before the election or at the present time. To what extent this question was an issue in the election I am not prepared to say. I was in a happy and unique position in my constituency: there was no one prepared officially to endorse either the hon. gentlemen now sitting opposite or the then government. Opposed to me was a gentleman who repudiated the Union government and its successor, the National what-do-you-call-it—the big name—and all its works, as well as the right hon. leader of the Opposition. But this question was not an issue in the constituency of Lisgar. As has been pointed out, the only issue raised in that country—and we could not get any discussion of public and really important questions at all—had to do with the question of the United Grain Growers. It is worth noting that in that section of the country, where that particular question was best understood—and we did understand it—the electors spoke in no uncertain terms. Hon. gentlemen on the Government benches will take note of that, just as well as hon. gentlemen of the official Opposition.

I said that I proposed to give a reason why I intended to oppose this amendment. The reason is simply this: I came here with the intention—and I stated this before the election—of giving any government that happened to be returned a fair opportunity to carry into effect the principles for which we stood. Up to the present time no issue has been raised that would make it necessary to depart from that position. I congratulate the hon. leader of the Opposition in his making use of an opportunity to rise to great moral fervour and to make a great moral appeal. For my part—and I think I can speak for the majority of those around me, though I do not know; perhaps I have no right to speak for them—I propose to judge the Government as I would have been prepared to judge a government that might have been formed by the right hon. leader of the Opposition had his party been returned to power. I propose to give them an opportunity to endorse the principles for which we stand. None of those principles are in any way involved in this discussion, and as the resolution is, according to the leader of the Opposition, a direct vote of want of confidence in the Government, I intend to oppose it.

I do not want my position to be interpreted as condoning anything that might seem like political trickery or breach of faith on the part of public men, whether members of the Government or of the Opposition. The Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) has referred to the pledge that was made in regard to redistribution. At the time of the nominating convention in my constituency I said that the time was inopportune to nominate a candidate in that riding because I did not think any government could be so lacking in good faith as to fail to implement the promise which we understood had been made to the country, namely, that redistribution would be granted. Unfortunately our faith in that respect was shaken; so, looking at the matter in an impartial manner, as I think we may do, I see no reason why we should vote for the amendment, which amounts to a motion of want of confidence in the Government of the day.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Arthurs) which was negatived on the following division.

SUPPLY

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair:

Civil Government—Justice—salaries and contingencies, $235,517.50.

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice): There are a few changes in the Estimates. There is an increase of $9,785 as follows:

One inspector of penitentiaries, new position	$2,820
One senior clerk stenographer for minister's office	1,320
One clerk stenographer for the penitentiary branch	960
One clerk stenographer for the department	960
	$6,060
Statutory increases for 46 officers	3,725
	$9,785

The decreases are as follows:

Saving by superannuation of Miss Armstrong ($2,100) replaced by Mr. Pearson ($1,140)	$ 960 00
Saving by vacant clerkships, reverting to minimum of class	417 50
Over estimated last year	995 00
Total decreases	$2,372 50
Net increase	$7,412 50

I must say that this is more apparent than real, because we have to deduct from this the salary of Mr. Archibald, Parole Officer, who was receiving $3,600. There is another amount of $600 which was paid to Mr. Ahearn, one of the secretaries of the Minister of Justice. Mr. Ahearn is now in the department, but he is no longer acting as a secretary. These two deductions would represent a decrease of $4,200, so that the net increase, counting statutory increases, would be $3,212.50.

I have the following to report from the Accountant. The apparent increase of $7,500 is caused partly by a transfer of the vote of $2,000 heretofore voted under "Administration of Justice" for expenses of the purchasing agent's office, and $5,500 to raise the vote, because, for a number of years, it has been too small for the increased requirements of the department, and supplementary votes have been necessary. The amount last year was $32,900, and we are now asking for $32,500.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sorry I could not follow the reasoning of the minister. The attempts at economy in this case, and it is not singular, have resulted in a substantial increase in disbursements. The explanation, as I understood it, was that there are certain statutory increases which account for the estimate. That is clear; but it accounts for only a small part of the salaries themselves. Of course, these increases do not account at all for contingencies. The minister says that the difference, some $7,000, is more apparent than real, because there is a saving of $3,600, in that the parole officer, Mr. Archibald, does not appear on the list. It would seem to me that the result of that would be that had Mr. Archibald not died there would have been an increase of $3,600.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Mr. Archibald's salary is included in the Estimates, which were prepared before he died. We do not, however, intend to replace him by the appointment of a new man; his place will be taken by one of the officials of the department. We are therefore saving $3,600 in his salary, and $600 on Mr. Ahearn's salary, or $4,200 in all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand the minister to say that these salaries are included in the Estimates. Why not strike them out? Mr. Archibald has been dead about a month.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We do not intend to make a new appointment; we will not spend the money.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Ahearn, I understand, is in the Clemency Branch?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will he be continued there?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So that he will draw his salary?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes, but not the extra $600.

Item agreed to.

Interior: Salaries, $1,462,770; Contingencies, $115,000.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of the Interior): The sum of $1,353,922.50 was voted for the fiscal year 1921-22 for salaries of the permanent staff at Ottawa, and it is estimated that it will require $1,462,770 for the service during the fiscal year 1922-23, an increase of $108,847. As shown in the schedule, the permanent inside service consists of 832 employes, an increase of ten over the fiscal year 1921-22. Statutory increases under the Civil Service Act have been provided for in every instance, and the balance of the increase shown is due to the application of the classification. The increase in the number of employees is accounted for as follows: Number of positions in 1921-22, estimated, were 822, less position of superintendent accountant, deleted. Then there was a transfer from the Commission of Conservation by Order in Council No. 2550, of the 20th of July, 1921, of eight persons. The following employees, namely, economic adviser, hydro-electrical engineer, outside agent, librarian, principal map draughtsman, four senior clerk stenographers, and a messenger clerk, account for the difference between the 822 estimated for and the 832 employed in the department.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know that this explanation quite covers the matter. Take the assistant office engineers, for example. They are fairly highly paid employees and they have increased from 15 to 31, or over 100 per cent. There are undoubtedly reductions in some other instances, but what is the reason for this increase?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): These increases were dated back to April, 1919, and they were not classified until this year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am not asking as to the salaries; the minister has given some explanation regarding them. I am speaking as to the number of the office engineers, which has increased from 15 to 31.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There are no increases, but there have been changes made by the classification of the Civil Service Commission, and these changes account for the difference.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have no doubt my hon. friend has given a good deal of thought to the Estimates. I suppose I am right in that?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I suppose so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, does he consider that the Estimates as produced are a proper exemplification of the platform of economy?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): As I am informed, this is a matter over which I have no control.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: No control over your employees?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have been in charge of the department for a short time, but I do not appear to have control over the number of employees, or the classification; my hon. friend appears to have provided for that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. minister thinks or believes that he has no control over the number of his employees, then with all my respect for him personally, I really think he should resign and let some one else take his place who will have control.

Mr. JACOBS: Are you looking for it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: When I was head of that department I controlled the number of employees.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): When I have been in charge for a time I will try to control the employees too.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am very glad of that promise of improvement, but I do not want the House to get the impression—at least, it will not be my fault if it does—that any minister does not absolutely control the number of officers in his department; that is to say, unless he fails to get the approval of Council, he can reduce the number to any extent he deems advisable, and the responsibility is his; he cannot shift it on to anybody else.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am not seeking to evade responsibility for control of the department. I quite understand, even from my short tenure of office, that one has the authority to carry on with a lesser number of civil servants than he may find in his department; but I think my hon. friend will agree with me that it is advisable to be well-informed and to go slowly before starting to make changes. I have said that I think the department is very well organized; I still think so; but perhaps after mature consideration I may find places where more economy may be exercised.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is quite right in connection with the classification. There is no doubt that former temporary emloyees have been drafted into the service, and very properly so, under the rules of the Civil Service Commission. For example, there is an apparent saving under the heading of Clerical Assistance from $40,000 to $25,000. That saving, as it is taken up, accounts in part for the increase in my hon. friend's vote, because those temporaries are made permanent and therefore added to the list. I am quite well aware of that. But take travelling expenses and sundries; that cannot be blamed on the Civil Service Commission. There is an increase of 30 percent. Why that increase?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I admit that personally I have not interfered with the services of any one of the departments over which I have control. I think it will be generally agreed that with eight hundred or nine hundred employees, while one is trying to get acquainted with them, there is not very much time to examine very closely as to where certain services might be dispensed with. This again is accounted for by a change. Travelling expenses and sundries, $32,000, shows an increase of $10,000 over 1921-22. It is estimated that $22,000 will be required to meet expenses of the permanent Inside Service officials at Ottawa who may be travelling on Government business, and an amount of $10,000 will be necessary to cover the expenditure connected with telegrams, postage, subscriptions to newspapers, express charges, cab hire, washing towels, and for other small items relating to the Inside Service of the department at Ottawa. The amount estimated for 1921-22 for travelling expenses was $12,000, but, on account of additions to the permanent Inside staff through blanketing-in Orders in Council or Section 79 of the Dominion Lands Act, it will be necessary to increase the item in order to meet the requirements of this service. The expenditure from 1st April, 1921, to 31st December, 1921, was $17,036.78. I am advised that the $10,000 is very largely charged from other services and is drawn by the very same civil servants who may be travelling. Those expenses will now be all taken out of this particular vote. There is therefore no real increase in this vote, it being in the nature of a transfer.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Is the total expense for the past year $17,300?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, the total expense from April 1st, 1921, to December 31, 1921, nine months, was $17,036.78.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then why are you endeavouring to increase the vote for nine months? The old vote would just about cover that.

Mr. BAXTER: I notice at the foot of page 78, dealing with senior file clerks, that the number is increased from twelve to twenty-nine. I thought at first that possibly some junior grades were moved up, but looking at the top of page 79 I find that even this year there are twenty-three, or a reduction of only two on the number last year. That would mean seven less in the junior grades, but there is an increase of seventeen in the senior grades. There is one other item on page 79, clerk stenographers, increased from 96 to 111, while the juniors have been reduced by ten. It may be that these two items together make up 30 per cent or 40 per cent of the entire increase in the department, and that the Civil Service Commission is responsible, although it would hardly seem to me to be so on a cursory inspection. On the other hand, it may be that the pruning knife which was applied to most of the departments by the late government—and which, very naturally, was very much resented—having been dropped, the economies which resulted are now being made up for by a constant expansion. I do not know whether the hon. minister can answer the question off hand. I do not ask to hold up the passing of the vote because of that, but I should like to know, and possibly the House might be interested too, in his explanation before all the Estimates are passed.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): A large proportion of the $10,000 item, practically all of it I am informed, is taken from the vote for other purposes in the interests of which these men were travelling. They are now grouped together, have become civil servants and can no longer procure money from that vote; therefore you find the item of $12,000 added to the travelling expenses for the purpose of covering those items. In answer to the hon. member for St. John, I thought I made it very clear that there is no increase, except to the extent of the eight who joined the service and were transferred from the Conservation Commission staff to that of the Department of the Interior. On the other hand, the items as changed simply represent, so far as my information goes, the changes made by the Civil Service Commission with respect to classification, and that I take it is fixed. I have not attempted to interfere with it, assuming that the Civil Service Commission have control.

Mr. MacKELVIE: What are the functions and duties of the Publicity Agent for whom $2,400 is provided on page 77? There are two or three other new items in the same group.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am informed that the publicity agent advertises the parks and playgrounds over which the department has control, and takes steps to induce tourists and other interested persons to visit them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: For the encouragement of the minister and to inspire in him hopes for the future, I want to say this: it is difficult in a large department such as the Interior to avoid increases, particularly in the face of the statutory increases of civil servants. This year I find that his increases amount to approximately $108,000. In the year of which I was reminded by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), when I was Minister of the Interior—and I know the previous reductions were the same—notwithstanding the obstacles, notwithstanding that the work of the department very considerably expanded, we took care of all statutory increases and of all the actual work and effected an actual reduction of $6,200.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the explanation of the increased amount asked for printing and stationery? Members of the House are literally flooded with stationery and printed matter from nearly every department; it seems to me that a good deal of it could be lopped off. It looks like a case where we should have a decrease rather than an increase, particularly in times like these.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The money is needed to pay for books of various descriptions,—index books; land patent record books, etc., file backs, special paper for patents, printed forms, purchase of typewriters and stationery required for the general use of the Inside Service at Ottawa. There are 250 typewriters constantly in use in the Inside Service, the cost of repairs and supplies in connection with which amount to a very large figure each year. The expenditure under the head of printing and stationery during the past three years has been as follows: fiscal year 1919-20, $58,603.64; 1920-21, $70,367,-.16; 1921-22, $77,000. The amount estimated for 1922-23 is $13,000 more than the amount of the estimated expenditure for 1921-22, but as strict economy is being practised it is thought that $58,000 will be sufficient to cover this service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But still, why the increase? We were using typewriters before. Prices are going down; paper is a good deal cheaper than it was. I may say that in order to effect a saving, the Department of the Secretary of State went through the old war departments and got hold of all available typewriters, and the departments were asked not to purchase any new ones. Is my hon. friend putting this large increase into the purchase of typewriters?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): No, I did not say so. That is simply one of the items.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Then why the increase?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I was going to ask the question about printing and stationery which the minister has just answered. We find ourselves at a loss in criticising any of these Estimates, because as soon as we speak about them we find that everything is covered by the reclassification. This reclassification is like charity; it covers a multitude of sins. Of what avail are our criticisms of these Estimates if every time we ask, why these increases, there is a tendency to hide behind the Civil Service Commission or the reclassification; and because of that we cannot go into the details. I realize that the heads of these departments are new men and cannot be expected to be familiar with all the details. At the same time, they are responsible for their departments, and we want to impress upon them that the country expects of them and will demand of them, classification or no classification, a reduction of these Estimates commensurate with the reduction in the cost of living and the price of supplies, due regard being had also to the country's diminishing income.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In the general vote of the department as a whole we are able to show a considerable saving. I hope no one would intimate that I have been endeavouring to hide behind the Civil Service Commission in connection with this matter; that was not my thought. So far as Civil Service salaries are concerned I must confess that we appear to have very little control,—I may say frankly, none at all. My hon. friends have pointed out that we have control so far as the reduction of the service is concerned; that is quite true. I think my predecessor in office was managing the department very well; I have every confidence in his ability to do that. It may be that further savings could be effected, but after some years' experience with civil servants I do not know that you can get along by reducing your staffs all at once. I am not prepared to say at this juncture whether or not further reductions can be made, but I do say that if savings can be made in any quarter, I am determined to make them. This vote is asked largely on the representations of the officials of the department. It is stated that the money is needed; if it is not needed it will not be spent.

Mr. STEVENS: There is a new appointment here: Economic Adviser, $4,200. Is this new Economic Adviser appointed to assist in the expenditure of the additional $100,000, or is he to assist the minister in reducing the expenditure? It seems rather a peculiar thing to appoint an economic adviser and then ask for an increase of $100,000.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I trust my hon. friend does not assume that I am thoroughly familiar with the titles of all the different officers in this huge department. I do not pretend to be able to give the information, and I would not try. This official came over from the Conservation Commission. I do not know why he has this particular title. Indeed, I may say I have sometimes wondered at the multiplicity of titles in the Civil Service.

Mr. MANION: We voted against titles some time ago in the House.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It does not seem to have reduced them in the Civil Service.

Mr. CRERAR: I was very glad a moment ago to hear the declaration from the minister that he proposed to practise as rigid economy as possible in the administration of his department. I commend that attitude, and trust that it will be fully appreciated and practised by the Government as a whole.

Since yesterday I have taken the trouble of getting a little information in respect to the increasing cost of civil government in this country, and to my mind it is quite alarming in view of the circumstances in which this country finds itself financially. I find, for instance, that in 1903 the total vote for civil government in Canada was in round figures $1,404,000; that is twenty years ago. In 1913, ten years later, it had increased to $5,372,000, and between 1913 and 1923 the cost of civil government has grown to over $11,000,000, or an increase of almost 100 per cent in the last ten years. That, to my mind, is a subject of very serious importance to this House. Parliament votes the money and naturally we are reluctant to cut down the Estimates that a minister asks for. I know that that is the attitude with which I approach the matter myself. I am anxious to see the public services carried on efficiently and effectively, but the time has come, I think, when we must frankly face the situation.

In respect to the department over which my hon. friend has supervision, I find that the increase has been equally great. In 1903 the total expenditure for civil government in the Department of the Interior, including salaries and contingencies was roughly $135,000; that is twenty years ago. In 1913 it had grown to $1,025,000. Now at that time the Department of Immigration was also in the Interior Department. Consequently, the figures I have just given include the expenditure for immigration purposes, as well as the conduct of the business of the Department of the Interior. At the present time the minister is asking for a vote of $1,462,770 for salaries, and $115,000 for contingencies, or a total of $1,577,770 for civil government in this department alone. That is an increase in the last ten years for civil government alone of $575,000 in the Interior Department, and if we include the vote for the Department of Immigration, which amounts to almost $275,000, we find that the cost of administering these services has increased by almost $1,000,000 in the last ten years. This does not take into account the cost of running the department outside Ottawa. It is simply the cost of civil government, the overhead cost of managing the machine, and I submit to the House and the Government that it is costing too much to run the business of this country. I am not criticising the Government for a moment; I am not disposed to criticise the government that preceded this one, for I had twenty-two months' experience in a government and I know how difficult it is to keep down expenditure, but I do say in all seriousness that the time has come in this country when there should be a thorough examination and revision not only of the cost of civil government, but of administering the whole government machinery outside of the head offices at Ottawa, to see wherein economies may be effected. We cannot tax the people of Canada at the rate of $450,000,000 or $500,000,000 a year, and expect the country to prosper, and if I may offer this suggestion, I think the Government would be well advised—and in this I am confident that they would have the whole-hearted support of the Canadian people—to set about seriously to consider where the cost of running the machinery may be cut down not only in the city of Ottawa but throughout the whole Dominion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Perhaps in view of the remarks of the hon. member for Marquette, and in view of the minister's own declaration that he finds his department exceedingly well run, he will now consent at least to say that extravagance shall stop or that it is not going on in his department, and will reduce this vote to the amount asked for last year. If we are to practise economy, this is the time to start.

I cannot add anything very much to what has been so ably said by the hon. member for Marquette nor indeed to the very frank admission of the minister himself, that he finds his department well run. Surely in this year of contraction and further deflation, there ought not to be an increase in the cost of administration, but rather economy, and I would suggest that the minister seriously consider cutting down this vote.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think no one knows better than the hon. gentleman who has just sat down that we have no control over the statutory increase. That is a matter for the Civil Service Commission. I should be very glad to run the department for the same amount as last year if the Civil Service Commission would permit me to pay the same salaries.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the minister consent to cutting down the vote to what it was last year except for the statutory increases?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That would mean that I should forego the increase of $10,000.

Mr. BELAND: May I remind my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) that legislation was passed by Parliament last session doing away entirely with the Conservation Commission, and the contention of the government then was that a large part of the work carried on by that commission would be diverted to the Department of the Interior. I think that would account for a large portion of this increase.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The contention was not that. The contention was that the work was already being done by the Department of Interior and that there was mere duplication in the Conservation Commission. That was why we adopted the economy of abolishing the commission. It appears, according to the minister, and I have no doubt he is right, that eight clerks were tansferred from the Conservation Commission to the Interior Department, but those should have taken the place of men who dropped out by death, superannuation or resignation. I do not see any need of increasing the number of employees in the Interior Department at all. Even though eight were transferred, there would be many more than that, even since the minister took office, who could drop out by retirement, death or superannuation, so there should not be an increase in the number. Furthermore, with reclassification and a better arrangement of the work it was hoped, and there is no reason why it should not take place, that there would be more work done by the individual man, permitting of a reduction, not by dismissals, but by the natural contraction that would take place through death, retirement and superannuation. It is that, the minister, I think, has failed to take account of.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Let me read the items that go to make up the $108,847.50:

Transferred from the Commission of Conservation (10)	$19,902 50
Transferred from Board of Pension Commissioners (1)	3,360 00

I do not know at the moment, but I presume the Government who passed the Order in Council did know for what purpose those ten individuals were transferred to the Department of the Interior, because they passed the Order in Council in July and transferred ten people.

The next item is Board of Pension Commissioners (1) $3,360, statutory increases make up $52,737.50, increases due to reclassification $55,418.50, less appointments at minimum to fill vacancies $22,571. And I am told that where retirement or superannuation takes place the office is filled at the minimum salary, and not at the maximum, so that what my hon. friend has just been pointing out does take place, but the position has been filled at the minimum salary, which requires $22,571, making up $108,847.50. That, I claim, is uncontrollable, unless the argument is used that the staff of the department be reduced, and I stated three or four times that I have not gone into that matter. I frankly confess that. But let me tell the hon. gentleman from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) that I will go into it. I think it would be presumptuous on the part of any one who has been in a department of this size for a period of a few months or six weeks to say he knows all about it, and that he would know which services could be dispensed with and which were absolutely required. I have absolute confidence in the ability of my predecessor to run the department, and I presume he required all the service I found there when I took office. I agree most thoroughly with the hon. gentleman from Marquette. I know that in the provincial government of the provinces during the period of the war, and undoubtedly in this Government, it was found incumbent upon the members of the Government to increase the payments to the staff, and they have been increased very materially. Not only was it found incumbent to increase them, but it was found incumbent to pay bonuses, and the cost of civil government has increased enormously. There is no doubt that, in conjunction with other services in Canada, the cost of government will have to come down, and that will be part of the business of this Government.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I notice on page 79 there is an item under the head of Research Astronomers. There are two of them at $3,060. These positions are apparently entirely new, and there was evidently no classification of last year. The item amounts to over $6,000, and right next to this item is the item of Astronomical Computors. I would like to know why there should be an increase occasioned by these appointments. Surely the Civil Service Commission are not responsible for that.

Mr. KNOX: What effect would it have on this vote if the natural resources were turned over to the Prairie provinces?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I am afraid I could not answer that question. I would not like to venture to say what proportion, but I imagine a very large, or a fair, proportion of the Department of the Interior would go over to the provinces. There are the territorial services that will have to be carried on, but just what proportion I am unable to say.

Mr. KNOX: I was merely asking for the purpose of showing that there would be a saving, and that it would be an argument in favour of turning over the natural resources to the provinces.

Mr. GOULD: The thought has occurred to me that it is possible our Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) would like to bring down a huge credit balance next year, and on that account he has not been very severe in his criticisms of his ministers when they have presented their budgets to him. The time to practise economy is right now, and surely from all the expressions that have been given on both sides, particularly the Government side, it is apparent the House has indicated its approval of the principle of economy. We are everlastingly talking economy on this side. We believe we should have economy, and yet in every case excuses or reasons are given why each particular department should be sustained in its vote, practically as high as the expenditure of last year. It seems to me the excuse of the Civil Service Commission is offered too frequently. They are charged with the responsibility, but it seems like a man trying to hide behind a woman's skirts a little bit.

If the Government appreciate the position of the taxpayers throughout the country, they will deal with the question of expenditure with determination to bring the administration back to a basis of rigid economy. While it is true that the minister has only a brief acquaintance with his department, he must have had advice; but I fear his advisers have not viewed the situation from the standpoint of the taxpayers. If all these large spending departments are coming before Parliament and asking for the same amounts of money as have been spent in recent years we must simply insist upon the Government putting into practice those principles of economy which have been enunciated on all sides. We must demonstrate by our votes that we are going to put in practice that which we preach. The ministers must accept the principle that economy has to be practised and the principle must be illustrated by the amount of money that Parliament is asked to vote.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I may say that, so far as the total vote of the department is concerned—and that concerns all our activities, including the Civil Service, and the $108,847.50 increase,—there is a net decrease of $68,482.50 this year. We are not dealing with that matter for the moment, and it might be unfair to interject it, but the total vote was $7,358,527.50, for 1921-22. This year we are asking for $7,290,045, or a reduction of $68,482.50, and I say that in spite of the increase of $108,847.50 the statutory increases, the memorandum of which I have just given to the committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do the hon. gentleman's figures include civil government?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I understand so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think so.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This is a summary of the whole vote of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Inclusive of civil government?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They never give it together.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have a summary of the figures for the whole department here. I mentioned, in answer to my hon. friend who makes the statement that we must economize, that it was probably unfair to interject the vote of the department into the civil government. A saving of $68,000 is not a very large economy in an expenditure of $7,000,000 odd, but I just want to show my hon. friend as we will be discussing this later that we are endeavouring to cut down, and we make that saving in spite of the statutory increases amounting to $108,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Do the sums mentioned here include a bonus, and if so, what amount?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): That will all be provided for if the bonus is continued. I am told the bonus was supplementary last year. The estimates that I am quoting are the estimates for last year, supplemented by a bonus. Whether the bonus will be continued or not is another matter.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister did not answer my question as to research astronomers.

Item agreed to.

Civil Government—Labour—salaries and contingencies, $304,255.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): It will be noted that the civil government Estimates for the Department of Labour for the fiscal year 1922-23, as prepared, show an increase of $23,400. This increase is explained as follows. Under the present regulations of the Civil Service Commission, it is necessary to provide for payment for positions resulting from promotions or changes in duties, before the positions are actually created by Council. There are in the Estimates now before the Committee a number of such positions, that is, a position specified with a stated salary opposite it, which position has not yet been created or filled, but which it is believed to be necessary to create and fill.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would it be convenient to give a list of those at this moment?

Mr. MURDOCK: Let us take the third specified position—Director of Technical Education. Since I have been minister of the department, we have had no Director of Technical Education. That official was taken from the Dominion Government by the Government of British Columbia, and we have not yet filled the position. I do not know just when we shall fill it, but possibly we shall not fill it for the next few months. It, however, appears necessary to place in the Estimates an amount to cover the salary for such an official, if it be found that we can get the proper and desirable man to fill the position, and if we think the time opportune to appoint such an official.

Mr. CRERAR: What are the duties of a Director of Technical Education in this department?

Mr. MURDOCK: The Director of Technical Education has, in co-operation and conjunction with the provincial educational authorities, the duty entrusted to him of maintaining timely supervision of the expenditures of the amounts of money granted by this Government to assist provincial governments in providing for proper technical education in the various provinces. As the hon. gentleman will know, this Government has a specified vote which, this particular year, amounts to $1,100,000, and which is apportioned on a certain basis prescribed by law and on an equal basis as between the provinces, to promote and further technical educational advantages to the youth of the various provinces. Those are, as best I can describe them, the duties of the Director of Technical Education. At the present time we have an Assistant Director of Technical Education, who is carrying on with the assistance of one or two stenographers, I am not sure just how many.

Mr. CRERAR: This, perhaps, affords an illustration of the manner in which these expenditures grow. As we well know, education is a matter entirely within the control of the provinces, and I think it should remain there. I know a good many of my hon. friends opposite agree with me in that view. It is of doubtful wisdom to develop in any branch of the federal government any staff or group of people whose business it is to mix up in the function of education which is particularly a function belonging to the provinces. If the federal authorities desire to assist and promote technical education in the various provinces, that can surely be done without the need of building up a staff of educational experts in our Labour Department. This is an item upon which we could have a little enlightenment.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am quite sure the hon. member for Marquette will not hold me responsible for the condition that I find in this respect.

Mr. CRERAR: Not for a moment.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am quite sure he will agree with me that, even though his views are absolutely correct and this House should conform thereto, it would be necessary to change an existing law. Under the existing arrangements and the law placed upon the statute book by the government which preceded us, we have a graduated, increasing amount of money provided by the federal government to assist, on a fifty-fifty basis, the various provincial governments in promoting proper technical education amongst the young people of those provinces. If the views of my hon. friend were to prevail, it would, of course, be necessary to eliminate the law now existing, which provides in the present year for a fund of $1,100,000, or $100,000 in excess of the amount provided for in last year's Estimate, and we would, in substance, be saying to the various provincial authorities: No longer will the federal government undertake to uphold the hands of the provinces or to assist them in providing technical education for their young people. I think my hon. friend will agree that to maintain the necessary and timely supervision over that federal expenditure of $1,100,000 during the present year, it is not unreasonable that there should be a director of technical education. We have not one now, and there should be such an officer; and we should also have an assistant director, because there might be something to do in two provinces at the same time. A couple, but not more than a couple, of stenographers are also needed, or approximately a staff of four, to maintain the supervision over the expenditure of this money during the present fiscal year.

Mr. CRERAR: I am aware of the legislation by which this assistance was given for technical education, but I do not think that it provides for any Director of Technical Education, or Assistant Director. That was what I was drawing my hon. friend's attention to. As regards his last statement, it is a fact, for instance, that the federal government pays large subsidies to certain provinces in Canada, but because that is done, under the law there is no provision that there should be a staff of experts to supervise, with the provincial authorities, the expenditure of those subsidies.

Mr. MURDOCK: I regret that I have not with me a copy of the statutes. I had understood that the law specifically provided that there shall be a director.

Mr. CRERAR: If that is so I stand corrected.

Mr. MANION: In view of the fact that the position which the minister speaks of was marked up against last year, so that it does not represent an increase, why is it that the total number of employees for the coming year is 11 more than in the preceding year? And before the minister answers this question perhaps he will answer another. He has spoken of technical education. Perhaps the House will be interested to know his view as to whether or not the Dominion Government should take part in technical education.

Mr. MURDOCK: The last question is indeed a fair one and I personally regard it as commendable that the federal government should show a disposition to cooperate, where desired, with the various provincial governments in promoting technical education. My hon. friend (Mr. Manion) asked why the permanent employees show an increase, the respective figures being 106 permanent employees for 1921-22 as compared with 117 for 1922-23. I am glad of the opportunity to answer the question. On the 30th of December I took charge of the Labour Department and found the following employees therein: In Ottawa, there were fifty-one permanent ladies, and twenty-five temporary; fifteen permanent returned soldiers and seven temporary; other males, twenty-eight permanent and five temporary, or a total of ninety-four permanent and thirty-seven temporary. Outside of Ottawa, at the employment offices in Calgary, Winnipeg, Vancouver and other points, there were three permanent ladies and four temporary, three permanent returned soldiers and one temporary; other males five permanent, or a total of 147 employees instead of the 106 which my hon. friend sees on the Estimates for the closing fiscal year. There were forty-two temporary employees. Perhaps my hon. friend would like to know how long these temporary employees had been working in the Labour Department.

Mr. MANION: Yes, and perhaps the minister will explain how it is that, in view of the fact, that there is to be a reduction of thirty or forty, he is increasing the estimate on civil government by $24,000.

Mr. MURDOCK: The proposal is to make twelve of these forty-two temporary employees permanent. Some of the rest have received notice, which so far as I understand will not be revoked, that they are to leave the service on the 31st of this month, or a few weeks later.

Mr. STEVENS: There are sixteen who are scattered over the country that are included in the estimate of last year, and my hon. friend is including them in the deduction he is making.

Mr. MURDOCK: All of the permanent employees of the department outside of Ottawa are included.

Mr. STEVENS: Where are they?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the number of employees in Ottawa?

Mr. MURDOCK: There were ninety-four permanent and thirty-seven temporary when I took charge.

Mr. STEVENS: Are the eleven permanent employees outside Ottawa included in this list?

Mr. MURDOCK: There are four wage investigators for 1922-23 at $11,460. The estimate also provides for a wage investigator who has heretofore been employed in the province of Quebec, and used temporarily on the basis of $15 per day. The proposal now is to provide a permanent salary of $1,980 to begin with, but without the definite assurance that we shall positively fill the position or put that wage investigator on a yearly salary. We do ask, though, to have the provision made so that his services can be utilized on the basis of a yearly salary, instead of on the basis of $15 a day, if it should be found to be a better business arrangement.

Mr. STEVENS: That accounts for three permanent employees.

Mr. MURDOCK: I thought my hon. friend from Vancouver was asking for certain employees outside Ottawa.

Mr. STEVENS: Exactly; there are eight more permanent employees outside Ottawa.

Mr. MURDOCK: There is a clearance officer who is assistant to the officer at Winnipeg. It is proposed to provide a salary for him on a permanent basis of $1,980.

Mr. STEVENS: That is a new appointment.

Mr. MURDOCK: Making a somewhat lengthy temporary appointment permanent. In the case of a number of these temporary employees the Civil Service Commission have intimated that they would decline to give any further temporary certificates because of the fact that such certificates for the same individuals had been issued on two, three or more occasions, and that they must be placed on a permanent basis.

Mr. IRVINE: What is the function of an employment specialist? Is he busy at the present time, and is the increase in his salary due to his increased employment in dealing with unemployment?

Mr. MURDOCK: This employment specialist analyzes the returns which come to the Labour department from various parts of the Dominion in regard to the employment situation. He was appointed by the late government, and is classified by the Civil Service Commission as specially qualified to perform the duties and to be regarded as an employment specialist. For fuller information the hon. member might consult the book which is issued by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. IRVINE: Is he a statistician?

Mr. MURDOCK: He has to deal with statistics, facts and figures, analyze them, and tabulate them to secure as accurate results as possible.

Mr. IRVINE: But those results would be purely statistical?

Mr. MURDOCK: Largely statistical, I think, and based on comparative estimates in each case with similar figures from other parts of the country.

Mr. HANSON: While these Estimates are under discussion I desire to call the attention of the minister to a matter which in my opinion, and I believe in the opinion of the House, is of great public importance, namely, the critical situation in the coal-mining districts of the maritime provinces, as a result of the strike-on-the-job which is now in progress in portions of Nova Scotia. I observe in the press that the hon. minister has declared himself in very strong terms to Mr. McLachlan, the secretary of the United Mine Workers of America, holding office in that province. I apprehend there will be no other opportunity to discuss this matter, and I think it is due to the country, especially in view of the representations which have been made to hon. members by circular letter, and also in view of the representations which I believe have been made to the hon. minister himself by the mayors of several towns in the districts affected, that we should have a declaration from him as to his policy in connection with this very important matter.

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. Chairman, in reply to my hon. friend from York-Sunbury, when a boy I was taught "There is a time and place for everything."

Mr. HANSON: This is the time and the place.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend has intimated that he has learned through the press my personal views of the intended strike-on-the-job. He has probably also noticed in the press that to-day a deputation from Nova Scotia waited on certain members of the Cabinet, including the Prime Minister. It is likely that a statement upon the situation as developed at the conference may be forthcoming within the next day or two, and therefore it would be entirely unbecoming for me now to undertake to deal with the matter.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not think we have got started yet, Mr. Chairman. The hon. Minister of Labour was giving us some information, but was interrupted by questions. He started to give us a list of appointments which he said were not filled now and which he had to have in reserve; he had given us one when he was interrupted. I hope now he will be able to go on.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am very much obliged to my hon. friend from West York for coming to my assistance. I will now proceed. I referred to the third specified position, Director of Technical Education. Now I would ask hon. members to go down to the position specified as Statistician at $2,400 a year.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Chairman, I should like to put another question or two with regard to this statistician. From my previous question I understand that the employment specialist is largely a statistician. Now we have another statistician in the Department of Labour. A little further down we have Wage Investigators, who I presume are also statisticians. Then a little further down we have Principal Statistical Clerks, who I presume, are statisticians. Then we have Junior Wage Investigators, who, I assume, are also statisticians. Then we have Senior Statistical Clerks and Junior Statistical Clerks. Would it not be possible to co-ordinate these statisticians and dispense with half of them?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend evidently thought I was too slow in running down the list, so he proceeded to get ahead of me. If he will bear with me patiently I will endeavour to go over each of these positions and discuss them for his benefit. The position of statistician is not a new one, though we are going to ask the Civil Service Commission to provide definitely for the classification of this employee. The duty of the statistician relates to the comparison of prices, the particulars concerning which you will find in the Labour Gazette. He has to secure accuracy in the comparison of those prices and make a correct estimate of the cost of living from time to time. Then we come to the head clerk. This vote is to place a capable employee in a slightly higher class in order that he may get a thorough line on the work of an efficient officer who is advancing in age, and thus become properly qualified to discharge those duties if necessary. The next position is that of Senior Wage Investigator. The vote is to place on a somewhat higher basis the position held by an officer of the department at Calgary.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Mr. HANSON: The minister was good enough to read me a little lecture a moment ago as to times and places. May I ask him if any of his investigators are in Cape Breton at the present time, and if so who they are, and what progress they are making?

Mr. MURDOCK: The answer to the first question is, No; therefore there is no necessity of answering the others.

Mr. STEVENS: I am very grateful for the information the minister has given me with regard to four out of eleven permanent employees outside of Ottawa who, he says, are included in this list. If he will inform me with respect to the other seven, I shall be obliged.

Mr. MURDOCK: I must ask the hon. member for Vancouver also to bear with me. I have started to do that several times, but have been tripped before I got through. I will try to get through the whole list. Now, we are asking the House to provide for five wage investigators instead of four.

Mr. STEVENS: You have already given that. I am anxious to get information with regard to the others.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The minister has not finished his initial list. If my hon. friend will bear with him, I think it is only fair that he should have a chance to do so.

Mr. MURDOCK: I started at the beginning of the list and am trying to deal specifically with each of the changes. I was going on to say that the fifth wage investigator is a gentleman in the province of Quebec whom we have been paying on the basis of $15 a day, but for whom we now ask you to provide a stated yearly salary of $1,980 in case it should be found necessary to use his services continuously.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): What are the duties of these wage investigators, and what control have they over wages paid or received?

Mr. MURDOCK: These wage investigators are skilled in the comparison of wage rates as paid to various classes of employees. As you know, for many years the Government has had a fair wage policy, and it is necessary quite frequently to investigate what the fair wages in any particular class of employment may be in a certain locality. To illustrate, recently we found it necessary to place two wage investigators in the Niagara Peninsula to ascertain comparative fair wage rates for various classes of employees engaged on the Welland Ship Canal. As the hon. member for Vancouver will know, one of these wage investigators undertakes, under the direction of the department, to maintain supervision over comparative fair wage rates in the mining industry on Vancouver Island; and he has been entrusted by employer and employees with the duty of determining from time to time what should be the graduated scale of wages paid in the coal mining industry.

Mr. HANSON: But not in Cape Breton.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): Have the Fair Wage Investigators anything to do with farm labour? To make clear the purport of my question, I may say that I have had considerable to do with this matter in the western territory, particularly in Saskatchewan, and I know that there is a real effort being made in those provinces by the provincial departments of labour to standardize the wages of farm labourers. They have been attempting to do that for two years. I think the first attempt was made in the summer of 1920, but they did not get very far. The officials met again a year later, and made a little more progress, and I happen to know they are attempting another step in advance this year. I should like to know if these Fair Wage Investigators have anything to do with that, and if so, what progress they are making.

Mr. MURDOCK: Do I understand my hon. friend to suggest that the Fair Wage Investigators of the federal department of Labour have been undertaking to interfere with the wages paid to farm labourers in Western Canada?

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): That was not my point. I know that the provincial departments of labour, in co-operation with the employers of labour on the Prairie provinces and with the employees, are attempting to evolve some system of standardizing the wages that will be fair both to the farmers and farm labourers. It may not seem to the committee to be a matter of importance, but there are many thousands engaged every year in seasonal occupations in Western Canada. Does the provincial department co-operate with the federal department? Have representatives of the federal department attended the conferences that have taken place, and if so, what part have they taken in them.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend is right to the extent that the Dominion Government bears one-half of the cost of the employment service, although permitting the provinces to maintain a large control over the manner of conducting that service. If my hon. friend has heard of any Fair Wage Investigators being connected with these matters, it is only in an advisory capacity to the provincial employment service officer, and only for the purpose of seeing that the money of the federal Government was spent wisely and well. Our Fair Wage Investigators have no other authority in matters of that kind.

Mr. IRVINE: Have the Fair Wage Investigators authority to investigate the wages paid to men in the employment of private companies or are their investigations confined to government works? If these Investigators have authority to investigate the wages paid to labourers by employers generally, how is it that they are not investigating these cases in Nova Scotia at the present time? If they are investigating those cases, what power has the government to put their recommendations into effect? I ask merely to ascertain what are the functions of these officials, and what authority they have in this matter.

Mr. MURDOCK: No Fair Wage officer of the federal government has any right or authority to interfere in the matter of the wages paid by private concerns. His investigation in that respect resolves itself merely into ascertaining what are the wages paid for the purpose of determining what would be a fair wage on government works in the district.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What are the duties of the Industrial Engineer?

Mr. MURDOCK: He was at first assistant to the Director of Employment Service, and handled the work of the Department in the absence of his superior.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: He is simply an assistant to the director?

Mr. MURDOCK: He is now used for general utility purposes in connection with employment and other questions. The next increase we come to is that of Junior Wage Investigator. Last year there was one such officer; this year we are suggesting that there should be two.

Mr. MACKELVIE: What about the Senior Wage Investigator?

Mr. MURDOCK: I thought I had explained that that was the position we were proposing for the gentleman at Calgary who has supervision over the entire coal mining industry in British Columbia, off the Island, and in Alberta. He is a very capable official.

Mr. STEVENS: What is his name?

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. F. E. Harrison.

Mr. CHURCH: I suppose that the minister, being young in office, has not yet given much thought to economy, for I notice there are increases practically all the way through his sub-departments. I understood from his speeches in Toronto during the election campaign that he would introduce new and better methods for carrying on the work, but he seems to have surrounded himself with a small standing army of officials so that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like him and all his retinue. For example, I notice there is an Editor of Copy at $2,160. What are his duties? I understood the hon. gentleman took the position in reference to his annual Estimates that he was introducing new methods and creating economy by just advising capital and labour to get together—he said it was a state of mind. This is the most criticized department in the public service all over Canada. Some officials are merely paper officials. I happen to have had some experience as a municipal officer for seventeen years under many governments past and present, and I say in reference to some officials here that their work is more on paper than real when you sum up the effect of it. I found the minister going to Toronto and a report was published of a speech he made at a Methodist church one Sunday night on what he was going to do—he was going to settle the labour problems probably in the same way that he lowered the high cost of living. He told his hearers that he was going to introduce new ways and means to effect economy. I am sorry I have not the article here. It relates to the first page of these Estimates. He was going to do something by compelling "capital and labour" to get together. What he meant and how he was going to do it he never said. What does he need with all these officials? He said you had to consider the state of mind of the people. Whatever he meant by that I do not know. We find now that he has publicity agents, editors, subeditors and an employment specialist. How any people has this latter officer got jobs for? We have several thousand out of employment in the place I come from. Further down he has 148 officials as against 130 last year, although now there is less work. Then he has a senior wage investigator, publicity clerk, editor and junior wage investigator. I suppose they will check up the editor. Then further down he has statistical clerks, a number of them, and clerk stenographers, probably to check up the statistical clerks; junior statistical clerks to check up some other set of clerks; secretary to executive, and editor of copy. He does not say what kind of editor. Does he hand out copy for the minister? Then there are assistant editors, one at $1,800 and one at $1,440. What are their duties? Do they work eight hours a day, or like the minister 24 hours a day? Then you have a translator $1,410, then editorial assistant at $1,275. You would think you were running a newspaper office instead of a Department of Labour. As a new member of the House I do not want to criticize the minister. He has not had time to look over the department, but this is one of the most extravagant departments of the public service and one full of frills and fads. I would like to say that a little economy would not have a bad effect on the department. If he can do so well in three months wait till you see the minister's estimates next year. If he can present such estimates after he has been in office two or three months what will they be next year, with the list of editors, supervisors, and other members of his retinue? On the next page they go from $108,000 to $192,000, and further on you come to the Labour Branch confidential messengers; two messenger clerks, probably confidential clerks to check up the other two messengers, and then contingencies, clerical and other assistants, including the minister's assistants. Then we have confidential messenger to the minister. He is not satisfied with the other messenger, but wants to have one of his own. Then you come to the printing and stationery bureau. What about the editor of copy? I think altogether too much copy has been given out by the minister and this department. His business and that of the department is to settle strikes, but I never knew them to settle strikes yet. We had several strikes in Toronto and all the department would do would be to wire or come down to the city and ask the municipal authorities to settle a strike. I think the department is overmanned. I think they could do with less men especially in view of the explanation of the Government that they are practising economy. Let us start in each department and let us get rid of the frills and fads with which this department is honeycombed. There are more frills in this department than any other department of the public service and I say that without fear of contradiction. I have had a good deal to do with this department. The minister went on to speak of the high cost of living. Let him investigate the price of coal. Soft coal at the Virginia mines is quoted at $1.10 a ton at the mines and hard coal at $6 a ton at the Pennsylvania and other mines. With all these officials why cannot the minister do something to get a reduction in the price of coal? What is he doing to bring down the price of coal? Is he going to bring the producer and consumer together? I am sorry to detain the House so long but I think the House is entitled to more information on each of these items.

The provinces have labour departments and the larger cities have labour and unemployment departments. Is there overlapping? We hear about the people who are out of work in Toronto and other large places. True it is, this Government has had to dole out some money, but they could have done a great deal more if they had reduced expenses by cutting down the number of these useless officials. If they will bring down the cost of civil government they will be doing something towards effecting economy. The question of economy in Estimates is before the United States Congress to-day. They are reducing estimates over there and the municipalities are struggling to reduce estimates. Yet here is the minister coming to the House with a big increase in his Estimates. Although we are told that the relations between capital and labour to-day are happy, the minister's advice is for them to get together. If this is done he should not need these various officials, because if they adopt the principle of getting together it is so much the better for labour and capital and I do not know what he will want the 148 officials for.

I would like some Progressive to go through the Labour Department and see what the officials are doing. Are they settling strikes? I do not wish to criticize them too much. They have done some good work I suppose, but I say these officials are not all necessary and that the Labour Department is often a paper organization so far as settling strikes go. Then you have the question of the Industrial Disputes Act which does not apply to a public utility, such as water-power, electric railway and electric light companies, operated by the people—and yet you have those officials who are going about the country, spending money and advising these publicly-owned enterprises to appoint boards to settle strikes.

I think if the hon. minister would go slowly in his Estimates when he is just starting, look further into the department and cut out some of the frills and fads it would be better for the House and the country and we would get better results for the money expended and promote the true and best interests of labour.

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. Chairman, I am extremely gratified to know that the member from North Toronto (Mr. Church) is here to deal with these questions in his usual way, and I am particularly gratified to note that he appears to be in the same state of mind and body that I have known him to be for many years in dealing with any such question as the one he has undertaken to analyze during the last few minutes. I regard it as a special honour for a young minister to have had so much attention paid to him as has been bestowed on me by the hon. member for North Toronto. But in disregard of all the views expressed by my hon. friend, I will undertake to proceed with a consistent and business-like analysis of these Estimates that are being submitted to you, and to show you wherein such increases appear to be necessary on the basis of the amounts that were regarded as necessary by the present Opposition, when it was the government last year. If, as stated by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church), this Labour department is a paper organization, and unnecessary, as I understood him to intimate, he might surely, for the protection of the reputation of his party, have kept that fact a secret for at least a little while longer, because I want to inform the hon. gentleman, what he was not here to receive a short time ago, namely that when I took hold of this department, there were in it 147 employees, 42 of whom were temporary and we now propose to make twelve of those temporary employees permanent, who will perform largely the same duties as they have been performing, and to discontinue, so far as possible, the services of the other temporary employees. I am sure, too, that the labouring men in Toronto, in whom my hon. friend has expressed, in years gone by under certain conditions, such an earnest interest, will be highly edified, on reading Hansard or the papers, if they take the trouble to quote the hon. gentleman, to learn that his estimate of the Labour department and its functions during the present and the past government, is that it is useless, of no effect and no good, a paper organization. My experience has been that the labouring men in Toronto and elsewhere have, at times held the view that sufficient consideration has not been given to the aims, claims and rights of labour, and that there should be rather a broadening than a contraction of the efforts of the Labour department. But we, tonight, have had the honour of listening to the advice of the hon. member for North Toronto, who intimates that there is nothing to that department; that it should all be wiped out. I am sure the labouring men of Toronto will be very much edified to hear of the latest stunt of the hon. member for North Toronto.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: It would surely never do to check the minister in his statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I was just referring to the fact that it would never do to interrupt the minister in order to pass this resolution, and I was called to order.

Mr. MURDOCK: We then come to the senior statistical clerks, of whom there were six last year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has the minister not missed the Publicity Assistant?

Mr. MURDOCK: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I have.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Will the minister be good enough to tell the commiteee what are the duties of the publicity agent proper, before we take up the question of his assistant?

Mr. MURDOCK: The publicity agent, I am told, draws what many hon. members may have seen at times, charts indicating the fluctuations as between supply and demand in the labour market in Canada, for the information of those who are interested in such matters. He also draws such charts and gives such publicity to the charts and to other information as would appear advisable to assist in equalizing, so far as possible, employment throughout this Dominion.

Mr. BOYS: Does he draft the political chart too?

Mr. MURDOCK: I think not.

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend evidently lost his.

Mr. MURDOCK: I might say to my hon. friend that, if he was drawing political charts, he would show to-morrow morning a largely rising margin as regards majorities. The hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) asked me about the publicity assistant. I am told that is just a classification which the Civil Service Commission have given to this clerk, classifying and specifying the work and defining the duties.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Is his work defined as assistant to the publicity agent proper?

Mr. MURDOCK: I was speaking about the publicity agent.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I thought you were speaking about the publicity assistant?

Mr. MURDOCK: The hon. member is right.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): The reason I asked the minister the question was that I noted by the Estimates that the publicity agent is apparently a new officer this year. I thought it would be fair to inquire if the work had doubled.

Mr. MURDOCK: The work has not changed whatsoever; but the Civil Service Commission have defined the duties, and have classified the position as publicity assistant.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): How was he classified last year?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am told that the position was classified heretofore as a senior clerk, although the clerk was performing the duties now being performed and which it is proposed shall continue.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): What is his name?

Mr. MURDOCK: M. K. Roughsedge. The next is an additional senior statistical clerk whom we are asking shall be provided for on a permanent basis. He has been performing the duties during the past fiscal year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That is a promotion.

Mr. MURDOCK: It is a promotion on the permanent classification. The next item is for 14 statistical clerks instead of 13, an addition of one, and then the increase in salary for the other clerks. Next is 14 clerk stenographers instead of 11. Two of them have been there during the entire past fiscal year on a temporary basis and on certificate; the third additional clerk is a temporary employee being promoted on a permanent basis. Then we are asking for five office appliance operators instead of four. In this instance we are again asking to have placed on a permanent basis an employee who has been carried throughout the past fiscal year as a temporary employee.

Mr. STEVENS: What are the duties of the office appliance operators?

Mr. MURDOCK: Notwithstanding the length of time which the member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) credits me with having been in the Labour department—almost three months—I have not had the opportunity, which I should like to have and which I hope I shall have, to investigate fully the working of the various branches of the department. I have, however, seen some of the office appliances that are used, and I should be glad indeed if any hon. gentleman would visit the Labour department and inspect the appliances that are used for the purpose of tabulating promptly and accurately certain results that are required from time to time to indicate the unemployment condition throughout Canada as well as many other matters upon which it is desired to secure absolutely accurate and reliable figures that cannot be controverted or disputed.

Mr. STEVENS: Are these employees operators of tabulating machines?

Mr. MURDOCK: Tabulating, mimeographing, multigraphing and some other larger machines. We have in particular in the department one machine which we cannot buy. I understand that we pay a rental of $100 a month for it, that being the only basis on which we can secure it. My predecessor thought that it was worth the money many times over and I have no reason to dispute his opinion in this regard. In the next item we ask for two additional junior clerk stenographers, who we feel are needed. These two additional clerk stenographers have been employed during the past year on a temporary basis, and it would appear to be consistent to come into the open and classify them on a permanent basis if they are to continue in the department. And that is what we are asking to do. My hon. friends will agree that that covers the additional increases in the permanent staff of the Labour department. I again call attention to the fact that there are about 30 temporary employees who were there when I came to the department and who are not provided for in these civil government estimates that are being considered. I do not know whether they can all be entirely dispensed with or not, but if they can, I assure hon. members, and especially the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) that they will be.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What saving does the minister expect to make in getting rid of the thirty employees?

Mr. MURDOCK: In regard to such of them as we find it possible or necessary, through lack of funds, to dispense with, the saving would, of course, be in their salaries, whatever they might be. Most of them would no doubt be employees with lower grade salaries.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But I understood that my hon. friend was making some real economies in connection with the Outside Service. He is now contemplating dispensing with thirty. I should like to know what salaries these thirty are getting and what saving the minister expects to effect in connection with them. I fear that the minister is perhaps holding back a little bit. He is not quite sure that he can dispense with any of them.

Mr. MURDOCK: If my hon. friend would like to go over the entire list of forty-two temporary employees I could tell him what they are getting.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: That would be too much. It would not be fair to the minister, and I want to be fair to him. Let him give us what the thirty are getting.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend need not concern himself about being fair to me; the hon. member for North Toronto will look after that.

Mr. CHURCH: Why are there 117 officials as against 106 last year? I see that there are planning clerks, filing clerks, and so forth. What are the duties of these various clerks?

Mr. MURDOCK: If my hon. friend will clearly state what information he desires I shall try to give it.

Mr. CHURCH: If the minister will give the information it will help him in putting through his estimates. I see there are planning clerks. . What do these men do? Do they plan election campaigns? Then I see there are filing clerks. What are their duties? Do they file the minister's speeches?

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend from North Toronto reminds me, in spite of myself, of the reply of the thief on the cross. I might call his attention to the fact that we have not yet got to the Estimates which he a moment ago was so interested in inquiring about; we have only been considering so far the Estimates of the Labour department. But we were not going fast enough for the impatient criticisms of my hon. friend; he must get ahead of the wagon and take up the Printing Bureau Estimates before we come to them, starting in with some of his characteristic criticisms.

Mr. STEVENS: We have been treated I think with a very plain and very patient explanation by the minister, Mr. Chairman, but with all due deference to him I must insist on bringing him back to the point where I had him very successfully a while ago. He very kindly gave me the positions of four of the twelve employees I asked him about. Really there are sixteen included in this list. He has not given me the other seven permanent and five temporary employees outside of Ottawa. While referring to that I wish to make another observation. We have in his statement a reduction of thirty employees. If that reduction is real, I wish frankly to congratulate him, because it is a step in the right direction. But with a reduction of thirty employees, which, to use his own expression, he has asserted with characteristic emphasis, we find an increase in the amount asked for of a little over $23,000. I want my hon. friend to get my point, because this is really the value of his economy, if there is any economy in it at all. Thirty less employees. Very good. But surely we do not need $23,000 more to pay for the remaining 117?

Mr. MURDOCK: I thought I went over the eleven additional positions which we are making permanent, but which heretofore have been temporary.

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps I have not made myself clear. A few minutes ago my hon. friend told me there were eleven of these employees outside of Ottawa. He explained to me four of them very satisfactorily. Now I should like to have an explanation regarding the balance, and also regarding the increased amount.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend must have misunderstood me. We have eleven permanent employees outside of Ottawa and only five temporary employees.

Mr. STEVENS: Where are they employed?

Mr. MURDOCK: One fair wages officer in Vancouver with a temporary stenographer; another fair wages officer at Calgary; another at Toronto, and a stenographer; in Montreal a fair wage investigator, a permanent employee; in Winnipeg we have a superintendent of the western provinces for the employment service, with two statistical clerks and one clerk stenographer.

Mr. STEVENS: Are they temporary or permanent?

Mr. MURDOCK: The clerk stenographer is temporary. There are two temporary junior clerk stenographers. In Halifax we have a clearance officer on a permanent basis, also a clerk stenographer with him on the same basis.

Mr. STEVENS: That accounts for seven permanent and five temporary employees. There are eleven permanent employees in this vote.

Mr. MURDOCK: One of them is not on a permanent basis but on the basis of $15 a day when required, as I stated; and another is a fair wage officer transferred to the Labour department on February 4, 1921, and on a temporary basis heretofore. Does that give my hon. friend the information that he requires about the eleven?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. I am sorry it has given my hon. friend so much trouble; I had no idea it would do so. Now will he explain the discrepancy in the additional amount for the reduced staff?

Mr. MURDOCK: Under the present regulations of the Civil Service Commission it is necessary to provide for payments in respect of positions resulting from promotions or changes in duties before the positions are actually created by Council.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But you need not create them.

Mr. CHURCH: If the Minister requires 148 officers to solve labour problems of the country, how many would he require to solve the high cost of living problem about which he talked so much during the election and has referred to so often since he became minister?

Mr. FIELDING: If within a little time we might pass this item it would be worth while remaining; otherwise I suggest that we adhere to our wholesome but unwritten rule of adjourning at eleven o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Wednesday, March 29, 1922

The House met at three o'clock, the Deputy Speaker in the Chair.

Hon. Mr. KENNEDY:

1. This department has no information as to the exact date.

2. The estimated cost given in the project statement to the department, for agreement under the Canada Highways Act, was $613,750, for water-bound macadam construction. GRASSHOPPER PLAGUE

Mr. GOULD:

1. Are there any indications of the return of grasshopper plague in the western provinces this year?
2. If so, in what sections?

Hon. Mr. MOTHERWELL:

1. Yes.
2. In Manitoba from evidence at hand, we anticipate that grasshoppers will be less in evidence than they were during 1921. In Saskatchewan a further outbreak is expected but the chief outbreak will apparently be in Alberta, in which province there was a heavy egg deposition in 1921, which it is expected will result in an important infestation of hoppers in 1922, particularly in the sections immediately north of the main line of the Canadian Northern railway.
3. Yes.
4. No. Previous experiments with chlorine gas indicated that this remedy is too expensive.

CIVIL SERVICE BONUS

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton):

[Mr. W. C. Kennedy.]

7. Was the total cost of operating the Canada Wheat Board borne by the grain passing through its hands?
8. If not, what was the actual cost to the Government?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. Yes.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. Yes.
4. $560,000.
5. Yes.
6. The Canada Wheat Board recommended that the above amount be distributed to the provincial governments pro rata on the basis of the quantity of wheat delivered by producers in each of the said provinces to the board, such moneys to be used for the immediate relief of distressed farmers in the various provinces. So far the Government has not yet decided on the action to be taken in regard to this recommendation.
7. Yes.
8. Answered by No. 7.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT

ENFRANCHISEMENT OF WOMEN OF ALIEN BIRTH

Mr. WILLIAM D. EULER (North Waterloo) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that subsection two of section twenty-nine of the Dominion Elections Act be struck from the Act in its entirety.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution, in its purpose, is identical with an amendment to the Dominion Elections Act of 1920, offered by myself in the session of 1920 and again offered in the session of last year. The aim of the amendment, as of the resolution to-day was to prevent the disfranchisement of many thousands of Canadian citizens. On the former occasions, the amendments failed; the government of the day voted them down. And yet they did not fail entirely, because in the session of 1920, after we who are now on this side had pointed out the injustice in connection with the bill as drafted, the Government, recognizing that we were right in part at least, itself brought down an amendment which corrected the wrong in some degree. My resolution proposes to remove the injustice entirely. In 1921 I brought the matter up again in the House, and once more after a year's thought, and reflection, and meditation, on the part of the Government, the latter decided that full justice had not been done, and while my amendment was again voted down, a supporter of the Government brought in another amendment which was carried. I commented at the time on the fact that the then government seemed to be under the impression that justice ought to be done on the instalment plan, and declared my intention to come to Parliament again in the session of 1922 for the final instalment. I did not anticipate that I should present the amendment to a Liberal Government, because we had been assured by the right hon. gentleman who is now leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), as well as by some of his supporters, that we should have no election in 1921. I am not at all disappointed in being able now to present my amendment to a Government which, I hope, will give it a more sympathetic reception than it obtained from those who are now sitting "angularly opposite".

This matter was debated at a very great length in the sessions of 1920 and 1921, and for that reason I do not propose to go into it fully again; but because many members of the present Parliament were not in this House in the previous Parliament, I shall as briefly as possible again review the facts in connection with my resolution, for their information, and for the purpose of refreshing the memories of those gentlemen who were members of the House when I brought the matter up before. In the session of 1920, the then Acting Solicitor-General, who is member for South Wellington in this House, (Mr. Guthrie), introduced what is known as the Dominion Elections Act. In introducing the bill he made what I think was conceded by all of us to be a most excellent speech. What appealed to us particularly was his statement that the franchise under that act would rest primarily and largely on the fact that men and women were British subjects, and that from that citizenship would flow the right to exercise the vote. That was in striking contrast with the provisions of the War-time Elections Act, in which only certain women were given the franchise; and I for one was pleased when I heard the minister of that day state that in future there should be no unfair discrimination as to the franchise of Canadian women. We assumed, therefore, that the franchise would be based on Canadian citizenship.

But when the printed bill was placed before the House we found in it a clause which entirely debarred thousands of Canadian citizens from the vote. As the bill then stood it was utterly impossible for probably 100,000 citizens of Canada to exercise the franchise, and it left many others under a heavy disability before they were in a position to vote. That fact was drawn to the attention of the Government, and while there was a disposition, I believe, on the part of some of our political friends to think that the clause had been inserted with the intention of depriving certain Canadian women of their franchise, I have not taken that attitude. At any rate, the Government declared, through the ex-Prime Minister, that this was an error on its part, and an amendment was introduced which partially remedied the evil.

Now, that clause of the act, in my opinion, still in practice, disfranchises many thousands of people. It is to be found in section 29. The section first recites the general qualifications of a voter. It states that the franchise rests with British subjects who are so by birth or naturalization. They must have resided in Canada for at least twelve months, and two months in the constituency in which they are to vote. These are the general provisions; and then the following clause appears, to which I would ask the careful attention of hon. members:

For the purposes of this Act, the allegiance or nationality of a person, as it was at the birth of such person, shall be deemed incapable of being changed, or of having been changed, merely by reason or in consequence of marriage or change of allegiance or naturalization of any other person, or otherwise than by personal naturalization of such first mentioned person. Provided, however.—

I would call the attention of the House to this most peculiar provision.

Provided, however, that this subsection shall not apply to any person born on the Continent of North America, nor to any person who in person applies to and obtains from any judge having jurisdiction in naturalization proceedings, a certificate under the hand of such judge and the seal, if any, of his court, to the effect following:

I am not going to read the certificate, but in effect it is this, that the judge shall certify that the person who makes application for the certificate has proven to him that he or she is qualified for personal naturalization. He then grants a voting certificate, which must not be confused with the naturalization certificate. The person who makes application is already legally naturalized, but in order to obtain the right to vote she must obtain a voting certificate before her name can be placed on the list. Perhaps this is not very clear to many members, and in order that the significance of that clause may be fully grasped, it is necessary to refer to the provisions of the Naturalization Act itself. Under the naturalization law there is one outstanding feature that applies to my resolution, and it is this: The wife of a British subject is herself a British subject; in other words, if a woman of foreign birth marries a man who is a British subject, she herself immediately becomes a British subject. If her husband is also of foreign birth and he becomes naturalized, she at the same time automatically becomes naturalized. Moreover, the minor children of such a man become naturalized with him. It follows then that foreign-born women married to foreign-born men who are legally naturalized are just as truly and legally Canadian citizens as are their foreign-born husbands.

Now, if the right to the franchise is based on citizenship, my contention is that the woman who is naturalized legally should have the right to vote just as unrestrictedly as her husband, who also is foreign-born. I stated a moment ago that the bill as originally drafted disfranchised something like 100,000 British subjects who happened to be born in what are sometimes called the Central Empires —Germany and Austria-Hungary. I am not making any particular reference to that except to say that under this clause which I am now discussing even if those women did go to a judge to obtain voting certificates—and, remember, they were British subjects—the judge could not grant them such certificates, for the simple reason that they were not qualified for naturalization, the Naturalization Act at that time absolutely forbidding the naturalization of persons who originally came from the countries with which we were at war. In justice to the then government it must be said that they disclaimed all intention of giving the law that effect, and they brought in an amendment placing those foreign-born women on exactly the same plane as other foreign-born women, making it necessary for them, however, as for others, to obtain this voting certificate before they could vote, although, as I say, they were naturalized British subjects.

The government of the day amended the Dominion Elections Act in the session of 1920. The matter remained in that position until the following session of 1921, when, believing that it was not yet properly settled, I brought it up again in Committee of the Whole and proposed an amendment similar to this one, but it was voted down, and again I proposed it on the third reading of the bill, with the same result. But mark this, the government of the day admitted again that there was an injustice there, and a second time they brought down an amendment that to some extent removed the disability.

But what the House will be particularly interested in now, after hearing that perhaps as a bit of history, is as to the actual present status of foreign-born women in Canada who are legally naturalized. This is the effect of the law: That married women in Canada, if of foreign birth and naturalized as the result of being the wives of British subjects must, before they can vote, apply to a judge for a voting certificate, although they are legally and actually Canadian citizens. I must qualify that statement; there are three exceptions, one most peculiar. The first is that all women who voted in the elections of 1917 are not subject to this peculiar provision, making it necessary for them to secure a voting certificate; then, again, men and women who became naturalized as boys and girls through the naturalization of the father need not secure the voting certificate; finally, women who were born on the continent of North America are not put to the same necessity.

Now you have the peculiar condition, in connection with the last proviso, that the woman who is born, we will say, in the West Indies—and she may be an uneducated negress—or a person who comes from Mexico or any other part of North America, is given the franchise without restriction if she is married to a British subject; whereas if a woman comes from France, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, Italy, Germany, Austria, Belgium or any other country than North America, she is obliged to go to a judge to obtain this voting certificate. I say that is an unfair distinction, and I have never to this day heard any justification whatever from members of the former government as to why that provision was drafted.

It has been said in previous debates that these women who are naturalized should not complain of the necessity for appearing before a judge and showing that they are proper persons for naturalization. Well, it means that they are at once placed in a separate and distinct class, and there at once attaches to them at least some doubt as to whether they are as worthy to vote as are their husbands, who also were born in a foreign country and who are not in any way any more Canadian citizens than are their wives. It obliges them to take three distinct steps before they can cast their ballots. In the first place, they must go to the judge, and that may necessitate, as it often does in Western Canada, a journey of perhaps one hundred miles or more, and the judge may after all refuse them a voting certificate; then it necessitates their seeing to it that their names are placed on the voters' list; and, finally, they must go to the poll to deposit their ballots, as of course everyone else must also.

Then there is the natural feeling of pride which rebels at the unnecessary restriction. I know in my own riding women who have lived in this country for thirty, forty and even fifty years, women who are good Canadian citizens, and they resent the necessity of appearing before a judge and showing cause why he should issue to them voting certificates. As a matter of fact they do not go before him, and I am of the opinion—and probably other members can speak with just as full knowledge—that of the women affected by this clause perhaps 75 to 80 per cent are thus virtually disfranchised.

We have both Dominion and provincial laws which do not perhaps in all cases meet with the approval of our citizens, but I do not think we have on our statute book any laws which conflict so directly one with the other as does this particular clause with the Naturalization Act. Our Naturalization Act provides distinctly that the wife of a British subject is herself a British subject; but this clause in the Election Act states that the wife of a British subject is not a British subject when it comes to voting.

Those two laws are absolutely irreconcilable, and if they are irreconcilable, the illogical one ought to give way. If my resolution is accepted that is what will happen, and the franchise will be universal to all Canadian women without restriction, the same as it is to men. We are now in the position of the Indian giver; he gives only in the expectation that it shall be returned to him again. The Naturalization Act gives to these women citizenship and the Dominion Elections Act takes it away. I leave it to the sense of justice of hon. members whether the franchise itself is not the first privilege or right that ought to flow out of citizenship. It is upon that ground that I base my claim that there should be no restrictions whatever placed in the way of a British subject, other than the ordinary restrictions that apply to male citizens, and that they should be given the franchise as a natural result flowing out of the fact of their citizenship. I say, Sir, there is only one proper remedy for that: let us adopt the principle that citizenship in itself confers the franchise. It is the only solution. Why should not a foreign-born woman, legally a Canadian citizen, as unrestrictedly have the right to vote as the foreign-born man, her husband, who is also a Canadian citizen? I have never heard any satisfactory reply to that question. Let us accept finally and frankly the logical consequences of our action in conferring upon women the privileges of naturalization. Now that women have the franchise, there should be no discrimination between foreign-born citizens of this country and the wives of those citizens, who are just as fairly and just as legally Canadian citizens as are their husbands. Let us bestow the franchise as freely as we bestowed citizenship, whether upon men or upon women.

That, Sir, is the intent of my resolution. I hope that it may have the support of my friends on this side of the House. I believe it will have the support of the Progressive members; I know it will of some of them. I hope that the leader of the official Opposition will see his way clear to assist now in granting that final instalment of justice to women—a right that should never have been withheld.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I think I can say that my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) has been very consistent during the past three sessions of Parliament and very assiduous in pressing upon the House the view which he has just expressed. I have no objection to offer to the manner in which he has presented the question historically upon the present occasion. It is just possible that the reasons which existed two or three years ago were more pointed in those days in support of legislation such as that mentioned by my hon. friend and such as that to be found in section 29 of the Dominion Elections Act, than they are to-day. But I submit that when the act was passed in 1920 there was real, substantial ground for the enactment. The object of that section of the statute was to place the male voter and the female voter upon the same plane and to surround each with the same conditions in respect to the franchise. The naturalized male subject was entitled under the Franchise Act to vote, but before being naturalized he had to meet the requirements of our naturalization law. Under the Naturalization Act, a woman married to a naturalized British subject became by operation of law a British subject, but no examination was required of her. There was a discrimination, apparently, as between the male and female voter at that time, and the object was to surround the right to use the Canadian franchise with every reasonable precaution. We had done so in regard to men who became naturalized, and we desired to do the same thing in regard to female voters.

My hon. friend, I think, confounds two entirely different things, namely, citizenship on the one hand, and the right to exercise the franchise on the other. There are thousands—yes, tens of thousands—of British subjects in this country who cannot vote. The judges of our country cannot vote. There are a number of requirements in addition to British citizenship which must be fulfilled in order that a man may be entitled to vote. The fact that a man is a British subject does not necessarily confer on him a vote. Until recently, indeed a property qualification was necessary in some of our provinces. I do not know that it is necessary now, but the mere fact that a man is a British subject has never been taken as tantamount to saying he is a voter. We in our wisdom in this Parliament did say that the chief qualification in regard to the franchise should be British citizenship. In 1920, when this law was enacted, there is no doubt that there was considerable unrest in Canada; various sets of opinion prevailed throughout the country. With regard to male voters who were not British subjects by birth, we had insisted on safeguards before they attained naturalization; we did not so insist in regard to women voters. When section 29 was placed in our election law it was merely an attempt on the part of Parliament to safeguard the right to the franchise in the case of women just as we had done in the case of men.

Now, we did make exceptions. We made an exception in regard to women who were born on the North American continent. Was not that a reasonable exception? The woman of the United States who became the wife of a Canadian citizen, should not, I think—on a superficial glance at the case, at all events—have been required to undergo the same critical examination as that applying to women coming from, say, Central Europe. Living conditions in the United States; the mode of government in the United States; the practice and enforcement of law in that country, and the language of its citizens—these are all similar to what we enjoy in this country. A woman born and living in the United States until her marriage would be brought up under conditions almost identical with those which a woman would enjoy in Canada. She would be presumed to know the institutions of this country as she would know those of her own. But not so with the citizens of Central Europe; many of them knew nothing of Canada, of our laws, of our language, or of our institutions. A man, in order to gain naturalization, had to appear before a judge and be able to pass a fairly critical examination, but the woman from Central Europe could marry the naturalized British subject and, without any examination or the imposition of any conditions whatever, would become a British subject and be entitled to vote merely by reason of her marriage, simply by operation of law. It was to guard against that condition of affairs that section 29 was placed in the statute of 1920.

It was pointed out in the following session that a difficulty would arise in the case of women who had voted previously in the Dominion of Canada and that a number of them might be deprived of the franchise in the ensuing general election. As soon as that was brought to the attention of Parliament at the last session, the difficulty was remedied, as the member for North Waterloo has pointed out. But the reason for the legislation is the reason which I have sought to give to the House. As another year has now elapsed, there may not be quite as much reason for this restriction as there was two or three years ago. It may be that as time goes on there will be less reason for it. But in my humble judgment the restriction then adopted was a reasonable and proper one, and it met with the approval of the House of Commons at that time.

Now, the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) intimated to the House this afternoon that the Government will in all probability bring down during the present session some amendments to the Elections Act. I have no doubt that at every session for a number of years it will be found expedient to amend that act, and I would like to see what amendments the Government proposes before definitely passing on a motion such as the one we have before us at the present time. I cannot say that I have any very strong opinion upon this question myself, but others may differ from me. I do not believe that the law in its working out created any injustice to any considerable portion of the foreign-born women. I know that it has been charged that in some places it was difficult to obtain certificates, but I think that any woman with any reasonable degree of effort could in the long time which intervened before the general election have obtained a certificate entitling her to vote if she so desired. The law was passed in 1920, and amended in 1921, and the election was held on the 6th of December last, so there were months and months and months during which the certificates might have been obtained from any judge having jurisdiction in the Dominion of Canada. I do not think any great injury arose by reason of the enactment. However, as I say, it is a fair matter for consideration now, and I think my hon. friend from North Waterloo might well consider letting his motion stand until we see just what amendments the Government proposes to bring down in regard to this question. Personally, I have no very strong opinion about it.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): Mr. Speaker, if I were of a vindictive disposition I would be willing to concur in the view expressed by the former Solicitor-General (Mr. Guthrie) and allow the law as it stands at present to remain on the statute books until another general election. But in view of the fact that I come of a race which likes to practise charity to all, I think it is only just, now that we are placed in the seats of the mighty, that we should try to even up matters and give those gentlemen opposite a reasonable run for their money when the next general election takes place.

I want to tell my friends on the opposite side that if I received a majority of something like seven or eight thousand in my division in the last election, it was largely due to this section 29 of the Elections Act which is now up for discussion. I had in my division something like five or six thousand foreign-born women. It was expected by the government that a large number of them would be prohibited from voting under this peculiar section 29, but I saw to it that every one of them was naturalized, and I venture to say that ninety-nine out of every hundred who were naturalized voted against the government which put upon the statute books this miserable and nefarious section. It is only natural that it should be so. I do not mind admitting frankly here that I sedulously circulated the fact that the reason why these women were standing in queues of thirty and forty and fifty in front of the judge's room, and in front of the court house before it was opened, in below zero weather, was that the government insisted that they should be put upon a plane different from that of their sisters born in Mexico, Guatemala, Hayti, Honduras and other portions of Central America.

The former Solicitor General tells us that the reasons at present are not so pointed as they were in 1920 when this law was put upon the statute books. I agree with him that the reasons are not so pointed now. Before 1920, when the reasons were pointed, these gentlemen were obliged within a very few months of that time to take the political jump, and that is the reason why they proposed by this act to disfranchise a large number of the people whom they thought and rightly so were going to vote against them. But even if this law had not been put into force, I believe these women would have voted against the government for their other sins of omission and commission during their four or five years of power.

I must congratulate the former Solicitor General upon his consistency. He took the ground some years ago that the amendment we proposed was inimical to the interests of the country, and he still thinks that, although he believes the reasons are not now as pointed as they were then. He has suffered a great deal within the past few months, and one would imagine that suffering and tribulation would cause him to think of the sins he committed in the past, but like the person about whom the poet wrote his "head is bloody, but unbowed". He is very much like the ancient Bourbon dynasty, who never learnt and never forgot. I think we ought to be under a debt of gratitude to the Government for having acquired for us this very large body of women voters in December, 1921. It has been said, and I agree with the statement, that "the female of the species is more deadly than the male." The government learnt that to their sorrow on the 6th of December last. When this question came up in 1919 and 1920 my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler) and myself were voices in the wilderness in the matter of pleading for the enfranchisement of women, and I remember my good friend the ex-Solicitor General telling us that the reason why these foreign-born women were put on an inferior plane, and a plane different from that of women born on this continent, was because the standard of living and morality among women born in Europe was somewhat different from the standard on this continent. He tried to circulate the myth that these foreign-born women all came from alien-enemy countries, and I suppose that nine out of every ten people who read the newspapers were of the opinion that this section in the act was merely intended to prevent German and Austrian women from exercising the franchise. The public mind had not cooled off at that time to the extent it has now and the feeling was that perhaps such women should not be permitted to settle the fate of the government in power. My hon. friend should have created the impression that the law applied to every class of women born in Europe, to French women, Belgian women, Italian women, and people of that kind, all of whom showed what they were capable of doing during the war. Every foreign-born woman from Europe was disfranchised by this act for the reason given by the former Solicitor General, that their standard of living and morality was different from that of the women born on this continent. I want to say that standards of living and morality are not governed by the country in which a person lives, but by something entirely different, and when we took the ground that all women should have the right to vote if British subjects, that applied to every class and character of women, no matter from what country she hailed. If they were British subjects by the fact of their husband's naturalization, and had all the rights and privileges of British subjects as such, they ought to have had the right of voting, which is one of the most important and essential rights given to British subjects in this country. We now have fallen on more pleasant days; I think that even our friends among the official Opposition will soon look at things in a very different light from that which they do now —I hope they will at any rate. But whether they do or not, my hon. friend from North Waterloo and myself will still continue to agitate for the repeal of this obnoxious law; and even if a measure of that kind is introduced into this House and fails to obtain the necessary majority in the other Chamber we will continue until this right is obtained for these women no matter from what country they come.

I would like my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) to note—it may be a matter of sorrow to him—that the former Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the old government, Hon. Mr. Ballantyne, owes his defeat very largely to the fact that this section of the law was engrafted on our Franchise Act. Mr. Ballantyne has publicly declared on many occasions that the women in the district in which he lived, the foreign born women, voted against him. How could he expect otherwise? One would almost have imagined that the late government wishing to rid themselves of the former Minister of Marine and Fisheries and throw him overboard—if I may so use the expression—just tacked on this provision in order that he might be left behind. I think I ought to state that perhaps there were other and sufficing reasons why he was left behind. Still it may be, as I say, of interest to the hon. gentleman to know that practically every woman of foreign birth in the St. Lawrence-St. George division—and there were about three thousand of them—voted en masse for the present member of that constituency (Mr. Marler) to show their detestation of the government which could stoop to such methods as the last government did in order to disfranchise them.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker: I think that what women really want to-day is perfect equality with men, and therefore if the striking out of section 29 of the Dominion Elections Act in its entirety does not confer upon women perfectly and entirely equal rights with men, then, I think, it is not going far enough. To me it would seem that if a woman were herself a naturalized Canadian it would not matter whom she married, or whether she was married at all, because she would still be permanently a Canadian, a naturalized Canadian. On the other hand, if she were not a naturalized Canadian herself, it would not matter whom she married, or whether she was married or not—she would not be a Canadian citizen. If that is not true then women must simply be deemed to be part of the goods and chattels of man—she is not an individual at all. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) say that women from the United States were much more eligible to become Canadians than women from Europe; I was not aware that the party to which he belongs was so friendly to the people of the United States.

I think that in the very few remarks I have made I have voiced the opinion of Canadian women. I think women just want to be individuals, as men are individuals—no more and no less. And so I would like to see that principle embodied in the law, rather than that a woman should be made a citizen by marriage to a man who was himself a citizen.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I shall not allow the taunts of the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) to deter me from discussing this question in, I hope, a fair manner, and, as I have some aspiration also, in an illuminating way, I cannot say that his remarks have added anything to the understanding of anybody as to either the legislation itself, its origin, its purpose, or its effect. The only impression my hon. friend made on me was this: If such was the character of the discussion of a law he thought fit to offer this Parliament, what must have been the character of the representations he made regarding it before the electorate of his constituency. The hon. member says he was elected by the votes of five or six thousand of those whom he calls foreign women. Well, I can imagine five or six thousand women—perhaps not speaking either of the two languages of our country and recently come to the city of Montreal—getting a most remarkable view of the law of Canada if they had to sit at the feet of the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier. I can imagine how prejudice would permeate his hearers just to the extent of his political activities.

There is undoubtedly in the law as it stands to-day a distinction between British subjects in the matter of the conferring upon them of the franchise—of that there is no question at all. Pass the motion of the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), bring in a bill and make it law, and there will still be a distinction between the rights to the franchise on the part of British subjects in this country, and a very great distinction and discrimination; and, I venture to say, this session will close without that discrimination being removed by hon. members opposite.

What is the discrimination we are treating of now? It is a discrimination which puts an additional burden on a certain class of women—on a class of women who have acquired naturalization by methods that have always been recognized, in this and every other country, as perfectly sufficient, which because of the relationship between man and woman as arising from marriage has always been recognized as perfectly sufficient, but which does not put the same restraints, qualifications and conditions around citizenship in the case of the woman as it puts in the case of a man. A man coming from another country to this Dominion in order to secure citizenship by the law of our land—and in principle our law in this respect conforms with the law of every other country in the world—that man must show not only that he is a resident here, but he must show that he has done certain things entitling him to have placed upon him the imprimatur of citizenship. He must, for example, now show that he has lived in our country for five years; he must show certain qualifications of citizenship; he must take a certain oath. He must show, as well, as I am informed by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), that he is able to converse in either of the two great languages of our country. Having done all these things, all men are treated alike and they are admitted to the citizenship of this Dominion. In the admission to citizenship, there is not equality. Let me repeat that sentence because it is at the bottom of this whole difficulty; it is at the bottom of the question that we are discussing now; it is the very heart of it. There is not equality in the admission to citizenship. Were there equality in the admission to citizenship, there would be no reason in the world for inequality in the admission to suffrage. The man must undergo examination; he must live up to those tests. But not so with the woman. The women come to this country, perhaps from Central Europe, but, at all events, from a country in which a different language from our own is spoken, a country in which the people live under different customs. No one is saying anything about their living under different moral conditions or anything about moral customs. Those were only words put by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier into the mouth of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), indicating, no doubt, the practices that the former indulged in during the election. Our contention is that, perhaps, the woman comes from a country in which the people live under conditions which would justify the presumption that she would know little of our institutions, of the obligations of our citizenship; in a word, from a country in which there would be no presumption that she was fitted to be admitted to all the rights of citizenship in our country. But she comes to Canada. Possibly within the first week in which she arrives in this country, the first day, for there are many such cases; or the first year, she marries a naturalized subject; perhaps she marries a citizen by birth. Let us take the case where she marries a naturalized subject—it does not matter which case we take—that moment she is a British citizen; that moment she is a Canadian citizen, and she has reached that status without having met any of the tests whatever which this country has placed around the admittance to that status of naturalization, and without having shown any qualification of any character whatsoever for citizenship.

Mr. JACOBS: If she came from Mexico, what would be the situation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We will come to that in a minute. They do not come from Mexico. The assumptions of the hon. gentleman are just about as far-fetched as his arguments and, indeed, his assertions of fact. I wonder how many of the five or six thousand who put the hon. gentleman in this House were from Mexico.

Mr. JACOBS: They were intelligent enough to vote against the right hon. gentleman and his government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The further away they came from, the less they would be likely to know, and the more likely they would be to vote for the hon. gentleman. I am endeavouring to make clear to the House the reasons for the distinction. I am not particularly concerned as to what weight those reasons are given; but I am concerned that the reasons which actuated myself and those with whom I work, shall be known and shall be in a position to be weighed and given such weight as hon. gentlemen ought to give them. I have explained the distinction that has always existed in this country, as everywhere, in the admission to citizenship. Can any hon. gentleman tell me a reason why there should be discrimination in the qualifications for citizenship and no discrimination in the qualifications for suffrage?

Mr. EULER: Is the right hon. gentleman not aware that that discrimination which now exists in the granting of citizenship to man and woman respectively is because of the action of the government of which he was a member, in removing from the Naturalization Act of 1919 the right which married women had to become naturalized? That is a fact.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman has missed the point altogether. That difference has existed all the time in this country; it exists in every country. Does the hon. gentleman know a country in the world where a woman, upon marriage, does not become of the citizenship of the man?

Mr. EULER: I am saying that by the Act of 1919, when a new naturalization law was passed, the married women of this country had a right to obtain personal naturalization, and that the government of 1920 dropped that clause from the amended act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That matter is not pertinent at all, but I do not think the hon. gentleman is right in fact. I have asked the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), and his opinion is the same as mine. It may be that we should have a law which would prevent women from becoming citizens except by process of naturalization.

Mr. EULER: We had it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Never. Never was there an hour in the history of this country when a woman did not become a naturalized citizen by reason of marriage.

Mr. EULER: I am not saying that. She had, as a married woman, a right to personal naturalization which she does not have now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very good. Admitting that the hon. gentleman is right; that a woman could have become naturalized by process, the same as a man, even though she were constructively naturalized by marriage, even so the fact remains that the woman always did become naturalized by marriage, and the man never became naturalized by marriage. He had to undergo all those tests, to live up to all those requirements, whereas, the woman did not have to do that at all.

Mr. EULER: You removed it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman from his seat state that that distinction has not always existed, that a woman has always been admitted to citizenship by marriage and that a man never has?

Mr. EULER: That is not the point.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is my only point. If the hon. gentleman really wants to dispute that point, I should be glad to have him rise. That distinction has always existed. It may be a wrong distinction—I am not arguing that at all. What the hon. gentleman says is that, although a woman always became naturalized by marriage, we in 1919 took away a method by which she could otherwise become naturalized. Assume that he is right and that that method was taken away in 1919—from memory, I express the opinion that he is wrong—the woman did not need to become naturalized by that method; she could become naturalized by marriage and in no other way. She does not need to take the other process, the hon. gentleman says, but by becoming naturalized, and by that fact alone, she should be admitted to the suffrage. What I am seeking to impress upon the House is that there has been inequality in the admission to the status of citizenship all through the history of this Dominion, of the British Empire and of every other civilized country under the sun.

Then we came to that stage in the development of our nation when it was thought wise to admit women to the right of suffrage. This situation at once presented itself, that men, admitted to the right of suffrage because of citizenship, had around them those safeguards, but women admitted to the right of suffrage, merely because of citizenship, in all those cases had around them no safeguards at all. Consequently if the mere admission to the status of citizenship in itself gave the right of suffrage, then necessarily there would be inequality, then necessarily, in the case of women, there would be an absence of those safeguards that have been thought wise in the case of men. Let me ask this question again, for after all, reason in these matters is infinitely better than passion, than taunt and quip. Does anyone know of any reason why there should be distinction in admission to citizenship and no distinction in admission to the right of suffrage? Does anyone know why, if we should admit to the right of suffrage merely on the unequal basis of citizenship, we should not go back and so alter the law that all would be admitted to citizenship exactly on an equal basis? If hon. gentlemen can answer that, I will admit that they have at least reached the point which they have never reached before in a discussion of this question. Will hon. gentlemen from their places state that citizenship is something in respect of which all sexes, all races, should be treated precisely alike? The hon. member for George Etienne Cartier shakes his head indicating a negative. Is that not strange, coming from him who has just sat down with that speech in favour of unlimited equality on his lips? If hon. gentlemen will take the stand that they propose to legislate in this Parliament that admission to the status of citizenship shall be the same for man as for woman, then all right, this question is solved, and they are in a strong position when they say that admission to the right of suffrage should be the same for both man and woman. Place the first on an equal basis and the second follows automatically; leave the first on an unequal basis and then, if the second follows automatically, it is not equality at all but inequality. Now, it was with the view of removing that inequality, which arose out of the inequality in the elevation to the status of citizenship, and of doing so with the least possible infringement or impairment of right of suffrage consistent with the safety of the suffrage itself, that that amendment was introduced. I know, speaking on purely theoretical grounds, that there is a discrimination in it, in our endeavouring to have it apply only to those cases where you could not possibly argue against its application. We did eliminate all the women born in the North American continent, which in effect meant the women born in the United States.

Mr. JACOBS: Why did you not say so?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is better legislation, and my hon. friend knows it just as well as I do, not to mention countries in any act. We mentioned the district and got the desired result. I know that the theoretical argument can be advanced, that these women, who are admitted to the right of citizenship by marriage, are foreigners just the same as the women of Central Europe. That is true. But they were born under institutions and conditions, and brought up to a character of citizenship, very much akin to our own. Consequently we felt, in our desire to make the restriction just the least that it could possibly be made, that we could safely eliminate those women; and we felt as well that, as respects those women whose very near relatives had fought for us in the war, there was no cause for restriction. That is why we brought in the amendment.

Mr. JACOBS: What about France?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It was felt to be part of wisdom not to name countries; but if hon. gentlemen want to get down to these fine points, they know as well as we do that we really have no immigration from France. The immigration that we have is, as a matter of practical fact, from Central Europe. That is the immigration of non-English speaking people, who certainly cannot be presumed, upon one week's or one month's residence in this country, to be of that character and qualification which this Parliament, as all Parliaments, has felt to be necessary in granting the status of citizenship. That was the object we sought by the legislation. Now, we did not disfranchise any one, in the first place. The statute itself admits the women to the franchise. That was the first admission, and this is a restriction placed upon it for the reasons I have given. And hon. gentlemen are free to attach to those reasons just what weight they think fit. I gave them because they were sincere reasons that actuated the Government, reasons that were strong then and are strong to-day. But we did not make the restriction absolute. We said this: As regards those women who have been naturalized by act of marriage, or, as it is sometimes put, constructively naturalized, those who have not undergone any test at all, all we ask is that they shall do what the men had to do, namely, go before a court and show that, if they had not been naturalized by marriage at all, they could qualify anyway. We asked that they should prove just what the men had to prove, and then the franchise would become theirs. Is that autocratic legislation? Is such a woman put under any hardship in being required to do precisely what the man had to do in order to attain the same goal she is seeking to reach? There is no hardship whatever. Hon. gentlemen say that they did not go. I do not know whether they did or not. I do not know of any reason why they should not, any more than the men, to attain the same ends, go and get their qualification established under the imprimatur of the court itself.

If hon. gentlemen have a simpler way to suggest by which this qualification can be established—and it is undoubtedly a sane and reasonable qualification—then I shall be only too happy to accept the simpler method, so long as there are fair safeguards. I do not even use the word "fair", but I say the same safeguards that heretofore have always existed in the case of men. If there is any foundation in the world for the attitude of mind—for that is about the best, or at least the most dignified expression I can use, and I do not refer in these words to the hon. member for North Waterloo, who did fairly argue the question—if there is any foundation for the attitude of mind displayed by those who make speeches of the character delivered by the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier, the best that can be said in respect of them is that they have determined that absolute equality of suffrage shall prevail. I defy hon. gentlemen opposite, nay, I do not defy them, I invite them, to consider the question of absolute equality of suffrage. It will be before them for consideration. They are now the responsible government, and they will have the question to face. If they are going to take this action and decide upon absolute equality of suffrage, then it will carry them to lengths which perhaps they do not contemplate just now. There is no absolute equality in suffrage to-day, aside altogether from this question. I did not hear the hon. member for North Waterloo make a plea for it, though possibly he might; but I have an idea that there are some hon. gentlemen opposite who would not. Those people coming from the oriental countries into the Dominion to-day cannot, under the law, vote in federal elections, at least in certain of the provinces of Canada. Is it the intention of hon. gentlemen opposite now to be logical in their position and to admit to the franchise those people from oriental countries who are citizens of this Dominion, citizens of the Empire and of Canada, under the new Naturalization Act? Is it their intention to admit them to the federal suffrage?

Mr. JACOBS: You are sidestepping the question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are you thinking of sidestepping already? If the attitude of mind being reflected now has any basis of reason at all, it has this basis, that citizenship means suffrage and that there shall be no distinction of races or of sexes. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to say that he will stand in this House and vote for that?

Mr. JACOBS: Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

Mr. MEIGHEN: "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof";—again indications come, first here and then there, that hon. gentlemen opposite are not prepared to accept the consequences of their position at all.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the right hon. member say that the Chinese inhabitants, the orientals, are not allowed to vote now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said, in certain provinces of the Dominion under the federal law to-day—the law which the hon. gentleman wants amended—citizens of Canada who are orientals by birth cannot vote.

Mr. CARROLL: That is federal?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. In that respect the federal law follows the provincial franchise; and the provincial franchise, mark you, is the franchise of governments controlled by the Liberal party. Let them carry the fiery cross and preach this doctrine of equality in British Columbia, yes, and elsewhere in western Canada, and then we shall find how sincere they are in trying to impress upon the House the inconsistency and autocracy of hon. gentlemen in this corner of the Chamber. No! We were not moved by any anxiety to discriminate against anybody at all, save to the extent that discrimination and care have always throughout the history of our country been considered necessary, in the case of men, in connection with the franchise. I was one of the members of the Government that admitted the women to the franchise, and that against the Opposition of some hon. gentlemen who sit right opposite us now, some of whom, even in the late contest, denounced that Government for having granted the women the franchise. One hon. gentleman among them, a distinguished member, denounced the late government for their women suffrage legislation because he said it admitted bad women to just the same status as good women. Was there any distinction and discrimination there? We admitted women to the franchise, and the admission was wide and sweeping. Herein is the only restriction. And that restriction was not invented by ourselves; it could be overcome by the woman herself, if she were qualified to do so, by going before a judge and getting a certificate. It is an admission to the franchise the same as applied to men historically in this Dominion.

Mr. MARTELL: Do I understand my right hon. friend to say that his Government was the first to admit women to the franchise in Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member may have understood me to say so, but I never used the word "first." We were the first in the history of the Dominion.

Mr. MARTELL: But in Nova Scotia we admitted women to the franchise on an equality with men long before the Dominion franchise was extended to women.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That may be. I do not know about the province of Nova Scotia; but I do know this, that the hon. gentleman has quite a number of colleagues around him who sought votes, and no doubt got them, by denouncing us for admitting women to the franchise.

Now then, I repeat, that we felt we had limited this safeguard to the narrowest limitation possible, and that instead of discriminating against women in favour of men, or discriminating against any class of women in favour of any class of men, it went as nearly as you can go by legislation to put them on an effective equality in consideration of the fact that with respect to admission to citizenship they were not on an equality at all.

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): Mr. Speaker, I may be allowed perhaps to bring back the debate from wandering into British Columbia and the Orient to a consideration, I trust calm and impartial, of the resolution before the House. The leader of the official Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has stated that there is in effect a difference between the naturalization of men and women. He states that we have gone in this country, as they have in most other civilized countries, along the lines of the proposition expressed so well in the old French adage: "Qui prend mari prend patrie"—who takes a husband takes the husband's fatherland. He states that that discriminates in favour of the woman, because the man who comes before the tribunal to get naturalization must undergo the prescribed examination; the woman gets it by the mere fact of marriage and is put really in a more favourable position. Well, the gallantry which should distinguish a House now led by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mackenzie King) and which was led by the right hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Meighen) should accept that position with pleasure.

But here is wherein, it seems to me, consists the fallacy—and I put it with all respect—of the right hon. member who leads the official Opposition. He says: We allow this constructive naturalization to take place with safety in regard to people that come from the North American continent; but it would not be safe to allow it in regard to people who come from Europe, whether they come from Central Europe or from France or Italy. Now, with all respect to him I say that it is a perfectly absurd distinction that there is any danger to Canadian people in the fact that the woman who has come from Italy and who has married a Canadian citizen should have the advantage of constructive naturalization; while it would be perfectly safe to allow it to her sister or cousin or aunt if she came from the state of Massachusetts. What was the idea? The idea was not to disfranchise, but to make the voting a little more difficult among those classes of the community that the then government thought were going to vote against them. I am sorry to have to say it, but that was the real foundation cause for the legislation.

But let me speak for one moment about another point raised by the right hon. member as the result of an interjection by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler), whose careful and impartial treatment of the subject, without heat and passion, I am sure has commended itself to the judgment of all hon. members. It is quite possible to take the view of the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) that women are individuals on an equality with men, and that therefore if a woman who is a foreign-born citizen marries a British subject she should not become a British subject but should remain an individual entitled to the benefits and subject to the disabilities of her birth. That is an understandable situation, but that situation was varied when in the session of 1920 the right that a married woman had to apply for personal naturalization was taken from her. That right was taken away by the legislation of 1920.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of 1920?

Mr. McMASTER: Of 1919. In 1919 we had a naturalization law whereby a married woman had a right to be personally naturalized and receive her naturalization certificate; but that was taken away by the legislation which was passed, I think, in the same year. So the only way in which a woman born out of the British Dominions and married here could get naturalization was through the naturalization of her husband.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sending for the statute, but I really cannot follow the hon. gentleman's reasoning. Does he say that prior to 1919 a woman naturalized by marriage could become naturalized again?

Mr. McMASTER: No. As I understand, the law was that a woman born outside the British Dominions and married in Canada could apply for naturalization in her own right supposing her husband did not want to become naturalized.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not if she were naturalized already by marriage.

Mr. McMASTER: I suppose she could not be naturalized twice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly; that is the whole point.

Mr. McMASTER: No, this is the point. I am dealing with the proposition submitted by the hon. member for Southeast Grey, which is to this effect: That it would be a proper thing if the law of this country did not recognize that old French adage of, "Qui prend mari prend patrie,"—if women stood on their own feet, so to speak, quo ad naturalization. I say that is an understandable position to take; but I say further that the right of a woman married to a foreigner in this country to obtain British naturalization for herself was taken away by legislation passed in 1919, and women of this class were driven back to what I might call constructive naturalization through the naturalization of their husbands. I say there never was any just reason why a woman who was born on the North American continent should be put in a position of superiority over one born elsewhere. Once you allow marriage to a British subject to open the door to the franchise, that door should be opened to any woman no matter in what part of the world she was born. That is my point; that is where I say the unfairness comes in.

Mr. STEVENS: Will my hon. friend permit me a question? Would he favour then, under those circumstances, extending the franchise to a woman who entered Canada, married, we will say, to put the extreme case, the day after she arrived, and who would if given the franchise vote within the week?

Mr. McMASTER: Yes, I would, because the number of cases where that would happen would be so infinitesimal as not to affect the general principle. As a matter of fact, if a woman comes in from the United States to-day that is precisely what she can do. But if she comes from France; if she is the mother of a hero who has gone from Canada to France to fight the battle of the Allies—and I know personally of such cases—she would be debarred from voting unless she went before a judge and was able to satisfy him that she had lived in Canada for five years before the election. I do think that when the leader of the official Opposition casts aside that somewhat worn attitude of mind he sometimes adopts; when he sits down as a lawyer and not as a leader trying to encourage his decimated ranks, he will agree with me.

Mr. JOHN MILLAR (Qu'Appelle): May I ask a question? I do not know that I have interpreted the Act correctly, but in the practical working out of the clause to which the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has referred—that is, the placing of American women in a different class from that applying to those coming from Europe—it would appear to me that an anomaly has arisen. Now, my view on this point has been disputed so often that I am quite prepared to discover that my interpretation is wrong. But this is as it appears to me: A woman who comes from the United States, becomes naturalized in her own right, and then marries a foreigner, is not allowed to vote; and a woman coming from Europe, becoming naturalized in her own right, and then marrying a foreigner—that is one who is not naturalized—takes the nationality of her husband and cannot vote. Is there any difference between these two cases?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As the question appears to be directed to me, I ask permission of the House to answer it. The law gives every woman, no matter what may be her history, the nationality of her husband, whatever that nationality may be. Though she may have previously been naturalized in her own right, upon marriage to any one of foreign nationality she takes that nationality and becomes a citizen of that country; she is no longer a citizen of Canada and cannot vote in Canada.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to bring the debate back to British Columbia for a few minutes? I understood the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) to say just now—if I am wrong, I assume he will correct me—that the Dominion franchise followed, on broad lines, that of the provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We did not permit the provinces to disfranchise soldiers, but with that exception, where a province disfranchised because of race, that disfranchisement was carried into the federal act.

Mr. NEILL: That is precisely the point to which I wish to direct the attention of the House—the question of disfranchising Asiatics—or enfranchising them, rather, for that is what it amounted to. I charge the late government with proceeding against the wishes of the people of British Columbia by enfranchising orientals in the late election. Quite a number of Japanese enlisted from that province during the war and went overseas with our troops. Some of these men were naturalized and some were not. When they came back they made application to the legislature of British Columbia, which was then sitting, for permission to vote. The matter was brought up by the G.W.V.A., and through four soldier members of the provincial House, in consultation with the government, and it was their joint opinion that whatever British Columbia owed these Japanese who had gone to the front with our men and had in many cases fought with them, we did not owe them the vote; that it was for many reasons—for a thousand reasons that I need not go into, but largely on account of the precedent it would create,—not desirable to grant them the franchise. I am not here to deal with the merits of that point; I am merely emphasizing the fact that that is what the G.W.V.A., the soldier members of the House and the government decided was in the best interests of British Columbia; and of those interests they were best qualified to judge. Therefore the application of the Asiatics to vote was disallowed and the act remained as it was before, disqualifying them. When the Dominion Government came to pass this Franchise Act, they were advised, presumably by members representing the Coast districts, that it might be expedient to allow these Japanese to vote. We had also the same complaint that my friend from George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) mentioned, and in addition the then government were advised that it would be policy to let these Japanese vote; therefore it was so arranged.

Now, the leader of the Opposition has said that where certain persons were disqualified by provincial enactment on account of their race, a similar disqualification was made effective by the Dominion,—soldiers, of course, being excepted. I will read what the act says:

> Persons who, by the laws of any province in Canada, are disqualified from voting for a member of the Legislative Assembly of such province in respect of race, shall not be qualified to vote in such province under the provisions of this Act: provided however that the provisions of this paragraph shall not disqualify or render incompetent to vote any person who has served in the naval, military or air forces of Canada in the late war and who produces a discharge.

You will observe, Sir, that this provision applied not simply to those who had fought in France, but to any who could produce a discharge. Some Asiatic may have been peeling potatoes at an internment camp, and if he could produce a discharge from the military forces he would be enfranchised under this provision. Or an Asiatic might have been engaged on one of the naval boats which carried supplies, oil and coal, to the various lighthouses, and which came under the naval service; if he could produce a discharge from that service, he was allowed to vote,—contrary, as I have intimated, to the express and determined wish of the people of British Columbia. I am not surprised that the Dominion Government were ashamed to put that provision in plain black and white in the act; for instead of putting it among qualifications of electors in section 29 they stuck it among the disqualifications of electors in section 30, by means of a double negative. I was challenged on one platform to turn over from beginning to end the leaves of that book containing the Dominion Elections Act and show where it was stated by any possible construction that the Japanese were permitted to vote. The ordinary man or woman would find it impossible to discover any such provision, it was so subtly incorporated among the disqualifications. I therefore strongly hope that when the act is revised—and the leader of the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King) has indicated that there will be revision—this provision and many others of a similar character will be eliminated.

Mr. HERBERT MARLER (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, what I have to say with reference to the resolution now before the House will be in a very few words. I rise not for the purpose of discussing any election or proceedings at elections, but merely to attempt to place before the House what seems to be a very grave injustice now imposed upon certain Canadian citizens in this Dominion. As I understand the situation, it is this. Under the Naturalization Act of 1914, which is, I believe, the law at present in force, with some minor amendments, it is provided that the wife of a British subject shall be deemed to be a British subject. There is practically the same provision in our civil code in Lower Canada, in Article 23, and if I mistake not, the provision is general practically throughout the world. Now when the Elections Act was framed, British subjects were given the right to vote with the exception provided in subsection 2 of section 29, the effect of which was simply this: many foreign-born women married to Canadian citizens, naturalized or native-born, and therefore themselves Canadian citizens, were deprived of the right to vote unless they went before a judge and obtained a certificate in the form set out in the act. That is the situation as it held at the time the lists were in preparation. As my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) has very clearly explained, possibly a situation may have existed then that does not exist now, but he also stressed very clearly that this provision of the act certainly imposed some other liability on these foreign-born women although Canadian citizens at the time. Some of the arguments used in the debate were that these foreign-born women did not understand our laws, our language, or our customs and temperament of the Canadian people. If that is the case, if these foreign-born women do not understand our laws, our language, or our temperament, how do they understand them any better by going before a judge and getting a certificate entitling them to vote? It seems to me that when they can get a certificate by going before a judge that argument falls to the ground.

All that any fair-minded person could ask in regard to this section of the Elections Act is that these women be placed in just the same position as other Canadian citizens, so that they will not have to go before a judge, but before the registrar the same as every other voter, and the registrar can inquire into the facts and accept or refuse a particular person's claim to the right to vote. That is all that this resolution seeks to do, and I am therefore in favour of it. There was, without the slightest shadow of a doubt a great deal of injustice done to women in the division which I represent owing to the operation of this section in the last election. These women had lived there not one, two, or three years, but for many years; they understood our language, and affairs in this country and were quite as capable of exercising the franchise as many others who were placed on the voters' lists, but instead of being able to go before the registrar as the ordinary citizen could, and simply give their name to the registrar and then be permitted to vote, they had to go before a judge of the Superior Court or one having jurisdiction in naturalization proceedings and obtain a certificate, and then present themselves before the registrar. That, of course, placed great difficulties in the way of very many women, who had the right to vote, exercising their franchise. It is quite true that many of them took advantage of this provision in the act, but I claim that there was, and is, an injustice placed upon these women, who are Canadian citizens just as much as many other women who are placed on the electoral lists. For that reason I think this subsection ought to be repealed.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Before this resolution carries, I should like to present the view of the Government on this matter. In a word, I might say that I think my colleagues and I agree with every word uttered by the mover of this resolution, the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). He has stated the case so clearly that anything that might be added would simply be in the nature of reiteration.

As to the relation between the franchise and citizenship, I think we ought to do all we can to see that our citizenship is kept strong and well selected; but once a person becomes a British subject, I think we should do all in our power to instil in him or her a pride in British citizenship, and the first duty of every citizen is to take an intelligent part in governmental affairs. No one can exercise the full privilege of citizenship if he is deprived of the right to vote under the conditions prescribed in the electoral law. If, therefore, Mr. Speaker, the House will approve of this motion, I would say that the Government will at a later stage bring in an amendment to the Elections Act with a view to giving effect to the intention of this resolution.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Centre Vancouver): I hesitate very much indeed intervening in this debate. I rise, not with any desire to question the good faith of my hon. friend from North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). I listened with intense interest to his very able argument to-day, as I have done to his arguments during the past two years. I do think, however, that the House is perhaps losing sight of an important point. I am not desiring to reflect on the intelligence of the House at all, but sometimes we stress one point and lose sight of another which perhaps may be of greater importance. There is no desire on my part whatever to interfere with the widest privileges of the franchise being given to foreign-born women citizens of Canada. I do not desire that at all, and I never have. I know that this question has exercised my hon. friend from North Waterloo in sessions gone by very, very much, but I think that the House must take this point into consideration, and if, later on, the act is amended, it certainly ought to be provided for. If this clause is repealed, we shall be giving to women aliens who enter Canada the right to exercise the franchise irrespective of the length of time they have been in the country and of their knowledge of our language and affairs, without any qualification whatsoever except one, and that is that they are married to a naturalized or native-born Canadian. Let us examine that from a practical standpoint. I put an extreme case to my hon. friend a moment ago, not for the purpose of misleading the House, but to illustrate the case as clearly as possible, but he took advantage of the fact that the rules of the House forbade me to speak, and rather ridiculed the idea. Let us look at it just for a moment, because I think it very vitally affects the question. If a woman immigrant, I care not where she comes from, enters Canada and, as very frequently happens, joins the sweetheart who preceded her and who has probbaly established a home in this country, it makes no difference whether they are married that very day or within six months or one or two years, that woman, if this resolution carries, could vote within a week or a month after her arrival and marriage in this country.

Mr. CALDWELL: Two months' residence in the riding is required.

Mr. STEVENS: Two months' residence in the riding and a year's residence in the country but the point is—

Mr. MARLER: Take the case of an American citizen coming into the country and marrying a Canadian naturalized subject. She would under the law become a British subject but she might not be able to speak our language any more than a person coming from a foreign land in Europe. What about a case of that kind? I am simply asking for information.

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend will be patient with me I will come to that in a moment. All I suggest is that the woman should acquire the right to vote on precisely the same grounds on which the man acquires that right. I appeal to the Prime Minister and the Government—because the former made a rather disturbing statement a moment ago—is it not reasonable and right that we should require the woman to comply with the same regulations that the man is called upon to comply with? On the other hand, if we allow the woman to vote simply by virtue of being married to a Canadian, she is given a privilege we have never extended to the man. If that point is fully met I have no objection to the disappearance of this clause and would vote for the resolution, but I certainly could not vote for the motion as it at present stands.

Now my hon. friend from St. George-St. Lawrence Division of Montreal (Mr. Marler) raised the question of the rather peculiar provision in the clause which really relates to persons coming from the United States. Well, my hon. friend knows exactly why that is in the act. He knows and the Minister of Railways also—

Mr. JACOBS: Knows what?

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. STEVENS: Both these hon. members were on the committee that considered the legislation and both of them were the originators of that provision—

Mr. JACOBS: Who were on the committee?

Mr. STEVENS:—but there is no reflection on them on that account.

Mr. JACOBS: May I point out to my hon. friend that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George Division came into the House as a result of the last election; he never was here before.

Mr. STEVENS: I ought to have said that my hon. friend for George Etienne Cartier was one of the originators of the proviso in this clause. It was to meet his views very largely that the proviso was put in, and the hon. member knows it.

Mr. JACOBS: May I tell my hon. friend that I am not complaining about the concessions which were wrung from the late government but of the things we failed to obtain.

Mr. STEVENS: The proviso is more or less absurd. I grant that, but if, as he says, it is a concession which was wrung from the government he was responsible for it. Now he is complaining about its inequality; now he bases his whole argument this afternoon upon the fact that it is—what shall I say?—a discriminating proviso. But that is not the point. The point is whether or not the right for women to vote in Canada is to be upon the same basis as the right for men to vote. That is the broad general ground, I think, that we must stand upon; and we must also insist upon the right of women to the franchise being surrounded by the same safeguards that obtain in the case of men. The Government ought to be very careful before allowing this resolution to pass, because we do not want them to put themselves in the position of saying when the bill comes before the House "Well we are committed to the principle by this resolution." I think the suggestion made to let the resolution stand until the bill comes down is a good one. Then we can take the clause up under the illuminating intelligence of the hon. members who now occupy the Treasury benches and we will be able to work out something that will be satisfactory. Personally, I do not want to seem

5 p.m. to vote against the general idea behind the plea of my hon. friend from North Waterloo, but I am certainly opposed to giving the franchise to women—alien women coming to this country—on any other conditions than those which apply to manhood franchise. It is upon that point that I personally desire to protect the act and in order to protect the principle I shall feel myself called upon regretfully to vote against the resolution of my hon. friend.

Mr. THOMAS LANGTON CHURCH (North Toronto): Mr. Speaker, the object of this motion is to repeal section 2 of section 29 of the Act of 1920. This legislation was passed only after the most mature, ample and thorough discussion in this House and in the country. There was a demand for it from the returned soldiers and patriotic organizations. I regret to have to differ with what has been said on the other side of the House to-day. Those who argue for this motion advance the doctrine that naturalization and the franchise are kindred subjects. Not so. No party since Confederation ever adopted that basic principle as a franchise test and hon. gentlemen who have argued in favour of that doctrine were themselves parties to the disfranchisement of many citizens of this country. The Act of 1920, gave the franchise to British subjects and no man or woman who was not a bona fide British subject, under this act, had a vote.

I have known some of those who have had the ballot taken away from them. Many of these persons were of alien origin who came to Canada years ago, in infancy, and grew up with the country in the belief that they were British subjects. But, after careful legal inquiry, they found it impossible to show that they were British subjects. Under the Act of 1920, no citizen of any country but Canada, whether man or woman, had a right to vote. I am not aware of any country in the world, or of any British possession, that applies any other principle to its franchise legislation. No country that I ever heard of has ever called on anyone not a citizen to take up arms and defend the country, and no country in the world ever gave the franchise to any person not a bona fide, legal, citizen. No British legislature that I am aware of ever gave the franchise to any one not a citizen.

I regret that this matter has come up at the present time. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in looking over the country, find a lot of people without the ballot and they are anxious to get them on the list because they believe that those who were left off under the Act of 1920, will vote for them and will vote in the way they want them to. That is why they now seek to repeal section 2. There is no demand for this legislation and it is too soon to repeal its provisions. It was not even an issue in the late election. This enactment was a war measure. This is a British country, it is going to continue to be one and that is a fact that we want to make sure of.

Under the operation of the War-Time Elections Act in England no citizen of any other country than Britain was allowed to vote; only a British subject was permitted to cast a ballot. Practically the same thing was adopted in this country; the franchise, under the War-Time Elections Act was denied to all but Canadian citizens. The indispensable requisite before being allowed to vote is that a man shall be a Canadian citizen. That is the primary condition of the franchise in every country in the world. Certainly, it is the law in the United States. Over there they assimilate their population; a man must be an American citizen and fight for the United States, no matter what country he comes from, before he is allowed to cast his ballot. I admire the American people for the firm manner in which they carried out their draft law during the war; everybody had to toe the mark, obey the law and become an American citizen. Citizenship is really one of the principles of the American constitution; if you want to live in that country you must be a citizen and be prepared to fight, and if need be, die for the Union.

I think the hon. member's motion should go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Such a provision as this should not be allowed to be passed without mature consideration, or before all classes are heard from and given an opportunity to present their views. We are here to give effect to public opinion. This proposition, I repeat, was not an issue in the last general election and there is no demand now from the people of Canada for the repeal of this war time measure. In his addresses to the people of North York the Prime Minister never even referred to the subject and the Government have no mandate to repeal this provision of the statute.

As this is only the first session of this Parliament, I would suggest that the hon. member allow this motion to go to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, pending the introduction of the bill, so that we can have a fair discussion of the question before the proper tribunal. I know that in the constituency from which I come very strong objection is taken by different patriotic and soldier organizations to the repeal of this legislation. During the election campaign in my constituency I was asked if I was in favour of the repeal of the War-Time Elections Act and I said that I was not. I do not agree with the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), whom we are always glad to hear from. I understood her to say that she claimed no special privilege for women. She thought all they desired was to be considered equal with men in relation to the franchise. That is all very well as far as it goes, but it does not touch the principle involved here. Let me say to the hon. member that she does not represent all the women in this country, or all the women of Ontario, or even all the women of Southeast Grey. The women in the constituency from which I come, and the women's patriotic organizations, are thoroughly opposed to this proposed amendment.

The act was a war measure; it was passed after most mature consideration and it was favoured by a patriotic body of soldiers who had just returned from the front and been demobilized and who had seen the condition of affairs in the old land. It was at their request and at the request of patriotic organizations throughout Canada that this legislation was placed on the statute book. Therefore, if no reasons are given, I do not know why some of my hon. friends are so anxious that this motion should carry. It may be that in our country a large number of people do not have the vote and perhaps the hon. gentleman thinks they will vote for him. It seems to me that something might be said in reference to that. I think it would be far better as the session is early yet, and we have been here only a few days, to go slow and postpone consideration of this resolution. I regret very much that this matter has been brought up at the present time, because we want this country to continue to be a British country with British institutions flourishing and we do not want to be unfair to any citizen, no matter who he is. I think, therefore, it would be far better if the hon. member would allow his motion to go to the Privileges and Elections Committee, so that the various soldiers and patriotic and other organizations could be heard from in order that we might see whether there is any demand for this proposed legislation. I am thoroughly opposed, Mr. Speaker, to any repeal of this statute and will vote against the motion.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): I should like to say just a few words on this subject, because I believe it affects the Prairie provinces probably as much as any other part of Canada, as we have to assimilate perhaps a greater percentage of that population than most other provinces have. I should like to say just a word as to the way in which the act has actually worked out in the permitting of women, who were absolutely qualified in every way to vote, to exercise the franchise. I am not going to go into the question of whether men and women should all be admitted to citizenship on an equal basis. That is a question of personal naturalization, and it hardly comes into this discussion; it is a question of amendment of the Naturalization Act. I have not considered the matter sufficiently to say whether or not I would oppose an amendment to the Naturalization Act, putting every man and woman on an equality as regards becoming naturalized, and eliminating the right of naturalization by marriage. The point is this: whether intentionally or not, that act prevented a large proportion of foreign-born women, who had been in this country a sufficient number of years to have assimilated our customs and acquired our language, from casting their ballots when election day arrived. Why did it do so? Partly, because of the distances which had to be traversed in that country in order that they might reach a judge. I am not reflecting on anything the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) or any other hon. member has said. Many members have no realization of the actual conditions which prevail in those prairie constituencies; they have no realization of their size, or the distances which must be covered, or the hardship which is inflicted on women who have to travel to meet the judge on a day which the judge has set, and obtain their certificates. We know that in the actual working out of that act, it was almost impossible, because the district was so large, to obtain judges to issue those certificates when the certificates were required. In all parts of those constituencies, in all parts of that prairie country, there were women requiring those certificates within a certain time, and with the number of judges we had, it was probably impossible for them to reach convenient points adjacent to all those women. In my constituency—and I am speaking of that, not because this is a personal matter, but because conditions in my constituency are probably much as they are in other large constituencies in the Prairie provinces—when it was possible to get a judge to come down, women had to travel anywhere from ten to fifty or sixty miles in order to meet that judge and get their certificates. The practical working out of that meant that they were debarred from obtaining those certificates, and they were thus debarred from voting.

Mr. JACOBS: That was why the law was enacted.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I am not making any reflections; I am simply making a statement of fact as it exists. I am not reflecting on the intentions of the hon. gentlemen who passed that act; possibly they had absolutely correct intentions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do men not have to do just the same thing?

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Not necessarily, so far as I can see.

Mr. McMASTER: It is easier for a man to travel than for a woman.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: That is not the point. A man can, to a certain extent before he is naturalized, choose his time for naturalization. In the case where a women has to receive her voting certificate in a comparatively short time preceding an election—

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is mistaken, I think. She can do that at any time at all. She has exactly the same privileges as a man.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I stand corrected, but neither I nor any other of the people in my constituency knew that a woman had the same right. The bulk of the women affected were not women who had come to Canada within a week or a month or a year of the date of the election. This legislation affected, to a large extent, the old-established constituencies, the old districts; it affected women who, for years, had understood that they were full Canadian citizens, women who had, so far as women could, fulfilled all the duties of Canadian citizenship. In actual effect, whatever the intention of the law was, it debarred those women from enjoying the full advantage accruing to the citizenship which they had acquired. I consider it was particularly a hardship in those pioneer districts. If ever any women on God's earth deserve the franchise and the full right of saying what legislation shall be passed affecting the rights and lives of every man and woman in this country, it is those women who went into those pioneer districts and, with their husbands, attempted to extend civilization into those wildernesses. The actual effect of that law which compelled those women to obtain such certificates before voting was to deprive a large percentage of them of the franchise.

On those grounds, on the grounds of common justice, on the ground that men and women who are full-fledged Canadian citizens should enjoy the fruits of Canadian citizenship, should enjoy the honour and fulfil the highest obligation of Canadian citizenship, I shall support the resolution.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I think there is one principle that we have somewhat forgotten in this discussion, and that is that, with war, there comes penalizing legislation.

Mr. CALDWELL: The war is over.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The war is over, therefore, the penalizing legislation ought to be modified. That will present itself to people in a broad way. For instance, our sentiment towards German citizenship is changing every day, and we are going to forget a lot of things that happened during the war, especially in the matter of legislation. The world is going to try to get together again and to get along as it used to do. As the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) pointed out, there was a reason for framing the law as it stands.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Do you not know that this legislation was enacted two years after the war was over?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Even granting that, there are a lot of people in this country, of whom perhaps I am one, who cannot forget that the war is over; and although we may forget some of the hardships and penalties that were necessary for national safety in time of war, we must bear in mind that we should not go too far in mitigating the law. We want to have a democratic franchise in this country, and we should try to suggest such means as will give us the best election system we can have. As an hon. member from Toronto suggests, a question of this kind should be submitted to a committee, and it might be wise for the hon. member for North Waterloo to let his motion stand until we ascertain what the Government submits to the House later on.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to take up much time, nor do I rise for the purpose of opposing in any way the motion before the House. I simply rise to indicate the consequence which might follow if the motion were passed, in the exact terms in which it is couched, and the Government felt called upon to implement the resolution by legislation exactly expressing it. Possibly the House is aware of the condition of affairs at the present day, let us say, with regard to Italy. Suppose two Italian women came to Canada both absolutely ignorant, as they might well be, of a single word of either French or English. One of these women, let us say, is married, the other unmarried. After the lapse of one year the unmarried woman, without perhaps having acquired the slightest facility in the use of either language, and without being able to understand the political conditions of the country, or to transact the slightest bit of business, will become franchised by the mere fact of marriage, if my hon. friend's resolution is carried directly into effect. In the case of the woman who is already married, however, some five years, I think, must elapse; and, I think, she must satisfy some official that she has a sufficient knowledge of one or other of the languages of the country in order to be able to communicate intelligently. Now, would it not be well to pause and, whether by means of a committee such as has been referred to, or by direct consideration by the Government, let us have all these possible phases carefully considered so that we might have legislation which would extend the franchise as far as it ought to go without creating any absurdities? I think that we, and all the people of the country, agree on the principle that the franchise should be as broad as is consistent with the safety of our institutions; and the safety of our institutions depends upon the capacity of the intended voter to apprehend the political and social questions which confront the people of Canada from time to time. Without a good working knowledge of one of the languages used in Canada, it is impossible for a voter intelligently to exercise the franchise. Do not let us rush in and alter the existing legislation in a spirit of ineffable charity, in order that some one shall be enfranchised without the slightest possibility of obtaining, through the natural community channels, a conception of what is going on in the country. That is not a real charity; it is not a prerogative; it is not a gift; it is simply a wasting and a debasing of the franchise that confers no real benefit on the individual who receives it.

On the other hand, I am forcibly struck by the remarks made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman). I can well apprehend the difficulty that would occur in many of the rural constituencies when people did not seek to register until practically the last few days of the campaign. They thought nothing of the vote until they wanted to use it, and then distance became a great obstacle. I have seen, and I fancy hon. members have all seen, precisely the same thing within the limits of densely settled communities. Very often people object to travelling a few blocks, or spending an hour or two, in order to reach the official. There is plenty of time during the whole year in which they can do this, and practically without inconvenience; but people complain, because, forsooth, everything is not ready for them right at hand at the time they realize that they want to make use of the franchise. Notwithstanding this statement, I do sympathize with the difficulties which distance imposes on a great many people in the rural communities, in the East just as well as in the West. Let us, then, give consideration to the other provisions of the election law and see if we can devise some tribunal that will exercise proper and reasonable discrimination that will not pass people through at the rate of several hundred in an hour, as was done in one of the most populous centres of the country. Let the officials get closer in touch with the people, so that they will not have to travel scores of miles. We should so arrange it that people could be accommodated at convenient seasons and, if they realize the importance of the franchise themselves, given the opportunity to be properly enrolled and enfranchised. Let that be confined, however, to the people who can speak one language or other in use in the country, and let us put the women on the same basis as the men. For myself, I would do away with marriage—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BAXTER: —as a qualification. Hon. members will observe the qualification I make. I am like the leader of the House

(Mr. Mackenzie King); we have both done without this popular institution for a good many years. If my hon. friend intends to change his attitude in this regard I shall not follow his example. It is one of the characteristics of the members of this particular group that they pursue the same policy right along. I would suggest that the women should be naturalized just in the same way as the men, on the same basis as to literacy and the question whether or not they would be desirable citizens of the country. There is legislation to come before the House, possibly within a day or two, by which would-be assassins or exponents of assassination as a means of changing government are not to be deported without trial. I do not think that the sober sense of the country intends to permit its election law to be so broad as to include elements of that character. Until we resolve to break down such barriers as these we must have some tribunal before which intending citizens shall submit themselves to a reasonable test as to their fitness to take part in the government of this country.

Motion agreed to.

BRITISH PREFERENCE AND CANADIAN SEAPORTS

On the motion being called:

That, in the opinion of this House, the British tariff preference should be confined to goods brought into Canada through Canadian seaports.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John): When does my hon. friend for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) intend to proceed with this motion? The subject matter is very interesting to me and very important, especially to certain parts of the Dominion. I had intended putting a similar resolution upon the Order Paper myself. I am very glad my hon. friend has done so, and I should like to be assured that he will proceed with his motion.

Mr. H. J. LOGAN (Cumberland): I have been waiting for some information from the Customs Department which I have only just received, and as it is now nearly six o'clock I did not think it was worth while to proceed with the motion to-day.

Mr. BAXTER: It will be duly proceeded with?

Mr. LOGAN: Yes, I can assure my hon. friend that it will be brought forward at the next opportunity.

QUEBEC FISHERIES

On the motion being called:

For a copy of the correspondence and all other documents regarding the transfer of fisheries to the Province of Quebec.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (leader of the Opposition): The intention that this motion would be taken up to-day has not been realized. I do not want to speak on the motion myself; I merely want to see it carried with as little delay as possible.

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure): I had intended proceeding with the motion to-day, but it being nearly six o'clock I did not think it advisable to do so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There will be no discussion.

Mr. MARCIL: I shall take it up to-morrow.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

On the Order being called for the second reading of Bill No. 16 to amend the Immigration Act:

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Might I ask the sponsor of this bill (Mr. Woodsworth) if he would be agreeable to allow it to stand until the Minister of Immigration is here?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes.

Order stands.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

On the order for the second reading of Bill No. 17 to amend the Criminal Code:

Mr. WOODSWORTH: This bill has relation to the same subject matter, and therefore it had better stand, too.

Order stands.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917

On the Order for the second reading of Bill No. 18, to repeal The Military Service Act, 1917.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Stands.

SUPPLY

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Marcil (Bonaventure) in the chair.

Civil Government:—Labour—Salaries, $258.-755.

Mr. MURDOCK—I have been able to secure the further detailed information in regard to outside employees of the Labour Department, which my hon. friend from Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) was extremely anxious to have. The permanent staff of the Labour Department outside of Ottawa, is composed of: Mr. R. A. Rigg, General Superintendent employment offices at Winnipeg, at a salary of $3,000 a year; Mrs. M. Chesney, statistical clerk in the same office, at $1,200 a year. Mr. J. Shannon, also a statistical clerk in the same office, at a salary of $1,080 a year. At Halifax, Mr. K. G. Christie is employed as clearance officer at $1,980, and Miss A. M. Stewart as clerk stenographer at $960. The fair wage officers are as follows: at Calgary, Mr. F. E. Harrison, $2,220; at Vancouver, Mr. D. T. Bulger, $2,340; at Toronto, Mr. E. N. Compton, $2,340; at Montreal, T. Bertrand, $1,740. Miss O. M. Compton is clerk typist in the Toronto office, at $960. Mr. George P. Shields is a clearance officer now located at Ottawa. The information I have here with respect to Mr. Shields is that since his discharge from the C.E.F. he has been employed mostly outside of Ottawa, being for some time clearance officer at Vancouver. When this statement was prepared he was in Toronto making investigations; at present he is at headquarters, but for the purposes of this statement he was classified as an outside employee. These are the eleven permanent so-called outside employees of the Labour Department. The temporary outside employees are Mr. G. I. Duke, clerk-stenographer, $960; Miss M. B. Nesbitt, junior clerk stenographer, $900; Miss I. Thomas, junior clerk, $900,—all in Mr. Rigg's office at Winnipeg. Miss H. A. Frederick is junior clerk-stenographer in Mr. Harrison's office at Calgary at a salary of $900. Miss E. B. Mitchell is clerk-stenographer in Mr. Bulger's office, Vancouver, at $960.

Mr. MacKELVIE: What are the duties of a clearance officer, and why has that office been discontinued at Vancouver?

Mr. MURDOCK: I hold up for the inspection of hon. members the book containing the classification of the Civil Service of Canada. I am told that it does not contain one-half the present classifications of the Service, and I am unable to find in it a statement of the duties of the clearance officer.

An hon. MEMBER: Tell them yourself.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am sorry to say that I have not been in the department long enough to know all the various classifications of the service, nor do I expect to be able to remain long enough to do so.

Mr. BAXTER: There is a Mr. Cochrane employed at Moncton who keeps in touch with the railway employees. Is he under the minister's department?

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not think so.

Mr. COPP: I think his appointment is made by the local administration, with the co-operation of the Dominion.

Mr. HANSON: I know the gentleman; he is an officer of the Labour Department, in charge of the Employment Bureau here. .

Mr. COPP: He is appointed, I believe, by the local government.

Mr. MURDOCK: This re-classification volume does not define the duties of a clearance officer, but I shall be glad to get the information and place it before my hon. friend. The Civil Service Commission establish the titles and define the duties of these various positions; the matter is not in the hands of the minister, or, I believe, of anyone in the department.

Mr. MacKELVIE: I was curious to know why the office had been discontinued at Vancouver while, apparently, there is still one at Halifax.

Mr. MURDOCK: I think the intention is to make a different classification for the gentleman at Calgary, carrying with it a slightly increased scale of compensation. The Civil Service Commission recently determined that so-called fair wage officers who devoted a considerable portion of their time to investigation of matters connected with the coal mining industry should be placed in a different classification from that of ordinary fair wage investigators who covered a wide field in other classes of employment. Accordingly, I understand they are rearranging the classification, slightly increasing, I believe, the compensation for fair wage officers having to do with matters affecting the coal mining industry.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Can the minister, now that he has the volume, state a little more definitely than he did yesterday what are the duties of the Industrial Engineer?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): If the minister will pardon me, I may say that I have been struck with the interest that has been shown by the minister's explanation of these numerous titles that are now attached to people in the Civil Service who, in my previous days in the House of Commons were simply known as clerks, and I discovered that you will find in the Distribution Office a large volume, if not two or three prepared by this wonderful Griffenhagen firm which was employed by the late government, at very great expense to the country, to reclassify the whole Civil Service; and in it will be found the duties of all the positions classified. The minister of any one department has nothing whatever to do with the affixing of titles or assigning the duties of the office.

Mr. MURDOCK: As I happen to have under my hand the duties of the Industrial Engineer, I will read them:

Definition of Class:

To act as technical adviser to the Department of Labour; to investigate various industrial matters and to prepare reports thereon; to draft forms and draw up standard practice instructions for use in the branches of the department; to act in an advisory capacity in connection with industrial disputes; to gather data and to furnish information and assistance in connection with the establishment of Joint Industrial Councils pursuant to the recommendation of the National Industrial Conference; and to perform other related work as required.

Qualifications:

Education equivalent to graduation in arts, science, or engineering from a university of recognized standing; at least five years of experience in constructive investigation work, of which at least two years shall have been in an administrative or consulting capacity; initiative, tact and good judgment; good address.

Compensation:

Monthly:	$ 255	270	285	300
Annual:	$3,060	3,240	3,420	3,600

This was described by the commission as a new class at the time it was classified. I do not think it would be out of the way for me to call the attention of hon. members to the fact that these definitions of class and qualifications were prepared under the direction of or directly by gentlemen who were being paid at the rate of $7 per hour, which perhaps accounts for their being so exhaustive.

Mr. BAXTER: As the minister was reading the classification I felt like remarking with regard to the particular type of individual required for this work, "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven," for it did not seem to me that you could add a single quality or a single bit of knowledge to such a wonderful combination of human intellect, resource and ability, as is there depicted by the Griffenhagen people or the Civil Service Commission.

I rose for the purpose of asking the minister, who I believe is a practical man, whether, stripping himself of all the attributes of the ministry, he does not feel like saying to this House that as regards the practical questions that have to be met in the labour world the real way to get at the root of any labour problem is to get a commonsense man or a body of men, who may never have had a university education at all, to go down into the thick of it between the capitalist and the employees and talk common sense to both sides, with a view to bringing them together. I believe that the minister and myself are absolutely of one mind there, and no matter what commissions the past government may have appointed, at no matter what cost, I trust that we are going to see from the minister within a very short time a scheme based on the real practical fundamentals of human nature. Perhaps he may be able to outline it later and tell us when we shall be able to get down to something less in the way of expense for what is almost a work of supererogation along the lines of education, and depend on the thing that really counts, human character in touch with human problems.

Mr. MURDOCK: I wholeheartedly agree that the hon. gentleman is talking common sense when he speaks of the proper methods of dealing with industrial disputes.

Mr. LADNER: There is a decided increase in these estimates over last year, apart from the statutory increases. Now, considering general world conditions and decrease in wages in all forms of labour, skilled and unskilled, I should like to ask the minister whether, when these Estimates were presented to him, he endeavoured to find out why there had been an increase, and whether some method could not be devised for bringing his estimates more into conformity with general conditions in the labour world outside.

Mr. MURDOCK: I did so. The proposed increase of $23,400 in the civil gov ernment estimates, so far as I know and honestly believe, is partly necessary in accordance with the provisions of the law regulating the statutory salary increases. I am sure my hon. friend will not hold me responsible for what is outside my control. Part of the increased cost is due to the appointment of some additional employees, but these I honestly believe to be necessary for the successful and proper functioning of the Department of Labour. Even with these additions to the permanent staff I am at a loss to know whether we will be even able to carry on, after dispensing with possibly twenty-five or thirty temporary employes who were appointed during the régime of my predecessor and have been in the department ever since I took office.

Mr. STEVENS: Out of what vote were these forty-seven temporary employees paid?

Mr. MURDOCK: Partly out of the vote for contingencies and sundries. To some extent the cost has also been met out of employment services and the industrial training fund, and other sources. Now, what I hope to do is to come right out into the open and resort to no camouflage to shelter any employee in the Labour Department. If such does not appear to be my course at the present time it is because —and I frankly admit the fact—I have not yet got a sufficiently detailed grasp of the entire situation to know just what can be done. I believe, however, that something can be done to improve the situation as regards the number of employees and to meet what I understand to be the generally expressed wish of Parliament.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the House adjourned without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 30, 1922

The House met at three o'clock, the Deputy Speaker in the Chair.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Hon. James Horace King, member for the electoral district of Kootenay East, introduced by Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Sir Lomer Gouin.

MR. SPEAKER'S BEREAVEMENT

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Hon. members of the House will regret to learn that His Honour, the Speaker of this House, has just suffered bereavement in the death of his father at the advanced and venerable age of eighty-six years. I express what I know to be the wish of the House when I ask you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to convey to Hon. Mr. Lemieux the deep sympathy of all its members. It will be the wish of hon. members that their sympathy should also be extended to other members of the late Mr. Lemieux's distinguished family.

[Mr. Murdock.]

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): It was only as I entered the Chamber a few moments ago that I received the very distressing news of the death of Mr. Speaker's father. Filial affection is one of the strongest impulses and ties that have to do with human relationships, and those of us who have known the Speaker of this House for so many years are aware that in the case of his family, and particularly as regards his father, that affection has been of the most marked and deepest character. The loss he has suffered is therefore severe, and I associate myself most earnestly with the sympathy expressed by the Prime Minister.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): While, with other members of the House, I was aware of the fact that the Speaker's father was seriously ill, I was not aware of the fatal termination of that illness until the announcement just made by the Prime Minister. For myself and those who sit with me, I wish to say that we associate ourselves with all that has been said by the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition in extending the sympathy of the House to Mr. Speaker and his family in the sad bereavement that they have suffered.

RETURNED SOLDIERS

APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON RE-ESTABLISHMENT

On the Order, Motions:

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment): I move, Mr. Speaker, with the unanimous consent of the House, that before we take up this order we proceed to Government Notices of Motion, in order that a motion be made which otherwise we might not reach in the course of the day.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I suppose it is a matter that will not take up much time?

Mr. BELAND: No.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I move the following resolution:

That a Special Committee be appointed to consider questions relating to the pensions, insurance and re-establishment of returned soldiers, and any amendments to the existing laws in relation thereto which may be proposed or considered necessary by the Committee; with power to send for persons, papers and records, to print from day to day its proceedings and the evidence taken, for the use of the Committee and to report from time to time; and that Rule 11 be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I move:

That the Special Committee appointed in conformity with the resolution agreed to by the House consist of the following members: Messrs. Arthurs, Black (Yukon), Brown, Caldwell, Carroll, Chisholm, Clark, Clifford, Denis (Joliette), Forrester, Hudson, Humphrey, Knox, McKay, Marler, MacLaren, Miss Macphail, Munro, Power, Raymond, Robinson, Ross (Kingston), Savard, Speakman, Stork, Sutherland, Turgeon and Wallace.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Will this committee be similar to the committees of the two previous sessions?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King the House returned to routine proceedings.

COMMITTEES—CHANGES

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): If it meets with no objection, I move:

That the name of Mr. Stewart (Hamilton) be substituted for that of Mr. Stewart (Lanark) on the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that the name of Mr. Stewart (Lanark) be substituted for that of Mr. Stewart (Hamilton) on the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Motion agreed to.

NOVA SCOTIA MINERS

MR. IRVINE MOVES ADJOURNMENT TO DISCUSS SITUATION

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to ask leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the serious crisis developing at the present time in Nova Scotia between the miners of District No. 26 and the British Empire Steel Corporation.

Mr. FIELDING: The hon. gentleman desires to have an opportunity of addressing the House on this subject. There is no objection.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, I presume that already most hon. members are aware of the situation in Nova Scotia for the discussion of which I now move the adjournment of the House. It is generally understood, I believe, that a difficulty has developed between the British Empire Steel Corporation and the coal miners of Nova Scotia, involving about twelve thousand men. The difficulty began about 1st January, when the company made a wage cut of about 37½ per cent. Incidentally I might point out that the cost of living in Nova Scotia is about 17 per cent higher than in Alberta, yet the wages are 71 per cent lower. Naturally the men concerned resisted this reduction. A conciliation board was granted. I understand that the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) appointed the chairman of that board because the representatives of the parties had some difficulty in agreeing on one themselves. The chairman was from Ontario. It seems that the conclusion which the committee arrived at was not very satisfactory to the men. It happened that the chairman agreed with the representative of the company, and I understand that his casting vote carried the day. The recommendation was that a 32½ per cent cut of wages should be put into effect instead of the 37½ per cent that was previously imposed by the company; but a minority report was submitted recommending a 14 per cent reduction on contracts and a minimum on the datal rate of $3.50. The majority report was submitted to the men and was rejected by an almost unanimous vote. Following this the miners considered the whole situation at a general convention, after which a delegation was sent to Montreal and negotiations were re-opened between them and the operators, which resulted in the latter granting $2.85 or slightly over that to the datal men. This was submitted to the men and was also rejected.

Now, immediately on the wage cut being put into effect by the company the men, of their own volition, naturally struck on the job. That is, they said to themselves: We will not continue to produce coal which will make very high profits for the corporation at a wage on which we cannot live; and this is commonly called "striking on the job." It might be pointed out here that the miners were not in a position to strike in the ordinary way for the reason that they had already expended almost their entire surplus funds in giving relief to their fellows who have been suffering from lack of nourishment and proper attention throughout the past winter. I do not know whether it was decided at any particular meeting or whether the strike leaders authorized it, but it was decided almost unanimously by the men that they would lower production of coal to a point about corresponding to what they are getting in wages.

The fact of the matter is that the coal is not being produced at the present time, which is an economic waste; and the second fact is that the men are not getting a living wage, and the stories which are coming through of the conditions in Nova Scotia almost rival those that have come to us from the famine districts of the Volga. We hear of children under-nourished and suffering sickness; we hear of an increase in the death rate; we hear of parents being summoned by the educational authorities for not being able to send their children to school because they cannot buy them boots and clothes and properly nourish them. I do not think it necessary for me to bring that information to the notice of the Government, for I believe they are already well acquainted with it, but I may say that those stories are coming from authoritative sources.

Now, there are about twelve thousand men and their families involved in this situation; and we understand, both from the organized labour movement of that province, and from the delegation which is at present in the city of Ottawa to meet the Government in consultation on this matter, that the men have about reached the limit of their endurance, and must of necessity secure a settlement of some kind at the very earliest possible moment. In order to secure that settlement they have sought in a proper British manner to secure some amelioration through constitutional means. They made their appeal first of all to the provincial government, and I understand that that government has absolutely refused to have anything to do with the matter.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Would my hon. friend tell us where he has received that information?

Mr. IRVINE: I have received that information, Mr. Speaker, from the delegation that is here waiting upon the Government to deal with this matter, and I have also received it from the organized labour movement of Nova Scotia. I have a copy of that information before me. Having failed to get redress at the hands of the local government, they have sent a delegation to Ottawa, consisting of mayors from the four mining towns of Nova Scotia, namely, Mayor Morrison, of Glace Bay; Mayor Ling, of New Waterford; Mayor McLean of Dominion, and Mayor Wilson, of Spring Hill. They have presented the miners' case to the Government, and I understand that they have not received a satisfactory answer. I am advised that the Government has practically refused to take any definite action. I have here the answer which was given to the delegation by the hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), and I will read it to the House:

> Referring to the request made by yourself and Messrs McLean, Ling and Wilson at the interview with certain of my colleagues and myself in my office yesterday, that a Royal Commission be appointed forthwith to investigate matters pertaining to the coal mining industry in the Province of Nova Scotia, I beg to inform you that the Government has had this matter under consideration and is of the opinion that the situation is not one which in the public interest can be satisfactorily dealt with under the existing circumstances by a Royal Commission.

Now, while it may be perfectly true that a royal commission would not be able to do anything of very material benefit, yet apparently the Government does not propose to take any other course that would be better than the appointment of a royal commission. So we take it that the note virtually means that the Government has no intention of taking any particular action in the circumstances. I wish to read for the information of the House just a line or two from the manifesto presented by this delegation:

> We feel that the situation will never be understood until a commission of sympathetic, just and competent investigators have gone into the mining districts of Nova Scotia and seen things for themselves; until they have seen with their own eyes the conditions under which these people are expected to live and bring up healthy families.

The delegation asks that a commission be appointed to investigate this matter. I may say that these delegates are not representative simply of labour organizations, they are mayors of towns, representatives of the citizens of Nova Scotia; and the matter with which they deal is of vital concern to almost everybody in that province. I repeat that they are not here to put forward any particular type of labour propaganda; they are here as representative citizens to consult the Government on a matter of real public importance.

Now, the point I wish to make is this. The miners of Nova Scotia have appealed to the constitutional authorities of this country to deal with a condition which to them is unbearable. The provincial authority says that it cannot or will not act; this Government says, or virtually says, it cannot act. Well, who is going to act? If these men cannot obtain redress by constitutional methods, what are they to do? Will any hon. gentleman tell us what they are to do? If they are receiving a wage upon which they cannot live; if they are contracting disease and, in some cases, dying through lack of nourishment, they must have some kind of redress; and if neither the provincial government nor the Dominion Government will take action, what is to be the outcome? It is too late for us to talk when things happen; now is the time for this Government—or some other government; we want to know where the authority is—to deal with this matter. Surely there is some constitutional authority which will face the situation and undertake to see that a fair deal is given both to the corporation and to the miners. I am not here to plead for anything that would not be fair to the corporation; I want to see the company as well as the miners get a square deal. But if we refuse to listen to the appeal of these men, I ask again, what is going to be the outcome? Human nature can only stand so much; if it gets a little more than it can stand, what is going to happen?

I would like to make a suggestion, Mr. Speaker, and if I am not in order in doing so, it will not be much trouble to you to tell me that I am out of order. I would suggest that some one—say, Mr. Howard Ross, K.C., of Montreal, or some one else of similar standing—be appointed by this Government to investigate the whole situation with a view to arriving at a sane settlement.

I need not remind you of the history of this particular corporation; hon. members undoubtedly know what that history is. They know of the recent great merger under which there was formed a gigantic corporation which practically controls a monopoly of the coal output of Nova Scotia. I understand also that this company through its manager has been enabled to create watered stock to the amount of some $19,000,000. If it is necessary to pay dividends upon that amount of watered stock, surely it can only be done by reducing the wages of the producers, particularly when the corporation has to compete in the coal markets of the world. I am led to believe that that is exactly what is taking place: the company is seeking to reduce wages to the point which will enable it to make sufficient profits on its watered stock, as well as on its dry stock, if you like, to make it worth while to carry on business. Perhaps you know also that this great corporation was refused a charter by the late government of this Dominion and was granted it by the provincial government. There is a Liberal government in power in Nova Scotia, and we have a Liberal Government here. Sir, the question of politics does not enter into this matter; I hope it is not simply because a Liberal government happens to be in power in Nova Scotia that the present federal Government does not see its way clear to take some action. This is a matter of great importance; it involves not only the rights of 12,000 workingmen in Nova Scotia, but the rights and privileges of the people generally of that province. In fact, if you look at the question closely you will see that it is of national importance. Therefore I would like to hear this House discuss the matter in all its phases and decide upon some course of action.

Mr. DONALD M. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): I wish to speak briefly, Mr. Speaker, in support of this motion. The Government cannot get away from its responsibility in this matter. Both Liberal and Conservative governments have given grants of large amounts to the companies that have been merged to form what is now the British Empire Steel Corporation and to that extent the Dominion authority is responsible for the establishing of this industry. Something like $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 has been granted to these companies. Therefore it is the duty of this Government to do whatever it can to bring about a settlement which will be fair in every way to the men who are doing the work in this industry. After all, is it the purpose of this industry merely to turn out coal, steel plates, and so on? Should it not also provide a good living for the men who are doing the work in connection with it? I think it is the duty of the Government to investigate the whole matter, and to do so in a sympathetic manner. Let it find the best men it can to assume the responsibility of getting at the facts and of trying to effect a settlement which will be fair and just to all parties concerned.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (Cape Breton South and Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I happen to be one of the representatives from South Cape Breton and Richmond where the large bulk of miners of Nova Scotia work and reside. I am deeply interested in the success of the coal mines in that province, and I am equally interested in the welfare of the miners and workingmen generally, especially of those engaged in the coal industry on the island of Cape Breton.

The delegation to which my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Irvine) has referred was introduced to the Government by hon. members from Nova Scotia including myself, and their case was fairly and vigorously placed before the members of the Government then present. The Government saw fit, yesterday evening I think, to advise that delegation that it would not at this juncture establish a royal commission to investigate the coal industry in the province of Nova Scotia and to re-canvass the whole situation in that province. That, in effect, I think, was the answer of the Government.

The situation in the coal fields of Nova Scotia at the present time is a most serious one, and if anything could be done to help bring together the coal operators and the coal miners and secure better co-operation in the operation of the mines of that province, it would be a splendid thing. I am in no way talking for the Government or any member of it. I have lived with the coal miners in the county of Cape Breton for the past sixteen or seventeen years, and a finer body of men does not exist in this Dominion. It is true that they did not treat myself very well during the last campaign, but that, of course, does not enter into the consideration of the question which my hon. friend from Calgary has brought before the House.

The hon. member for Calgary has told us that this Government appointed the chairman of the conciliation board established by the Minister of Labour in the last Government, Hon. Senator Robertson. The facts are that the miners appointed as their representative Mayor Ling, an estimable man, who has been a coal miner himself. The Dominion Coal Company which operates the mines, refused to name a man, and Senator Robertson therefore appointed a gentleman to represent them. These two could not agree on the third arbitrator, and so when the present Government came into power the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) appointed U. E. Gillen, from the city of Toronto, as chairman of the board. That board held its meetings in the city of Halifax. Personally, I think it would have been much better if the board had sat in the town of Glace Bay, which is the centre of coal operations in the province of Nova Scotia, because the members would then have been able to see for themselves the actual conditions among the miners and could have had at a moment's notice any evidence which it would have been proper to bring before the tribunal. They sat, however, in the city of Halifax, and subsequently they made certain recommendations. That, of course, was the only thing they could do, because, as I understand it, neither the Labour people nor those who have put their capital in industrial enterprise in this country, wish to have compulsory arbitration; neither party wishes to be bound to accept the findings of an arbitration board. I remember that while discussing in Parliament, in 1912 or 1913, a coal strike in the province of British Columbia in which there had been an arbitration, the findings of which were very much in favour of the miners, I suggested that it might be well if there were some way of enforcing the findings of that particular arbitration and of future arbitrations. But immediately I had letters from all of the large labour unions in this country telling me that while I had done them some service in bringing this matter before the House and the government of the day, the unions of this country were not in favour of compulsory arbitration and I think, perhaps, when everything is said and done, that they are taking the proper stand. So there is no way of enforcing the awards of a conciliation board.

The conciliation board that sat in Halifax brought in its findings, and I am not here to say whether those findings were or were not based on the evidence which came before the board. I understand that the Dominion Coal Company, at the request of members of the board, introduced as evidence the cost sheets of the company, and that the arbitrators had the right to go into these cost sheets and ascertain for themselves just what it was costing the Dominion Coal Company to mine coal. With that and other evidence before them I think the board should have been in a position to bring in very fair findings, but I am bound to say that some of the findings in detail do not seem to me to have been well thought out. However, I am not here to criticise the findings of that board. The mine workers refused to accept the recommendations of that board, and the Dominion Coal Company, which is part of the British Empire Steel Corporation, went into further conferences with the men, through the executive of the United Mine Workers of America, to which organization the miners of Nova Scotia belong. Conferences took place in the city of Montreal, and after some time a majority of that board agreed to certain proposals made by representatives of the Dominion Coal Company. I think the executive board, while in the city of Montreal, consisted of seven members, and four of that executive representing the United Mine Workers, signed a statement that the additional proposals of the Dominion Coal Company should be recommended to the good judgment of the miners of Nova Scotia and accepted by them as a working agreement until such time as further negotiations could take place. The recommendation was sent to various labour councils in the province of Nova Scotia, and a vote was taken upon it, but, strange to say, a week or so before the miners were to vote on the acceptance of that proposed agreement the executive of the United Mine Workers of America broke over it, and we found three members of the United Mine Workers, the secretary-treasurer and two district board representatives, going out among the miners in the various coal centres of Nova Scotia exhorting them not to accept the working arrangement which had been agreed to by a majority of the board in the city of Montreal. We also find those who favoured the agreement proposed by the company going out and opposing their brothers of the executive, and advising the miners of Nova Scotia to accept the proposals of the Dominion Coal Company. However, the result was that the miners, by an extremely large majority—I think seven to one—voted to turn down the agreement, and said they were not going to work under it. I want to point out that the proposals of the Dominion Coal Company and the arrangement which formed the basis of the agreement arrived at in the city of Montreal did increase the wages of the datal men beyond what were recommended by the members of the conciliation board, although the increase was small it is true. The wage, which had been cut down to $2.68, was increased to $3. Under the recommendations of the board it would have been $2.85. So that a minimum wage of $3 was established for these men who are not paid by contract but on a basis of what is ordinarily termed piece work. However, the agreement, as I have said, was turned down, and so the miners of Nova Scotia have reverted, as far as their wages are concerned, to the findings of the conciliation board of which Mr. Gillen of Toronto was chairman; and they are in a worse position than they would have been had they accepted the further proposals contemplated by the agreement entered into by the operators and by a majority of the board.

Knowing the career in this country of my hon. friend (Mr. Irvine) who moved the adjournment, I know that he is wholeheartedly in favour of the labour people of this country getting a fair show. So am I, Sir; that is the position I have taken ever since I first participated in the politics of this country, and even before that. Now the trouble seems to be that, so far as legislation enacted by this Parliament is concerned, there remains nothing else to be done, and the federal government has refused to appoint a royal commission to consider the question. My hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) has stated that the United Mine Workers have done everything they could to cause the Government of Nova Scotia to act, but without avail. I can tell my hon. friend that he is somewhat mistaken in that statement. I have kept in the very closest touch with the situation since coming here, and I am aware that last week the Minister of Mines for Nova Scotia, Hon. Mr. Armstrong, wired Mr. Baxter, who is president of the United Mine Workers of America in that district, inviting him to come to Halifax,—and I may say in passing that Mr. Baxter is one of those who recommended to the miners under his charge, the adoption of the agreement entered into in Montreal. At a joint meeting held in the New Savoy theatre in Glace Bay last Sunday night, at which Mr. McLachlan, the secretary-treasurer, and Mr. Baxter, the president—who are taking opposite sides on this matter—were present, Mr. Baxter made the statement that Mr. Armstrong, provincial Minister of Mines, informed him that if the miners in the district would go back to work and not loaf on the job—as they were advised to do and as I think they are doing to some extent—he would appoint a royal commission to investigate the whole coal mine situation in the province of Nova Scotia. I am sorry to say that, according to my advices and instructions from that meeting his recommendations in effect were turned down. My hon. friend from East Calgary says that the coal miners have exhausted all their appeals so far as the government of Nova Scotia is concerned. Well, I want to point out that there is on the statute books of Nova Scotia the best piece of legislation—in so far as arbitration between miners and operators is concerned—that could possibly exist. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it excels, far excels, what is commonly called the Lemieux Act, or Conciliation Act, of the Dominion under which conciliation boards are held. I want to point out that this legislation is embodied in Chapter 21 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, 1900. Now, there is no appeal from an arbitration board instituted under Dominion legislation; there is no way of compelling either party to the negotiations to accept the recommendations of the conciliation board; there is no higher tribunal to which either party may appeal. May I point out that under the arbitration provided for between miners and employers in Nova Scotia, if those on either side do not agree with the finding of the arbitrators, they may appeal to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia consisting of seven judges—who have always been, and I believe yet are, eminently fair men.

Mr. IRVINE: What is the government of Nova Scotia doing in this matter? And is it the case that certain members of that government are shareholders in this particular corporation?

Mr. CARROLL: Answering my hon. friend's second question first, permit me to say that I do not know who the shareholders in the British Empire Steel Corporation are. However, I can take my hon. friend into my confidence and tell him that, happily, I am not one. In reply to his other question let me remind him that I have already stated what the Minister of Mines in Nova Scotia was willing to do if the miners would come to the conclusion that they would give a fair day's work for the wages which they were receiving. That communication was made to the miners through Mr. Baxter, President of the Union, at a mass meeting in Glace Bay on last Sunday evening, and was turned down by that meeting. In further answer to my hon. friend I may say that the government of Nova Scotia does not take the initiative under the provincial legislation to which I refer; the initiation must be taken either by the employees, that is, the miners, or the operators. They must make application to the Minister of Mines of the province, and if he is satisfied that they have established a good case he will grant a board. The men appoint two arbitrators and the operators appoint two and—as is usual in other arbitration cases—if they do not agree a judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia appoints the fifth arbitrator. Whatever may be said of the present or past Ministers of Labour of Canada, whatever may be said as to the character and political affiliations of the men whom they have appointed as chairman of these conciliation boards—whose appointment is part of the minister's duty—surely little fault can be found with a provision that a judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia shall appoint the fifth arbitrator of a provincial board. And in that respect I say the act governing arbitration between miners and employees in the province of Nova Scotia is away ahead of the legislation which has been passed by this government in the Lemieux Act.

I am not going to criticise the leaders in Nova Scotia who think they are properly advising the men when they ask them to strike on the job. That is a matter for the executive of the United Mine Workers of Nova Scotia, and I suppose they know their business better than I do. But I think it passing strange that the executive of the United Mine Workers of the province of Nova Scotia have been so poorly advised by these legal lights who have been giving them legal advice in the past two years, that they have not yet been informed that there is such a magnificent piece of legislation upon the statute book of Nova Scotia to arbitrate and settle wage disputes. Neither am I here to say, Mr. Speaker, anything concerning the telegraphic communications between Mr. McLachlan, the Secretary-Treasurer of the United Mine Workers, and my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). That is their business. But something should be done to attempt, at least to bring those people together again.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. CARROLL: I say that I believe—and I am not saying this on account of the fact that Mr. McLachlan and myself had some little controversies over politics in the last election—that Mr. McLachlan broke faith with the executive after he left Montreal, and he broke faith with the executive when he went down to Nova Scotia and did not assist them in putting through the agreement which was reached there. I believe that the miner, in common with every other class of labour in this country, is entitled to a fair and living wage. I think I can go so far as to say that there are some classes of labour in the province of New Brunswick, as in other parts of the Dominion of Canada, who are not paid a fair or living wage.

I did not know this discussion was coming up to-day. While my hon. friend from East Calgary was perfectly within his right in moving adjournment in order to discuss this matter, I am sorry he did not give notice of the discussion. He was perfectly in order in the course he has taken, and he did give notice to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). I regret that I did not have some time to prepare myself on the various phases on the findings of the conciliation board. As a matter of fact, I think the findings of the conciliation board were somewhat worse than described by the hon gentleman from East Calgary. Not only was there a cut of 22½ per cent on the wages which certain men were receiving, but the 55 cents which was granted to those men by a previous board was taken off. It meant 22 per cent in some cases, plus 55 cents. In other cases it meant a 15 per cent cut plus 55 cents. Those getting $3.80 before, got more as a result of the findings of the arbitration board than did those who were getting $4. These were some of the little inconsistencies of findings of the board, and, perhaps that was the reason why the Dominion Coal Company went into further negotiations after that finding had been made.

I might tell the House, in reference to the question of loafing on the job—I forget the other word; oh, yes, sabotage—that that is where the war is on between the Dominion Coal Company and the men at the present time. The Dominion Coal Company tell the men: "You know what you are going down into the mine for. You know when you go into the mine you are going to receive $3.00 a day, and we want you to do a good day's work for that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman enlighten me on a certain point? I have been informed that the great body of the men, indeed all the coal miners, are what we always called piece-workers, who received so much a ton. Therefore, they only get as much pay as they earn, whether they follow the order of which he complains, or whether they do as they did before. Consequently, how does he describe that as "loafing on the job?"

Mr. CARROLL: I think my right hon. friend is right. I think about 70 per cent of the employees are datal men at the present time. They receive so much a day. The remainder of the men get so much for the amount of coal taken out. Those are the men who work at the face of the mine. Hon. gentlemen who are familiar with mining know what that means. But the men who dig the coal and blow out the coal, are all paid by what they produce, and those are the men who are hurt by loafing on the job. They will not loaf on a job. It is in their interests to produce all the coal they can. The more coal they produce the more money will be in the envelope on Saturday evening. But the men who take the coal from those producers, and get it to the top of the mine, are paid not less than $3 a day. It does not make a bit of difference whether they take out one ton or twenty tons, they get their $3. In that way the war is to this effect; that the men are trying to enhance the cost of production in order to bring the Dominion Coal Company to their knees and get better terms. As my right hon. friend says, the only men who suffer are those who produce the coal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are they not parties to the arrangement by which they produce only so much? And are not the other men reduced by the company to such numbers as will only take care of the production of piece-work men?

Mr. CARROLL: I was coming to that. If a datal man refuses to carry the produce of the mines to the surface, he is immediately dismissed; and my latest advice from the mines last Tuesday was that 96 such men have already been dismissed from two mines of the Dominion Coal Company, who operate twenty-three or twenty-four mines in that area. Now, regarding watered stock, if what the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) has said is correct, it is a most unfortunate thing that a corporation operating a basic industry should secure an act of incorporation by which they could have $1,000,000 or $2,000,000, or, as my hon. friend has said, $19,000,000 of watered stock. I think the time has come when legislatures and the federal Parliament of Canada should say to such people: So far shall you go, but no further. I do not know how much watered stock the British Empire Steel Corporation has, but my hon. friend has stated that they have so many millions. A man does not need to be able to read or write to see that if there is $2,000,000 of watered stock in a company, when the accountant goes over the books to see how much they can pay their employees and get fair dividends for the money invested in the business, the men will have the worst of the bargain and will get lower wages than if the capital of the company consisted in actual dollars duly paid into the coffers of the corporation.

As regards the investigation into the affairs of this company, I fully agree with certain members of the Government, with whom I have discussed the matter, that if there is anything wrong in the company's organization, if it has any watered stock—

I have no reference to their votes—it is the duty of the government of Nova Scotia, not of this Parliament, to investigate the matter. I do not think that the federal Parliament should investigate the affairs of a company incorporated under the laws of a province. I am reminded by my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Martell) that it is not only the duty, but it would be to the material advantage of the province of Nova Scotia, to make every effort possible to bring about a settlement of this unfortunate difficulty. On every ton of coal produced by the Dominion Coal Company in Nova Scotia the local government receives a royalty of 12½ cents, and if the output of coal falls off it is obvious that the revenue of the province must decline. And, while I in no way represent any member of the provincial government and do not speak for any member of the Provincial Assembly or the Legislative Council of Nova Scotia, I feel that if an application were made to the Government of the province, under the provisions of Chapter 21 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, 1900, and the men did their part while the negotiations were in progress, and stopped loafing, the government of the province would jump at the chance of giving them a board under that statute. I am saying this not so much in answer to my hon. friend, because I am not attempting to answer him, since I think he and I feel much the same way about the matter. But I am trying to show that the mine workers of Nova Scotia have not taken the opportunity of having their difficulties settled under the local statute and by a government which must of necessity be deeply concerned if the production of coal is curtailed.

I am deeply interested in this dispute because of its public importance. It not only affects 12,000 coal miners in Nova Scotia, but, as well, every man and woman in the province living east of the county of Hants. In the county of Cape Breton, at Sydney, we have a great steel corporation which employs 8,000 or 10,000 men, and if the coal industry goes down the steel industry will naturally die, because there is an agreement between the Dominion Steel Company and the Dominion Coal Company whereby the former gets its coal for practically nothing. The dispute, therefore, not only affects the 12,000 miners to whom reference has been made, but it affects 9,000 steel workers in Sydney, 3,000 or 4,000 more steel workers at Sydney Mines, and 3,000 or 4,000 steel workers in the county of Pictou. Furthermore, it affects the bread and butter of every man living in the vicinity of these large industrial concerns. For these reasons I believe that the government of Nova Scotia will do everything in its power, when the proper procedure is followed, to get the miners of Nova Scotia and the operators together to discuss the difficulty under the provisions of the Act I have cited. I know what I am talking about, because Mr. Armstrong sent to the president of the United Mine Workers a message which was delivered to the coal miners in the town of Glace Bay last Sunday evening, to the effect that if peace reigned for the time being he would institute a royal commission to investigate and re-canvass the whole coal mining situation in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend says, "If peace reigns once more." I do not know just what he means by that.

Mr. CARROLL: If peace should reign for the time being, I said. Mr. Armstrong sent a message to the president of the United Mine Workers asking them to proceed for the time being and get as much production as they could, and that he would then institute a royal commission. But I would say to the mining population of Nova Scotia that as a lawyer I would give them this advice: Do not ask the Government for a royal commission, because the findings of that commission, whether they are against you or are in your favour, cannot be enforced, and you have no appeal from them. Go to a board, the chairman of which is appointed by a judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, the findings of which, if against you, can be reviewed by five of the Supreme Court judges of the province. If that procedure is followed I believe that the miners will get a fair deal and that peace will reign once more in the mining areas.

I am deeply concerned from the personal standpoint in the early solution of this difficulty, because if the trouble continues it will mean that the large industrial centres which have grown up in the locality during the past twenty years, and of which we are all proud, will decline, and the population will ultimately have to get out. Further, it will mean that the provincial government will be unable to carry on its legitimate business because it will lose the royalties, amounting to millions of dollars, which are now being paid by the Dominion Coal Company and other corporations. It will also entail untold sorrow, trouble and suffering to the men and their families, and that to my mind is the most serious feature of the situation. I hope it is true that the delegation has been advised by the Government that no royal commission will be appointed at the present time. This morning I conferred with the four mayors —very estimable gentlemen—and I told them of the Arbitration Act, and I advised them to go back to Nova Scotia, and get the miners to instruct their lawyers to put that law into operation.

I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, for having taken up so much time, but this is a serious matter and must be settled without further delay. Whether it will be settled by the authorities of Nova Scotia or by the federal authorities, it must be settled, for we cannot afford to have a continuance of the situation which prevails in Nova Scotia at the present time. I am not going to say whose fault it is that the present conditions exist, I am not going to offer any criticism of the parties to the dispute. I am here simply to outline in a general way the causes and the results of that unfortunate misunderstanding between capital and labour, and to advise, if I may, those interested how, to my mind, the misunderstanding may be settled. Having done that, and having assisted the delegation in every possible way, I hope, Sir, that this House will at least feel that I have done my duty as I see it.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) did not advise me—no doubt through an oversight —that he proposed to bring this matter up to-day. It is, however, only fair to say that a newspaper gentleman, a friend of mine, notified me at ten minutes past one. I am indeed glad that this question has been brought to the notice of the House, because I find that hon. gentlemen in this chamber and elsewhere appear to be, and quite rightly, very much interested in this grave situation as it concerns the miners and other citizens of Nova Scotia.

The commencement of the dispute between the miners and the British Empire Steel Corporation and other employing coal companies was prior to the 29th December last when I became Minister of Labour.

My predecessor, Hon Mr. Robertson—a gentleman for whom, by the way, I have always had and still have the greatest admiration and respect as a representative of labour and as an exponent, so far as his understanding goes, of the proper aims, and ambitions, and contentions of labour, —took the initiative in dealing with the situation, as was quite proper that he should do. He had instituted a board of investigation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, and appointed to it Mayor Ling, of New Waterford, one of the delegation of Nova Scotia mayors now in Ottawa, to whom my hon. friend from East Calgary has referred. On the declination by the company to name a representative my predecessor also appointed a Mr. Thompson of Halifax. So I came into office as his successor to find the board formed thus far and waiting for the appointment of a chairman. It was my first appointment of a chairman of a board of investigation, and I have no regrets to express or apologies to offer for my choice of chairman. Indeed, if I had it to do again I would make the same choice.

In the light of certain suggestions that have been made during the past few days by the deputation from Nova Scotia and by certain hon. members, the belief might be indicated that the board should have been instructed to go on the ground and investigate at first hand all the facts and circumstances in connection with the everyday life of these miners, and of the organization of the British Empire Steel Corporation.

But the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act contemplates giving some latitude, to a reasonable board of investigation appointed to inquire into a matter of this kind. As I understand it, it has not been considered altogether proper for the Minister of Labour to suggest to any such board just how or in what manner or where they should conduct their investigation with a view to arriving at a proper decision. The board, as has been stated, was formed, and while it was in session I presumed to send to Nova Scotia a very capable officer of the department in order that he might go on the ground in the mining towns of Cape Breton and ascertain what the actual conditions were. At that particular time much publicity was given in the press to the statement that riots had broken out, that stores of the Dominion Coal Company had been robbed, and that, on the whole, a very serious situation had arisen. It was intimated that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should be sent down there to assist in bringing order out of chaos. But so far as I was concerned I felt that nothing of the kind should be done, I did believe that as Minister of Labour I was entitled to have from a trusted employee of the department a first-hand statement as to the actual conditions prevailing in the mining villages of Nova Scotia. I am sorry to say that I must have been too presumptuous in sending a federal employee to that district and in that capacity, because when he got to Halifax he was given to understand, in substance, that he had better mind his own business and get back to Ottawa. I wired him, however, to proceed forthwith, and to furnish a report with regard to the conditions in the various mining towns.

The first result of the investigation was that Mayor Ling, one of the deputation of Nova Scotia mayors now in our city and representative of the miners on the board could not agree with the other two members, Mr. U. E. Gillen, of Toronto, chairman, and Mr. Thompson, representative of the British Empire Steel Corporation. It seemed to have been impossible to arrive at a unanimous understanding, consequently a majority and a minority award were filed with the department. The majority award was very voluminous indeed. It is about half an inch thick, comprising typewritten matter, and covers the entire situation as the chairman and the representative of the company saw it. The report of the majority was accepted by the General Manager of the British Empire Steel Corporation. The representatives of the employees declared that they would submit the matter to the men, which was very proper. I wish now to take you through a few of the stages in connection with the handling of the matter since that time, in order that you may see whether this Government; whether this department; whether this youthful, and, in a parliamentary way, inexperienced Minister of Labour,—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MURDOCK: Admitted, before you applauded. I want you to see whether we have stood ready, in season and out of season, day and night, to do anything constitutionally possible to secure for these men in Nova Scotia a fair day's pay for a fair day's work. I hope that no hon. member of this House, that no individual throughout the length and breadth of Canada, has any doubt as to where my sympathies are in the matter of securing for the labouring man a fair day's pay for a fair day's work. But I am not ready to concede now, nor shall I be in the months and years to come, that if—

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. MURDOCK: The Toronto Telegram, you know, said that the Murdock voice could reach to the farthest corner of any hall. I would not like to have anybody come to me after the House rises and intimate that he had been unable to hear me.

I am not ready to concede now, nor shall I be in the months and years to come, that the belief on the part of some employees or their representatives that a fair day's wage has not been given justifies their pretending to work for an employer at that particular wage while at the same time declaring to the world that they are going to cut the output and thus penalize the employer. I have never, in something like twenty-five or twenty-six years' experience as a labouring man and as a representative of labour, held that view, and I do not now, as Minister of Labour, intend to hold it or to follow any such policy.

Shortly after we were able to get the majority and minority awards in such shape that they could be given to the parties concerned, we received from Mr. McLachlan copy of a letter addressed to Mr. E. P. Merrill, general manager of the Dominion Coal Company, dated February 6, reading as follows:

> This is to acknowledge receipt of your favour of the 4th inst., stating that your Company is prepared to accept the finding of the U. E. Gillen Conciliation Board with certain minor adjustments to preserve rate differentials not fully covered by the wording of the award.
> Replying I wish to state that the question of accepting or rejecting the award shall be voted on by our people on the 10th instant. However, in order that they may know the attitude of your Company, I shall mail to-day to each local union a copy of your letter for their information. In the absence of the other members of the Executive Board and using my own best judgment I shall be unable to recommend to the local unions the acceptance of your offer as a settlement of this wage dispute.
> I am,
> Yours truly,
> J. B. McLachlan.

As I see it, that letter is couched in absolutely proper and consistent language. I blame not at all Mr. McLachlan for coming out frankly, in man-fashion, and indicating to Mr. Merrill, the general manager, that he could not recommend the acceptance of the award to the miners. He had a perfect right to do that. Let us proceed to further developments.

Under date of February 17, Mr. McLachlan wrote another letter to Mr. E. P. Merrill as follows:

> Replying further to your letter dated February 4, 1922, I wish to advise you that the members of District No. 26, United Mine Workers of America voted on the award made by the Gillen Conciliation Board and the vote resulted as follows: for the Award, 468; against the Award, 10,305; all of which means that the proposition made in your letter of the 4th instant has been overwhelmingly rejected by the miners.

No doubt your Company must feel by this time that a great mistake was made in Montreal when your officers informed the representatives of the miners that the Company would now look after its own interest and refused to allow negotiations to proceed along the legitimate lines followed with fair success during recent wage contracts. The almost unanimous condemnation by the press, the pulpit and the public of the drastic action of your Company in slashing the miners' wages in the manner you did, and the complete alienation of the sympathies of some of your own most loyal officials must indicate that the day has gone forever when one-sided wage bargains can be made effective.

When men have made such mistakes as your Company has made, mistakes which have brought down on their heads wholesale condemnation, there is only one thing left open for them to do, pocket their pride, and retrace the fatal steps at the first opportunity and remove the cause of the condemnation.

The miners are having a convention in Truro on the 23rd instant, and I would suggest that the coal companies comprised in the British Empire Steel Corporation send representatives there for the purpose of negotiating a new wage agreement. Until a wage agreement is arrived at mutually I cannot see where your Company can reasonably hope to have any stability in the coal industry of Nova Scotia.

Trusting that your representatives can be present at Truro on the 23rd instant, I am,

Yours truly,

J. B. McLachlan,
Secretary, District No. 22, U.M.W. of A.

Once more I express the view that there is nothing wrong whatsoever in the statements made by Mr. McLachlan in that letter. Had I been in his position under the existing circumstances, I might have written more insistently even than he did.

Then, under date of February 22, the Minister of Labour, new on the job, was interested in trying to see if something could not be done, and so he wired Mr. J. B. McLachlan, who was to be at Truro with the other representatives of District No. 26 the following day, as follows:

Your letter seventeenth enclosing copy of communication same date forwarded to General Manager Dominion Coal Company not received until to-day. Terms of same noted, also fact that miners are holding convention at Truro, Thursday, twenty-third, and have invited British Empire Steel Corporation to send representatives for purpose of negotiating new wage agreement. Minister will be pleased to have word from you at your earliest convenience as to outcome of any efforts in direction indicated.

To that the reply was as follows, under date of February 23:

Telegram received. No coal operators present here. Would be pleased to have Department use good offices looking towards settlements. Convention may continue until Saturday.

At once I instructed the deputy minister to send the following telegram, dated February 23:

D. H. McDougall, Vice President, British Empire Steel Corporation, Montreal.

Minister asks me to bring to your attention communications exchanged between J. B. McLachlan, Secretary District 26 United Mine Workers of America, Glace Bay, and the undersigned. Mr. McLachlan forwarded under date 17th instant copy of letter mailed same date to Mr. E. P. Merrill, General Manager Dominion Coal Company, Sydney, N. S., notifying Mr. Merrill that miners were having convention in Truro on 23rd instant and suggested that "coal companies comprising the British Empire Steel Corporation send representatives there for the purpose of negotiating a new wage agreement." On receipt yesterday of Mr. McLachlan's letter following wire was by Minister's instructions addressed by undersigned to Mr. McLachlan:

"Your letter seventeenth enclosing copy of communication same date forwarded to General Manager, Dominion Coal, not received until to-day. Terms of same noted, also fact that miners are holding convention at Truro, Thursday, twenty-third, and have invited British Empire Steel Coroporation to send representatives for purpose of negotiating new wage agreement.

"Minister will be pleased to have word from you at your earliest convenience as to outcome of any efforts in direction indicated."

To-day undersigned is in receipt of message from McLachlan as follows:

"Telegram received. No coal operators present here. Would be pleased to have Department use good offices looking towards settlement. Convention may continue until Saturday."

Minister observes Mr. McLachlan's statement that, "no coal operators present here" and asks if you do not think would be desirable Company should take steps immediately to be represented at miners' convention, accepting workmen's invitation, and thus doing its part in endeavouring to negotiate a wage settlement. Minister will be pleased to have word from you.

To that Mr. D. H. McDougall replied by wire as follows:

MONTREAL, February 25, 1922.

In reply to your telegram yesterday would state we mailed Department 10th instant copy of our letter fourth offering to negotiate contract with our mine workers on basis Award of Gillen Conciliation Board appointed by Minister at request of mine workers, and also copy of J. B. McLachlan's reply. This reply, together with McLachlan's letter to our General Manager Merrill, under date seventeenth, inviting us to send representatives to mine workers' convention at Truro (being a further reply to our letter fourth) we regard as being merely expression McLachlan's personal opinions and not as authorized official communications from District 26.

Said communications have been written by McLachlan in absence of President Baxter and other responsible executive officials in attendance on Indianapolis convention.

Truro convention is being held for purpose of considering offer made in our letter of fourth, and we understand is confined to officials and delegates of union. We anticipate that when matter has been discussed in convention a further official communication may be addressed to us outlining the attitude the executive officials of the union are empowered to take in regard to further negotiations with the coal companies.

In the meantime, as notified you by letter from our general manager under date twenty-first instant, we have put into effect the Gillen award with some necessary adjustments that have substantially modified the award in favour of the mine workers and are making retroactive payment to January first of difference in rates of wages betwen our schedule of January first, and the schedule as modified by Gillen award.

D. H. McDOUGALL.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with some of the later phases of this condition. On the same date, February 25, we received a telegram from Mr. E. H. Armstrong, Minister of Public Works and Mines of Nova Scotia, as follows:

Personal. Truro convention to consider action miners re Gillen award. Requested further conference with officials Besco Monday next but am advised no answer. Have just wired McDougall and Wolvin urging favourable and prompt consideration. Believe under all circumstances this course advisable and will bring about more satisfactory solution. Appreciate any co-operation you can reasonably suggest.

E. H. ARMSTRONG,
Minister of Public Works and Mines.

At once we took the matter up with a view to getting a representative of the Labour Department to see if a further conference could not be brought about. The later developments were that the representatives of the miners came from Truro to Montreal to meet the officials of the British Empire Steel Corporation, and I want to read to you a report made to the Deputy Minister of Labour by the gentleman representing the Labour Department who was present at that meeting. It is as follows:

MONTREAL, March 2, 1922.

F. A. ACLAND, Esq.,
Deputy Minister of Labour,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Acland,—I enclose for record, text of the agreement reached between the United Mine Workers of Nova Scotia, through Robert Baxter, president, and committee, and the British Empire Steel Corporation and constituent companies, represented by Mr. D. H. McDougall.

The agreement was negotiated in Montreal by a conference extending over a period of three days, i.e., Feb. 27th and 28th, and March 1st.

The department representative, E. McG. Quirk, was present at the conferences and assisted in an intermediary capacity.

Mr. J. P. White, of the International, was present in an advisory capacity, rendering very material assistance.

The sense of the agreement will be submitted to the locals for ratification. When ratified the company will be prepared to resume operations on an increased scale.

Yours truly,
E. McG. QUIRK.

The text of the agreement which is referred to in that communication is as follows:

MONTREAL, 1st March, 1922.

The members of district executive board of District 26, U.M.W. of A., having been authorized by a district conference held in Truro, February 23 to 25 to interview the management of the British Empire Steel Corporation and ascertain the best terms the management could offer as a basis for a settlement of the outstanding wage questions, the following was finally mutually agreed to:

First.—The management has already accepted and put into effect—

Mr. CRERAR: Do I understand that Mr. McLachlan was present at this conference in Montreal?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: And did he concur in the agreement you are about to read?

Mr. MURDOCK: I may say to my hon. friend from Marquette that the agreement is signed, on behalf of District No. 26 by Robert Baxter, who, I understand, is president. My understanding further is that Mr. McLachlan and other members of the executive committee were present, and I think that point will be proven a little later. To continue with the reading of the agreement:

—the rates recommended under the Gillen award, and, in addition thereto, has voluntarily made an adjustment of the datal rates between the minimum rate of $2.85 per day and certain other slightly higher rates, and agrees to increase the minimum datal rate to $3 per day.

2. The companies will not object to inclusion in this wage agreement of employees in the general machine shops and shot-firers employed at the collieries.

A committee equally composed of representatives of the coal companies and the men to decide on what others of the employees, excluded on January 1st, should be included in the scope of the agreement.

3. The conditions of the Montreal agreement to remain in force in all particulars except as regards the rates of wages and as herein modified.

The terms above written to become effective between the 1st January, 1922, and 30th November, 1922, when ratified by members of District 26, both sides to agree to meet twenty days before the expiration of the agreement, for the purpose of arranging a new understanding.

On behalf of District No. 26, U.M.W. of America,

ROBERT BAXTER.
DOMINION COAL COMPANY, LIMITED,
R. M. Wolvin, President.
NOVA SCOTIA STEEL & COAL COMPANY, LIMITED,
D. H. McDougall, President.
ACADIA COAL COMPANY, LIMITED,
D. H. McDougall, Vice-President.

Dated at Montreal, 1st March, 1922.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know what the fact is, but one would rather gather that the men's representatives at that meeting numbered seven and that four of them were in favour of the offer which the minister has read, but that three, including Mr. McLachlan, were against it.

Mr. MURDOCK: My understanding is that at that particular meeting there were not seven; I think only three or four of the district officers came up for the purposes of this meeting, although my hon. friend is probably correct in understanding that there are eight officers of the district committee. Recently these eight officers took official action in connection with Mr. McLachlan's proposal to cut the output or "loaf on the job," the result being that three of the committee went with Mr. McLachlan and three against him. The papers indicate that some of them have since resigned. Mr. Baxter, who occupied the chair as president, did not vote. We can therefore reasonably and properly assume that the mine workers' executive committee of eight was evenly divided, four against four, on the proposition to cut the output or "loaf on the job." It seems that the agreement, which was tenatively entered into at Montreal as between representatives of the miners and representatives of the coal companies, was carried back to secure the votes of the individual miners, as to acceptance or rejection. I find no fault with the manner in which certain organizations or committees representing workmen undertake to deal with such questions, but, fortunately or unfortunately, my experience has been, in the representation of labour, that when an agreement was entered into and determined upon as satisfactory by the representatives of workmen, it should not be held as a football, to be kicked here and there, and decided out in the open by various individuals, even although some of my good friends and others will tell you they had a perfect right to do that. The point is that here was an agreement which, on the first day of March, in the city of Montreal, in the opinion of those directly representing the Miners' Association, was something better than had been conceded by the Gillen award, and something that could reasonably offer a basis of settlement. You and I know that, when that committee representing the workers went back to the miners of Nova Scotia, they were divided in their recommendations to these workmen and their families as to whether that award should be accepted or not. I am not criticizing that, but I regard it as indeed a distinct misfortune that it should have been found possible and consistent to make an agreement in Montreal on the first day of March that could not have been made by the board of arbitration sitting in Halifax some two weeks earlier. I do not know why it was that the direct representatives of these coal companies met in Montreal on the first day of March and offered more favourable conditions, some slight increases in compensation over and above what, evidently, their representatives on the board of investigation had been prepared and disposed to give when the matter was being dealt with in Halifax. It is one of the unfortunate circumstances in connection with this situation that it was possible to do that, and it is one of the phases of the situation that has given much ground and opportunity for alleging that boards of investigation, under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, are weak and useless in dealing with matters of this kind. It is a misfortune it was done at that particular time. I would like to deal with a few of the references made by my hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) in regard to this situation. In his opening remarks as I understood him, he told this House—and I am sure he will correct me if I am wrong—that the wages of the miners of Nova Scotia were 70 per cent lower than the wages for similar work in the mines of British Columbia and Alberta.

5 p.m.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Seventeen per cent, I think.

Mr. MURDOCK: I understood 70 per cent.

Mr. IRVINE: It was 71.

Mr. MURDOCK: We were both wrong.

Mr. IRVINE: I said the cost of living was 17 per cent higher in Nova Scotia, and the wages 71 per cent lower.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am obliged for the correction. I am quite sure that the hon. gentleman had not the slightest intention of presenting an inaccurate conception of facts to this House, but what are the facts? As my hon. friend from East Calgary know, the facts in regard to the mines in District 18, British Columbia and Alberta, are that notification has been given by the operators in that territory that wages will be brought down very materially, effective on Saturday morning next, April 1. So that my hon. friend's statement, which would indicate that the wages of miners in Alberta and British Columbia are 71 per cent higher than in Nova Scotia, is far-fetched indeed. I am sure he will concede that as a matter of fact.

Mr. IRVINE: Can the hon. minister tell me if the proposed reduction in wages has been accepted by the miners of Alberta?

Mr. MURDOCK: The answer to my hon. friend's question is, no, but according to the proposals of the operators in District 18, effective on Saturady morning next, wage cuts of materially lower standards than those that have, under war time and post-war conditions existed in that territory are, it is said, to go into effect. What is the comparison of those wages that have been posted as going into effect on Saturday morning with the wages we are discussing for datal men in Nova Scotia? In British Columbia and Alberta the wage for datal men is proposed at $3.25 for the lower standards of pay, as against the wage rate agreed to in Montreal on March 1, between the representatives of United Mine Workers and the officials of Nova Scotia companies. I do not hold for one moment that $3 or $3.25 is a living wage under certain conditions, and do not let any hon. gentleman in this House, or any gentleman outside of this House, understand that I am contending anything of the kind. I take the position that it is hardly fair for us to undertake to influence hon. gentlemen in this House, or the public at large, and to create the belief that there is such a wide margin of difference as between Nova Scotia and Alberta and British Columbia.

Mr. IRVINE: Is it not perfectly fair for us to take into consideration in this comparison the actual wages that are being paid now in Nova Scotia with the actual wages that are being paid in Alberta? If that is not the proper way to consider it, what other method can we adopt?

Mr. MURDOCK: I will leave the question of the equity or the fairness of that method of presenting the question to be determined in the minds of hon. members of this House. The hon. gentleman from Calgary, as he spoke for to-day and to-morrow, was substantially, and, so far as I know, absolutely correct in his comparison of percentages as to wages. He may have been entirely correct for to-day and to-morrow, but I hope it will not be regarded as altogether improper for me to present, at least, the other point of view. Then my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Irvine) laid stress upon the minority report which was filed in this investigation held in Halifax. Personally I should have been happy indeed had it been possible, and consistent with due regard to the rights of employer, employed and, above all, the general public, to have suggested that the minority report as handed in to the department on this question by Mayor Ling, of New Waterford, should be adopted. But my hon. friend surely knows that the only authority that this Government has in dealing with such matters is to be found in the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. We had no option then, and surely have no option now, being bound by that law, to compel the findings of one man directly representing the employees to be made effective. And then my hon. friend said, if I quote his exact words, as I think I do: "The men naturally struck on the job." In all reverence I say, Heaven forbid that the time should ever come when it should be regarded as necessary by labouring men, accepting a wage of any kind, to strike on a job. Again I repeat, red-blooded Canadian citizens will never do any such thing; and anyone who undertakes to countenance any such suggestion is only looking to the ruin of the constitutional rights and liberties of the citizenship of this country. I myself regard it as a misfortune that anyone should stand in the councils of the nation, and, even by inference or suggestion, convey the view that there is anything fair, honourable or decent in striking on the job. One of the greatest misfortunes that have existed in years gone by, and one that is with us at this moment in Canada, is the theorist who has cures for all the ills of labour, some of which contemplate being as indecent and unfair as may be necessary to win your point with the employer, while at the same time accepting the full demonstration of charity and decent treatment for yourself. Forget it, I say, to the labouring man or his representative who advocates such a policy. Even if any such policy might be desired by this Government or by the people of the country, I have more respect for my own conscience than to participate, even as a Minister of the Crown, in promulgating, or forwarding, or countenancing any such claim on the part of Labour directly or through anybody presuming to represent Labour. Labour has got to be fair and decent, and in case someone might form an improper opinion on the matter, let me say this: In the sixteen years or so that I was an officer of a labour organization, I personally gave sanction to more strikes than any other officer the organization had, and I have no apologies to offer for having done so; nor should I lose my nerve, either, if I were back at the job. But I believe there is decency and equity in all things; and it was not, nor is it now, decent for us to be dallying with the suggestion that the men "naturally struck on the job," while accepting, or pretending to work for, a wage rate, be it ever so small. I do not argue that it is sufficient. Personally, I regard it as a misfortune indeed that the British Empire Steel Corporation, out of the sum of $3,000,000 paid to them from the demobilization funds, by the party in power on the 25th of November last, could not have utilized a portion and given a little more decent consideration to these mine workers in Nova Scotia. But they have not done so. I assume that that $3,000,000 has gone to do what my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll) so well suggested, namely, to pay dividends on watered stock. I do not subscribe to any such thing, and so long as I may remain a member of this House or of the Government, my voice will be lifted and my effort directed against the continuation of such practices.

My hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Irvine) suggested to this House the name of a gentleman of Montreal, a Mr. Howard Ross, as eminently qualified to investigate this whole matter. It is rather peculiar that the gentleman who called me by telephone to advise me that this matter was coming up this afternoon also suggested the name of Mr. Howard Ross. I have not the honour of the acquaintance of Mr. Ross; he may be of the highest standing and the most responsible character in Canada; but, as a general proposition, I am not disposed, as Minister of Labour, to accept such recommendations coming in such a manner, because I have found by some experience that sometimes those who are sympathetic to labour make recommendations which are really favourable and consistent only from their own point of view. The representations made on behalf of Mr. Howard Ross, whoever the gentleman is, would unfortunately have made me suspicious of considering his appointment as possibly biased toward one side unduly, if anything of the kind had been contemplated.

My hon. friend referred to something about a fair day's work for a day's pay. I think that that is the entire question. It is true that a deputation from Nova Scotia mining towns came to this city and made representations to my honoured leader and other members of the Cabinet that a royal commission should be appointed. But I do not think that I am giving away any secrets when I say that those gentlemen, individually and collectively, advised us that they were speaking only for the citizens of their respective towns, who were not actually employed as miners, and that they could give no guarantee that even if a royal commission were appointed it would be accepted. Is that a fair view of the entire situation? In other words—and I do not want in any way to disparage the position of my hon. friend from East Calgary or those for whom he is speaking—is it fair for us to have suggested to us the appointment of a royal commission especially for the other citizens in these mining villages in face of the frank statement that maybe after the royal commission had thoroughly investigated the situation and made its recommendations the miners might not accept them? No, no, surely nothing so one-sided as that could be thought of for a minute.

My hon. friend from Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) referred to the opportunities for these miners to get the necessary co-operation and, I hope, some assistance from the provincial authorities if the proper steps were taken. Last night there was given to the press a statement of the position of the Government,—not a statement of the position of the Minister of Labour, please, although I whole-heartedly subscribe to every statement contained herein. For the sake of accuracy I want to include this statement in Hansard. It is as follows:

Ottawa, March 29th, 1922.

Yesterday a deputation, consisting of D. W. Morrison, Mayor of Glace Bay, J. M. McLean, Mayor of Dominion, N. S., James Ling, Mayor of New Waterford, N. S., and Mayor Wilson of Spring Hill, Cumberland County, N. S., accompanied by Messrs. Carroll, Macdonald, Kyte, Chisholm and Logan, Members of Parliament for the various coal-mining constituencies of Nova Scotia, waited upon the Prime Minister, who was accompanied by the Hon. W. S. Fielding, Hon D. D. McKenzie and Hon. James Murdock. The deputation placed before the Government a memorial dealing with the alleged very serious situation existing in the coal mining industry in Nova Scotia, and suggested the appointment of a Royal Commission to go on the ground and thoroughly investigate the entire question affecting the coal mining industry and the alleged attitude of the British Empire Steel Corporation in dealing with its employees.

Careful consideration was promised and given to the representations made by the deputation who were advised that the decision of the Government would be stated as early as possible.

Under all circumstances the Government has deemed it inadvisable to appoint a Royal Commission. It should be understood that in its decision the Government has been influenced by the attitude of Mr. McLachlan, Secretary of the United Mine Workers of America, who has indicated his intent to insist on the employees in the coal-mining industry cutting the output and doing as little work as possible for the wages being paid. To grant a commission in view of the declarations and attitude of Mr. McLachlan would in the opinion of the Government be placing a premium on the advocacy of the methods most prejudicial to the public interest and unfair as respects relations between employer and employees. Press reports also indicate that the miners have repudiated advice as to reasonable and consistent loyalty to the employer from other representatives of the employees and have proposed that Mr. McLachlan should be regarded as the dictator of the miners' policy, which policy as outlined by Mr. McLachlan cannot in any measure be countenanced by the Government. The Government regrets exceedingly the alleged existing conditions in Nova Scotia, but cannot be a party to countenancing the position taken by Mr. McLachlan and others who are following his instructions.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, I wholeheartedly agree with every word contained in this statment. I think that labour, both in Nova Scotia and elsewhere, would be well advised to follow the principle, not merely to-day but all the time, of giving a fair day's work ungrudgingly for the wage accepted or that it is pretended to work for. I will countenance no other principle on the part of labour so-called so far as my responsibility or authority goes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Will the hon. Minister permit me a question? Apparently, according to the press reports, the information of the Government was that a number of the regular officers of the men had resigned. I should like to find out from my hon. friend what officers resigned and to whom they handed their resignations, so that we might have some idea of how the matter now stands.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am unable to give that information except as I have received it from press reports. When I made some reference to the resignation of certain members of the miners' executive committees a short time ago the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) shook his head at me, and therefore I assumed that he had some direct information showing that the press reports were not correct. I should like to ask him if he has any knowledge of whether any members of the executive committee of district No. 26 have resigned.

Mr. CARROLL: No, Mr. Speaker. I had a communication this morning from the town of Glace Bay to the effect that up to date none of them has resigned.

Mr. MURDOCK: We have had a rather extended discussion of this matter, which I have no doubt will not be entirely finished when I shall take my seat, but it seems to me an opportune time to give to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) certain information very closely connected with this matter as to which he made inquiries in the House yesterday, I think. My hon. friend wanted to know on Friday next—nothing like taking time by the forelock and getting into position as early as possible—

> When the Minister of Labour purported to give to the press written communications received by him from J. B. McLachlan of the United Mine Workers did he give such communications in full?

The answer is "Yes." The next question is:

> If not, why; and what is the text of the part omitted?

That is answered by the answer to the first question. But, for the information of the hon. member and because certain newspaper reporters appear to have thought it necessary to shield somewhat the Minister of Labour, I am going to read into Hansard the complete text of all these telegrams which I was not aware were not completely quoted in the press to-day. The House has the right to the complete context, and while of course I thank the gentlemen representing the press for being so considerate of me, I would say: Let the people have all the telegrams in full. The first telegram to Mr. McLachlan is dated the 18th inst.

> My attention has been called to a despatch appearing in to-day's Ottawa Journal dated from Sydney, and reading in part as follows: "The war is on, class war. In those words of a manifesto issued to-night, J. B. McLachlan, secretary of District 26, United Mine Workers, calls on the twelve thousand miners of Nova Scotia to join him in a policy of cutting the output as the most effective method of waging a labour war against the British Empire Steel Corporation." I have thought it well to bring the above statement to your attention, and should be obliged if you would let me have word immediately if any such document as is here outlined has been issued with your approval. I trust the published statement may prove to be without foundation, and take this opportunity, in any event, of expressing the hope that yourself and other officers and members of your organization will cast your influence definitely against any such policy as is indicated in the statement above quoted. You will, I think, on reflection agree with me that any strength which organized labour possesses at the present time is the result, not of the underhanded and dishonest methods of undercutting, or, as it is sometimes called, sabotage, but of straight and honest dealings, each worker giving the best that is in him for the wages agreed upon. Any union or trade practice which is not in absolute agreement with this principle will inevitably bring disaster, and workmen who unwisely allow themselves to be misled into the adoption of such methods will ultimately repudiate the leadership of those who have betrayed them. I trust I may receive from you an assurance that you are in sympathy with the view expressed in this message, and, since the despatch from which I have quoted and which has credited you with action on contrary lines has received much publicity I shall gladly do my best to see that any reply received from you by way of disavowal or otherwise receives equal prominence. I am handing this message to the press.

JAMES MURDOCK,
Minister of Labour.

And here is the full answer received, which my friend from Leeds (Mr. Stewart) wants to hear in its entirety:

GLACE BAY, N.S.,
March 20, 1922.

Hon. JAMES MURDOCK,
Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ont.

Replying to your lengthy telegram of Saturday, wish to state that in manifesto issued by me on the 16th instant, neither the thing known as sabotage nor the word itself were mentioned. Once, however, I did in that document strongly advise the miners to cut down production to a point where all profits for the British Empire Steel Corporation would vanish. This tactic as a method of retaliation for a highly unjust encroachment of the employers on the wages of their workmen and an invasion on an already all too slender living I have proclaimed openly and in the face of day and there is nothing dishonest about it, you to the contrary notwithstanding. I have preached this with the blessing of my friends and amid the curses of my enemies. I have preached it to individuals, to tens, to hundreds and to thousands. I have done it on land and on sea, in miners' halls and in churches, on the hillsides of Nova Scotia and on her busy streets, and Mr. Minister, what are you going to do about it? I shall do it again this week, knowing that a miner has a perfect right to work with his coat on if he wants to. But what kind of innocent or hypocrite are you? Did you not one year ago call a strike of the trainmen employed at the Sydney steel works, owned by the British Empire Steel Corporation, and did you not circularize the trainmen on the Sydney end of the Government railway to institute a blockade on all steel company products, and tell the trainmen to leave the cars with steel company goods in the sidings in the woods where there were no telegraph offices, and you made no exception to perishable goods? That was sabotage from top to bottom, from start to finish. Our method of fighting this unjust wage imposition is effective and within the law, and the prime reason why the stock gamblers of Montreal got you to wire a lecture to me is this: Listen—Caledonia Mine for the week ending December 16 hoisted 8,561 tons of coal at a labour cost of $2.02 per ton. That was before the cut in wages was made. Since the first of the year wages have been cut 32 per cent. For the week ending January 13 the labour cost per ton was $1.62; and then the miners refused to strip themselves naked to the waist, to give the best that is in them, as you put it, instead cut down production and for the week ending January 27 produced 2,322 tons at a labour cost of $2.25 per ton. Add on the other overhead charges on that miserable 2,000 tons of coal and you may be able to guess why the Hallelujah Chorus is ringing in the soul of the miners who are actively fighting an unjust wage, and why the stock gamblers at Montreal are reduced to seek the assistance of an innocent like you. There is no wage agreement of any kind here. The British Empire Steel Corporation is seeking to impose a rate as low as $2.85 per day and refuses to give men with that small wage anything like six days per week. They are imposing these miserable wages to enable them to pay dividends on huge blocks of watered stock and on acres of idle junk that they call steel works. We shall continue to fight the imposition of this iniquitous wage reduction, if we have to rock the ramshackle institution known as the British Empire Steel Corporation from its rotten sills to its bending and shaking rafters.

J. B. MCLACHLAN.

That is the telegram in full that the hon. member for Leeds desired.

Mr. HANSON: May I ask the hon. minister if he paid for that telegram? Was it sent "collect"?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, it came "collect." Now then, Mr. Speaker, I replied as follows, on March 21—

Mr. CHAPLIN: Did you send your reply "collect" also?

Mr. MURDOCK: "Charge to Labour Department—sundries."

J. B. McLachlan,
Secretary, District No. 26,
United Mine Workers of America,
Glace Bay, Nova Scotia.

Your telegram received and handed to the press. The written and actual record of the action authorized by the undersigned and others in connection with the strike of train and engine men in the steel works at Sydney in 1920 speaks for itself, and cannot be changed by any interpretation you may care to place on such action. Have no doubt whatever you have preached, as you say, so-called passive strike methods for some time, and still continue so to do. In my judgment it is un-British, un-

Canadian and cowardly to pretend to be working for a wage rate in effect while declaring to the world that only partial grudging service will be given. My experience has been that men quit like men and walk off the job when unwilling to work for wage rates or conditions offered, but the advice you give would place you and those who accept such advice surely in some other class. Be assured that the undersigned has no brief for or personal sympathy with certain methods adopted by the British Empire Steel Corporation, and I regard it now, as during the recent general election campaign, as one of Canada's tragedies that any corporation should appear to be able to undertake to dictate Government policy or to shape the course of public events to its own purposes. Two wrongs, however, do not make one right and red-blooded Canadian citizens will not, in my judgment, follow your advice in the pretense of loyally staying on the job for the purpose of penalizing the employer.

James Murdock,
Minister of Labour.

May I in conclusion say this. I, as Minister of Labour, would have been very glad indeed to do anything I could consistent with what I believe to be federal rights in such matters to assist in bringing order out of chaos and in securing a further consideration of this situation. The deputation of mayors which waited on us the day before yesterday suggested that the board of investigation should have visited all of the mines in Nova Scotia, and held their investigation on the ground. I have no doubt that that would have been very much the better way but Mr. Ling, the Mayor of New Waterford, and a member of that board, never by inference or otherwise conveyed such a desire or suggestion to the Labour Department. Had he done so, I would have undertaken as best I could to see to it that the board did go on the ground and there give that full consideration to the actual circumstances that he now contends should have been given. But there were no such representations whatever made to me at the time. I, of course, do not criticise Mr. Ling or other gentlemen for these after-thoughts which now occur to them.

Furthermore, if Mr. Ling and these other gentlemen had represented that the matter had not been fully and properly investigated, that there was ample reason for a further investigation of all the facts and circumstances of the situation in Cape Breton and elsewhere, I should have been only too glad to have undertaken, to convene again the board of investigation and insist on them going on the ground, as I understand the law permits the Minister of Labour to do and making a full and further investigation. But no suggestion of that kind comes to the Labour Department or to myself as minister. We simply observe in the morning press of March 18 that Mr. J. B. McLachlan, who, I understand, is a gentleman of broad sympathies—in this House and elsewhere I understand he has been referred to as a long-time friend of mine, but to my knowledge I never met the gentleman in my life—in substance declares to the world that he has adopted a really new policy, I hope so far as Canada is concerned of dealing with questions affecting the welfare and the rights of labour—the policy of "cut down production, loaf on the job, work with your coat on, be sure that you do not give anything more than you have to for what we call the small pittance you receive as compensation." That, Mr. Speaker, I describe as un-Canadian. I have heard in years gone by, while representing labour, of the I.W.W. under war-time conditions advocating that policy and nothing else. I now charge that the gentlemen who are advocating this policy are in heart and sympathy equal, no more and no less, with the I.W.W. in their every aim and ambition. I contend that they dare not come out into the light of our Canadian day and advocate that same policy under the standard of the I.W.W. They may be fooling themselves, and undertaking to fool someone else, but they are not fooling me with any pretence that that is anything like the policy of organized labour, red-blooded,virile and ready to do its share at all times. I challenge it now as I.W.W. propaganda, nothing more and nothing less; and as Minister of Labour, or back in the common ranks of labour again if that should occur, I will fight it, because it is wrong. So I say to hon. gentlemen opposite and to hon. gentlemen to their left and to my colleagues in the Government and its supporters, we cannot afford, as I understand the aims and ambitions and contentions of labour, to dally with or countenance for one moment any such propaganda or proposals as we have had confronting us in this Nova Scotia situation. I believe that I am as fully informed individually as any one of the urgent necessity that some means should be taken to alleviate some of the conditions existing in Nova Scotia; and I hope that even out of this discussion, and the notoriety that will ensue from it steps will be taken, by McLachlan and others with their I.W.W. theories, when reason has dawned upon them to discard and abandon any such policy. I hope that even then something may be done to assist the other workmen and the workers in the mines in Nova Scotia who hold no such views and to assist their wives and families as well. You would have no respect for a Government—let alone an inexperienced, in a parliamentary way, Minister of Labour—who would show the white feather and knuckle down to challenges such as we have had from J. B. McLachlan and others. You cannot—I give this advice as the result of some years experience—countenance for one moment the tactics of the reds; you must meet it and fight it man-fashion wherever it is found. While I have the most profound sympathy for some of the contentions that have been advanced yet it is a fact that despite the actual first-hand knowledge of some of us respecting the proper aims, ambitions, and conditions of labour, there are theorists who come to us from time to time and advise us from a theoretical standpoint how to deal with labour questions. Well, we are not going to deal with these questions on any such basis. So long as I can exercise my voice and my vote I say that the tactics of the red element—for that is what it really is—and the I.W.W. propaganda that has been used, and used during a period of dire distress in Canada and the United States, shall not prevail. They are the same tactics that have been used in the forests of Washington, of Oregon and of British Columbia—I refer to the suggestions now being scattered broadcast in Nova Scotia by J. B. McLachlan. None of it for me. I have been fighting that propaganda too long to start now to countenance any such thing as Minister of Labour, and I do not believe that hon. members will for one moment do anything more in this matter than uphold and commend the judgment of this Government in deciding that under the circumstances that have been explained to you no royal commission will be appointed at the behest and at the dictation of these gentlemen in Nova Scotia, these men who are advocating such an un-Canadian policy as we have been hearing of during the past few days.

Mr. HENRY E. SPENCER (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I would like, for a moment, to draw the attention of the Minister of Labour to the fact that although labour owes a duty to capital there is also a duty on the part of capital toward labour. As one who is an employer of labour I feel particularly keen on that point, and think I am in a position to speak with some definiteness concerning it. There are three reasons why, in my opinion, this must be regarded as a serious question and one demanding instant action on the part of the Government. The first reason is this: I understand that when two years ago this same British Empire Steel Corporation applied to the federal Parliament for a charter and an act of incorporation its request was refused. That refusal must have been based on some very good foundation. The second reason is that we are told this corporation has been allowed to water its stock to the extent of $19,000,000. Such a statement should not be allowed to pass without some effort made to prove its truth or falsity. It is a very serious charge, and if true I maintain that the employers of this Nova Scotia mine must consider their duty towards their men—they must consider whether it is right at the present moment to pay the miners practically a starvation wage and at the same time endeavour to pay a dividend on $19,000,000 of watered stock. Furthermore, the Government of Canada, I understand, has made a grant of some millions to this same corporation. If this be true, surely the federal Government should have something to say in a dispute of this character. It has been urged from the Government side that this is not a federal matter. I want to point out to hon. members that when you have men congregated in large numbers—such as they are in mining camps and in factories—and they are put on a low scale of wages, and hundreds and thousands of them are out of work, you have a responsibility towards those men. You can drive poverty in the country a good deal nearer the bread line, than you can drive poverty in the cities; and when a man gets down to a certain level, when he gets to the stage that wages are so low he has not the means of maintaining himself and his family, then neither a military law nor a civil law will restrain him: The only law he thinks of obeying is the law of self-preservation. That is one of the truths we cannot ignore. Even if this were not a federal matter, it may speedily be made so if the dispute continues, and the Government does not take a stand. Because if these men are pushed nearer and nearer the bread line and mob rule begins to manifest itself in Nova Scotia, what will you see? You will see the mounted police sent down to the mines and military rule will be invoked. Does not the matter then become one of federal concern? I would like to urge upon the Government: Is it not better to take hold of the situation now and prevent its going any further than to contemplate what possibly may develop into dire results in the future.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): A great many of us were inclined to take it for granted that, when a labour man was appointed to the position of Minister of Labour, the Liberal party was showing its sympathy with the great labour movement across the country. It seems to me most regrettable that there should not have been revealed, in the speech to which we have listened, any real sympathy or intelligent understanding of some of the fundamental problems as they affect labour. I sincerely trust that it has been the heat of the debate that has carried the minister further than is his real position in regard to this matter. It would seem almost as if he had resented the action of Mr. J. D. McLachlan as a personal affront. I am not concerned—and I do not think the country at large is concerned—with the attitude of the Minister of Labour towards J. D. McLachlan. There is something more fundamental altogether for us to discuss here, and I can hardly conceive that constructive action should be delayed on account of anything of this character. The Minister of Labour spent a good deal of time making a very lengthy defence of the action which has been taken during the past weeks in this matter. I would like to say —and I am quite sure the Minister of Labour omitted the matter unintentionally—that perhaps it would be fair to read the last telegram of the series. If I remember aright the minister read the first three, but did not read the last telegram from Mr. McLachlan. This is dated March 22nd, 1922, addressed to Hon. James Murdock, Minister of Labour, Ottawa, and reads:

> Your telegram of yesterday to hand, and note that you state it as one of Canada's tragedies that the British Empire Steel Corporation should undertake to dictate government policy and shape the course of public events to its own purposes. I agree with you as to the corrupt influences of this corporation on the public life of the country, and desire to state that, to its other sins, it has added since January 1st that of a starvation wage for ten thousand workers. Your Government is young and surely yet uncorrupted by this corporation which you call one of Canada's tragedies. The starvation of ten thousand mine workers in Nova Scotia gives your Government right now ample justification to appoint a commission at once which shall tear wide open the rotten heart of this corrupter of public life and starver of the workers of Nova Scotia, if you and your young Government have the courage of your convictions, you shall appoint a commission now and give it this man's job of cleaning up this corrupt tragedy.
> J. D. McLACHLAN.

I submit there is nothing widely extravagant about that last telegram of J. D. McLachlan. It is rather a reasonable request to prefer to the Government of this country, and I take it that the Government assumes a great responsibility, indeed, if it refuses to accede to as reasonable a request as has been made by Mr. McLachlan, and by the delegation which has just waited upon it. The minister had a great deal to say about the I.W.W. methods and had a good deal of denunciation for those whom he termed the Reds. I think that is rather a curious thing, since the minister himself, on two or three distinct occasions, made use of the phrase "red blooded Canadian citizens". I take it that all this is a matter of the connotation of words. One party means one thing by red, and another party means something entirely different. The Minister of Labour believes in red blooded citizens. A good many of the Labour party use the term "red" not in so very different a sense, because they instruct one another, that just as there is red blood in all of us, and the same red blood runs through all the human race, they should emphasize the universal human note in dealing with matters of importance in their public policy. With the ordinary labour man, I can assure this House, that "red" does not connote anything of bloodshed, but that "red" as used by them is rather the emphasis of human brotherhood. It is in that sense that they use it. I can quite understand that the minister may try to discount it by using it in another sense altogether, but I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we ought, in this House, to get away from the idea of trying to settle problems by calling names. I wondered almost if we should hear the other term which has been so prevalent during the last few years, "pro-German". I thought that was the next word to come. I take it that we are not going to get further by calling one another red, or by retorting that somebody else is yellow. We are in a position where we ought to consider these questions on their merits, and this is one question which is worthy of discussion.

I cannot pass over some of the points on which the Minister of Labour dwelt, because they involve some things that are fundamental to an understanding of the labour position and, although I have not the privilege of an intimate knowledge of the situation in Glace Bay, I know that some of the matters that have been put forth here to-day deal with fundamental labour conceptions and labour positions. Those of us who represent labour here are bound to try to put forth the labour point of view with regard to them.

We have heard a good deal about loafing on the job. The Minister of Labour called upon high heaven to witness that he would always denounce that kind of a policy. Now, it is not the place to say whether or not that policy is expedient, but the ground was taken—a deeper ground than that—that it was utterly wrong. I do not know that I want to discuss a purely abstract ethical question, but I want to say that when we talk about loafing on the job, and when we sometimes make use of the French word "sabotage", or the Scotch expression "ca'canny" we are indicating a method of industrial warfare, which, perhaps, we could more accurately express as curtailment of output.

Now, I submit, that, leaving aside for the moment the ethical aspect of this question, curtailment of output is a natural, recognized mode of procedure in the business world to-day. There are factories all over Canada which, so soon as their managers think that profits are not sufficiently high to warrant further operation, curtail their production, or, sometimes, stop work altogether. Since the minister has put the question on high ethical grounds, if it is wrong for labour men to curtail production when they cannot earn even a living for themselves and their families, then it is a much greater wrong for any manager of a factory or corporation to stop work simply because he cannot obtain the profits he would like. I shall have to go a little further and mention an incident which I trust my farmer friends will apreciate rather than resent. I had a talk with the president of the farmers' organization of Alberta a year or two ago, when oats were selling, if I remember rightly, at about 16 or 20 cents a bushel. That gentleman informed me then that he was going to advise the farmers to stop planting oats and other kinds of grain until prices were somewhat higher, because, as he said, the farmers could not produce at the then current prices. Well, that also, I submit, is a curtailment of production, and the farmer feels abundantly justified in the matter because he says he cannot produce at a loss. Neither he can; that is obvious. I remember saying at the time to the president of the association that what he proposed to do would be rather hard on the people who lived in the cities. "Well," he said, "I don't see any other way in which we can bring the railroads and other large institutions to time." That is the selfsame step, apparently, which is being taken by the miners down in Glace Bay and in Nova Scotia generally. I do not say these things simply for the sake of talking, because I realize that we have an exceedingly difficult problem to cope with, an ethical problem if you will. We have been given one side of it by the Minister of Labour, and a great many of us have failed to realize that there is distinctly another side to the question. Sometimes the worker is driven to do some things he does not like to do. May I be permitted to give an illustration from my own experience during the time I was engaged as a manual worker on the waterfront? I used to have a theoretical knowledge of some of these questions, and I discovered that that knowledge had to be somewhat thrown to the winds in the face of practical experience. Men were unloading ships, and the day was supposed to be an eight hour day; but if the task was finished before the close of the day the workers were dismissed. The result was that when the pay envelope came they were short perhaps two or three hours of their day's work. Now, they needed every cent of the wages they were receiving in order to keep their families, or even to exist. They went to work at eight o'clock in the morning in the full belief that they would be able to work an eight hour day, but perhaps about two or three o'clock word would come that the cargo was almost through loading or unloading, as the case might be, and some times the suggestion would be made: "We must go slow and do not finish before the regular closing hour." And the men proceeded to adopt the policy ca'canny, of loafing on the job. No doubt it will be said, from a high ethical standpoint, that such a practice is reprehensible. However, let me say, on the other side, that there was no organization of labour on the waterfront at Vancouver as there has been, to a certain extent, at the docks at Liverpool and elsewhere; but a much larger pool of labour was kept for cases of emergency than was ordinarily needed. Had there been a common sense arrangement between the various companies concerned, it could have been readily arranged that each man could work his eight hours, neither more nor less, and be guaranteed sufficient for a living. But under the maladjustments inherent in our present system he was unable, through no fault of his own, to obtain a full day's work; and under the circumstances about the only thing he saw he could do was to go slower if he wanted to obtain sufficient food for himself and his family. I can remember some of these men discussing the situation. They called attention to the fact, for example, that the Dollar Steamship Company was making millions out of the war trade which it had at that time, and they could see no reason why the steamship company could make its millions and yet not afford them a living wage. There you have the same situation as now exists in Nova Scotia, and I suggest that there are two sides to a question of this kind. I am not going to discuss here the larger question, upon which a great many of us feel very strongly, namely, that industry has increased to such a large extent that it ought no longer to be left in private hands. The group which I represent in this House has it as a part of its policy, the plank that the large fundamental industries of the country should be handled by the country in the interests of the country at large. I was glad to see a year or two ago that the Farmers' party adopted the principle of the nationalization of coal mines. They did it because they thought that a supply of coal was essential to the welfare of the country, and that from the standpoint of the consumer it was necessary to nationalize large public industries. Here we have another aspect of the question; because of control by an autocratic company, it becomes necessary in the interests of the men to see that they have fair play. This is a large question into which I will not go to-night, but let me say this: If private ownership is going to function and supply us with all the goods we need, and if it is going to secure us democracy and industrial freedom then let us continue private ownership. But I claim that private ownership is failing to do these very things. To-day we have 200,000 unemployed in Canada; we have factories closed down and men all over the country who say they have not the rights of free men. This is the challenge that comes from the labour world to-day.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) used a number of expressions which I have no doubt would win applause from a regular lecture platform audience. And they are true. But the use of them sometimes makes them only half truths, and a half truth is on occasion more false in its effect than a lie. The minister said that two wrongs do not make one right. Of course, we all applaud that. I may say, in passing, that I was very much interested to note that a good deal of the applause while the minister spoke came from the benches opposite rather than those immediately behind him. But let me ask: Is not this action which the minister himself is advocating—a policy of waiting, a refusal to deal with the one and the more fundamental wrong? I am not advocating strikes, I am not advocating slowing down on the job, I am not advocating violence or anything of the kind, but I do say that we have on the other hand, as has been stated by various hon. members, a company that is organized with millions upon millions of watered stock, and that conducts its affairs in the most arbitrary fashion according to the minister's own statement. Let me read it again:

> Be assured that the undersigned has no brief for or personal sympathy with certain methods adopted by the British Empire Steel Corporation, and I regard it now as during the recent general election campaign as one of Canada's tragedies that any corporation should appear to be able to undertake to dictate government policy or to shape the course of public events to its own purposes.

I think we are justified in asking what steps the minister is taking to change that state of affairs. That is the prior wrong and the greater wrong of the two.

What about the advice to walk off the job? I suppose that is the action that would be taken by a "red-blooded Canadian." It is all very well if you can walk off the job, but, Mr. Speaker, I submit that a great many of these men cannot quit work even for a single day without involving hardship on their wives and children. That is the other side of the question. I noticed in some of our campaign literature a phrase to this effect: Your job is your living. The working men would be willing to go a little bit further and say: A man's job is his very life. Can such a man quit work when his family is on the verge of starvation, and would starve if he quit for a few days? You may talk about individual freedom, but such a man who is bound down in that way has no chance of enjoying individual freedom.

I am not sure whether the phrase was used. "Sacredness of contracts," but the idea was there, that under no circumstances must a man break his contract. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to advocate, nor to justify the breaking of contracts, but I do say that frequently to-day men are placed in such a position that it is absolutely impossible for them to carry through their contracts and fulfill their duties to others dependent on them. I am not going into questions of casuistry; they do not get us any distance at all; but I submit that even in law duress is recognized. If I point a revolver at a man's head and say to him, "You sign that document or I will shoot you," that contract, as the House is aware, would not be recognized as valid in any court of law. And yet that is precisely what it is in the employer's power to do when a man is at his wit's end, when he is at his extremity, when he has no food with which to feed his wife and children. Under the conditions the employer is in the position to point a gun, as it were, at the employee's head and say, "Take this job or starve." I hope to live to see the time when that kind of contract will by the laws of the land be declared invalid.

But we come back to the big question which we are apt to overlook: What else are the men to do? I am not justifying this course, let me say that again and again, but I do ask: What other course is pointed out to the men? We are told that there may be some danger of interfering with the provincial rights of Nova Scotia. I am informed by members of the delegation who are here from the East that again and again the miners sent delegates to the Nova Scotia Government to ask for some redress or some help, and that those delegates were told again and again that the provincial government had no power to act. There is the situation that we find. The federal government say: We cannot act. The provincial government say: We cannot act. In the meantime the men and their families are suffering.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll), if I understood him aright, admitted that there was considerable watered stock in the capitalization of this corporation. But he asked: Why should the federal government interfere with a company chartered by the provincial government? Mr. Speaker, let me put the matter as the common men of Canada are beginning to put it. It is a crime if a man should put water in milk, and he can be tried under the criminal law and punished. I should like to ask: Why is it less a crime that a man should put water in stock? And I hope to see the Government during this very session introduce legislation that will make it criminal for anybody to water stock. Has the Dominion government no right to act? I submit that again and again, the Dominion government has interfered or taken action with regard to all sorts of industrial disputes from one coast to the other. Is there any reason why at this particular juncture action should not be taken in what seems a most serious situation?—a situation which has gradually been growing more and more serious for some months, and with respect to which the provincial authorities seem to have taken no action whatever. As some hon. member has already said, if there should break out any violent disorder he assumed that the Dominion government would be asked to send in the mounted police or the military to restore order. Have we not arrived at a stage in our civilization when we will refuse to adopt the policy of waiting till something serious happens,—something which we already see is likely to happen?

If I remember rightly, I was in the galleries of this House in 1913 when there was a strike in progress at Nanaimo. I think the Liberal party then in power—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no; the Tory party.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Was it 1909? I remember quite distinctly that some members of the Liberal party pleaded that action should be taken in connection with that dispute. I am not going into this phase of the question with the idea of stirring up party recriminations, but I would say that in the past action has been taken by the federal authorities at various times. The trouble in Winnipeg in 1919 is, I take it, fresh in the minds of a great many of us. Week after week that trouble went on. The municipality seemed almost helpless; the province seemed almost helpless. The federal Government took no action for quite a time; then at last they did take action, with a club. But for a long time nothing was done, though anyone could see that things would grow more and more serious. Surely we have come to the time in the history of civilization when we ought to be able to prevent some of these disputes eventuating in violence.

With the development of our large-scale industry, we have reached the point where it becomes necessary for the Government to take an active part in the management of big industrial enterprises. In a book published by Mr. Woodrow Wilson, containing some of the election speeches made by him during the campaign in which he was elected, he called attention to the fact that the old watchword of "individual liberty" with regard to carrying on one's business affairs was no longer applicable in our complicated industrial life of to-day. He used a very fine illustration to bring home his point. He said that in many cities of the United States the owners of tenement blocks were still taking the position that an Englishman's house was his castle and were refusing to allow the municipal authorities to enter those tenement houses for the purpose of inspecting the sanitary arrangements, and so on. He pointed out that even in England and Scotland—I think he referred particularly to the city of Glasgow, where this old doctrine that an Englishman's house was his castle had long prevailed—they had had common sense enough to recognize the changed conditions. They had said that it was only an accident that fifty families became herded together under one roof of a huge tenement; that in that case each particular suite was a private house, but the tenement itself was essentially a public highway; therefore its corridors ought to be policed and sanitary arrangements provided for it. Mr. Wilson said the time had come when all these large public corporations ought to be recognized as public in their character and ought to have the full light of publicity thrown upon every detail of their management and operation. I say, Mr. Speaker, that we must accept the necessity of regulating, of absolutely controlling, these big public enterprises, or go one step further and have the public, the Government itself, take them over and manage them in the interests of the people.

I take it that there is no dispute with regard to the fundamental facts of the situation which have been brought before us. First of all, the men are not obtaining in Nova Scotia a living wage. I believe that the minimum wage of some 8,500 out of the 12,000 men affected is $2.85 a day. A great many of us who draw our salaries by the week or by the month are not familiar with the way in which the workingman must count his income. In Nova Scotia very few of the miners, I am informed by the delegation here, are obtaining more than four days work in the week —and that through no fault of their own. Four days' work in the week at $2.85 means $11.40 a week. Now, I want to turn for a moment to the Labour Gazette, one of the valuable publications issued by the Department of Labour itself. According to the Labour Gazette for February, $21.52 was the cost of a weekly budget for a family of five. That included twenty-nine staple articles of food; wood, coal, light, etc. But the miners of Nova Scotia are receiving $11.40 a week, only half the amount which, according to the Department of Labour, is the minimum on which a family can subsist. Either the figures of the department are grossly misleading, or there is something wrong with the wage paid to the miners of Nova Scotia. And I may say, Mr. Speaker, that this figure of $21.52 makes no provision for medical service, for union dues, for church expenses, for newspapers, for books, for insurance, for any of the cultural needs that most of us believe to be necessary if men are to live according to Canadian standards. That is the situation which we must frankly face in this connection.

Not only are the men not receiving a living wage, according to these figures, but their wives and children are suffering. We are told that children are being kept home from school because they have not sufficient clothing. We are told that the school boards have notified parents to send their children to school and have been unable to enforce that order because of the conditions of poverty prevailing in the homes.

Now, that is one outstanding fact: the men are not receiving a living wage. The second outstanding fact in the situation is that the corporation apparently has got the province by the throat. I do not need to read again the statement made by the Minister of Labour himself.

The third great outstanding feature of the situation is that men, women and little children are suffering. Surely we ought not to underestimate that fact. And I hope the minister did not intend to say that no action could be taken because Mr. J. B. McLachlan had not shown sufficient deference to the Minister of Labour. I do not care anything about that. I do not care anything about whether or not Mr. McLachlan has taken just the right attitude. There is a bigger question than that. It is the welfare of the men, and the women, and the children living down there in Nova Scotia. The delegation that came here from those towns has made a most just and reasonable request. They are not proposing to take the law into their own hands, but having gone repeatedly to the provincial house and obtained no redress; having been told that the province was incapable of doing anything, they have come to the federal House and have said: "Can you not do something for us?" Are we going to turn them empty away?

Two or three years ago, shortly after the war, we heard a great deal about the necessity for reconstruction, but it has turned out that reconstruction has simply meant in many cases construction along the old lines. I submit that the people of Canada, the ordinary people of Canada, the labouring men, the business men and the farmers, are looking for a new lead. They are tired of the old way of doing things and are looking for a new lead. This new Government is to-day on its trial. Either this new Government must give a new lead or it will not be very long before some other government will have to come that will lead. I often think as we sit here dealing with our papers and talking back and forth about one thing and another, and then going to our offices and reading statistics, and that kind of thing, that we are failing to realize the real thought and the real aspirations of the people of Canada. The common people of Canada believe that every man in this country ought to have a chance, and they are not very much concerned with the questions of procedure or with delicate questions as to provincial or inter-provincial rights. They send their representatives here to this House, and they say there must be some way out of the situation. It is not for us on this side to devise ways and means; we cannot suggest very much. But it is for us to urge upon the Government in power that action, and if necessary, radical action, of a constructive nature should be taken, and so far as some of us are concerned we can pledge the Government that if that kind of action is taken, it will receive the fullest support from representatives who are here primarily not for partisan purposes but in an effort to bring a better way of life to the common people of this country.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, my excuse for entering this debate must be that I represent a constituency which is to a large extent a labouring one. A large proportion of my constituents work for wages, and a still larger proportion are workers in the very broadest sense of the word. We have very few drones in the Comox-Alberni district.

I do not wish to enter into the merits of the arguments in this case. Before I would venture to pass an opinion, I would have to have a very much clearer definition of the two sides of the question than have been presented this afternoon. But apart from that, as I live such a distance from the scene of this trouble, it would be presumptuous for me to pass an opinion upon it. I would rather leave that to the members who represent the districts concerned or those in the immediate neighbourhood.

I just want to express one argument for the consideration of the Government. We have heard a good deal about Bolshevism and the Reds. Bolshevism is the word I shall use, because I do not know what the noun of Red is, whether it is Redness or Redism; so let us call it Bolshevism. Bolshevism, like co-ordination, is a very much over-worked word. It used to mean only a majority—not a term of reproach under the constitutional conditions of this country. Then it drifted on to mean those principles, if we can call them so, or practices, promulgated and put into force by Lenine, Trotsky and their associates. The word went further in the last election and became a general term of villification for every one who had the audacity and temerity to oppose the candidates of the Government of the day. I think hon. members to my left will be fully aware of that fact. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie), in speaking the other day, said that he had some four thousand Reds in his district, adjoining mine, and that I had some thousands also. Well, he can speak for himself. They may be called Reds in the Nanaimo district, but in my district we call them intelligent voters. I am not at all ashamed, and I have no anticipation of being ashamed in the future, of the so-called Reds who gave me their confidence in the last election.

Coming now to the fourth meaning of the word, Bolshevism may now fairly be applied to a spirit of Radicalism almost revolutionary in its desires, and also rather vague. I think that might honestly be described as the meaning of the word to-day in ordinary conversation. Now why do we find these men so? If we examine into the conditions and industrial surroundings of these men that they are called Reds we can perhaps find out what makes them red. We have all had some experience with this class of men. Do we find that the man who is well fed, well clothed, with a steady job and owning his little home, where his family grows up around him, with a wage sufficient to keep him in decent comfort and allow him to save a little for his old age, which is the standard we should aspire to, and often with a little leisure to read and inform himself, because ignorance has a good deal to do with Bolshevism — do we find that man becoming a Red? Never. It is never that class of men. The men of that class are always inclined to take a sober and, in the dictionary sense of the word, a conservative view of things. It is the man who lives with his wife and family under conditions of poverty, misery and above all, with a rankling sense of injustice that you find becoming a Red. I have even heard men in good positions, well educated men, say in conversation regarding some incident, "It is enough to make me turn Bolshevik." That indicates the idea that it is a rankling sense of injustice against social and industrial conditions that turns a man or a woman to talk Bolshevism and Redism. It does not matter if it is a civil servant who after years and years of service in anticipation of being promoted to a higher position sees some political has-been promoted over his head, it does not matter if it is a lumberjack or a miner who has been done out of his wages for months by some quirk of law invoked by some unscrupulous employer, the principle is the same; they have a rankling sense of injustice in the conditions immediately surrounding them.

Then if you admit, for the sake of my argument, that Bolshevism is caused, or tends to be produced, by injustice in our industrial and economic surroundings, you must also admit the next proposition I submit, that the spread of that sentiment is undesirable in Canada from every point of view. Then would it not be wise, granting those two postulates, so to speak, for the Government in the instance before us to seek in any and every way possible to remove any possible cause of injustice there may be in connection with these men's alleged —and I use that word because I do not know the actual circumstances—grievances. If that were done, the cost of half-a-dozen royal commissions would be well repaid.

It is true you can station Northwest Mounted Police at every street corner, and to a certain extent check free speech. I was surprised the other day to see my colleagues from British Columbia hasten to repudiate the suggestion I made that the Northwest Mounted Police were no longer needed in British Columbia. Sir, I have never said a word in depreciation of the Northwest Mounted Police. They are a fine body of men. I only said they were not needed. One hon. member, I think, claimed they had done great work for us in British Columbia during the war. I beg to remind you, Sir, and the hon. member in question that the Northwest Mounted Police were not in British Columbia during the war. Apart from that I can say that you may station mounted police on every street corner of the country and you will to a certain extent check the exercise of free speech. But a worse thing than that may happen. The dark thought in a man's mind rankles and he broods over it to a far worse extent if speech is repressed than if he were allowed to give expression to it. It is like trying to sweep back a stream with a broom—you cannot do it. But if you go to the source of the stream when it is only a trickle, a little drip, you can easily divert it there. It is the same with the spirit of Bolshevism. You may try to put your hand on unrest and say it is not there like putting your hand on a pool of water but it will exist and spread to a far greater extent by repression than if you had taken wise action at the beginning. The best way to deal with the problems arising in connection with our social and industrial relations is to enact wise legislation for the elimination of injustices; then Bolshevism will die a natural, and for that very reason, a permanent death.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine), and I congratulate him on having brought this matter to the attention of the Government. I cannot say that I admire in any way whatever the remarks of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) this afternoon. I am quite sure that labour will not be overjoyed to find such a type of minister at the head of this important department; and I am quite sure that all Canada and its press will be critical of the minister's remarks this afternoon. I would ask hon. members what they would do if to-day they were in the situation of these miners in Nova Scotia? The Minister of Labour this afternoon rose to the most extraordinary and perfervid heights of tragic-comedy when he endeavoured to demonstrate to the House the awful and terrible character of the doctrines that, he said, were being promulgated by Mr. McLachlan. However, I ask the Minister of Labour what he would do if he were himself in such a position? All that was asked of this Government was the inception of such a constructive policy as would meet the situation in the province of Nova Scotia. I wonder what hon. members of this House would do if they were face to face with hunger? I think they would look at this whole question to-day and with more sympathy than they perhaps now feel. These coal miners, as I view the situation, are confronted with this situation: Their union has not the means to carry on the strike; therefore, they are not in a position to go out on strike. They are not in a position to do what the Minister of Labour suggested this afternoon he would probably have done had he been in their place. The men are not merely faced with hunger themselves—if that were the case doubtless many of them would meet the situation bravely—but their wives and children are threatened with hunger. Now if hon. members were placed in that position I think they would do exactly what the delegation has done. I think they would send a delegation to this House to ask it to devise a solution of the problem. The Minister of Labour said a good deal during the election, and also since then, about the desirability of bringing employer and employee together to act in co-operation. Now I should think, Mr. Speaker, that as the head of the Labour Department he has the opportunity to evolve some plan that will bring employers and employees together. I think there is not an hon. member here but will admit that the most difficult thing in the world to-day is to bring face to face employer and employees who are fighting each other. They will not in the natural course of events, I think, come together of their own accord. The two parties should be brought together by somebody sympathetic towards both and animated with a desire to solve the problem which if left unsolved may develop into a heavy burden on the State. I ask the Government, or the Department of Labour, if they have no constructive policy calculated to meet this situation. I ask, are they going to meet it? Are they going to meet this delegation, talk to them fairly and squarely and then sit down and consider, and introduce as quickly as possible, the solution of the problem which the circumstances call for? That is all the Government is asked to do and I believe it is its duty to carry out the request. It is the duty of this Government, in my opinion, to meet a situation of this kind as quickly as possible.

Mr. HANCE J. LOGAN (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I represent a constituency in which there is a large number of miners and in which one of the properties of the Dominion Coal Company is situated.

I believe we are having too much camouflage at the present time in reference to this question. We do not desire to deceive the miners of Nova Scotia and I claim that if we appoint a royal commission at the present time such action would be tantamount to deception. Because we have no power here to implement the recommendations of that royal commission as far as those mines and miners are concerned, and probably in two, three or four months time the same condition that now prevails would be found still existing only perhaps in a more aggravated form. No one in this House can have a more sympathetic feeling for the miners of Nova Scotia than we who know these miners well. No man can have more sympathy with the miners of Cumberland than we who know and appreciate their difficulties, and I would not to-night support any government or any party if I thought the action it was taking would betray the interests of these men. I desire to speak out plainly and to say that I believe the appointment of a royal commission would only postpone this matter and result in a more aggravated state of affairs than now prevails.

Let me briefly recite the facts. There was a dispute between the men and the company. The former applied for a board of conciliation and nominated as their representative Mayor Ling of Waterford in Cape Breton. Afterwards the government of the day appointed Colonel Thompson of Halifax representing the company. These two men not being able to agree upon a third member of the board the present Minister of Labour appointed Mr. Gillen of Toronto as the chairman. The members of the board proceeded to Halifax. Under the Industrial Disputes Act they could call witnesses from the four corners of Canada to testify and the witnesses would be paid out of the public exchequer. They did call a number of witnesses and an extended investigation was held. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it would have been better had the members of that board gone to the mines. They should have gone to Springhill in the county of Cumberland and to Glace Bay and other mining towns in Cape Breton. However, they did not see fit to do so, but they did hold an investigation, and heard all the evidence presented by both sides. Then why appoint a royal commission to take the same evidence over again and then find ourselves in the position of having no power to enforce the recommendations of the commission?

My hon. friend from Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) said that the proper place for investigation was not here, but in the province of Nova Scotia. I endorse that statement, because in that province they have power to enforce the recommendation of any royal commission which they may appoint in that province. The decision in reference to the Board of Commerce shows how limited our power is in the federal arena to make any enforcement. The British Empire Steel Company is a Nova Scotia concern. It is incorporated under the laws of Nova Scotia. The mines of Nova Scotia are owned by the province of Nova Scotia, by the government of Nova Scotia if you like, representing the people of their province. It is the duty of the government of that province, I humbly submit, to appoint a royal commission to investigate the workings and operation of their own property, the coal mines of that province.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would you explain what you meant by saying that the province of Nova Scotia, under the legislation in force in that province, has power to enforce the finding of a tribunal? Do you mean that they have the power, in case the tribunal makes the decision as to wages, to compel the men to work? What is the full extent of the implication, when you say they have power to enforce their findings?

Mr. LOGAN: Under chapter 21 Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, as read by the hon. member from Cape Breton South, they would have the power—

An hon. MEMBER: To make the men work.

Mr. LOGAN: No, you can never do that. You cannot force any man to work, if he does not desire to do so. There is no doubt about that. But Nova Scotia, owning the property, being the lessor of the coal areas to the companies, has the whip hand over the companies, who are only lessees from the government. Under the lease which it gives, the government has very large powers, and it has the power, I believe, as was decided in the case of the Board of Commerce, to enforce the findings affecting the miners of Nova Scotia. But that is a power which we lack. It is a matter of property and civil rights, and within the provincial powers.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Calgary (Mr. Irvine). If I felt that we could be of any service in the matter, I would support him, but it would be simply useless for us to appoint a royal commission to investigate this matter within the province of Nova Scotia without the power to enforce the findings and it would only deceive the miners.

Mr. MARTELL: Is not the whole trouble, as regards this particular unfortunate position in Nova Scotia, due to the fact that the British Empire Steel people are trying to make the coal industry of Cape Breton pay dividends for the stock of other corporations which are non-productive, which corporations they have taken into the amalgamation?

Mr. LOGAN: As to the accuracy of the statement, permit me to say that the proper place to investigate that is before a royal commission appointed by the province of Nova Scotia, to investigate the position of the company. That province incorporated this company and gave it a large capitalization, and this company is answerable, I submit, to the province of Nova Scotia, and not answerable to this parliament or to the federal authorities.

Suppose the intention of the hon. member for Calgary were carried out, what would happen? A royal commission would be appointed by this government. That would take some time. Then this commission would proceed down to Halifax. Probably weeks would elapse. They then would proceed to Cape Breton county, and Inverness, and down into Cumberland. More weeks go by, the children are still in want, the men are not working the mines, and there is trouble all over the province. What we do now should be done in the quickest manner possible, and the best thing for us to do is to say to the Legislature of Nova Scotia, "You have incorporated this company, and it is your duty to investigate the charges that have been made".

We have heard a great many statements made with reference to the watered stock of the British Empire Steel Corporation, but we do not know. Not a man in this House knows whether dividends are being paid on watered stock, or how much the stock is watered. It is all very well to make the statement. It should be investigated, before a commission which has power to investigate these matters.

If we appoint a royal commission, it would take them weeks to get the evidence together, and make findings. And then what could a royal commission do? It would be utterly powerless. A commission appointed here could make any findings they pleased, but could not enforce them. The men would then find themselves exactly where they are to-day, with that much lost time and that much more trouble in the province.

We do not concur in the recommendation of Mr. McLachlan that men should lie down upon the job. Cumberland men will not lie down upon any job—no mistake about that. We ought to recognize the fact that Mr. Baxter, the President of the U.M.W., is not in sympathy with Mr. McLachlan on this occasion. I suppose that Mr. Baxter has, at least in the past, had the confidence of the people of that province, and the confidence of the miners. He does not concur in the movement of Mr. McLachlan.

Therefore, I say, Mr. Speaker, do not deceive the men by giving them a commission from Ottawa. Such a commission could bring all the witnesses together, go to great expense, employ all the lawyers they wanted to prove the case, and at the end of the time we would find we were powerless and could do nothing to enforce the recommendations of the commission. Let us send this matter directly to the province of Nova Scotia where they have power to enforce the recommendations of their tribunal. It is within the purview of their legislative capacity to appoint a commission at the present time to investigate this unfortunate difficulty in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. T. H. McCONICA, (Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to become involved in this debate and, under other circumstances, I should certainly have preferred to listen, but some things have developed in the discussion, even amongst my own friends, with which I am not in full accord. What is the controversy before us to-night? It appears that a corporation organized under the laws of Nova Scotia, engaged in mining in that province, has upon its hands a controversy with the citizens of that province, touching a question of wages. Some investigations have been made, and there was an attempt, I understand, by the Department of Labour to adjust the difference. That attempt failed. Now, what has occurred? A grievous situation exists there, no doubt. It is said that there is a corporation on one side in which the stock is very much watered—a deplorable thing, but something that did not come about by virtue of any action of the federal Parliament. The labour is organized, a very proper thing; but it was not organized by virtue of the laws passed by this Parliament. A controversy has arisen, not because of anything for which we in this Parliament are responsible, or over which we have jurisdiction. The controversy has arisen between the citizens of Nova Scotia and a corporation in that province. Under those circumstances, some gentlemen come to the Government and make representations. Are they parties to the controversy? Not at all. Do they bear any credentials from the miners or employees? None whatever. Are they here in a representative capacity? I do not so understand; they are here in their private capacity, when there is a remedy in the province itself, a remedy the efficiency and integrity of which have not been questioned by any gentlemen on this floor, and which has been pointed out to them, as was clearly set forth this afternoon by an hon. gentleman from the province in which the difficulty exists. Now, an hon. member from away west of us asks this Government to appoint a royal commission.

Mr. IRVINE: Do you mean to say that I asked for the appointment of a royal commission?

Mr. McCONICA: I am not so sure that I have correctly stated your position, but you have brought a motion before the House and consumed one-half day of mighty valuable time—to do what? I do not know, Sir, what he does want us to do, but the suggestion is that a royal commission should be appointed. Would such a commission have any authority to enforce its findings? Is it asked for by either the miner or the operator? Have we any intimation from either side that the findings of such a commission would be accepted? Not one suggestion of the kind. The suggestion comes from my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Irvine), and the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). Now, I admire the sentiment expressed by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock), when he said that a man should render an honest day's work for a day's wages; and I resent the idea that there is a parallel between the man who shirks his task and the farmer who finds that he cannot raise an abundant crop. The farmer did not put in his crop for some other man; it was his own crop, and it was his own failure if he did not reap the harvest he expected. He did not accept any man's wages for which he was expected to raise a full crop, and then only try to raise half a crop. The difference is a very material one, in my estimation. What would be the effect of appointing a royal commission? What would it do? It would find out precisely what we all know, and nothing more. It would develop facts concerning which we are fully advised. And what would we do about it? We do not know. What could we do? Not a thing, so far as I have been advised by all the gentlemen that have discussed the question. We might just find out what we know already, but we could ascertain nothing more. It seems to me that we have had enough of this sort of business.

I deplore the fact that the miners of Nova Scotia are suffering. I deplore the fact that their employers are not able to pay them wages sufficient to maintain them. I do not know whose fault it is; the hon. gentleman does not know whose fault it is. If he were paying the wages he would probably be in a very different frame of mind. I know something about paying wages, and I have never had one hour's or one minute's controversy with any man I have ever employed. I have never had a labourer leave me that was not fully satisfied. But I do not like to hire a man and have him filled with the idea that he has to get even with me, for some fancied wrong, by neglecting that for which I am paying him. I do not like that doctrine, I am not here to endorse it, and I am sorry to hear it favourably expounded by gentlemen on this side.

Now, there is some talk about the Red business. We have nothing of that kind in the country I live in. I have heard some talk that the farmers of the West were not particularly loyal, that they were disposed to tear down government, and I remember a few years ago there was a great controversy in the city of Winnipeg. There seemed to be a concerted effort on the part of an element gathered in that cosmopolitan city for the purpose of sweeping a conflagration of anarchy over the western part of this great Dominion; and I heard it suggested that the farmers were organized and were ready to take up the fiery torch and cross and bear it through the West. I lived out in that country at that time, and I want to tell hon. gentlemen present that there was not, in my opinion, a man living on any farm in western Canada who would not have put his foot down with all the vigour necessary to stamp out any attempt of that kind. No such sentiment has ever existed there. The western farmer is a loyal Canadian citizen. Why is he in the West? Did he go to that wild country bent upon plunder when there was no one he could rob? He went to engage in a legitimate, an honourable, a respectable and a useful calling,—a calling that imposes hardship, demands labour, and requires long hours of toil in a rigorous climate. What did he come to Canada for? Was he unfriendly to the institutions of the country? If he had been, why did he choose that rigorous climate? He came because Canadian institutions appealed to him, and because the flag that was to float over him represented his idea of liberty. He came to establish the one foundation institution upon which all our liberties rest, he came for the purpose of building there that to which we all look as the great corner-stone of our civilization—he came to build a home. And is that man a dangerous citizen? No, indeed, he is not. He is there to engage in a useful and proper and arduous occupation; he is the busiest man in Canada; he is not asking for short hours; he is not asking for protection; he is there to render an honest day's work for an honest day's pay. And you can rely upon this, Mr. Speaker, that the torch of anarchy will never be kindled at the forge of industry.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): Mr. Speaker, I regret to have to differ with my hon. friend from the West who has just spoken (Mr. McConica). He entertains a view of provincial or state independence that seems rather strange to a Canadian habit of thinking. Coming to this country from the South, he seems to have brought with him amongst his settler's effects that idea of state independence which prevails there, and which has not taken very deep root in this country, where we believe in a large measure of federal control. I do not concur in his view of the futility of a royal commission appointed by this Parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. BIRD: I have the consciousness that I am speaking rather loud—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No. you are not.

Mr. BIRD: —but by and by I shall be habituated to the conditions under which I am speaking. I fail to agree with the view that a royal commission appointed by this House would be futile, because there is another kind of force besides physical force. I do not think anyone supposes that this Government would send down the Royal Northwest Mounted Police to enforce the findings of such a commission upon the British Empire Company. I do not think that for a moment. But there is such a thing as moral force which can be generated in the minds of the people, in other words, public opinion, which would be more effective than any physical force the Government could bring to bear. So for that reason I think the plea which has been put forward to-day is very sensible and reasonable, and it does not seem to me that our time is being wasted in its discussion. On the contrary, I think the time is well spent, for we are dealing with a big human question. Some of us are not very well prepared to speak on them, but these human questions are very alluring, and we cannot keep quiet while we listen to the pleas that are being made.

My own position is somewhat neutral, for I have no obligation in a political sense to Labour, none whatever; the only obligation I have is that which any right-thinking man must own towards the great mass of his little brothers—and I confess that I have a feeling that as opportunity arises I must put myself on the side of the bottom dog. I believe that sentiment is characteristically British. I believe in deference to hon. members opposite who represent another race, that it is also Galician. The word "sabotage" which has been interlarded in this debate considerably, had an honourable origin in the history of the race that is represented opposite, and arose out of conditions similar to those we are now considering.

I cannot speak for my group, and therefore I should like my words to be treated as purely the expression of my personal views, but it seems to me that the sentiments of the Progressive party and the sentiments of Labour are very near together at the root. The reason for this Progressive group being here is because of the widespread discontent, of which this labour trouble in Nova Scotia is a manifestation; it is the same root. Now, the immediate conditions which react upon the farmer are vastly different from those which react upon the labourer, but the ultimate conditions are the same! The difference is geographical, as some one has said of protection, that is all, but the root is the same; down beneath the ground there is a connection between the farmer and the labourer. And when we heard the talk about watered stock our hearts began to kindle, because we of the Farmer group have felt for a long time that we too have been suffering from watered stock. When the charge of sedition was imputed to our Labour friends on the corner bench to my left, our hearts began to warm again, because that epithet has also been applied to us. In our efforts to get just conditions for ourselves we have had to suffer obloquy in the same way. So there is a real kindred feeling betwen Labour and Progressives.

But this is where I come near to the sentiments of my hon. friend from Battleford. I do not believe the average farmer has much use for sabotage. The farmer in the West—and I am speaking now of the class that I know—on the average usually employs either a man or a boy for at least some part of the year, and it would be repugnant to him at any time to find that man or boy loafing on his job, not because his moral sense is more highly developed than any one else's—I do not think that on the average the farmer's moral sense is any more discriminating than that of any other class—but because his sense of self-interest has developed just a little further than that of any other class in the country.

Now, moral fervour, as a certain class of philosophers have alleged, has its main root in self-interest. I believe there is a measure of truth in that theory, but I rather fight off the thought that the moral fervour, the righteous indignation, manifested by the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) was a reflection of self-interest as it applied to the industrial affairs of this country. I do not think it was, because it seemed to me that the note of sincerity was clear enough in his speech, and his past record would confirm that.

But I think he made a signal mistake; he has put his Government in a very compromising position so far as a large class of the working men of this country are concerned. Mark you, a large section of the workingmen, and a large number of the farmers, too, are not Red,—they repulse the very thought—and they will not read the minister's speech with any kindly feeling. I am even afraid that some of that feeling will be reflected upon the Government which he represents.

Now, I think the Minister of Labour was inflamed a little too much by that word "sabotage"—a word which is all right for ornamental purposes and which looks impressive in a big headline, but which has no relation whatever to the facts of this case and has been very much misused. He could have safely taken that word for what it meant, and in reply to Mr. McLachlan he could, I think, have used more temperate language. He could well have afforded to overlook the gibes and sneers of that wily Scotchman; for I infer that he is a Scotchman,—not by his name, but by the fact that he sent that telegram collect. The minister occupies a position which enables him to overlook things of that kind, and I do think that the note of personal vindication entered a little too much into his discussion of the matter. I am sorry he is not in the chamber at the moment, because these remarks have been made for his benefit.

Now, I believe that the appointment of a royal commission by the Government to investigate this matter would have a very wholesome effect upon public opinion. It would have a very wholesome effect upon the Government themselves; it would make it easy for a good many of us from now on to give them that whole-hearted support that we have it in mind to give them so long as they array themselves with the forces in this country that are making for righteousness.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): That this subject is of sufficient consequence to have warranted the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Irvine) in moving the adjournment for the purpose of a discussion, no one can doubt. The solution of the difficulty that confronts Canada in the province of Nova Scotia goes to the very root of industrial and social life in that province, and has to do with the well-being and the happiness—possibly even with the existence—of many of our fellow citizens there. An area of Canada of very considerable size, one of the oldest settled areas of this Dominion, is affected to a degree perhaps unknown hitherto as respects any other part of the country. I want to examine as carefully as I may the circumstances that have brought us to the position we are in and to suggest a course, if it is in my power to do so, that may help. I am not sure that I agree with any who have addressed the House upon the subject, and I am still more doubtful whether I shall find any with me after I am through my address to-night.

We all know that an order went out some time last fall putting into effect a wage reduction of enormous extent—37½ per cent, on the average—applicable to some 12,000 miners in the Cape Breton district, employees of the British Empire Steel Corporation, distributed among its various component companies. That reduction completely wiped away the increases that had previously been given by what is known as the Montreal agreement—the first Montreal agreement—and, as has been stated to the Government in a document a copy of which I have been favoured with, represented as well a twenty-five per cent reduction in the wages that had prevailed before that agreement. This reduction the miners resisted, and the proper steps were taken toward the establishment of a board of conciliation. The company refused to name its representative on the board—why, has not been made clear; the reason they could have had I do not know. Their representative, then, in accordance with the law, was named by the Minister of Labour, as was also—the two representatives failing to agree on the point—the third member, who was named by the present minister. Of any of the choices made I have no criticism to offer at the present time. That board sat in the city of Halifax, heard evidence, and announced its decision. The decision was the decision of the majority, and a minority decision by Mayor Ling, representing the men, followed. The decision of the majority changed the reduction from 37½ per cent to 32½ per cent, and in bringing that reduction into effect there were certain amendments as well, applicable to the lower paid men, with the result that men below a certain wage were not to be reduced beyond 12½ per cent; to those above this wage the general reduction would apply. This award was, one might say, unanimously rejected by the men. It appears that in that award there were certain anomalies which indicated that the board had not exercised the care one might expect of it in arriving at its decision. For example, the award made the pay of some men who had previously been receiving a higher wage than others, less than those others were now to receive. Other anomalies also were embodied in the award; but no doubt the resistance of the men to the award arose not so much from the anomalies as from the fact that so little scaling was done and that a very substantial reduction was made from the wages that had before obtained. Whether or not such a reduction was justified, this Parliament is not in a position to say; I am not in a position to say. It does strike one, though, that it was a very substantial reduction indeed to take place all at one time.

The result of the resistance of the men to the award was that representatives of the men again met representatives of the company and some slight modifications were made, not affecting in any way the main body of the findings; not affecting in any way the 32½ per cent reduction, but correcting certain of the anomalies that were found in the first report. It appears that some of the representatives of the men favoured the acceptance of the suggestion—which, of course, had no effect at all until accepted—and that others did not. At all events, the men declined to accept, and by a vote of about seven to one declared they would not be parties to such an agreement.

Consequently, the men were in this position, that all steps had been taken which they could take under the law of Canada. Whether there was a law of the province they might have resorted to or not that had any effect, I could not say. One has been referred to by the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Carroll) to-night, but under the law that comes under our purview here the men had taken all the steps they could take, the company had done the same, and still the clash existed. Now, having pursued the remedies provided for by the act in proper order, the fact remains that there is a class war on in the province of Nova Scotia. The fact remains that twelve thousand men are in a state of hostility against their employers, the British Empire Steel Corporation. In that condition of affairs one of their leaders, who appears, I judge, from press reports, to have behind him a vast majority of the men whether he ought to have or not, advises those men, and they accept his advice, to adopt a certain course, namely, to decline to work a full day's work at this reduced wage which now is in effect, but to give rather a partial day's work which they believe represents the full wage they receive, and which prevents the company making profits or piling coal as a reserve, which reserve the men believe would put the company in a position to fight effectually any further resistance on their part.

Now that this condition is a serious one, and a very serious one, none of us can dispute. Though there may be wrong on the part of Mr. McLachlan and on the part of the men who follow him—and I will discuss that later—though there may be wrong on the part of the operators, neither of these wrongs removes the fact that a serious condition of affairs exists in the province of Nova Scotia. Then the question comes: Is there anything this Parliament can do, is there anything this Government has failed to do or to-day can do, to improve the situation in the province of Nova Scotia? I hold in my hand what was given to me as a copy, and I have no doubt it is, of the memorial presented to the Administration by the mayors of the towns or cities in the bodies of this area affected so seriously by the present situation. These mayors do not come in their personal capacity. Surely it is not correct to say that they do. I have met only one, but we cannot ignore the fact that they are mayors elected by their people, representing all the people, doubtless, of the towns and cities of which they are officers, and they come here to make their representations because of the general concern of the whole community in a happy outcome of the present unfortunate condition of affairs. Those are men who ought to know what is really the trouble; they ought to be able to measure pretty well what the dangers are, what is to be avoided, and they ought to be able to judge fairly well what might be done. I read from their memorial in order to give their view of how serious, if not desperate, the situation is. They say:

> In this connection the delegation wish to quote a paragraph from a letter received since their arrival in Ottawa. This letter refers to conditions in the coal fields of Cape Breton and says:
>
> "The doctors here declare that there is more sickness among young children than they ever met with before. There are more children staying away from school than ever in the history of the mining towns of this district."

The delegation goes on to say:

> This sickness among young children has resulted from nothing more nor less than malnutrition. The children are kept home from school because their parents cannot provide them with sufficient clothing. The Supervisor of Schools in Glace Bay is authority for the statement that young boys are being kept away from school in order that they may earn something to help provide for the families; and any one who cares to investigate will find that children are actually going hungry in the mining districts and are falling ill because it is impossible to provide them with sufficient nourishing food and sufficient clothing.
> We have in Nova Scotia laws requiring the attendance of children at school; but when notices are sent out to parents of supposed delinquents it transpires that the children cannot attend because they are not sufficiently clothed.
> This is an attempt to briefly sketch conditions as they exist; but no one who has not seen these conditions for himself can be expected to understand what they mean in the lives of tens of thousands of human beings—

Because, be it remembered, while twelve thousand represents the number of miners, probably sixty thousand would more nearly represent the numbers in the families of those affected.

—and this is, we may say, the chief reason why we are here to-day asking the Government to investigate. We feel that the situation will never be understood until a commission of sympathetic, just and competent investigators have gone into the mining districts of Nova Scotia and seen things for themselves, until they have seen with their own eyes the conditions under which these people are expected to live and bring up healthy families. For we can assure the Government that this dispute that is threatening the industrial stability of the province of Nova Scotia has had rise in these conditions. It is useless to expect peace and harmony and contentment in a community, the citizens of which are forced to exist in this way. If men cannot earn enough to feed and clothe themselves and their families, to live in some degree of comfort, and provide means of even a common school education for their children, not to mention some provision for the years in which miners become too old to earn, then, we feel, we may well despair of the future.

The memorial goes on with reasonings and assertions of what they say are facts much of a character similar to that I have read and some of it, indeed, even more alarming. The House recalls as well the words of the hon. member who represents at least part of the district affected, the hon. member for Cape Breton South, and it was only too plain from what he said that a situation far more perilous than appears now may well follow unless by some means or another alleviation is brought.

In the body of the memorial I have read it appears to be their opinion that only by examining the condition of the families on the ground can the problem be understood or a fair solution offered. It is most unfortunate that the board that already has acted saw fit to confine its geography to the city of Halifax and was content to listen to what you might call inanimate evidence, instead of going right on the ground to the seat of the trouble, among the miners themselves, and seeing the actual conditions with their own eyes. All who have taken part in the debate, including the Minister of Labour, have clearly given the House the impression that the award could never have been expected to do what an award ought to do because of the failure of the board of arbitration in that regard. This delegation asked for a royal commission of men of sympathy and understanding and fairness of judgment to be selected to go down and, as it were, re-try the case, and re-try it under conditions that unfortunately were not brought to bear when the former board or arbitration met. That is their suggestion. There may be a better. I do not argue whether that is best or not.

The question I am going to approach is this: Whether or not this Government is justified in simply standing aside and saying: "We have had that board of arbitration. It did not do its whole duty by any means but all the same we have had it and here we have discovered a statute of the province of Nova Scotia. We are going to kick the whole thing out of Parliament and beyond our sight and push it over to the province of Nova Scotia for treatment." The Minister of Labour comes to Parliament, makes a speech of much passion and vehemence, declares against a certain line of conduct, and in an hour's oration and peroration denounces the suggestion with all the force of his personality. But really I think if he had given more careful consideration to an analysis of the facts before coming to the decision that he has announced here he would have better served the purpose of a Minister of Labour.

What is his position? He says: "I will have nothing to do with this thing at all. No royal commission for me. No action on my part. No dallying with the course of action on the part of Mr. McLachlan and his followers which is morally wrong and from which I turn my eyes in disgust." Were Mr. McLachlan assumed to be morally wrong, were all those following him wrong, were they indulging in something that is against the law—would even that be sufficient to justify the Government of the day in saying "Things can go right on until they step out of that line of conduct and comply with the law"? Let me give an illustration. Supposing Mr. McLachlan and his followers had declined to come under the Lemieux Act at all, that is under the Industrial Disputes Act? Suppose they had never negotiated with the British Empire Steel Company? Suppose they had never asked for a board of arbitration, following the failure of such a negotiation, but had simply gone on strike? They would be violaters of the law of this land, they would be violating the provisions of the Lemieux Act, but would that be sufficient cause for the Department of Labour to refuse its offices in every way, to decline to help them altogether or help the board; would it be a justification for the Minister of Labour to say "Oh you did not ask for a board of arbitration, you never tried to negotiate, you did not obey the law of the Dominion of Canada, things can go on just as they like and men can starve. Whatever dispute arises I will not have anything to do with it because to do so would be to countenance and to encourage what is against the law of the land." Well, the Department of Labour has not taken that course in years gone by; the Department of Labour has stood always ready to help even though parties to the dispute might have been at the time acting in violation of the law.

Now let us inquire whether this case is worse than that? Are there reasons here for standing aloof in cold indifference that would not exist were the parties striking and acting in violation of law? What are these parties doing? Are they acting in violation of law? Are they in as bad a position as strikers would be who will not strike without asking for a board of arbitration? Well, I submit that they are not. I am not one who in the past has been noted for countenancing violation of the law. I have taken some risks, politically and otherwise, in order that the law of this land might be upheld; and I have no sympathy whatever with the conduct of men who seek to gain their end by violation of a law of any kind, whether it is the Criminal Code or any other statute. And there is another class with whom I would have no sympathy at all: I would have no sympathy with a man, or a body of men, who, accepting a wage schedule and contracting to work under it, would go to work and seek to give only a partial day's work for a day's pay although they accept it as a day's pay. I do not think that would be particularly a violation of the law but it would be, morally at least, a violation of contract. To pretend to be doing a day's work and not be doing it, that is what I would call loafing on the job, that is what I would call dishonesty—it is pretending to do what you are not doing.

Are these men even in that position? If they were I do not think it would be a violation of the law; but are they in that position? They may be but if so I have not understood the facts as adduced in this House. What have these men done? They have been requested, we will put it, to accept a wage reduction of 32½ per cent. They have declined to do it. They say "No, it is not a living wage; we cannot support our families, we cannot send our children to school. We do not want to go on strike or go out." Why? The reason they give is that they have exhausted their funds in mutual help already and that they would have great difficulty in supporting a strike. They say: "Here, you are giving us two-thirds of a day's pay and we will give you two-thirds of a day's work and only that: we won't pretend to give you any more." That is what I understand to be their position.

Now aside from the fact, aside from whether it can be criticized or not, is it any false pretence on their part? Really I cannot see that it is. Mr. McLachlan announced this position publicly and we take the men as announcing the same thing because we must assume that each man went to his employer and said: "You pay us so much a day and we will give you so much work." I am speaking now of the men known as the datal men who asked for so much a day, I will speak of the others in a moment. Very well, it is within the province of the employer to say "We will not accept that; we will not pay you for that two-thirds of a day's work;" and I cannot see how anyone could very well complain when the men go openly to the employer and openly announce "We will do so much work a day and will not do any more." That is the stand the men have taken. If hon. gentlemen see offence in that well at least you can measure the extent of that offence, and I ask the House is the extent of that offence so terrible that the Department of Labour of Canada must fold its arms and cease to function altogether, that they must say "Oh, until you stop that, until you cease to do that anti-British or non-British, non-Canadian cowardly act you can expect no more help from the Department of Labour; we will leave the community to its fate until you cease to tell your employers that you will only do so much work for the wage they have offered you."

As regards the piece-work men respecting whom I ventured to interrupt the member for Cape Breton (Mr. Carroll), really I do not see how any complaint can be made against them at all—let me say that very frankly. A man who is taking coal out of a mine at so much a ton is offered so much a ton. Perhaps a day's work is twenty tons—I do not know what it is—but he says "I will only produce fifteen tons." Well that man will only get paid for fifteen tons; consequently, how any complaint could be levelled against him —and I am told he represents thirty-five or forty per cent of the whole number—is beyond my power to imagine.

Mr. CARROLL: And he is anxious to work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. I understand that the piece-work men were parties to this arrangement to only do a partial amount of work.

Mr. CARROLL: My instructions are that ninety-five per cent of the men who have been dismissed by the coal company up to date are datal men who cannot lose whether they work or not. The great bulk of the men who are paid by the amount of their production are willing to produce all they can but they cannot get the coal out because the datal men refuse to carry it for them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My information is that the piece-work men and the datal men are all parties to this method of seeking a settlement of this dispute. That is my information at all events. Now what I am saying is this—

Mr. CARROLL: I notice that the president of Local Dominion No. 1 has resigned and refused to carry out the instructions given by Mr. McLachlan; so that they are probably divided.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am informed that one man has resigned, but that is a very insignificant number compared with the size of the organization. Generally speaking, all have concurred in taking this course, but, really, it is not at all relevant to the argument I am making. I am arguing that, with respect to these workmen, if they choose to take this course, it is difficult for any one to criticize their action.

Mr. McMASTER: Would it be fair to the employer to have his machinery simply used at three-quarters capacity?

Mr. MEIGHEN: He has the option of letting them all out. If a man comes frankly to his employer and says, "At that rate of wages I will produce so much, and the reason I am doing this is that if I produce more it places me at your mercy later on," the employer has the option of keeping him on or letting him go.

Mr. McMASTER: That is a new arrangement.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the situation to-day. If I am wrongly informed, I should like to be corrected. They have openly said to the world and to the employer, "We are ready to do this and no more; if it does not satisfy you, you have your course." I have merely delineated to the House the facts as represented to me, and they are in no way inconsistent with what any hon. gentleman has to-day presented, and in no way inconsistent with any facts presented by the Minister of Labour.

Has the minister analysed the actions of these men? He makes great perorations about "loafing on the job." I can understand what loafing would be. Suppose there were a body of trained men on a railway line, or any other class of men, who had come to a wage agreement with their employer and agreed to work for a certain wage a certain length of time, expiring on a certain date, and that body of men, in the course of that time, declined to give a day's work, or declined to do a portion of the work it was their duty to do—that, I would say, was loafing on the job, a violation of the contract, and dishonest toil. But that is not the position of these men. That is what is alleged by Mr. McLachlan in one of his replies, whether correctly or not I do not know at all, but that is a very different thing from the position of men, particularly piece workers, who say, "This much we are prepared to do, and that wage we will take for it; there is our position, what is yours?" Let me ask again, is the assumption of a position of that kind so black and unforgivable an offence against social order that the Minister of Labour of this country will stand in his might and majesty and say "Not for mine," to use his classical language this afternoon? That is the position the Government has taken.

It is argued by the hon. gentleman from Cumberland (Mr. Logan), evidently in a spirit of fairness on his part, that there is no remdy open to these men, that to appoint a royal commission would be utterly valueless, because it has no power to enforce its award, but he says there is a remedy down in Nova Scotia by means of a commission that would have power to enforce its award. Let us examine that contention. A royal commission has not the power to enforce its award, any more than a board of arbitration has. It was never the intention, as the Prime Minister knows better than I do, because he largely framed the act, that any board of arbitration created under its provision should have power to enforce their award. The great object of the law, as I apprehend it, was this: that by means of boards of arbitration the facts would be brought to light and the position and difficulties of each side would be revealed to the other. There would be means of mutual negotiation and consultation, and strikes would be avoided, and where strikes were not avoided, then the adducing of the facts and the revelation of the truth would so affect the public mind on the side of the party who had the major right in the case that those who were not right would be compelled to succumb. I have sought, in one or two sentences, to state the purpose and the spirit of the law of Canada as I understand it. That is the object of a board of arbitration, and that would be the main object of a commission were such to be appointed in response to this demand at the present time.

Is there any body in Nova Scotia that can enforce its award? A board of arbitration or a royal commission appointed by the government of Nova Scotia could no more enforce its award than a royal commission appointed by this Government could. There might be some lever that the government of Nova Scotia would have over the company. If an award were made against the company, they might be able, although it would be pretty hard to justify it, I would think, to say to the company, "We will cancel your lease if you do not comply with that award." But how would they ever enforce an award against the men? And what is the good of an award that is enforceable only one way? Therefore, that attempt at distinction falls at once to the ground. Any object to be served by a commission of inquiry, investigation and conciliation, appointed by any government, can be served by such commission as requested by the memorialists who have appeared before the Government. Why the Government should have adopted the statement indicated in the press statement read by the Minister of Labour to-day, passes my comprehension. But to say to these men "We do not dispute the value of a royal commission, or the need of further investigation, we do not dispute the dire conditions you present, and we do not dispute they may get worse and rapidly worse, although all these things are undisputed, because J. D. McLachlan advises the men, and they take his advice, only to do so much work for so much money, we will not have anything to do with it whatsoever." Is that not actually the position taken by the Minister of Labour, and the position the Government is in to-night? Can the Government hold that position? I do not see how they can sustain it in reason.

It surely is the duty of the Government not to be looking to the rightness or the wrongness of the act of a man or a body of men, but to be looking to the course it can take to help out a great community that faces a great calamity. Surely it is not too late to reverse or, for my part, modify the position the Government unfortunately took in this regard. Surely, it is not too late yet to intervene, and, if not by royal commission, by some other means, possibly a committee of this House, although I would fancy a commission would be very much better, because it could go down there and understand conditions with the eyes of humankind which a committee sitting here could not do. By some means, surely a way can be found to prevent what appears very likely to be serious happenings in Nova Scotia. Now, in what I have sought to say I have not in any way argued against the reasonableness of either side. I am not sufficiently versed with the facts to do so. Only a commission that hears evidence from every angle could do that, but what I have sought to argue is this: That there is nothing in the present state of facts, nor in the conduct of any parties in this dispute, to justify the Government in the course it has taken, and the duty of the Government to-day is to get between the parties, by means of a commission, or some better means if they can devise it, and seek to help both sides, but seek most of all to assist the community that faces the danger it does face, and that community is not merely the province of Nova Scotia. More than Nova Scotia is affected by it. There is a very large section of eastern Canada which will be affected. This is the appeal I make to the Government to-night.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Southeast Grey): Mr. Speaker, as I sat, an interested observer all afternoon, I noticed that a favourite expression was used over and over again, and that was the phrase "loafing on the job." I wondered how it was that the hon. members of this House became so familiar with that phrase "loafing on the job," and then it struck me that I had read some place in the dim past about certain large subsidies that had been given to some steel corporations in the vicinity at least of Nova Scotia. I thought that possibly that was the time that the people's representatives were loafing on the job. I think, like many others, that we are not in possession of the concrete facts of the case; and after all we can speak on this matter only from a human standpoint. We do know something about this British Empire Steel Corporation. We know, for instance, that it is not a provincial corporation, in that its shareholders do not live in the province of Nova Scotia. We know that it is not even a national but an international concern. We guess, too, that the statement that there is $19,000,000 of water in the stock is quite true, and that the company is endeavouring to get dividends on this watered stock out of the labourers whose wages they have reduced so drastically.

I am aware, you know, that sitting here quite comfortably and well fed, it does not seem such a bad thing to have your wages reduced 37½ per cent. But if anyone got up to-night and moved that the indemnity, starting with the Prime Minister and coming down, should be reduced 37½ per cent, I think it would be generally felt that this was quite a reduction. And that is the only viewpoint in this matter after all; just that. It may be that there is a provincial law, or a national law, in the way. But do you know what I thought before I came to this House? I thought that laws were made for people, but I know now that that is not true; people are made for laws. And surely if there is something in the constitution that is in the way it can be removed so that justice may be meted out to those people, who seem to form a large part of the population of Nova Scotia. I believe that the mayors who came here did not come to represent labour at all. They did not come to represent the miners. They came to represent the people of the towns in which they live, who are not miners. Those people see the injustice of the thing and they feel that somebody must do something to remedy the situation. One of the mayors said that in his town there were 7,000 people, including children, of whom 1,600 were miners, and that he was not sent here to represent those 1,600 but the 5,400 who were not miners, because they want law and order in their land and realise that permanent law and order can come only through prosperity and happiness.

Now, I have here a copy of the notices sent to the parents of the children telling them that their children had not been to school and that under the law they were punishable by fine not exceeding $20, or in default one month's imprisonment. It strikes one that there could be but one object in sending them to prison; they would be fed during that month, because the county council of Cape Breton allows 40 cents a day for the food of prisoners, while the British Empire Steel Corporation pays 19 cents per head per day to men who have on an average five of a family to support. From that standpoint, therefore, it appears that it would be better for them to go to jail for the month at least. I do not in the least feel that I am competent to enter upon a full discussion of the case, but there is sitting in this House a gentleman who is a recognized authority on such things, and who has written a very learned book, and I shall be glad to quote therefrom for the benefit of hon. members:

> Of methods of industrial remuneration which are calculated to beget a sense of freedom in effort, and which therefore are specially adapted to promote efficiency, it is certain that experience has revealed no single method possessing a monopoly of advantage. On the contrary, methods wholly different have disclosed much of individual merit. The practice which in the long run is apt to do most by way of promoting efficiency, through harmonizing the interests of labour, capital, management, and the community, is pretty certain to be in the nature of a combination of features broader than any possessed by a single method.
> What labour is really concerned about as regards remuneration, is adequate reward of the effort put forth. What capital and management are really concerned about is adequate reward for their investments and services. What the community is really concerned about is adequate value in services and commodities for purchasing power. The method of remuneration of labour which helps most to secure adequacy of returns all round is the method which is likely to prove the most productive of efficiency, and, in the long run, the most advantageous to labour.
>
> What is earned, rather than what is received, or paid, is the fundamental consideration. Men should get what they earn, and should earn what they get. The amount of product must be looked to as the determining factor. The thing paid for is the result, not the time spent on obtaining it.
>
> Where remuneration is the incentive to effort, if effort is to be adequate, remuneration must be adequate. The real interest of the parties to industry lies in the incentive being adequate to call forth the best that is in the worker in energy and skill in other words, the utmost of his will and capacity. If the best is to be expected of a man, he must be given the fullest opportunity to make the best of himself.
>
> Wages, like hours, may be excessive or deficient. They are too high when they lead to laziness and indifference, and too low when they are insufficient to stimulate effort. Adequate wages are beneficial alike to labour, capital, management, and the community, in that they lead to a maximum of effort and a minimum of waste.
> It is seldom possible to determine readily what are adequate wages. Much depends on the class of work to be performed and the amount of energy and skill required on the character and temperament, and even on the heredity of the worker.

Much depends, too, on circumstances and conditions such as the available supply and demand of labour, the hours to be worked, the quality of materials supplied, the efficiency of the plant and equipment, and other indeterminable factors. With remuneration, as with all else in industrial relations, to secure efficiency is a matter of proper adjustments. Account must be taken of human as well as economic considerations. The incentive must be adjusted to the individual. "The ideal condition economically", says Dr. Arthur Shadwell, "would be an automatic mechanism which would exactly adjust the incentive to the individual, or the wages to the work, thereby eliciting the best of which each is capable. This would be equally advantageous to the wage-taker and the wage-giver, and to the community to which both belong, because there would be no waste. Its perfect realization in industry is no more practicable than any other sort of perfection, but some methods of remuneration come nearer to it than others, and their comparative bearing on efficiency can be gauged accordingly."

Proceeding to estimate the various methods of remunerating Labour, by reference to the economic principle of "adjusted incentive" or "the differential treatment of varying capacity," this eminent authority finds that, of all methods, the farthest removed from the ideal is that of Time-wages at a uniform rate, in that it presupposes an equality which has no existence, and is therefore based on a false principle. Piece-work, on the other hand, he regards as obviously based on the sound economic principle that workers should be paid according to the value of their work. Where Time-work is adjusted to individual capacity, the principle is the same as that underlying payment by the piece.

That Dr. Shadwell in his analysis is right, must be apparent to all who, like him, have had a wide range of observation and experience. How is it, then, that Labour, which is primarily interested in the method of remuneration best calculated to assure it amplest returns, is so averse to payment on a piece-work basis, and inclines so strongly to payment of a standard wage on a time basis? To attribute this to sheer laziness, or to a desire to degrade all workers to the level of the least capable or industrious is as untrue to the facts as it is unfair to human nature. Workers in industry are just as inclined to put forth effort for the sake of reward, just as ambitious, just as eager for individual recognition, as individuals from any other class in society. Nor are the leaders different from others in these respects. If in appreciable numbers the workers fail in these qualities, it is because the path of bitter experience has bred feelings of fatality concerning the circumstances of their lot, and because, in the immensity of the struggle in which they are involved, they see little hope of gaining a reward which they consider adequate, little opportunity of rising to a higher level, and little scope for individual initiative or individual attainment.

As a matter of fact, it is not the desire to ignore talent, but a belief that in some manner beyond their control special skill or exertion will be ignored, or, what is worse, exploited, that provokes among working men a reaction against piece-work payment, and a desire for payment on a time basis. As Dr. Shadwell has pointed out, the minimum time-wage, on which Labour insists, is itself a sort of tacit and unconscious protest against a uniform rate, since a minimum implies possible variations which are not to fall beneath a certain point but may rise above it. Likewise, the real meaning of the "living-wage," he finds to lie in the fact that wages are the incentive to work, and must be adequate to produce it. Where men are forced by necessity to work below a standard which constitutes a living wage, labour, while apparently cheap, is really dear, because "sweated" Labour is either unwilling or without capacity.

If payment on a piece-work rather than on a uniform time basis is to be maintained in industry, it can be so only through affording grounds sufficient to lead to the substitution of faith for fear as respects the consequences involved. Foremost must come the certainty that if a man increases his output by working harder, he will continue to reap an advantage by so doing. This means that employers must refrain from cutting down the piece-price in order to reap, at labour's expense, the benefit of increased exertions on the part of labour. Such practice vitiates the whole principle of piece-work payment by destroying the capable worker's incentive. Since it inevitably results in a lessening of productivity, it deals a fatal blow at efficiency, leads to a consequent increase in the cost of production, and justifies the prejudice on the part of labour against this method of remuneration.

Piece-work, moreover, must not be rendered illusory in practice through employers providing bad material or machinery. The temptation to "speed up" machinery, thereby overtaxing energies of the worker, is something which must also be guarded against, though it is not likely to be a source of danger where the rate of speed is controlled by the worker himself. The fear that jealousy between workers may be excited through competition is less an evil than the danger that incentive may so vanish as to leave little room for competition. The example of the more capable and industrious should prove a stimulus rather than an irritant to less efficient workers where certainty of enhanced rewards is rendered apparent.

Once confidence is established in the piece-work basis of remuneration through the assured maintenance of the principle on which it is founded that, namely, of workers being rewarded according to the value of their work, the stimulus of ordinary piece-work may be increased in various ways by additional rewards based on evidence of different individual capacity. In technical language, this is the principle of the "intensive differential rate." Referring to intensive piece-work, Dr. Shadwell says: "It takes different forms, but generally consists in paying each worker a higher price (i.e., a differential rate) for each piece or job in proportion to the rapidity and quality of his workmanship. This automatically adjusts the incentive to the individual who has the choice of earning more or less according to capacity and industry. The employer is able to pay higher wages for quicker work because he gets a larger output for the same machine cost. He divides with the worker the advantage accruing from the difference."

Organized labour, in some trades, has protested against this method on the ground that it resembles the task system of wage payment and creates jealousy and ill-feeling. It is clear that a rare impartiality must be exercised in any attempt to apply the principle of the "intensive differential rate," and that a just discrimination is difficult. Unless, in practice, suspicion of favoritism or of undue pressure can be avoided, this method may well serve to arouse rather than allay unrest.

Similar in purpose to payment by the piece is the premium or premium bonus plan. It consists in offering additional pay for more output in a given time, or for less time expended on a given piece, or for economies effected with respect to power, supplies or materials used in production. The premium may be differently calculated according to the nature of the work. It may be on a time basis, so much by the day or week with additional pay for curtailment of the time required for a given result, or on a piece basis with a bonus for the less time expended on a given piece. Or it may be on a basis of inverse ratio to quantities of power or materials consumed. The method is open to the same kind of dangers as payment on a piece-work basis, and prejudice against it can be overcome only by the same regard for the maintenance of standard rates irrespective of the premiums or bonuses allowed.

In the remuneration of labour, the fears of capital, management, and the community are just as important a consideration as those of labour. If productivity, in which all share, is to be increased through improved relations, capital, management and the community, as well as labour, must have their faith increased through the elimination of their fears. All payment based on the principle of "the adjusted incentive" and "the differential treatment of varying capacity," tends in this direction.

Labour cost is only one element in the total production cost. There are in addition the cost of premises and equipment, including plant, power, tools, and machinery the cost of maintenance, raw materials, and supplies; the expenses of management, including superintendence and direction of processes; and there are the risks of various kinds to property and person which become chargeable upon industry. It is quite conceivable that "the differential incentive," whilst it elicits the best efforts of each man by paying him according to value of output, offers no incentive to him to promote the interests of the whole by care of machinery, by economy of power or raw material. It may, through the effort to increase his own output, lead the worker to be extravagant of many things. If cost of production is to be kept down, something more is required which will give the wage-earner a direct interest in the success of the undertaking as a whole. Such an interest limits the tendency toward extravagance in the use of the property of others, and has the advantage of reducing the need and the expense of supervision. A direct interest in the success of an undertaking as a whole is the prevention of waste in production what a knowledge of industrial processes as a whole is to intelligent and sustained effort.

"A thoroughly effective method of remuneration," says Dr. Shadwell, "includes both principles, (1) the differential incentive, which acts on the individual as such; and (2) profit-sharing, which acts on him in his collective capacity, as a member of a body bound together by common interests and working for a common end. By increasing the efficiency of labour, they diminish its cost, and so increase profits though wages rise."

I thought it possible, Mr. Speaker, that the leader of the Government had forgotten that he wrote this book. If he does remember, I am quite sure that some of his followers, judging by the sentiments they expressed this afternoon, are not in sympathy with it; and Hansard to-morrow morning may make good reading for them. This is the thing, however, that as a House of Commons which is supposed to represent the people of Canada, we should remember: the only thing worth while in industry, no matter what that industry is, is humanity. If the Government can, by appointing either a royal commission or a commission that is not royal, go to the ground and look it over—I think the Minister of Labour admitted this afternoon that the investigators in this case had gone to Halifax rather than to Glace Bay and Cumberland and the places where the miners worked and lived—if the Government can do anything by this means, they should do it. I felt that as the only woman member of the House—although I would rather be known as the member for South-east Grey than as the woman member of the House— I would not be fair to myself or to the women and children in Nova Scotia who are to-day really suffering for the lack of food and clothing, if I too, did not raise my voice in protest against conditions that are made possible by the special privilege and great power that have been granted to the British Empire Steel Corporation.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that my hon. friend who has just taken her seat (Miss Macphail) will not be surprised when I say, that I agree whole-heartedly with the greater part, if not all, of what she has said. As to the conditions existing in the mining regions of Nova Scotia and the unfortunate and deplorable state of affairs which has arisen out of a particular industrial controversy, I am very much in accord with what has been said this afternoon. The question that we are called upon to consider, however, is not these conditions but how they can best be met.

The discussion to-day has arisen out of the Government's attitude toward a request which was made yesterday by a deputation that a royal commission be appointed to consider mining conditions in Nova Scotia. In order that the House may understand the significance of the Government's action, may I make perfectly clear just what powers a royal commission has and what powers exist under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, which has already been applied to deal with this dispute and the provisions of which are still available should it be thought advisable to have further use made of them. To show the relationship, perhaps I might go back a little and trace the steps which led to the passing of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act.

One of the hon. members who addressed the House this afternoon pointed out that the old Liberal government had appointed royal commissions to deal with industrial disputes. That is perfectly true, but the reason why it did, was that at the time there was no other agency for conducting investigations under oath where the matters involved were in the nature of industrial disputes. The first legislation of this Parliament with special relation to industrial controversies was enacted in 1900, when a Conciliation Act was passed, based upon similar legislation in force in Great Britain. That act empowered the Government to appoint at the time of an industrial dispute, a conciliator who might go into the district affected and endeavour to bring the parties together, his powers were voluntary and failing adjustment of the controversy by voluntary effort, he was limited to making a report which might influence public opinion sufficiently to assist in ending the controversy. For a number of years that was the only legislation we had to deal with industrial disputes. Under it there were many interventions, but experience went to show that the act was insufficient in that it gave to the Government conciliator no power to get at the truth in the event of the facts being disputed as between the parties. He was unable to summon witnesses; he was unable, except with the consent of the parties, to investigate premises; his power was, in large measure, simply one of persuasion.

One or two very serious disputes arose, one, in particular, in western Canada which involved the interests not merely of the two contending parties but also of the general public, who in no way were responsible for the controversy and had no voice in its settlement. I have reference to the strike which took place in southern Alberta, I think it was in 1907. Because of a dispute in the coal fields there, many of the settlers in our western provinces found themselves at the beginning of the winter season without coal or fuel and threatened with the possibility of freezing to death. After that situation had been brought to the attention of Parliament the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act was passed with a view of providing machinery which might more adequately deal with these disputes and which would give to all parties concerned the power of investigation. There was always this objection to a royal commission: that the Government might be accused of including in its personnel an appointee or appointees of their own who would be persona non grata with one or other or both of the parties to the dispute. It is seldom that a government can satisfy all parties to a dispute in the selection of the personnel of a royal commission. It was thought, therefore, that if a method could be found which, while protecting the rights of the parties, would at the same time give to each an opportunity to investigate through an appointee of its own, some one in whom it had confidence, that would be the wisest course the Government could take. That is the theoretical basis of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. It recognizes first of all that Labour as a party to an industrial controversy has the right to have its own investigator participate in the investigation; that capital also as a party to an industrial controversy has the right to have an investigator in whom it has confidence participate in the investigation. Then there is the third party, the public, which is vitally interested in most industrial disputes.

I must confess that except for a chance remark or two we have heard little said this afternoon or in the course of this debate as to the public interest in the matter, and it is in that regard that I wish particularly to say a word or two as to the Government's attitude in this matter. The public are interested in a just settlement and particularly in the prevention of industrial disputes. This fact the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act takes cognizance of by permitting the two parties to the dispute to agree, if they can, on a chairman, but failing agreement by the parties, giving to a minister of the Government, representing the people of the country, the right to appoint the chairman of a board; also if either of the parties to the dispute fails to appoint a representative then giving the minister as representing the public the right to appoint such member of a board. Once a board of investigation has been established under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, that board has all the powers of a royal commission. It can summon before it witnesses, it can compel the production of documents, it has the right to take evidence under oath, it can go on to the premises concerned and investigate matters there; it has all the powers that a court has.

Now, notice this, and it is an important point for hon. members to have in their minds: The Government might appoint a royal commission, place on it very honourable and estimable persons, but would it be possible for the Government to place on a board, representatives who were likely to share to the same degree the confidence of the parties concerned as representatives selected by the parties themselves?—and that is the right the parties have under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. When this dispute took place in Nova Scotia the parties to it were asked to name their members on the board. The miners named a member, and their member had all the rights and powers of a royal commissioner. He had the right to call before him any member of the company concerned, he had the right to demand the production of the books of the company concerned. I repeat he had all the powers and rights that any royal commissioner would have The other members of the board had similar rights.

Now, when those rights have already been given, when a board has already acted with that full power and authority, does it seem a wise course for the Government immediately afterwards, because the award that has been given has not been satisfactory to the parties concerned, and simply, because asked to appoint a royal commission, to go on and investigate the matter further? No one in this country has greater faith in the power of publicity to remedy certain wrongs than I have. I believe there are evils which publicity can cure that no penalty on earth would ever cure, particularly that class of evils which are of the nature of an injustice, or of meanness, arbitrary behaviour and the like. Things of this kind, which are more or less common to all industrial controversies, will not stand the light of publicity. I believe firmly and strongly in the wisdom of the widest publicity as the best agency for helping to solve industrial wrongs, but there comes a time when one has to decide just how many agencies of publicity must be set to work and in what particular circumstances they must be set to work.

I hope I have made it clear, as regards this dispute, that every member of the board appointed, including the representative chosen by the miners themselves, had this right of investigation and all the powers that go with it—powers equivalent to those of a royal commission. One of the members of the delegation which appeared before some of my colleagues and myself yesterday to ask for a royal commission was a member of that board. He mentioned that the board did not visit the different parts of the mining area affected, and he was asked the question by one of my colleagues whether any communication had been sent to the minister at Ottawa to request the board to visit these districts. He intimated that there had been none, but that he had spoken to his colleagues and they had preferred to sit in Halifax and have the investigation carried on there. Can the Government be held responsible for the board having failed to travel to different parts of Nova Scotia to make its inquiry when no member of the board brought that suggestion to the Government's attention? My colleague, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) would have been the very first to have directed the board of investigation to go wherever any member of it wished to go, and I venture to say that if any useful purpose can be served by a further investigation, and it is desired to have the board re-convened, visit these different districts and take evidence, my colleague the Minister of Labour will be the first to try and bring about that effective means of investigation.

One thing I should like to point out, however, and it is this: The right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has read to the House this evening part of a memorial which was presented to the Government yesterday. I think hon. members who heard it will recall that what he read had to do very largely with the condition of the children attending the schools, that they were not attending as they should because they were not properly clothed, had not sufficient food, and the like. Well, I ask hon. members of this House, is the question of the attendance of children at school primarily a question for investigation by this Government or by the government of the province concerned? If there is any truth in this memorial, and I am not calling it in question one way or the other, the matters that are brought to the attention of the Government in that memorial would appear to be matters primarily of concern to the province of Nova Scotia.

Let me direct the attention of hon. members to this further fact. The province of Nova Scotia has offered to appoint a royal commission. Neither of the parties to the controversy in Nova Scotia is being denied a royal commission. The government of Nova Scotia, the province concerned, and this dispute relates only to that province, have offered to appoint a royal commission. True, they have attached a certain condition to its appointment. They have said that pending the time of the inquiry by the commission they will expect the miners to drop this policy of ca'canny, or sabotage, or loafing on the job, curtailment of output, or whatever you wish to call it. This policy is not, as my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition tried to make out, one of simply offering to do so much work for so much money. It is a method of industrial warfare which has worked all kinds of havoc in the Old World, and which we do not wish to see reproduced in this country. Let me tell my right hon. friend that his time might be better employed than in trying to defend such a course which is a species of industrial warfare, and one of the worst kinds of industrial warfare known to the world.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not state that it was not industrial warfare; nothing of the kind. I would like the hon. gentleman to tell me wherein what I stated was wrong. If I misstated the facts, will he please state where and what the real facts are?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I notice that whenever I hit the nail on the head my right hon. friend jumps at once to his feet. I think hon. members of the House will be the first to appreciate whether I have given their true significance to the words of my right hon. friend. What I want to make plain is that so far as the purpose of this Government is concerned, we do not propose to take any action which can be construed as countenancing that kind of industrial warfare. It has not made any headway in Canada at the present time, and for this Government—after an attempt has been made to introduce such methods into an industrial controversy—to appoint, or to concede in the interests of those responsible a commission under such circumstances would be to countenance that kind of warfare and to encourage it in this country. The Minister of Labour made that very plain this afternoon and in doing so he stated unequivocally the position of the Government.

Mr. IRVINE: In what way would an attempt by this Government to settle the trouble in Nova Scotia be countenancing sabotage?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What I said—and I hope I have not failed to make my meaning clear to every member—was this: There are times and seasons for all things. There is a proper time for the Government to grant a commission; there is a proper time for a Government to withhold a commission. There has been an investigation of this industrial trouble. A finding has been made by the Board of Investigators. Since that finding has been made a certain policy has been announced by one of the parties to the controversy, a policy which we think is not in the public interest. What we say is this: When those who are carrying out that policy or others on their behalf come to the Government and ask us to do something at the public expense, we expect them first of all to consider the public interest; and when they are prepared to do that we will be prepared to consider any further request they may have to make; in taking that stand our position is exactly the same as that of the province of Nova Scotia at the present time.

Mr. IRVINE: I would ask the Prime Minister this question: Have there not been statements made by the two parties in this difficulty? Has not the corporation itself made the very definite statement that it will refuse to pay any more than so much wages? In that case why should not the Government consider that just as much sabotage as it does the contention of the men? To put my question more clearly: If it is sabotage for the men to say "We will give so much work for so much money," is it not sabotage for the company to say "We will give so much money for so much work"? What is the difference?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There may be no difference whatever but the point I wish to bring out is this: In my opinion the most cruel act a government can perform in its dealings with labour is to raise the hopes of labour as regards any possible future improvement with the certainty of those hopes being disappointed in the course of a very short time. For this Government to tell the miners in Nova Scotia to-day that it will appoint a royal commission, with the miners being led to believe that the appointment of such a commission would mean the raising of their wages—when what my hon. friend has just said may be true, that the company concerned does not intend to alter its scale of wages one way or the other—would be to raise false hopes in the minds of many. There are certain things that a government can do and there are other things that no government can do; and I think a government has to be very careful before announcing any policy, to view the end from the beginning, and not to raise hopes in the minds of men and women unless they see a possibility of those hopes being realized.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not wish to interrupt the Prime Minister too much, and I promise not to do so again for the present, but what about the killing of hope? If any promise of a royal commission by this Government will raise false hopes, will not the refraining from appointing that commission kill all hope? Which of the two is the worse?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I point out to my hon. friend—because I think he and I have the same motive at heart in this matter; I think we are each equally concerned in the welfare of the men and women involved in this dispute—the province of Nova Scotia has promised a royal commission. If there is efficacy in a royal commission, if further investigation is going to help the situation, there is the chance. True, the province of Nova Scotia has stipulated that pending the period of the investigation the employees of the company shall carry out their work in accordance with the terms of the existing contract. Now does my hon. friend not think—I do—that if there is virtue in publicity, if there is virtue in a royal commission dealing with this subject, that the miners would be well advised just for that period to carry out the terms of the contract and meanwhile discontinue this policy of loafing on the job? May I say further that when I spoke yesterday with the deputation I asked this question of its members: If the Government of Canada will undertake to appoint a royal commission at the public expense and to give them the power of investigating this whole question, do you think the parties to the dispute will agree to accept the findings of that commission? They intimated that they did not think they would. Under such circumstances is the Government to appoint commissions simply because and whenever it is requested to appoint them? The Government is obliged to take account of many considerations in all its actions. If it appoints a commission in Nova Scotia because of an industrial dispute there after an investigation under the Industrial Disputes Act has taken place, to-morrow it may be called upon to appoint a commission for like reasons in the province of British Columbia, and next day for similar reasons in the province of Ontario. There has to be some policy followed consistently, and the policy which the Government is prepared to follow is that of seeing that in so far as these industrial disputes can be fully investigated they shall be fully investigated, and that in so far as each dispute can be investigated by a board possessing a personnel in which the different parties concerned will have confidence, the effort of the Government will be to secure that personnel. In regard to the request of the deputation that waited upon it, all that the Government has said is—to quote from the words of the letter which I sent yesterday and which my hon. friend (Mr. Irvine) has read:

> —that having had the matter under consideration the Government is of the opinion that the situation is not one which in the public interest can be satisfactorily dealt with under the existing circumstances by a Royal Commission.

"Under the existing circumstances!" And that has reference to the policy which we think is not in the public interest but which is being followed by one of the parties to the dispute at the present time. We are prepared to consider the interests of labour, we are prepared to consider the interests of Capital, but we have also to consider, and to consider primarily, the interests of the public; and I contend, Mr. Speaker, that it is not in the public interest for the Government to issue a royal commission upon request of parties who are taking a course of action which cannot be defended in this Parliament.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): It is the right of the hon. member for East Calgary to close the debate. If any other hon. member desires to speak he should do so now.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There are a lot of things evidently as to which we are all agreed. But apparently there is a situation in Nova Scotia which is an unfortunate one and something ought to be done to relieve it; but seemingly we cannot agree as to what ought to be done or, indeed, as to whether anything can be done. I do not for one minute question the stand taken by my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) in many of the aspects of the case. But the fact remains that we have this serious trouble, and that we are doing absolutely nothing to remedy it. Suppose we test this case on any of the grounds put forward by the hon. gentleman. Suppose we take the ground of public necessity. Here is a great big public interest involved, not only in connection with the men and wages, but also in connection with the mining of our coal. There is a public interest with respect to the coal, which we urgently require. It is not only Nova Scotia that is interested, but the whole of Canada, up to the city of Montreal is vitally interested in the question of the production of Nova Scotia's coal.

The case is absolutely parallel to the case my hon. friend refers to, where he justified the royal commission of 1907. My difficulty is to find out just exactly why we cannot do something. Only two nights ago, when the estimates for the Labour Department were under consideration, an hon. member, speaking from this side of the House, asked the Minister of Labour whether, in his opinion, labour disputes could not be better settled by men of strong common sense, who knew human character, and how to deal with men rather than by men of scientific attainments, and I understood there was a very cheerful assent given to that proposition by the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). But there is no such man on the job. He has to-day given us two reasons why this request is refused. The first reason, is that the request was made by representatives, not of the men, but of the people down there, that they were not in a position to say that the men were to be bound by anything that was done, that they did not know the companies would be bound by anything that was done, and because these people came here, not representing the men, a royal commission could not be granted. That was his first point. Later on, as the theme developed the real reason apparently was that, upon a very vital question, in the minister's mind, a question of policy in connection with the railway matter, the attitude of the men as represented by Mr. McLachlan, was such that he would not give them any commission. I do not know which was the real reason for refusal, but I know the grounds were absolutely inconsistent, one with the other.

The Premier gives illustrations, and makes an argument, for example, as to the peculiar position of this company, the peculiar complaint, and the peculiar interest the province has in connection with it He refers particularly to the school question, but there was much more than the school question. It is quite true my hon. friend did refer to the school question, but the memorandum refers to lots of things that are very largely in the hands of this Parliament. The memorandum says for example—

> We feel that, unless prompt and effective action is taken by the Government, matters too long drifting may break out into open hostilities to the lasting injury of the entire province.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, that is something which at least concerns, and very closely concerns, the Dominion authorities. But we are not driven to that one particular thing; there are many grounds that could be raised. What is the idea of a Labour Department? That is what we are concerned with. Is it to say that, because one party to the controversy is utterly and entirely unreasonable, no attempt shall be made to bring him to his senses? Is it because the issue is grave and difficult that the department is rendered absolutely impotent to take action? That apparently is the attitude. Nothing is to be done because one of the parties to this issue is entirely wrong. Well, to the extent of the wrong, I should have thought there was all the more work for the Department of Labour to do, if that department is to properly function. Here is a very serious labour dispute, and we have not a single suggestion made by the Minister of Labour as to how that dispute is to be settled, except that somebody else is to take up the job, and that he is not worrying about it. He will not go into it, the thing is too serious and the department will not deal with it, because these men are going to such absurd lengths that the department will not have anything to do with it.

How are you ever going to get people into a reasonable and proper frame of mind, assuming they are all wrong, unless you apply some of the excellent principles to be found so splendidly set out in the first part of the Prime Minister's book. He says in that book that the first underlying principle in the settlement of industrial disputes is that of the open conference which, he points out, cannot be applied unless you first bring the parties together, and at least try to make an honest attempt to settle across the table all differences. It is admitted here that this board of conciliation did not go upon the ground, or at least did not familiarize itself with the local situation. I do not know that the Government is to blame for that. I would not blame it for that at all. The Prime Minister in his argument to-day, asked,"How is the Government to blame for that?" The Government was not to blame for it. Absolutely not at all. There is no question of blaming anybody, but what we are finding fault with is the lack of action. The Government was not to blame one way or the other for what that commission did or did not do, and that commission may be absolutely all right, but the point is that the people there do not think it is all right. You have a deadlock. You have a Labour Department appointed for the purpose of breaking deadlocks, and I would have thought the more serious that deadlock, the more suffering entailed by it, the more necessary direct and urgent action on the part of that department.

I think the House is entitled to at least some statement from the Minister of Labour as to how this condition is to be properly handled, and to whom he has on the job, if he has anybody there. Apparently he has nobody there, and why? Because it is a mess, because it is a difficult proposition, the people ought to be left absolutely and entirely to their own resources. It is said that Nova Scotia can look after itself. You might say that about any labour trouble in any province in this country, but why have we a Labour Department? We are maintaining a Labour Department to settle these matters.

The same argument might be made as to the Alberta trouble. The Labour Department took action in that case and brought peace and production to the coal fields there. They did not do that by saying "We have no jurisdiction." They did it by going on the ground, and getting the parties together.

Mr. LOGAN: Does the hon. gentleman not know that the mines of Alberta are the property of the federal government while the mines of Nova Scotia are the property of the provincial government?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. gentleman is right in part of his statement. Some of the mines are and some are not entirely outside of the Government's jurisdiction. But in any event I do not think it would make very much difference to any government determined to see that no stone was left unturned in order that the differences might be settled. All we ask is an expression of opinion from the Government as to what they propose to do. More than that, there is that large public interest to which my hon. friend the Prime Minister refers. What is going to be done for the protection of that public interest? Because some man has gone too far here or there is surely no reason why public interest ought to be overlooked.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): At this late hour I do not propose to detain the House for any great length of time in discussing this question. That it is a question of very serious moment is quite evident from the information disclosed in the debate to-day, and it seems to me, with the present temper of the situation in Nova Scotia, there is a condition of affairs there that might easily and readily become more serious even than it is at the present time. That is a question which neither the government of Nova Scotia nor the Government of Canada can afford lightly to pass over. I am not going to enter into a discussion of the question of paying dividends on watered stock of the British Empire Steel Corporation. The question of watered stock in corporations is, in my judgment, a question that might well engage the attention of this House, because I think that a very great deal of the industrial trouble we have had in this country is due to the fact that the management of corporations are inclined to earn returns on stock that is very greatly inflated. I do not wish, however, to discuss that aspect of the matter to-night.

I rise mainly for the purpose of offering a suggestion to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Government,, and it is one which under the circumstances might very well be accepted. As to the attitude they have taken in regard to the appointing of a royal commission, it appears to me that there is considerable force in the arguments advanced by the Prime Minister. There was a Conciliation board appointed several months ago to inquire into this whole matter. It seems pretty generally admitted by all parties to the dispute, and the public as well, that the board of concilliation did not discharge its duties as fully as possible in the way of seeking information from the miners themselves, and from a study of the question in the precise areas affected, as it might have done. I am quite sure that the man whom the miners appointed as their representative on that board is one in whom they had confidence. The atmosphere in which the board of conciliation approached this work several months ago is totally different from the atmosphere that exists at the present time, and I would offer a suggestion to the Government. It was hinted at by the Prime Minister, and I trust it will be acted upon.

The board of conciliation might very well be reconstituted now and asked to inquire into the whole question in the light of the present situation as it exists in Nova Scotia in the areas concerned.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand that the Minister of Labour has indicated that if any one of the members of the board asks to have it reconvened to inquire into the matters in dispute, he will take steps to have this done. If I am not correct in that statement, I do not hesitate to say that the Government will be glad to act on the suggestion of my hon. friend, if a request comes from any member of the board.

Mr. CRERAR: I am glad to hear that from the lips of the Prime Minister. I am not quite familiar enough with the law to know whether or not it would lie in the initiative of the Government to take that step. If it does, then I submit that the Prime Minister would be well advised in taking it. After all, the great force of public opinion is perhaps the strongest force that operates in the settlement of these disputes, and I have not seen, either to-day or yesterday, or even before, although it may have escaped my observation, that this way has again been tried in the consideration of this matter. As the Prime Minister has pointed out, a board of conciliation has all the powers of inquiry that a royal commission has, and if that board is reconvened—and I presume it is still in existence—and takes up its work again, making an inquiry in the light of the situation as it exists, you may find the temper on both sides of the dispute at such a point that the parties could find a common ground on which to arrive at a settlement. People have to quarrel sometimes for a certain length of time before they can reach common ground, and after a dispute has been accentuated and the atmosphere has become tense, people, not only the parties to the dispute but the great force of public opinion outside, have impressed upon their minds the gravity of the matter, and you have a situation that makes a solution possible. I do hope that the Government will take this step. I think it is their duty to do so, and if, as I understand, it lies within their initiative to do it, it can be properly said, I think, that they have discharged their duty fully in the matter. Then, if in the full light of what takes place, a settlement is not reached, at any rate the Government and Parliament will have the satisfaction of knowing that everything was done that could possibly have been done.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): I do not indulge the hope that I shall be able to add a single new thought to the discussion, but I should like to concentrate the attention of the House upon what I believe to be the really vital point of the whole matter; and what I have to say is very much in line with what my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) has said. Most of my knowledge of this matter came from my presence at the interview with the gentlemen who waited upon the Government yesterday, the four mayors from Springhill and the three towns in Cape Breton. I had a general knowledge before, but the precise information that I have on the subject I have derived from these gentlemen.

Now, listening to the discussion in the early part of the debate, one would have thought that there had been no machinery for dealing with matters of this kind. My hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Irvine) pictured the scene of the miners coming to the Dominion Government and finding that nothing could be done, and going to the local government and meeting with the same experience. He then asked what in the world was there for the miners to do but something which he did not suggest but left us to guess at. Is that a fair statement of the case? That would imply that we had no machinery whatever for dealing with such a situation, and if that were the case it would be deplorable indeed. But that is not a fair statement of the matter. We have machinery for dealing with these things, and too little attention has been given to the fact that such machinery has been employed. As a matter of fact it has been set in motion.

Let us see what was done. Under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act the miners named as their representative a Mr. Ling, a very intelligent, earnest and respected member of the mining community, who has the honour to occupy the position of mayor of his town. The British Empire Steel Corporation, for reasons of their own, did not nominate a man. The late government, exercising the power they had, nominated a gentleman in Halifax, Colonel Thompson. I have the pleasure of knowing Colonel Thompson, who is a most respected citizen, and who, I am perfectly sure, approached his duties with a sincere desire to act fairly to every one. The parties not being able to agree, the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) appointed a Mr. Gillen, from Toronto. I do not know Mr. Gillen, but I understand that he is a man of large experience and is much respected all round. I spoke to Mr. Ling yesterday, who was a member of the board and one of the four mayors that came to see us. I said: "The burden of your difficulty appears to be that the tribunal met at Halifax and did not meet at Cape Breton or Springhill?" He answered, "Yes." "Well," I said, "you were a member of the board. Did you move that it should go to Cape Breton?" "No," he said, "I asked the question and I was told that it would sit at Halifax." I have no doubt he meant well, but it would seem that, had he attached much importance to a meeting at Cape Breton, he would have done more than merely ask a question as to whether the board would meet there. He would have appealed to the Minister of Labour. I turned to the Minister of Labour sitting next to me and said, "Were you ever asked to direct the commission as to where they would meet?" "No," he said; "had I been asked I would have gladly given such direction."

The picture they presented of the situation with regard to the schools and the children, and the general condition in those towns, is so deplorable that it has moved all of us to sympathy. But I do not think the right steps were taken, and I think Mr. Ling would admit now that he should have requested a meeting of the commission at Sydney. He did not do so. I suggested to him, "Would not that be now the best way? I am not sure," I said, "speaking from memory, whether the Minister of Labour would have power to revive the commission, but if that could be done would it meet the case?" Well, he was not prepared to answer for other people, he was not representing the labour men; as has been said, he was representing the community generally. I said, "Won't you admit, Mr. Ling, that if the commission could be revived and go down to Cape Breton and discuss the question on the ground, it might lead to satisfactory results?" He answered, "Perhaps it would." "I do not understand," I said, "that you are questioning either the integrity or the competency of the commission?" "No," he answered. I then put this further question to him, "You think Mr. Gillen was trying to do right?" "Yes," he replied. Then I added, "You have confidence in Mr. Gillen, and Colonel Thompson has the confidence of everybody. Why in the world cannot you get together and have the matter adjusted in that way?"

That is exactly what my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) has suggested. I think that can be done. Let us get the commission together again, if the machinery of the law will permit, and let them see with their own eyes the unhappy conditions which prevail—let them as good citizens and honoured members of that tribunal make an effort to bring about a settlement of this unfortunate misunderstanding. But I think the workmen and the company ought to be both asked: If we give you this investigation by the tribunal, and you bring before them all the evidence you wish, will you give us an assurance that you will accept whatever decision may be then reached?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do I understand that this suggestion which my hon. friend made, and which still stands, that the old tribunal be reconstituted and go down to Cape Breton and make an investigation on the ground, is wholly irrespective of the order issued by Mr. McLachlan, or conditional on that order being revoked?

Mr. FIELDING: I made no condition about Mr. McLachlan at all, in fact I had not given that phase of the question much thought, but I think if we have legal power —and the Minister of Labour holds that we have—to revive the commission—I do not like the term "revive"; I think the commission is still alive—they should be asked to resume the inquiry, go to Cape Breton and acquaint themselves sympathetically with conditions on the ground. I have every hope that if that is done you will have a satisfactory conclusion of the difficulty.

Mr. IRVINE: Mr. Speaker, after what seems to be a very happy termination of this discussion—

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil): I have to inform the House that once the hon. member for East Calgary has spoken the debate is closed.

Mr. IRVINE: After the very happy spirit which has developed, Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for me to prolong the debate. The good spirit began to develop after the brilliant presentation of the case by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) who concluded by saying, "It is not yet too late to do something"; then the Prime Minister followed and exhibited a spirit of sympathetic interest in the great problems of the nation which I think was helpful to all who listened to him; and, finally, the leader of the Progressives made a concrete suggestion, which was endorsed by the hon. Minister of Finance and accepted by the Prime Minister. I do not know if the course suggested will result in a solution, as a matter of fact I do not contend that any government can find an absolute solution for any problem, but I am very glad to see that so much interest has been created in this particular case.

In summing up the debate I wish to make it quite clear that I did not suggest the appointment of a royal commission. I have just as little faith in royal commissions as have hon. members on this side of the House. I never suggested that. But I have to a very great extent got all that I was trying to secure in the suggestion which has been made. It seems to me however, that it was not fair on the part of the hon. Minister of Labour to claim that the Government has the right to make a stipulation to the miners that it does not make to the other side concerned in this row. The hon. Minister of Finance suggested, if I heard him correctly, that they had the right to exact from both parties a promise to accept the finding of the commission. I think that is reasonable; but to expect that the men alone shall make that promise does not seem to me at all fair.

I am delighted that throughout this prolonged debate there has been no incursion into party politics, but that the question before the House and the country has been discussed in such an excellent spirit and with such excellent results.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil): The hon. member's object having been attained, will he consent to withdraw the motion?

Mr. IRVINE: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I consent.

Motion (Mr. Irvine) withdrawn.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 11.30 p.m.

Friday, March 31, 1922

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 25 to amend the Penitentiary Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Explain.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: This bill is to amend two sections of the Penitentiary Act in order to permit prisoners suffering from infectious diseases to be returned from the penitentiaries to the provincial authorities for treatment. The amendment is being made at the request of the provincial authorities, who are in doubt as to their power in the matter.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER ADJOURNMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ANDREW KNOX (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask, partly for my own benefit and partly for the benefit of those who, like myself, live at a considerable distance from Ottawa, when the Easter adjournment will take place and for how long.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The custom in previous years has been to adjourn on the Wednesday prior to Good Friday until the following Tuesday. Unless there is desire on the part of the House for some other arrangement, it is the intention of the Government to follow that custom. However, the Government would like to consult the wishes of hon. members in the matter.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, SASKATCHEWAN COURT OF APPEAL

On motion of Sir Lomer Gouin (Minister of Justice), Bill No. 19, to amend the Judges Act, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On section 1—puisne judges of Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan increased from 3 to 4:

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is struck out by this amendment?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: One clause is repealed and replaced by another. It is simply providing for four judges instead of three.

Mr. CRERAR: That is the only change?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Mr. CHURCH: I have no desire to oppose this bill, but I wish to point out that there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction throughout the country with regard to judges of the High Court leaving their judicial duties for the purpose of serving on provincial commissions. The matter has been the subject of discussion by the Bar Associations of some of the provinces. The judiciary of Canada have always been on a high plane and have commanded the respect of everybody, and it would be well if the minister would lay down a policy under which judges of the High Court might not serve on these political commissions. In fact, an act was passed a few years ago prohibiting them from doing so. It is not in the interests of the Bench; it is not in the interests of the judicial business of the province. The practice to which I refer has prevailed not only in Ontario but in various parts of the West and the East. In Ontario three judges of the High Court have been leaving their judicial duties during several months in the year to serve on these commissions. Before we pass this bill the minister should give us an assurance that without the addition proposed the number of judges in Saskatchewan would be insufficient. If three judges in Ontario can leave their judicial duties for four or five months in the year, it means that there are too many High Court judges in that province, and the same thing may apply to Saskatchewan and other parts of the country. This practice must stop if the confidence of the people in the judiciary is to be maintained. I trust that the minister will see that the act passed a few years ago with regard to the matter is enforced.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The law which my hon. friend refers to has been enforced, and it is our intention to have it enforced in the future.

Mr. BAXTER: When this matter was before the Committee the other day I expressed the view that there was some disparity between the members of the judiciary in Saskatchewan and those in the other western provinces. On looking up the number of judges provided for in the Estimates I find that I was quite right. In Manitoba, which is very populous and wealthy and must have more legal business than some of the other provinces, there are eleven judges in all,—the Chief Justice of the Court of Appeal and four judges; the Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench and five judges. In British Columbia there is a Chief Justice of the Court of Appeal and four judges; a Chief Justice of the Supreme Court and five judges, a total of eleven. In Alberta there is a Chief Justice and four justices of the peace; a Chief Justice of the Trial Division and five justices, a total of eleven. At present in Saskatchewan there is a Chief Justice of the Court of Appeal and three judges; a Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench and six judges, a total of eleven. Now, the western provinces have each the same number of judges, though they are not distributed in the same way as between the Court of Appeal and the Trial Division. It is now sought to add another judge in Saskatchewan; and I would like to ask the Government and the House how long it will be before Saskatchewan will be taken as the measure and a judge added to each of the other western provinces. It seems to me that it is making in that direction. I suggested the other day that it was only necessary for Saskatchewan, if the division was not satisfactory, to increase the number of its Appellate Division, and reduce that of the Trial Division, by one. They would thus be able to adjust the present judiciary to the actual work of the province. I had investigated the reports very cursorily, but I examined them with a little more attention later, and I found that I had greatly overestimated the number of cases coming before the Court of Appeal in Saskatchewan. In fact, ninety was the total in one volume of the reports, covering a year,—much less than I had thought. The Trial Division reports are put in with those of the Appeal Division and it makes it look like quite a large volume. I assume, however, that the excuse for this legislation is to be found in the newspaper reports, which indicate that the appointment of a gentleman as judge in that province has already been decided upon. In view of the political outlook in Saskatchewan, I suppose it is extremely necessary to provide for some one; therefore the country must pay an additional $9,000 each year for something that is not needed, except to support an appointee of the Government who might not be as politically fortunate, as his friends in this House have been.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We are informed by the legislature of Saskatchewan that the appointment is necessary. I have not heard any such rumour as my hon. friend has mentioned.

Mr. BAXTER: The hon. gentleman does not read the papers.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Well, I do not read all of them. The hon. member must himself admit that a tribunal consisting of four judges is not sufficient to carry on the work in that province. No additional judges in the Trial Division are needed. As I stated the other day when the resolution was before the Committee, we are merely supplementing the legislation of Saskatchewan. We have been advised by hon. members of this House that the cases before the Court of Appeal in that province are so numerous that a large number are in arrears. I think this is a sufficient answer to my hon. friend's representations.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE BILL

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Militia and Defence) moved the second reading of Bill No. 15, respecting the Department of National Defence.

Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington): I rise to a point of order in regard to this bill. I sumbit that this is a bill which seeks to impose a public charge —it certainly does by clause 5—and that it should therefore come before the House in the usual way by resolution after the assent of His Excellency has been obtained. I think it is Rule 77 that covers the case. The practice we have always followed should be followed now, I submit.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think my hon. friend will find that the purpose of this bill is to reduce the public charge. So far from the bill proposing any extra charge on the country, its effect will be to reduce very considerably the present charge.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My point is this: This bill proposes a charge upon the people of this country. It is in regard to pensions, and gives the Governor in Council power to increase the pensions now allowed by law by adding from one to three years in the computation of the time, thereby largely increasing the amount the country will have to pay. That charge is being imposed for the first time, and I therefore submit that the bill comes within Rule 77 and should be preceded by a resolution.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Militia): As a matter of fact, I imagine, this bill will not impose any additional financial burdens on the country, but will rather lessen those burdens, although they may be carried under another name. This bill was submitted to the Parliamentary Counsel and declared not to be a money bill. He was strong on that point, before I introduced the bill in this way. However, if the hon. gentleman wishes to delay the bill, I am willing to bring down a resolution, but, of course, it will delay the beginning of the reorganization that much longer.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): Does the hon. member (Mr. Guthrie) press his objection?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not strongly insisting, but I do think that the rule should be followed, or a precedent may be set up that will be invoked later.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): Rule 77 clearly provides that money bills must be preceded by a resolution.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend will appreciate that I have postponed this bill for a good many days at his request, and now he is the first to object to our going on with it. I maintain that this is not a money bill, but in order that there may be no question I will withdraw my motion for the second reading, and proceed by way of resolution.

Motion withdrawn.

On the motion of Mr. Graham, the Order was discharged.

SUPPLY

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Civil Government—Department of Labour—Salaries, $258,755; contingencies, $45,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: At a previous sitting I asked the minister for information as to the amount of money expended last year on account of the forty-two temporary employees. Perhaps he could now give that information.

Mr. MURDOCK: I have here a list of the forty-two temporary clerks in the Department of Labour when I assumed charge of that office, most of whom, indeed, I think all of them except one, are still there. I will read the list:

The appointment of private secretary was made after I took office. The confidential messenger was a temporary employee in the office when I came there, the date of his appointment being as specified. He was made the confidential messenger of the minister with the specified increase in salary whatever it amounts to—I think it is some $300 a year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What is the total?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am sorry to say the figures have not been totalled but I can very readily make the count.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Never mind, we can get that information later. My hon. friend pointed out the manner in which the increases were made but what I want to find out from him, irrespective of that, is this: Are any of these salaries too high, and if so what are they?

Mr. MURDOCK: It would be entirely unbecoming, under the existing condition of the law, for the Minister of Labour to even hazard a view as to the consistency of wage rates now in effect with respect to the various classes of civil service as established and maintained by the Civil Service Commission, a body appointed under the preceding government. While, no doubt, I might hold certain definite views in regard to these matters, it would appear to me as being entirely unbecoming that I should be called upon to express my individual opinion on the subject at this time, especially when I have no jurisdiction whatsoever over this question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would have thought that the minister responsible for these payments would be able to give the Committee an idea as to whether the payments ought to be made or not. After all, he is the minister who has chiefly to do with the wage scales of the country, and kindred subjects. He is held to be an authority on what are considered fair wages and what rates ought to be paid in the respective cases, and surely we ought to be able to appeal with confidence to him for information as to whether, in these or other cases, the salaries we are paying are too high or too low.

Mr. MURDOCK: If the House in its wisdom should later assign to me the duty of determining what should be a consistent and proper wage rate for the various civil servants I should then consider I would have an absolute right to answer the question of my hon. friend. At present it would not be fair—and I am sure my hon. friend does not want to put me in such a position—to ask me to express my opinion as to any individual rate paid, because these rates are established by the Civil Service Commission, an heirloom of which has been bequeathed to us from the previous government, and whose recommendations we are now following.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: If there is such an "heirloom", and it is bad in its character, I do not know why the minister does not puncture that heirloom, unless it is from any false sense of modesty, a sentiment I would not have ascribed to him. Now what I am asking is this: My hon. friend said, in connection with these estimates that there were large increases made in a particular way for particular reasons. I know my hon. friend is not in charge of all the other departments, nor is he sitting in general judgment upon the Civil Service Commission, but he is in control of his own department and he knows what kind of work the different members of his staff have to do. There is no use in talking about these things in generalities; there is not a bit of good in ministers coming here and saying "We have got big votes but it is the Civil Service Commission that is responsible". The thing they can say, and they will help us by saying it, is "In our department we know the work that is carried on and we ought only to ask for so much money for this man or that man". If the minister has not considered that view of the subject he ought to do so before these estimates are passed.

Mr. MURDOCK: I think I appreciate fully what my hon. friend from West York (Sir Henry Drayton) would like to get me to do, but he has not a chance on earth of inducing me to meet his wishes. I will, however, go in the direction of meeting the hon. member's desires by expressing this view: A few days ago a deputation waited on me in this city and said they represented some forty-five returned soldiers who have been discharged as physically fit under D.S.C.R. regulations. These men I was told—all of them under civil service regulations, and most of them married—were being required to work for $720 a year. I will express to my hon. friend the belief that a man cannot in decency, in this Canada of ours under the existing conditions, maintain a family as Canadians should, live on $720 a year. Of course it must be admitted that at the present time there is a bonus attached to that salary. I do not know what the result is going to be in that respect, but if my hon. friend wants to get my view on any question affecting the existing salaries that is the only opinion I would care to express. As regards the individual employees in my department, my hon. friend flatters me when he even suggests that I have even been able as yet to get a line upon the work of every individual employee. I find there have not been sufficient hours in the day during the past three months for me to accomplish anything of the kind. However, I hope that, if I continue in my present position, when I again come to this House with estimates I shall have a better grasp of the situation in that regard. I hope to know if the various employees in the department are worth the amount of this country's money that is being paid to them for the duties they are called upon to perform, but at the present time I doubt my ability to give you any detailed information as to whether any or all of the employees in the department are overpaid or underpaid.

Mr. MARTELL: Is it not a fact that the employees of the Labour Department, as well as all the employees in all other departments in the inside civil service, have to receive a certain salary until they get to the maximum, whether you want to give it to them or not, or whether they are worth it or not?

Mr. MURDOCK: The hon. gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I feel very diffident in disagreeing with so final a pronouncement from the last court of appeal as that just given by the Minister of Labour, but I am compelled to. He tells this House that, no matter what may be the will of the Government, or of this Parliament, these men must get the salaries set opposite their names because the Civil Service Commission says so.

Mr. MURDOCK: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, if he understood me to say that, I can only say that I did not intend to convey any such impression.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What did the hon. minister say?

Mr. MURDOCK: I understood the hon. gentleman from Hants (Mr. Martell) to ask me if it was not a fact that these salaries and the increases in the salaries were set forth, and that I was compelled to pay them, whether I wanted to or not. I answered, yes. The Civil Service regulations so far as I know—and I have some things to learn yet—provide for just that, no more and no less. I am not dealing with what this House can do.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not see very much difference between what the hon. minister says and what I ascribed to him, but he will not get out of responsibility in that way.

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not want to.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And I do not want the hon. gentleman to get out of the responsibility, although he has been trying hard to. The Civil Service Commission has a duty under the act. That duty is to define the duties and to allocate the salary that is in their view commensurate with the duties and responsibilities of each office. With that duty they are intrusted by the Civil Service Act. But no civil servant has a right at all to any salary until this House passes upon it and decides that it is a proper one. And when the minister comes to this House with his estimates, he says: Those are the salaries that I think right, and I ask this House to vote them. That is his responsibility.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Fine hair-splitting.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not the hon. gentleman's hair I am trying to split, my idea is to get it into his head.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Thank you, teacher.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If I only had his hair to deal with, it would be an easier task.

Mr. McMASTER: That is the barber's business.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When a minister comes to Parliament he takes his responsibility for the fairness of the salaries. He is in a position to say, "The Civil Service Commission recommends these salaries, they believe they are fair and right, and I have behind me their support." But he cannot say, "I am bound to put these salaries in the Estimates because that is the view of the Civil Service Commission"—not at all. He may come to Parliament as a new minister and say, "I have the Civil Service Commission's recommendation of this schedule as a fair one. I do not understand the department fully. I have not had an opportunity of reviewing the duties of office, and, therefore, I do not feel justified in coming to the House and asking for an alteration." There might be some reason in that, but if he comes to the House and says, "I have no responsibility in this matter at all, the Civil Service Commission has done it, and that is an end of it", what is the good of coming to Parliament at all? Are we here merely to put our imprimatur upon what the Civil Service Commission says? Not at all. The minister's responsibility is that he recommends these salaries to this committee, each and every one of them, and he cannot escape that responsibility. He may appeal to the Committee not to ask him to take the responsibility of modifying any of these estimates because of his inexperience in the department. It will be for the committee to decide the value of that plea. But do not let him come here and repeat over and over again that he has not the responsibility; because he has.

Mr. MURDOCK: Will the hon. member state when and where I said I had no responsibility?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not need to, because the Committee heard the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK: Will the hon. gentleman please not misquote me to this House. I will assume full responsibility now and ever.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think I have gone far enough.

Mr. MURDOCK: I think so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister now says he has the responsibility, but I am sure no one in this House ever thought that he admitted the responsibility until he got up the last time. If the hon. minister came to Parliament and struck twenty per cent off each of those salaries, the reduced amount would be all the civil servants would receive, and there would be no violation of any law whatever.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Civil Service Act.

Mr. HOEY: As a new member, I would like to know if it has been customary in the past to change the schedules as brought down.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have been changed. The government come to Parliament and say "We recommend salaries which the Civil Service Commission recommended to us. We accept them and take the responsibility to ask Parliament to pass them. We think they are right."

Mr. MURDOCK: Would the hon. gentleman answer me one question: Has the matter ever been handled, in the case of one individual, as the hon. gentleman indicates? If I thought for a moment of doing what the right hon. gentleman, no doubt, would like to have me do, would it not be necessary for the entire schedule and every salary in the classification so dealt with to go back to the Civil Service Commission for re-arrangement and re-classification before being submitted here?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all. If the hon. minister feels that he would be right in recommending to this House the reduction of $1,000 in any one salary, then the action of this House is final, and the reduced amount would be all that the official affected could receive. The minister would take the responsibility of doing so, out of line with the classification of the commission, but his decision, supported by this House, would be final. Suppose, for example, a motion were made to reduce the salary of any one, and that motion carried, that would prevail. The hon. gentleman would have to take the responsibility of saying whether he thought it should be reduced or not, acquiescing in the motion or not, but whatever the decision of the House is on these Estimates, that fixes the salary to be paid.

Mr. MURDOCK: Do I get an answer to my first question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is, if it was ever done.

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why, certainly it has been done. Votes have been struck out and votes reduced. But the Government asks for a certain vote. That is a Government motion, and, if it is not carried, the Government itself on that vote is defeated. If the hon. minister wants to stand by his estimates, let him do so, but it is his responsibility to stand by them. Do not let him lead hon. gentlemen to believe that he is powerless to reduce his estimates, because he is not powerless by any means.

Mr. MURDOCK: Will the hon. gentleman answer my question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the question?

Mr. MURDOCK: The question is—can the right hon. gentleman indicate to me one individual case of a civil service regulation where this House ever assumed the authority or taken the unquestioned authority to reduce a salary specified by the Civil Service Commission as equitable for a classified position? I want to know of one concrete case, and as a youthful person, inexperienced in a parliamentary way, surely, if there is going to be criticism, I am entitled to that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What the hon. gentleman asks is this—Has there ever been a case where a Government, coming in with its Estimates, which followed the Civil Service classification, has had the estimate of a salary reduced?

Mr. MURDOCK: That is not what I asked at all—a Government coming in. My question was whether it had happened in the past.

Mr .MEIGHEN: That is the case. The Government comes in with its Estimates, and the Government's Estimates, the hon. gentleman says, are supported by the Civil Service Commission and in accordance with the classication. I do not know of a case where the Government did not stand by them, or where the salary of a single man was reduced; but that was because the House supported the Government; the House never sought to evade its responsibility, never in the world, until the hon. gentleman came into office.

Mr. BELAND: Has the right hon. gentleman any recollection of the ordinary increase provided for by the classification being challenged on the floor of the House by any hon. member?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was not able to attend to the Estimates very carefully when I was Prime Minister, but I am told by hon. gentlemen around me that last session motions were made to reduce salaries.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not on Civil Government. I should like my right hon. friend to point out a case.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Cannot such a motion be entertained?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not the point. My right hon. friend has made the statement that last session it was done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said that I was informed it was done. I do not know of any case where, on a Government coming in with its Estimates, there was a reduction in the Civil Government Estimates, if an estimate had behind it the Civil Service classification. But the Government is responsible for presenting its Estimates; the Government can recommend to the House reductions. If an hon. member moves that the salary of any civil servant be reduced, the Government can accept the reduction, and that fixes the salary of the man. That is what I am concerned to have the members of the committee understand. Does the hon. gentleman say that that is not right?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend is perfectly right in making the statement in the form in which he is now presenting it. Certainly, as I have listened to what he has been saying, he has been endeavouring to convey a wholly different impression of what the minister had in mind when speaking of his responsibility. Let me put the matter to the House in a way that, I think, will make perfectly clear what the minister is seeking to demonstrate. The present Government comes into office and finds certain salaries attached to certain positions. It finds that those positions have been graded by the Civil Service Commission; that the previous government has asked for certain sums of money, and that Parliament has appropriated those sums for the particular positions mentioned in the Estimates. The minister, when he is about to prepare his estimates for Parliament, calls in the permanent head of the department, his deputy minister, and he asks him to state what, in his opinion, are the estimates required to carry on the work of the department. The deputy minister presents his estimates. The minister asks him: "Are there any increases here other than those which are required by statute? Are there any new appointments? Has any clerk been given a promotion which he should not have received or which he is not entitled to? Eplain the estimates in that way." The deputy minister then makes his statement, informing the minister that the estimates are entirely in accord with what they have been in the previous year; that the only increases are those that are required by statute, and that all have been approved by the Civil Service Commission. The minister may take one of two courses. He may say: "I am anxious to keep this whole matter out of Parliament. I am desirous of having the Civil Service feel a sense of security, knowing that there will be no interference on the part of the Government or the minister. Therefore, I will come to Parliament with the estimates exactly as they have been prepared and presented to me by my deputy minister." That is what my hon. friend is doing at the present time. On the other hand, he may take the opposite course. He may say: "I am minister of the department now; I am going to look into the salaries; I am going to cut down so many clerks, promote other clerks, ignore the Civil Service Commission altogether. I am master of this particular department at the present time, and I propose to exercise my authority in that way." That is the kind of responsibility that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) has refused to exercise. As my right hon. friend says, he as the minister has the power, but to exercise it is to begin to interfere from a political point of view, and that is what hon. members on this side and members of the Government have refused to do. They have sought to respect the Civil Service as being outside of politics altogether, and, in the Estimates which they bring before the House, to be governed by the recommendations of the permanent heads of departments who know the service, and by the approval of the Civil Service Commission. My hon. friend has stated that, during the course of the year, once the ministry has been in office for a time, opportunity will be afforded to the different ministers to see whether there is a necessity for retaining in some of the departments the large number of clerks who are there at the present time. Up to the present, no minister has had the opportunity to become fully acquainted with his department. But at this moment, to strike out of the Estimates some sums which may be necessary for clerks who are there at the present time, might be to do a great injustice to many members of the Civil Service. All we are asking is that Parliament vote what it voted in previous years, plus the regular statutory increases, and allow the ministers time to look through their departments; and when we meet Parliament again, or before we meet Parliament again, if some of those services are overmanned they will be reduced and the money will not be taken out of the public treasury. But there is a great deal of difference between a minister saying: "I will not take the responsibility of interfering with the recommendations of my deputy head, those recommendations having been approved by the Civil Service Commission," and one saying: "I do not take any responsibility at all."

Mr. MEIGHEN: I take no exception to any sentence of the hon. member; what he has said is precisely the truth that I was trying to express myself; but it is precisely the responsibility that the language, if not the intent, of the minister was designed to make the country believe he did not have.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Not at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He has that responsibility. It is true, if he takes this man and that man and reduces their salaries and recommends those reductions to the committee, he might be charged with favouritism, with politics. That is what the Prime Minister fears. But the responsibility is the minister's. I would suggest to him that if he really favours reduction and does not want to be charged with favouritism or politics, there is another way in which he can act. He can come to the committee and recommend a reduction of ten or twenty per cent all along the line. That is quite within his power; the responsibility of the recommendation is his; the responsibility of the decision is his and this committee's for every salary in the list. I am ready to accept the minister's plea that he has not sufficient knowledge of his department to convince him whether there are too many clerkships or not, whether the salaries are too high or not; but I cannot help making this reflection, that hon. members, before the last election, had much greater knowledge of those departments than they have now. Before the last election we heard all sorts of talk about the "barnacles of the civil service". Why, the Civil Service was cluttered and clogged, and you could not get through, and salaries were too high, and all the rest of it! They had their information sufficient to warrant them in making these assertions broadcast. Yet, three months and more after they have taken office, almost four months after the election, they do not know enough about the departments to make any changes at all. If they know less now than they knew three months ago, how much less will they know a year from now? The progress of ignorance seems to be rapid. I accept the hon. gentleman's argument that he has not been in the department long enough to find out whether it is overmanned or overpaid. Nevertheless this is not the only respect in which the loud-sounding phrases of the manifesto fell down in realization.

Mr. JACOBS: You cannot forget them.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Lord loveth a cheerful giver;—and the public love a cheerful loser. My right hon. friend seems to take every opportunity—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Don't flatter me.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not have to; it shows for itself. My right hon. friend seems to take every opportunity to show his vinegary disposition. It was not always so; he was usually good.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just cold water.

Mr. GRAHAM: Then he comes to the rescue of his friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), just as if he had not said enough. If it had not been for the remarks of the Prime Minister, I leave it to hon. members to say whether they would not have been misled by the statement of the right hon. leader of the Opposition. He implied that it was in the discretion of the Minister of Labour to move the reduction of the salaries of civil servants that had been fixed by the Civil Service Commission, and that that would do no harm. Why, it would practically repeal the Civil Service Act to that extent, because the act provides, in effect, that these salaries shall not be left to the minister to fix, nor shall the appointments be left to him to make, but that both the appointments shall be made and the salaries fixed by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Subject to the approval of Parliament.

Mr. GRAHAM: Subject to the approval of Parliament. But Parliament approved that law in the first place and gave the Civil Service Commission that power, and until Parliament repeals that act it must continue in force, and any action taken by the Minister of Labour or any other minister to move to reduce a salary for a certain office—I am not saying a certain official, because the salary is attached to the office, not to the official—any such action would be equivalent to repealing the Civil Service Act so far as that particular salary was concerned.

Let me point out to the committee a concrete example of what power the Civil Service Commission has,—always subject to Parliament; that of course, goes without saying, for we can repeal the whole act just as well as we can repeal one section by doing as the right hon. gentleman suggests we have power to do. No one questions the power of Parliament to repeal any act, but so long as the Civil Service Act is in force a minister cannot, without contravening the spirit of that legislation, reduce any salary fixed by the commission, and everyone knows that.

Mr. ARTHURS: He could reduce the personnel.

Mr. GRAHAM: He can dismiss an official for cause, but he cannot appoint another in his place. In other words, he can reduce the personnel, but not change it. Le me point out a concrete case. A committee in the Militia Department, composed of certain officials of the department and one member of the Civil Service Commission, proceeded to reclassify that department some months ago under the instructions of the then minister;—this was before my time. That committee brought in a report classifying, I think, 190 officials and fixing their salaries. Eighty-two of those 190 officials appealed to the Civil Service Commission and got their salaries increased, notwithstanding the fact that the minister had approved of the lower classification made by the committee. That shows that the Civil Service Commission is intended, under the act that created it, to fix salaries, even if those salaries are higher than the scale proposed by Parliament.

Mr. BIRD: Does the minister think it wise and in accordance with our parliamentary traditions that the expenditure of public money should be taken from the sphere of effective criticism by this House?

Mr. GRAHAM: Certainly not. Hon. members would have the right to move for the repeal of the Civil Service Act if they wished.

Mr. BIRD: Would the hon. minister approve of that course being taken?

[Mr. Graham.]

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend must be Irish: he answers a question by asking another. That is a matter for discussion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am pointing out the effect of the act as it stands now.

Mr. BIRD: I should like to point out to the hon. minister the serious situation that arises here. We are engaged in the laborious process of criticising the Estimates, and yet it seems that all our labours are in vain, because when we try to bring our criticisms to bear we find the responsible minister of the Crown takes refuge by saying: These things are fixed before hand by the Civil Service Commission. I think it is a very serious feature of the present situation, and not in accordance with British parliamentary traditions which declare that all public expenditures should be subject to the effective criticism of parliament.

Mr. GRAHAM: That may be true.

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. Chairman, I should like very much indeed to expedite as far as possible the business of this committee. But as my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and others have chosen to "pick" on me in regard to this civil service question—and, personally, I do not mind that in the least—I am going to read into Hansard what purports to be a complete statement of this question as prepared by my honoured predecessor, Hon. Mr. Robertson. This statement, as I understand, was prepared for the Conservative government in the expectation of being able to show the wonderful benefits accruing to civil servants under the provisions of the Civil Service Act. It recites in detail the munificent and wonderful privileges and the sympathetic consideration enjoyed by civil servants through the acts of our predecessors in office. It would appear to be a very opportune time to place this statement on Hansard for the information of hon. members. It was evidently prepared, as will be noted before I finish reading it, after 1st October, 1921, just on the eve of the general election, for the purpose of showing what had been accomplished by adopting the Civil Service Commission method of dealing with the remuneration of civil servants.

Mr. ARTHURS: What is its date?

Mr. MURDOCK: After 1st October, 1921.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And before 6th December.

Mr. MURDOCK: It reads:

The Arthur Young Company was appointed by an Order in Council of August, 1918. Mr. Crerar was a member of the Government at that time, having been sworn in on October 12, 1917, resigning November, 1919.

The employment of Griffenhagen and Associates, Limited, was authorized by P.C. 1238, May 31st, 1920. Their contract was terminated by 60 days' notice, P.C. 296, February 7th, 1921.

The subcommittee of Council to consider proposed legislation re Civil Service and to draft a Bill to bring about proposed reforms, consisted of the Hon. A. K. Maclean, convener, Hon. N. W. Rowell, Hon. F. B. Carvell, and the Hon. G. D. Robertson, appointed by P.C. 372, February 18th, 1918.

"The Subcommittee on Reorganization and Efficiency, consisting of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, President of the Privy Council, the Minister of Labour, and the Minister of Immigration, appointed by Order in Council, P.C. 1238, May 31, 1920, was cancelled by P.C. 3649, October 3, 1921, which appointed instead of the foregoing, the Minister of Labour, the Secretary of State, and the Minister of Immigration. Employees who have up to date been blanketed in under the provisions of Order in Council of December 16, 1920, P.C. 2958—with overseas active service, 894 other females, 1,062; other males, 727; total, 2,638. Number of employees in Civil Service, 1913-14, 29,135; 1917-18, 44,378; 1919-20, 50,307; 1920-21, 41,641. The decrease shown by last figure is due mainly to the reductions in war departments. The above figures do not include rural postmasters. There were about 8,000 rural postmasters in 1914, and there are about 10.000 to-day.

The Union Government went to the country in 1917 with a definite policy to reorganize the Civil Service and to eliminate patronage. In implementing their promise they have carried out a reclassification of the Civil Service and a partial reorganization. The reclassification was carried out by, and under the direction of, the Civil Service Commission.

The merit system of promotion is now in full sway in the Civil Service, even in the higher positions. Clerks are selected from the ranks of juniors, seniors and branch heads from those below them, and so on right along the line. New employees are only taken into the service when there is no one suitable for promotion amongst the permanent employees. Patronage has been entirely eliminated. Examinations are practical instead of academic. The new order of things offers inducements and prizes to the highly trained man. Every position is graded and dovetailed into another of greater opportunity, responsibility and salary. Patronage is dead. Favouritism is as nearly eliminated as human nature and the inexorable processes of departmental procedure will permit. To-day entrance to the Civil Service is by way of competition and is ruthlessly just. Industry, integrity, and intelligence are now the only passports to success in the Civil Service, which offers opportunities worthy of the consideration of the best minds among the young men and women of Canada."—(Extract from a pamphlet recently issued by the Civil Service Commission.)

Some examples of merit promotion made recently are—

Mr. CHURCH: What has that letter to do with the item under consideration, Mr. Chairman? The minister is taking up the time of the committee with something that has nothing to do with the matter before us.

Mr. MURDOCK (reading):

Some examples of merit promotion made recently are: postmastership of Winnipeg, filled by the assistant postmaster; director of Printing Bureau, Deputy Minister of Finance; Assistant Deputy Minister of Finance; Assistant Deputy Minister of Interior; postmaster of Toronto.

Coincident with reclassification the Outside Service came under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. Previous to this, in the matter of promotions, the trail of patronage was apparent, and the more remunerative appointments were made under the direction of the Patronage Committee. This was particularly true in the Outside Service, where politics entered into every promotion and appointment. The lucrative posts in each locality were jealously guarded, and as no official was transferred from his district or promoted to higher duties in another place, promotion of any kind was almost unknown. The majority of officials in the Outside Service were without hope and many of them in great distress.

The Civil Service Commission was constituted in 1908. Their jurisdiction, however, was confined to the Inside Service and remained thus limited for ten years. During those years, in spite of attempted remedies, the patronage system survived and flourished. The many anomalies and abuses existing were discussed from time to time in Parliament, but so little practical and permanent improvement had resulted that the people were skeptical—

Mr. CHURCH: I rise to a point of order. What item of the Estimates is now being discussed, and is the letter which the minister is reading relative to that item?

The CHAIRMAN: The minister has the right to discuss the general policy of his department. The issue has been raised and he is now discussing that policy, particularly with reference to the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MANION: Mr. Chairman, may I just draw your attention—

Some hon MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member may not, if that is his intention, criticise the ruling which I have given.

Mr. MANION: I submit that the Chair cannot rule against an hon. member on that point unless he has first made such a criticism. I was just going to express the hope that in connection with all the Estimates we on this side shall be permitted to take that into account as well as the minister. The other day we were dealing with the question of soldiers' civil re-establishment and it was brought to our attention that we were out of order in discussing matters of general policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am sorry that it is necessary to do this; I am doing it only because hon. members seem to want something from me.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MURDOCK (reading):

So little practical and permanent improvement had resulted that the people were skeptical and the service itself, than whom none knew better the need for reform, was well nigh losing hope of salvation. However, Sir Robert Borden's manifesto on the eve of the election in December, 1917, placed the matter in a clear light. Next to the determination to "win the war," "Civil Service reform" was the chief plank in the platform of the Union Government, and immediately after the general election—

Mr. CHURCH: I rise to a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: If you refer to this green book containing the rules of procedure of the House you will find it provides that speeches in committee must be relevant to the item under consideration. What are we now discussing that makes that letter relevant? I ask for the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. MURDOCK: We are discussing the civil government estimates of the Department of Labour, which we started to discuss two or three nights ago, not the Printing Bureau items, which the hon. member for North Toronto got into a discussion of.

(Reading):

Immediately after the general election the entire outside service was placed under the control of the Civil Service Commission. Subsequently on the 24th of May, 1918, a Civil Service Act was sanctioned providing for a reclassification and reorganization of all departments and extending the powers of the Commission to cover all appointments and promotions in the outside service.

In recent years the people have evidenced a growing interest in the administration of the public service. They are demanding more and better service. Now, as never before, the greatest economy is necessitated by the financial burdens resulting from the War.

In the reclassification of such a large army of workers, it was inevitable that there should be some dissatisfaction with the grades awarded, but a right of appeal was given to a Board of Hearing, and this resulted in many individuals being re-graded. Previous to Reclassification, there was no appeal against any seeming injustice or unfairness; influence was the only thing that helped.

The number dealt with throughout the entire Service under the original scheme of classification was 60,000

[Mr. Manion.]

Total number of appeals submitted.. 5,000

These were divided into five classes as follows:—

(a) personal appeals claiming wrong classification;
(b) class appeals;
(c) appeals for increased remuneration;
(d) bonus;
(e) general.

These personal appeals in Ottawa totalled 2,500. All of these were individually investigated and over one thousand were granted, entailing an increase in salary. The average amount of increase on the appeals granted was $400. The total amount of increase in salary resulting from the hearing of personal appeals was over $400,000. This amount does not include the back-pay which was paid on the successful appeals being made retroactive to April 1919.

A considerable number of changes along the line of promotions have been made among the clerks not appealing, which has resulted in a considerable increase in the salary of these clerks, which would go to increase the above figures.

It can readily be seen that there is still a great number of adjustments to be made which have been delayed by the hearing of personal appeals. The latter are now about completed, when this phase of the work will be taken up.

The appeals from the Outside Service have been treated in the same manner as the appeals in Ottawa, and investigators have been sent from Coast to Coast to personally hear these appeals. The result cannot be given as they are yet incompleted.

It will, therefore, be seen that the Government has taken up seriously the question of proper classification and has offered the proper facilities for every employee of the Government to present his case and have it properly adjusted. This was carried out and is being carried out in the following manner:—

The different units throughout the various branches of the departments elected a representative to present their cases before the Investigators. The Investigator visited each appellant, investigated his work, received his personal statement and then in consultation with the Appellant's representative came to a decision as to the proper classification of the Appellant. In cases where the Investigator and the representative disagreed, all the documents and representations both of the Appellant and the Branch Representative, as well as the departmental representative and deputy head, were sent to the Board of Hearing for final decision. It will therefore be seen that every means was exhausted to give every clerk a full opportunity to present his case.

The whole scheme of reclassification was to place each and every clerk in his proper class in harmony with the work he was performing. This will eventually be accomplished. The result will be that each and every clerk will have a direct channel of promotion open to him. If he is competent, ambitious and faithful, he is bound to rise through the different grades of the class in which he has been placed. Under the old scheme this could not be followed, for the reason that a clerk might be doing one class of work to-day and another to-morrow, which did not afford him the opportunity of making himself efficient in any one; therefore, though that inefficiency in the particular class in which he was then found might prevent his subsequent promotion, whereas, in the new, this cannot occur, and the matter of promotion is entirely up to the clerk.

It must also be remembered that a great many appellants filed appeals simply on principle of taking advantage of every opportunity, and on investigation it was found that many of these had already received a substantial promotion and increase in salary, and taking a chance of getting more. This will account for a considerable number of those not granted.

The chief objection to the reclassification as it originally occurred in 1918, was the apparent low remuneration attached to the many classes. This was not as bad as it looked, for the reason that under the old system a clerk was promoted on seniority and not merit, on length of service and not on duties performed, and the classes under the old system included in each class a large number of grades as established under classification. That is to say that the grading under the old system, $900 to $1,600, would include a large number of classes which now are titled and bear different remunerations. When a clerk is placed in the class to which he properly belongs, his energy and ability can be devoted along that special line, the result being increased efficiency and usefulness. No matter what the service, efficiency will be the one factor which will lead to his promotion, and while the remuneration at the outset of his classification might be considered low, yet the range of possibilities along the lines of promotion are ten to one as compared to the old system. Another feature is, under the old system, a man's duties could change, and he might be assigned very much more important duties than he was then performing, but he would have no claim for increased remuneration or promotion, whereas, under the new classification, the moment new duties are assigned, his classification is affected and he has a claim for a higher grading.

Thus it will be seen that all vestige of patronage, of pull, of favoritism, or any of the old influences that ever entered into the promotion of a clerk are now eliminated, and it is up to the clerk himself as to whether he will make himself efficient along the lines of the duties in which he has been classified.

It will, therefore, be seen at a glance the tremendous undertaking of classifying this large body of Civil Servants and it cannot be denied that errors crept in and are bound to creep in, inconsistencies will naturally arise, but all these will eventually be adjusted, but this tremendous task canot be acomplished in a day. Owing to the demands of the Service for haste and speed this work had to be acomplished in a much less time than should have been consumed, considering the importance of the work, but now that personal appeals have practically been disposed of, these errors and inconsistencies will be rectified.

The hope of the Civil Service is not in appointments, but in promotions, and this is considered the one strong point of classification as it provides a future for every Civil Servant regardless of who he is, what influences he has, or how many years' service he may have rendered. The amount of money which these changes have entailed cannot as yet be estimated, but the figures given will give you some idea of the large amount required to meet this demand, and while we hear very little from the clerk who receives a substantial promotion and a considerable increase in salary as well as back pay, it is quite natural that we should hear from the unfortunate clerk who did not fare so well, and, therefore, it would appear that the great good that has resulted and the large amount of money that has circulated throughout the Service through re-classification, will not be brought to the surface as the satisfied people say little, but the dissatisfied very much.

If the statements of those whose duty it has been to go through the entire service and meet the rank and file—as has been done during the last year—are to be considered as representing the true state of affairs, then it can safely be said that there is more contentment and real genuine satisfaction throughout the great mass of Civil Service employees to-day than there has ever been before, and while there are a number of dissatisfied clerks, even these realize that to a certain extent their future has been assured in a better way than ever before and that an incentive has been given them for efficiency and proper service.

The service cannot realize the many difficulties that are being met by those having in charge classification, and if they will only be patient until an opportunity is afforded for the proper adjustment of what may appear to be hardships and unfairness, it can be safely said that good results will be obtained. If the service will only recognize that they have the opportunity to place before an unprejudiced tribunal any grievances which they may have or think they have, then their criticisms will be less harsh and the future will have a brighter outlook, and many of their worries will have disappeared.

It is to be hoped that nothing will interfere with the proposed programme which has been begun for the betterment of the service. Those in charge of this tremendous work are now reaching a point where they have their very proper understanding of the needs of the service and are preparing to meet all conditions in a proper and fair way and to see that every clerk, male or female, gets absolute justice. This will take time and require a little more patience on the part of the service.

Hand-in-hand with reorganization goes superannuation, consequently the Public Service Retirement Act of 1920 (or the Calder Act, as it is better known) was passed by Parliament. By it the government assumed responsibility for all employees retired. In every case where it was necessary, either on account of old age, ill-health, inefficiency or lack of employment to deprive a man of his position, some provision was made whereby he would leave the service with a retiring allowance. This amount has been calculated according to his length of service, age and salary.

While these retiring allowances have cost the recipient nothing, at the same time the interests of those who have been contributors to the Civil Service Superannuation and Retirement Act were conserved and the allowances in every case made a little less than in the case of the contributors to the old fund.

When the Act began to be administered and it was found that anomalies were arising and that sufficient provision had not been made for all classes of employees the government passed an amending Bill at the last session of Parliament whereby an endeavour was made to cover all classes of federal service employees. This has been accomplished as practically all employees are eligible under its provisions for retiring allowances with the exception of men who are paid by the hour or what may be termed prevailing rates employed. (It may be pointed out here that the men who have been placed on prevailing rates during the last two years are consequently prevented from benefiting by the Act.)

Up to October 1, 1921, 468 employees have been retired under the Act. To these has been paid in cash gratuities $195,430.76. The pensions will cost the government while the present annuities live $194,485.60 annually.

In February, 1918, an Order in Council was passed which had the effect of extending a preference to returned soldiers, those who obtain sufficient marks to pass an examination being placed, irrespective of the marks obtained, in order of merit on the list of successful candidates above all other candidates. Further the prescriptions as to age and physical requirements do not apply to any returned soldier if he is able to perform the duties of the office. Returned soldiers are exempted from examination fees. The term "returned soldier" includes all women who served as nurses and so on.

Not only were these preferences accorded by law, but the Civil Service Commission utilized every means to bring to the attention of returned soldiers the opportunities available. Co-operation of the veteran associations was secured throughout the Dominion, and on all special advisory boards for the purpose of adjudicating on applications there is always an official representative present from the Great War Veterans' Association.

Mr. Chairman, that is the document that was prepared and used, as I understand, to justify the position of the predecessors of this Government in connection with the Civil Service regulations, and under these regulations I have felt that I was bound while the law remains as it is and had no option to suggest or make changes in the existing classification of any employees who are being continued in the service.

Mr. CHURCH: Reading long letters will not settle questions of this kind. I do not see how the minister ever expects to pass his estimates—estimates which total upwards of $258,000—by wasting the time of the committee in reading a letter which is not at all relevant to the matter under consideration. What we expect from the minister is constructive legislation such as will improve the conditions of labouring people in this country whether they are engaged on the farm or at work in the large urban centres. If this is to be an example of the kind of administration we are to anticipate from the Minister of Labour—

Mr. McKENZIE: I rise to a point of order. While the Minister of Labour has the floor he can only be deprived of that privilege with his own consent.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: But the Minister of Labour sat down, having concluded what he had to say.

[Mr. Murdock.]

Mr. McKENZIE: This is an interruption to the speech of a minister.

Mr. CHURCH: I am very much obliged to the Solicitor-General (Mr. McKenzie) for his interruption. I would like to remind him, however, that he may not be much longer in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. CHURCH: I regret to say that the Department of Labour is honeycombed with politics. Never was that condition more glaringly apparent than it is to-day. Now, this department has important relations with the industrial activities of the country and the social welfare of the people; it is a department that should be taken completely out of politics.

Mr. MURDOCK: Has the department changed in character at all during the last three months, excepting that I am now administering it?

Mr. STEVENS: That is a big change.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the change to which the hon. member from North Toronto (Mr. Church) refers.

Mr. CHURCH: The Minister of Labour has made about 375 speeches up to date, and is still talking. He talked all day Monday, all day yesterday, and this afternoon he is still talking—it is evident that the more he talks the less he knows, and the less he knows the more he talks.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend has not yet answered my question. Would he advise me if there has been any change in the character of the Department of Labour since I assumed control? It is too bad that my hon. friend cannot hear anyone but himself.

Mr. CHURCH: Yes. There are a whole lot of things which are changed and which merit criticism in connection with the Department of Labour; in fact, we have not got an up to date Department of Labour at all. No wonder he cannot settle strikes in this country. The hon. minister seems to be brimful of ideas. We have heard him for two or three days in this House, bubbling over with enthusiasm for everything but the poor toiler and worker. I read his speeches during the election campaign in the Toronto district, and I have read his speeches since he was sworn in as a minister of the Crown, and I have yet to see him advance one idea of any value in regard to the Labour Department. The first brilliant idea he expressed was after he was sworn in as a minister, when he solved the unemployment question in six words. And what were those fatal words? They were simply "Let capital and labour get together." It was announced in the Toronto Globe and the Toronto Star—in fact the Prime Minister announced—that it was a silent government. So the Minister of Labour remained silent for a month. Then he went to the High Park Methodist church and propounded the new policy he proposed for his department—a new policy in the labour situation. I am glad that the rules of this House are framed as they are. They are like the British House of Commons rules, they allow, on the Estimates, a discussion of policies of the departments. They compel those who are criticising the ministers also to be fair and to stick to things relevant. I do not want to be unfair to the Minister of Labour because I do not believe in his policy. The other night we had quite an exhibition of personalities from him. I desire to say to the Minister of Labour that I am not an opponent of his or of Labour. I had seventeen years' experience in a municipal council, and the work that has been done in that period there for the working classes will speak for itself. Better hours and better conditions have been obtained for the workingmen, and they are receiving better wages. With coal and rent as they are to-day, we should not think of any reduction in wages until the hon. minister is able to enact legislation which will check up high prices and the trusts and combines. I think the minister might follow the example set him in the United States. He has a lot of local officers throughout the country—investigators, fair wage officers, editors, sub-editors, a huge staff of filing clerks, publicity agents and his unemployment experts,—and if he would use all those officers in an effort to solve the high cost of living and the unemployment question he would accomplish something. If the hon. minister, instead of travelling all over the country, lecturing and playing politics, would bring before the House some advanced scheme to make Canada a better country for the farmer and the worker in the factory, it would be much better. He says that there are 200,000 people idle, and while I doubt it, I will accept his figure. If the hon. minister would do something for the unfortunate poor people of Canada, the country would appreciate it.

Now a word as to his labour policy. The Minister of Labour visited High Park Methodist church in Toronto and ascended the pulpit. The statement which he made is relevant to the present issue and to these estimates. I think a reference to it is in order. The statement relates to the estimates, to unemployment, fair wages, strikes, industrial wages and supply and demand, and the work of the officers of the department. He said more in the pulpit in that church as a lay-minister in about eight sentences, than he has been able to say in Parliament for two days. He gave a very short sermon in this Methodist church, one of the most honoured churches we have in Toronto, and I will read what this clipping says about that:

> The Minister of Labour entered the pulpit as the choir and congregation were singing, "Work, for the Night is Coming."

It was not "work for the jobs are coming".

> He was garbed in a frock coat and during his address, which was delivered slowly—at times the words were uttered with long pauses between them—the listener gained the impression that, if he should ever have occasion to, Mr. Murdock could turn to the ministry of the Gospel and fit in quite nicely.

Mr. LAPOINTE: We did not catch that.

Mr. CHURCH: He said there were 200,000 men out of work in Canada to-day. Of course there are 200,000 out of work in Canada and why not, the way the department of Labour is run?

> There is something wrong in the conditions under which Canada has been living or is now living. There is a marked necessity for a demonstration of real brotherhood now and in the weeks to come.

He goes on to describe the labour and capital situation.

> The labour problem of to-day is very largely a state of mind.

He has been in several states of mind recently.

> "I am quite sure there are among you those who will not agree with that thought. I insist and intend to show that this is a state of mind. The attitude of the worker towards his tasks, his lot in life, relation to employer, standard of living, are all questions potent for good or ill in Canada. Labour and labouring men approach these questions in a somewhat unbalanced mental attitude or unbalanced viewpoint. Having suffered only too often they have become soured, discouraged, resentful, and in an improper state of mind, so that they cannot argue out the desires and rights of the workers and the desires and rights of the employers."
> Mr. Murdock said he had visited a city some time ago where he had seen married ex-service men given doles. Unmarried ex-service men sleeping in buildings with only an army blanket over them and lined up outside waiting for a bugle to blow in order that they might march inside and get a bowl of soup. All this had distressed the Minister's mind very much.

"It is all wrong," he declared, with sorrow in his voice. "The unfortunate part was that no provincial or municipal assistance could be secured, and so far as the interests represented by me were concerned, I was unable to move until the supervision of municipal and provincial authorities was secured.

"Let the people do something in Canada by real brotherhood.

"Can this unemployment question be dealt with? Yes. If we can only correct the state of mind which we know exists."

Then the employer of labour came in for some warning. There were some employers, the minister said, who are in such a state of mind that they have no right to employ members of the human family.

Mr. McMASTER: I rise to a point of order. I understand that, under the rules of this House, when we are in committee on estimates the discussion must pertain closely to the item under discussion.

Mr. CALDWELL: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER: I draw attention to the fact that this long reading of documents wastes the time of 235 members who are here to transact the country's business.

Mr. ARTHURS: A few minutes ago a point of order was taken on exactly similar lines. The minister was then reading from a report of the Civil Service Commission, entirely foreign to his department, except that his department was like all other departments of government.

Mr. MURDOCK: I call the attention of my hon. friend to the fact, that the gentlemen of the Opposition were taking entire exception to certain conditions, which had been handed down to us as heirlooms from our predecessors. All I was undertaking to do was to read what my predecessor prepared as chairman of the committee to deal with the subject. In other words, if that document was an accurate statement of the prerogatives and rights of the Civil Service Commission in October last, it must, of necessity, be a fairly accurate statement of the condition as of March 31, 1922, and that is all I wanted to bring to the attention of the committee.

Mr. CHURCH: That is not a point of order. That is just a sermonette.

The CHAIRMAN: The question was raised a short time ago in the House as to the right of dealing with matters of general policy of the department. The question arose as to the relationship of the Civil Service Commission to the office of the department of the Minister of Labour and the fixing of the salaries of officials of that department. A discussion took place with regard to the relationship existing, and the minister read a statement from his department, which dealt with that particular matter and which was pertinent. I understand the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) is dealing with that matter, perhaps not in the same manner as the Minister of Labour did, but he is making an effort to deal with a particular issue of the expenditures of this department which are included in the civil government Estimates now before this committee, and in that he would be in order unless he were to go too far afield in discussing some speech which was made at some other time.

Mr. CHURCH: I thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, for your ruling. I want to read from this report just one more paragraph. This is taken down verbatim. I may say that the minister's theme was Brotherhood:

Mr. Murdock was quite anxious that the people generally should know his position on such questions.

He was anxious that they should know his position on these real live labour questions and what the policy of the department was as compared with that of his predecessor. I want to read just one more sentence.

I hold this one of those things that has got to be done more now than at any other time in the history of Canada. It is for labour to recognize its responsibility and the fact that the employer cannot, and should not, be expected to furnish all of the harmony necessary to the carrying on of business. The labourer has got to recognize the fact that there was something meant when in this Book of Holy Writ we were all enjoined to do whatsoever our hand found to do and do it with our might. The labourer and those representing labour have got to recognize and daily give a demonstration of this.

I am very much dissatisfied with the condition of labour in this country to-day. We are spending a quarter of a million dollars in this proposed appropriation and in my opinion, we are simply throwing it away in the same haphazard fashion as we did twenty-five years ago. It is the desire of every hon. member to do something to alleviate conditions of employees, workers, artisans and farm labourers in this country, and to do that is what I believe to be practical religion. I am not so unfair as to say that this department is perhaps worse under this Government than it was under any other government. While I am a Conservative, I am an independent Conservative and I am endeavouring to do something for labour in the constituency which I have the honour to represent in this House. I am very much disappointed, as one who has been a member of this House only a few days, to find a minister, like myself a newcomer in this House, who, after he has been speaking on platform after platform for three or four months throughout the country, cannot come forward with a definite policy, when there are 200,000 people out of work in this country. Why cannot the Government utilize the Department of Labour as is being done in the United States to-day? Capital is very highly organized in this country; the trusts and combines are flourishing to-day as they never were before, and if they are allowed to continue to flourish, in six months from now things will be ten times worse than they are at present. In the United States, the Labour Department have their experts throughout the country; they are the eyes of the government; they are going into every city and town in the United States; the Attorney Generals of the different states are at their back and they have had 485 prosecutions of trusts and combines. Thus, the machinery of the Department of Labour in the United States is being used to the advantage of the employee and the artisan. Labour is disorganized in this country. While 5 p.m. it is true we have a Dominion department and provincial departments, while they may have done good work, I do not say that they have done the best they could have done. The unfortunate part of the whole labour problem is that to-day it is made the political football of this political party and that. I plead for better consideration of labour in this House. I represent a city that is the home of trade unionism. Long may trade unionism flourish, because it has done a great deal for Canada. The minister has done something for labour, but he has been fairly well paid for anything that he has done for it. I should like to see the department with a bigger ideal. I do not care what the department spends; I would be the last man to raise my voice against the estimates of this department if I saw in them some means of solving the labour problem of Canada. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) during the late election campaign, went up and down this country sympathizing with the poor people who were complaining of the high cost of living. The policy of the hon. members to my left, the Progressive party, is to bring the producer and consumer together. How are they to get together with coal at $15.50 a ton? How is the labouring man going to live when the cost of living is so high as it is to-day? While the farmer may think that he is not getting proper prices for his produce at the present time, yet if the Labour Department will take this matter up and endeavour to do something to bring down the cost of living, to investigate the housing conditions, and like the Labour Department in the United States, endeavour to regulate the trusts and combines, it would be doing something for the benefit of the working classes. Under the British North America Act there is power enough for the Department of Labour to be up and doing, to do what the minister said he would do if he was returned as a member of this House, let alone a minister, to bring down the high cost of living. After listening to the minister for two or three days, I am sorry I have to say that he will not be any more a success in solving the labour problem of this country than he was in solving the problem of the high cost of living under the late government. I believe some of the members of the Progressive party referred to the high freight rates, the high cost of getting their produce to the consumer. We sympathize with them in that regard. If the minister would think more of labour, be more of a labour man and less of a politician—not be a labour man to-day and a partisan to-morrow—if he would try to think of the employees and workers, in the cities and towns, he would be doing far better than reading lengthy letters in this committee. I am amused to see a letter which the minister wrote the other day to the Liberal organization in the city of Toronto. I will not detain the House by reading it; but if the minister would spend more of his time on labour problems and towards bettering the conditions of the working classes of this country, he would be accomplishing something that would be better for employees and artisans of Canada. I do not wish to offer any opposition whatever to the minister. If he will introduce a big progressive policy along these lines I will give him every assistance and support. But it is useless to attempt to settle strikes by the old methods and red tape and quoting charts on supply and demand. Strikes can only be settled by conciliatory and sympathetic action along practical business lines. In a word, we want practical labour men in the department who have worked for their living and know something about labour conditions from actual experience, and the minister will have my support in any steps he may take to engage such practical labour men.

Mr. STEVENS: The other night I asked my hon. friend the Minister of Labour what I thought was a very pertinent question, but the adjournment intervened between the question and the possibility of an answer from him. I had expected that he might give the information when the House convened to-day. The question was; how the minister reconciled an increase in the vote of $23,000 odd when there was a reduction in the staff of thirty. In placing this matter clearly and concisely before the House I am taking advantage of the implied suggestion of the Prime Minister, that bona fide suggestions would be welcomed, and, furthermore, that the House itself must take the responsibility for any action in regard to the Estimates. I call the attention of the House to the fact that the Labour Department estimates for this year are increased by $23,000. This is the minister's statement, in answer to a question of mine, appearing on page 479 of unrevised Hansard:

The other thirty—

Referring to thirty of the forty-two additional employees.

The other thirty have received notice, which so far as I understand will not be revoked, that they are to leave the service on the 31st of this month.

That is to-day. At another point the minister explained that he was incorporating in the regular permanent staff twelve of the forty-two employees. Now, I want the House to get this point. Last year there was contained in the Estimates a sum of $10,000 for clerical and other assistance, and $10,000 for sundries, out of which would be paid these temporary employees. Inasmuch as the minister has been able to reduce his staff by thirty employees, who leave to-day—this being the end of the fiscal year—there is no necessity for the House to provide in the Estimates for those thirty employees for the coming fiscal year. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Sheard:

That in view of the statement of the Minister of Labour, as appearing on page 479 of Hansard, that thirty employees of his department would be dismissed on this day, March 31st, 1922, that item 24 on page 9 of the Estimates be reduced to the same amount as last year, namely, $171,640 for salaries, and $35,000 for contingencies.

[Mr. Church.]

This will give to the minister the same amount of money that he required for last year, including the contingencies, which we have not reduced at all.

I am not taking a course that has not been followed in the past. Last year motions were made to reduce items, and the government of the day took the responsibility of making or not making the reductions, and generally they rejected the motions. It is quite within the authority and power of the Government to reject this motion; but, on the other hand, I do not wish it to shield itself wholly behind the Civil Service Commission. That commission has certain distinct functions to perform, which we all recognize. This House has certain responsibilities, and the Government has certain responsibilities. We are merely asking the Government now to accept this suggestion by which those of us who vote for it are willing at once to aid in the reduction of the Estimates and to take our share of the responsibility for what in some quarters may be regarded as the questionable course of reducing this sum, because sometimes a Government is a little hesitant about taking that responsibility. We offer the Government this opportunity to take advantage of our assistance in the reduction of this item so as to bring it to exactly the same figure as last year in view of the dismissal of thirty employees.

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate indeed that the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), formerly a Cabinet Minister, cannot see the real facts. To me it is inconceivable that he cannot appreciate that the allegation contained in his motion is absolutely inaccurate. I presume that he can read and analyze Estimates, and was doing so before I ever thought of becoming a member of this House. May I ask him to turn with me to the page showing the number of permanent employees of the Labour Department for the fiscal year expiring to-day? He will find it is 106. Then, if he will follow slowly to the left he will find the proposal is to provide for 117 permanent employees for the next fiscal year. My firm conviction is that the hon. gentleman surely knows that the thirty employees under discussion are not included, and have never been included, in either the 106 or the 117 employees as specified, but are temporary employees and a part of the staff that I found in the department when I took charge. I have stated that when I took over the Labour Department, 147 employees were engaged there. Of that number thirty-seven were temporary employees in Ottawa and five were temporary employees located at outside points. None of the thirty-seven in Ottawa or the five at outside points was included in the 106 permanent employees provided for by the late government in the Estimates of the fiscal year expiring to-day. I think I am justified in asuming that no one knows that better than my hon. friend from Vancouver. All this play and parade, therefore, all this imputing to the Minister of Labour something that he never intended to suggest, will not get the hon. gentleman or other hon. gentlemen anywhere. I intimated that a considerable number of temporary employees had been served with notices that there was no provision for them after to-night. A number of these employees were paid out of certain votes not included in the civil government items. I do not know what it may be necessary to do in regard to any or all of these temporary employees, but I have already assured the House that all will be dispensed with whom we can get along without. So far as the 117 are concerned, I have repeatedly stated that we are establishing as permanent only a few of those who were handed to me as temporary and whose services are regarded as essential, according to my predecessor, in carrying out the work of the department.

Now, the adoption of the motion made by the hon. gentleman would personally make no difference to me, but it would herald broadcast to the world and to Canadian labour in particular that the Conservative Opposition in this House are doing all they can to stultify the efforts of my department to do the things that labour believes ought to be done on its behalf. That is all that the opposition to these estimates during the past few days has amounted to. If the motion should carry, it simply means that the department cannot even have the 106 permanent employes paid under the provisions of the law for next year. If the hon. member for Vancouver and his associates are prepared to accept the responsibility for that result, why, let the blame rest where it should. Labour will be interested in finding hon. gentlemen like my hon. friend from Vancouver coming out in their true colours. The member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) also has indicated clearly where he stands on questions affecting the rights of labour. They are trying to embarrass the department in every effort it is making to do the things that ought to be done.

Mr. LEWIS: I see here an item for contingencies, $35,000. Does that cover temporary labour in the minister's department?

Mr. MURDOCK: It does cover some of it. It has done so in the past and probably will be utilized for that purpose in the future where necessary.

Mr. STEVENS: Let me ask a question just to clear the atmosphere a little after the somewhat warm castigation that my hon. friend has laid upon me. I understood all that my hon. friend has said before he laboured so hard to impress upon the House that I did not.

Mr. MURDOCK: I knew it.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend has transferred twelve to the permanent staff; is that right?

Mr. MURDOCK: It looks like that.

Mr. STEVENS: But is that the fact? That is what I understood my hon. friend to say the other day.

Mr. MURDOCK: What is the difference between 106 and 117?

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend stated very clearly that he had transferred twelve. He mentioned also the other night that one had passed out; perhaps he forgets what he did say, but I do not. Thirty are being dismissed, as he has told us so clearly, his reasons being to do away with this miscellaneous group of temporary employees. The twelve employees whom he transferred were paid out of the estimates of last year; therefore if we give the same amount this year as last, $171,000, plus $35,000, we are giving exactly the same amount for a smaller staff. And there is something further that my hon. friend might take into consideration. There are two offices here which can be dispensed with. One is vacant now, involving a salary of $3,900. The other, with a salary of $3,700—Assistant Director of Technical Education—is not needed and, it is understood, was to have been dispensed with. This is a total of about $7,500, so that in asking for this reduction we are asking for nothing unreasonable.

Mr. MURDOCK: The hon. member surely does not indicate that both the Director of Technical Education and the Assistant Director can be dispensed with?

Mr. STEVENS: Unquestionably, on this ground: these two offices were inaugurated in connection with the $10,000,000 vote by way of assistance for technical schools in Canada some years ago. The duty of these officers was to organize technical schools in each province and allocate the respective shares of the $10,000,000 vote to each. There is no necessity for continuing the services of these two highly paid officials once the provincial officials commence to function; a clerk in the deputy minister's office can do all that is required. When the Director of Technical Education vacated the office nearly a year ago, the late government was determined not to refill the position, on the ground that it was no longer necessary. My hon. friend the other day, while he did not think it was required, would not assure the House that he would not give this position to some deserving friend. But what I want to point out is this; there is no need for such an officer, because the provincial governments are functioning so far as technical education is concerned.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have been trying to get this thing clear in my mind, but I do not know that I have succeeded very well. The motion refers to a statement made on the 28th of March as recorded in Hansard at page 479, and the statement, I take it, is as follows:

> Mr. Murdock: The proposal is to make twelve of these forty-two temporary employees permanent. The other thirty have received notice, which so far as I understand will not be revoked, that they are to leave the service on the 31st of this month.

Now we may take it as clear that thirty men go out to-day, the last day of the financial year. I think it is quite as clear that it will not be necessary to provide any money to pay the salaries of these thirty men who will not be there next year. It is equally as clear in my mind that they were paid last year. Twelve of them will have to be paid again this year, but thirty of them will not. Then why are we asked to vote money this year to pay for thirty men who will not be there? It may be that the whole forty-two were paid last year out of some other vote—contingencies, perhaps. Well, we are voting the full amount of contingencies again this year, so why increase this vote to an amount that will include the salaries of thirty men who are going to leave the service to-day? I cannot understand the situation, and if I have not stated it correctly, I should like to be corrected. To my mind it is an idle and a wrong thing of Parliament to vote money that is not going to be expended. We should know how the money is going to be expended before we vote it. It is clear that only twelve out of the forty-two men employed last year are to be retained as permanent, so why should we vote the money for the thirty who are not going to be retained? As I understand the motion, it is simply to reduce these estimates by a sum that will represent the salaries of the thirty who are to be dismissed, and I think under the circumstances the minister himself might very well have intimated to the committee that the vote would be reduced by that amount. It has been done before in this House. I remember last year when the civil government estimates of the Militia Department were up they provided for forty-one men whom we did not intend to employ that year, and we struck out those forty-one, and reduced the vote by something like $58,000. That is all that this motion asks for. The men are not there, so the salaries are not required, and the money should not be voted.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the facts were as stated by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, I for one would not take the slightest exception to this amount being reduced as suggested by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens). I think the whole difficulty has arisen from the form in which the estimates have been presented to the House. In this connection let me say that it is not wholly the fault of the present Government that the form is what it is, because the Government in presenting the Estimates to Parliament has simply followed the form in which the Estimates were presented and passed last year, and has presented its figures under corresponding heads. If my hon. friends will look at the Estimates, they will find that what we are now discussing are items contained on pages 107 and 108, details of civil government, which relate to the members of the service whom we wish to have retained as permanent employees. If hon. members will turn to the estimates of the Department of Labour on page 52, they will see there the votes which were passed by Parliament at the last session. Let me direct attention to item No. 268, Administration, Employment Offices Co-ordination Act. Hon. members will see that last year the sum voted under this head was $75,000, and that this year the minister is asking only $45,000. I am informed that in connection with these employment offices some temporary clerks whose services are being dispensed with were formerly employed and paid out of that particular vote.

Mr. STEVENS: Just at that point, may I ask how much of this $75,000 was expended last year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: While that point is being looked up, I might invite the attention of the committee to another point. If hon. members will look at Item No. 267 on page 52, they will find that the amount voted last year for Fair Wages and Inspection Officers was $20,000, and that this year it is reduced to $5,000; and if one takes the last item of all on that page under Details, "Appropriations not required for 1922-23, $50,000," I speak subject to correction, but I think investigation will show that that $50,000 was in part used for the payment of salaries of temporary clerks who are leaving the service.

Mr. STEVENS: That $50,000 would represent simply the excess of last year over this year, and it is put in there for the purpose of balancing the two columns. It is meaningless outside of that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The members of the committee will see that the total amount asked for by the minister last year was $472,000 and that this year it is $372,000. There is a saving of $100,000. It is reasonable I think to ask the committee, when considering the question of reducing the civil government estimates by the sum of $97,000, to take into account the fact that the minister in presenting his estimates to the House this year shows a reduction of $100,000 in the expenditure for his department on what was asked last year, part of that amount having been used to pay the salaries of temporary employees.

Mr. STEVENS: May I correct my hon. friend? I am not asking for a reduction of $97,000, but of $23,000 in this item No. 24, on page 9 of the civil government estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad to hear that it is not the larger amount, but what I have said would be equally applicable in that case; perhaps the force of my remarks might be increased. When my hon. friend asks that the civil government estimates for the Department of Labour be reduced by $23,000, I think it is fair to ask the committee to take into consideration the fact that the minister shows a reduction in the main estimates for the Department of Labour, as presented to Parliament this year, of $100,000 on the amount asked for last year. I can readily see, that if hon. members wish to embarrass the minister, wish to make it difficult for a new minister requiring first knowledge of his department, and wishing to do justice to the members of his staff, they can probably make out a case from the estimates as brought down which would seem to show that some money asked for was not required, but in view of what I have just said, and in view of the explanation the minister has made that some of the temporary clerks he is dispensing with altogether, were not paid out of corresponding appropriations to those he is referring to at the present time, and that the increase is accounted for by his seeking to disclose publicly to the House that he is making permanent a few clerks to take the place of a larger number of temporary clerks he has dispensed with, I hope my hon. friend from Centre Vancouver, under such circumstances, will not press his motion. If he should, I would ask the Committee to take what I think under the circumstances would be a reasonable attitude in considering the motion and bear in mind all that the minister has said by way of explanation, as well as his saving on the main estimates, and permit him at least the opportunity to get to know the work of his department before beginning to do an injustice to some members of the Civil Service who certainly will be adversely affected if a motion of the kind is passed.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister answer my question as to the amount expended under the item of $75,000 because that is important; that is what this whole argument is based on.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend will understand that as the fiscal year expires to-night we could not accurately give him the information now. It might be of information to him, however, if I would state the results at the close of the last fiscal year.

Mr. STEVENS: Pardon me. I have asked my hon. friend for certain information. I am asking it in a conciliatory spirit and, having in mind the expressed wish of the Prime Minister that this motion be withdrawn, if he will tell me, or show me that a very substantial portion of the $75,000 has been expended on this the 31st day of March, or up to the 1st of March, it will go a long way to support the argument of the Prime Minister. If not I cannot see anything in the argument.

Mr. MURDOCK: In answer to my hon. friend I would say that up to February 28th, 1922, $47,012.51 had been expended under Administration Employment Offices. I still would like to give my hon. friend some of the results that were before him at the close of the last financial year as indicating that he surely must have some knowledge of this situation. At the close of the last fiscal year we found that the civil government salaries $106,762.60 had been paid out, and that out of civil government contingencies $30,627.91 had been paid for temporary employees. For the salaries of Fair Wages Inspection Officers $12,269.84 had been paid; for salaries under the Conciliation and Labour Act $12,721.12; for salaries to Administration Employment Offices $50,953.93. I am sure my hon. friend will agree these are funds entirely different from those we are considering here.

Mr. STEVENS: That is the item referred to by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MURDOCK: Temporary employees. Other items are: salaries joint industrial councils, $326.62; salary director of coal operations, $6,285; salary arrears under reclassification, $8,052.97, or a total for the last fiscal year of $228,139.34. That was as of March 31, one year ago to-day. Again, may I say to my hon. friend that last year the records indicate that the temporary employees in the Labour Department were paid from these sources: contingencies, 56; employment offices, 56; joint councils, 2. This indicates there were 114 temporary employees at one time or another, but there were only about 42 when I took charge of the department.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Do I understand the minister to say that during the past fiscal year at different times there were 114 temporary employees employed in that department?

Mr. MURDOCK: That is correct.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): And do I understand the minister to say that the wages of these men were largely paid out of the vote referred to by the Prime Minister?

Mr. MURDOCK: The figures were: employment offices, 56; contingencies, 56; joint councils, 2.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): And on the 1st January when the minister took charge there were forty-two temporary employees?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): And the minister proposes to do away permanently with thirty out of these forty-two?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes, in so far as that may be possible.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): And twelve out of the forty-two are to be made permanent? Is that the situation?

Mr. MURDOCK: In order that there will be no misunderstanding, let me say there is no provision being made in these civil government estimates for thirty of the employees I found in the Labour Department when I took office.

Mr. STEVENS: Then their salaries are not needed in the vote?

Mr. MURDOCK: Unless it may be necessary to utilize their services in some one of the branches, and either pay them out of contingencies or some other of the various funds of the department as fixed by statute.

Mr. STEVENS: That does not affect the fact upon which my motion rests. They are provided for in your main estimates of this year. I would say to my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that the figure of 114 temporary employees given by the minister has no relation whatever, to the extent of forty-two, to the estimates under consideration now. The balance of them, and seventy odd employees, are provided for in item 272 to be found at page 52 of the Estimates. So we must not allow the idea to permeate the minds of hon. gentlemen that the number of temporary employees is being reduced from 114 to 12—that would not be correct at all.

Mr. HALBERT: I hesitate to ask a question for fear of eliciting another speech from the Minister of Labour. We have spent a great deal of time with these estimates and we have not made much progress. I would like to get information on a couple of points from the minister if he can answer me briefly. I understand that under the Civil Service Act the minister has no power to discharge any official but he can abolish an office. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. MURDOCK: My understanding is that I could discharge an employee for cause, but I could not do away with the office.

Mr. STEVENS: Could you not do it under Order in Council?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend corrects me to the extent of saying that I could do so under an Order in Council, but no hon. member would expect me to abolish an office that was necessary and one in which there was work to be done.

Mr. HALBERT: I should think that perhaps you might dispense with unnecessary employees by degrees. For example if there were three clerks in an office it might be possible for you to get along with two. My next question is: To what extent have these estimates been increased by statutory increases to the clerks in the department?

Mr. MURDOCK: The increase of $23,400 in salaries is attributable to the statutory increases provided for in the Civil Service Act, and by the addition to the permanent staff of employees who have heretofore been temporary.

Mr. ARTHURS: Is it not true that during the last fiscal year a number of employees of the department were working with the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and were temporary on that account?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am advised that a good many of them were blanketed in during the year, but I had nothing to do with that. It was done before I was there.

Mr. ARTHURS: As a matter of fact, they were so employed.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am told a considerable number were.

Mr. ARTHURS: They were there for the express purpose of assisting returned soldiers in the department and were partially paid by your department.

Mr. MURDOCK: No, I am told that none of them were for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): As I understand these estimates, the minister is taking 117 permanent employees to do the work for which he proposes to pay $195,000. The work which that 117 are supposed to do in the coming year was performed in the past year by 106 permanent employees, plus 42 temporary ones, and it cost the department $171,000 odd, plus the amount paid to the 42 temporary ones, taken care of in some other vote. Is that correct?

Mr. MURDOCK: I think my hon. friend is substantially correct.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): In that case this vote, so far from showing an increase, would, in my opinion, show a decrease, because 42 are provided for out of the difference.

Mr. STEVENS: No, 12. My hon. friend is in error. That is very ingenious, but it does not carry. My hon. friend has declared, and never denied, that he has given notice to 30 of the 42 employees, and that, as far as he and the Government are concerned, their salaries cease. He has included in this vote 12 additional ones, or 11, but he says that 12 temporary ones are transferred to the permanent list. The item is increased by $23,000 plus the contingencies. Twelve are paid out of $171,000 plus the contingencies last year.

Mr. MURDOCK: No.

Mr. STEVENS: The salaries of the 117 employees which he is now asking for in the $171,000, plus the $35,000 contingencies. We say to the House this year, "Give his department exactly the same as you gave it last year, and do not give it $23,000 in addition." I agree that these twelve are included in the $195,000, but he has told us, with a spirit of reproach, that he does not intend to clutter up the department with temporary employees like his predecessor. That is a very commendable action. Then it is not under the contingencies, and he can change the vote if he likes. It might have been better had I moved that the total amount be reduced and not specify anything. I specified the item for the purpose of clarity. Last year the Government paid for 117, just the same as they provide for this year, with $171,000, plus the contingency vote of $35,000. We are asked to do the same thing this year.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): I would like to ask if the employees last year were not 106 plus 42 temporary, making 148 employees in the service.

Mr. MURDOCK: At the close of the year.

Mr. STEVENS: Paid out of $171,000 plus—

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): I did not so understand it. I understood 106 of them were paid out of the $171,640 and the other 42 were paid out of some other vote.

Mr. STEVENS: Out of this $35,000.

Mr. MURDOCK: The hon. gentleman from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) is entirely mistaken, but it is impossible to explain, and I will certainly have to give up trying to explain. I am forcefully reminded of the old adage "There are none so blind as those who do not wish to see," and I am also reminded of the words of Kipling—

> If you can make one heap of all your winnings,
> And risk it on one turn of pitch and toss,
> And lose, and start again at your beginnings,
> And never breathe a word about your loss.

Poor losers are the cause of all this discussion during the last two or three days.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): I had hoped, by my remark, that I would help clear up this matter, but what is the use of trying to clear up this matter, if the minister proceeds to use it as an excuse to lecture his political opponents?

Mr. CARROLL: The motion of the hon. gentleman for Vancouver Centre is in effect for a reduction of some $23,000. He is moving to have the $195,000 odd in these Estimates reduced to some $171,000 odd. I take it that is impossible, unless he is going to force the minister to take away from the permanent staff of the Labour Department the twelve employees whom he has placed there. If the motion read that the whole Estimates be reduced by $23,000 I would see some sense in it. I do not think that motion can be properly dealt with in this Committee. It is something over which this Committee has no control. This increase for the year is mostly made up by statutory increases plus the salary of twelve permanent employees who are taken from the forty-two temporary employees. I do not think the motion of my hon. friend is in order at all, so far as the real gist of the motion is concerned.

Mr. BROWN: I would like to get at the facts of the case, and see where we stand. Perhaps it is not our part to lecture political opponents or political friends, but I think a little less pugnacity on the part of the Minister of Labour would enable us to arrive at an understanding of the situation. I think, perhaps, we understand the situation regarding the permanent employees. There were 106 last year and there are to be 117 this year. I presume the statutory increases provided in the Civil Service Act cover that amount, making the average salary last year $1,619 and the average salary this year $1,667. I suppose that is accounted for by the working out of that machine which we have created, and for which we do not seem to have provided any brakes. However, that is a matter for discussion later on, but that is the way it has impressed us so far. We have made a machine we do not seem able to control. If there is a brake we have not been able to get our hand on it yet. The question seems to centre around a little question of fact: were those temporary employees last year paid out of that contingency fund of $35,000 or were they not?

Mr. MURDOCK: Part of them were.

Mr. BROWN: If they were paid out of some other vote, I can understand the position taken by the minister that it is necessary to have that amount for contingencies voted this year as well as the amount covering the permanent staff. It is simply a question of fact. If they were paid out of some other fund last year, then we need that amount this year. If the $35,000 contingency fund covered all the temporary employees last year, then I can see that there is something in the motion made by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens). Can we get at this question of fact? Speaking for myself—and I think I may speak for those around me—I may say that we came here with a great desire to reduce expenditures. We do not want to handicap unduly a minister in getting acquainted with his department. When I began to look at these estimates, I was almost afraid to confess that I did not know anything about the matter; but since ministers are prepared to confess that, I do not know that we need be ashamed. We do not want to reduce any expenditure that is necessary; we do not want to take the position of "cheap guys," who wish to cut down the salary of a man who is really useful in his department because, after all, the man who is getting the low salary is not, by any means, always the poorest man in a department. Sometimes it pays and pays well to get good men, however much you have to pay them. That is our position. At the same time we want to impress upon this particular minister and upon the Government that it is our desire, if any means can be found of controlling this machine, to control it, so that we may not have this expenditure mounting up year after year without knowing when we are going to reach the maximum for civil government. Can we get at this little question of fact as regards the contingency fund, which may or may not have provided for those temporary employees? If we can reach an agreement as to that point, we shall understand where we are.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The hon. gentleman's question of fact, which is a pertinent one, will I think, be answered by reference to the Auditor General's report. If hon. members will look at the Auditor General's report for the year ended March 31, 1921, which is the latest report published, they will find that a number of clerks received salaries paid from funds other than those represented in the appropriation that is being asked for at the present time. The same thing took place during the past year. The Auditor General's report for the past fiscal year, which ends to-day, cannot be presented to Parliament until next year; but it will show then that temporary clerks have been paid out of funds other than the contingency fund referred to here. It will be found that when the minister came into office fifty-six temporary clerks were paid out of the appropriation for employment offices, and as was pointed out this afternoon, the estimate for the employment offices has been reduced this year by several thousands of dollars. I do not think the hon. member for Centre Vancouver is anxious to embarrass us unduly. His purpose has been to make quite plain the difficulties that these Estimates involve and I think all the hon. members will realise that, seeking to follow what has been the custom of other years and to present the Estimates in a similar form, we have not been in a position to make the differences as apparent as we ourselves would like to have them appear. I hope my hon. friend's purpose has been served, and that he will not press his motion to a vote.

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) stated clearly—and there is no doubt as to his statement, so far as I can gather during these two or three days' discussion—that the forty-two temporary employees came under this civil list; the fifty-six temporary employees to whom the Prime Minister refers, are provided for in another appropriation altogether on page 52 of the Estimates. My hon. friend is wrong in suggesting to the committee that we are seeking to reduce this vote by virtue of temporary employees being dismissed who were paid under another fund. Nothing of the kind. That point is the crux of the whole business. The forty-two employees, of whom twelve are remaining, were paid last year out of the civil vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If we were to discuss this for another week, we would not get very much further ahead, and if my hon. friend intends to press this matter to a vote, I hope he will let us take the vote before six o'clock.

Mr. MURDOCK: The hon. member for Centre Vancouver should know that eighteen of those temporary employees are at present being paid out of the Employment Service appropriation.

Mr. STEVENS: Which is another vote altogether.

Mr. MURDOCK: And two out of the vote for Joint Industrial Councils. That accounts for twenty of the forty-two who are not therefore, being paid out of any contingencies that are now before the committee.

Mr. MANION: Those two votes are in the other section of the Labour estimates.

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes they are being paid out of the Employment Service appropriation on page 52.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Chairman, I think it is desirable that hon. members should appreciate not only the difficulties which the present Government has, but the difficulties which the late government had, in the classification of the Estimates, and I would ask the indulgence of the House for a moment or two while I read a part of a debate which took place last session, and which will illustrate that the difficulties we on this side of the House are having at the present time in explaining our Estimates are precisely of the nature and character of those with which the late Government was faced when asking Parliament to pass its Estimates, and this as a consequence of its own legislation in giving certain powers to the Civil Service Commission and being governed in the reorganization of the Civil Service under those powers. I have in my hand Hansard of March 15th, 1921, when the then Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) was putting through his estimates. Hon. members who were in the House last session will agree that no more conciliatory minister could be found than the then Minister of Agriculture, and the following is an illustration of the difficulties which he met with in endeavouring to explain the organization of his department. At page 935 of Hansard the following appears:

Mr. Cannon. Am I to understand the minister to mean that the Civil Service Commission has the right to fix the wages that shall be received by the civil servants in the employ of the Government, without the head of the department having anything to say about the matter?

Mr. Tolmie: The salaries and the increases are fixed by the classification.

Mr. Cannon: Does the minister refer to the classification that was made by those American experts imported into Canada, or to some other classification?

Mr. Tolmie: The classification brought into force about a year ago.

Mr. Cannon: By whom?

Mr. Tolmie: By the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. Cannon: Last week the Minister of Trade and Commerce explained during a debate in this House that experts brought into the country by the Government and who were absolute strangers to the Civil Service had made certain changes in the classification of the civil servants. Am I to understand that the changes which appear in the item I refer to were made by the experts or by the Civil Service Commission itself?

Mr. Tolmie: I understand that these salaries were fixed at the time the classification was made, but what part the American experts played in the classification I could not say off-hand.

Mr. Cannon: What I want to know is who made the classification? The Civil Service Commission, the Minister, or the outside experts?

Mr. Tolmie: It was certainly not the minister, but the Civil Service Commission. Whether they had the assistance of these imported experts or not, I could not say.

Mr. Cannon: The minister states he is not responsible for the classification of these employees?

Mr. Tolmie: The minister had nothing to do with the fixing of these salaries.

Mr. Cannon: But before the classification was made was not the minister consulted by the Civil Service Commission or by the experts, because, after all, the people who can give proper information in regard to the employees of a department are the head, the deputy head, and the branch heads? Were they consulted, and if so, did they make reports written or verbal?

Mr. Tolmie: The classifiers had a staff of experts of their own, and also consulted the deputy head before the classification was approved.

Mr. Cannon: Am I to understand that the deputy head of the Department of Agriculture is responsible for the classification of these particular employees? If so, I would like the minister, who is the head of the deputy head, to tell us the reasons for these varying increases.

Mr. Tolmie: The evidence of the deputy minister was taken by the commission, who came to their own decision.

Mr. Cannon: I should like to know from the minister, now that his deputy is here and can give him the required information, why the junior translator is getting a bigger increase than the translator himself?

Mr. Tolmie: Although the evidence of the deputy minister was taken, the final decision was in the hands of the Civil Service Commission. Therefore, I do not hold the deputy minister responsible for these increases that appear here. As I have explained before, there is the old classification and the new. This particular class of junior translator begins at a salary of $1,200 under the old system, with annual increases of about $50 a year up to about $1,600. Under the new classification the minimum salary of translator is fixed at $1,440, with annual increases of $60 up to the maximum.

I think Mr. Chairman, it will be apparent to hon. members that the late government experienced the same difficulty in accounting for their estimates as presented to Parliament as we on this side of the House are experiencing to-night. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) has explained that in presenting his estimates he accepted the statement made to him by his deputy minister as to what was the proper classification of the different clerks in his department, and the appropriate increases they were to receive, and that the estimates as presented contained nothing in the way of new appointments other than the making permanent of a certain number of temporary clerks.

I took advantage of the recess to discuss with the minister, with his deputy and others of the staff who had to do with the preparation of the estimates, the figures as they are presented. I find that the position is exactly as stated by the minister: that some of the temporary clerks have been made permanent. But there is this feature which has not been brought out, and which should be explained. If a deputy minister thinks that certain of his clerks ought to be promoted under the methods employed, the Civil Service Commission require that Parliament in the first instance vote the money for the position to which the advancement is to be made. After the money has been voted, the deputy minister has to go to the commission and ask its members to make the promotion. The commission may or may not carry out the wish of the deputy in that regard. The consequence of this method of procedure is that, in bringing down his estimates, the minister is obliged to ask Parliament to vote the money needed for the new position and also to vote the salary of the clerk in his existing position in case he should not be transferred to the new one. In these estimates, six positions are cited which represent positions into which certain of the clerks may be promoted. Whether the Civil Service Commission will grant the promotions after they have been asked to do so, no one can say; until Parliament has voted the money and the promotion has actually been made, it cannot be a matter of certainty. The deputy minister states that these positions are provided for in the estimates in accordance with the requirements of the Civil Service Commission and the classification.

My hon. friend has a motion before the committee to reduce the estimates by a certain sum. I would like to make it clear that the acceptance of the motion will mean that the services of certain clerks in the department will have to be dispensed with, because there may not be an amount sufficient to pay the salaries of all the clerks whose positions are being provided for. The new fiscal year begins to-morrow; what we are asking Parliament to vote now is an amount necessary to meet these salaries during the coming year. I think the minister will find it possible to dispense with some of the clerks in his department; he intends to do so, in any event, when he gets an opportunity to effect reorganization. But the adoption of the motion may involve considerable embarrassment to some of the members of the service; it might make it necessary to dispense with the services of certain clerks a little more summarily, perhaps, than would otherwise be the case. I would appeal to the members of the committee to consider the Civil Service in this matter, and not to take a step which will involve no embarrassment to the Government but which may bring hardship on certain members of the Civil Service.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend the minister, and, in a more moderate manner, the Prime Minister, read a lecture this afternoon to me and to others here instead of seeking, as the Prime Minister now has done, to give us an intelligent understanding of this matter. If the minister finds himself in a dilemma, it is his own fault. I asked him a very civil and pertinent question on Tuesday last; I got no answer to it. I asked the question a second time. I am not blaming him or even rebuking him for not answering my inquiry, but he got off on other topics. To-day I broached the matter again, and my answer was a lecture which, I may say, did not impress me very strongly. If a minister replies to questions by delivering curtain lectures, he is not likely to get very much consideration at the hands of those who are seeking the information. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour both sought to give the impression that I had no serious intention in pressing for the information I was requesting. Now, let me point out to the committee a few facts. The Prime Minister this afternoon very skilfully led the committee away from the point under discussion to another vote,—and I am quite sure, Mr. Chairman, had I been in that position you would have promptly called me to order—a vote on page 52, resolutions 268 and 272, dealing with the Labour Department proper. He conveyed to the committee information which was refused by the Minister of Labour,—who, indeed, gave us exactly the opposite impression—that the temporary employees involved in this discussion came under vote 272. Now, the minister gave us the impression very distinctly—and I shall not read long stories from last year's Hansard or this to support my argument—that he was reducing the large floating temporary staff, and he took upon himself great credit for doing so. I am in the judgment of the committee whether or not I reasonably interpreted the minister's attitude. He took credit to himself for that, and in his remarks he referred to this vote now before us. I came to the conclusion, as I think other members did, that he was reducing the staff which was included in the vote we were discussing; otherwise, why should he bring it in at all? If he wanted to take credit for reducing the staff by over thirty employees who came under another vote which we were not discussing, why did he bring the matter up? I submit I was perfectly correct in taking the minister's answer as it was given, although I am free to say that it was neither clear nor free from ambiguity. But I will meet the Prime Minister exactly on his own ground. He takes us over the votes 268 and 272, and I assume I shall be in order, Mr. Chairman, in referring to them; the Prime Minister transgressed the rules sufficiently to take us there.

I submit these facts to the committee in justification of the motion which I have presented: In votes 268 and 272 and the vote now before us we have three sums —I will give last year's figures first— $171,000 in vote 24; $75,000 in vote 268; $15,000 in vote 272, a total vote of $261,000. I asked the Prime Minister how much of vote 268 had been used, and after a great deal of pressure we secured the information that up to the first of this month, $48,000 out of the $75,000 had been spent. I will add $12,000 more for this year, making $60,000—and it will not amount to $60,000, I may tell hon. gentlemen. In other words that reduces the amount for last year to $246,000 in respect of the three votes—and the Prime Minister is weaving these supernumeraries into the three votes. The amounts for 1922-23 are as follows: $195,000 for vote 24; $45,000 for vote 268; $15,000 for vote 272, a total of $255,000. In other words, we have $246,000 last year as against $255,000 proposed this year. The minister has given us his solemn statement that to-night thirty employees cease to be employed by the department. He is asking for about $9,000 more for thirty employees less in these three votes,—and I care not how the Prime Minister juggles from one vote to another; the thirty employees are incorporated in these three votes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Would my hon. friend tell us what figures he is adding, how he gets $246,000?

Mr. STEVENS: I went over that pretty well, but I shall not follow the example of the minister and refuse to give the information again. In 1921-22 the civil government vote corresponding with vote 24 this year was $171,000, in round figures; vote No. 268 was $75,000, and vote No. 271, $15,000. The Prime Minister tells us that those are the votes in which these employees are somewhere involved. The total is $261,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Where do you get $246,000?

Mr. STEVENS: I will give it to my hon. friend at once.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): You said $246,000 just now.

Mr. STEVENS: Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to finish the sentence I was about to utter. I asked the Prime Minister this afternoon how much of that $75,000 vote had been expended, and after a little pressure we got the answer, namely, $48,000; that applies to vote No. 268, and I say that I allow for this month, and it is an excessive allowance, an additianal $12,000, making $60,000 on that vote, or a total of $246,000. Now this is the point and the crux of the whole matter. That vote of $246,000 paid for the whole of these employees, both the ones included in the vote immediately under consideration and the supernumerary group. Let us go a step further. The minister advises us that he is dropping thirty employees; I am clear about that.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend has said so many times this afternoon what the Minister of Labour intended to do that perhaps I had better read the minister's language, so that there will be no misunderstanding.

Mr. STEVENS: I will read it.

Mr. MURDOCK: It is on page 479 of Hansard.

Mr. STEVENS: On page 479 of Hansard a question was asked the minister and he replied as follows:

> Mr. Murdock: The proposal is to make twelve of these forty-two temporary employees permanent. The other thirty have received notice, which so far as I understand will not be revoked, that they are to leave the service on the 31st of this month.

Now have I misstated the minister's language?

Mr. MURDOCK: That is correct.

Mr. STEVENS: Then let me go back to my argument. For the sum of $246,000 a certain staff was maintained last year. This year there are thirty employees less whose services are to terminate to-night, the 31st of the month, yet the Government are asking $255,000 this year. I submit that there is no need to ask for $255,000 to provide for the services of thirty less employees when $246,000 proved sufficient for last year.

But that is not all. In the vote now before us the minister himself tells us that the position of Director of Technical Education, opposite which is the sum of $3,900 has been vacant for many months, I think nearly a year. He does not think it will be filled, but he is not certain. Then he states on page 479 of Hansard in regard to another individual, "I have no assurance that we shall fill this position." That was a position carrying a salary of $1,980 so here again there is an additional $5,800 for two positions which according to the minister's own statement there is no need to fill. So I submit to the House that in view of a reduction in the staff of thirty, and two other positions with salaries attaching to them amounting to $5,800 that the minister says he does not think will be filled, we are warranted in reducing this vote by $23,000.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Does my hon. friend take into consideration in that computation he made by way of a comparison any statutory increases for this year? He is eliminating them altogether.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend can take what consolation he likes out of that interjection, but it is utterly void of reason and logic.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): It is chock full of truth though.

Mr. STEVENS: Then I also say this: Last year, when these estimates were before the House, the then minister reduced them by $40,000. Why? I am not saying there was any particular merit in that, but the point is this: Exactly the same conditions apply this year as applied last year. During the war, and subsequently, there had been built up in this as in other departments extra staffs to deal with questions that were perhaps pertinent at the time but which to a large extent have now disappeared. Last year $40,000 of a reduction was made in these estimates, and I am informed that this year there should be a corresponding reduction in the requirements for this department. Indeed, Sir, when the Prime Minister himself spoke and carried us away from the vote under consideration to page 52 of the Estimates, he pointed out that the department had reduced the estimates on page 52. Now does not that reduction indicate that the activities of the department, and its main activities are covered by these main estimates, have been reduced by a corresponding amount? Otherwise, why the reduction in the estimates? If, therefore, there has been a reduction in the main estimates on page 52, does it not stand to reason that the head office expenses ought to be reduced accordingly? Is not that common sense?

The Prime Minister also made the statement that there were six duplications in these estimates. Let us pause for a moment to consider that. Why did not the minister tell us there were these duplications? He had his two deputies in front of him, and he told us that he required all of this. He said he might be able to weed some out, but the Prime Minister coolly tells us tonight that there are six duplications: that is, there are six clerks provided for here, and in order to meet some possible demand of the Civil Service Commission for possible elevation of officers to new positions, six new positions are provided. Does that sort of thing permeate the whole of these Estimates?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: In every department?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: It is a most extraordinary situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is.

Mr. STEVENS: What I suggest to my hon. friend is this: We have here a list of the votes in resolutions such as this: "Privy Council, $66,000." That is the resolution. Then details are given for our convenience, and the minister has a great many more details for his convenience, but the vote is a vote for a certain sum, and therefore I say to the committee we can very well afford to reduce the sum and then let the department work out these difficulties of duplications that have been mentioned. It is manifestly absurd for the minister to come before Parliament and ask us to vote sums on which we have no information at all. Let me put it this way to my hon. friends. If what the Prime Minister states is now the case, let us take these six duplications and segregate them so that they are not applicable to both votes. My hon. friend knows this perfectly well; supposing he elevates one of these clerks to a higher salaried position, he is immediately at liberty, by authority of Parliament, to refill the vacated position; he knows perfectly well that he is.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend, I am sure, does not want to create a wrong impression. As I explained to him, that is part of the method of procedure adopted by the Civil Service Commission. They fill the new position. When they have done so, they take account of the fact that this money has been voted, not for the purpose of creating two positions, but for the purpose of enabling a clerk to be transferred at the appropriate time from one to the other. The minister cannot fill the position; his deputy asks the Civil Service Commission to give him a clerk to fill a particular position. The Civil Service Commission then takes account of the fact that when the Estimates were before Parliament one appropriation was put in to meet the possibility of this new appointment; that however, cancels the other—it does not create two new positions. This is simply a method of procedure which the Civil Service Commission has adopted to carry out what is necessary in effecting promotions.

Mr. STEVENS: I think perhaps it would be more correct to say that it was a method discovered this afternoon, or this evening, by my hon. friend to explain this rather involved dilemma in which he finds himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. STEVENS: The bare facts are there. A certain sum of money was required last year for a given service. This simple fact I place before the committee—and let me say to them that the same thing applies to other departments—the service is reduced by the number of thirty employees, and I say that we should not be asked to vote a larger sum by $23,000, than was required last year, for the payment of that reduced service. Now let me say this to the Prime Minister—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I ask my hon. friend this question: Suppose the Civil Service Commission should refuse to promote a certain clerk? If his salary is done away with what is going to be done with that clerk? From what source is he going to get his salary? The only way in which the payment can be provided in the meantime is for the estimate to be voted.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend can vote his appropriation for the clerk if he desires. We are not objecting to that; we are objecting to this increase when there is a reduction of service. Just exactly how my hon. friend is to work it out is his business and not ours. Now let me draw the attention of the committee to another fact. I may be transgressing the rules but the Prime Minister has set an example in this regard. The Government claim—a statement was handed to the press in which they made the claim—a reduction of $138,000,000 in the general estimates of the country. The claim is made—we will not debate for the moment whether rightly or wrongly—that this is an economy effected in expenditure throughout the country. But if you take the Civil List you will find that in practically every department, with the exception, I think, of the Department of Railways, there is an increase at Ottawa. Now I bring this fact to the attention of the Government and I say: Personally I will co-operate with you in bringing about a reduction in the cost of administration in Ottawa because of the decreased service throughout the country. Now, if that is not logical I do not know what it is. Take any department; take the Department of Public Works, if you like. If there is a cessation of public works activities throughout the country surely there ought to be a corresponding reduction in the overhead cost of administration. Let me point this out to the committee: The very expedient employed by the late government, and condemned by the Minister of Labour this afternoon, is the method by which this can be brought about. And what is that? You will note that a year ago a reduction of $40,000 was made in the Labour Department. How? By dismissing or dispensing with the services of a number of temporary employees. We have been told by the Minister of Labour, by the Prime Minister and other speakers for the Government, that you cannot reduce the staff because they are permanent employees. The Minister of Labour says he cannot reduce the estimates because the salaries are for permanent employees. He is making twelve new permanent employees out of temporary employees this year. My hon. friend shakes his head. I do not know how on earth we are going to pin the Minister of Labour down to anything. He has told us time and time again that he is adding twelve temporary employees to the permanent staff. The committee knows perfectly well that what I am stating is perfectly true. Now what I am pointing out is this: The expedient of temporary employees is for exactly the situation that is facing us to-day. What is that? A reduction of the cost of administration throughout the country resulting from a cessation of activities due to the war and causes subsequent to the war. We can never get down from the war peak in the matter of expenditure unless we dismiss some one. Whom should we dismiss? Why the temporary employees certainly, and that is what the Minister of Labour of last year did. He reduced the estimates by $40,000; he laid off certain temporary employees. The present Minister has forty-two temporary employees and this number, when temporary employees in other branches are included, is increased to 114. How can he reduce his estimates, how can he reduce his overhead, how can he reduce the cost of administration in Ottawa? Simply by dispensing with the services of some of these temporary employees instead of making them more permanent than they were. And so I say this to the Government: All through the main Estimates for the Civil Service in Ottawa there is a tendency towards a general increase; and I am not going to allow the Minister of Labour to get away with his curtain lecture to me this afternoon, or the suggestion that I was aiming a blow at the working people in the Civil Service. I am doing nothing of the kind. I say to the Government that where they have efficient civil servants pay them a salary commensurate with their services every time; but it does not follow that the country must maintain a large staff beyond the needs and the requirements of the service. If the conditions to-day, as they were last year, are coming gradually back to normal, and we are getting away from the exigencies of war, then let us gradually bring the service down to a peace standard. Therefore what we say to the Prime Minister, and to every member of the Government, is that they will find us willing to join with them in a study of these Estimates for the one purpose of bringing about a reduction in the overhead charge, viz., the cost of administration in Ottawa.

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. Chairman, I sincerely regret if I have not been able to make the hon. member from Vancouver realize my viewpoint and my understanding in regard to some of these things. I have tried several times to make it clear that, although in the estimates in certain cases perhaps there are two salaries, it is only intended to use one. Let me give a concrete case to illustrate my meaning, that of Mr. F. E. Harrison, Wage Investigator, Calgary. This gentleman has been for some time classified as a wage investigator at a salary of $2,340 a year. It has been contended—and here is the argument—that he should be named as a senior wage investigator beginning at $2,520 per year, a classification established by the Civil Service Commission. The vote in this particular case is to provide for the promotion of Mr. Harrison. In addition to his regular position he was formerly assistant to Mr. W. H. Armstrong, Director of Coal Operations, and was paid a salary of $600 per annum from War Appropriations for his extra services. While the position of Director of Coal Operations has been abolished, many of the duties pertaining to this position have descended to Mr. Harrison who performs them at a loss of $600 in salary. The department feels that Mr. Harrison should not suffer any loss, but as the limitations of the classification of his position and the regulations of the Civil Service Commission prevented the department from giving him the required increase in salary it was deemed advisable to create the new position of Senior Wage Investigator carrying a higher salary in order that he might be permitted to receive the compensation to which the department feels he is entitled.

This is not an increase in the staff, but it proposes to establish two classifications with pay, only one of which will be used, under any circumstances, but if this $2,520 salary for Mr. Harrison's classification, as senior wage investigator, does not pass, we surely want to leave him with his present salary of $2,340, and classified as a wage investigator; otherwise we would have to come back to you and ask you to reconsider it. There is a number of exactly similar duplications in this proposal.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: By whom was Harrison appointed? That is important.

Mr. MURDOCK: The Hon. Mr. Crothers, the late Minister of Labour, now deceased.

Mr. ARTHURS: Is it not possible, if both votes pass, for the senior wage investigator and the other investigator, as proposed, for the Minister of Labour to appoint another man?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am told that the lower position would be at once abolished by the commission, when the senior wage investigator had ben appointed.

Mr. ARTHURS: Why?

Mr. MURDOCK: That is something I cannot answer.

Mr. ARTHURS: Have you any wage investigator other than this man?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes.

Mr. ARTHURS: Why should the position be abolished?

Mr. MURDOCK: I can only give my hon. friend my word that the position will not be filled, and, furthermore, I will acquiesce in your view. If hon. gentlemen say that no more money should be paid for permanent salaries this year than last year, to-morrow morning I will proceed to put into effect the desire of this House, but not one temporary salary has been paid out of the vote of last year, or could be paid out of the vote of this year, and, therefore, any stress that has been placed on the forty-two temporary employees has no bearing upon this specific civil government vote.

Mr. HOCKEN: As I understand the minister, a larger salary has been put in providing for the promotion of this investigator. He is not sure that this man is going to be promoted. If the position for which he is providing this salary is filled by the Civil Service Commission, we will have two employees on the pay-roll. Here is a wage investigator, as I understand it, at $2,300 a year. Then $2,500 is put in in the expectation that he will be promoted. If the Civil Service Commission say that he is not a suitable man, and they select somebody else, you will have two men on salary. Is that right? You do not lay off the wage investigator; you retain him in the position he occupies now, and you add another entire salary.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am told we would at once drop the wage investigator.

Mr. HOCKEN: You put in the man who now holds that position?

Mr. MURDOCK: We would not accept any other man for promotion in place of this man, for whom a new official classification has been made.

Mr. HOCKEN: Do I understand that in the promotion of this man, and the creation of a new office, the department has power to refuse the man selected by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. MURDOCK: The department would have the right to refuse to appoint any one. I desire the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) to understand that this man is regarded as being specially entitled to some extra consideration on account of the special mining situation in District 18, and the fact that he has proven to be a valuable officer in British Columbia and Alberta. While war appropriations were being dealt with he was getting $600 more, but that cannot be paid any longer, and, therefore, the only way to give him a fair measure of justice is to make a slightly increased classification, giving him a couple of hundred dollars more than other investigators.

Mr. HOCKEN: I am not objecting to his getting an increase or promotion, but I am stating that the Civil Service Commission is the body that will decide whether he is to be promoted or not. Am I right?

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend is hardly right, because they would not appoint without an application from us, and if they appointed anyone except this man, I am told the Labour Department would not accept the appointment, and would not regard some other man as being specially entitled to $200 extra, and, therefore, the position would not be filled.

Mr. HOCKEN: Then I do not understand the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Who does?

Mr. HOCKEN: I thought the procedure was that the department notified the Civil Service Commission that there was a certain office to be filled. The commission then advertised for applications for the particular office, and held an examination, or an inquiry, into the man's capacity and filled the office. I do not object to this man being promoted, or getting more salary, but if the Civil Service Commission say "You having asked for a new officer, we do not think the man who was the former wage investigator is competent for it, and we will appoint someone else." Then I understand the appointment by the Civil Service Commission would stand. If they appointed someone else, then the department has not only the wage investigator on its payrolls, but also the new appointee. I do not see how you are going to get over that, unless the Department of Labour directs the course of the Civil Service Commission. If the minister tells me that he can control the commission that will explain the matter. I was under the impression that that commission was not controlled by the department. If it is controlled by the department, then patronage has not been abolished, and if it is not controlled, we are in danger of having two men to fill one job.

Mr. EULER: It came out pretty clearly last year, before the committee dealing with the Spinney Bill, that the deputy head of the department could make a recommendation to the Civil Service Commission, which was almost always accepted by the commission. I was a member of that committee and I think that was pretty clearly established.

Mr. CALDWELL: Was that not with regard to promotions only?

Mr. EULER: Not necessarily. This would refer to a promotion, I understand. It was clearly understood in that investigation that the opinion, or the suggestion, of the deputy head would be accepted. I do not know that they are absolutely bound by that opinion, but it was established before that committee, certainly to my satisfaction that the commission accepted the recommendation of the deputy head. Therefore, if the Minister of Labour or his deputy made his recommendation to the commission that this particular man be appointed, I think there is very little doubt that the commission would accept that recommendation—at least they stated so at the investigation.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I wish to ask a question, and I am not asking it in a controversial way. It arose from a statement made by the Prime Minister, which struck me as being of considerable importance, and I should like to get a clear understanding of it. If I mistake not, it was said that, not only in this department, but in others, the necessity arose at times practically to duplicate positions in the Estimates in order to provide for possible or probable promotion from one position to another, and in order to allow for that, a salary was provided for each position, with the understanding that only one salary would be used.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the case in some of the departments.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: In that case, is it necessary to provide for both salaries? Would it not be sufficient, in cases like that, to provide for a salary to cover the higher position of the two, because the greater always contains the less, and in case the promotion was not made, the salary appropriated for the higher position would still pay the salary of the lower position.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend is quite right. I am informed that, in some departments, what he has suggested is done, but in others, the other course has been adopted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the way I have understood the act to be worked out; but does that not all go to show that this motion should pass? The motion is made on the ground that there is not so much to provide for this year as last; that is to say, that the Labour Department, in the scale of its operations, would be smaller rather than larger, on account of the assurance of the minister that the number of employees would be less, as undoubtedly they should be less? The number has been growing progressively less for some time. Objection is taken on this ground—this is given as an illustration of the objection—that it is necessary to name in the Estimates two positions to cover the event of the man who fills what is now only the one position, the lower, not being chosen by the commission to fill the higher. The minister says: "Well, if he is not chosen, we shall not accept the other choice." I think he is right in saying that the department has power to refuse the choice of the commission. In that case only one salary is going to be required, and if the higher one is provided for, undoubtedly that is all that is necessary. Supposing there is simply a general cut ordered by this committee. Then it is certainly within the power of the department to allocate that cut so that just the six duplications will absorb a good part of it. Consequently, there is no argument in the case of duplication against the cut being made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my right hon. friend is quite correct so far as he goes. The sum which the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) has proposed is an arbitrary and rather a large amount. Without opportunity for adjusting all these estimates very carefully, it is difficult to say just what amount could be saved. If my hon. friend from Vancouver would consider reducing his amount somewhat, possibly the hardship of which I have just spoken might be avoided; but to take the sum which he has suggested and deliberately pass it in this committee, I am afraid, would create hardship upon some members of the Civil Service.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I should like to ask the minister whether with reference to two positions provided for in the estimates, a substantial saving might not be made. On page 107, the third position is that of Director of Technical Education. As I understand the matter, the legislation under which this office was created was passed in 1919, and Dr. Gill was appointed Director of Technical Education either in the latter part of 1919 or in the early months of 1920. In carrying out the provisions of the act, it was found that it was necessary for the Director of Technical Education to visit the different provinces for the purpose of making the necessary arrangements for the proper working of the act, and that required that the director should be absent from Ottawa a great part of his time. That was found to interfere with the carrying on of the office at Ottawa; and in order to carry on the negotiations with the provinces, later on an Assistant Director of Technical Education was appointed. We have a Director of Technical Education, and for the last year the appropriation was $4,275. This year the appropriation is $3,900. The arrangements, as I understand the matter, have all been completed with the provinces, and on the first of September of last year, Dr. Gill resigned. Mr. Crawford was appointed Assistant Director of Technical Education, and from the first of September of last year until the 29th of December, when the late government went out, Mr. Crawford was carrying on, performing the duties of Director of Technical Education. It was the intention of the late government that no appointment would be made to fill the vacancy; that Mr. Crawford should be promoted to be Director of Technical Education. It was found that the reason for the appointment of the assistant had passed.

All arrangements had been completed between the department at Ottawa and the provinces, and the Director of Technical Education was again in a position to carry on his work here. The late government was in office from the first of September until the 29th of December, and no appointment was made to fill the vacancy. Why? Simply because it was the policy of the government to do away with the assistant and to let the director again carry on at Ottawa. There is really no work outside of Ottawa, and it was the policy of the ex-Minister of Labour and of the late government that the Director of Technical Education should be a fountain of information only; that he should be in Ottawa for the purpose of giving to the provinces information that they might write for, so that these two offices are clearly not necessary, unless the present minister has changed the policy of his predecessor in office and has some other policy for the administration of this act. If he has, I am sure he will tell the House what that policy is. If he has no other policy, surely it is unnecessary to provide a salary of $3,900 for the Director of Technical Education and a salary of $3,705 for the assistant director. I do not know whether any appointment has been made since the 20th of December last or not; but I know that prior to that time no appointment had been made, and that the late government had no intention to make any appointment. There you have a clear saving of $3,705. With another item here, the two would make a saving of more than $5,000. I should like to know from the minister, in connection with the second item on page 108, "Confidential Messenger," who the confidential messenger was last year.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am advised that Mr. Lacelle was confidential messenger last year and is this year, as proposed.

[Mr. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): When was Mr. Lacelle appointed?

Mr. MURDOCK: In 1906, I am told.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Was a Mr. Rump not confidential messenger last year?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am advised that he was promoted to a clerkship, and that he earned his promotion by passing the specified examination. He has been there since I have been in office.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): If I were to claim that when Mr. Rump was placed in another department no appointment to the office of confidential mesenger was made, that would not be according to what the minister understands to be the fact?

Mr. MURDOCK: I am told that Mr. Lacelle has been a messenger since 1906, and that he was made confidential messenger some two or three years ago.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Did Mr. Lacelle occupy the position which in the estimates $1,200 was provided for last year?

Mr. MURDOCK: The estimates as I have them before me so indicate.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): That is your answer?

Mr. MURDOCK: Yes sir; and he did occupy the position to the best of my knowledge and belief.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Will the minister kindly explain the position of the department with reference to the appointment of a Director and Assistant Director of Technical Education?

Mr. MURDOCK: Gladly. The position of Director of Technical Education was vacant when I assumed office. I understand that Dr. Gill, who ocupied the position, went to British Columbia at a substantially increased salary some time early in September last. My predecessor in office very kindly left me a memorandum in regard to Dr. Gill, and the hon. member for Lanark has explained fully to the House the recommendation and suggestion made to me at the time I took office. The position has not been filled yet, although numerous applications have come to me, and I have not thought of filling it at the moment. We have in the department an Assistant Director of Technical Education. With my knowledge of his abilities and of the work to be performed, I do not care at the present time to promote him to the directorship. I do not see the necessity of having two officers at present, but I do not know whether that condition will continue. It is only proper to say, though, that this year there are $1,000,000 to be handled under the direction of either the Director or the Assistant Director of Technical Education. I am told that each year agreements have to be made between the federal government's representative and the educational authorities of the provinces with regard to the expenditure of this fund, and that it requires a very capable officer to see that the appropriation is judiciously expended. That is as I understand the situation with regard to the Directorship of Technical Education. I think the hon. member will agree that it would not be advisable for me to strike out the position of director and leave in the position of assistant director—in other words, an assistant to a position which does not exist. Therefore, at present the two positions are left in, although one is vacant.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): If it is intended to promote the Assistant Director of Technical Education to the position of Director, surely the position of Assistant at $3,705 should be struck out of the estimates; or if it is the intention to continue the assistant, then the position of director at $3,900 should be struck out. It is not intended to continue the two positions?

Mr. MURDOCK: Would it be consistent to strike out the Director of Technical Education and leave in the Assistant Director? If my hon. friend, as a business man and member of this House, will advise that course, I will agree with him at once.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): No. I would suggest to the hon. minister that he follow what I stated to have been the policy of the late government—promote Mr. Crawford.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am not prepared to do that, Sir, at present.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): But that would not be any reason why both appropriations should be kept in the estimates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Why not strike out the appropriation and leave the position there?

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, the Prime Minister made a very reasonable suggestion, and I want to bring it to the attention of the committee as early as possible. I would suggest that my resolution which now reads:

That in view of the statement of the Minister of Labour as appearing on page 479 of Hansard that thirty employees of the department would be dismissed on this day, March 31, 1922, item 24 on page 9 of the Estimates be reduced to the same amount as last year, namely, $171,640 for salaries and $35,000 for contingencies.

Instead of that I would move to substitute therefore:

That item 24 on page 9 of the Estimates be reduced by the sum of $15,000.

This, I have calculated somewhat carefully, will pretty well cover these points upon which we are agreed there will be required no vote. If the Prime Minister is agreeable to that, I would amend my motion accordingly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the House will agree, I think we shall save time by accepting the hon. gentleman's amendment.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Chairman, I have been waiting for an opportunity to address the committee briefly. I am delighted with the zeal for economy shown by my hon. friends to my right. They have made a great deal of progress during the past year in the right direction, and I hope that that progress will continue. It did seem to me that my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Stewart) was on pretty good ground with respect to this Directorship of Technical Education. I expressed my opinion yesterday on that question, and I need only make this further observation now, that the position of Assistant Director of Technical Education might very well be dispensed with. If the minister does not wish to promote the present occupant of that position to the senior position, he might leave him in an active capacity in the other, at any rate, until he had made up his mind whether or not he wished to make that promotion. In fact, I am pretty well convinced that there is no need for either, and I think that the deputy minister or the minister himself, might very well be able to make the necessary arrangements with the provincial authorities covering the expenditure of this money, which in my judgment should never have been voted to the provinces for this purpose. But let that pass.

There is one other aspect of these estimates that I wish to briefly bring to the attention of the minister, and I do it not in any spirit of captious criticism, but with a real desire to assist him. I observe there are several items in the estimates for statistical clerks. Altogether we are providing about $27,000 for twenty-two statistical clerks in the Department of Labour. We have a Bureau of Statistics, a branch of the Government service which in my judgment is very efficiently manned and operated. Would it not be possible for the Department of Labour to have its statistical work done, in large measure at least, in the Bureau of Statistics? The offices of the Labour Department are only a few blocks from those of the Bureau of Statistics; the bureau has all the machinery and equipment necessary to carry on the work. Are we to understand that the Department of Labour are building up within their own confines another statistical bureau? I mention this because I know how easy it is to duplicate services in government departments in this city. Another question I would ask is whether the Department of Labour is being equipped with the machines that go with statistical research work and which are already installed in the Bureau of Statistics?

Mr. MURDOCK: At present we are merely continuing the plan which, as I understand, has been in effect for very many years. These statistics collected in the Department of Labour are in connection with employment questions, the cost of living, and other matters coming within the purview of the department. I may tell my hon. friend, however, that for the past couple of weeks two or three ministers who think there is unnecessary duplication of statistical work have had it in mind to confer with the deputies of the respective departments and their chief officers with a view to finding out where those duplications can be eliminated, and how the collection of statistics can best be made uniform and placed under the supervision of one department only. I could place before you correspondence indicating that that matter is now under advisement and awaiting the time when we shall be able to get together for that purpose.

Mr. CRERAR: I am delighted to hear that statement from the minister. I am very certain that if the committee of the Cabinet prosecute their inquiries diligently, as I am sure they will, very considerable saving can be effected. I may not be fully conversant with the circumstances, but there appears to be no good reason why this information gathered from different parts of the country for statistical purposes cannot be turned over to and compiled by the Statistical Bureau, with a consequent saving of thousands of dollars to the other departments.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: I make no criticism at all of the vote; in fact, I am disposed to think it is necessary. But it is only right that the committee should know that the concentration of statistics has been the work mainly of the last two years. The statistics formerly were prepared in every department—Railway Department, Trade and Commerce, and all the rest, and the result was not duplication, but triplication and quadruplication and all the other "cations." They have, however, been concentrated in the Trade and Commerce Department, under a very efficient officer, Mr. Coats, who stated in a recent address that, in his belief, we now had the best statistical service of any country in the world. That has been the work of late years. I do not rise particularly to emphasize that feature of the late administration, but possibly I can be justified in doing so in view of the taunt that has just been flung at us that our enthusiasm for economy is of recent birth.

Mr. BROWN: Another thing that the Government might well consider is the question of what statistics are really valuable, and what are not. As an illustration of statistics that are not very valuable I recall the case of a man in our community who used to bucksaw wood and who could tell you at the close of the day exactly how many sticks he had cut. He marked it down and kept a faithful record; in other words, he accumulated statistics. We had a very ponderous volume put into our hands since we came here, the Canadian Atlas, a magnificent volume, splendidly printed on paper of excellent quality. I turned over the pages the other day and I came across this heading: "Tons of freight per head of population." Now, that information is entombed in this ponderous volume. It reminds me of going into a museum and finding the mummies of cats and hawks and other vermin that were taken from the pyramids of Egypt. The Government might very well consider whether it is wise or necessary to publish statistics that are not of permanent value. One of the things that makes us speak as we do in regard to the reduction of expenditure is that the wheat crop of Manitoba is said not to be able to pay the taxes of this year.

Mr. MARTELL: Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take part in this discussion, but as its range seems to have stretched from Dan to Beersheba and has proceeded, whether relevant to the item under consideration or not, I wish to suggest that when the Government are co-ordinating, so to speak, the statistical branches of the various departments they consider seriously the advisability of eliminating at least fifty per cent of the civil servants employed in the inside service at Ottawa. I am an old civil servant; I had about four years' experience in the Department of Marine and Fisheries at Ottawa, and during that time I was forced to the conclusion that the service at Ottawa is overmanned, and, to great extent, overpaid. The people of my constituency are up in arms against the conditions prevailing in Ottawa with regard to the Civil Service. The late government gave us what was termed Civil Service improvement or Civil Service reform. A few days ago I went over to the department in which I used to be employed, and I found that where there were two employees in 1914, in many of the branches to-day there are fifteen or sixteen, drawing pay from the public treasury. The farmers and the labouring men of Hants object to the public funds being dissipated in this manner. This afternoon we spent a great deal of time in the consideration of a matter involving $4,000 or $5,000; and we spent about $25,000 or $30,000 of the public moneys in useless discussion, largely owing to the fact that the ministry have inherited from the Government which was driven from power on the sixth of December a legacy for which the people owe them nothing but christian forgiveness—to say the least. My only object in rising this afternoon is to ask the Administration, when they take into consideration the co-ordination of the statistical branches, to give serious attention also to the reformation of the inside Civil Service—without going to the United States for assistance and without accepting the legacy which was handed down to us by the late administration.

Mr. NEILL: I have much pleasure in endorsing the remarks of the last two speakers, although my experience has been from a different point of view. While it is highly desirable that we should save the money that is spent in handling and tabulating these returns when they are brought in, the people who excite my sympathies are the wretched people in the country who have to make them out. There are a large number of retailers in Canada —I forget the exact number—and it was a plank in my platform that I should endeavour to eliminate these useless returns. They are a perfect pest to the body of retailers throughout Canada. A merchant in a big way in Vancouver told me they had to employ an extra clerk to make out the returns; this was more particularly during the war. Every time they sold a sack of potatoes all these different returns had to be made out, and not only did they have to keep an extra clerk for that work, but a very capable clerk, a statistician, indeed, to cope with it. I know one case where a storekeeper got one of these wretched returns and sat down and wrote on it, "I will go to gaol before I will attempt to fill out this return." He simply could not do it and was not going to lie about it. This going-to goal part of the business is no fantasy, because nearly all these returns have a notice at the bottom that if the return is not sent in by such and such a date you are liable to so many days in gaol. The company I am associated with have had a number of returns to make out, and while we fibbed a little we generally got them out a month or so late, and mailed the things in. One in particular I had mailed, but it did not appear to have reached the department, because I got a registered letter to say that on account of its not being sent in I was liable to, I forgot how many months in gaol, and they rather indicated they expected me to go to gaol by registered letter forthwith. I had no way of proving that I had sent the return in, although I knew perfectly well I had sent it in. The company I am connected with also sells coal, and we have a monthly coal return to fill in. It is made out in such a way that no known system of book-keeping can be used in making out the return. We fake the thing as a matter of fact. Every sale is supposed to be tabulated in this miserable return, and we simply have to fill it out more or less by guess. And if that were not enough, about every three months, or to be quite safe, every six months, they change the whole system of making out the returns so they cannot be of any possible use to them for purposes of comparison. Hon. gentlemen are inclined to laugh, but it is a matter of deadly earnestness to a great many people. I am often at a loss to know and often wonder whether it will be myself or my book-keeper who will go to gaol eventually. Certainly one of us will. If the Government will eliminate some of these returns they will certainly earn the gratitude of the very large body of retailers throughout Canada.

Amendment (Mr. Stevens) agreed to: yeas 120, nays 0.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Before the resolution as amended is agreed to I would like to ask if it is the intention of the Department of Labour to be represented at the Genoa Conference by a labour representative of this Dominion.

Mr. MURDOCK: If my hon. friend is referring to the Conference in April, we shall be represented by Colonel Carnegie. I think the conference my hon. friend refers to is at Rome, not Genoa. The governing body of the International Labour Office meets at Rome in April.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I am speaking of the Economic Conference at Genoa.

Mr. MURDOCK: We have nothing to do with it.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I think Canada is represented at the Genoa Conference by Sir Charles Gordon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And Professor Montpetit.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Is it the intention of the department or of the Government that labour shall be represented at that conference?

Mr. MURDOCK: We have had no invitation to be represented at that conference.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): The conference is for the consideration of economic and financial questions which are vital to the interests of Canada, questions in which labour as well as capital has a very deep interest. I should like to ask the minister if, in his opinion, in the consideration of these matters the interests of labour would be well taken care of by Sir Charles Gordon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps I might answer my hon. friend. An invitation was extended to the Government of Canada to be represented at the Genoa Conference. It was intimated that one or two delegates might be appointed, but the Government has chosen, as my hon. friend has mentioned, Sir Charles Gordon and Professor Montpetit. As my hon. friend is probably aware, Professor Montpetit is professor of economics in the University of Montreal and is well versed in labour and other problems. I am sure that in the hands of these two gentlemen the interests of labour, so far as they are matters for special concern, will be represented at this conference. It was not especially requisite that any particular group or class should be represented.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I do not wish at all that my question should indicate that I have any fault to find with the selection made by the Government. If I were to express my own view I should say that in the selection of Sir Charles Gordon no happier or better choice could have been made for Canada. I simply desired to know whether in this conference, as in past international conferences, it was the intention that the Department of Labour, or labour, should be specially represented by a labour representative.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I point out to my hon. friend that this conference is very similar in character to the conference at Washington. The late government when asked to appoint delegates to Washington selected Sir Robert Borden to represent this country; it was not thought advisable to appoint a special labour representative to that conference. The same reasons that governed the late administration in their appointment have also actuated the present Government.

Mr. LAPOINTE: May I tell my hon. friend furthermore that I do not know of a better economist in Canada than Professor Montpetit and he is not more of a capitalist than myself. Besides I do not see why a labour man should be appointed at this conference any more than a farmer or a person engaged in any other trade or occupation in Canada.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I am entirely satisfied; I simply wished to get the position the Government took. There is another question I would like to ask the Minister of Labour before this matter is finally disposed of and that is: Is it the present policy of the minister to promote, or to attempt to promote, further good relations between employers and employees, particularly in the building trades? I find that in January last the minister is reported to have said that employers and employees in the building industry "must and shall get together." Now if my hon. friend is correctly reported I think it is possibly due to the committee that we should know what the policy of the Labour Department is, particularly in view of the fact that after that statement was reported by the press to have been made by the minister, the Fourth Annual Conference of the Association of Building and Construction Industries, held in the city of Hamilton from January 17th to 20th, passed this resolution:

Resolved, that in our industry we have found Joint Industrial Councils tend only to cause dissension rather than cure it, and therefore such councils should not be continued.

I would like to have the minister state to the committee whether in view of the fact that earlier in the month of January he is reported to have stated—if he was incorrectly reported of course that disposes of the matter—that the employers and the employees must and shall get together, the department has any policy for dealing with the situation in view of the resolution passed in Hamilton.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am glad to advise my hon. friend, although I am sure he is already aware of the fact, that the Labour Department has no authority to compel pleasant, proper and consistent relations in the building trades as between employer and employee. I can however, inform the hon. member that anything that can be done in a suggestive way will be done, any assistance that can be rendered will be rendered, in order to bring about, to create and to maintain proper relations between employer and employees in the building trades. That is being done from time to time. Occasionally we have suggestions as to how we can assist in that respect, and in every case we undertake to do whatever it appears possible to do to bring about, establish, and maintain the relations which should exist between employers and employees. But again I repeat my hon. friend is as familiar as I am, if not more so with the knowledge as to how far, under the existing federal regulations, the Labour Department can go in a matter of that kind.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): It was only in view of the language used by the minister himself "must and shall" that I asked for information as to what the policy of the department was. Now I have one more question to ask and then I am through. In the Toronto Globe of November 24, 1921, the minister is reported to have expressed himself as follows:

I have been longing for two years to appear before a proper tribunal in order to get the facts as to the manner in which the rights of the people of this Dominion have been sacrificed and intentionally so. But no opportunity will come until after December 6th. When I am member for South Toronto I am going to continue in Parliament this battle for a showdown. Among those who may be questioned will be the Conservative nominee for West York, who will then be a private gentleman.

I shall ask what protection the Canadian people have at present against combines, trusts and mergers. I'll answer here and now, none whatever.

I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether with the staff and organization of the Department of Labour, he has undertaken to carry out and wage this battle which, at Mimico on 24th November last, he promised to wage, and if not whether he intends to carry out the promise? If so when and how?

Mr. MURDOCK: The hon. member's question has nothing whatever to do with the Department of Labour but I will answer by saying that no action has been taken or will be taken through or by the Department of Labour to do the things to which my hon. friend refers; and I here and now suggest that I was rather optimistic in regard to certain things at that time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I agree with the Minister of Labour that there is no power of compulsion in the department to compel the employers and the employees in the building trades to get together; but if there is no power of compulsion, would it not comport more with the dignity of this country if the minister did not use the language of compulsion? When a minister of the Crown uses the language of compulsion, saying what people "must and shall" do, that signifies that the power of compulsion is behind the language; and when the power of compulsion fails it does not comport very well with the dignity of the country or with the dignity of the office which the minister holds.

The next point I want to make is this: The minister through the campaign painted a lurid picture of what he described as trusts and combines which he designated as the enemies of the people. They were described as foes to be fought, as the oppressors of the real people of the country —the common people of the nation. Does he really think that the man whom he joyfully painted as acting in that role—and he was joined in vigorous language day after day and night after night by the leader of the Progressive party in denunciation of Dominion Textiles and all that pertained to them—does he think that the head and front, the founder, the centre, the heart, and everything practically, of Dominion Textiles is the right representative of Canada at an economic conference? If I believed what the minister expressed before the election, and if I believed what the leader of the Progressive party expressed over and over again, and Sir Charles Gordon were appointed to represent this country at an economic conference—a man who was declared to be the common enemy of the people of Canada—I would feel like getting up in Parliament and saying so. Why is it there is silence on the part of the minister and the Government after Sir Charles Gordon is selected? Why is there silence on the part of the Progressive leader in Parliament after Sir Charles Gordon is selected? Does not all this seem very strange? Certain things, of course, were brought into the arena of vituperation, but none so much as Dominion Textiles. That organization was held up as the child and creation of the late Government, and those who controlled it were represented as the dictators of the Government policy, pressing their heels on the neck of the common people, without sentiments of real patriotism for the nation as a whole, and selfish aggrandisers interested only in the accumulation of wealth. Is such a man as Sir Charles Gordon a fit representative of the Dominion, and of labour, along with the rest of the Dominion, at any conference at all? How could hon. gentlemen have been sincere, and then sit silent when such a selection was made?

Mr. MURDOCK: Two or three hon. gentlemen have referred to Sir Charles Gordon, and to what I said in the campaign. I never mentioned Sir Charles Gordon's name throughout the election, and I challenge any hon. gentleman to produce proof to the contrary. Furthermore, I never gave consideration—

Mr. RYCKMAN: Did the hon. gentleman mention the Dominion Textile Company and one of the presidents of it?

Mr. MURDOCK: One at a time, please. I never thought about Sir Charles Gordon during the campaign. I never dealt, specifically or otherwise, with the Dominion Textiles, but rather with certain other concerns.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Will the hon. minister allow me a question? Did he impale the Dominion Textile Company in the city of Toronto?

Mr. MURDOCK: I referred in Toronto, and at other places, to certain combines in textiles, cement and various things affecting the interests of the common people of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Dominion Textiles.

Mr. MURDOCK: I do not think it. I do not think I ever used the words "Dominion Textiles."

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I should like to know if we are discussing the Department of Labour or holding a post mortem?

Mr. HOEY: The hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has made frequent and characteristic attacks, has misled the members of this House and has referred to the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar).

Hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): I do not think those expressions are quite parliamentary.

Mr. HOEY: If they were parliamentary, those are the expressions I would use.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. HOEY: I want to say—

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure): I think the hon. gentleman must withdraw that expression, and use some other.

Mr. HOEY: If it is your pleasure and ruling, Mr. Chairman, I will be glad to withdraw, although I have the misfortune to come from a country where men do not usually withdraw their statements once made. I say, in answer to the charge made by the hon. leader of the Opposition, that the hon. leader of the Progressive party has already on the floor of this House, in the debate on the Address, protested against the appointment of Sir Charles Gordon to the Economic Conference at Genoa.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am very glad the hon. gentleman rose and made the statement. If he said so, I did not hear him. I am very glad he made the statement. He was consistent in doing it. I am not disputing it at all.

Mr. ARTHURS: During the debate yesterday a question arose regarding the mining situation in Nova Scotia, and the minister is reported to have spoken as follows:

> I presumed to send to Nova Scotia a very capable officer of the department in order that he might go on the ground in the mining towns of Cape Breton and ascertain what the actual conditions were.

Further on he said—

> I am sorry to say that I must have been too presumptuous in sending a federal employee to that district and in that capacity, because when he got to Halifax he was given to understand, in substance, that he had better mind his own business and get back to Ottawa.

What officer of the department was sent; for what purpose was he sent and from whom did he receive the order to come back to Ottawa? The minister must know this.

Mr. MURDOCK: In reply to the question of the hon. gentleman from Parry Sound (Mr. Arthurs), I may say that Mr. T. A. Stevenson was the officer of the Labour Department who went East to investigate the entire situation and report to the minister. After being in Halifax a short time—I could not say the time without the file—he was given to understand by an official of the provincial government, as I understand the report, that the provincial government of Nova Scotia was amply sufficient unto itself to deal with the situation in that locality, and that there was not any real necessity for a representative of our department to go further than Halifax to look into the situation.

Mr. ARTHURS: The hon. gentleman has stated that some officer of the provincial government of Nova Scotia gave this order to come back to Ottawa. Has this officer sent by his department made a report to the Minister of Labour, and if so is that report available to this House?

Mr. MURDOCK: Mr. T. A. Stevenson made a report as I recall now. I am speaking from recollection subject to correction. He made a report of each mining town investigated during his stay there, forwarding daily reports, and if they were all collected into one continuous report, I imagine we would find a concrete reference to every mining town he visited, or every situation which he investigated while down there.

Mr. ARTHURS: That does not answer the last question. Is that report available to the House? Further, who was the officer of the Nova Scotia government who asked this man to come back to Ottawa. I would also ask the hon. gentleman as a favour to lay the report on the Table, so that it would be available to every member of the House, and we could see the conditions that this officer found.

Mr. MURDOCK: Anything in the Labour Department is available to the hon. gentleman and to this House. I will undertake to bring it to the hon. gentleman and to give to it such publicity as he desires.

Mr. ARTHURS: That is all we want. The minister did not answer my other question as to who was the officer of the Nova Scotia government who asked this man to come back to Ottawa.

Mr. MURDOCK: I would have to look at the report in order to give the information which my hon. friend wants, and which, I judge, he can get from the report when he receives it.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): There are two matters I should like to clear up on the record with reference to these estimates, and I am sure the minister would be glad to have them cleared up. On page 108, there is an item, "one supplies clerk", for which, last year, there was an appropriation of $1,600, and for which there is no appropriation this year. I understand that, last year, no appointment was made to this office and no salary paid. Can the minister confirm that? From the estimate as it appears now, it would seem to be a reduction in staff and a saving.

Mr. MURDOCK: It has been found possible to discontinue entirely that position for this fiscal year.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I make the statement that no appointment was made last year and no salary paid, and that consequently no officer can be disposed of. This year the Government is not dispensing with the services of an officer or with a salary, but is simply carrying out the policy of the ex-minister in the late government.

Mr. MURDOCK: My hon. friend will note that last year there was a salary of $1,600 provided for in the estimates for one supplies clerk. I am told now that, by the usual methods of Civil Service promotion and advancement, that gentleman has gone up to the classification of senior supplies clerk at a salary of $1,680, or an increase of $80 a year.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Last year no appointment was made and no salary paid. That is all I desire to clear up.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am told that my hon. friend is perfectly right, and I am thankful for the information because I was not aware of it.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I simply wish to clear up what appears from the estimates to be dispensing with the services of an officer and the saving of a salary of $1,600. My hon. friend does not wish to create that impression when it is not so. Does the same thing not apply to the next item, "one audit clerk", for which, in the estimates of last year, a salary of $1,300 was provided, and for which there is no appropriation this year? I understand no appointment was made to the office and no salary paid. If that is so, that is all I desire to clear up.

Mr. MURDOCK: If the hon. member will look further up the list, he will find an item, "senior audit clerk", at a salary of $1,500. That is where that classification has gone to and where it is specified in the current estimates.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Last year both these offices were not filled and both salaries were not paid.

Mr. MURDOCK: I am told, the same individual in each case.

Item as amended agreed to.

Civil Government—Militia and Defence—Salaries and contingencies—$615,577.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand that this resolution was called on Monday or Tuesday last and was allowed to stand over owing to my absence. I may say that I have taken the opportunity of going through the various items with some care, and I think I can say that I have some familiarity with the particular items concerned. There does not appear to be very much reduction from the estimates of last year as they were amended by the committee on that occasion, but I think the reason for that is justifiable. The work consequent upon the conclusion of the war is still being performed to a large extent by three branches of the Department of Militia, notably, the Central Registry Office, the Records Office and the Pay and Allowance Branch. The work these three branches are doing is practically all after-war work, necessitating the employment of a considerable staff. I thought, perhaps, there might be a little greater reduction at the present time than these estimates show, but still I cannot express much surprise at the statement now made. Perhaps I might state that, in addition to the staff which is shown upon page 74 of the Estimates, there is a large temporary staff in that department; 400 of the temporary staff are, I understand, to be let out to-day. When I had the honour of being made Minister of Militia and Defence the temporary staff alone numbered 5,280, and last April, while the estimates were before the House, I remember I was able to say that the staff had been reduced to 1,200 or thereabouts, and that it would be gradually reduced and finally wiped out within the next year or two. I think myself that a reduction of 400 this year is a fairly good showing. That temporary staff, however, is not paid out of the Militia Department vote at all, but out of the Demobilization or War Claims Vote, as it is now called, which will be found in the Estimates, amounting to some $6,000,000 or $7,000,000. It is purely a war vote. These clerks are doing war work and have always been paid out of the demobilization fund. Their services will expire automatically, I should think, within a year or at most two years, when these temporary officials will of course be all out of the service. I would hardly like to say that the minister has saved the country $600,000 as I saw stated in one newspaper, by reason of dispensing with four hundred clerks on the first of this month. Certainly that amount will not be paid to them this year, but no one expected it would be. Automatically they go out because there is no work for them to do. The Demobilization or War Claims vote will also vanish entirely within a year or two. But on page 74 of the Estimates we find the permanent staff as it is to-day of the Militia Department. Having gone over that as carefully as I can, I do not think any reasonable objection can be taken to it, and so far as I am concerned, the vote having stood over for my presence in the House, I do not think I have any further criticism to offer on that head.

Mr. MANION: I notice a Director of Separation Allowances and Assigned Pay. Of course, I know that officer was used very much during the war, but I am wondering as to the necessity of such an officer at the present time.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Militia and Defence): Although the war is over that officer's work is going on at the rate of two hundred cases a month.

Mr. MANION: Are they disputed cases?

Mr. GRAHAM: He is also in charge, I believe, of the loan branch in connection with the Finance Department, and is a pretty busy man.

Mr. MANION: The minister apparently did not hear my question. I asked if the officer's work was in regard to disputed cases of assigned pay and separation allowances.

Mr. GRAHAM: I will give the number of claims investigated, approved and paid by him during the war. War service gratuities, 1,647; separation allowances, 246; pay and allowances, 764; refunds of transportation, 120. Approximately only 10 per cent of the claims received were approved, 90 per cent being rejected, but all had to be investigated. The number of pay and allowance cheques redeemed up to the 28th March, 1922, was 16,656, while the letters received numbered about 60,000, or an average of 4,000 per month. All these letters, of course, had to be answered. He is a very busy man with a comparatively small staff.

Mr. SALES: Is such an officer as custodian of surveying equipment at a salary of $1,680 really necessary?

Mr. GRAHAM: Until some time ago that gentleman was a senior clerk. He has been given that title by the new classification, and his work is the same as before, although he is engaged in the Survey branch.

Mr. BROWN: I have had occasion to look over the Auditor General's report for the year ended March 31, 1921, and under the head of civil government, Department of Militia and Defence, I find the total allotted to be $221,955.14. Does that cover the items that we are considering here, which were increased to $586,000 odd last year, and for which $585,000 is now being asked? Did the expenditure for that department increase that amount in one year?

Mr. GRAHAM: The statement would of course be for two years ago—

Mr. BROWN: I realize that.

Mr. GRAHAM:—before 270 employees were added.

Mr. BROWN: Then does the number of employees added to the staff account for that very large increase over two years ago?

Mr. GRAHAM: The classification of the department, although recommended, was delayed for quite a length of time, and when it came into effect it was to some extent retroactive, which made the expenses all the larger.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I notice that the purchasing department has been increased to this extent: there are three junior purchasing agents instead of one; two purchasing agents as there were before; and they have dropped one assisting purchasing agent, making five agents altogether instead of three. Is this due to reclassification? That is, are they the same men under different names? If so, are the former positions which they held still provided for by duplicated statements, or have they been abolished?

Mr. GRAHAM: The positions which they held before have been abolished. The department did not recommend that these new titles be given, but on appeal the officials were given them by the Civil Service classification. It is the same men, and the former offices disappear.

Mr. BROWN: I have not had my question answered yet, and I think it is something that the country would like to know. I asked whether I have correctly interpreted the Auditor General's report in assuming that the cost of this department has increased from $221,000 two years ago to something over half a million both for last year and the present year.

Mr. GRAHAM: As a matter of fact, the hon. gentleman is literally true on account of the postponement of reclassification from an earlier date up to that time, and the increase two years ago was really made almost entirely owing to the reclassification.

Mr. BROWN: That means over $300,000 in that one year.

Mr. GRAHAM: The work that these permanent clerks now do was performed at the time he mentions by temporary clerks who were paid out of the demobilization vote.

Mr. GOULD: Reference was made by the hon. ex-Minister of Militia and Defence to the services of some 400 temporary clerks being dispensed with to-day. Are the salaries of members of the permanent staff in the Records Office paid out of the war appropriations fund, or out of the moneys that are being voted to-night?

Mr. GRAHAM: The permanent staff is paid out of this vote. A large portion of the temporary staff, as has been explained by the ex-minister, was paid in former years out of the demobilization vote. This year—and personally I regret the necessity for doing it—four hundred members of the temporary staff are being retired, effective the first of April. I hope that with the amalgamation bill put through we shall eventually be able to carry on the work of the four branches, each of which has now a large temporary staff, with the permanent staff only.

Mr. GOULD: About three years ago contracts were entered into with those who now constitute a part of the permanent staff to cover their employment for a period of three years. I understand that at the end of next month those contracts will expire, and that they apply to quite a number on the permanent staff in Ottawa. If these contracts are not to be renewed—and from personal conversation with some of the men affected, I judge they do not anticipate their renewal—the decrease in the permanent staff should be apparent in the amount we are asked to vote to-night.

Mr. GRAHAM: That would be in connection with the military staff, not the civil staff.

Mr. MacLAREN: In the preparation of these estimates, has the system of duplication of salary votes been followed, as in the case of the Labour Department, where provision is desired for promotions?

Mr. GRAHAM: No.

Item agreed to.

Civil government—Agriculture—Salaries and contingencies, $775,717.50.

Mr. TOLMIE: The Prime Minister stated a few evenings ago that the secretaries employed by ministers of the late government would be placed in such a position that they would receive, as nearly as possible, their ordinary salaries, less secretarial allowance. My late secretary, Mr. Lynton, was first engaged in the Department of Customs; later he was taken by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) when he assumed the office of Minister of Agriculture. He served him for two years and was then taken over by me. I am anxious to know what the disposition of the minister is with regard to Mr. Lynton, or what he proposes to do in that connection?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): We are endeavouring to locate him, but we have at present no vacancy which is worth as much as the position he held previously, and so far we have not succeeded. That, however, is our aim.

Mr. CRERAR: I notice a very considerable increase in the amount for salaries from $567,000 last year to $640,000 this year, contingencies standing at the same amount. The total amount voted for salaries in the Department of Agriculture has grown from $399,000 in 1913 to $640,000 this year—a very substantial increase. Perhaps the minister could give us some explanation of the increase of $80,000 over the amount voted last year.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The increase of $71,680 is due to three causes. A certain number of temporary clerks have been promoted to the permanent staff and get larger salaries, in accordance with the new salary range. In addition to that, there are some nineteen new positions, accounting for something like half the total increase. There is a reduction, however, under the head of clerical and other assistance from $45,000 to $35,000. My hon. friend may think the salaries very high, but if we have a number of these positions vacant to-day, as we have, it is because the salaries are not sufficiently high to attract applicants to fill the vacancies. The position of Dominion Cerealist, for instance, will be vacant in June. The positions of Dominion Agrostologist and of Plant Pathologist have not been filled yet. Taking them altogether, I do not think that the key men in the department are overpaid. As a matter of fact, we have some difficulty in retaining them at their present salaries.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I should like to ask why $10,000 additional is necessary for travelling expenses. I was under the impression that the cost of travelling was coming down to a certain extent.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There are a number of assemblies and conventions held, some every year, and others at longer intervals, at which the department is represented. The Agricultural Institute meets at Rome this year, and we shall have representatives there. Then there are always a certain number of conferences in connection with live stock and other matters at which we are represented. Some of the travelling expenses that were formerly charged up to the branch vote will this year be charged to this item specifically set aside for travelling expenses. The main increase is due to these overseas conventions being held this year.

Mr. EVANS: A number of new positions are being filled this year, such as Dominion Bacteriologist, Chief of Feed Division, Specialist in Ornamental Horticulture, two Assistant Entomologists, and so forth. It seems to me that agriculture is top heavy at the present time with professional men. It is too expensive altogether. Was there a call for these new appointments this year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have not had a Dominion Bacteriologist in the department hitherto, but if my hon. friend has been reading the newspapers and is acquainted with the legislation passed last session, the Dairy Produce Act, he will know that a great deal of attention is now being paid to the question of bacteria in milk and dairy products generally. Then there is the question of soil bacteria. It has been found as we go along in our agricultural research work that bacteriology plays a far more important part in agriculture than we ever dreamt of some years ago. This man will have to deal more particularly with dairy products and soil bacteriology.

With regard to the Chief of the Feed Division, it is proposed to subject our various feeds to an analysis to guard against any dilution or disease in the seed. It includes bran and shorts, and all kinds of stock feeds.

The specialist in ornamental horticulture will be used at the Dominion Experimental Farm. That farm is a rendezvous for visitors from all over the Dominion, and it was thought that a little more attention might be paid to ornamentation of the lawns, shrubberies, and that kind of thing.

The Assistant Chemist is required because the chemist's work is growing and he is unable to take care of it himself. Many samples of soil are sent in from time to time, and in order that we may intelligently apply artificial manures, it is necessary to analyze different soils to ascertain what manures are best adapted to them.

With regard to the Assistant Entomologist, I am sure we must all have heard at various times of the tremendous loss to our forests as a result of the spruce budworm and other insect pests. The department sends out scouts from the Entomological Branch for the purpose of locating these insects and directing the activities of the lumbermen to the affected parts of their limits, so that they can cut down their trees and use them before they are destroyed by these bark beetles and other insects. As a matter of fact, we are going to be short even with these new men.

Mr. GOULD: I am not in any mood to criticise the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, because since my appearance in this House I have been quite convinced that of all departments of the Government the Department of Agriculture has been used the most niggardly in the matter of expenditure. I have made a point of that throughout the country. The minister has mentioned the work done by our Entomological branch and in that connection an incident comes to my mind which happened some years ago at a time when the cut worm was very bad in the West. I mentioned it simply to urge that the Entomological branch has been perhaps in a more or less starving condition so that research work could not be carried out thoroughly, with the result that we who were engaged in agriculture and suffering much loss annually through the depredations of insects would sometimes have to challenge the advice that was given out by the branch. On this occasion, I was driving my team up and down the field, and as the horses were warm I stopped them and walked into an adjoining field of wheat. I had been reading Bulletin No. 32, I think it was, of the Entomological branch, dealing with the cut worm, and according to the advice given in that bulletin all these cut worms should at that time in the morning have been under the surface. It was about eleven in the forenoon and the sun was shining very strong when I walked into my field of wheat and saw, I should judge, a million cut worms in a given space, some going north, some south, some east, some west. I said, "My, according to information in a certain pamphlet you fellows should all be under the ground. What are you doing here?" I wrote to Mr. Criddle about it, and we exchanged several letters, and in the end—I am not saying this boastfully at all—he informed me that my contention was right, that the instructions given in this pamphlet were wrong, and he asked me to continue my research work.

My point is this. The professional man whose money is secure, being voted by this Government, is in a much more favourable position for carrying on research work than the practical man who is concerned with making his living, and consequently I ask that adequate provision be made both in the estimates and in the staff of the Entomological branch so that those who are making their living by agriculture may receive real assistance through entomological research work, which the individual on the farm has not the time to carry on. As I said before I believe that many of the branches of the Department of Agriculture have been starved in the past for the want of funds, and I make this special plea particularly on behalf of agriculture and of the producers of Canada. I read in the records of last year that the loss to agriculture from insect pests amounts to no less a sum than $120,000,000. A few days ago I put a question with reference to the methods employed by the Government in dealing with insect pests. I asked, for instance, about chlorine gas. I was informed that chlorine gas was considered too expensive to employ in the destruction of insects. That may be true; but the expense of chlorine gas does not prevent its use in the destruction of human lives. If we entertain a proper conception of the value of the agricultural industry surely we shall not hesitate to employ chlorine gas, or any other remedy, which will enable us to prevent the wholesale losses that result from these insects. Let me point out that the vacant lands held by this Dominion in our western country form veritable breeding grounds for the grasshoppers, cutworms, and many other insects injurious to agriculture, of which I have been complaining. These vacant lands are also breeding grounds for gophers and other pests—menaces to the growth of wheat and other products of the soil, and in view of this fact the Dominion Government must assume the obligation to combat these pests which live upon the Dominion Government's land. We settlers can take care of our cultivated areas and we do so; but when we have taken the necessary precautions in the shape of spreading poisoned bait we see when we come out the next morning hordes of grasshoppers emerging from the vacant Dominion lands, spreading in all directions, and all our work, onerous as it is, has to be done all over again, to say nothing of the additional expense incurred. I earnestly urge the Government to appropriate sufficient money to wage a determined fight against these insects and other pests which commit such depredations in the west.

Mr. SPENCER: I understand that Mr. Duncan Marshall is in the employ of the Department of Agriculture. Which of these positions does this official fill?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He does not belong to the inside service.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): Reference has been made to a position which was shortly to become vacant. Am I correct in understanding that this position has been vacated by Dr. Saunders, who was identified with the research and experimental work which resulted in the origination of the variety of wheat known as Marquis wheat?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend refers, I think, to Dr. Charles Saunders. He and his father were closely identified with the experiments which resulted in the discovery to which my hon. friend refers—both of them worked together.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): I am informed that this position has become vacant owing to the resignation of Dr. Saunders on acount of ill health?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): Is this position being filled; also is any provision being made for Dr. Saunders, or has he made any application for assistance of any kind?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I may say in reply to the hon. member for Moosejaw that the position will not be vacant until the first of July next. Dr. Saunders has been on sick leave most of the winter, although until quite recently he has been working an hour or two a day—some of the time at any rate—and against the doctor's orders. We are fearful that we shall not be able to replace him at the same salary. Hon. members will find an item in the Estimates making provision for increases of salary. That I think will overcome the difficulty which was the subject of discussion this afternoon and as to which we apparently got all tangled up. On page 89 of the Estimates a vote of $4,000 is asked for "New positions and promotions." In the event of an increase of salary being needed, after receiving the necessary authority from the Civil Service Commission, we shall thus have an appropriation out of which some provision may be made. We shall have to provide for the vacancy mentioned and possibly one or two others; for example the Plant Pathologist who is now investigating the depredations of rust. All of us from the West know the loss that has been sustained from this cause. I suppose that in that country from fifty to one hundred millions of dollars has been lost from the result of the invasion of rust, and the trouble is becoming more prevalent all the time. Aparently there are only one or two men on this continent who are capable of holding the position referred to. Unfortunately, if I wanted to augment the salary attached to this office by $5,000 I do not know how I should do it—I would not know how to go about it. That is a serious handicap which the members of the Government are labouring under at the present time, and I do hope that before Parliament prorogues we will be given the necessary authority to meet the existing situation. We have not only the positions of Cerealist and Plant Pathologist to fill, but one or two others; and I am afraid that if the present classification is to prevail the salaries attached to these offices will be found to be wholly inadequate. Hon. members must understand that there is a very large limitation of ministerial authority in connection with these appointments. I am not making any complaint, we are working under the system as best we can; but the point is that when responsibility rests—as it must rest—upon a minister, he should be given the necessary authority to meet such a peculiar situation.

I do not think I answered my hon. friend's query as to how we are dealing with Dr. Saunders. We are making provision for his going on the retiring list under the provisions of the Calder Act. This act, however, expires on the first of July next and unless we provide for an extension it will not be very long available for our purposes. I do not know whether any further provision will be made for Dr. Saunders than the present law permits. I do not hesitate to say that he has been a very greatly underpaid man during the last number of years. That, perhaps, is due to the fault of nobody in particular. It so happened that when the war broke out he happened to be at the top of what is called his salary range. I do not know whether my hon. friends are familiar with that term but they probably understand what it means. In the case of a position which has been classified there is a certain minimum and a certain maximum fixed, and the stages between are called steps. Dr. Saunders happened to be at the top of his class when the fiat went forth that there should not be any more increases in salary, and therefore got no further remuneration except the bonus which he enjoyed in common with all others. I hope that some method may be worked out during the present session whereby this injustice will be rectified, and I feel confident of receiving the assistance of my hon. friend from Moosejaw in arriving at a right conclusion.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is it true that another Professor Saunders—in this case in Nova Scotia—has resigned from the Department of Agriculture? The official to whom I refer has been engaged in demonstrating the efficacy of poisons for the potato bugs and other insects.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand that what my hon. friend states is the case. The officer was an entomologist.

Mr. CALDWELL: Why did he resign?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know.

Mr. CALDWELL: I have understood he resigned because of the inadequacy of his salary. I feel that Professor Saunder's resignation is a distinct loss to the Dominion, especially to the eastern section of Canada where we grow large quantities of potatoes and encounter serious difficulties with varieties of insects that destroy the crop, to say nothing of rust and other plant diseases which affect potatoes. I repeat that it is a distinct loss to the potato growers of eastern Canada that we should lose the services of Professor Saunders.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend's remarks further illustrate the difficulty to which I was referring. I am informed that Professor Saunders resigned because he received a better offer from elsewhere.

Mr. CALDWELL: From the United States?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, these offers invariably come from the United States. We experience very active competition from that source in regard to qualified scientists. Under the provision as to salary we were not able to meet the competition and we had to let him go.

Mr. CALDWELL: What salary was he getting?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know. That comes under the outside staff. We have not that information here.

Mr. CALDWELL: Does your plant pathologist come under this head?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, he is under civil government, but we have plant pathologists who will come under the vote for outside staff in connection with the different farms, the information regarding which will be given while we are considering the general estimates of the department. I understand that we have lost pathologists there also for the reasons that I have indicated. We will go into that more extensively when we have the general estimates up.

Mr. CALDWELL: I hope so.

Mr. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): What are the duties of the chief car inspector?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This gentleman's duties are to inspect the fumigation and cleansing of the stock cars under the provisions of the Animal Contagious Diseases Act. He has charge of the inspectors, who look after fumigation and general cleansing of the stock cars.

Mr. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): Have you inspectors all over the country?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, located at strategic points all over Canada.

Mr. GOULD: We have provision made for the Dominion Apiarist, who is an adviser in the keeping of bees. It is not my intention to object to this item, but I wanted to draw the attention of the minister to a circumstance which exists in my own district, the Moose mountain country. Several farmers in that part of the country, owing to the shelter provided by the Moose mountains, attempted to go into the business of keeping bees, and with more or less success. These men have all communicated with me, and asked what assistance might be given them in the way of advice, or what advice the department had to give them, which would be applicable to their particular district. They feel that they should not do all the pioneer work, and I would suggest that perhaps this expenditure might be increased to help out conditions existing in the West. The hon. gentleman is well acquainted with the fact that it is difficult for the people in the West to raise bees. We have small fruits and none of the larger fruits, and the production of honey in that western country would be a wonderful thing, particularly as a weapon to defend ourselves against the encroachments of our British Columbia friends who want to charge us 90 cents extra duty on apples. I think these men who have done much of this bee-keeping work around that country should get a little assistance in the way of advice at least from the department based on information they have received from experiments carried on in a community where conditions are the same as exist in the West. I would ask the minister if any provision is to be made to give advice to farmers as to how it is best to keep bees so that they may produce honey for home consumption.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is exactly the object of his appointment. The apiarist is assistant to the Dominion Apiarist. The Dominion Apiarist has charge of the bee work of twenty-two experimental farms, and his assistant is at liberty to travel through the length and breadth of the land for the purposes mentioned by my hon. friend. This is a work which is neglected. The little tiny bee looks small to the farmer, but the time has come when we must look into small things in connection with agriculture, if we are going to make the best of everything that we can avail ourselves of.

Mr. CALDWELL: What is the duty of the fertilizer inspector? This is a new appointment.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The principal work is to take charge of the experiments in connection with the application of the fertilizers, so that he may be able to report back to the people just what the results are from the use of the fertilizers. I expect to bring down a consolidation of the present Fertilizer Act, with extensive amendments this year. It is for the purpose of superintendence, and, in addition to that, the carrying out of the act, to see that the fertilizers are of a particular strength in certain important constituent parts. Perhaps that would be the duty of the chemist. This appointment is principally for the purpose of conducting experiments with fertilizers. The officer will first analyze the soil to see what it is deficient in, then apply the fertilizer and report back to those interested.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am as much interested in fertilizer—because we use it in growing potatoes—as my hon. friends from the West are in wheat. Potato-growing is the chief industry in New Brunswick. I do not see how you can expect to get an inspector for $1,900. The chief canning inspector gets a salary of $2,660. It looks to me as though the fertilizer expert would command a larger salary than the canning inspector. I am as much in favour of economy as anybody in Canada, because nobody realizes the necessity more than I do, but I think it is false economy to try to employ a specialist at the price of a common day labourer, because you will not get him at that price.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think you are quite right in that respect. We find it pretty difficult to keep up with our work just now, and with reference to the item I read a few moments ago "New positions and promotions," we expect to promote one of the officials, and put him into a higher grade. He will begin at the bottom salary, and get automatic increases for two or three years, whatever the various steps may be, and this $4,000 will take care of that. I do not know exactly why it was put in at such a low rate. It is a new position entirely, and the salary range has not been fixed, we just simply put it in at that figure until such time as we could put it through the Civil Service Commission, with the salary raised and all that sort of thing. It is rather complex and difficult to understand. I have been trying to grasp it for the last three months and I am in my A B C's yet, but I think I understand a little more about it than I did when I began. It is one of the most complicated pieces of machinery I ever saw.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am not finding fault with the salary. I do not think you will be able to get a competent man for that salary.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think so.

Mr. CALDWELL: And I think my friends from the West hardly realize the importance of it to us in the East. We use a ton of fertilizer to the acre to produce a crop of potatoes, we pay as high as $100 a ton for the fertilizer, and it sometimes proves very unsatisfactory. I think you will understand the necessity of having a good man as a fertilizer expert. I know a hundred farmers in one locality absolutely refused to pay for the fertilizer two years ago, because it not only did not produce a crop, but it destroyed the soil. They were to pay $100 a ton for it, and they used a ton an acre. Some of the men ploughed it in, and sowed grain in the soil. Others left a few potato plants in the ground and did not get any results. The fertilizer company entered action against one man as a test case to collect the price of the fertilizer and seventy odd farmers combined to fight the case, and put up the money. Yet the fertilizer company has not brought the case to trial, although it is two years old. A sum amounting to $70,000 is involved in the matter between the farmers and the fertilizer company. I hope when the ministers new fertilizer bill comes down, it will cover the case more fully than the old act did. Last year I brought up an amendment to the Fertilizer Act, in an endeavour to remedy this condition. It received its first and second readings; it was referred to the Committee on Agriculture by the then Prime Minister; it was unanimously endorsed by that committee; but notwithstanding that fact and the fact that the committee reported it back to the House at least a month before Parliament prorogued, the government failed to bring my bill up for third reading. I do not know whether the reason was because the representatives of the fertilizer company, who came and fought the bill before the Agriculture Committee, stayed around a week longer lobbying in the House. I noticed that the next day after the Agriculture Committee had reported the bill back, they were going around with long faces. I think the barber must have charged them half a dollar to shave them that morning, their faces were so long. Their faces shortened gradually during that week, and they finally went away with broad smiles. My bill was not brought up for third reading, which is merely a matter of form and takes a very short time in the House, and accordingly it lapsed. When the ministers new fertilizer bill comes down, I hope it will cover the subject very fully. I also hope he will be able to get an expert, through whom the farmers will be able to get some redress in a case like that I have spoken of.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will promise my hon. friend that the Agriculture Committee will have full opportunity to deal with this bill when it comes down, because it is my intention to refer the bill directly to the committee. I am disposed to think this salary will not get the party desired. I had an explanation from Dr. Grisdale before he was waylaid in Ottawa the other night and was so maltreated that he was not able to get around for some time. There was some special reason why he thought at that time he could get a man for the salary; but inasmuch as there is an appropriation to provide for a probable increase, I think we shall be able to meet the situation. We do not want any third-rate man; there is no place in the department or anywhere else for poor men. If you are going to get a good man and if you wish to retain him, you must pay a good salary I forget why this salary was put at $1,920 but there is some provision for the higher rate, if we get the consent of the Civil Service Commission, and I think we shall.

Mr. MILLAR: Perhaps it might be appropriate just now to go back to the first part of the session when we had a number of speeches in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Many congratulations were offered. I am going to congratulate the leader of this Government (Mr. Mackenzie King) on securing such a man as the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). Perhaps it is appropriate that I should do so because we lived within a few miles of each other over thirty years ago, and I have known him ever since. I think I may say that, amongst the men that were available at that time to fill this position, I know of no man who commands the respect and confidence of the people of Saskatchewan amongst all classes, not only Liberals, but Progressives and Conservatives, to the same degree as the present Minister of Agriculture.

I was going to ask a simple question. I was quite interested in the remarks about rust. I thought it was significant that the minister connected his remarks about filling the position of plant pathologist and the salary required to get the proper man, with the fact that there were only two or three on the continent who could successfully cope with the question of rust. From the minister's knowledge, what chance does he think there is of successfully coping with the rust question? The losses are enormous, and I was rather of the opinion that, so far, there was no one who could successfully cope with this great evil. I thought, perhaps, from the minister's remarks to-night he had some inkling that they were making some headway and had some chance of finding a remedy.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Before answering my hon. friend's question, I should like to express my appreciation of his very kind remarks with respect to myself. I can remember the time, not so long ago, when my hon. friend was the first secretary of the Territorial Grain Growers' Association, including Saskatchewan and Alberta, and I was the president for the first five years of its existence. I can appreciate my hon. friend's very kind remarks in connection with our relations in those days. I do not exactly know how it has come about that this aisle is between us at the present time, but we shall look forward to the time when, perhaps, the distance between us will be lessened.

Mr. MILLAR: The minister is on the wrong side.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Referring more particularly to the question of rust investigations, I may say that progress has been somewhat slow. I can recall now, over fifty years ago, my first experience of rust in Ontario, more particularly with respect to winter wheat. It was looked upon as a very mysterious visitation; it was thought to be associated with climatic conditions. Certain days were then spoken of as "rusty" days. Intermittent blinks of sunshine and rain, calm, warm, murky nights and mornings, we knew, were conducive to the development of this parasitic spore. Of later years we came to the conclusion that we knew very little about it, and now our research men are investigating in all directions to find some remedy for it. They seem to think the remedy is along the line of plant resistance, of breeding a wheat plant of sufficient resistance to fight off the attack itself. Just as Dr. Saunders, by plant breeding, discovered a wheat known as "Marquis," somewhat similar to, but very much earlier than the old "Red Fife," so it is thought there may be discovered a wheat plant that will be able to resist the ravages of this rust fungus. I saw in the local papers the other day some American research workers had discovered a smut-resisting wheat, and I am sure some of my hon. friends must have noticed it. Smut has sometimes been referred to as a twin brother or sister of rust, although there is no relation between the two, but it is one of our enemies in the West more particularly. It is thought, if these researches are taken up exhaustively, we shall be able to discover a rust-resisting wheat and other rust-resisting cereal plants. Just the same as animals are resistant to disease, as has been well established, so plants are also resistant, some more so than others, to diseases of this nature. I may say to the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, that the progress in that direction has not been very rapid. We have made the discovery, that in the West these invasions usually start down about the Gulf of Mexico in the spring of the year. In another two or three weeks, you will have the wheat planted; in fact, it will be green there now. If they have a severe attack of rust down in Oklahoma and around the gulf, about the beginning or middle of May, and later on in Kansas, it is almost certain that western Canada will have an attack sooner or later. Sometimes, it occurs so late in the season that it does not do very much harm. If it starts sufficiently early down in the south, it has to travel, and travel against the prevailing winds; it comes up through the Dakotas and Minnesota, into part of Saskatchewan, but mainly into Alberta. By the time it gets that far west or northwest the grain is ripe and safe from its ravages. How it travelled had always been a mystery, but experiments made with balloons showed that at an altitude of three or four miles the rust spores travel in the cross currents going in an opposite direction to the currents at a lower level. Those spores have been found fertile even at that altitude. That will explain in a measure how rust travels so rapidly in a northwesterly direction against the prevailing wind. We know that it does travel, and that it is more or less epidemic. Once it gets started it develops very fast even though the climatic conditions may not be very favourable to it: but if the climatic conditions in the south are favourable, it gets to the northern latitude before the harvest is over. Experiments so far have not led to any particular conclusions; we are feeling our way and are getting sufficient foundation material to know in what direction to act, but it will take some years to reach this stage. Up until quite recently we knew very little about this pest. This much, however, has been established, that the barberry bush is the intermediary or host-plant that makes it possible for this fungus growth to develop. Without the barberry it is questionable if it could find another host-plant to serve its purpose. Therefore, wherever we find the barberry bush we would be well advised to look upon it as a noxious weed and destroy it. As a matter of fact some of the western provinces are now treating the barberry bush as a noxious weed.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is the Department of Agriculture carrying on any work with the object of combating the ravages of the spruce bud moth of eastern Canada? All over the maritime provinces and Quebec the situation is becoming very serious.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am almost ashamed to admit that the only way in which we are taking care of that extensive work is by the addition of this one lone entomologist we spoke of a moment ago. That is one of the many requirements that we have to attend to; there is no question about that. When my hon. friend on my left (Mr. Fielding) gets his revenues in a more buoyant condition I will apply to him and may get an appropriation for a good many more entomologists. The ravages of this spruce bud worm are tremendous, and are measured not in tens of millions of dollars but in hundreds of millions. I was given the information by a gentleman recently, but the figures are so alarming that I hesitate to quote them. This matter comes under the Department of the Interior, but there is a certain amount of interchange of work, and on request from that department we do a certain amount of scouting for the purpose of discovering where the invasions of this pest are most threatening so the lumbermen may cut the timber before it is quite destroyed. We are not doing much, but we have to cut our coat according to the cloth. I do not think that is a good policy in this case, and I would certainly like to get more cloth somehow or other. The next war, it is said, must be against insect life. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould) I do not think is unduly alarmed at all, for he comes from a district which by dear experience knows the ravages made by insect pests.

Mr. CALDWELL: Are the provinces taking up this work themselves?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is the Department of Agriculture co-operating with them?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: The hon. minister speaks of the loss in dollars, but it cannot be computed in dollars at all. I think we hardly realize what it means to eastern Canada if the spruce bud moth continues its ravages. Unless it can be checked there will be no pulp to make paper and no lumber to build houses. The spruce forests of eastern Canada are different from those of the West, where I have also spent a considerable time. The spruce is a perpetual growth, the trees varying from the size of one's arm up to the largest sizes, all being intermingled, and as the large trees are cut the young growth develop and give a crop of lumber every ten years upon the same ground. But in New Bruswick—and I know that province best—it is estimated that 50 per cent of the standing spruce, both large and small, has been killed already by the spruce bud moth, which means that for generations to come this land will be barren, it being generally unfit for agriculture, and simply a lumber preserve. Our spruce forests are what the province of New Brunswick derives its revenue from almost absolutely, and I think the Dominion Government will be well advised to take some steps to explore the possibility of combating this menace. It looks to me to be a big problem. I have seen the air full of these moths fluttering around the tops of our spruce trees, and as a result of their ravages you will notice the buds turn red as if they had been scorched, and the tree dies in one or two years. It is not merely a matter of dollars and cents; the preservation of the future supply of our lumber for building, for pulp and paper, and for other uses is involved.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The maritime provinces and Quebec are taking steps to preserve their forests, and a fairly extensive reforestation plan is being carried out in Quebec now. This is such an interesting subject that I may be excused, Mr. Chairman, if I refer to the Main Estimates —and this will also relieve the anxiety of my hon. friend from Assiniboia—where it will be found that provision is made for dealing with other insect pests. At page 22 we have an appropriation for the administration and enforcement of the Destructive Insect Pests Act. In the present temper of the country I might be subject to some criticism if this vote was not for such an urgent purpose, as it will be noted that last year the vote was $190,000, as against $235,000 this year, or an increase of $45,000. But that will be found rather small, too, when we come to apply it to the enormous task we are discussing, the fight against these new insect pests, because, Mr. Chairman, the last four or five years have been so dry not only in the West but also in the East, that a lot of new insect enemies have been developed that we never heard of before. In other words, if you change the climate you change the insect pests. The result is we have to meet the situation with a new vote for that branch which will come up later on.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, if the pleasant exchange of compliments between the minister and the governmental supporters on this side is finished—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Order.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: —I would suggest that it is a good time to adjourn.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carry the Estimates.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I should like to assist my friends as much as possible, but there are several members very much interested in this item who did not think it would come up so soon, and I would therefore ask that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. FIELDING: Is the item to carry or to stand?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let it stand.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.12.

[Mr. Caldwell.]

Monday, April 3, 1922

The House met at three o'clock.

ESQUIMALT DRY DOCK

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. S. F. TOLMIE (Victoria City): Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to direct the attention of the leader of the Government to an article appearing in the press this morning to the effect that work on the Esquimalt dry dock has been ordered stopped. In that connection I would like to read a wire from the Associated Boards of Trade of British Columbia, dated Victoria, March 31. It reads

Whereas it has been brought to our notice that the Federal Government has ordered the suspension of work on the building of the Government dry dock at Esquimalt; also we understand that the work on the floating dry dock at the Wallace shipyards, North Vancouver, has been discontinued by order of the Government; and exceedingly regretting that the Government has seen fit to stop both of these important works especially seeing that at Esquimalt they have already expended approximately one and one half millions of dollars; therefore be it resolved that this meeting of the Associated Boards of Trade of British Columbia in session at Victoria request the Government to immediately reconsider their decision in order that these important and necessary works for the development of the ports of Victoria and Vancouver be proceeded with as rapidly as possible.

This telegram clearly indicates that the matter is one of great importance not only to the ports mentioned, but also to the great shipping interests of the Pacific coast. I should be very glad indeed, therefore, to receive from the leader of the Government some statement as to what the Government intends to do in this connection.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I saw in this morning's paper the despatch to which my hon. friend has referred. I also noticed a communication which was reported to be a telegram from myself to the secretary of some organization in Victoria with regard to this matter. I should like to make it plain that I have not sent any communications at all; possibly the message referred to was sent by one of my colleagues and the press has got the Kings mixed. But the substance of this telegram attributed to me, indicated that the matter was receiving the attention of the Government. We have thought it advisable to have a report on the situation as it affects the dry docks of Victoria and Vancouver before proceeding further with the work. The matter is under consideration.

NOVA SCOTIA MINERS

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to put a question to the Government with regard to the positon of the present or apprehended strike in Nova Scotia. In this morning's press there is an announcement which purports to come from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock). The substance of it is in five or six lines, which I will read:

I have not reconstituted the Gillen Board, and I shall not do so unless the "strike on the job" policy is abandoned and repudiated. If that policy is repudiated I shall be very glad to do anything in my power to bring about a settlement of the trouble.

Contrast that with the statement of the Government as embodied in the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), which may be compressed also into a very few words. After suggesting that the Gillen Board should be reconstituted, and being asked by myself whether that intention on the part of the Government was to be carried out wholly irrespective of the order issued by Mr. McLachlan or conditional on that order being revoked, he said:

I made no condition about Mr. McLachlan at all, in fact I had not given that phase of the question much thought, but I think if we have legal power—and the Minister of Labour holds that we have—to revive the commission—I do not like the term "revive"; I think the commission is still alive—they should be asked to resume the inquiry, go to Cape Breton and acquaint themselves sympathetically with conditions on the ground. I have every hope that if that is done you will have a satisfactory conclusion of the difficulty.

That attitude I think was pretty generally accepted by the House as meaning that action on the part of the Department of Labour was not to abide the day of repentance on the part of McLachlan. May I ask, does the statement purporting to come from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) or the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) of Thursday last represent the position of the Government to-day, or does neither?

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): With regard to my right hon. friend's first query respecting the statement of my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock), I understand that statement has reference to a telegram the minister received from Mr. Baxter, the president of the miners, asking whether the board would be reconvened under certain conditions, and the reply of the minister had reference to the request as he received it from Mr. Baxter.

The position which the Government has taken was exactly as stated the other evening. The Government is quite prepared to reconvene the board, and the Minister of Labour has already in the last couple of days been in communication with Mr. Gillen the president of the board, obtaining his consent to act on the board the minute it is reconvened. The Government had expected to receive an intimation from either one of the interested parties or from one of the members of the board asking for its reconvening. We thought that that request would be forthcoming. If it is much longer delayed, the Government will proceed with the establishment of the board without waiting for the request, but we thought it might facilitate the working of the board later on if one of the parties was sufficiently interested to request that it be reconvened.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Anyway, I understand that the reconvening of the board is wholly irrespective of the repudiation of Mr. McLachlan's stand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We think the reconvening of the board should in the public interest be unconditionally.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Unconditionally?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, certainly.

SUPPLY—INTERIM VOTE

On motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) the House proceeded to Government orders, and went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance) moved:

Resolved, That a sum not exceeding $79,109,751.00 being one-fourth of the amount of each of the several items not yet voted as set forth in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1923, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of Parliament, be granted to His Majesty for the year ending March 31, 1923.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I have had the opportunity since this matter was last discussed of further considering the plight in which we find ourselves and of what ought to be done in the circumstances, and I am confirmed in my opinion previously expressed, that the practice in the past was the only practice which could have been adopted, and that the change that was foreshadowed by last year's opposition was not seriously proposed—it was merely advanced for the purpose of delaying, obstructing and embarrassing the government. Under those circumstances, I have no desire to follow such a course of action. I think, however, we ought to follow as nearly as possible the practice in the past, which was to vote simply one-sixth, and not one-fourth, as this resolution proposes. The only reason for taking an interim vote in advance of the consideration of the Estimates in detail is that of necessity. The Estimates ought to be considered as individual estimates without any doubt, and the usual conditions under which an interim supply vote is granted—I have no doubt my hon. friend the Minister of Finance will agree with me—are: First, that the Opposition are not in the slightest degree prejudiced in considering the Estimates or in objecting to any individual item; and, second—with which condition also I think the Minister of Finance will agree, that this interim supply cannot be made use of for the purpose of undertaking any new work which has not yet been passed upon by the House.

Now, as to the amount. The only excuse for a vote of this kind is necessity. The usual vote has been one-sixth. That will carry the Government down to the 15th of June, and between now and the 15th of June all these Estimates ought to have been properly and regularly considered in detail, and I have no doubt they will have been. Therefore, I am perfectly willing to consent so far as I am concerned and so far as this Opposition is concerned to the usual interim vote of one-sixth.

Mr. FIELDING: The mental processes by which my hon. friend has reached his conclusion do not disturb me very much. I am more interested in getting the vote through. I regret my hon. friend did not mention sooner that he preferred one-sixth, because at the first stage of the discussion I stated that, while it might be a convenience to have one-fourth voted, if he preferred one-sixth I would be happy to change the motion accordingly, but if we are to change the motion now, it will have to be postponed so that new calculations can be made. We will have to adjourn the committee and have the clerks make the new calculation.

As to the conditions laid down I quite agree with my hon. friend that no action of this kind prejudices the right of the Opposition or of any member of this House to the fullest and freest discussion of every item in the Estimates. As to the second point mentioned, that this interim supply cannot be made applicable to works not yet authorized, of course, at the most, it could only be applied to things expressed in the Estimates; anything not authorized and passed by the House of Commons cannot be undertaken. However, I do not anticipate any difficulty in that direction. The main purpose of the vote is to meet the requirements of the Civil Service. If on reflection my hon. friend would prefer to make it one-sixth, I have no objection, although it is taking two bites of a cherry—this House will be in session for several months, under the best conditions. But I have no objection to making it one-sixth. It will delay the proceedings a little while, that is all.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am very sorry this misunderstanding has occurred. I had intended to make myself clear on the previous occasion, that I would consent to one-sixth. So far as making the change in the figure is concerned, the calculation could be made in a few moments by the clerk. It is merely a matter of dividing the vote by six instead of by four. Or, the figure could be inserted afterwards, and the motion read simply one-sixth without stating the figure.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend and I will agree that we will make the motion one-sixth, and leave the clerks to work it out. I move now to amend the motion by making it one-sixth instead of one-fourth, and the clerks will fill in the precise amount at a later stage. That will also be necessary with regard to the bill which I shall have occasion to move in a few moments.

I do not know whether there has been any collusion between my hon. friend and the clerks at the table, but I find they have already the motion prepared for one-sixth, with the amount filled in accordingly. The figure will be $53,901,669.17.

Motion as amended agreed to.

Resolution reported, read a first and second time, and concurred in.

Excise collections are included in the amounts shown for 1921-22, as the Customs Service and Excise Service have been amalgamated since 1st April, 1921.

It is not possible to give the information as requested regarding excise collections prior to April 1, 1921, for the reason that the Inland Revenue records did not show amounts collected for smaller places but included them in the total collections for the division in which the county of Madawaska is situated.

Therefore, I would ask the hon. member to put on the Order Paper a Notice of Motion, with a view of ascertaining the sentiment of the House in regard to rendering public the names of pensioners. I am in the hands of the House. In the meantime, if the hon. gentleman is agreeable, I would ask that the question be dropped.

QUEBEC FISHERIES

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure) moved:

For a copy of the correspondence and all other documents, regarding the transfer of fisheries to the Province of Quebec.

[Sir Henry Drayton.]

He said: The question of jurisdiction in the matter of fisheries is not a new one, at least in this particular case. For many years past there has been a divided jurisdiction between the Dominion Government and the governments of several provinces. I am reminded, Mr. Speaker, that twenty-five years ago this very month, in 1897, on your invitation and the invitation of the Liberals of the county of Gaspé I became a candidate to represent that county in the legislature. I contested the election against the then premier of the province, the Hon. E. J. Flynn, who in the course of his campaign announced that the province of Quebec had secured a victory before the Privy Council in England by obtaining a decision which meant that from then on the provincial government would issue licenses to the fishermen in the tidal waters of Quebec. And so it happened that from 1897 until last year, without interruption, the government of Quebec controlled the issuing of licenses to the fishermen in the counties of Bonaventure, Gaspé, along the river St. Lawrence, and in the tidal waters generally of the province. In the month of November, 1920, following a reference to the Privy Council of the question of disputed jurisdiction between the Dominion and some of the provincial governments, and in the light of the decision rendered in the case of British Columbia, a new policy was adopted by the federal government then in office. Last session, wishing to know exactly what the policy of the Dominion government was, I placed on the Order Paper a question which was answered by Hon. Mr. Ballantyne, then Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I give the question and the answer:

QUEBEC SALMON NET LICENSES

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

1. Has any understanding been arrived at between the Government of Canada and that of the Province of Quebec regarding the granting of licenses for salmon nets in the tidal waters of said province consequent upon the recent judgment of the Privy Council?

2. Is the Government aware that the Province of Quebec has granted licenses for the present year?

3. What action if any does the Government intend to take in this matter in the public interest and that of the fishermen concerned?

4. Is it a fact that the Province of Quebec contends that it is the sole authority having power to grant licenses in such tidal waters because of its jurisdiction over the bed of rivers and bays and the shores generally of that Province?

5. If so, will the Government of Canada recognise the licenses granted this year by the Government of Quebec?

Hon. Mr. BALLANTYNE:

1, 2, 3, 4, 5. The decision of the Judical Committee of the Privy Council of November 30 last in the Quebec Fisheries Reference decided that the administration of the fisheries in the navigable waters if the province that 'are accessible by way of navigation from the sea comes within the purview of the Federal Government. The Government of the Province of Quebec has been informed that the Department of Marine and Fisheries will undertake the administration of the fisheries in such waters from May 1 proximo. Any licenses issued by the provincial authorities will not be accepted as conferring authority to fish. No one will be permitted to fish in the said waters except under license from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

The House will realize the position in which the fishermen found themselves. They had paid for and been granted licenses in the usual course, as they had done for the last twenty-five years, and they were suddenly informed by the Dominion authorities that thereafter those licenses were worthless and that they would have to secure permits from the Dominion fishery officer. Of course, the fishermen had to accept the situation, and the electors in my constituency, in yours, Mr. Speaker, and throughout the province, were called upon to pay additional sums of $20, $25, $30 and $40 before they were in a position to fish. This anomalous condition of affairs then presented itself: Men who had fished for twenty-five years on a provincial license were told that they could not fish unless they secured a license from the Dominion authorities, while other men who had the Dominion license found it worthless unless they could show a provincial permit as well. The man who had the provincial license could fish along the shore belonging to the province, but he had to have a Dominion license if he fished in the waters that came within the purview of the federal government. Naturally, the fishermen asked that some remedy should be found for this state of affairs; and about a month ago we learned that negotiations had been entered into between the Department of Marine, under the control of my hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe), and the government of Quebec, as a result of which a satisfactory solution had been arrived at. The fisheries have been transferred to the province of Quebec, so far as such a transference lies within the power of the Dominion government, who retain the control that is required by the British North America Act. I have been receiving letters from my constituents, who fish the magnificent Gaspé salmon, which is known the world over and is the glory and joy of men from all parts of America who love fishing, and they ask that the license fees paid to the Dominion government last year be refunded. I have submitted the matter to the minister, who informs me that he has it under consideration, although his first answer was not favourable. As an instance of what actually happened, I should like to read to the House a brief statement given to me by a gentleman who was at Port Daniel, one of the fishing villages in my constituency, last year, at the time of the conference between the Dominion and the provincial governments. This statement is as follows:

Statement of Louis Simpson re Complaints of Certain Salmon Fishermen of Port Daniel and District.

Last summer these salmon fishermen were called upon to pay for two several licenses to permit them to follow their occupation of fishing salmon. One license fee was paid to the Dominion Government, whilst another license fee had to be paid to the Government of the province of Quebec.

The official responsible to the Dominion Government collected the several fees and in return granted licenses, but after so doing did not notify the fishermen that it was the intention of the Dominion Government to alter the arrangement, which for years past had been permitted by the representatives of the Government of the province of Quebec (which Government until last year had administered the fisheries). One of these arrangements, was that, notwithstanding, the printed regulations, the fishermen fishing in the harbours open to the winds blowing from the gulf (such as Port Daniel and the other ports to the northeast) should not be required to tie up their nets on Sunday. It was recognized by the government official that nets, so tied, were liable, should a storm arise, blowing from the east to be destroyed. Moreover, at Port Daniel where the rivers emptying into the Baracbois are allowed to be poached, there was nothing to be gained by a strict adherence to these regulations.

The officials of the Dominion Government, without giving the fishermen any notice of their intention of withdrawing such permission or of their intention to make a custom, legalized by many years permission, which certainly can be claimed to have established, until withdrawn by notice, a legal right, raided the fishermen's nets, seized and sold the salmon found therein, and summoned the licensees to the county town of New Carlisle to appear before a judge.

The fishermen, against my advice, were induced to plead guilty of a technical infraction of the regulations and were each fined by the judge, two dollars and costs.

The loss to the fishermen was as follows:—

The value of the nets taken.

One day's work at the most important time of the year.

Expenses to New Carlisle and back.

Fine and expenses.

The fines, loss of time and expense will have exceeded ten dollars per man, while some of the salmon taken was allowed to go back and the balance was eventually sold at less than the market price for fresh caught fish.

The actual sum realized by the department from the sale of the fish is not known to me, but the value of the fish taken will have exceeded $200, and the total loss to the fishermen over $500.

On my return home I called on the Assistant Deputy Minister of Fisheries, and explained the matter to him, suggesting that the money received by the department from the sale of the fish be returned to the fishermen, but my suggestion did not find favour with Mr. Found, who ignored altogether my view of the case as to the equity if not the illegality of the seizure under the conditions herein stated, which view I still hold to be correct.

Louis Simpson.

I submit, therefore, that under the circumstances it was imperative, in the interests of the fisheries and in justice to the fishermen themselves, that some arrangement should have been arrived at between the two governments that would allow the fishermen to pursue their calling as heretofore without the irritation of having to submit to two fishery officers, one in conflict with the other. When I originally moved this motion I included therein a request for a copy of the Order in Council transferring the fisheries; but the present leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), having requested that the Order in Council be laid on the Table, and this being done, I amended my motion in consequence. The document having been laid on the Table of the House, I am now in a position to read a portion of it so that the House will be able to ascertain exactly the nature of the arrangement, and to consider the justice of the arrangement arrived at:

The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 13th February, 1922, from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, submitting as follows, with reference to a minute of the Council of April 13th, 1921 (P.C. 1246) authorizing the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to undertake the administration of the fisheries in the tidal and navigable water of Quebec that are accessible by way of navigation from the sea:

1. That following such authority, the Department of Marine and Fisheries undertook the administration of the fisheries in all the aforementioned waters, and allowed no one to fish therein, in a fishery in which licenses were required, without first procuring a license from it:

2. That as under the Privy Council decision of November 30th, 1920, the province has the exclusive power to grant the right to fix engines to the soil, where the soil is vested in the crown in the right of the province, so far as such engines and the affixing of them do not interfere with the right of the public to fish or prevent the regulation of the right of fishing by private persons without the aid of such engines, and as most of the licensed fishing in the province of Quebec is done by means of engines that are attached to the soil, the provincial authorities during the past season refused to allow anyone to fish with appliances attached to the soil where it claimed the ownership of the soil without first procuring a license from them authorizing the use of such fishing engines.

[Mr. Marcil.]

Thus the fishermen, through no fault of their own, were placed in the position of having to procure two licenses and pay two sets of fees before they could engage in fishing. Also under such conditions should it happen at any place that a fisherman who had procured a license from the federal authorities were refused one from the provincial authorities, or vice versa, he would be unable to fish and no fishing could go on at that place.

This dual jurisdiction also required dual expenditure in the administration of the fisheries, as each authority found it necessary to maintain a staff of fishery officers.

The Minister states that with a view to putting an end to such an undesirable state of affairs, he arranged for a conference with the representatives of the provincial Government, and to that end the Minister of Colonization, Mines and Fisheries and the Deputy Attorney General for the province of Quebec came to Ottawa, and on the 13th February instant the minister discussed the whole matter with them. At this conference it developed that the provincial authorities, in view of their interest in the river fisheries, and of the necessity for their maintaining a staff of officers for the proper administration and protection of these fisheries, are prepared to undertake, under proper regulation by the Federal Government as to conditions under which such fishing may be carried on, the responsibility for the administration of all the coastal fisheries of the province as well, with the exception of those about the Magdalen Islands.

The provincial authorities are also prepared to undertake the operation of the two fish hatcheries that the Department of Marine and Fisheries is maintaining in Quebec for the development of the salmon fisheries there.

In view of the important saving that would be involved to the federal exchequer, and of the eminent desirability of removing as far as possible all dual control in the fisheries, the minister recommends that the entire administration of the fisheries, under the Fisheries Act and regulations passed thereunder, be handed over to the provincial authorities, and that the staff of federal fishery officers, as well as the fisheries patrol steamer "Loos" be withdrawn, such to become effective on April 1st, 1922.

The minister further recommends that the Gaspé and Tadoussac fish hatcheries of the Department of Marine and Fisheries, together with all their appurtenances, be transferred to the provincial government of Quebec on the 1st July, 1922, when the present season's operations will have been completed.

The order further provides that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries shall continue the administration of the various acts which have been passed by this Parliament relating to the fisheries and shall retain such powers as cannot be transferred to the province.

My object in directing attention to this matter is to congratulate the Government on the action they have taken in obviating a difficulty which would otherwise have been a very awkward one for our people. The fisheries of Quebec have not the advantages of those of other maritime provinces. Our seasons are much shorter: on Baie des Chaleurs the season extends for three, four or five months: on the St. Lawrence, especially on the north shore, it barely extends over three months. The province of Quebec, therefore, should receive particular attention from the Dominion government so far as the fisheries are concerned. I am glad to know that we have as one of the ministers from that province a gentleman who is familiar with the conditions there. The Government should continue to give all the encouragement they can to the fishermen of the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the Baie des Chaleurs, that deserving class of our people who have to work under all conditions and in all kinds of weather. In giving that encouragement I trust they will not overlook the claim I have now made: that if at all possible the double license paid last year by these fishermen be refunded.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): In British Columbia dual licenses are exacted; that is to say, the fishermen have to take licenses from the Dominion as well as from the province. Would the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) be good enough to explain why this arrangement should be made with respect to the province of Quebec if a similar arrangement is not made with respect to British Columbia?

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): I have exhausted my right to speak, but the reason is this: for the last twenty-five years Quebec has administered its fisheries, and it is advisable in the interests of those fisheries that that system should continue.

Mr. McQUARRIE: As I understand it, British Columbia exercises control over the fisheries of that province, and has done so for years. I would suggest that the hon. minister give some consideration also to conditions respecting the fisheries in British Columbia.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the House will be indebted to the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil)—at least, I am—for having brought this subject to its attention, especially in view of the misapprehensions that seem to exist in some quarters as to what has taken place in regard to these fisheries. There has been no transfer, much less an abandonment, of any right belonging to the federal government. An irritating question has been settled, in the interests, I believe, of all concerned.

Under the British North America Act, "sea coast and inland fisheries" are, by inclusion in article 12, placed under the legislative power of the federal government. The interpretation of this article has been the subject of many litigations, and I think a short history of the case will help to bring about an understanding of the situation.

There was no difficulty in connection with the fisheries until about 1882, when the federal government undertook to lease salmon angling privileges in non-tidal rivers in New Brunswick. In this connection the case of Robertson vs the Queen was submitted to the Exchequer Court of Canada and subsequently, on appeal, to the Supreme Court of Canada. The federal government had leased salmon angling privileges on the Miramichi river. The adjacent property was owned by a private company which permitted private citizens to fish in that river. Mr. Robertson took proceedings against these fishermen, and the latter were successful. Robertson then instituted an action for damages against the Dominion government in the Exchequer Court and later before the Supreme Court of Canada. The decision was that under the British North America Act the fisheries did not pass to the federal government, but remained the property of the riparian owners. As in all the provinces the Crown, in the right of the province was owner of the properties adjacent to the rivers. From the time of that decision until to-day the provinces have themselves administered those fisheries and leased the salmon and other angling privileges.

Following this decision the provinces claimed that they had jurisdiction in tidal waters as well, and it was finally decided to submit the case for a decision to the Supreme Court of Canada and to the Privy Council. This submission to the Supreme Court was in 1894, and the decision of the Privy Council was given in 1898. It was, in substance, that the exclusive power of regulating the fisheries, no matter where they were situated, was vested in the federal government under the British North America Act, but that any rights which the provinces had prior to Confederation were still kept by them. But the decision did not define what were those property rights of the provinces.

In Ontario all the fisheries are non-tidal, so the administration of all the fisheries in Ontario passed to the Ontario government, and has always been in its hands. Of course, this does not take away the power of regulation by the federal government, which applies to all the fisheries, inland as well as sea coast. Immediately after that decision, the sea-washed provinces claimed the administration of all their fisheries. They took the ground that prior to Confederation they owned the fisheries not only in the non-tidal rivers but in the territorial waters as well. They did not go to the courts immediately, but after many conferences between the Dominion government and the provincial governments they came to an agreement under which the federal government continued to administer the fisheries pending a decision on the question of rights. This applied to all the provinces except Quebec. Quebec insisted on its interpretation of the clause of the decision, but finally there was also a modus vivendi between this government and the province of Quebec, under which Quebec kept the control and the administration of all the fisheries on the north shore of the river St. Lawrence and the gulf of St. Lawrence, on the north shore as far as a place called Pointe des Monts, and also of the rivers and their estuaries from Pointe des Monts as far as the boundary Blanc Sablon. It was found impossible to reach an amicable settlement as to the question of rights, and then it was decided to submit the difficulty to the courts again. This was done in 1912 or 1913. The province of British Columbia was the party to the litigation against the Dominion government, but all the other interested provinces joined in the case and were represented before the courts. The decision was given in 1913, and was, in brief, that since Magna Charta there has been under British law a public right of fishing in all tidal waters, and that the administration of this right passed to the federal government under the British North America Act. This decision settled the matter everywhere except in Quebec. Immediately after the decision was rendered, the government of Canada published in the official Canada Gazette a notice stating that on 1st January, 1915, it would assume control of the fisheries in the tidal waters of the province of Quebec hitherto administered by the federal government, and at the same time on the 25th of January the government of the province of Quebec published in the Quebec Official Gazette a notice that the decision of the British Columbia reference did not apply to the province of Quebec, and that therefore any person wishing to fish in the river and gulf of St. Lawrence and any tidal waters should make application to the Department of Colonization, Mines and Fisheries for the necessary permit.

[Mr. Lapointe.]

The province of Quebec contended that as the decision of the Privy Council was based on Magna Charta, and as Magna Charta did not apply to Quebec the decision did not affect that province;—it is well to remember that in civil matters the French law has always been kept in Quebec, though the country passed to the British Crown. It was consequently necessary to have a further reference to the court as far as that province was concerned. In the meantime the same modus vivendi applied and Quebec continued to administer her fisheries within the geographical limits I have described. The reference was arranged for in 1914, and the decision of the Privy Council was given in 1920. This decision was, in substance, that while Magna Charta did not apply to Quebec, there is a public right of fishing in all the waters that are navigable from the sea, but that there is no public right in the soil under the water, and that where the province or any private person owned the soil it could not be used for fishing without the consent of the owner. I think it would be well for me to read a sentence of the decision of the Privy Council:

> To the first question, neither the Government of Quebec, nor any member of the executive council, has the power to grant the exclusive right of fishing in the tidal waters so far as navigable of the rivers, streams, gulfs, bays, straits or arms of the sea of the province and of the high seas washing its coasts. In so far as the soil is vested in the Crown in right of the province, the Government of the province has exclusive power to grant the right to affix engines to the solum, so far as such engines and the affixing of them do not interfere with the right of the public to fish, or prevent the regulation of the right of fishing by private persons without the aid of such engines.

Now, it happens not only in the St. Lawrence river but on the coast of the gulf of St. Lawrence, on both the north and the south shores, that owing to conditions along the coast all the fisheries there are carried on by fishing engines attached to the soil. The water is very shallow along the whole coast, and in very many cases these fishing nets are out of the water at low tide; so that there really is a conflict of jurisdiction in the administration of these fisheries along the whole coast. The decision, of course—and this has never been denied—gives the exclusive power of regulating the fisheries to the federal government. In the province of Quebec the ownership of the soil is still vested in those who own that soil, either private citizens or the Crown—mostly the Crown in right of the province. So whatever rights of fishing the public may have in those waters cannot be exercised there, on account of the conditions along the coast, without attaching engines to the soil, and this cannot be done without the consent of the owner, in other words, the province of Quebec. Last year, which was the first year after the decision of the Privy Council no settlement could be made; and the federal government undertook to enforce its rights in all the waters of the province that are navigable from the sea. To administer those fisheries and to issue licenses, which they had never done before, the federal government had to employ overseers. We appointed nine overseers, with an inspector over them, and we had to use a suitable boat for the purpose of supervising those fisheries. The cost of this service was about $85,000, and the total revenue from this portion of the district this year has been $12,573.39, and as the fees for salmon fishing licenses have been reduced the revenue from that source will be even lower in future.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Has the federal government applied to the British Parliament to have this dispute straightened out by legislative action? Would that cure the difficulty?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not think it is at all necessary.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): It is a very expensive business.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It has been very expensive so far, but that will not be the case in future now that an agreement has been reached. I may point out that under the agreement the provincial government will continue what they were doing last year and furthermore will issue licenses. Great friction and conflict resulted from the divided authority last year as my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) has stated. The fishermen in his district, and in other districts of the province, had to pay a double license at high cost. For instance, on one side of the Baie des Chaleurs, in my hon. friend's constituency, the fishermen had to pay twice the amount which was exacted from the fishermen of New Brunswick, on the other side, for the same right and the same privilege. There has also been litigation, as between the fishermen and the provincial government and the federal government, and it was a very unfortunate state of affairs. After all, under the present arrangement we have practically only repealed the Order in Council which had been passed last year after the decision of the Privy Council, which Order in Council provided that licenses should be required from all the fishermen along the coasts of the gulf of St. Lawrence and the river St. Lawrence. We have repealed that Order in Council, but we are maintaining our right of regulating the fisheries there, and we will always have the right to intervene if these regulations are not observed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who will report to the Government as to whether the regulations are observed or not?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I would say the fishermen themselves, and those who are interested in the fisheries there; there are many interested parties.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You will have no officer to report to you whether your regulations are lived up to or not?

Mr. LAPOINTE: There is no obstacle to the appointment of some man to see that the regulations are fully observed.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Is it the intention of the federal government to transfer to the province of British Columbia the administration of the fisheries on the Pacific coast? Has the government of that province requested such transfer, and has the federal government reached an adverse decision in the matter? If so, on what ground was that decision based?

Mr. LAPOINTE: The government of British Columbia has not requested any such transfer. Furthermore, I may tell my hon. friend that the legal and other conditions are not at all the same in British Columbia as in the province of Quebec. I do not know whether what is suggested could be done. My hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) shakes his head, but if the government of British Columbia applies for a transfer of the administration of fisheries the application will certainly be considered. However, I do not think such a request will be made, because the administration of those fisheries costs this Government about $400,000 a year, and I think the provincial government would hesitate very much before assuming such a large expenditure as that.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Has not the minister seen the despatches in the press to the effect that the government of British Columbia was making such a request?

Mr. LAPOINTE: No such request has reached me, but my hon. friend may rest assured it will be fully considered if, and when, it does come.

Mr. McQUARRIE: Can the minister state the amount of revenue received from the Pacific coast fisheries?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I cannot give my hon. friend that information offhand, but I have been informed by the officials of the department that the administration of these fisheries involves a cost to the Dominion treasury of about $400,000 a year.

With respect to the Quebec fisheries, as I have said there has been no giving away of any right. We have kept the power of regulation, we have not given anything which we should not have given; and the whole matter resolves itself into the settlement of a cause of conflict and difficulty. In view of the Confederation pact, which was the result of any agreement between various provinces by virtue of which they relinquished some of their rights and retained others for the purposes of administration and control, it is very important that any cause of conflict should be avoided. Any encroachment on the rights of the provinces—even the mere appearance of an encroachment—is dangerous to the peace and good order of this country. I think, therefore, it is a good thing that this question, which was certainly an irritating one, should have been settled in a way that will result in economy on the part of this Government at this time. I repeat that no right has been given away by the federal government, and this settlement should enlist the support of all good-minded people in the Dominion.

Mr. LADNER: Does the federal government draw any revenue from the fisheries as a result of this arrangement with the province of Quebec?

Mr. LAPOINTE: I do not see how any revenue could be enjoyed in view of the fact that we expended $88,000 last year and the receipts were only $12,000. So the Quebec fisheries will be a charge on the provincial government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If my hon. friend has no officers to see that his regulations are carried out this year, he will not have any revenue—he will only have the advantage of the expenditure.

Mr. LAPOINTE: The difference between the revenue and the expenditure was $76,000. I can give a pledge to my hon. friend that no officers will be paid any such sum as that to carry out the work of supervision.

Mr. MEIGHEN: One officer would not be able to accomplish anything. This is merely a motion for the production of papers, and it is not wholly unobjectionable in itself, but is a motion which, in my judgment, should pass. Of course it is a motion on which hon. gentlemen have a right to speak, and the mover has taken advantage of it to congratulate the Government on its course, and the Government has also taken advantage of it to congratulate itself. I have listened with interest to what has fallen from the lips of both these hon. gentlemen, and I may say that their comment on the conduct of the Government has been helpful. The minister's remarks have been of value as interpreting the judgments delivered since 1882 by the Privy Council. I may go further and say that they are illuminating on every question except those questions which may possibly come in controversy and be of moment in connection with the conduct of administration, that is to say, on the question of the right of the Government of Canada to abdicate to any other government a function placed in it by the constitution, the right of the government of Canada by Order in Council to amend the British North America Act. At the present time I do not wish to enter into a controversy for the reason that on the motion that is before the House, for the production of papers, the judgment of the House could not possibly be obtained. I merely make this comment for the purpose of preserving the right, although I do not think it needs any preserving, of bringing the subject up on a later occasion should I be so advised.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I should like to say in connection with this discussion, that I do not blame the lawyers at all, but the question at issue to my mind is in regard to the powers under the British North America Act, and the distribution of rights as between the provinces and the federal government. I think all these troubles could be remedied by legislation rather than by appeals to the court. But we do not happen to have in this country the right to amend our own constitution. They have that right in Australia, and now that we are a nation, and so described by everybody in this country—and especially so described in his reference to the free state of Ireland the other day, by the Prime Minister of Great Britain—I think it is pretty nearly time that the Parliament of Canada had the power to straighten out this question of jurisdiction as between the provinces and the Dominion. If we had that power these questions would not be coming up. In other words these questions could be settled by conference between the provinces and the federal power, and the settlement embodied in a short act of parliament. Matters are coming up year after year, and we have conferences and litigation between the Dominion and the provinces, and it is an expensive business. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent on it, when it could all be straightened out by legislation, rather than by litigation. Again I say, after hearing discussions for many years, and seeing the progress that has been made in curing these things by legislation, rather than by negotiation or by incessant appeals to the court, that a short way to cure the trouble would easily be reached, if the Parliament of Canada, perhaps in conjuction with the provinces, had the right to amend the constitution, so that it could be adapted to the requirements of the day.

Mr. McQUARRIE: As to the question which I asked a few moments ago, I do not wish it to be understood that I was urging upon the hon. minister that he should transfer the fisheries of British Columbia to that province, but having seen in the press despatches a statement to the effect that British Columbia had asked that to be done, I wish to clear up the matter. I think, as a matter of fact, there might be more reason for turning over to the province of British Columbia the fisheries than there would be in respect to the fisheries of any other province, because we are very far away from the seat of administration, and it takes us a long time to get a decision on matters which come up from time to time. The minister may remember that it was urged upon the previous government that a commission should be appointed or that an advisory board should be appointed in British Columbia to take charge of the administration of fisheries there, or, if that were going too far, to advise the minister from time to time as to the various questions which come up in respect of the fisheries on the Pacific coast. The minister will remember that that request was made by all those interested in the British Columbia fisheries, by the canners, by the fishermen, merchants, the boards of trade, and so on, by the returned soldiers, and by all others interested in fisheries in British Columbia. That request was refused by the previous minister, and I would like to take this opportunity of pressing that same request upon the present minister. I think something of that kind should be done, because Ottawa is too far away to look after all the matters which pertain to the fisheries away out on the Pacific coast, and we should have some board out there to assist the minister and the department.

Motion (Mr. Marcil, Bonaventure) agreed to.

QUEBEC, ORIENTAL AND ATLANTIC, AND QUEBEC AND WESTERN RAILWAYS

Hon. CHARLES MARCIL (Bonaventure) moved:

For a copy of the correspondence with the proprietors of the Quebec Oriental and Atlantic and the Quebec and Western railways or other persons on their behalf, concerning the operation or merging of these two roads with the Canadian National system.

He said: the older members of this House will remember that this question was discussed by yourself, Mr. Speaker, and by myself as representing respectively the counties of Gaspé and Bonaventure. To enlighten the new members of the House, I would like to preface my remarks by a reference to the proceedings in Parliament of the 9th April, 1884, nearly 40 years ago. Parliament voted $300,000 to build a branch of the Intercolonial from the lower end of the Matapedia valley along down to Gaspé bay. That vote was brought about by the request of Sir Charles Tupper, then Minister of Railways, and supported by Sir Hector Langevin, representing the province of Quebec. Unfortunately, the construction of the Intercolonial had been completed but a few years before, and, like most railways in those days, it cost much more than it should. A company organized under the name Baie des Chaleurs company induced the government in the following year to reverse its policy, and instead of building this railway as a branch of the Intercolonial to serve Bonaventure and Gaspé, handed over the subsidy and the undertaking to a private company called the Baie des Chaleurs Company. They secured the usual double subsidies from Quebec and Ottawa, and land subsidies in addition, the subsidies amounting to probably a million and a half dollars. They went through a chequered career for ten or fifteen years, and finally the road was brought down to Paspebiac, a hundred miles from the starting point.

Things were in that stage when you, Mr. Speaker, were elected to the House, and in the same stage when I was elected to the House nearly twenty-three years ago. When we asked the then government to take over these railways as branches of the Intercolonial railway, because they were intended, at their very inception, to be branches or feeders of the Intercolonial, the government of the day told us that it would be advisable first to complete the undertaking and then the whole system would be merged into the Intercolonial railway. You, Sir, succeeded in encouraging and inducing a company of British capitalists to extend the railway from Paspebiac down to Gaspé Basin, where it has remained for almost the last ten years, and where it connects with deep waters in one of the finest inland ports in North America. This railway is owned by a British company who are holding the property merely for the purpose of getting rid of it. They are operating a train twice a day. They have very little rolling stock; they have very poor cars, and their locomotives are antiquated. The local rates paid on this railway by the people are deemed to be exorbitant and matters are at a standstill. I am treating now not of the case of the company; I know that at the present time the railway problem in Canada is the greatest of all our problems. Our railways are the backbone of the country; and remembering what was said last year by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), and what no doubt the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) will say, I realize that this is a very poor time to advocate the taking over of any railway. I am not here to advocate the taking over or purchasing of these railways; I am here to advocate the cause of the inhabitants of the north shore of the Baie des Chaleurs.

We have in these two counties of Bonaventure and Gaspé a miniature of Canada. We have the old Acadian settlement, the original settlers from Grand Pré, who came through the wilderness of New Brunswick and started the Acadian settlement. We have the United Empire Loyalists who, in 1812, were settled in our townships by the government of the day, and the Jersey fishers, who came over from the Island of Jersey and who exploited the fisheries of the Baie des Chaleurs, which, for 150 years, has been one of the most prolific fisheries in Canada. We have in Paspebiac the mother-house of the establishment now converted into a maritime provincial concern, of Robins, Jones & Whitman, which has been doing a steady business in the same place for 170 years and which has twenty-two establishments scattered along the coast of the Baie des Chaleurs and the gulf of St. Lawrence. We have, in connection with this mixed population, a most admirable soil, productive to a marked degree. We have resources unknown at the present time. The Gaspé peninsula, as you yourself, Mr. Speaker, said in your speech last year and as you have said on previous occasions, measures, roughly, 11,000 square miles, the size of two ordinary kingdoms of Europe. We have there on the south shore of the gulf and along the Baie des Chaleurs, which enters into this case, a population of only about 60,000 or 70,000 people and only a strip about three or four miles wide along the shore is inhabited at the present time; the remainder is a terra incognita. We have there pulpwood to supply the continent of America for I do not know how long. The builder of this Parliament building, Mr. Lyall, organized a company in Montreal some three or four years ago, and started looking for lead and zinc in Lemieux township, partly in Gaspé and adjoining Bonaventure. He has taken out of the earth there 400,000 tons of mineral ore for the reduction of zinc and lead, and according to the reports which he has, the probabilities are that lead ore can be found there in hundreds of thousands of tons. Our fisheries as I have said have been exploited for 175 years. Our forests are magnificent; the pulpwood is unlimited. The fisheries are splendid; the soil is fertile, and we have a hardy, law-abiding population. These two counties sent 1,000 men to the front during the Great War, and memorials to commemorate their deeds are now being erected along the coast of the two counties. The inhabitants live in happiness together. These people inhabit the oldest established part of the province of Quebec, because Jacques Cartier entered the bay of Gaspé and planted the cross there before he reached Quebec. These people, have, through their representatives, been voting steadily for the construction of railways throughout Canada so as to open up the great Canadian West and every other part of this country. You, Mr. Speaker, and I, myself, have, in their names, voted railway subsidies by the million, by the hundreds of millions. We have assisted in the establishment of new provinces, in opening up new harbours, in developing everything that Canada now possesses; but these old counties in Quebec seem to have been overlooked. The families of these people are very large, as is usual in Quebec; they have eight, ten, fifteen children. The young men have to leave the country; the young girls have to do likewise, and you will find them today, after the instruction which they have received at the different colleges in Quebec, scattered throughout the continent of America. Thus, these are all good, hardy settlers who have been lost to Canada. They are the descendants of the pioneers; as woodsmen they are unsurpassed in Canada. Put them in the hardest and roughest part of this country and they will make good. Some of them are engaged now in developing a part of the Abitibi country; they are developing that part of the country between Moncton and Lévis over the great Transcontinental railway. These people made good fighters during the war, and one of the Victoria Crosses granted to the province of Quebec was granted to a boy who came from the Matapedia valley.

I am pleading in their names; I am asking this new Government; the new Minister of Railways to consider the position of these two counties and to see if he cannot bring about a state of affairs by which they will be given an opportunity of earning their living properly, of developing the country, and of bringing business to the Canadian National railways, because this is the only way in which the deficit of the country can be met. Two years ago, a million and a half dollars worth of business was handed over to the Canadian National by these two small railways, and if they had had the ordinary facilities, this could have been doubled. They have very little rolling stock; their locomotives are antiquated; their passenger service is not a credit to the country. The man in charge of the organization is putting up a big fight to carry on, but the people are not getting the service they should have. Running a railway skirting the shore of the Baie des Chaleurs is a difficult undertaking in the winter time, and in some seasons the railway service has been interrupted. This year fortunately, the winter has been exceptionally mild in Quebec, and trains have been running with the loss of scarcely a day. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) received a number of petitions which I handed him in your name, Sir, from the county of Gaspé, and I myself handed him petitions from my people of Bonaventure county asking that something should be done. If it is impossible at the present time to take over these railways in any shape or form, I should like that they be considered as forming part of the Canadian National railway system for purposes of transportation.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Why could they not form part of the Intercolonial?

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): Perhaps some arrangement could be made by which they could be treated as forming part of the Intercolonial. At present goods are shipped by the branch lines as far as Matapedia where these railways connect with the Intercolonial. There another freight charge is made, and I am informed that shippers suffer a handicap of $4 per thousand feet on lumber shipped through these counties.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Has the Intercolonial railway a lower freight rate than any other road in Canada?

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): I will leave that question to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy). I do know that goods shipped from any of the parishes in these counties are waybilled to Matapedia and then put on the Intercolonial railway. At Bonaventure there is a magnificent timber limit known as the Robitaille limit. It is a magnificent bit of forest, and was once owned by Mr. Robitaille, who was at one time Receiver-General of Canada, having sat for many years in the House of Commons. Some years ago this limit was acquired by Senator Edwards and is now owned by Mr. Angus McLean, of Bathurst, New Brunswick. Mr. McLean, and others operated a mill in this district, and they declare that it is impossible for them to ship lumber profitably over these railways. They have therefore closed down the mill, throwing hundreds of men out of employment. The logs are cut in this area and rafted across the Baie des Chaleurs to Bathurst, a distance of twenty-five miles, where they are sawn and manufactured. The same thing occurs in the Nouvelle river district, where the timber is cut and rafted across the Baie to Dalhousie to be manufactured at Dalhousie. This is a great injustice, and it recalls the fact that Sir Oliver Mowat at one time started a campaign in Ontario to stop the export of timber from Ontario to Michigan, and the present Minister of Justice stopped the shipping of pulp-wood cut in Crown Lands to the United States. It is unfair to these people that they should be deprived of their resources and their only means of livilihood, because the Government of Canada has not seen fit to give them proper railway communication. I have given these two instances to show what might be done, and I hope that the present Minister of Railways will take the matter seriously into consideration. The first important step is to see that these people are put on the same footing as if they were on the south shore of the Baie des Chaleurs and on the main line of the Intercolonial railway.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Is it a fact that the Intercolonial railway has a lower freight rate than other railways?

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): I am unable to answer that question. Now, apart from the traffic arrangements, I would remind the House that last year the advertising department of the railways made a great feature of summering in the Baie des Chaleurs district. Those hon. members who have not visited that country in summer time have not seen one of the most enchanting places of Canada. The scene from Campbellton to Gaspé is unparalleled for beauty. Every year thousands of tourists go down the Baie des Chaleurs. Once they reach Matapedia they have to take other cars in order to get to their various destinations. If a Pullman car left Montreal three times a week for Gaspé I feel sure it would be full during the months of June and July. At present there is a Pullman running to Campbellton, but it is practically worthless, because passengers leave it at Matapedia and take the local railway going down the Baie, and the Pullman runs empty to Campbellton. The passenger service undoubtedly needs improvement. I have it on good authority that the Canadian National system could easily put on, at a nominal cost, a Pullman car for the service of these people; and also locomotives and cars to assist in local transportation.

I have so far spoken principally in regard to the part of the railway that extends through my country, but as Mr. Speaker is unable to take part in this debate we unfortunately cannot have his views on the subject so far as his own constituency is concerned. A couple of days ago I received a visit from Mr. Dubuc, who is well known in Quebec, and is a considerable promoter of the pulp industry. He gave me certain facts and figures. The pulp mills with which he is concerned at Chandler have been closed for the last six or seven months, but they were opened up again last week, and they give employment at present to about 300 hands. This gentleman tells me that his idea is to use the port of Gaspé where the Dominion government at considerable cost, provided excellent accommodation. We have also a splendid railway to New Carlisle; and if this part of the road on the Atlantic, Quebec and Western railway were provided with the necessary service, it would expedite the whole business through the port of Gaspé, and utilize the wharf, which is now practically idle. With adequate facilities he could handle 40,000 tons of pulp. 6,000 tons of sulphur, and 6,000 tons of coal per year, and he suggests that the Minister of Railways might easily overcome the deficit, so far as that portion of these railways is concerned, and at the same time develop business in that district, by providing at a nominal cost 50 dumping, coal, platform and box cars. This would secure some return for the money that has been invested in these railways, and it would give the people the service they should have.

I do not intend to go further into this question, but I think I have put the matter in a nutshell, as the Speaker of this House did last year when he spoke on the same subject. The Chairman of the Railway Commission reports, as a result of the investigation held at New Carlisle, that there is no branch connecting with the Intercolonial anywhere that could compare with these two branch railways from the standpoint of the importance of their traffic. I direct the attention of the minister to the fact that by chapter 16 of the Statutes of 1915 it was enacted by this Parliament that any branch lines not exceeding 200 miles in length could be either purchased or leased without agreement to purchase, and brought under the Government railway system. The following roads have been taken over under that legislation:

New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island railway	36.05
International Railway of New Brunswick	111.3
St. Martins railway	28.73
Salisbury and Albert	44.77
York and Carleton railway	5.46
Moncton and Buctouche railway	29.93
Elgin and Havelock railway	26.11
Lotbiniere and Megantic railway	29.59
Cape Breton railway	30.64
Caraquet and Gulf Shore railway	80.01

I would ask the minister as a favour, before he reaches a conclusion in this matter and admits the reasonableness of my claim, to compare the value of the business carried on by the railways mentioned in this list with that of the two roads to which I have referred. I suggest also that he compare the total earnings, tonnage carried, and business generally of the two Gaspé railways with others in the province of Quebec, such as the Roberval and Saguenay, the Temiscouata, and the Quebec, Montreal and Southern. He will realize at once that the two Gaspé railways are among the best feeders that the Intercolonial have.

The people have waited patiently for many years for the taking of some action in this matter. They were told in the old days that these railways would form an important part of the Intercolonial. Mr. Robitaille, who represented the county in the early days, advocated the construction of this railway. I may say in passing that the grain grown by him on his farm at New Carlisle, Bonaventure county, took the gold medal for Canadian wheat at the Paris Universal Exposition of 1867. The possibilities therefore of the soil of that district, are immense. We have a hardworking population; we have men of business calibre; we have large resources of sea and land, forest and mines. I leave the matter in the hands of the Minister of Railways, and sincerely hope that he will see his way clear to put these roads on a proper footing, thus increasing the business of the Government railways and assisting in the development of that section of the country.

Hon. W. C. KENNEDY (Essex, Minister of Railways and Canals): Mr. Speaker, the notice of motion of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) is for a copy of the correspondence with the proprietors of the Quebec Oriental and Atlantic and the Quebec and Western railways or other persons on their behalf. I find that two returns have already been brought down with regard to this matter, the first on May 16, 1913, and the second on May 27, 1919. Since the last-mentioned date there has been considerable correspondence with the owner of the lines referred to, Mr. Read, of London, with a view to purchase, but the government of the day did not see fit to conclude an agreement with him. As I understand it, these roads are not to-day paying carrying charges, and if they are included in the national system the rates applying to their tariff will be the through rates rather than the local rates, and their deficits will be increased.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Is Mr. Read getting any subsidies on these roads?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I do not know, though I understand from what was said by the hon. member for Bonaventure that he received two subsidies, one from the Dominion and one from the provincial government. However, that is not the point. The hon. member for Bonaventure has stated the needs of the people living along the line of the roads mentioned, and it is the duty of this Parliament to assist them in every possible way. The hon. member contends that considerable development in traffic, both as to freight and passengers may be anticipated. The Dominion government have had this matter before them in the past. There is on file in the department a report of the Chief Railway Commissioner with regard to it, and a very favourable report it is. Representations have also been made by residents of the district, and I assure the hon. member for Bonaventure that when the time is opportune we will give the matter every consideration. I need hardly tell him, of course, that Bonaventure is not the only part of the country which is demanding increased railway facilities.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman says that he will "give the matter every consideration." May I ask him what he means? I did not understand the hon. member for Bonaventure to ask for the absorption of these lines by the national railways.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I understood him to say that one of three courses might be adopted: absorption by the national railways, loan of equipment, or lease. When I said that the matter would be given consideration, I meant that we would go into it very carefully and if it were found possible to relieve the disabilities which are stated to exist there, we would be glad to do what we could. In the meantime, the Government will have much pleasure in producing the papers required by my hon. friend.

Motion agreed to.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—PROPOSED ELECTRIFICATION

Mr. DESLAURIERS (Sainte-Marie.) (Translation): Moved:

That in the opinion of this House, it is advisable that the Government substitute electric power to that of coal over its railways, in such centres where this natural supply abounds.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention in this present discussion to point out to this House all the localities in the Dominion where electric power might possibly replace steam for traction purposes, the subject would be too vast; I shall content myself with showing the possibility of its profitable use in my province, where this natural resource has been distributed profusely by Providence. The idea of utilizing electric power for the railways is not a new one. It is a daily topic in almost every European country; and in many of which, trials have proved sufficiently satisfactory so as to permit me now to state, that nowhere has it been deemed advisable to return to the old steam power method, especially when the direct current system has been utilized: as for instance in Switzerland, on the St. Gothard road; in France on the Paris-Lyon-Mediterrané and Orleans-Midi systems; in Italy on two railway sections of 62 miles in length where the triphase current system was tried out with very good results. Finally in Germany, England, Australia, Africa, and in Spain, it is the question of the day; however the country in which electric power has been applied on a larger scale as a propelling force, is certainly that of our neighbour the United States. In fact, the electrification of the New York Central, the New York-New Haven and Hartford, the Butte-Anaconda railway, then, and more particularly, the electrification on a gigantic scale of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul railways are experiments of the highest importance, since they were crowned with success. Seeing that all the countries are adopting this system, why does not Canada immediately follow in their footsteps? When we are confronted, in our yearly Budget, with an enormous deficit amounting to one hundred million dollars and we hear it said in this House that this deficit will continue for a whole decade; when we know that we import from our neighbours all the anthracite which is consumed in Canada; when we are forced to submit to their unreasonable demands, to undergo the hardships and after-effects of their strikes, to put up with the fluctuations of their market; when we realize that in the central part of Canada we have not a trace of any coal deposit and that according to geological data, we shall never possess any, am I not free to cast my eyes towards this magnificent chain of mountains, the Laurentides, where I see these thousand and one streams silent at times and at others tumbling about them, as they proceed, precipitating their waters in the mighty St. Lawrence, itself uncontrolled and unharnessed, I wonder why we should not call upon this element to help solve, if not to entirely solve, our railway problem, at least to ameliorate our situation with regard to railways. Doubtless, the economic side of the question was given full consideration in Europe as well as in the United States, with regard to the electrification of railways. I might consider the merit of the question with special reference to humanity for large centers such as Montreal, Toronto, etc,—and it is on this high ground according to me that we should look to the discussion of this problem. This country possesses vast forest reserves, but we should not be led to expect and believe that they are inexhaustible. The late Senator W. C. Edwards, an authority on forestry, in a report to the Commission on Conservation, did not hesitate to declare that as things were going, timber industry in a few years, would be very insignificant in the Eastern parts of Canada. If we look up the report of the Forest Department for the Province of Quebec, we find a statement of Mr. Piché, forestry expert, declaring that the loss each year through the destruction of wood, both manufactured and unmanufactured and buildings, amounts to the enormous sum of $10,000,000 or $15,000,000, losses which for the greater part are attributed to sparks emitted from steam locomotives. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this enormous loss is well worth while that the Government should find means to eradicate this form of conflagration. In large centers, such as Montreal, Toronto and others, the requirements of cleanliness, health, quiet and rest for the population have for ever so long tended toward the discarding of the steam locomotive. I would ask you, Sir, to follow me, for a few moments, in the great metropolis, to pass through the counties of Saint Henri, Hochelaga and Sainte Marie and there to stop and to look at these windows besmeared with soot and gases, closed the year around, these walls equally blackened and I would moreover invite you to enter with me into the workman's abode who, owing to the scarcity of lodgings, is forced to seek shelter in the vicinity of stations and railway yards, there you will find, as if imprisoned, his wife surrounded with a large family, washing the clothes and beginning over again each day the same work. Snow itself reaches the ground in a filthy state. Hark! the locomotive all night long fills the air with its hooting and deafening noise, thus depriving the sick child, the worn out spouse and the husband exhausted by his daily toils, from their legitimate and beneficial sleep. And we, the representatives of the Metropolis, would be deprived of the privilege to harness this powerful agent, the St. Lawrence river, so as to furnish us the necessary power to electrify all the railway systems which are in operation on the Montreal island. I feel certain that if such an advantage were offered to New York, Paris or London, this change would have long ago taken place. The first condition required for the carrying out of such an undertaking, is to ascertain if we have in this country water power in sufficient quantity and capable of being utilized. This is perhaps the point in my argument which is the most easily demonstrated. If we examine the report of the Commission on Waterways for the Province of Quebec we notice that the north shore of the St. Lawrence is specially endowed with water powers. But first of all we have the St. Lawrence which has a potential energy estimated at 2,500,000 horsepower. On the south shore, there is the Richelieu river, a tributary whose rapids at St. John, Chambly and Saint Ours can develop 40,000 horsepower. Flowing past Hull to the city of Montreal we find the Ottawa river with its tributaries, the Quinze river, the Gatineau, the Liévre, the Little Nation, the North, the Red and the Kipawa rivers whose united waterpower is calculated to be 481,000 horsepower. From Montreal down on the north shore to the St. Maurice river are to be found the tributaries of l'Achigan, l'Assomption, the river du Loup, the Maskinongé and the Ouareau whose total waterpower amounts to 20,500 horse-power. The Saint Maurice river itself which supplies at present 365,000 horse-power can be regulated so as to develop 800,000 horse-power. Following the north shore down from the St. Maurice river to the Saguenay river, are the tributaries of the Batiscan, Sainte Anne de la Perade, Jacques Cartier, Montmorency and Saint Anne de Beaupré which altogether can develop 30,000 horse-power. The Saguenay basin alone with its gigantic tributaries, the Grande Décharge, the Péribonka, the Mistassini rivers, mentioning but the most important ones, can develop 800,000 horse-power. Continuing along the north shore of the St. Lawrence from the Saguenay to the Hamilton river are the Sainte Marguerite, the rivière aux Outardes, the Escoumains whose united courses can be made to yield 550,000 horse-power.

The Hamilton river alone can develop 506,000 horse-power; we could also add to it two other water-powers in its vicinity, which are capable of developing 50,000 horse-power. On the watershed of James bay, we come across the Harricana, Nottaway, Bell and Rupert rivers whose combined water-powers can develop 753,700 horse-power. Now, Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt that this part of my argument has been clearly proved. There exists in Canada, on the St. Lawrence river and along the north shore, within the province of Quebec, an abundance of waterpower well capable of being developed.

Let us compare the water powers of which I have just given the potential energy, with the hydraulic forces utilized by the United States for the electrification of their magnificent Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul system; this railway has a total energy of 200,000 horse-power supplied by various separate plants some of which have no more than 4,000 horsepower, others varying as follows: 10,000 horse-power, 15,000 horse-power, 30,000 horse-power, and 80,000 horse-power. Therefore with 200,000 horsepower the Americans have found it possible to electrify the whole of the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway system, 440 miles in length, and to maintain a voltage of 100,000 volts on the main line with substations which step down the voltage to 3,000 volts so as to distribute it to the transmission lines supplying the trains on their run.

It might perhaps seem venturesome for a young country like ours, almost ruined through its unlimited participation in the last war, to be the first to undertake this experiment, but when we behold France, which alone bore up with the greatest share of the burden of the war, and whose financial state is probably as bad as ours, undertaking the electrification of its vast Paris - Lyon - Méditerranée, Orleans - Midi systems, when we see the United States obtaining the most practical results by the electrification of their magnificent Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul system, first of all on a 440 miles run, but which has since been extended to 655 miles, when we have under our eyes the report of the Butte, Anaconda Pacific Railway which, for one year's operation, all expenses included, on a capital of $1,200,000 effects a saving of $242,300, I say, Mr. Speaker, that what can be accomplished in the United States, the good results thus obtained by our neighbours can well be duplicated over here and that we should have no fear of ridicule in tackling the problem.

For us, representatives of the people in Parliament, our first duty calls forth the development and conservation of our natural resources for the welfare of Canada. According to an American engineer, Mr. Spencer, there exists between lake St. Francis and the foot of the Lachine canal about 2,000,000 horse-power undeveloped. It takes, approximately, two pounds of coal to produce one horse-power per hour, we are therefore losing each day 30,000 tons of coal. Let us suppose that it is bituminous coal, and the cost agrees with the price laid down in the railway statistics for the year ending on the 31st December, 1920, namely $6.47 per ton, we are consequently daily losing, owing to the fact that these 2,000,000 horse-power are undeveloped, the sum of $194,700, in other words, $50,565,500 per year.

I am aware that the operating of our railways by electricity, would not be very practical were we left to operate them solely from their earnings, having due regard to the smallness of our population and to the undeveloped state of our trade activities for the time being; however, seeing we have the option to utilize the direct current system with central power-houses and substations, allowing the withdrawal at each substation of a sufficient amount of current for lighting purposes, heating and for the needs of industry, I believe, we have in this a very useful complement to the electrification of our railways. Take for example the yearly cost of heating, in Montreal. On an average, six or seven tons of anthracite are consumed yearly in each home, which amounts up to 700,000 tons of coal per year. I suppose that the consumer pays $16 per ton, this gives us, for the 700,000 tons, a total of $11,200,000 per year, simply for the heating. I therefore contend that if it were possible to develop electricity at a low cost, all the oil lamps would vanish from every home, all would cancel their American coal orders and adopt this system absolutely hygienic and far more effective—the electric system—and moreover in large centres such as Montreal and others, it would allow the public to do away with gas-meters which are as detrimental to their purse as to their health.

In order to ensure the success of the plan it is evident that both private interests and companies should not be considered. My past experience with them, forces me to make this statement; at present the companies, in Montreal, which supply electricity for the purposes of lighting and heating, sell the kilowatt-hour at one and a half cent, this means that they charge $128 for what actually cost them $15 or one-fifth of a cent per kilowatt-hour. As an explanation of these business methods, I might point out that in their reports there are to be found numerous misleading entries included in their outlays, and much overhead expenditure in connection with the improvement and harnessing of water courses. I wish to say that if the Government utilized all of the 2,000,000 h.p. on the St. Lawrence river, it could sell electricity at such a low price that the whole public would benefit by it; what we, at present, pay $128 for, we could buy for $50 and we would only be paying a fraction of a cent per kilowatt-hour; this would permit us to make use freely of electricity. The main point in an electrification system is the high cost of the initial outlay which includes the dams, causeways, electrical appliances, transmission lines, the construction of central power plants, sub-stations, etc. Take for instance the Loutre dam, the largest dam in the world today, larger than that of the Nile and Panama, having a capacity of sixty billion cubic feet of water at the disposal of the industries which are established below the dam. These industries pay the interest, plus a certain sum to the sinking fund, on the capital invested and held by the province of Quebec, they moreover, pay a thirty-five cent tax per horse-power, I therefore state that if we followed this example, given the same conditions, we would also have a large number of industries establishing themselves below these dams, in our own country, thus bringing in revenues to the province and conserving our natural resources. I believe we should without any hesitation follow the advice of Mr. Mauduit, a French engineer, who having had some experience in the operations of these systems, knows what type of electric locomotive has given the best results in the United States; and is also in a position to know what system has proved the best, and this, through his serious study of the management and operation of the Chicago-Milwaukee and St. Paul system.

He states that this system is the most practical, safe and economical. If the cost of equipping the central power houses and the sub-stations is very high, the operating of the large railways by the direct current system is so economic, that we have in it, I believe, a reasonable compensation. The electric locomotive, in fact, gives such effective results that it is out of the question to compare it with the efficiency of a steam locomotive. Moreover, it is lighter and starts with no wheel slippage, has a more effective brakeage, a greater steadiness of pull easily regulated, and highly thought of for hilly and mountainous grades. While the steam locomotive has on the average a normal pull of 31,112 pounds, the electric locomotive has a normal pull of 65,000 pounds and more, which is steady on grades of 2 per cent, a feat which cannot be accomplished by the steam locomotive. Our neighbours have further established the proof of the efficiency of the electric locomotive when, on their great Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul system they have replaced 112 steam locomotives by 45 electric locomotives. The decrease in the number of locomotives brings up the question of salaries and hands. A trainman, I believe, receives $10.85 per day. Therefore, the fact of decreasing the number of locomotives entails also a reduction in our expenses in reference to salaries.

Comparing the electric locomotive with that of the steam locomotive of equal horsepower, the former weighs thirty to thirty-five per cent less and its weight is distributed on a number of driving axles distant from one another by seven or eight feet, while the steam locomotive carries its weight in one place; this means that in the construction of roads and bridges, the electric locomotive, owing to the distribution of its weight, enjoys an economic advantage denied to the steam locomotive. The strength in construction of the electric locomotive allows it to run a long time without having to be cleaned, inspected or repaired. This is not the case of the steam locomotive, for after having run one hundred or one hundred and fifty miles we have to see to the cleaning, inspection and most of the time to fairly costly repairs. This necessitates an outlay for equipment, inspection and repair shops, all of which are a cause of considerable expense, while we do not need any of these with the electric locomotive.

As we are obliged to import coal for the steam locomotives, the question of returns which are 6 per cent, and at the most 8 per cent, according to the Canadian Pacific, is worthy of consideration. This great waste is due to steam under pressure, to stoppages, either for traffic, coal or water, or again for the meeting of trains; whilst the electric locomotive gives a maximum yield, particularly when its source of energy is drawn from the water powers along the line, as would be the case in the province of Quebec.

The ordinary price of an electric locomotive varies to-day from $130,000 to $140,000. Formerly, it was $60,000. But, as I said previously, the electric locomotive being worth two or three steam locomotives, it is more economical to purchase an electric locomotive. The Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul railway, has invested a capital of $12,750,000 for the electrification of its 440-mile system, which compares with the distance from Ottawa to St. John, or Ottawa to New York, but, so as to have the actual cost, it is in order to deduct therefrom the actual value of the 112 steam locomotives which have been replaced by electric locomotives and which are laid down at a price much below their value, though they are still in use in other parts of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, when I think that our coal resources, at the extremities of the Dominion, are fast being exhausted, because the more we utilize them, the less there is left of them; when I think that these coal resources which we so badly need for our metallurgic industry are getting exhausted; while the more we utilize our water powers, the smaller the waste; when I know that the United States, at each Congress, at each conference, and in both their houses, recommend that their natural resources be used economically; when I know that the Canadian Pacific, almost concluded a contract with the Shawinigan Power, a couple of years ago, for the electrification of its Montreal-Quebec system, then I think that, under the circumstances, this debate is not ill-timed.

Knowing, as we do, that the electric locomotive can overcome all obstacles and even take advantage of them, can ascend the mountain grades, as well as descend them; knowing, as we do, that the electric locomotive may reach points which until now it has been impossible to utilize for the starting and developing of new industries; knowing, as we do, that the electric locomotive makes it possible to operate a railway system in a rolling, mountainous country, at very low cost, on account of the steadiness of its pull; knowing, as we do, that this locomotive can face a storm, can brave the severest cold weather without itself being affected; knowing, as we do, that it can easily haul heavy trains up steep grades; knowing, as we do, that, in the Rocky mountains, Americans are using the electric locomotive to pull their steam locomotives out of the snow banks; knowing all this, I do not think it reasonable to compare it to the dirty locomotive which besmears everything in its way, which is powerless in difficult roads, is helpless against a storm, is stifling in a subway, and at times even incendiary.

When we know that the difference in cost, for electric power, for the same distance, the same work, during the same time, is in proportion of 88 to 200 in favour of the electric locomotive, that the cost of repairs is 8 to 18 in favour of the electric locomotive, I wonder why the St. Maurice Valley railway which has 800,000 horsepower at its disposal, is not electrified. I wonder why all the railway systems which run on the island of Montreal are not electrified by this time; I wonder why the Government railway systems, from Montreal to Ottawa, are not electrified; I wonder why an electric railway should not be built to the Gaspé peninsula, in that mountainous district where an electric locomotive would be so useful and so advantageous in the development of our mining resources; I wonder why an electric railway should not be built to the coast of Labrador thus providing an outlet for the beautiful and immense forest resources we own there.

In concluding, I feel confident that the present Government will always, in directing its future policy, bear in mind a truly national and patriotic spirit, and that it will avoid, contrary to what has been done in the past, conceding water-powers like those of the "Cèdres" to the Aluminium Electric company of Massena, New York, which disregards each year the clauses of its contract, pays nothing to the province and withdraws yearly from the St. Lawrence 65,000 horse-power. I hope that this Government and the provinces will have sufficient national pride so as not to advertise themselves in the future as pawn-shops in order to dispose of our national resources in the interest of private companies and strangers. I have confidence that the Government will always remain national so as not to forget this ever-living motto of our regretted grand leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Canada first, second and last.

[Mr. Deslauriers.]

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, for a moment I want to refer to a matter that concerns the whole House. I am speaking to-night, as I did the other day, from this centre line as between the Progressives and the official Opposition, so that I may be heard all over the Chamber, and I would make this suggestion to the House, and especially to the leader of the House whom I see in his place, that henceforth any one who wishes to address the House and to be heard all over should have the privilege of coming to the centre—

Mr. McMASTER: That does not fill the bill.

Mr. MACLEAN (York):—and that ministers, when their estimates are up, should always occupy the centre seats in the front row opposite. In that way everybody could hear, and it would improve the debate. I am throwing out that suggestion to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the leader of the House, so that after this we can try and get those who wish to be heard—and I wish to be heard to-night; I have no trouble in maying myself heard—to come to the centre. The electrician also has told me that with very little trouble he could attach a light to the two centre desks. I think if my suggestion were adopted the debates would be improved.

Mr. SPEAKER: Without wishing to interrupt the hon. member I might say that although the rule is that an hon. member when speaking should address the House from his own seat, yet in view of the poor acoustics of the Chamber I shall not, if such is the judgment of the whole House, apply that rule against any hon. member who would like to speak from the centre of the Chamber in order to be heard.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I am very glad to hear you say that, Mr. Speaker. I would expect that from you, having regard to your knowledge of the House. I also speak from my knowledge of the House. Only to-night one of the members of the Hansard staff approached me and said, "Mr. Maclean, would you mind speaking from the centre of the House so that we can hear you better?" I said, "Yes, I have been considering that." I hope that some arrangement will be made so that the two seats here and on the other side can be used by hon. gentlemen and by ministers when their estimates are going through. Everyone in the Chamber would then be able to hear, and the debates would be improved.

For a few moments I want to refer to the motion that has been introduced by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) in favour of the electrification of the railways of Canada. When he raised that question this afternoon he raised the most important question in connection with transportation that has ever come up in this country, and I am especially pleased to see the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) here to-night. I hope that he will not only listen to the discussion, but take part in the debate.

I have been an advocate of the public ownership of railways, for years and years, and the basis of public ownership of our railways is their electrification. Now that the electrification of the railways is coming, I hope that the State will have control over it. Not only is that the view here in Canada, but the President of the United States, amid all his duties and responsibilities, and especially the responsibility that was his when the new treaty was made between the powers in the direction of disarmament, took occasion to make a very important deliverance to the people of the United States in regard to transportation. He spoke in favour of the electrification of the railways, and he based his deliverance on the report of the International Joint Commission that was appointed by the United States and by Canada to deal with this very question and other similar ones. The International Joint Commission made a special report to Congress and to this Parliament, and in that report, which is now in the hands of hon. members, they come out unitedly in favour of the development of the St. Lawrence waterways, and in connection with that development, the development of water-power for transportation, a subject in which hon. gentlemen to my left are especially interested. The President of the United States within the last three months has practically said that there is no solution of the transportation problem as far as he could see except in two directions, and his proposal was that we must develop the waterways of the St. Lawrence, and develop them not only as waterways so as to allow ocean steamships to get right up to lake Superior, but develop them also for water-power, for the electrification of the railways.

The hon. member for St. Mary spoke in support of his resolution in French this afternoon, and although I did not get all of what he said, I think I understand fairly well what his argument was. He said that the province of Quebec has probably the greatest store of water-powers in her rivers of any portion of Canada. I could not quite make out though whether the hon. member was making the argument I am making to-night, that these powers should be developed by the State for the use of our own railways; and when I speak of the railway question I have only to repeat what I said in this House two weeks ago on that question, that the corporation-owned railways of the United States have absolutely failed in their mission. They have broken down; they are practically all hamstrung to-day, and in bad financial condition. Their champions, and they have several, have said in the prominent American newspapers and magazines in the last few weeks that the only salvation for the American railroads lies in their electrification, and, that before that can be done the two hundred company-owned lines in the United States must be consolidated into ten or twelve systems. If that is done, and the railways are electrified, there may be some hope for the American roads, and still more hope if the magnificent waterways we have in connection with the St. Lawrence are developed for the transportation of steamships and for the generation of power.

There is one man in Canada who, like Joseph in Egypt, saw what was coming. Joseph had divine inspiration behind him, but there is a man in Canada to-day who had the foresight of Joseph, and who saw that the development of electrical energy was to be his main mission in life, and Sir Adam Beck to-day has this to his credit: He is the one man who foresaw what was coming, and he had the hardihood—and it is said to be a crime that he is guilty of—to see that the great development of water-power energy by the public would go a long way toward the settlement of the transportation problem. And Adam Beck has this further achievement to his credit, that he has the greatest public development of water-power in the world at Chippawa and Niagara. He has only two of his units working to-day, but each is producing 55,000 horse-power.

The two generators were run the other day up to 120,000 horse-power. Not only has he these generators but he has eight others ready to install when the proposed development is completed. The progressive section of the people of Ontario, who represent the municipalities there, are lining up behind this movement. They are even putting mortgages on their property to promote these great developments of horse-power for the purpose of improving transportation. As I said earlier, before the year is over Sir Adam Beck will have developed 600,000 horse-power; and I believe that ultimately he will even have a million horse-power. And yet at the inception of the Chippawa plant Sir Adam was told that he was a crazy man. Why there will ultimately be an income of $10,000,000 from the horse-power generated on the Niagara and Chippawa rivers. The other day Sir Adam asked the Progressive party in this House to go up some Saturday and see the plant at Chippawa and Niagara, and inspect what is being done there in the way of developing electric energy for the railroads of Canada. I want to tell the Prime Minister now that if he wishes to be up-to-date he must have in his Government in the future a Minister of Power. I do not say go to Adam Beck and secure him for that office; although he may be looking for a position before long if we are to judge what is going on in the legislature of Ontario. In Sir Adam Beck we have a man like Joseph of Egypt; he had the force and capacity to go and induce the municipalities to stand behind him and to give him the credit in order to generate this power. It is this very power, in connection with which my hon. friend (Mr. Deslauriers) moved his resolution this afternoon, that will be the salvation of the country as far as transportation is concerned. I hope the leader of the Government will pay some attention to what I am saying. I repeat that the first man he ought to get is a man like Sir Adam Beck in connection with the administration of our national railways.

Mr. BUREAU: Do you want to kill us?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I certainly do not want to kill you. Here are our members from Quebec speaking. Our friends there are afraid—

Mr. BUREAU: Not a Frenchman but the French member for Three Rivers.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): My friend has a splendid electrical development in his constituency at Three Rivers, but the people do not own it.

Mr. BUREAU: No, but they are making money through it.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): In that case you ought to be proud of it. Unfortunately our friends in Quebec do not want to hear what Ontario is doing although the latter is carrying out this development in the public interest. In the province of Quebec they think that work can only be done by private companies. If I understood the argument of my hon. friend (Mr. Deslauriers) this afternoon, he sees what is coming; he hears the sound of the "going in the mulberry trees," and that these private companies are getting ready to sell out and turn their enterprises over to the Government. My suggestion to the Prime Minister is that he should get as soon as he can a good man to act as chairman of the National Railways.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, Sir Joseph Flavelle.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Sir Joseph Flavelle is acting in that capacity at the present time, but I understand the position may be vacated soon. The Government must get a man as chairman of the national railways who possesses the capacity not only to bring about the generation of power but to go ahead and buy out these companies. Perhaps he can buy out the Montreal power companies and then it will be possible to proceed with the electrification of the railroads of Canada. If President Harding's scheme is carried out in connection with the waterways in the St. Lawrence and the generation of the electrical energy there; if Adam Beck is able to develop his million horse-power, as I think he will, at Niagara; if some of the available water-power is developed on the Ottawa here; if water-power is developed by Adam Beck also on lake Superior and on the Abitibi—taking all these developments together, and including in them the energy to be derived from the Montreal power scheme, there will be enough power available to drive every train that is run on the Canadian railroads from the city of Quebec right up to lake Superior and along the front of our country to Windsor. That power is the cheapest in the world; it will solve the question of cheap motive power for our railways. Not only that, but it will render us independent of the coal owners of the United States upon whom we are now dependent for our coal and for the fuel for our railways. Why we are sending millions of dollars every year to the United States for the purchase of coal to supply motive power for our Canadian railways. The province of Ontario has started in the right direction by making this a question of public ownership. The right solution of the transportation problem in America is going to result from this power development. I am not giving my own view but am simply citing the opinion of men who have studied this question—from the President of the United States down to even the champions of private ownership—when I say that there is no solution of the problem of transportation except through the electrification of the railroads.

The hon. member who brought up this resolution this afternoon has done a public service in directing our attention to it, but he did not handle the question in the way in which I would have handled it because I maintain that this power must be owned by the people. We are saying the same thing in Ontario to-day and we have made a great success of power development. And it is because of that success that we hear so much opposition to it in Montreal. I have nothing to say against our friends in Montreal; but for some reason or other all, or at least the main part, of the opposition to what has been done in Ontario comes from outside that province. A great deal of it emanates from the power trust —I will not call them the power ring— that is centered in Montreal. My hon. friend (Mr. Bureau) is a member of the Government. If the only view he has about the public ownership of power development is that it is a dangerous thing in connection with transportation in this country he cannot very well say that he is a Liberal or even a Progressive: he is an old-timer, he is a "die-hard," he has joined the party of the "die-hards."

Mr. BUREAU: May I ask my hon. friend what party he has joined?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I have not joined the "die hards" but the public ownership party. I think my hon. friend is with the "die hards."

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend's companions are far worse than the "die hards."

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Well, our friends the farmers have grasped that solution of the transportation problem to which I have alluded. At the same time I give the province of Quebec credit for what it has done. Down at Three Rivers and on the lower St. Lawrence there has been some fine water-power development. Let me remind hon. members—I think I referred to it the other day in connection with this water-power question—that some years ago a very innocent bill was introduced into this House and into the Railway Committee and very nearly got through. That innocent bill went in this direction: That all the water-power developed at Cornwall and on the Long Sault, on the St. Lawrence river, was to be given to the greatest metal trust in the United States, the Aluminum Trust. They very nearly got all those water-powers that President Harding now says ought to be used for the electrification of their railroads over there. However, the plan did not succeed because some of us members in the House stopped it. So there is a free field open now for water-power development. The example has been set by the province of Ontario; and soon I hope there will be one million horse-power available for motive power for our railways and for the benefit of the people of the province.

As I said when the railway question was under discussion the other night, I think I know what the C.P.R. desire more than anything else. While they have denounced, or somebody has denounced, Adam Beck and his radials in Ontario, nobody would be so glad to get the Sir Adam Beck radials and water powers as the Canadian Pacific railway. I give them credit for that. We are going to keep that water power for the Canadian Pacific Railway, if they come to us as a customer, but we do not want them to get control of those powers. Just wait and see how soon some big trust will reach out, on the lines of the suggestion of the hon. member for St. Mary's (Mr. Deslauriers), and endeavour to grab the water powers now centered in the power companies in Monteral. Perhaps the Canadian Pacific Railway would administer them as well as they could administer many other things, and I give them credit for that. But the Canadian Pacific Railway is strong enough as a transportation company in this country, and I should not like to see it get this water power. I think the Government should get those powers, and have for a minister a man with foresight to handle the proposition. All the Dominion has to do is to get into the province of Quebec. There are many rivers there that have not been taken over, and if they can get two or three of those rivers, such as the hon. gentleman spoke of this afternoon, they can show how cheaply water power can be developed as a public proposition, and they will be able to generate all the power required down there at a fair price. I do not want to see the investors lose a cent, and I do not want to see them use the energy they have to put up the transportable charges.

When I spoke of transportation in connection with waterways, I told the story of the barrel of herring that was obtained by a United States merchant in the Alaska fisheries. When these herring came to be sold in the eastern States the charge was $5 a barrel, while the products of the fisheries of Scotland were brought by some steamship to New York for 50 cents a barrel. That is the difference between transportation by rail and transportation by water, and when they have reduced the cost of the development of water power there will be almost a like reduction in freight charges. I want to tell my Progressive friends that they are improving transportation, that there will be a great improvement in the future and that they are entitled to the benefit of it. A man cannot succeed in farming under the present rates unless the transportation charges are reduced. Electrification of the energy for the railways, and waterways as competitors of the railways, will do a lot, and the way to get the full benefit of electrical energy for transportation in this country will be by the state owning the water powers. Especially will it be the duty of the Minister of Railways, in his reconstruction of the National Railways, to select a chairman who will make it his main business to study the water power question, and see where he can get his power for the lowering of transportation charges.

In Ontario the development of our electrical energies for transportation and for industrial purposes, and most of all for improving life on the farm, would be of immense benefit. The Hydro-Electric of Ontario is distributing electrical energy for all purposes through the farms. They have broadened their policy, they are going to reduce prices and subsidize the lines which will distribute the electrical energy. It will be a great source of wealth and strength to the people of Ontario to have that development, and we are going on with it. We start in the right way when we take it up as a public ownership proposition. Transportation must be a public ownership proposition. Everybody sees that it has to come, and I hope the Minister of Railways will announce that he is going ahead with a system of consolidation, so as to put the railways in a position to use this electrical energy. When we get that announcement we will know that the country is prepared to move ahead.

While I was glad to hear the hon. gentleman speak this afternoon, and beg to express my appreciation of his effort in drawing public attention to the question, I want to see that effort, as far as this House is concerned, realized on the lines of public ownership, particularly in the way of getting a chairman of the National Railways who will have two main duties. His first duty will be to assist in the real consolidation of our railways and provide electrical energy, so that we will be independent of our neighbours in the United States. They have been good friends to us, but they cut us off from our supplies from time to time. The President of the United States has said that he is for the development of waterways in order to lower freight rates. We have done the same thing, and made a success of it, and I hope there will be no more talk in this Parliament or in the legislature except on the lines of public ownership.

I want to speak of the West. I have been reading for a great many years about the West, and the information I have—and I think the members from the West will confirm it—is that there is enough power in the Saskatchewan river, the Red river, the Assiniboine and other rivers, to run every train, and to move every bushel of wheat, even when there will be five times the number of farmers they have on the prairies, by electrical energy instead of coal. Of course they have coal mines in the West, but that coal is dear, and then there is a better way to use the coal at all seasons of the year than by the present method.

The coal can be burned at the mine and they can generate electrical energy, and instead of shovelling coal and loading it up, they can burn it right down in the mine, as they say, and convert it into electrical energy. That energy has the one supreme quality that nothing else in the world has; it transports itself along the wire, travels itself and delivers itself, wherever it is wanted. There is no trouble about that. I forget how much of the energy of our railways is devoted to carrying their own coal, but it is a large proportion. The electrical energy has this marvellous quality. It travels along the wire and delivers itself wherever it is wanted, right into the engine, or it can deliver itself into an individual motor in a car. I was glad to hear the hon. member speak this afternoon in favour of development of electrical energy as a motive power in this country. He is a supporter of the Government, and after he has made that statement, I think the Government will listen to the suggestion I have made, that is to put a chairman at the head of the National Railways who will make it his business to develop two or three water-powers at cost price, and see at what price he can buy water-powers from the companies already possessed of them.

When the Minister of Railways commences his consolidation of the railways—and I hope he will begin in Ontario and make a demonstration there—I trust he will be ready to take all the power that the Hydro Electric system of Ontario will be prepared to deliver in almost a few days. To show how successful Adam Beck's system is, let me state that three of the power systems that have been taken from private companies are comparatively so inferior to the modern development that Sir Adam Beck has at Chippawa, that he will scrap those three great plants at Niagara Falls. That shows what progress is being made along that line. The Toronto Power Company, the Ontario Electrical Development Company, the big company that was bought over from the private interests in Buffalo, that owned it, and the other power company at Hamilton, which is ready to sell and which has fixed its price, will all have to be scrapped because the development of electrical power by the Ontario Hydro Electric Commission has been so successful.

This commission has made a great success of the development of electrical energy in the interest of Ontario; it has made a success of the Toronto Street Railway. I wish hon. gentlemen who criticise street railway systems would visit Toronto and see the system of street railways owned by that city. If the city authorities are charging the people six cents for transportation, it must be remembered that they are spending a great deal of money on the equipment. It is a fine example of a publicly-owned transportation system operated by electrical energy, owned by the people, and a system the purpose of which is not primarily to make profits, but to give service.

Who has brought that about? It is not private companies that have made this great demonstration to the world. The municipalities of Ontario have given this example, and up to date they have not lost a dollar in this connection. People say: "Adam Beck has made this and that mistake; he has exceeded his estimate," and his great critic is the Drury government. But when a government begins to criticise another organization for extravagance or carelessness, let me ask how their estimates compare with those of Sir Adam Beck? He has kept well within his estimates and he has made good. The people who are behind him have not lost a cent, and there has not been any graft in connection with the development of this power. The power is there; the exhibition of it is there, and you can see it every day now. Let the new Minister of Railways start to electrify the railways at once with all the power that he can get from the Ontario system, and let him begin to move cars from Niagara to the Detroit river, and from Niagara through Toronto where most of the traffic is. We have there two great National roads, the Grand Trunk and the Canadian Northern. We can also sell some electrical power to the Canadian Pacific if they want it. I believe the Canadian Pacific are willing to buy power; they are simply waiting to buy power for the electrification of their railways. They hope to buy it from companies in Montreal, and I should like to see them get it there; but no matter who gets the power, the Government must take control of the electrification of railways and must fix the price.

I have almost finished my remarks, but I come back to the same statement I made the other day in regard to transportation. I have been in this House long enough to see freight rates reduced time after time by the Railway Commission that we established in this country, and every time a dollar was taken off railway freight rates in the moving of our crops, that dollar was put on by the steamship ring that controls transportation on the Atlantic. That cannot be done when the people own the transportation facilities, and therein lies the protection of the public. When the government of the United States—and this is what private transportation companies are afraid of—join, as I hope they will gladly join, with the present Government in developing electrical energy on the St. Lawrence river right in front of us and in two or three other places where power can be generated, we shall have the railway companies of the United States and of Canada in the hands of the people. This will give us a better lever for controlling freight rates than any commission or anything of the kind. We will furnish power to move your trains, provided you make the freight rates reasonable. There is the real problem of transportation in this country, and the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) pointed it out to-night. I have studied this problem, and I hope we shall hear more to-night in favour of electrification of the railways of Canada, based on public control, and best of all, if it can be effected, based on public ownership of the sources of electrical energy. If we have that, we shall make real progress towards lower freight charges in this country.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (Westmount-St. Henri): Mr. Speaker, I feel it my duty to speak to the resolution moved by the hon. member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers). This question may be viewed from many angles. I think the whole House has been well informed about the matter from a technical point of view; but the question may be looked at from the point of view of local interests. For instance, every hon. member knows my constituency, Westmount-St. Henri, which is divided into two big portions, one on the upper level, namely, Westmount, and the other on the plains, the two wards of St. Henri and St. Cunegonde. Hon. members who have travelled through the province of Quebec via the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Northern, or the Central Vermont, have passed through those centres, and they know how the population is suffering as a result of that traffic, and from the smoke which spoils everything, and is even injurious to human life.

This resolution must also be considered from a general point of view as far as public health and civic progress are concerned. In Montreal, there are electrical locomotives leaving the Canadian National railway station, and in all parts of the United States electrical locomotives are being used with great success. No doubt, the problem can be easily solved by the electrification of locomotives; the population, especially in urban centres, will not be inconvenienced by the dense smoke, and great benefit will ensue in connection with public health and child welfare if this resolution is adopted by the House.

I understand that the Government is obliged to say that it is shouldering very large expenses; but if this discussion has the result of inducing the Government to do its utmost to remedy the situation, the populations of the large urban centres will benefit thereby. I remember reading that Max Hopkins used to say, when he was looking at a locomotive, "I take off my hat to it." If fuel locomotives are replaced by electrical locomotives when trains are passing through cities, the people will continue to practise that maxim by raising their hats to this new electrification of progress.

Hon. W. C. KENNEDY (Minister of Railways): The thanks of the House are due to the member for St. Mary (Mr. Deslauriers) for bringing this resolution to its attention. He has displayed a keen interest in the question of the electrification of our railroads, which is one of great moment to the people of the country. The member for South York (Mr. Maclean) also made an interesting contribution to the debate, although, perhaps, he discussed the matter from a different angle from that of my hon. friend from Montreal. Those of us who come from Ontario, however, and who know that the hon. member for South York was one of the pioneers in the advocacy of the electrical development of our railways, and all that goes to make for the successful development of eletrical energy in our province, feel sure that those who have the matter in charge will give the hon. member's views every consideration. I have taken this matter up with the Board of Directors and the Board of Management of the Railways, who are keenly alive to the situation and know what is being done not only in this country but also on the other side. They are aware that the New York Central, the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railway, and many other roads on the other side, use electrical energy, but they feel that in Canada the change at present would entail a very large expenditure, which the result of investigations that have been made is hardly conclusive enough to warrant. It is considered, therefore, that it would be better, for the present at any rate, to defer action in the matter. Probably all that my hon. friend from St. Mary had in mind was just to bring the matter to the attention of Parliament, and I know that he will feel satisfied when I tell him that everything in connection with the development of electrical energy is being closely watched by the Board of Management of the Railways. They are not only interested in the question, but are also sympathetic, and when the right time comes they will do their part. In the meantime I would suggest to my hon. friend, if it meets with his approval, now that we have had a discussion of the subject, that he withdraw his resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the House that the hon. member have leave to withdraw the resolution?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: I might direct the attention of the House to the fact that, at first sight, the resolution does not seem to be in order. It reads:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should take steps to electrify the Canadian Government railways on all lines where electric power is available.

Reading it a second time, however, I find that it contains only a pious wish, on the part of the hon. member who moves it, that the Government should take certain action in respect to the matter he brings before the House. The hon. member invites the Government to make an investigation; that, undoubtedly, is what is meant by "taking steps." Section 54 of the British North America Act reads:

It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill, for the Appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any Tax or Impost, to any Purpose that has not been first recommended to that House by Message of the Governor General in the session in which such Vote, Resolution, Address, or Bill is proposed.

I must remind hon. members on both sides of the House that when a resolution is adopted it is binding on the Government; and any resolution that calls for the expenditure of public moneys must originate with the Government. In the present instance, the resolution is simply a request that the Government should investigate the matter in question. For that reason I have allowed the discussion, which otherwise would not have been in order.

Motion withdrawn.

TERMINAL FACILITIES AT ST. JOHN, N.B.

RESOLUTION NOT IN ORDER

On the Order:

Mr. CALDWELL:

That in the opinion of this House, terminal facilities should be provided by the Government of Canada at the port of St. John, New Brunswick, in the shape of a frost proof warehouse, to enable Canadian grown potatoes to be shipped during the entire year from a Canadian port.

Mr. CALDWELL: Stand.

Mr. SPEAKER: Since the hon. member does not propose to proceed with his resolution, I would ask that he amend it in conformity with the section of the British North America Act which I have just read. If the resolution were adopted as it stands, it would be binding on the Government, as it calls for the expenditure of public money. The hon. member may bring it forward at another sitting of the House in an amended form.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT, 1917 AMENDMENT BILL

Mr. JAMES S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 18, to repeal the Military Service Act, 1917. He said:

I shall not say much on this motion. I take it that the Military Service Act was very fully discussed on almost every political platform in the country. I understand that it is a matter of legal dispute as to whether or not the act is still operative or whether it became void automatically with the cessation of the war. If it is dead, it seems to me that the least we can do is to give it decent burial. The war has ended, and we are glad to think that the circumstances which may or may not have made necessary the passing of the Military Service Act no longer exist. I therefore ask that that act be repealed.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If the Military Service Act were still in operation the Government would be only too glad to accept the hon. member's suggestion and repeal it. But the act has ceased for some time past to be operative, and there is therefore, in the opinion of the Government, no need for the proposed legislation. My hon. friend has said that it is a matter of legal dispute whether or not the act is still in force. I can, I think, give my hon. friend assurance on that point which will be satisfactory to him and to the House. I have the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, agreed to by the Parliamentary Counsel, Mr. Gisborne. There is no doubt whatever in the minds of authorities who advise the Government on legal matters, as to the exact position of this legislation. The opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice is as follows:

The Military Service Act, Chapter 19 of 1917, was passed, as the recitals show, for the single purpose of enabling the Government to embody, by selective draft, re-inforcements not exceeding 100,000 men (section 13, subsection 4) "to maintain and support the Canadian Expeditionary Force now engaged in active service overseas". By section 4, sub-section 1, the Governor General in Council was authorized to call out by proclamation any of the classes of men described by the Act for service "for the duration of the present war and of demobilization thereafter." The Act plainly had its application only to the circumstances then existing, and in relation to the war then in progress. The Act is now exhausted and spent and could not be invoked for another emergency. Therefore it is not necessary to repeal it.

If the statutes were being revised, Mr. Speaker, the commissioners would simply drop this act altogether. For us to proceed any further would be to take action which is wholly unnecessary.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Of the correctness of the position taken by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) there is no doubt whatever. The act has no present force and effect; there is no room for legal dispute of any kind on that point. The act plainly applied to the then war, and to no other; it could not by any government be applied to any other emergency, contingency, or war whatsoever. Consequently, on the termination of that war, the act became obliterated so far as actual operation at any time is concerned. However, the fact that it applied to the one state of hostilities and to that alone did not prevent a very prolonged and bitter assault being made upon it in the late campaign, and I have no doubt many hon. members of this House count it among their pledges that they would repeal this law,—a law which already was repealed; a law which, if you can speak of it in that way, was functus offiicio—absolutely without power of operation. That was the plan adopted of attacking the method of selective conscription which that law embodied.

If, however, it is the purpose of the hon. member or of any other hon. member or of the Government to wipe conscription from our statute book, there is yet much to be done. The Militia Act contains a provision for conscription, for compulsory military service—not through selection by tribunals; not by selection of any kind, but merely by the casting of lots,—by chance. The Governor in Council is empowered under the Militia Act, as it is to-day and has been on our statutes for decades, to compel military service in this country or out of this country for the defence of Canada at any time the Governor in Council or Parliament deems such a course necessary. Consequently, the principle of compulsory military service is as much embedded in our law as the principle of compulsory financial service by way of taxation. If, therefore, there are those pledged against it who desire to redeem their pledge—which, of course, I have grave reason to doubt, on this or any other subject—the course to be pursued would be to attack the Militia Act of this country. I for one will await with much interest, though with little apprehension, any attack that may be made upon it.

Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I desire only to correct a misapprehension on the part of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). He seems to be unaware of the campaign that was carried on in my province with regard to the Military Service Act at the last election. My right hon. friend says that there are men in this House who sit here, probably, because they took a pledge to have that act repealed. I wish to tell him that those who took that pledge were defeated at the last election, and they were the friends of my right hon. friend. We were opposed by the friends of the right hon. leader of the Opposition, mind you, because we were supposed to have supported conscription. We, they said, were those who had been in favour of conscription; and they attacked us because we did not ask the repeal of that act after the war was over. The position I took then, the position we on this side of the House took, was the position that has just been taken by my right hon. friend: that the Military Service Act is no longer in force and that these gentlemen, supporters of my right hon. friend were absolutely mistaken.

I will give my right hon. friend some further information. His colleagues, the new ministers who were appointed to represent the province of Quebec,—Dr. Normand, fellow citizen of my hon. friend to my right (Mr. Bureau); Mr. Monty, and the others—came down to the province of Quebec and said in their speeches that we were responsible for conscription; that if they had been in the House at the time they would have opposed it; that we were the conscriptionists and that the colleagues of my right hon. friend were those opposed to it. That was the campaign in the province of Quebec at the last election, and my right hon. friend is mistaken when he states otherwise.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will my hon. friend permit me to ask again a favour I so often ask,—that is, that he support his assertions as to other people by quotation?

Mr. LAPOINTE: Everyone knows that in my province; no one would deny it. All those who read newspapers, whether they live in the province of Quebec or elsewhere, know that what I say is correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will support mine.

Hon. JACQUES BUREAU (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend (Mr. Lapointe) does not, perhaps, know of the service rendered to me in Three Rivers at the last election by the leader of the official Opposition (Mr. Meighen). It was my privilege to have as my opponent the then President of the Privy Council. This gentleman came on the stump and asserted—and a list of the members in question was published in one of the papers supported by the friends of my right hon. friend—that those who voted for and supported conscription were the Liberals in Opposition in 1917. But I was saved in this way: My right hon. friend came to Three Rivers and said in the course of a speech there: "I am the father of conscription". I called a meeting and I asked the President of the Privy Council, who was right, he or his leader; and when he was caught between the two he did not answer. Thus the situation was saved.

Now, my right hon. friend wants quotations. If he will have patience and wait until to-morrow I will send him the newspapers of Three Rivers from which he will see that prior to his visit to that city there was not a speech made by the President of his Privy Council—and we had three or four meetings every evening in those days; it was a great fight—in which it was not stated that Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the then Opposition, naming your humble servant as one of the members of it, were the fathers and promoters of conscription. But after my right hon. friend came to Three Rivers, they changed their tune. They said: "Well, conscription was not invented in 1917; it was instituted at the time of Confederation. Sir George Etienne Cartier was the father of conscription. Subsequently Sir Frederick Borden changed the act; it was he who imposed conscription upon the people; therefore, the law of 1917 was nothing new; we simply took your act and put it into force." Then we put the question, "Why did you change it if you already had authority to raise armies for overseas? Why didn't you use that law? Why did you pass a new one?" "Oh," they said, "the war was a new thing; the conditions were entirely new; everything was new." I make the statement here that in the province of Quebec the fight was made, whether it was inspired by the leader of the Opposition or not, on the charge that the Opposition of that day, in 1917, were the people that brought about conscription. But when my right hon. friend went through the province saying that he was the father of conscription these people changed their minds and said, "So it dates from the consolidation of the Militia Act," and they were opposed to it and said: "The Militia Act will be wiped off the statute book. We as a self-respecting nation do not want that." My right hon. friend does not need to ask for quotations, because I could load him up with so many that it would take him the balance of the session to read them. So I will ask him to "dispense"; it will save him work and the country will be as well informed.

Mr. GEORGE PARENT (Quebec West): I should like to gratify the request of the leader of the Opposition for a quotation. I happen to have one in my pocket at the moment. During the recent campaign Mr. Belley the ex-Postmaster General, was the candidate of my right hon. friend in the county of Charlevoix-Montmorency and I can quote from a speech he made as reported in the Quebec Chronicle, the owner of which was the late Sir David Watson, a well known friend of the Tory government and of the government that has just passed away. This is what that newspaper report says:

With documentary evidence in hand Mr. Belley proved that the Conscription Act was contained in the Laurier law,—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. PARENT (reading):

—as it appears in the Revised Statutes of Canada of 1906. The Borden Act did not change this Act, but simply changed the mode of raising troops. By the Laurier Act the troops were raised by lottery while the Borden Act provided for selection by exemption tribunals.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All true.

Mr. PARENT (reading):

By the lottery system enacted in the Laurier Act hundreds of young men would have gone to war, but under the Borden exemption system not a single young man of Charlevoix county went to the war. But the point which impressed the audience most was the voting of five hundred million dollars which Mr. Borden had obtained in the session of 1918. He explained that the Borden Act was passed before the elections of 1917, the elections having been held in December that year. At the beginning of the session of 1918 Mr. Borden presented a bill bearing No. 38, by which he asked Parliament for a sum of five hundred million dollars which was required, amongst other things, for the enforcing of the Conscription Act. Not a single member had voted against the granting of this money, not even the Liberal members, who had taken pledges only a few months before that they would ask for the repeal of the Military Service Act.

Several members then sought Mr. Belley's permission to ask him a few questions, and he readily consented and answered all questions decisively.

I hope that quotation will satisfy my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If I may be permitted a remark, I am thankful to my hon. friend for confirming precisely what I stated was the case.

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency): My hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Parent) has just given the House a quotation from the Quebec Chronicle with reference to the campaign of the ex-Postmaster General (Mr. Belley) in the county of Charlevoix-Montmorency. I happen to have been the fortunate candidate in that election. I succeeded in beating one of the ministers who had enjoyed office for a few days under my right hon. friend who now leads the Opposition. Every word that has been quoted by my hon. friend from Quebec West is absolutely true. I could also quote to the House, if I wished to detain it, many more statements circulated in the county of Charlevoix-Montmorency at the expense of the people of this country to show that conscription was the work of the Liberal party. I answered each and every one of these statements on the platform, and with the aid of some of my friends, especially the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe), I succeeded in obtaining the victory over one of the ministers of my right hon. friend opposite. The first statement which was published referred to the voting of $500,000,000 which was required among other things for the enforcing of the Conscription Act. I answered that which was not absolutely correct, and several other statements that were made about conscription at that time. We did not raise the issue. It was the hon. gentlemen now sitting angularly opposite who raised it, although they accuse us of having raised the issue to get us back into power. I want to say publicly here in the House that if the election in the province of Quebec was carried on the conscription issue, it was not carried by the Liberal party, but by hon. gentlemen sitting angularly opposite from me here. I shall vote with pleasure for the repeal of this law.

[Mr. Parent.]

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, in my humble opinion this bill is useless. I agree with my hon. friend the Prime Minister that the law is not now in operation, and I only rise to answer in two words the right hon. ex-member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) who now sits angularly opposite by the grace, generosity, and skilful tactics of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). I happen to have with me a few quotations that he challenged my hon. friend from Quebec East to produce I have a quotation, for instance, from a speech made by the ex-Secretary of State, Mr. Monty, on conscription, as reported in La Minerve, a Montreal paper carrying on its front page the photograph of the leader of the official Opposition. I will translate from La Minerve of November 5th, 1921 as follows:

The Hon. Mr. Monty in Beauharnois

The Hon. Mr. Monty spoke afterwards on conscription. He declared that in 1917 he was opposed to that law. No one could doubt it. He had defended hundreds and hundreds of conscripts. He had adopted and he was still willing to defend the principle of Sir John A. Macdonald that Canada should have an army only for the defence of Canadian territory. He openly declared that if ever in future the same question came up he would oppose conscription and defend his anti-conscription principles. "You can say," repeated the Secretary of State "that I was against conscription, that I am still against conscription, that I will be against conscription on the 6th of December, that I always will be against conscription."

If this quotation is not sufficient I can read further extracts from a newspaper that was published in the constituency of Three Rivers, the St. Lawrence Valley Chronicle, quoting speeches delivered by the Hon. Dr. Normand. That gentleman, who was president of the Privy Council is reported as saying the following:

Conscription is not a matter of principle but simply a matter of contribution, and I said it and I repeat it again, and I always said during conscription time, that I was opposed to conscription, and I am still opposed to conscription. I thought it was a bad system of administration. I was also opposed to it because I considered it the wrong way and I am still opposed to it. In the present election there are Nationalists who state that we should never participate in the wars of the Empire. I am with those, I am somewhat of a Nationalist myself.

Dr. Normand also said that he had always opposed conscription which he condemned vigorously saying that on that question he agreed with the Nationalist idea on the subject. Now I will not further occupy the time of the House in reading these newspapers. I have probably ten or fifteen numbers of the paper La Minerve showing the whole fight in the province of Quebec carried on by the ex-ministers—the ministers pro tem as I might call them—was on this question. The Liberals did not bring on this issue in the province of Quebec. It was the friends of the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I can quote from another copy of La Minerve a list conspicuously printed on the first page of Liberal members of the province of Quebec who were accused of having voted for the principle of conscription.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And I was one of them.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: The list sets forth the names of Messrs. Bureau, Brouillard, Bickerdike, Boivin, Bourassa, Boyer, Cardin, Deslisle, Demers, Devlin, Ethier, Fortier and so on. That was the fight that was waged by friends of hon. gentlemen opposite in the province of Quebec in the last election. How different from the fight conducted in 1917 when the Liberals were accused of being friends of the Kaiser and not willing to do their duty in the war. I will not say anything further, but I am sure my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition will not insist upon any more quotations, and will be a little more chary about issuing challenges in future.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have never contended, and have never even said, that the ministers who came into the Government had been or were in favour of conscription.

Mr. DUFF: But you took them into the Cabinet.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Was the question of the attitude of the ministers on conscription never discussed before their entrance into the Cabinet?

Mr. N. K. LAFLAMME (Drummond-Arthabaska): The bill proposes to repeal a statute which is no longer in effect, because it is exhausted. The Government takes that view and so does the leader of the Opposition. That is also the opinion of the law officers. Surely the war was concluded by the ratification of the three Treaties, Versailles, St. Germain and Sèvres. There is nothing for us to discuss here, so why bring such a question before the House. The discussion will not advance the business of the House one iota. Its only effect is to transfer to this Chamber—for a motive I am unable to appreciate—a debate which will have not the slightest effect upon the members of this House, whatever influence it might have if conducted from the hustings.

Mr. HENRI E. LAVIGUEUR (Quebec County): When conducting the fight in my constituency at the last election I had to face opponents who demanded of me that I should ask Parliament, if circumstances permit, to repeal the Conscription Act. At that time I happened to have as my opponent Mr. Armand Lavergne, the chief of the Nationalist party in the district of Quebec. That gentleman opposed me on the ground that I had not asked Parliament to repeal the act of 1917. Mr. Lavergne was supported in that fight by chiefs of the Conservative party, some of whom were the intimate friends of the leader of the Opposition. I told the electors at the time exactly what the hon. member who has just taken his seat has stated to the House—that the Conscription Act was dead and that there was no need to repeal a dead law. Now I am happy to have the statement I made at that time confirmed in this House by no less a person than the leader of the Opposition himself.

Mr. H. A. FORTIER (Labelle), (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I have but a few remarks to add with reference to the proposed legislation which is before this House. I do not wish to recall the unpleasant reminiscences of the last general election. The electors of the county of Labelle returned me with such a large majority that I can afford, in this instance, to be magnanimous and not take any notice of the declarations made by my opponents. I then declared in the presence of my electors that there was no necessity of a special bill for the repeal of the Military Service Act as the latter did not exist. These declarations, I believe, are absolutely identical to those made in this House by the hon. leader of the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King), and moreover by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). I still hold to this opinion as I contended before my electors, that no necessity exists to bring in a special bill for the repeal of the Conscription Act. However, seeing that the Prime Minister has given us communication of a letter of the legal adviser to the Justice Department, leading to the belief that perhaps in certain parts of the country, there seems to exist doubts on the advisability of such a bill, I emphatically declare that I am in favour of this bill, if its mover persists in submitting it to the consideration of this House. I have always been opposed to conscription, and if the measure is necessary, I shall gladly give my support to a bill which would repeal the Military Service Act of 1917.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my judgment this discussion is out of order. Any resolution presented in the House must have something positive as to its effect. If a motion is made or a bill introduced with a view to repeal legislation, that legislation must be in existence. From the opinions of the Law Officers of the House of Commons and of the Deputy Minister of Justice, and, after the opinion expressed by some of the leaders on both sides, I come to the conclusion that the Military Service Act, 1917, cannot be repealed, because it has exhausted itself, and is considered as non-existent at present in the statutes. Therefore I give it as my opinion that this bill should be dropped and that the discussion should not proceed and I so rule.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Militia and Defence) moved that the House to-morrow go into Committee of the Whole on the following proposed resolution:

Resolved—1. That it is expedient to bring in a measure to create a department of the Government of Canada to be called the Department of National Defence, over which a Minister of the Crown shall preside who shall be the Minister of National Defence.

2. That the Minister shall be charged with all matters relating to Defence, including the Militia, the Military, Naval, Air and Police Services of Canada.

3. That there shall be a Deputy Minister of National Defence who shall be appointed by the Governor in Council, and hold office during pleasure, and such officers may be appointed as are necessary for the carrying on of the business of the department.

4. That the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Minister may appoint an officer who shall, in relation to the Naval Service exercise all the powers and duties vested in the Deputy Minister of the Naval Service by or under The Naval Service Act, and who shall have the rank and salary of a Deputy Head of a department, and shall be a member of the Defence Council.

5. That the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Minister may appoint an officer to be known as Comptroller, who under the Deputy Minister of National Defence, shall be charged with all financial matters pertaining to the Department of National Defence.

[Mr. Fortier.]

6. That any person whose position is abolished on the coming into force of the Act to be based upon these Resolutions may, on the recommendation of the Minister, be appointed by the Governor in Council to such position in the Department and with such rank, title and salary as shall be prescribed.

7. That if any person is removed from office or an appointment in consequence of the abolition of his office or his appointment by the Act based upon these Resolutions or by any order or regulation thereunder, or is retired within two years after the coming into force of the said Act, the Governor in Council may grant him a gratuity, retiring or superannuation allowance, or pension not exceeding such as he would have been entitled or eligible to receive if he had been retired under the provisions of any Act applicable to him, after adding from one to three years, as the Governor in Council may deem advisable, to his actual term of service.

8. That provision be made to vest the powers, duties and functions vested in the Ministers and Deputy Ministers under the various Acts relating to the Naval Service, the Militia, Militia Pensions, the Royal Military College, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Dominion Police, in the Minister of National Defence and the Deputy Minister of National Defence respectively:—Provided that the powers vested in the Deputy Minister of the Naval Service under the Naval Service Act shall be exercised by the officer appointed for that purpose as aforesaid.

9. That provision be made to constitute a Defence Council to advise the Minister on all matters of Defence, including or relating to the Militia, the Military, Naval, Air and Police Services of Canada, and on all matters referred to it by the Minister, and to perform such other duties as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council.

He said: I beg to inform the House that His Excellency the Governor General having been apprised of the subject matter of the resolution commends it to the consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—AGRICULTURE

House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Department of Agriculture:—
Salaries..	$ 640,717 50
Contingencies..	135,000 00

Mr. SPENCER: On page 87 there is an item, "Chief, sheep and goat division, $3,210." Will the minister tell me what the duties of this gentleman are?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): That gentleman has charge of the marketing of these animals and the development of new strains or breeds. It may seem strange to my hon. friend that we should be raising goats in our country, but we are. They are in use, sometimes for milk purposes, as well as for their meat.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it would be opportune now if the Minister of Agriculture would give us an explanation of an appointment which has been made in his department to a post that it had not been considered necessary to fill for some time, and the making of which, so far as any information I have goes, was wholly against the provision, the spirit, if not, indeed, the letter of the Civil Service Act. I refer to the appointment of Mr. Duncan Marshall to the position of Commissioner of Agriculture. The Civil Service Commission classified this position and fixed the maximum salary, I think, at $4,200. Even with the classification there, owing to the fact that the Agricultural Instruction Act had got wholly under way, there was no very great difficulty to be encountered in the completion of the grants to be made under that act. It was not considered necessary to fill the position and incur that expenditure, because the officers of the department felt themselves wholly capable of taking care of all the work that had been done previously by the commissioner. Notwithstanding this the present Government has appointed a Commissioner of Agriculture, and as the reports state—and I do not think it is disputed—has repealed the Civil Service recommendation as to salary, and gone beyond the maximum by about $1,800 to commence with, giving Mr. Marshall $6,000 a year at the public expense. I believe that in relation to certain subjects in his department we have had the spectacle lately of the deputy minister—who by the way draws only $6,000 himself—having an officer under him drawing the same salary. I do not know whether the minister counts the Commissioner of Agriculture under the deputy minister or not. Possibly there are two executive heads in his department. We have had the spectacle of these two officers giving diametrically opposite statements as to matters affecting the department in relation to the embargo. I think the House is entitled to an explanation as to why they saw fit to fasten this charge on the public, and whether or not it was on the recommendation of the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, a most efficient officer.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is a matter that does not come under the head of civil government as Mr. Mashall's salary is dealt with in the estimate for the administration of the Agricultural Instruction Act. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, however, I will be very pleased to give the explanation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How does the minister justify taking an officer's salary, which is a civil government matter, out of civil government, and putting it under the other estimate?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Mr. Duncan Marshall has not been appointed Commissioner of Agriculture at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What position has he been appointed to?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If I have the permission of the Chair, I will read the Order in Council, and probably that will speak for itself. I may say that I think answers to questions in regard to this matter were tabled to-day: This is the Order in Council:

> The Committee of the Privy Council have had before them a report, dated 1st February, 1922, from the Minister of Agriculture, submitting that the Agricultural Instruction Act under which the sum of $1,100,000 annually has been granted to the Provincial Departments of Agriculture for the purpose of aiding agricultural instruction in the provinces expires March 31st, 1923.
> The minister states that in view of the extraordinary and exceptional conditions in the agricultural world it is highly desirable that an investigation be made into the advisability of the continuation, discontinuation or emendation of the provisions of this Act; the amounts to be paid, and the methods of calculating such amounts in the event of its extension; and the scope of the work of the provinces to be undertaken with the assistance of funds provided thereunder.
>
> It is considered advisable that a commissioner be appointed under section 38c of the Civil Service Act as amended by chapter 22 of the Statutes of 1921, to conduct the investigation indicated above, and to inquire into such other agricultural problems as may be desirable and necessary.
>
> The minister, therefore recommends that Mr. Duncan Marshall, of Olds, Alberta, be appointed as a commissioner for the above purpose, and to perform such other duties of a cognate nature as may be delegated to him.
>
> The minister further recommends that Mr. Marshall be paid a salary at the rate of $6,000 per annum, said salary to be paid from the appropriation provided for the administration of the Agricultural Instruction Act and that this appointment date from January 15, 1922.
>
> The committee concur in the foregoing recommendations and submit the same for approval.

I will read simply that part of section 38-c, beginning within five lines of the bottom, which has to do more particularly with the subject under consideration:

> Nothing in this Act shall affect the powers of the Governor in Council with respect to the appointment of any commissioner or other member of any Royal or other commission or board, or any deputy head.

The appointment was made under that section, not as Commissioner of Agriculture, but as a commissioner to make certain investigations with respect to the continuance, or non-continuance or amendment of the Agricultural Instruction Act. That is what he is engaged in doing now, and I hope we shall have his report in time to determine what will be the character of the legislation. The hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), in his speech on the Address, referred to the absence of any reference to this. We are contemplating bringing down legislation; but before doing so, we shall have the special report stating how this legislation can be improved or extended, or whether it should be left just the way it is.

Mr. CRERAR: Am I to gather from my hon. friend's remarks that this question is not a permanent one?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is a temporary appointment.

Mr. CRERAR: How long is it expected to last?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: About six months, probably.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister of course, could not help noticing, as he read the Order in Council, that the duties assigned to Mr. Marshall are just the duties that would be performed by the Commissioner of the Agricultural Education Branch, were he appointed to fill that office for which the Civil Service Commission fixes a salary of $4,200 a year only. Did Mr. Marshall, as part of his duties in this office, make a trip to Mexico recently?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: He has not been here for two or three weeks.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was the trip to Mexico a part of the investigation into the Agricultural Education Branch?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was it a trip at the public expense?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: So far as I know, he did not go to Mexico.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Was it Florida? Was his trip there part of his duties under the Order in Council?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That was not amongst his duties enumerated in the Order in Council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did he take that trip as a public official, or was it a private job?

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When the right hon. gentleman has finished, I will endeavour to answer his question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the first question. The next is this. Surely the minister does not contend that that section of the Civil Service Act can be utilized merely by giving a man another name as an excuse for giving him another salary.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: With respect to Mr. Marshall's duties, apart from the investigation into the working of the Agricultural Instruction Act, I may say that he is conducting an investigation with respect to the exhibition grant throughout Canada. As my right hon. friend knows, in the past about $180,000 have been paid by the Dominion Department of Agriculture by way of exhibition grants. That seems a large sum of money, and he is conducting a special inquiry as to how much those grants can be reduced without materially affecting the success of those exhibitions. Another matter is the question of the working out of the "accredited herd" policy of the present Government. This work is being taken up with great vigour; the amount of money set aside in the past for it has not been sufficient to meet the situation, and certain amendments are under consideration. I might point out that no herds under twelve in number have been inspected, and the result has been that complaints have been made about discrimination in favour of the man with the big herd, inasmuch as the man with the small herd does not come within the scope of the act. When Mr. Marshall comes back and completes his report with respect to these matters, as I hope he will be able to do in the course of two or three weeks, we have under consideration sending him to some South American countries, either Argentine, or Brazil, or Chili, or probably them all, this matter depending on the information which we get from the Department of Trade and Commerce as to which of these countries will prove, at the present time, the best market for our pure-bred herds that just now have difficulty in finding a market. As my right hon. friend and the committee know, the foot-and-mouth disease, that is so prevalent in the old country at this time, makes it impossible for any of these countries to get their breeding animals from the usual source in the United Kingdom. It was, therefore, thought that this would be a good time to set up a market for our pure-bred animals in these countries, and that we might possibly be able to continue it. Their business relations with Canada are good at the present time, and as they are not able to get pure-bred animals from the United Kingdom, we thought it would be a fortunate time to send one or two representatives of this department to these South American countries with the object that I have stated in view. Mr. Duncan Marshall, when he returns, with probably another gentleman, Mr. Dryden, will be delegated, if the information we get from the Department of Trade and Commerce justifies us in sending them, to these South American countries to open up a market more particularly for pure-bred animals.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What was his last trip in connection with?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: With regard to Florida, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) and I sometimes exchange the work of our men. If the right hon. gentleman had been in the Chamber on Friday evening, he would have heard how we lent some of our entomologists to the Interior Department. Some of them went out in scouting parties and in aeroplanes to guide the lumbermen in directing their operations and in taking care of their lumber areas that are menaced by the spruce bud worm. There was a large exhibition in Florida, where the Department of the Interior was represented by Mr. Marshall, who did some work in connection with immigration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should like the minister to take a note and, when he hears of any immigrant coming from that district, let me know. Evidently Mr. Marshall is in for a good time. I believe Chili comes next, then the Bermudas, and so on. Will that expedition to Chili be for immigration, or in the interests of pure bred stock?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I thought I made that plain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The South American trips would be in the interest of the Department of Agriculture. I am afraid that six months will go by without much study into the question of the continuance of agricultural grants.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I am sorry if my right hon. friend has never heard of the prospects of the live stock markets in the Argentine, in Chili or in Patagonia. There is an exceedingly good prospect there for pure bred animals, especially as they are not available in Great Britain, where they were formerly got.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is not that the work of the trade commissioners? If the trade commissioners are not good enough, would it not be better to have Mr. Marshall appointed under the Department of Trade and Commerce and be paid a salary for this sort of work?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: You could do it that way, but inasmuch as Messrs. Marshall and Dryden are both practical, first class live stock men, it was thought that they would be as successful as anyone else.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The salary limit was pretty low under the Civil Service Commission. That question came up too, I suppose.

Mr. BRETHEN: I think it is quite well understood that some of the countries that have been mentioned—the Argentine and Chili—are already in the market for Canadian pure bred stock. They have already purchased our stock. Why have the Commissioner of Agriculture and Mr. Dryden been selected to form the committee? It is well known that both of these gentlemen are competent and are zealous in looking after the interests of beef breeds of cattle; but why have not the dairy interests been considered? It is dairy cattle that have been going to Chili and to the Argentine, and I cannot see why there should not be some one to represent the dairy breeds, which, I think we all agree, are quite as important in Canada as the beef breeds.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Neither Mr. Marshall nor Mr. Dryden is unfamiliar with the dairy interests. It is true that they have paid more attention to beef cattle, but in regard to any one whom we might appoint the question might be asked: Why not appoint some one else? Judging from the nature of questions on the Order Paper, one might be inclined to think that it was something different that some hon. members had in view. The question is asked, for instance: Was one of these gentlemen a defeated candidate? I do not see that that has anything to do with this subject. If any hon. gentleman thinks it has, let him ask the question.

Mr. HANSON: Is not Mr. Duncan Marshall himself a large grower of beef cattle, and will he be prohibited from doing business on his own acount while travelling as a representative of the Goverment. He might have an eye for the main chance, and the minister might say whether there will be an express prohibition against his doing business in his own behalf.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand from the newspaper reports that Mr. Marshall has sold out his live stock and has rented his place. He is therefore completely at liberty to represent the Government. I do not know what his future plans may be, but I learn from the newspapers that he has disposed of his stock.

Mr. TOLMIE: I endorse what my hon. friend (Mr. Brethen) has said with regard to the necessity for including an expert dairyman in the delegation which is going to South America to secure more trade for Canadian breeders of cattle. While both the gentlemen mentioned are well known and of great ability, we must remember that they have both specialised of late years in the beef cattle industry. It is well known that our dairy herds have been developed to a very high point indeed. In fact, we are producing certain specimens of dairy breeds that are among the very best in the world. We also know that there is a tremendous development of the dairy industry in South America, particularly in the Argentine. That country has been making very rapid strides of late years in the production of dairy breeds, and their products are shipped to Great Britain in competition with our own. I think therefore that the minister would be well advised if, in that delegation, he included an expert dairyman to explain to the people of the Argentine the benefits to be derived from the importation of Canadian dairy breeds. I am greatly interested in what the minister has to say with regard to the accredited herd system. This system is costing a great deal of money, but I think that it is accomplishing considerable good in Canada in eradicating tuberculosis from our herds. As we all know, tuberculosis has been making alarming progress, affecting not only cattle but hogs, and this is shown in our abattoir inspections. In the past the accredited herd system has been conducted largely through the minister, the deputy minister and the veterinary director general. I do not quite appreciate the reason for appointing a man, who is not a veterinarian, for the purpose of reporting upon this kind of work. I used to think that the old combination worked well indeed, and if there was any fault to be found with it, it was the barrier that we encountered when we went to the Minister of Finance for further assistance. The old combination worked well enough, and I do not think it is necessary to make any change now. Is it the intention to renew the fund, under the Agricultural Instruction Act, which will run out at an early date; and, will approximately the same sum of money be appropriated for the purpose for which that fund was provided? Does the Government intend to disburse that money in the way it has been spent during the past ten years, namely, by the provinces with a slight control exercised by the federal authorities? I should like to know also if the expenditure for agricultural grants for fairs has been cut down this year. These grants have done a great deal of good in developing exhibitions throughout the country, and I do not think that there is any particular agency that has rendered a greater service to the pure bred live stock business of Canada and the cattle industry generally than the encouragement of these exhibitions. The reduction in grants will not be felt to any great extent by the larger exhibitions, but the smaller and medium sized fairs that obtain grants from the department will suffer considerably as a result of a cut, I understand, of 50 per cent now under contemplation. On behalf of the exhibitions throughout the country from coast to coast, I would ask the minister to consider this point carefully and try to make the reduction less in the case of the smaller exhibitions than in the case of the larger ones that will not feel the reduction to the same extent. By following such a course he would let down the smaller exhibitions gently, so to speak, and would not interfere unduly with the work that they have carried on. The plans for these exhibitions are prepared in most cases, about a year in advance, and if a severe cut in their grant is made without warning, they may be involved in serious difficulties, particularly if bad weather is encountered and the gate receipts are much smaller than in former years.

Mr. WARNER: Was it through Mr. Marshall's recommendation that the reduction in these grants was made?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Should Mr. Marshall's report indicate that injustice is being done to these exhibitions, the matter may be considered as reopened. I understood when we decided on the reduction of these grants that all the exhibition managers had been notified of the intended reductions from six months to a year ago. There is some doubt, however, about the accuracy of my information in that respect, and should Mr. Marshall's report indicate that hardship would follow as a result of these cuts, there will be an opportunity of reconsidering the matter when we come to the vote in the Supplementary Estimates. In the Finance Minister's absence, of course, I do not want to say anything about the Supplementary Estimates that will startle him, but at least the matter can be considered. The member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie) knows as well as I do that large sums of money have been handed out to exhibitions all over Canada during the last three or four years. There is no use in talking economy about a $2,000 civil servant, and then handing out $180,000 to these big exhibitions. There is no sense in that sort of thing. We have a certain amount for agriculture; what is the best way to spend it? Do we get as much value out of this expenditure as we would get out of $180,000 spent for other purposes. That is what we have to determine. In my opinion we get less value from the money granted to these exhibitions than we do from any other expenditure that is made in the Department of Agriculture. If we made the grant the same as before, I am sure my secretaries and stenographers would be saved a good deal of trouble in answering telegrams and inquiries of all kinds; but in my judgment a substantial reduction is justified. As I have intimated, however, if it is found that the exhibition managers did not get proper notice, as I understod they did a year ago, the matter will be looked into, and possibly we might make the reduction only twenty per cent this year, with a further cut next year.

Another very proper question was put to me by the hon. gentleman who was my very capable predecessor—and I want to pay tribute to him; I found the department particularly the live stock branch, in excellent shape when I took office, and consider myself fortunate in being able to step into it. Now the hon. gentleman asked why Mr. Marshall interfered—I am not sure that is the word he used—with the accredited herds. That is a matter which has been left largely to the veterinarians. Only those who have had their animals tested and found to their dismay that they were affected with tuberculosis and had to be destroyed, know what it feels like. There is a good deal of feeling throughout the country that the tuberculin test is not the last word with respect to the diagnosis and treatment of this disease, and the view prevails that there ought to be some representation of the man whose herds are proposed to be slaughtered. Both Duncan Marshall and myself know what it is, experimentally, to have one's herds slaughtered on account of tuberculosis, and there is no doubt that those who own the cattle should be represented in such an important matter,—not merely the veterinarians, much as I may think of them. I may say in this connection that investigations are being made in Europe with a view to discovering some serum or vaccine or antitoxin that will take care of this disease by immunizing the animals when they are young, just as is done in the case of blackleg. If you could not treat blackleg when the animals are young, the mortality would be much greater than it is. Some progress has been made in that investigation. It is not one of the matters that I intended to have Duncan Marshall deal with, but what I do want him to get at is the viewpoint of the man who owns the herds. There is another point in this connection: the man who has only three or four head of cattle who is exempted from the operations of the accredited herd regulations wants to know why the big man should have access to this accredited herd money while he has not. These are some of the reasons why we want this matter inquired into, and I do not know any better man to do it than Duncan Marshall. He is himself a stock raiser; he has had his herds infected by tuberculosis, and has been co-operating with the federal Department of Agriculture in the administration of the Agricultural Instruction Act.

Mr. MANION: What exhibitions are qualified to receive the federal grant, and on what grounds are they so qualified?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I cannot have my whole staff here to deal with these various matters; this is the result of our getting away from the civil government estimates and into the matter of exhibitions. However, I can tell my hon. friend offhand that in Saskatchewan seven cities and towns receive grants from the federal treasury, amounting to almost a fabulous sum. As to Ontario, the city of Ottawa, for instance, gets a grant. I read in one of the morning papers the other day that the Ottawa fair had a surplus of $10,000 as a result of last year's operations, and that another exhibition had a surplus of $14,000. In the West, large salaries are being paid to the managers of exhibitions, in some cases as much as $10,000 a year, where large grants are given by the Dominion as well as by the province. These $10,000 salaries are somewhat large compared with Mr. Marshall's modest $6,000, and in view of the surpluses which these exhibitions have in many cases it seems to me that with the exchequer in its present condition, a continuance of the usual large grants would be a little too prodigal.

Mr. MANION: Can my hon. friend give me the qualifications which entitle these exhibitions to grants?

Mr. CHAPLIN: If this matter comes up under another item, why should we discuss it under the civil government?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have here the statement of conditions under which grants were made to summer and fall exhibitions for the year 1922. There would be very little change this year. I might quote a few paragraphs:

Exhibition Associations whose shows are open in all live stock classes to the whole of the Dominion of Canada, will receive grants under the following conditions on the basis of the expenditure in prize money in the utility classes of live stock and poultry at their last exhibition:—

1. Fairs, which have expended at their last preceding exhibition a minimum of $4,000.00 and up to $16,000.00 of a maximum of their own money for prizes in these classes and which have not received a grant from the Dominion Department of Agriculture for the show at which this expenditure was made, shall receive the minimum grant of $1,250.00.

2. Such fairs as have not received a grant for their previous exhibition shall be entitled, in addition to the minimum grant as stated above, to a grant of 50 per cent of the expenditure over $4,000.00. The maximum grant, in no case, shall exceed $2,500.00.

3. Fairs, which shall have expended at their last preceding show a minimum of $4,000.00 and up to $16,000.00 of a maximum of their own money for prizes in these classes plus the amount of the grant received from the Department for their preceding show, shall be entitled to the minimum grant of $1,250.00.

I take the ground that we should not let them down too suddenly. They went up gradually, and we should try and arrange it so as to give the least jolt to those concerned. The matter will undoubtedly be reconsidered later on when the report of Duncan Marshall comes in, as well as that of Dr. Grisdale, who has just returned from the West.

Mr. GOULD: I have complete faith in the Minister of Agriculture spending the moneys that are voted in a proper manner. I see that the staff contains from forty-eight to fifty new members, but hon. members will remember that in the discussions concerning agriculture in this House I have always expressed the belief that the Department of Agriculture was nearer the point of starvation than any other department of the Government.

With regard to this vaccine or antitoxin, I am sure that we should approve of the expenditure. A good many members of this House will recall along with myself that there was a time in the West when our stock was not inspected, and the thought came to me as the minister was speaking of a visit he himself had from an inspector who destroyed a certain portion of his herd on the ground that they were infected with tuberculosis. I remember once an inspector came on my farm and shot horses that were supposed to be suffering from glanders. He was receiving five dollars per head for every horse that he found infected with the disease, so naturally enough he was successful in finding a goodly number roundabout that were infected. I mention this in order to emphasize that the Department of Agriculture should be provided with sufficient money to provide for proper officers, so that we shall not be subjected in the future to enormities such as those I have described. I do not think the House is really opposed to voting this money. In past years, owners have suffered materially in Canada because of the ravages of various diseases among their stock, and those diseases are becoming even more prevalent in the herds of Canada to-day.

Mr. TOLMIE: Speaking of the grants for these agricultural exhibitions, while some of them may have reached a point where they are beyond the need of assistance, it must be remembered that though we have in western Canada five or six of the best fairs on this continent, they had to be built up by assistance from both federal and provincial governments, and without that assistance they would not have been the excellent shows they are to-day.

As far as the salaries are concerned, that is a matter for arrangement by the management of each exhibition. These exhibitions do not consist altogether of agriculture; manufacturers and many other lines are represented, although the grant is made on the ground that a certain sum of money has been paid for live stock at the exhibition of the previous year, so the ten thousand dollar salary paid to the manager of one of these western exhibitions is not only for his services as manager of the live stock, but for managing the whole show.

I was interested in what the minister had to say with regard to the accredited herd system. He said that tuberculin, which is being used for the purpose of testing these cattle in the accredited herds, was not the last word in diagnosing tuberculosis. I claim that it is, so far as we know, and while we do not recognize tuberculin as an infallible agent, it is the very best we have including three tests for diagnosing tuberculosis. When we take into consideration our great loss from this disease, particularly in our abattoirs and in swine from dairy districts, I think the Government has been quite justified in the past in using the very best methods at hand for the eradication of this disease. There is a great deal to do in that direction in the future.

Wtih regard to the use of serums for immunizing, and so on, that has nothing whatever to do with the accredited herd system, but a system of experiment should be carried on along these lines whenever any agency is found that gives promise of combatting this great disease. But that has nothing to do with tuberculin as a diagnostic agent.

Mr. WARNER: I would point out that it is not possible for the fairs in the West to get the attendance or the admission fees possible in the East with its heavier settlement, and consequently it is more necessary to give assistance to the western fairs. I have had experience enough to know that if these fairs are not given the grant this year, probably many of them will be spoilt. I think they should have, at the worst, at least one year's warning before the grant is withdrawn, because they have made their arrangements on the basis of receiving the grant. They could not possibly carry on with any fair amount of success with a very much lower grant from the Dominion Government.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): There is a question I would like to ask the minister in connection with this vote and it is this: Considerable anxiety was expressed at one of our recent sittings by reason of the fact that insufficient encouragement is given to those who are deserving of promotion in the Civil Service. That being the case does the Minister of Agriculture consider it a desirable thing to give to an outsider like Mr. Duncan Marshall what the public would consider a plum in the Civil Service? Is this an encouragement to those who have worked so long and faithfully in the Civil Service?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My hon. friend has raised a very good point and it is one I considered very carefully before I made my decision. The present Government, it must be remembered, has only been in power about three months. Now it was only at the beginning of the new year, or very shortly afterwards, that it was made apparent to me that the Agricultural Instruction Act would have to be dealt with at this session of Parliament. That information came to me quite unexpectedly and quite suddenly. My staff at that time were all busily engaged; there was a convention in progress at one end of Canada with regard to a particular topic, and another convention dealing with something else at the other end of the Dominion at which our officers were in attendance. Even at the present time a number of the staff are just returning from a live stock convention at Saskatoon; and we had not at the time I refer to a single man available to take up that particular line of investigation work. My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. Tolmie) can testify if he likes that when he presided over this department the staff were all busy. They are always busy and particularly in the early months of the year. Here was the session coming on, and we wanted to deal with this question in a thorough and intelligent way; we wanted to ascertain just what the facts were. Very well, how are you going to get facts unless you send out a representative to procure them? Take my position to-night. I am without proper assistance owing to the absence of the deputy minister. It is quite true that on the civil government estimates the official who is here advising me is as good an authority as I could get; but in the matter of experimental farms and exhibitions Dr. Grisdale is the best authority available because he has been so closely identified with them. Now then, so far as the qualifications of Mr. Duncan Marshall are concerned he has been, as my hon. friend knows, a provincial Minister of Agriculture, and has worked in connection with the federal Minister of Agriculture under a signed contract each year on the administration of his quota of the moneys to be expended under the Agricultural Instruction Act, and amounting probably in the case of his province to $75,000 per annum. Mr. Marshall knows, as few other men could possibly know, the weaknesses of that act. In this connection I think there is one very pronounced weak point in the statute and it is this: Although the statute is called the Agricultural Instruction Act and under its provisions something like a total of $10,000,000 is distributed, the distribution does not take into consideration the rural population at all but is made on the straight basis of population. That is one of the weak points emphasized by Mr. Duncan Marshall. I would therefore ask who should be better qualified to investigate the conditions of an act than the one who represents a province that has suffered under the past system of distribution. I am now opening up what may be a controversial question and I do not want to continue on that line—I would rather go ahead with my estimates. However I simply wished to demonstrate the facts and establish why we selected Duncan Marshall for this particular work.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I was very much pleased to hear the minister state that Mr. Marshall's appointment was due to the fact that owing to pressure of public business at that time no men in the Civil Service were available. I am sure the minister will therefore be quite willing to give the committee the assurance that the appointment of Mr. Marshall to the position of Commissioner is merely temporary, and that as soon as possible one of the deserving members of the Civil Service will be promoted to fill it. If for no other reason than a desire to improve the morale of the service and to encourage the civil servants who are to work in conjunction and co-operation with him, he should now give us a guarantee that one of them will be appointed to the office as soon as possible.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): If I can get the attention of the minister away from the subject of exhibitions I would ask him if it is the intention of his department to put into operation this season the Dairy Grading Act which was passed during the last session of Parliament.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think my hon. friend refers to the Dairy Produce Act.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Will the minister please answer my question?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We were hoping to put the act into force the first of May so that by the time the rush of the season came on there would be as little disturbance as possible, but if so, matters will have to be greatly accelerated. The Civil Service Commission makes the necessary appointments and it may take them three or four months to do so—in fact I may not get the act into force at all for some time. Sometimes nearly a year elapses before they make appointments, so that when I speak of the date at which the act is likely to come into force I do so with that reservation in mind.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I see from the estimates that a new officer is being appointed as a "Canning Specialist." I would like to know what the duties of this new officer are?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is an appointment made at the Experimental Farm. The position is vacant now but I understand it is to be occupied by a lady who will deal with the canning of fruits and vegetables and demonstrate the various processes.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I would like to know how many of the officers of the department are connected with the Experimental Farm in Ottawa?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Do you want a list of the employees at the Experimental Farm?

Mr. CHAPLIN: I assume the minister is not going to get through with his estimates this evening, I would therefore like him to provide a list of the officers who are connected with the Central Experimental Farm. I think that is a question that relates to the civil list and I would like to discuss it. In my opinion that is one of the sources of great extravagance in Ottawa and if you want to put in the plug in the interests of economy that is a place where it ought to be done.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: At the Experimental Farm?

Mr. CHAPLIN: Yes.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It would only lead the discussion very much afield if I went into that.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I asked the question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is the specific vote.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Can the hon. gentleman answer the question?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It would take a long time.

The CHAIRMAN: Item 41 deals with the Experimental Farm, and will be found on page 92. It will come up later.

Mr. CHAPLIN: If this list goes through, I will not get the information I want when I come to the Experimental Farms.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have the list here. It will be rather slow if I pick them out. They are initialled on the left-hand margin.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I do not want the minister to take up time now. He can give me information another time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If my hon. friend would ask for a return, I think it would be the simplest way.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That would be all right.

Mr. STEVENS: The list should be prepared and brought down in its entirety.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is all here, if the committee desires it, but it would be a laborious task to pick out the information.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister says he borrowed some of his help from the Minister of the Interior. Did he ever borrow any of the astronomers from the Minister of the Interior? I inquired of that minister about his astronomers, but he never gave me the information. Has the hon. Minister of Agriculture ever borrowed any astronomers from the Minister of the Interior?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Could the hon. minister tell me if the position held by Mr. Marshall is permanent or temporary?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Temporary. He has not been appointed Commissioner of Agriculture. He has been appointed a commissioner to make a certain investigation and most assuredly it must be temporary. I should like to answer one question, asked by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie) which the hon. gentleman from East Peterborough (Mr. Brethen) referred to, namely, why both these representatives are required. These representatives were appointed to investigate markets in South America. Whether they will do this work or not will depend on whether they are available, or whether they have other work that is pressing. We have that work in mind, if we can carry it out. However, I will consider the appointment of a dairy representative to take the place of one of these gentlemen. We would like to keep down the expense as much as possible. The point is well taken, and I will be pleased to consider the advisability of having a representative of the dairy interests take the place of one of these gentlemen, inasmuch as both of these positions are tentative.

Mr. BRETHEN: Coming back to the position of the deputy minister, I desire to ask a question, but I do not know that we can hold the minister responsible, because it will probably work back to the Civil Service Commission. I should like to know why, in a department of the importance of the Department of Agriculture, the deputy minister gets $5,500, while in some of these small departments, and all the other departments, excepting one where the deputy minister gets $10,000, the salary is $6,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I may assure the hon. gentleman at the outset, that I am not going to deny responsibility in any matter. The principle of ministerial responsibility is part of our constitution, and I would like to say that a ministerial responsibility should carry the power to act. Dr. Grisdale gets a house in addition to his salary. It is not usual to put that item in the estimates. His salary is reduced in the estimates from $6,000 to $5,500, the $500 being represented by the house. He was a director of the Experimental Farm before he took this position, and one of the conditions of his taking the present position was that he would remain on the Experimental Farm.

Mr. BRETHEN: That answers my question.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Had it been as my hon. friend suggests, there would have been just ground for complaint. I hope I will have my hon. friend's assistance in making bona fide corrections in these matters. The salaries attached to these positions are so unattractive that we cannot get them filled. A process has been under way to try and get more money in order that we may get men fitted for the work.

Mr. THOMPSON: As to the grading of the dairy produce, have the regulations been drafted yet, and if so, what are they?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, there was a conference in Ottawa about two weeks ago of the dairy representatives from all parts of Canada,—cheese, butter, and wholesale interests—and they proposed regulations that they thought would work out. All the parties interested were there, including the middlemen. These regulations have not been approved either by myself or by Council. We have not yet dealt with them, but we hope to within a very short time. Possibly the cheese will be assembled at some convenient place for grading.

If it is a convenient railway centre and a large number of small factories around, we would assemble it for grading. If it was a large factory with a large output we would grade it right in the factory. The regulations will come to me when they are licked into shape, I will go over them, and they will be finally approved. If my hon. friend has any representations to make in regard to this matter, I will be glad to have them. We have had before us representatives of the dairy interests of Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific, including the wholesale dealers.

Mr. LADNER: I notice by the Canadian Grocer that an official announcement has been made that the importation of oleomargarine is to be prohibited after the expiration of the present act in July next. I should like to know from the minister whether other hon. gentlemen are receiving communications of the kind or not. I know I have received communications from urban centres in western Canada where oleomargarine is used, and I would like to know whether it is the intention of the Government to continue the act by which the importation and manufacture of oleomargarine under regulations may be carried on.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think permission to import and manufacture expires on the first of September. So far as I am concerned, it can expire forever.

Mr. LADNER: Undoubtedly the minister has given some consideration to the matter. It is a very important one for the people, both consumers and producers. Do I understand you to say it is the policy of the Government not to allow importation when the act expires.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I thought I made it quite plain that the Government had not dealt with the matter. It is a few months ahead, and we are so pressed with our daily duties that we meet questions when we come to them. We do not cross the bridge until we come to it. I have not discussed it, even with my colleagues. I could not give an official reply, inasmuch as it must be the policy of the Government. I have given my personal views, and I do not think it necessary to elaborate them at this time.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): I understood the minister to say that the grant for exhibitions would be cut down, and in his statement he said something about associations making large surpluses and the managers claiming large salaries. I might say, with regard to the fair at Ottawa, that the grant from the federal government was $5,000 and, according to newspaper reports, it is to be cut by $2,000. The outcome of that will be that the prizes that the live stock men receive will be cut down by just that much, and they are the ones who are getting the big benefit of this federal grant. For instance, according to our fair in Ottawa last year, if a man showing horses paid a dollar for entry money, he got eight dollars out in prize money; if a man showing cattle paid a dollar for entry money, he got seven dollars out in prize money; if a man showing sheep paid a dollar for entry money, he got five dollars out in prize money; if a man showing poultry paid a dollar for entry money, he got three dollars out in prize money. The outcome of this policy will be that this prize money will be reduced proportionately by $2,000, and that will be a hardship, not so much on the fair board as on men who are exhibiting stock.

Mr. MILNE: I notice in this estimate that we have fourteen statisticians. If we do not already have enough statisticians to carry out the work of the department, we soon should have. I notice we have five animal pathologists and two plant pathologists. Where are their laboratories, and do they co-operate with gentlemen who are doing the same work in the provinces?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: With regard to the animal pathologists, we have laboratories at Ottawa. Dr. Watson has charge of the whole of this work, and a large number of serums and antitoxins are made in the laboratories. Some of the provinces have laboratories, but they find it more economical to import serums and antitoxins or to ship them in from large centres. I had the pleasure of meeting some of the gentlemen engaged in this work. As a matter of fact, I do not know where one-half of the buildings are that contain the staff of my department. There are eleven buildings, I think, and when I get time, I shall avail myself of the opportunity of, at least, finding out where they are. The statisticians are engaged in compiling statistics for filing purposes, for library purposes and, more particularly, for market purposes. I can assure the committee that, so far as I know, there are no drones around the department, and I have the department just as it was handed over to me. As regards the Experimental farm, I visited the poultry plant, but I did not go all over it to see whether the staff were all on the job or loafing. I know Mr. Archibald, however, and I do not believe he is a man who would permit loafing, so that I do not think the remarks along that line were warranted. But there is nothing so good that it cannot be improved, and we have had some valuable contributions and good suggestions this evening. I like the suggestion that was made about a dairy representative going down to explore the possibilities of South America in connection with the dairy breed of cattle. No branch of agriculture is getting so hard hit to-day as dairying.

Mr. MILNE: I do not believe the minister quite understood my question. Do these investigators under the federal department co-operate with investigators under the provincial departments, or, when they are investigating, do they simply walk indiscriminately all over the field?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There is co-operation and there should be a good deal more, but it is not an easy task to undertake. The hon. member for Victoria city (Mr. Tolmie) and the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) were not long at their work until they realised the necessity of more co-operation between provincial and federal departments. I thank my hon. friend, because that is one of the works of my special messenger in the person of Mr. Duncan Marshall, namely, to see if we cannot cut out some of the overlapping, particularly in the live stock branch. It is not easy to do so, but I think it can be done. A resolution was passed last session in the Saskatchewan legislature recommending just such a policy, and it was proposed to extend it to the administration of experimental farms in that province. That opens up a big field of research, and I think a great deal can be done especially in the live stock branch where the provincial government has a live stock policy and the federal government has almost a corresponding one, with the necessary paraphernalia connected with both. Some co-operation has been effected and I hope more will be.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): What is the last item in this appropriation, $4,000, for new positions and promotions?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I explained that the other night, and that is the saving feature of all these items. New positions may be found necessary between now and next year, and if it is found that some of these salaries are not sufficiently attractive to secure applicants, we shall have to ask the Civil Service Commission to regrade these positions at higher salaries. If that is done, some source will have to be provided from which to get the additional money, and that is what this sum of $4,000 is for. It is quite necessary, and a safeguard in the whole business.

Mr. CALDWELL: Did I understand the minister to say that his policy is to cut off grants for agricultural exhibitions?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: No, my first proposal was to reduce them, on the ground that I understood the associations had all been notified a year ago that these grants had been so generous during the war that they ran up in the aggregate to $180,000, and they would be cut down. I am not criticising the grants adversely. During the war, when there were so many calls on individuals for various purposes, it was found advisable by the then government to give substantial additional grants for these shows. I understood from my officials that the associations have been notified that the grants would be cut down, and the proposition was to cut them in two with due notice. I find they all claim now that they were not notified, and it is quite possible that we may be able to modify our proposal when we come to the Supplementary Estimates. If subsequent reports indicate that there is going to be a severe strain on these fairs as a result of cutting the grants in two, at the beginning we may start with a cut of 20 per cent, and gradually make further reductions, but we can consider the matter further when we come to the Supplementary Estimates. I cannot give any assurance that this will be done; I shall have to wait and ascertain what the reports are. If my hon. friend ever tried to reduce the grants to agricultural societies he would find it a difficuut job. Someone has to stand up and advocate it. At the same time I do not want to be harsh or unjust to the institutions that have their programmes prepared for the coming summer.

Mr. THOMPSON: Will the regulations with regard to the grading of dairy products be considered by this House before they are finally adopted? If not, I want to express the views of my constituency, which is the second largest cheese producing county in the Dominion. The people I represent are absolutely opposed to the grading of cheese being done in Montreal, as proposed by the minister. For years we have had a system whereby the cheese is inspected at cheese factories, which are large and commodious; and the work of inspection has been carried on satisfactorily and with the best results. I was present at meetings held at Peterborough, Campbellford, Stirling, Picton, Belleville and Madoc, and while I am not speaking for any place outside of my own constituency, I can say that resolutions have been passed at all of these cheese boards absolutely opposing the grading in Montreal. Copies of these resolutions have been sent to the minister asking that the grading be done in the cheese factories. The people believe that this system which has worked satisfactorily in the past, is very much better than the one now proposed. The man buys his cheese and inspects it at the factory, and there is a proviso in the regulations that if there is any dispute between buyer and seller, the instructor of the district, who is a disinterested party, shall act as sole arbitrator, his decision being final. This system has given every satisfaction and the people are therefore unanimously opposed to the proposal to send the cheese to Montreal for inspection and grading. If the Government wishes to carry on grading they do not offer any objection, although they do not see the need for it; but they do certainly oppose strenuously the attempt to change the system and send the cheese to Montreal. Besides the convenience there is in inspecting the cheese at the factory, there is this fact, which is of considerable importance, that when the inspection is done under the eyes of the cheese maker, defects can be pointed out to him and he can readily remedy them.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If the hon. member has recommendations to make in regard to the regulations I shall be glad to receive them, but I think that the inspection in the past was done principally by those interested in buying the cheese. In regard to grain, for instance, the grading is done by the buyer, where the grain is sold locally. What we want is to have a government grading of cheese. We have received some objections, but they were from the buyers of cheese. Sometimes we have had a few objections from farmers who have not understood the matter; but as a matter of fact no change is ever introduced without some objections. The grading of butter has been practised in the West for years, with entire satisfaction, and I have no doubt that when we establish the system with regard to cheese it will be found to work satisfactorily. We have to do it whether we like it or not.

Mr. THOMPSON: The delegates from Peterborough, Campbellford, Stirling, Picton, Belleville and Madoc cheese boards, who attended the meetings which the hon. minister refers to, opposed the grading in Montreal. They represent about $10,000,000 worth of cheese exported, and their views should be considered. Whatever may have been done with regard to butter in the West is no reason for enforcing on cheese makers regulations which they do not agree with.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: On page 22, item 45 we have cold storage warehouses and dairy, and we should discuss this matter under that item.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): Under what item does poultry inspection, in regard to record performance, appear?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: On page 87. This comes under "Chief, Poultry Division." In some cases we have two sets of what appear to be the same officials, one for the Experimental Farm here, and another for outside work at some other experimental farm.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): The inspectors to which I have reference are not in connection with any experimental farm, either in Ottawa or anywhere else. They go to the individual farms that participate in the contest. Last year there were some 11,000 birds entered.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The inspectors of poultry are paid out of the live stock vote on page 22. These are civil government estimates.

Mr. TOLMIE: While I heartily sympathise with the minister in his desire to increase salaries—because I know very well that some of the experts are not as well paid as they should be—still I note in the last item on page 89 the sum of $4,000 for new positions and promotions. Is this in accordance with the Civil Service Act, and did the minister consult the Department of Justice before including this item in the Estimates?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I hope to be able to prevail on the Civil Service Commission to increase salaries to get the right men. The Plant Pathologist whom we hope to get I do not believe will be attracted by the salary offered. We shall go to the commission and make out a case for better salaries.

Mr. COOTE: There is an increase in travelling expenses from $75,000 to $85,000. Does the minister really think that his department is justified in asking for an increase of $10,000, particularly when we expect railway rates to come down? If any part of this $10,000 is to be incurred on trips to the Argentine or Chili, I think he should ask the Department of Trade and Commerce to reimburse him to that extent. I believe that we have trade commissioners in South America, and if the Department of Agriculture sends specialists there, it is only fair for the minister of that department to ask the Department of Trade and Commerce to shoulder that expense.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have explained that; possibly the hon. member was not in the Chamber at the time. Almost every year representatives of the department have to attend meetings or conferences overseas. The Agricultural Institute meets at Rome this year; it has to do with the compilation of farm statistics from all over the world. That accounts for a considerable amount of the $10,000 for this year. In addition, the travelling expenses of a number of officers in the administrative branches have been transferred to this vote, augmenting the amount to that extent.

Mr. CHAPLIN: In respect to the item of $4,000 for new positions and promotions, I notice on page 88 that increases of salary are provided for thirty-six positions, while five or six remain at the same amount. Why, then, should there be provision for this $4,000 also?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If my hon. friend refers to some getting increases and others not, I may point out that it depends upon what stage of the salary range they have reached. If at the top, they stay there until put into a higher grade by the Civil Service Commission; if at the bottom or somewhere between the bottom and the top, they go up according to the classification.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Why is it necessary to provide for $4,000 for possible further increases?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Because these salaries may not attract the men we want. As a matter of fact, some of them will not.

Mr. LADNER: What new positions are contemplated in this vote of $4,000?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: These figures, of course, are estimates; the amount is an approximation. There may be some outbreak which the Entomological branch will have to deal with; if the season is hot and dry, invasions of insects are possible and may come overnight. I do not anticipate that there will be many new positions, and I hope there will be sufficient extensions of salaries to get the positions all filled. If the money is not required it will not be spent.

Item agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS: I think we have done pretty well; we might adjourn.

Mr. FIELDING: Very well.

On the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

The House met at three o'clock.

MARKETING OF WHEAT

SECOND AND THIRD REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE

Mr. W. F. KAY (Missisquoi) presented the second report of the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization, as follows:

That without delaying investigation by this committee as to the advisability of the re-establishment of the Canada Wheat Board, the matter of the constitutionality of such re-establishment be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada and that every effort be made to secure decision at an early date.

Also the third report of said committee, reading as follows:

That the reference to the committee of the memorandum of Council of Agriculture be enlarged, and that the committee be instructed to consider also the suggestion of a "Voluntary Pool" under control of the Government and working in conjunction with the elevator system now owned by the Government, and also the proposal of marketing of the wheat crop by the co-operative system, and to report to the House its finding.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Militia and Defence) moved that the House go into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

1. That it is expedient to bring in a measure to create a department of the Government of Canada to be called the Department of National Defence, over which a Minister of the Crown shall preside who shall be the Minister of National Defence.

2. That the minister shall be charged with all matters relating to Defence, including the Militia, the Military, Naval, Air and Police Services of Canada.

3. That there shall be a Deputy Minister of National Defence who shall be appointed by the Governor in Council, and hold office during pleasure, and such officers may be appointed as are necessary for the carrying on of the business of the department.

4. That the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the Minister may appoint an officer who shall, in relation to the Naval Service exercise all the powers and duties vested in the Deputy Minister of the Naval Service by or under The Naval Service Act, and who shall have the rank and salary of a deputy head of a department, and shall be a member of the Defence Council.

5. That the Governor in Council on the recommendation of the minister may appoint an officer to be known as Comptroller, who under the Deputy Minister of National Defence, shall be charged with all financial matters pertaining to the Department of National Defence.

6. That any person whose position is abolished on the coming into force of the Act to be based upon these resolutions may, on the recommendation of the minister, be appointed by the Governor in Council to such position in the department and with such rank, title and salary as shall be prescribed.

7. That if any person is removed from office or an appointment in consequence of the abolition of his office or his appointment by the Act based upon these resolutions or by any order or regulation thereunder, or is retired within two years after the coming into force of the said Act, the Governor in Council may grant him a gratuity, retiring or superannuation allowance, or pension not exceeding such as he would have been entitled or eligible to receive if he had been retired under the provisions of any Act applicable to him, after adding from one to three years, as the Governor in Council may deem advisable, to his actual term of service.

8. That provision be made to vest the powers, duties and functions vested in the ministers and deputy ministers under the various Acts relating to the Naval Service, the Militia, Militia Pensions, the Royal Military College, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Dominion Police, in the Minister of National Defence and the Deputy Minister of National Defence respectively:—Provided that the powers vested in the Deputy Minister of the Naval Service under the Naval Service Act shall be exercised by the officer appointed for that purpose as aforesaid.

9. That provision be made to constitute a Defence Council to advise the minister on all matters of defence, including or relating to the Militia, the Military, Naval, Air and Police Services of Canada, and on all matters referred to it by the minister, and to perform such other duties as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council.

He said: Although the statement appears in Hansard that His Excellency the Governor General has been apprised of the subject matter of this resolution and commends it to the consideration of the House, it does not appear in the Votes and Proceedings.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think a few words of explanation from the minister would not be out of place at the present time with regard to this important resolution.

Mr. GRAHAM: I proposed to make a statement on moving the second reading of the bill.

Mr. McMASTER: We cannot hear at this end of the Chamber.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is the first time I was ever accused of speaking in too low a tone. I am quite willing to make a short explanation now as to the object of this resolution; but I shall reserve the further and more detailed statement until the motion for the second reading of the bill.

As hon. members know, announcement was made some weeks ago that it was the intention of the Government to bring under one ministerial head what might properly be termed the defence forces of Canada. There are four branches,—the Militia, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Naval Service and the Air Service. The object of the present resolution, and of the bill to be founded on it, is to bring these branches under one ministerial head, in the hope of thereby promoting efficiency and economy. It is a fair question to ask: In what direction does the Government expect to promote economy? I will just mention one phase of the matter which I think will appeal to every member of the House. In all these branches there are quite a large number of temporary employees. Now the word "temporary" used in this connection has not the significance we usually apply to the term. A clerk in one of these departments, or in any other department, may be properly termed temporary though he or she may have been in such department for years. The fact may be that they have failed to pass the necessary examination entitling them to become permanent employees, or even some may have passed such examination and still not have been made permanent under the act. Now, in the departments referred to there are a large number of temporary employees, and the Government hope that by the amalgamation of the different branches in question the services can be approximately carried on by the permanent staff. If our hope in that direction be realized, I think there would be a saving on this account alone of between seven hundred thousand and a million dollars per annum. Then there are other directions, I think, in which economy can be promoted; for example in the amalgamation of the various executive forces of these different branches, those engaged in buying and selling—what we call the purchasing departments—and other services of this nature. By amalgamation it is hoped that we can do the business just as well, or perhaps a little better, with a smaller staff. There is a question involved in the uniting of these branches that is a difficult one to solve. Hon. members who have been ministerial heads of departments will perhaps appreciate the fact more thoroughly than those who have not held such a trying position. There are not a few semi-heads of branches, including men quite prominent in the land, splendid men, whom it will be perhaps a little difficult to establish under the new organization; but I am taking the House into my confidence when I say that I will endeavour, as far as possible, to see that in the carrying out of the new organization no injustice will be done to these men who have given years of service to the public. I do not know that it would be wise, or even necessary, at this stage to enter upon a consideration of the details of what is proposed. I think it would be more satisfactory to do that when the bill has been printed and placed in its entirety in the hands of hon. members.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Has the Minister made provision for these changes in the Estimates that are before the House?

Mr. GRAHAM: It will take months to bring about this organization; and I may say that discussing it with a gentleman, not in the employ of the Government but one who has had experience in several departments, he assured me that if it were accomplished in one year it would be good work. But the Estimates had to be prepared for the fiscal year, and we have just entered upon a new fiscal period. It has not been possible to adopt any other method in this respect than that which we have followed.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think the committee will agree that the resolution forecasts a bill which, in general, will be to the advantage of Canada; and while we cannot give to the present minister the credit for originating the idea still, I think, we may accord him full credit as the first Minister of Militia in Canada who has brought forth a concrete scheme, or proposal, for accomplishing the purpose. So far back as the year 1909 or 1910, the older members of the House will recollect, Sir Frederick Borden, then Minister of Militia and Defence in the Liberal Administration of that day, considered it would be desirable to bring together the Naval and Military services. It was at the time of the discussion in this House of the act known as the Naval Service Act of Canada, but there were difficulties in carrying out the proposal at that time and there have been difficulties since.

Mr. GRAHAM: And there are difficulties now.

Mr. GUTHRIE: In fact it has been said that the only time properly to consolidate several departments of government into one is at the beginning of a new parliament and upon the formation of a new ministry. The Naval Service section of the defence forces of Canada has heretofore always been under the Minister of Marine and Fisheries who was known also as Minister of the Naval Service. The Mounted Police were, for many years, under the jurisdiction of the President of the Council. The force is still under the President of the Privy Council, but under the late administration the holder of that portfolio was, for a time, also Minister of Immigration and Colonization. The Air Board was, I think, at its inception attached to the Department of the Secretary of State. Shortly afterwards it was transferred to the Department of Militia and Defence, but only in so far as the minister himself was named as the chairman of the board; the board did not function under the Department of Militia and Defence save in regard to the chairmanship of the Minister of Militia. In a scheme advanced by Sir Frederick Borden, and in another scheme suggested to Parliament in a report by Lord French—made, I think, in the year 1910 or 1911—the suggestion was advanced that all the military and naval forces of Canada should be brought under one department. Speaking subject to correction let me say that neither in Sir Frederick Borden's suggestion nor in Lord French's report was it proposed that the Mounted Police of Canada should be made part of the Department of National Defence. Then at a later stage, following the late war, General Sir Arthur Currie, while chief of staff in the Department of Militia, made a report and I had the pleasure and honour of discussing that report with him. It will be found, I think, in the militia report of 1920. In his report Sir Arthur Currie recommended that the military force, the naval force and the air force should be brought under one department, and also that there should be a committee of national defence in the government, but he, I think, likewise excluded the Royal Northwest Mounted Police.

We have, however, waited until the present time before taking action in regard to the matter. The proposal of the minister is to take all of our defence forces and all of our police forces not strictly of a military or naval nature and place them under one central control and in a single department of government, and by so doing the minister says—and I think he has reasonable ground for the statement—that he will to some extent reduce the expenditure in regard to national defence. I assume that that will be one of the results of the proposed action of the minister. I, for one, am very much gratified that he is taking this stand in regard to national defence. From statements made in this House last session and the session before, and from speeches made during the recent election, I feared very much that the present Government upon attaining power would not do anything in regard to national defence at all. I felt gratified when I looked over the Estimates and found that the proposals for expenditures on national defence this year were practically about what they were the year before and the year before that. It was a matter of gratification for me to see that the proposed expenditure this year in the Department of Militia is just about ten million six or seven hundred thousand dollars and I think I am within the mark when I say that all we spent in the Department of Militia last year just closed was ten million two hundred thousand or two hundred and fifty thousand or about half a million less than the proposed expenditure for this year. I feared from what I had read and heard in this House that a severe assault was to be made upon the militia system of Canada and I am greatly gratified to find that that is not the case but that substantially the Government proposes to maintain in this country what we have maintained from Confederation down to the present time. I believe it will be in the general interests of the service and of the Dominion to bring the various defence forces together as the minister proposes, but I am going to reserve, during the present discussion, from expressing any opinion in regard to the proposal to bring the Mounted Police into the Department of National Defence, as part of the defence forces of Canada. No one knows better than my hon. friend the minister (Mr. Graham) and the Government of which he is a member, that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police was originally established upon the distinct understanding that it was not to be a military but essentially a civil force. While it is true that it has always been drilled and organized upon military lines, its duties and functions have always been distinctly civil, as apart from military. The late Sir Frederick Borden did not suggest taking it in, neither did Lord French nor Sir Arthur Currie, and the ground of their refusal to suggest its being taken in was that it might be continued as a purely civil force. I do not think I am going beyond the facts when I say that the chief benefit derived in the Dominion of Canada from the Northwest Mounted Police has been in regard to civil work. It has been of tremendous advantage to this country that we have had such a force. It has been engaged in the investigation of crime, the preservation of law and order, just as an ordinary municipal police force would be, and if you now turn that purely civil into part of your military establishment or part of your national defence, you will rob that exceptional force of the distinctly civil character which it has enjoyed heretofore, and by reason of which it has been so useful from its inception to the present time.

Also, I point out to the committee at this stage that the present resolution forecasts a bill, and the bill will be brought in, in due course. The resolution and the bill, I am satisfied, are mere skeletons, they merely state that a department of national defence shall be established, but the whole machinery for the establishment and carrying on of that department is left to the Governor in Council. It is rather strange that in a short resolution such as the present one we find that in no less than six different instances the Government proposes to carry out this scheme by Order in Council. This intention on the part of the Government is even more marked in the bill than in the resolution. The Government boldly proposes to reserve to itself the right to deal with this new department, to carry on the great matter of national defence, by Order in Council. If the committee will stop to count the references in this short resolution, they will find that the Order in Council method of dealing with the matter is adopted in no less than six instances, and it occurs more frequently in the bill than it does in the resolution. For any one who sat in this Parliament during the last three sessions, and heard the members of the present Government, then in opposition, condemning in the strongest language, in season and out of season, what they called "government by order in council," it is a strange thing that the first piece of real legislation which they have to present to the House this session is merely a skeleton, and that the present Government, which formed the Opposition during the last three years, now deliberately proposes to carry out this measure under the powers which can be exercised by the Governor in Council.

I was glad to hear the minister state that it was his intention, as far as possible, to take care of the experienced members of his staff although it is quite possible that he may not require the services of them all. I think it is worth the time of the committee to give some consideration to that question. We have to-day in the Militia Department—and I can say this without any qualification—the most highly-trained men and the most thoroughly experienced military staff that we have ever had in the history of the Dominion. That is, of course, by reason of the fact that the men who are now in the commanding positions in that department were men who served with the Canadian forces throughout the great war. We have now in that department, or had until very recently, as Inspector-General, Major General Sir Henry Burstall, one of the ablest officers that the Dominion of Canada has yet produced. We have as Chief of General Staff, Major General MacBrien, as Master of Ordnance, Major General Sir Edward Morrison, as Adjutant General, Major General Elmsley, and as Quarter-master, Major General Ashton, a group of men, who, as field commanders in time of trouble, or as advisers and adminstrators in time of peace, it would be hard to surpass. These officers are all highly experienced staff officers whose places could not be easily filled in this country. Most of the men have been trained, to some extent, at the expense of the Dominion of Canada. Three, at least, of them have been sent by and at the expense of this country to the staff college in Great Britain, and they have taken brilliant courses there. They have been equipped, at the expense and for the benefit of Canada, with the highest kind of military training, and they are all yet within military age. I believe, if this bill goes through and this reorganization takes place, some of these men will have to leave the service to seek other walks of life, and I believe it is proposed to promote some juniors in the service to their positions. Is it in the interest of Canada to have specially trained officers, to spend our money to send these men to the staff college in England, and then to cast them adrift rather than to continue to utilize their services? It is of the highest importance that such men, as those whom I have enumerated, should be retained in the Militia of Canada and that their services should not be dispensed with. If it be wrong to train men and to send them to the staff college in England, let us stop doing so now; but let us have the services of those men who have heretofore been trained, not only in the staff college, but in the long and hard school in which they served during the years of the Great War.

In connection with the retirement or release of officers, there is another point which should be especially drawn to the attention of the committee, and that is the provision for their retirement. If they are to be retired, I want to see them liberally dealt with; but I do not know that the minister has adopted the right course. He is proposing to add to their years of service for the purpose of increasing their pensions. We have not been accustomed to let out our privates on that basis, and I think the 400 clerks, who were let out of the Militia Department on the first of this month, were not treated in that way. I do not know that it is a proper principle to add unserved time to time served, for the purpose of increasing pensions, but that is the power which the minister is taking under this bill.

Mr. VIEN: What other course would the hon. gentleman recommend if he wants these men to be treated generously?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would retain their services instead of putting other men in their places. We have now a Militia Council, and its place is to be taken by a Council of National Defence. This will mean that new men will be taken on or that other men will be promoted.

Mr. VIEN: The hon. gentleman said: If the department has to dispense with the services of these men, I wish the minister would treat them generously; but I do not agree with the minister in his proposal of adding to their years of service so as to increase their pensions. I put this question to the hon. gentleman. If he does not agree with the policy of adding years to their years of service for the purpose of increasing their pensions, what other course does he suggest, if we admit that their services must be dispensed with?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not admit that their services must be dispensed with. The services of the men, who are now there, and whom I have enumerated, should be retained, and I am asking that they be retained.

Mr. GRAHAM: Under the present law, the Government has practically carte blanche to add to their years of service for the purpose of pensions.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Then why put this provision in the bill?

Mr. GRAHAM: Outside of the men who come under the Military Pensions Act, there are men in the other branches who do not come under that provision.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I hope the minister will be able to convince me when we come to deal with that clause, which struck me as an odd clause when I read it. My experience is that experienced men, whom Canada has educated, of whom Canada is proud, who did so well in the Great War, should be retained, and new men should not be introduced, either by promotions or new appointments.

Mr. VIEN: Does my hon. friend believe that seventeen generals are necessary to manage the affairs of the Militia of Canada?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is some applause to that sentiment from the Progressive side of the House. These seventeen officers were not Generals before the war; but by reason of the fact that these men succeeded in the war, they were promoted at the most critical time in the history of this country and its people. Thus it was that they rose to high command. Should that now be a disqualification? Does it justify us in saying: "Now, you cannot stay in the Militia? You must make way for less experienced men." The seventeen Generals of whom my right hon. friend speaks, are men who did not rise to that rank before the great war; but by reason of their good and hard work during the war, they attained that rank, and we should retain them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I should like to say just one word as to what my hon. friend has stated about the references in this resolution to Orders in Council. I think no one understands better than my hon. friend that there is a great difference between asking Parliament to authorize certain administrative acts by Order in Council, which acts can be performed only in that way, and the Governor-in-Council taking to itself power, to all intents and purposes, to enact legislation on matters which should be the subject of legislation in this Parliament. What we on this side of the House took strong objection to in the case of hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were sitting on this side, was that, having been given certain general powers for war purposes, they continued to use those powers for the purpose of putting through by Order in Council enactment after enactment which should have had their origin in this House, if they were to have an origin anywhere. My hon. friends will recall that it was more or less a habit with them to pass Orders in Council and then to come to Parliament and ask Parliament to legalise the effects of those Orders in Council. I remember, in the case of one bill relating to some matters affecting coal mining operations in the West, the government of my hon. friend opposite presented to this House 180 Orders in Council and Parliament was asked to re-enact these Orders in Council, to give them beyond question the effect of law, although Parliament, at the outset, was not even favoured with copies of the Orders in Council. They were enumerated by number, from number 1 to No. 180, and this Parliament was asked to give the force of law to Orders in Council that were enumerated in that way. What we are asking in this resolution is for Parliament to authorize the Governor-in-Council to do certain administrative acts which are necessary to give effect to the intention of Parliament with regard to this legislation. If, in any particular, hon. members think the powers asked should not be given for certain specific acts, they will not be further asked for. It will be for the House to decide whether these particular administrative acts should be performed by the Governor-in-Council; and if the House decides that they should not, to suggest some other method of doing what is proposed. I think it is but right that the point to which we have taken such strong exception in the matter of Orders in Council, should be made clear. The objection is not to the Governor-in-Council discharging necessary acts of administration, but to the Governor-in-Council usurping certain powers of legislation by proceeding by Order in Council where legislation should be sought.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I wish to say a few words about the resolution and also a few words as to this monthly sermon that we receive from the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

Mr. LAPOINTE: We are receiving a daily one from the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen).

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Right from the pulpit.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Sometimes the obstinacy of the audience puts an unnecessary burden on the instructor. As regards the Governor-in-Council or the government that has gone out of office taking to itself powers, I do not know what meaning that has in the mind of the Prime Minister. I know it has no meaning at all in mine, and I am sure it has no meaning at all in the mind of anyone who takes a practical grasp of what a Governor-in-Council is, of what an Order in Council is. A Governor-in-Council can take no powers to itself, no more than can a gentleman take powers to himself, no more than this Parliament can take powers to itself. A Governor in Council cannot add to its powers, nor can any Order in Council at all expand the powers vested in the Governor in Council by the Parliament of Canada. There do come times in the life of every government, and never so much, certainly, as in the life of the late government —because the late government had charge of the affairs of this country during by no means ordinary times, to put it mildly— when it is found that the Governor in Council must anticipate the will of Parliament if it is to do its duty by the nation. We did that frequently during the war, and we had to do it subsequent to the war, because the conditions that prevailed then were really not different from those that obtained during the days of the war. To say that the late government did anything different from what every government in the world did is simply to speak without any knowledge of the facts. The late government passed its war Orders in Council under the provisions either of ordinary statutes or of what was known as the War Measures Act, an act which virtually gave to the government the powers of Parliament and which passed this House unanimously. The British Government had a corresponding act entitled the Defence of the Realm Act. Our act was out of effect at least a year—although I think I should be closer to the exact time if I said two years—before the corresponding act went out of operation in Great Britain. Great Britain was legislating under her Defence of the Realm Act, and the King in Council, for a year, if not two years, after our act was out of force, was passing orders in council in the Mother Country. Now, the hon. gentleman says that we passed 180 orders in council which we had to come to Parliament to have confirmed. I have some recollection of what he refers to particularly. During the war we were compelled to establish an office, the exact title of which I do not recall.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Director of Coal Operations.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Director of Coal Operations. Hon. gentlemen will remember the difficulties that arose in the coal mines in the province of Alberta, difficulties that involved an imminent peril to the whole of western Canada. We appointed the Coal Controller and empowered him to make orders fixing various conditions as between the workmen, on the one hand, and the mines on the other. He made many orders under the powers vested in him by the Governor in Council, which powers were exercised under the War Measures Act. That is the time when the 180 orders were passed. And, by the way, I do not know how many of them were of any consequence, nor am I sure that all of them were not wholly legal, under the powers vested in the Controller by the instrument that appointed him, which instrument was passed by virtue of the War Measures Act itself. But there arose a doubt as to whether, the Governor in Council having acted under the War Measures Act and passed an Order in Council empowering a man to do certain work, that man himself could issue written orders having the force of law. For that reason we came to Parliament and confirmed the whole matter. But to say that everything should have stood still, and the whole chaotic state of affairs allowed to continue, without anything being done until Parliament met, is merely to speak what has no basis in common sense, if indeed it has any basis in sanity. I am pretty sure that the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) was a member of the government when we appointed Mr. Armstrong a controller. If I am wrong the hon. member will correct me. It will be recalled how perilous the condition was; and, standing here, I am prepared to say, and leave it to the judgment of the House, that our conduct in the crisis of the coal situation in Alberta at that time, and its results, may be very favourably compared with the conduct of the present Government in the coal crisis in Nova Scotia to-day. That is the basis of the hon. gentleman's allegation in that regard. Occasionally, let me repeat, the time comes—and naturally it comes more often in troublous, tempestuous months and years of war, than in the ordinary times of peace—when it is essential, unless the Government runs away from its duties, that it anticipate the will of Parliament. And I do not think that any one can look back to-day and say, wherever we considered it absolutely essential in the public interest to do this in the days that have gone, that our conduct, when it came before Parliament for consideration, was ever open to question as to the rightness of the course we had pursued. Of course, there was the usual talk that this was government by Order in Council, and that Parliament should have done these things. Had it been possible to wait for Parliament, undoubtedly that course would have been adopted. However, this is not the time to draw the parallels; but let me suggest to the Prime Minister not to be over confident; because since he has been in office Orders in Council have been passed in fairly quiet times, when the sun was shining and all was quiet without, as respects which, if they are to have validity, he will have to come to Parliament for ratification.

Now, this resolution foreshadows a bill which is considered of such moment that it was thought necessary to refer to it in the Speech from the Throne; and very considerable beating of drums and sounding of trumpets have been going on as to this very vital piece of legislation. I think, first of all, that the disposition of the responsibilities of departments and branches of departments among ministers is a matter which might well be left to the Government in office, a matter more or less of domestic arrangement; and as respects any such disposition I should not be inclined to offer very severe criticism. I think a government should be permitted to dispose of its work among its ministers as it may deem best. There might, of course, be arrangements as to the distribution of work that would be incongruous. In one respect the present proposal is open to that objection, and only as regards that do I feel like offering criticism. But to say that this is any great outstanding piece of legislation is surely rather to reflect on the weight or moment of the programme which the Government has in mind. The Government could practically do what it now proposes under the legislation that has been in effect for years. The late government brought departments and branches of departments together under that legislation. It is true that by the existing provisions you cannot wholly amalgamate and get rid of deputy ministers. Under those provisions you can keep departments separate, but under one minister; while under this legislation you can get rid of deputy ministers and effectually amalgamate departments into one. Whether anything more will actually result under this proposed legislation than could be done under the machinery now in force I doubt very much. I, at least, do not think, and I do not believe that any one else does, that there is any doing away with ministers by this legislation. Previously the Marine and Fisheries Department, the Naval Service Department, the Militia Department, the Air Department, the Mounted Police, and External Affairs—I name six—were all under the review and the charge of three ministers, the Minister of Militia, ordinarily so-called, the Minister of Marine, and the Prime Minister. Those six departments, when this legislation goes through, will still be under three ministers, just the same number as before. The work will be differently disposed among them, that is all. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries will have charge of Marine and Fisheries alone; the Naval Service goes from him to the Minister of Militia. The Prime Minister will have charge of External Affairs; and the Mounted Police, which before was under myself, will go from that department to the Militia Department. So that the six services that previously were under three ministers will be under three ministers still.

As to taking the Naval Service out of the Marine and Fisheries Department, so called, or really disjoining it from the Marine and Fisheries Department—for it is a department in itself—and putting it under the Militia Department, I have no criticism to make. I fancy that as the duties of the Minister of Militia now will be very much lighter than they have been in the last eight years, it may be a division that will more equitably take care of the services and responsibilities that fall to the various ministers. And it may be that the Naval Service is really more akin to the Militia service than it is to the Marine and Fisheries service. I presume it was really joined with the latter as two departments under the one minister because both the Marine and Fisheries and the Naval Service are departments that have to do with our waters. That the Naval Service should be taken out and now joined to the Militia Department is in my judgment a matter for the Government itself to determine, and does not lend itself to criticism.

But I do object to the Mounted Police being taken out of a civilian department and made part of the military forces, and I see no reason for the step whatever. The Mounted Police from its inception has been a civilian force, and the very credit that accrues to it to-day throughout this Dominion is derived more from the fact that it is a civilian force than from any other consideration. Make it a military force and throw around it the atmosphere and the trappings of the militia, and you will not find the Mounted Police held in the same regard; the attitude of the public towards that force will not be maintained. The Mounted Police is not a defence force in any sense whatever; it has been a civilian force all through its history, and there is more reason for maintaining it as a civilian force now than there ever was before. Why? Because two or three years ago the Dominion Police, which had been administered under the Justice Department, were joined with the Mounted Police and under the title of The Royal Canadian Mounted Police. So here we have the Dominion Police and the old civilian Mounted Police in one force, now to be merged in the Militia Department and to be administered as part of the defence forces. By what turn of language can the Mounted Police or the Dominion Police be described as a defence force? They are in no sense such a force. I think that the use of the Mounted Police has been solely for the purpose of supplementing the work of the local police in taking care of emergencies that the latter were incapable of handling, and hence municipalities called upon the Mounted Police for assistance. That use will not be availed of with the same freedom, and the Mounted Police will not be held in quite the same regard, if the local authorities feel that it is really part of the militia they are calling in to do service that they would rather have performed by a civilian force. The Mounted Police investigate crime, they go into the far remote parts of our country and ferret out the criminal. Why should men engaged in that pursuit be attached to the militia? This suggestion I remember was made before I had the honour of being head of the Government, and after consideration it was felt that it would be a mistake to take the Mounted Police out of its civilian rank and put it under a Minister of Militia, although it was never even considered that they should be assigned to militia service and to that extent be given the character of a defence force. I think the minister would be well advised to reconsider this resolution in the light of that experience. Beyond that I offer no objection to the resolution, but I think it will be regretted in the days to come if the Mounted Police with its splendid history is taken out of the category of a civilian police force and placed before the public as part of the militia or defence force.

Mr. MARTELL: I have only one short observation to make as regards the amalgamation of these various departments. I do not know exactly from the resolution what the Minister of Defence, as he is to be termed in future, contemplates doing with the fishery protection service, but I hope that he will take into consideration the advisability of putting back this service under the control of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Some years ago I had the honour of being an official in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and unfortunately the fisheries protection service was placed under the Department of National Defence. The result was that when the departmental officials sent in reports to the department complaining that Americans or others were poaching and in other ways breaking the Fisheries Protection Law, they had to take the matter up with the Naval Service Department, and there was so much red tape that it took three or four days before a naval service boat was despatched to the scene of action. I really believe that it is in the best interests of our fisheries administration that when this co-ordination of the service is being brought about the fisheries protection fleet and all its officers should be put under the control of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Their function is not as a defensive force against an invader, but primarily to see that the fishery laws are observed, and under no department can they be so thoroughly and efficiently enforced as under the Marine and Fisheries Department.

Mr. MEWBURN: I wish to offer my congratulations to the hon. minister on his endeavour to bring some of the departments together in the way suggested, but I have one or two minor exceptions to make. As the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) pointed out, this is not a new proposal; it was suggested years ago, during the war, and since the armistice, but it did not then seem feasible to carry it into effect. I am not particularly interested in the post-mortems respecting orders in council that the hon. leader of the Government and my right hon. leader have been sparring about; I should like to get down to the essentials of this bill.

I do feel very strongly that the Mounted Police should not be interfered with. The reason that has already been given I entirely concur with. Our Royal Canadian Mounted Police has beyond a question of a doubt been respected not only in Canada but the world over as the finest force for the preservation of law and order that has ever been organized. It is entirely a civil force, but the minute it is merged with the militia it cannot help but be known all over this country as part of the military forces of Canada. I am convinced that if the Mounted Police, which has now within its fold the old Dominion Police, could remain, for administrative purposes, under the Prime Minister, it would be much wiser and sounder. We have had troubles in the past, strikes and that sort of thing, and although under the present Militia Act it is within the power of a municipality to call upon the militia to turn out for the preservation of law and order, that is the very last resort that should be adopted in this country. The Mounted Police are available, and if it were not for the petty jealousies existing throughout the various provinces they could be utilized to much greater advantage than they have been up to the present time. The moral effect of the presence of one or two Mounted Police is the most wonderful thing in this country. I know that in the province of Ontario not very long ago, the Attorney General called for the services of that force in connection with some trouble at Thorold or Merritton. I think the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) will bear me out that the work that the Mounted Police did was a very vital force in the community. One or two members of the Mounted Police force can do more for the preservation of law and order than any number of militiamen that might be called out. Furthermore, every individual man of the Mounted Police force is a trained constable, possessing nerve and judgment and experience, and in the case of any trouble where the services of the Mounted Police may be required, there is far less danger in utilizing their services than in calling out the militia. I would therefore urge that the minister seriously consider eliminating the Mounted Police from the scope of this bill.

There is one other matter that I would like to touch upon. It may not be serious, and can be discussed more fully on the second reading of the bill. I notice that the resolution provides for two deputy ministers. I do not wish to make any severe criticism, but it seems to me that the services of one deputy minister are all that should be required. We already have a deputy minister of the Naval Service, a deputy minister of Marine and Fisheries, and a deputy minister of Militia and Defence, and from my own personal experience I think that the present deputy minister of Militia and Defence is capable of carrying on three or four important departments now that the war is over, and, I think, with due economy. If you are going to have two deputy ministers, you will be practically carrying on the same administration as we have to-day in the Naval Service and Militia Departments.

I wish to concur heartily in the remarks of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) about some of the staff officers. A good many people in this country and elsewhere are very prone to criticise staff officers and the "brass hat," but those who do so fail to realize that it is no choice of these men how they are dressed or what uniform they wear. Behind the staff uniform there has been an education going on for years, and during the late war an experience and ability have been gained through the testing of time. I think, instead of sneering at these men, this country owes them the greatest possible debt of gratitude, and I sincerely trust that the minister will use the services of these men whom it has cost the country something to educate. Some of these men have cheerfully given up their lives, and those who are left are prepared to give the benefit of their experience to this country, to the second and third generation. I commend the minister for the efforts he has made on their behalf.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I just wish to be sure that I understand what my hon. friend has in mind. If I gather rightly, he is of the opinion that the Mounted Police should be kept under the Prime Minister in order that they may be available in times of industrial disputes to be sent into the area affected to act on such occasions. As against that, the method which has prevailed in the past has been for the civil authorities to request the calling out of the militia, if additional aid is needed when there is an industrial dispute in any locality. My hon. friend, I gather, thinks that that course should no longer be followed but that the mounted police should be used instead in these industrial disputes.

Mr. MEWBURN: Not at all. My hon. friend entirely misunderstood me. I said that the Mounted Police have always been known as a police force, a civil force pure and simple, not as a military force, and I thought it was far better to have that force under the Prime Minister, as it was in the past until a change was made and the force was put under the Privy Council. I do not say that the mounted police should be called into any area where there is a dispute or a strike, or anything of that sort. What I said was that it would be far better if the Mounted Police force, for administrative purposes, was entirely under the Prime Minister, and was known all over the world as a civil force rather than as a military force. I pointed out that I realized that in the event of any trouble arising in any municipality, at the present time the municipal authorities can request the aid of the militia, but I say that before that step is taken, the presence of a few Mounted Police, who could be sent in there to investigate, has such a moral effect in many instances as to prevent further trouble arising.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is most desirable that the Mounted Police should not be drawn into these industrial disputes at all. I might point out to my hon. friend that if we had followed the course he now suggests, there probably would have been very serious trouble in Nova Scotia. A request was made of the Government some two or three months ago to do just exactly what my hon. friend suggested, that is, to send the Mounted Police into these areas in Nova Scotia where there has been industrial trouble and have them skirmish about, as my hon. friend says, keeping order, and in that way obviate possibly worse happenings later on. But the Government took the position that if we wished to create an industrial disturbance of very serious proportions, possibly the best way we could go about it would be to order the Mounted Police into those areas. The matter came to my attention directly, and I refused absolutely to countenance sending the Mounted Police into these areas at that time. We told the municipal authorities that if they were unable to maintain law and order themselves, as they were supposed to do, they had the right under the Militia Act to call in the aid of the militia, but that they would be responsible for so doing and would have to be prepared to meet the expenses of the militia when called out. If you once open the door to having the Mounted Police called in to aid the civil authorities on any occasion when there may be alarm on account of industrial disputes, you will in a very short time have the federal government discharging a function in the matter of keeping law and order which it was never contemplated it should discharge. I think that if an injury has been done to the Mounted Police, it has been that under the late government on two or three occasions the Mounted Police were brought into these industrial disputes where it was absolutely unnecessary for them to have been brought in.

Mr. MEWBURN: My hon. friend says that he refused to send the Mounted Police to Nova Scotia, and quite right. He can always refuse to send them. The Mounted Police, under my suggestion, would only be sent when the Prime Minister acceded to a request for their services and where those services were absolutely essential. I hope that the Prime Minister will never be required to give his consent, but the day may come when he will be very glad to have the force at his disposal and to be able to accede to such a request.

Mr. CRERAR: The principle underlying the resolution that is now before the Committee has been pretty fully explained by the Minister of Militia, and further elaborated in the debate which has taken place. With this principle, which is that the different defence arms of Canada should be united under one control and direction, I am in hearty sympathy. I think such a step is in the right direction. It has several things to commend it. In the first place if it is necessary—and I am not among those who believe that it is not the duty of a country to provide for its own defence—if it is necessary to provide for defence, a unification of the arms of defence, particularly in a country like Canada, should lend itself to efficiency in control and in operation. That is my first point. In the second place the step that the minister proposes to take, as outlined in this resolution, should bring about a greater efficiency with greater economy; and that certainly is to be desired at the present time.

As to the details of the bill in respect to the status of deputy ministers and other officials now in these departments, that is a matter that can, of course, be much better discussed when we are considering the measure clause by clause. There is one point, however, on which I find myself in general agreement with the position taken by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), and that is in respect to the inclusion of the control of the Mounted Police in this measure, in the amalgamation that it is sought to bring about. Either the Mounted Police is a defence arm or it is not. If it is intended for purposes of defence, then by all means it should be included in the proposed co-ordination or amalgamation; but if it is intended for an arm of defence why do we need it at all? We do not require it for that purpose; we have enough scope in the Militia law for the provision of defence without creating an additional arm for that purpose. On the other hand, if the Mounted Police is a civil force, and it certainly has been a civil force, intended for the administration of civil law, then I submit it is not sound policy to include it with the arms that have to do with defence. I am among those who believe that the administration of civil law and the maintenance of civil order should be kept away as far as possible from that relating to the defence of the country—I think that is a sound principle upon which to proceed. I am a little bit doubtful also of the wisdom of including the Canadian Mounted Police in the co-ordination as suggested because of the fear that the association of that splendid force with the arms of the service that have to do with the defence of the country, may create a wrong impression in the public mind, and may create a wrong impression altogether in the mind of the force itself in relation to its public duty. I take second place to none in this House, or out of it, in my regard for the distinguished service that the North-west Mounted Police—the forerunners of the present body—gave this country. They have a very distinguished place in our history and a very distinguished record. I believe I am on record as expressing a doubt as to the wisdom of creating the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as we have it at the present time. I think the step taken in converting the Mounted Police into the present organization was one of very doubtful wisdom. After all, the maintenance of civil law and order is a function that belongs to the provinces. Why then should there be any attempt to create a Canadian police force for this purpose? In the olden days, in the large unorganized territories in western Canada, it was absolutely essential to have this police force, which was created in the days of the Mackenzie government for a specific purpose. In those days the force rendered admirable service to western Canada. But to take the position now that we must have a federal police force, with headquarters in the Capital city of the Dominion, sending its officers and constables into all parts of Canada, has no justification either on financial grounds or for reasons of utility. Consequently I am favourable to this idea—that recognizing as I do the splendid traditions of the force, recognizing the admirable service it has rendered to Canada in the past, the time has come when this force might very well be discontinued excepting in so far as it is necessary to police the territory in Canada that still remains unorganized. For that reason I trust the Government may be able to give consideration to the suggestion made that the Mounted Police, at any rate, or such of it as we may retain, should not be included under the administration of the Militia Department that has to do purely with matters of defence. I think that is a sound principle to adopt in relation to this matter.

Let me say again, Mr. Chairman, that I cordially support the principle of the bill. I think it is a step in the right direction, because it will make for greater efficiency, or should do so, and will at the same time make for greater economy. I trust the Government may be able to give consideration to the suggestions advanced in connection with the Mounted Police. I for one would be very glad indeed if the Government could see its way clear—

An hon. MEMBER: To get rid of it.

Mr. CRERAR: No. I shall not say get rid of the force, but at any rate to reduce its personnel to what is necessary to police the unorganized territory of Canada.

Mr. GRAHAM: I am very much pleased with the reception the committee have given to this proposed legislation. I do not make any great claim to be the originator of this suggestion; but a suggestion that is only originated and never acted upon does not get us anywhere. I think I may say that I am the first minister who brought in a concrete proposition dealing with this subject.

I concur in what my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) said with respect to the military officers he named; and in discussing the question of the militia of Canada we ought to remember one thing—that the men who now hold these offices largely went to war from the volunteer forces of Canada on their own volition and were advanced in rank, some of them from the rank of captain, to the positions they now hold. We therefore do owe them respect, and we ought to take advantage of their experience, so far as we possibly can, when they are willing to give us that experience. That is the way I feel about it. I am not an enemy of the militia of Canada—not by any means; I have reason to be otherwise—but what I I do want to accomplish if I possibly can, and I think we all have it in mind, is to have a well organized, snappy, defence force that will be a credit to Canada without being too expensive.

Now as to the officers mentioned by my hon. friend and the law pertaining to them, I may say that one of the gentlemen who have retired has been given more than a year's leave of absence by the Government which proves that the law touching this matter exists and that the Government has the power to do such a thing so far as the militia is concerned. I want to say further that as regards Sir Henry Burstall he is one of the men who brought distinction to Canada every time he was called upon to take a stand for the good name of the country not only at home but on the battlefield. General Gwatkin, one of the generals who has been retired, came from Great Britain and during the war rendered Canada great service by reason of his experience and his advice. I tell the House now that under the existing act the Government thought it fair to give General Gwatkin one year's leave of absence. So far as Commissioner Perry is concerned, he is one of the great men of this country. He asked to be retired the first week I was here, I think, giving good reasons, but remained on for a while. The Government, acting on its right under the statute, has given Commissioner Perry one year's leave of absence. Consequently, no matter what my confreres of the press may say, there can be no successor appointed for one year, because Mr. Perry will draw the salary for this year. The suggestion made by some hon. members in regard to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is certainly worthy of consideration. The object of the Government and of the Militia Department was not at all to make soldiers of the Mounted Police, but we thought that, for convenience and economy, that department lent itself more readily than any other department to the combination of the executive or accounting forces of the different departments. That is the only object, and the matter is worth consideration and discussion. The question has been raised as to the amalgamation of the Northwest Mounted police. That force was established in 1874, and performed the work that no other body of men could have performed, and whether people assembled in small numbers or in vast crowds throughout the western territory, one or two of these mounted police were able to maintain order where, perhaps, the ordinary policeman could not have done so, even if there were a dozen policemen present. No person has a higher regard than I have for the work done by that grand body of men in the years gone by. But the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) called attention to one phase of the matter that is worthy of thought. Has the time arrived when the Northwest Mounted Police, or the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as they are called now, should be reduced and the responsibility placed on the provinces for the maintaining of order? I have been in communication with the various provinces in this respect, and personally I am of the opinion that, whilst there are services to be carried on yet by the federal authority which probably could not be carried on well by the provinces, speaking in the main the provincial authorities are responsible for maintaining order within their several areas. There still exists unorganized territory to which the application of federal authority cannot be questioned. The Dominion Police, I think, were organized away back in 1846, and they have carried on their work splendidly. Their work included what we might call secret service work all over the Dominion of Canada, and it was not confined alone to eastern Canada. If I were not a member of a government, and were sitting somewhere else, I might express the personal opinion that I think the secret service of Canada ought to be under the Minister of Justice. It seems to be along the line of his work rather than the Militia Department, and I am free to confess that the Government would be advised by me to take into consideration the advisability of handing that part of the Royal Mounted Police work over to the Justice Department, rather than have it under the Militia Department. I assure hon. gentlemen that this bill is meant to carry out just what I have indicated. When we are in committee I will be glad to have both sides of the House help to make the bill as perfect as possible. What we want is the best defence force that we can get at as little expense as possible, all with keeping in mind that no country is fully equipped as a nation that has not an armed force of some kind.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I would like to endorse the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Marquette (Mr. Crerar). Those of us who have been old-timers in the Canadian Northwest will recognize the splendid work which the Mounted Police performed in the early days. Some of us who have been on the plains know the work that they did in connection with the cattle thieves and the Indians, I venture to say that in the last few years we have witnessed a complete transformation of the activities of that force, and I would go so far as to say that I doubt very much, indeed, whether the honour which was once attached to that force is maintained to-day. Speaking as a representative of labour, I believe that there is no other organization that causes so much friction in our communities as the Northwest Mounted Police. Perhaps, that is rather a serious charge to make, but since the whole matter is under consideration with a view to re-organization, possibly this is the time when it should be discussed. The Mounted Police to-day are no longer the "riders of the plains" that we used to hear about. To a very considerable extent they are reduced to the position of being a secret service department. I might say they are a very large spending department; last year they cost almost $4,000,000—to be accurate, the expense was $3,927,798.82. Some of these items are of very special interest to those concerned with industry. I notice that, not only are amounts spent for the police themselves and their activities, but amounts are paid to outside people and to agencies. In the criminal investigation branch the expenditures are as follows—

Services and expenses of special agents, $87,236.14.

We are not told who those agents are—

[Mr. Graham.]

Employers' Detective Agencies, Services and expenses of operators..	$5,608 00
Pinkerton's Detective Agency, Services and expenses of operators..	2,412 15
The Thiel Detective Service Company, Services and expenses of operators..	1,473 92

About $100,000 has been spent on those items alone, for which no details are given. I learn from the report that the services of the Mounted Police have been used for spying upon labour activities. Among the expenses of the members of the force in various investigations at Toronto we find—

O.B.U. Activities..	$ 234 62
O.B.U. Labour Unrest at Winnipeg..	2,173 30

Then an expenditure at Regina. Another item for duty altogether outside this country was:

Special duty at Boston and Springfield..	$ 190 70
Investigating Bolshevistic and labour conditions..	3,380 40
Expenses at Prince Albert, agitators and suspects..	49 55
Lumber Workers' Industrial Union of the O.B.U..	356 10
Expenses at Edmonton, attending the Labour Church..	4 00
Bolshevist and Labour conditions..	22 10
At Lethbridge, attending a labour meeting..	7 00
Agitators and suspects..	31 75
At Vancouver, attending labour meetings..	18 86
Self Determination League..	328 80

I suppose this last was the meeting which Lindsay Crawford held in Vancouver, and which was broken up by a gang of rowdies. So the report goes on down the line. It would seem that there is an atmosphere of suspicion throughout the entire report. The Police have been conjuring up all sorts of hobgoblins, and then proceeding to say that when they arrive on the scene, by their moral influence everything evil vanishes. It is rather a serious thing when we undertake to employ detective agencies, and even to employ American detective companies to keep up a system of close espionage upon labour movements. About a year ago there was issued a very close study of the American spy system—and remember three of these firms whose names I have given are American firms. These are some of the instructions that were given to a spy:

We want you to stir up as much bad feeling as you possibly can between the Italians and the Serbians. Spread data among the Serbians that the Italians are going back to work. Call up every question you can in reference to racial hatred between these two nationalities.

I am quoting from a series of articles by Sidney Howard, Investigator for Dr. Richard Cabot, now Professor of Social Ethics in Harvard University. Again the spy says:

I was expressly told by Russell's general manager, Burgett, to try and get the pickets to cause as much trouble as possible so that Russell agency could keep its men on the job for as long a time as possible. I also was sent by Russell to Marinette to work in .... Lumber Company, I worked in the plant as general handy man around the yard. My particular work was to join the union and watch the men and report any labour agitation or activity.

The CHAIRMAN: The quotations which the hon. member is making dealing with matters arising in a foreign country and with regard to the administration of order there, are hardly relevant to the question which is being discussed in the committee now, namely, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I bow to your decision. I quoted these extracts because American detective firms were being employed in Canada, and I take it that the same methods which they employed in the United States were being employed in Canada. I should like, however, to deal with conditions in Canada. We had a keen industrial dispute several years ago, and we know the part which the Mounted Police took at that time throughout the country. Perhaps, I might be permitted to quote an affidavit produced in Montreal with regard to the type of work which was carried on there in searching houses. This work of searching houses was carried on from coast to coast, and this instance is one, amongst many, which was printed in one of the labor papers:

Province of Quebec,
District of Montreal,
Canada,

I, the undersigned Joseph Schubert, Secretary International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, Montreal Locals, being duly sworn, depose and say:

(1) On the morning of July 1st, 1919, between the hours of 12.30 to 1.00 o'clock, 4 men in plain clothes and another in a police uniform visited my house for the purpose of searching same. On my request to let me see the warrant, they refused to put same in my hands, but they permitted me to read same, as it was held by one of them. As I could not see my name mentioned in the warrant, I asked them to show me my name. To this I was answered that my name was not put in the warrant, that the warrant was general, and permitted them to visit and search any house they choose.

(2) The aforesaid men proceeded to search my house. My wife, who was in an advanced state of pregnancy, was ordered out of her bed, as well as my little child, who were frightened by the rough treatment they received by the aforesaid visitors, one of whom was drunk.

(3) After a thorough search, lasting half an hour, which brought particular hardship to my wife, the following books, periodicals and things were removed by the aforesaid men:

The Statesman, a Liberal weekly paper.

A set of reproductions of paintings of Jesus Christ and prayers including "Our Father."

Socialism and the Great State, a book by H. G. Wells.

The Liberator, single copy, a journal purchased at any newstand.

A book by Heinrich Heine.

A book by F. Lasale.

American Labor Year Book.

Three memoirs on the Roumanian Jewish question.

Two personal letters.

That is an example of the searching of houses, and I think hon. members can understand the feeling of labour men from coast to coast when they and their wives are subjected to indignities of this character. I would call attention to the case of one man, who is still in the employ of the Mounted Police and who, according to the report has been transferred to Montreal—Corporal Zaneth. We had some knowledge of the kind of work which he did shortly after, or about, the time of the Winnipeg general strike. One paragraph from the report of his cross-examination at that time is as follows. This is a summary; I could give the original, if necessary:

In direct examination, witness told the court that he had joined the police in 1917, enlisting so that he could go overseas with them. Physical disability prevented this, so he was given work in Canada. He was an Italian by birth and was later naturalised as a Canadian citizen. On September 12, 1918, he was detailed to work amongst the miners at Drumheller, Alberta. Shortly after his arrival there he had joined the Socialist Party of Canada. He named the officials of the party in Alberta. So keenly had he worked there that he was elected Vice President of the Federal Labour Workers.

For a considerable period he had distributed literature and also sold some of it at the conventions held in Calgary. This literature he was distributing under instructions from the Socialist Party of Canada.

Cross-examined by Mr. Bonnar, Corporal Zaneth told of his early life, saying that he was born in the northern part of Italy. He had changed his name only once, which was when he was out in Alberta. The name he assumed then was Harry Blask. He had signed an obligation when he joined the Socialist Party of Canada. He admitted that while he was out there, he had told lots of lies as he was only following his instructions.

Mr. Bonnar: Did your Officer Commanding tell you to tell lies?

Witness: No, he did not.

Mr. Bonnar: You weren't following his instructions then?

Witness: I certainly wasn't going to tell those people I was a Mounted Policeman.

Here we have a case in which a corporal of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police became an "agent provacateur," actually selling literature which he knew to be banned. Are we, as a Canadian people, reduced to the position, that we have to adopt the methods of "agents provocateurs?" I should like to assure this House that, in labour circles, when any man stands up in a meeting and begins to talk violence, he is immediately suspected by the labour people of being a spy. That is the kind of thing that is going on, and there are to-day in the ranks of labour, men who are recognized as outstanding radicals who are in close touch with such men as Corporal Zaneth.

The result is that the whole labour movement is permeated by this system of espionage, and also by a sense of suspicion. People are arrested, we do not know why. We cannot tell whether they are simply expressing their radical notions in order to get others into trouble. I should like to read one other passage closely relating to the Winnipeg trials, because it shows that evidence was really purchased at that time. That is going still further than the work of the agent provocateur.

A bench warrant to bring Daskaluk into court was applied for and issued by the judge. The copies of letters filed in court by Mr. Bird are as follows:

I think these letters explain themselves. They are from the relief officials of Winnipeg and Vancouver.

G. B. CLARK, Esq., Secy. Social Service Committee, Winnipeg, Man.

Dear Sir,—Re Daskaluk, 688 Linden Ave., Winnipeg, Man. This man, his wife and infant child, three weeks old, Ukrainians, are destitute and a public charge in this city. He states he was sent here by the Provincial Government, as his life was in danger in Winnipeg on account of evidence which he gave against Almazoff in recent trials at Winnipeg. Formerly he had been a special agent of the R.N.W.M.P. I have wired Col. Stearns, O.C., R.N.W.M.P. who is said to have paid transportation to this city A former promise of $500.00 and transportation to his own country was not carried out for the alleged pretext that Ukrania was now at war and this man could not enter his country. He states that he has only received $150.00 of the $500.00 promised him. I have read the evidence as contained in the newspapers which he gave and there is absolutely nothing in any of his statements that would endanger his personal safety. I expect the R.N.W.M.P., to provide transportation through their local commanding officer for this man and his wife to return at once to your city, if his statements are correct. Will you be good enough to investigate his statements especially with Col. Stearns, with Mr. Andrews, the prosecutor for the province, and his brother who lives at 256 Austin Street. Thanking you in advance,

Yours sincerely,

GEO. D. IRELAND,
Relief Officer.

To which there came the following reply after investigation.

GEO. D. IRELAND, Esq.,
530 Gambie St.,
Vancouver, B.C.

Dear Sir,—Re H. Daskaluk, 688 Linden Ave., your letter 4th inst. to hand and owing to the writer being sick reply was delayed. I called on Col. Stearns of the Royal North West Mounted Police who told me that this man gave evidence for the crown, and was promised $500, and he states that as soon as the case is finished they will give him the balance. As your letter states, he has received $150 and his transportation to Vancouver. Col. Stearns told me that he wired to the officer commanding the Royal North West Mounted Police in Vancouver to advance Mr. Daskaluk $100. I also called to see Mr. Daskaluk's brother at 256 Austin Street, but was not able to see him as he is working on the railroad, and comes in but once a week, and owing to the big snow storm we have had in Manitoba, all the trains are held up and we do not know when he will be in. I further found that Mr. Daskaluk was never a resident of the city, but of East Kildonan, Man. Trusting this will be satisfactory, I am,

Yours truly,

B. ZEGLINSKI,
Agent, (B.Z.M.H.).

Mr. McMASTER: What do those letters mean?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am not sure. This gentleman was the agent of the Social Welfare Department of the city of Winnipeg. Now, in the report of the Northwest Mounted Police a good deal is made of the alleged fact that the good humour and tact of the Mounted Police have done much to avoid friction. Well, I have one other quotation which I want to read in this connection. It will show that, instead of avoiding friction, the presence of these men is often a decided irritant. I read from a copy of the Winnipeg Telegram of June 21, 1919:

Serious Turmoil this Afternoon Almost Certain

"Mounties" Resent Statements That They Are "Yellow Dogs"—Soldier-Strikers Insist They Will Parade This Afternoon and Authorities Are Just as Determined They Will Not.

Five hundred Royal Northwest Mounted Police are under orders to disperse any parades which may attempt to march on the streets of Winnipeg to-day.

Every "Mountie" is a returned soldier. They will be armed with revolvers and swords. They are in an excellent mood to cope with the situation. Remarks made by strikers at their gatherings to the effect that the "Royal North West Mounted Police" were "Yellow Dogs" has raised the ire of the Mounted Police and they stand doubly determined to take nothing from persons who attempt to break the law this afternoon.

The order for the Royal North West Mounted Police to maintain law and order in Winnipeg came from Hon. N. W. Rowell, President of the Privy Council, to Commissioner Perry.

In a kaleidoscopic change in the strike situation last night confident hopes of an early and peaceful settlement gave way to a condition which to-day heralds a crisis of the first magnitude.

Those of us who were at all closely in touch with the situation at that time know, as can be borne out by the member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Hudson), who was one of those who kept the channels of communication open between the provincial government and the men, that there would in all probability have been a peaceful settlement of the Winnipeg strike had the Mounted Police not been ordered out at that time. Their presence incensed the curious crowd that gathered on the streets and precipitated the trouble. One of the most serious facts in the labour situation is the constant surveillance which labour men, as such, are forced to endure. I should not like to suggest how many thousands of dollars I have cost Canada in having the police trail me around. I want to make that very clear; possibly I was worth watching. But the things I am saying to-day are the very things for which I was trailed, and my fellow-citizens in Winnipeg have very clearly given their verdict as to what they think of this sort of business. I remember a few instances particularly. Before I threw myself into the labour movement I could hardly credit this kind of thing. I remember addressing one night a meeting of labour people, and the next morning an officer of the Mounted Police came to my home and asked me to go to his office. You speak about this as a civil police force. Well, when I entered that office I found everything exactly as though it were a military tribunal. There an effort was made to persuade or intimidate me into either retracting my statements or pledging myself not to make similar statements to the people. I was trying to plead for decency and good order in this country, and to prevent the occasions of strife which are so frequently occurring. I remember speaking at a little town in southern Saskatchewan. The local clergyman was chairman of the meeting, and everything was conducted in perfect good order. But the next day after I left, the local clergyman was subjected to all sorts of indignities at the hands of the local Mounted Police officer. The clergyman happened to have been born in England. We had to tell the Mounted Police officer when he came over to this country, whether he had any connection with the Reds, and Labour, and all the rest of it. A few days later I happened to be addressing a class in political economy in the University of Saskatchewan, and the Mounted Police tried to discover what was going on inside the class room. It was too much for the editor of the local newspaper who reported the address, and he had to reprimand the police and ask what right they had to enter the class rooms of our universities to find out what was being taught. I can remember another occasion at Nanaimo, where a police officer deliberately attempted to draw me into a dispute and to provoke me into saying something that, I presume, he thought would be of service to him.

We have heard about the way in which the Mounted Police have backed up the provincial authorities. I can refer the House to a little industrial dispute in southern Saskatchewan, at Bienfait, where there was next to a clash between the provincial police and the Mounted Police—perhaps I should scarcely go that far, but I know relations were very much strained between the two groups—and the whole country was filled with spies and policemen.

Now, I ask hon. members if we are going to establish good working relations in this country by the presence of a body of men of this character, doing detective work and acting as spies, as agents provocateur,—actually, according to this information, paying for evidence, and on the slightest provocation being ready to "protect" law and order, although, as appeared from the reports, in practice their actions precipitated trouble?

Coming definitely to the question that we have before us, I submit that when reorganization is being discussed we should seriously consider whether we need to continue a force of this character. And I should like to urge what I intend to bring forward a resolution, but as the question has come up I mention it now. I contend that the activities of the Mounted Police should be confined to the unorganized territories, and that each province should be left to administer its own civil affairs.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have already spoken on the point directly relevant to the resolution, as to whether the Mounted Police should come under the Militia Department; but, whatever is done with this resolution, it does seem to me that what should be the composition and the extent and scope of the work of the Mounted Police has some pertinence as a matter of administration.

I gather from the remarks of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) that he feels it was a mistake to extend the work of the Mounted Police beyond the unorganized territories, and particularly to encompass within the same force the Mounted Police and the Dominion Police. If I have rightly interpreted his conclusions, I am sorry that I can not agree with either one. I do not know whether, first of all, the Mounted Police did confine their activities to the unorganized districts. I am quite ready to accept the statement that they were formed for the purpose of taking care of law and order in the large unorganized portion of Canada at that time; but though they may have for the time being confined themselves to those areas, nevertheless their work was continued and even extended after those districts became erected to the full status of provinces. Not only was it continued, but I am confident that no hon. member would say that the Mounted Police should have been retired from Alberta or Saskatchewan or even Manitoba. I think the House will agree with me that we would have been flying in the face of the very plainest conclusions of the history of the last three decades had we effected such a retirement. Every one must also admit that within the last few years there have been reasons for maintaining the Mounted Police in those very provinces; and I would go further—though some might dispute me here—there was reason also for the use of the Mounted Police in the other provinces during the last six years.

The hon. member for Marquette was himself a member of the government when it was decided to incorporate the Mounted Police with the Dominion Police, not because we were anxious to send the Mounted Police anywhere, but because we felt we could not avoid the request of the local authorities, but must answer in the affirmative and add to the strength of the local force for the maintenance of order in great and perilous emergencies. That such emergencies existed in the three prairie provinces at more than one place during the past six years there can be no doubt; that such emergencies existed, indeed, before those years there can be no doubt. For example, such an emergency existed two or three years ago in the city of Winnipeg. I do not want to seriously criticise any one, particularly any one who looks at this matter from a different angle—and there may be one or two hon. members who do—but would any hon. members opposite say that it was the duty of the government, three years ago, to decline the request of the local authorities for help when those authorities felt themselves unequal to the maintenance of law and order in the city of Winnipeg? If there was criticism at the time it would have been appropriate to introduce a resolution then condemning the conduct of the Government in that regard, but no such resolution was introduced, nor was there any serious criticism of the government either in this House or in the country. Consequently I think it will be generally admitted that there has been in highly organized districts—districts organized just as highly as the city of Montreal and the city of Toronto—reason for the co-operation of the federal authorities with the local authorities to overcome emergencies that, fortunately, very rarely arise in this country.

Then the question comes: Is it best in the interests of our country that there should be a federal civilian force applicable to assist the local authorities under conditions when the latter feel themselves unequal to coping with the situation? Now, I agree very firmly with the hon. member for Marquette and with the Minister of Militia, that the responsibility for the maintenance of peace and law is provincial; not only so, but that it should be made fundamentally provincial. And I am against—perhaps more against than some of the acts of the late administration would indicate—the overlapping of activities. I am in favour of leaving the responsibility as the Constitution has left it, in the local authorities, to the utmost possible extent, as regards this and other subjects; and I am in favour of no more police interference than is absolutely essential to the fair and reasonable maintenance of law and order. But is it not true that we can maintain law and order at least expense by the maintenance of a civilian force of this kind—one that can be used anywhere as desired, but that will be sent only when there is a request for it by the local authorities as essential to the preservation of law and order? If not it will then fall upon the provinces not only to maintain such an ordinary force of local police as will take care of all ordinary situations, preserve law and order in the towns and villages and meet all emergencies that might ordinarily be expected but they will have to go further and prepare themselves against almost any contingency that might arise within their borders. There is no need to anticipate that we will need as large a force as in the past, but with a moderate-sized, mobile federal force that could be kept at one or two or three points, and whose services would be at the disposal, when requested, of the local authorities of any province, you could maintain law and order and take care of extraordinary situations much more cheaply than if you put that obligation, not upon one, but upon each and all of the whole nine provinces of Confederation.

Now as to the criticism that an error was made in amalgamating the Dominion Police with the Mounted Police, really I cannot see the force of that argument at all. We have no Dominion Police for the purpose of the general maintenance of law and order. We never had; we have none to-day. But we have always had a Dominion Police. What for? For the protection of our own federal buildings and our own property. The provinces are not obliged to protect our property; we protect our own; that is what the Dominion Police is for. The Dominion Police were, for the purpose of administration, joined to the Mounted Police, and all was described as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and placed under the charge of Mr. Commissioner Perry. What objection can be taken to that, I do not know. I would certainly not be in favour of any extension of the responsibilities of the Dominion Police, nor would I be in favour of any further maintenance of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police than was essential to supplying a sort of civilian police reserve which might co-operate with the local police upon request of the local authorities, rather than that it should be essential to call instead upon the militia for that purpose. I think it is far better that a civilian reserve should be at the disposal upon request of the local authorities. Keep the police out to the last hour; let the police never go in at all, if you can; but it is far better that a civilian force should be at the disposal of the federal authorities available to answer a call locally should unfortunately that call come, and I ask the Government to consider carefully before they put it out of their power to answer any local call by sending a moderate-sized civilian force, and by putting it out of their power, make it essential that the militia in case of any contingency shall be called on to operate instead.

I repeat, inasmuch as we are not now in the period we were in, inasmuch as there is not now as much likelihood of disturbance as there was during the period of the war and the period of demobilization that followed, it is undoubtedly possible that the strength of the force and the cost of operation could be reduced. Let that be done. To that I will offer no objection whatever, but I think there should be very serious consideration given before the operations of the Mounted Police in the organized parts of Canada should be entirely done away with. If you are only going to have the Mounted Police to take care of the needs of law and order in the Northwest Territories, you eliminate the Mounted Police almost altogether. I would not be in favour of that. I would be in favour of such reduction as the Government felt it was possible to make and still maintain a mobile police reserve with the reputation the Mounted Police have, for the purpose of answering these extraordinary contingencies that arise, and that probably will arise in the future as well.

Mr. VIEN: Mr. Chairman, it is pleasant to hear so much said in commendation of the principle of the bill. The only criticism heard, if we can call it criticism, has been of a constructive nature with respect to exempting the Mounted Police from the amalgamation provided by the resolution.

There is one consideration to be added to those suggested by hon. members this afternoon, and it is that under our constitution the question of police is a provincial matter. So far as it is necessary to maintain a police force in an organized territory, I would leave it to the provincial authorities to look after it. So far as unorganized federal territory is concerned, the Mounted Police could be retained. I think everybody will agree with what has been said as to the high standing and fine reputation of the Mounted Police. The right hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Meighen), in speaking of retaining as strong a force of Mounted Police as possible, due regard being had to the exigencies of the service and the exigencies of the financial situation of the country, conveyed the idea that we should maintain the corps, in consideration of its activities in the past and the splendid services it has rendered to the country. I believe that we should maintain no such organization as a decoration, or as a souvenir. I think we should do away with the force as much as possible. The Mounted Police was organized mainly to maintain law and order in those territories which were not under provincial authority, and to my mind we should limit their activities to that field.

My right hon. friend also intimated that the amalgamation of the Mounted Police with the Department of Defence would lower their standing in the public opinion; I want to say that I am of a different opinion. It is casting a totally uncalled for aspersion on the militia of Canada to say that amalgamation with it will discredit the Mounted Police. The militia of Canada is composed of an army of citizens and I believe that as such it is a credit to the country. Certainly it should be no discredit to the Mounted Police to be amalgamated with it.

There is one other point. When there is a disturbance in any part of this country and the civilian authorities find it necessary to call the militia to their aid, preferably to the Mounted Police, I would call the local regiments of the militia, which are composed of citizens of the locality. They understand the mentality of the people of that community, and would be better able to cope with the situation than a police force from a distant part of the country, almost a stranger to the conditions with which it would have to deal.

I might give an instance in which this principle has found application. I suggest to the right hon. gentleman that when there was a disturbance in Quebec in 1918, and regiments were brought from Toronto, to march through our streets, post their machine guns on different corners and fire at peaceful citizens as they did, which in itself was a provocation to the people of that city, if the local regiments of the militia had been called out instead, as was recommended by General Landry in command of the district, bloodshed would probably have been avoided.

The same thing is likely to happen again whenever, in order to quell a local disturbance you bring regiments from a distant part of the country, be they a Mounted Police force, a regiment of artillery or a battalion of infantry. The feelings of these soldiers are often inflamed before they leave their quarters, and sometimes as they are reported to have said in Hamilton on one occasion, they say: "we will fix bayonets and we will go down to these people." In such cases as that you do not quell the disturbance; you only add fuel to the flames. Therefore, I believe it is a wise thing to bring even the Mounted Police under the Minister of Defence.

In the second place I believe the Mounted Police should be limited to the smallest possible number, so as to avoid expense, and its operations should be limited to the territories that are not under provincial authority. In that way we should avoid expense and also the duplication of authority so far as the police organization is concerned.

May I add another consideration? Why should I of the province of Quebec, or you of the province of Ontario, be obliged to contribute to policing the territory of a distant province? We in Quebec look after the organization of our provincial police, and we pay for it. Why should not other provinces do the same, leaving it to the federal government to provide that small force only which is necessary to look after the unorganized territories which are in its jurisdiction?

May I add a word or two on another question which has been touched on by a few hon. members? Speaking on the principle of the proposed legislation, and particularly in respect of the reduction of the staff of the militia, my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn), whom I am sorry not to see in his seat at the present time, has shed a few tears regarding the few generals who have to retire. As to the general character of these officers, the services they have rendered the country, and their high attainments, I do not believe there is any difference of opinion among the members of this House, or among all classes of our population. But I do not think that we should be altogether as sensitive as my hon. friend would like us to be.

There are other people who displayed merit during the war. There are many men who served in the Canadian Expeditionary Force who cannot display their breasts bedecked with medals; they received no titles; they can only show their merits and their claims to consideration by exhibiting an amputated arm or an amputated leg. And yet these brave men when the forces were called back to this country were demobilized and granted a very small pension indeed. Sometimes, forsooth, they were left in a dire condition and face to face with great hardship.

But if these examples are not altogether appropriate when we consider our great generals at home—and I do not sneer at the officers in question—if these examples are not altogether appropriate to their case, let me cite to them an example that history gives us. There was once a great general in Rome named Cincinnatus. He came out of the ranks of the citizens. He served his country, and when he left the army he returned to the plough. A great number of our generals came from the ranks of the citizens of Canada to serve in a citizen army. They have served their country well; their country is much indebted to them; now that the war is over let them return to the plough; let them return to their daily occupation, let them serve in the large army of the citizens of Canada who are toiling to establish peace and prosperity in this Dominion. If they do this they will not only deserve the commendations of the nation for the services they have rendered under arms, but they will earn the praise of future generations for having done their duty whether under arms or in civilian attire. Mr. Chairman, I believe the proposed legislation deserves the approval of the committee and that the resolution should pass as drafted.

Mr. BOYS: Before the resolution is adopted I would like to draw the attention of the minister to the provisions of section 8. Let me read them:

> That provision be made to vest the powers, duties and functions vested in the Ministers and Deputy Ministers under the various Acts relating to the Naval Service, the Militia, Militia Pensions, the Royal Military College, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Dominion Police, in the Minister of National Defence, and the Deputy Minister of National Defence respectively—and so on. I take it for granted it is the intention of the minister to include the Canadian Air Force because I observe by section 2 the following language:

> That the Minister shall be charged with all matters relating to Defence, including the Militia the Military, Naval, Air and Police Services of Canada.

It would appear to me under the wording of the section as it stands now, that the powers, duties and functions which are vested in the minister under the provisions of the Air Board Act, 9 and 10 George V, Chapter 11, are entirely omitted. I am personally very much interested in the Air Force and I certainly do not wish to see it omitted. I do not believe it is the intention of the minister to omit the Air Force, but I would like to suggest that the language of section 8 be amended so as to include the provisions of the Air Board Act. It may be there is other legislation dealing with the Air Board, or the Canadian Air Force, with which I am not familiar; but I think that all such provisions should be included in section 8 so that thereby the powers, duties and functions vested in the minister and deputy minister pursuant to the same may also pass to the Minister of National Defence, which evidently is the intention of the section.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Air Force is a little different in its organization; there is no deputy minister in the Air Force.

Mr. BOYS: No, but there is the act.

Mr. GRAHAM: And the Minister of Militia is only chairman of the Air Board.

Mr. BOYS: The language of section 2, if I remember correctly, provides that the minister himself shall be chairman. There is also a vice-chairman provided for, and then there is the provision of the act which gives certain powers which are now being exercised by the Air Board. I presume it is the intention of the minister that all these powers should now be vested, under the proposed bill, in the Minister of National Defence. If it is the intention to include the various statutes relating to the Minister of Militia and Defence it seems to me to be equally necessary to include the statute relating to the Air Board.

Mr. MURPHY: May I ask my hon. friend a question? I have not at hand the statute to which he refers but in that act are there powers and duties vested in the minister and deputy minister?

Mr. BOYS: I would say so, certainly, although I have not read it all.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not think so.

Mr. BOYS: It is provided that the Governor in Council shall appoint a member of the Air Board, who is one of the Ministers of the Crown, to be chairman of the board, and shall appoint one of the other members of the Air Force to be vice- chairman. One member of the Air Board is to be appointed as representative of the Department of Militia and Defence, and one as a representative of the Department of Naval Service. The members of the Air Board are to be appointed for a term of three years and are to be eligible for reappointment. They are to be paid such salaries as the Governor-in-Council may determine. Then follows section 3 dealing with the duties of the Air Board, and section 4 dealing with their powers. It is under that statute, as far as I know, that the Air Board gets all its powers.

It is manifest to me, from the remarks of the minister, and from the provisions of section 2 of the resolution, that it is his intention to continue the work of the Air Board, perhaps in a lesser degree, because I notice the estimates are cut to some extent, but I think the minister should amend that section to include the Air Board Act to which I have just referred, and perhaps some other legislation.

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend will see that there are no such powers vested in the minister or deputy minister under the act from which he has just quoted as there are in the acts cited in this resolution and in the bill that will be founded upon it.

Mr. BOYS: I do not suggest that for a moment, but I say there are powers, and I presume the desire of the minister is to retain those powers, whatever they may be, but I think the motion would have to be amended to accomplish the object.

Mr. GRAHAM: How would you propose to amend it? The object is to give all the authority necessary to the minister and deputy minister of the Department of National Defence for the management of the Air Service. As I understand it, there being no deputy minister, no act and no minister really referring to the Air Service, it was not necessary. The Air Service, as the hon. member from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) stated was attached to the Militia Department. The minister acted as chairman of the board. As I intimated his duties were most perfunctory. If the lawyers agree that an amendment is necessary, I am willing that it should be inserted. To my mind, it is not necessary, but legally it may be desirable.

Mr. BOYS: I do not profess any special knowledge on the subject at all, but I understand the entire work of the Air Board is carried on under this act, and it is the intention, to some degree at all events, to continue that work under the Minister of National Defence, and where is he going to get power to do it, unless the power under this act is taken by him. as power is taken by other branches of the service.

Mr. MARTELL: I asked what was going to be done with regard to the fisheries protection service, and I have received no answer. I think we should make some provision for that service. We are going to create a department of National Defence, and I suppose that means the appointment of a large number of officials wearing gold braid. But we are leaving the Fishery Department, which is second only to Agriculture, altogether unprotected. I should like some answer as to what is proposed under this bill with reference to the fisheries protection service, which is administered by the Naval Department.

Mr. BOYS: I move that the word "and" as it first appears in the fourth line of paragraph 8 be omitted, and that the words " and the Air Board " be inserted after the words " Dominion Police."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GRAHAM: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to answer the question asked by the hon. member for Hants (Mr. Martell)? Under the act as it now stands, the fisheries protection service can be transferred from the Naval Department to the Marine Department by Order in Council. This scheme we now have in hand is not workable. I may point out, however, that the British navy undertakes largely, if not altogether, to operate the fishery protection service.

Mr. MARTELL: I know that in days gone by, when the fisheries were placed under the Naval Service Department, it was necessary, on all occasions, for the fisheries branch to apply to the naval service to protect the fishery routes. There was so much red tape and the departments were so jealous of each other, that often the reason for the fishery protection had disappeared before the department authorized the fishery boat to go to the place in question.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I think there is much in favour of this argument, and some of the officers of the Naval Department say that the protection of fisheries should be under the Department of Marine and Fisheries. It is a matter which may be adjusted between myself and my hon. friend later on.

Mr. CLARK: Although a new member of the House, and inexperienced in speaking before the committee, I consider that I would not be doing my duty if I did not place myself on record in connection with the resolution now under consideration. I have heard some very extreme views expressed this afternoon, and I feel that some of these views have been expressed by men possibly who have not had the actual experience in the matters on which they have so freely addressed the committee. I have been privileged to belong to the defence forces of Canada for some twenty years, and during that time it has been my great misfortune to have been called out in civil aid forces. It rather astonished me to hear the great applause which greeted the suggestion that the generals who had won their promotions in the face of the enemy, should now be decapitated, or as one hon. gentleman put it "let them return to the plough." All those of us who had the honour of serving our country, and the distinction, though I cannot say the honour, of fighting for those who so readily applause these extreme measures, will be astonished at the applause which greets the suggestion of doing away with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the dismissal of officers referred to and proposals which are detrimental to the efficiency of our defence forces.

The hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) asked if it was the desire of the late Minister of Militia that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should be called out in cases of industrial dispute. I do not know whether that is the leader of the Government's view of what the Mounted Police force exists for or not. That is not my view of the purpose for which they exist, but I shall refer to that later. The view has been expressed that the Mounted Police should become part of the National Defence Force of Canada. My opinion is that it is a dangerous thing to make the Mounted Police part and parcel of the defence force of Canada. The two are entirely distinct. One is for the purpose of defending the country in case of invasion; the other is, in my opinion, for the purpose of assisting in the maintenance of law and order in the country.

I have seen the Mounted Police used on numerous occasions, and I should like to give one instance of how I saw them used. Only two mounted policemen were used in this case, which occurred about a year ago in the town of Merritt, B.C., where a mine foreman had been foully murdered. The whole town was in a state of nervousness; the police of the town had no conception of how to tackle the problem; appeals were made by practically the whole town to bring in the Mounted Police, and a small detachment of two policemen was sent there. The moral effect which the presence of those policemen had in that town justifies the maintenance of such a force for the purpose of its moral effect, if for no other purpose. That, of course, would not justify the maintenance of a very large force, but the maintenance of a force is justified by the moral effect it has upon a community. I have seen the same thing demonstrated in many other towns, and I have given that one community as an illustration. There is a feeling of security in a community where the Mounted Police is established.

There comes, however, in our civil life a more serious phase which has had to be dealt with on many occasions in the history of Canada, and which may have to be dealt with in the future. That is not exactly what the Prime Minister has referred to, but it is something which has arisen out of industrial disputes and other conditions. I think the term "industrial disputes" is too narrow, and I personally would regret having the Mounted Police called into any town or city for the purpose of settling industrial disputes, because that, in my opinion, is not what they are for at all. But when, arising out of industrial disputes or any other conditions, we have anarchy or the danger of anarchy, then there is, in this or any other country, no force more fitted than the Mounted Police to deal with that condition. As one who has served in a civil aid force and one who has been unfortunate enough to be called out in the militia for that purpose, I want to place myself on record to the effect that no greater error can be made than to call the militia out in aid of the civil power. The last hon. member (Mr. Vien) who spoke on this subject, recommended that. If you want to destroy the efficiency of your defence force, that, in my opinion, is the best way to do it, because if we are going to have an effective defence force in this country, it must not be confined to any one particular class in a community. It must be open to all classes. We must encourage men of all classes, labouring men and others alike, to join the force, in order to make it efficient and give it scope to do the work that such a force should do, because, if that force is given the scope that it should be given, it will do more for the patriotism of this country than any other factor we have in Canada.

I am in entire sympathy with the general principle of the resolution. There are, no doubt, some features of it which can be criticized, and I think those points have been fully covered. But my object in speaking this afternoon is to attempt to bring home to the committee and to place before the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Graham) the great danger of ever placing the military forces of Canada in a position where it will be necessary to call them out in aid of the civil power, execept in the most dangerous and extreme cases. To place the Mounted Police in a position where they are part of the defence force of Canada, and may be called out for the purpose of the defence of this country, will have the same effect on the Mounted Police as the calling out of the militia has on the efficiency of that force.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend knows, of course, that the law, as it stands, gives the civil authorities the right to call out the militia in aid of the civil power.

Mr. CLARK (Burrard): I quite understand that.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I have listened very attentively to this debate, and the committee will pardon me if I say that I think they have rather ignored the real issue that is raised in this resolution. The real question to be considered in this bill is whether there is to be an instrument of some kind for the federal enforcement of federal law, as is the case in the United States. The President, the Attorney General and all the deputy attorneys general under him, throughout the United States, are to-day so organized as to be able to cope with any emergency that might arise. In the early history of the United States the principle was observed that the local community should be responsible for law and order in its own territory. But after 150 years of experience that principle has been gradually departed from and a great organization now exists on the other side, embracing an immense force, for federally enforcing federal law. They have erected federal courts throughout the United States, and we in Canada are moving in the same direction. We have a Supreme Court, a Court of Exchequer and other federal courts, and possibly later on we may find it advisable to follow in the footsteps of the United States and create a federal organization with comprehensive jurisdiction for the enforcement of federal law. Especially since the enactment of the federal prohibition law in the United States, the organization for enforcing federal law has been greatly increased there. They maintain courts, attorneys, officers of all kinds, a wide secret service, and, generally, thousands of agents. We cannot ignore altogether what they have done, because the time may come when we shall find a similar organization absolutely necessary in Canada.

Some other time I may refer further to this matter, but in the meantime I agree with what was said by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). His suggestion was a wise one, that some kind of civil force ought to be at the disposal of the Government. In my opinion it should be in the special charge of the Prime Minister or of the Minister of Justice. I also agree with what has been said by an hon. member, that in some way the protection of the fisheries should be properly maintained; and this bill could be modified to that end. If we think that the federal authority will not be called on at times to maintain federal law by its own organization, and even go the length of creating federal courts and appointing attorneys to prosecute in those courts, then we are not reading the signs of the times. Some hon. gentlemen contend that the provinces should maintain law and order. The doctrine was preached in Ontario that the local authorities should maintain order in their own localities, but the province is now creating a provincial police force for the purpose of enforcing provincial law where hitherto the local authorities were held responsible.

Mr. MURPHY: Have they not always had a provincial force in Ontario?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Yes, but the force is being highly organized now, somewhat on the lines of the Mounted Police. I am not advocating any particular action; I am simply pointing out that in the United States the question of federal enforcement of federal law has become so alarming that they have voted immense sums of money to carry on the machinery I have mentioned. It is all very well for us to ignore what they have done in the United States; but peace and order in that country have been maintained in the last twenty-five years only by constitutional subterfuge. They have created institutions for the enforcement of all kinds of law throughout the country by legislation of pretty much the same order as that which gave them control of transportation. There the condition of things is much like ours; there is a distribution of powers between the states and the central government. We may be compelled to maintain some kind of force for the enforcement of federal law in connection with the prohibition laws we have in this country. In view of the fact that, as I have pointed out, the President of the United States, the Attorney General, and the vast organization which they have created are holding themselves in readiness to meet any emergencies that might arise, I think that we ought at least to be prepared to do something in the same direction. I do not contend that the federal power should be increased, but I do say that we may have to assume such responsibilities as the federal authorities on the other side have had to shoulder. I believe the leader of the Opposition gave a very fair statement of his case, and as near as I can judge he reflected the opinion of Sir John Macdonald on this very question. Sir John inclined to the view that the provincial authorities should as far as possible enforce the law within the provinces. But notwithstanding all that, our Customs and Inland Revenue organization at the start was largely undertaken by the federal authorities, and to-day we have a federal organization for the enforcement of our inland revenue law; so have the United States. In the same way we may have to adopt a similar procedure in the maintenance of peace and order. Ultimately we will pass through the same experiences as the United States, and while I should like to see our local authorities in all cases able to maintain peace and order, they may fall down in that work, and I think we ought to have some little skeleton organization, as the leader of the Opposition termed it, around which could be maintained a force for the maintenance of peace and order. I should like to see such an organization put under the charge of the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice. In that way we might avoid mistakes that otherwise will certainly be made if we take the position that the federal authority has no responsibility for the maintenance of peace and order.

Resolution as amended reported and concurred in.

Mr. GRAHAM thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 27 respecting the Department of National Defence.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the first and second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the chair.

Progress reported.

Mr. BOYS: Will the minister at eight o'clock make the somewhat lengthy statement he promised?

Mr. GRAHAM: I am prepared to go right on with the bill to-night, if you choose.

Mr. BOYS: We do not want any mistake.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

CORRECTION—STATEMENT BY Mr. FIELDING

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, there is a personal explanation I desire to make. I notice in the press an item referring to yesterday's proceedings which would convey the impression to those who were not present that our good friend the Assistant Clerk of this House had been rather lacking in courtesy to myself. I desire to say that there is no foundation for it whatever. What happened was exactly in accordance with the understanding, and the Assistant Clerk simply did his duty. Then, as in every other case, he has always been courteous, as he should be, to all the members of the House. For his sake, I regret the comment in the press, because it was entirely unwarranted.

SUPPLY

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Civil Government—Indian Affairs—salaries, $145,425; contingencies, $19,000.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the minister will explain what he is doing with respect to what I might call the extraordinary services of the department, for example, the greater production work.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of the Interior): During the period when production was very necessary, a scheme of breaking land upon the Indian reservations was undertaken under the supervision of Mr. Graham, who is the official in charge at Regina. He has made a very fair success of the undertakings. Naturally it is not desirable to continue that work, but there is the question of getting the land back into the hands of the Indians who farm the land, and these are invariably students coming out of school. A very large proportion of that land has been given to these young students, and they are now established in farming them. I would have had the figures with me had I anticipated this matter coming up this evening, but I have not got them here.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I could not expect the minister to furnish them under this item. I would just like a statement of policy as to what he proposes doing.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have discussed this matter with Mr. Graham and the deputy minister, and we have decided that as fast as the Indians are able to take this land and farm it under the supervision of the agents, they will be allowed to do so. In the meantime, a very considerable portion of it will have to be farmed under the supervision of Mr. Graham. There are some four hundred odd acres in the vicinity of Regina, which it is the intention of the department to continue as an experimental and demonstration farm. The rest will be turned over to the Indians as fast as they are able to take the land.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister mean that this farm near Regina will be retained for experimentation purposes by the Indian Department, or will it be turned over to the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The intention is to run it under the control of the Department of Indian Affairs, simply because it is very close to Mr. Graham's office. It will be used for demonstration purposes, the distribution of seed grain, and that sort of thing. We think it will be very beneficial.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think probably the minister is right in that. I notice that the salary for the Accountant and Purchasing Agent has been very considerably increased, much beyond the figure, I think, fixed by the classification for an accountant. Why is an exception made here.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This is absolutely under the control of the Civil Service Commission and I cannot understand how the salary of the accountant in this case could be higher. I understand there are three grades of accountants—at least that is true of the Department of Interior—and different salaries appertain to the different grades.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think in this case the salary is higher than in the case of the accountants that have been re-classified. When I see an extra piece of nomenclature after an officer's title I always become suspicious. That is the plan usually adopted should they want to get in a bigger salary than the classification allows. The official then becomes something exceptional. I notice here the accountant has become a purchasing agent. I think the minister would do well to look into the matter before he brings this estimate down as the proper salary.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I can give you a summary of the estimates of the department in so far as civil government is concerned. For the fiscal year 1922-23 these increases were granted for meritorious service: Three increases of $180; 17 of $120; 15 of $60; and 6 of $50. The increase in the salary of the Superintendent of Indian Education, due to change in classification in the schedule, amounts to $335. There is an increase due to an amount being provided for a new position as clerk stenographer, $960, making a total increase in civil government in the department of $5,075. Then there were savings due to no provision being made for two positions. There is the position of chief surveyor, which you will notice is dropped, and that of junior architect. The chief surveyor has $3,240, the junior architect $1,920. As to the savings I am not very clear but I imagine they are because the salaries set forth are the minimum salaries in positions which became vacant during the year. The appointees now start at the minimum; therefore, there is a saving in the salary. As the appointees start at the minimum, you have a saving until the individual who takes the position goes to his maximum. The reductions in salary are: Clerk, $900; chief stenographer, $340; chief clerk, $460; head clerk, $320; architect, $180; junior clerk stenographer, $180; clerk stenographer, $90; and clerk stenographer, $60. This makes a total of $7,690 and the increases are $5,075 representing a net saving of $2,615 for the department this year. There is no special claim made for saving because there are no changes; it is simply the result of the classification in these particular cases. The senior officials have either gone into other positions or have retired from the service, and those filling the positions have begun at the minimum salary.

Mr. JACOBS: Could the minister tell us how many Indians are wards of the Government? I would like to have some idea of the number?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It is a most difficult thing to obtain this information at present. If hon. members will confine their questions to estimates on civil government I can furnish them with the desired information which has been pretty well prepared. If they venture out of that field, however, I shall have to hunt for the details. However I shall be able to give that when the general Estimates are under discussion. All matters appertaining to those estimates will then be the subjects of inquiry. I am perfectly willing if the necessary time is allowed to answer questions outside of civil government, but I may say that it is on that particular subject I have had the information prepared.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I notice that in the Department of Indian Affairs there is a departmental solicitor, and of course a law clerk stenographer to help him out. The solicitor this year receives $3,660. Would the minister give us an idea of what this official's duties are in the department? His name is Williams, I think.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I notice there are legal officials in every one of the departments. I imagine this particular official will have to attend to transfers of property, and leases; there is also other legal business being done by the department. I am not prepared to say just exactly what he does, but I presume he is transacting that sort of legal business for the protection of the department.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That touches the point I desire to raise. For many years, I think, the various departments have had solicitors upon their staff. I notice on page 77 of the Estimates that the Department of the Interior has another departmental solicitor drawing a similar salary; and if you turn to page 76 you will find that in the Department of Secretary of State there are two departmental solicitors. There is also one in the Department of External Affairs, and one in the Militia Department; but the latter is Judge Advocate General and deals with military law, because I think the practice in this department in regard to civil law is to refer all questions to the Justice Department. I think there is a solicitor in the Customs Department, another in the Public Works Department, and certainly one in the Department of Railways. Now under our system we have a Department of Justice which is the responsible legal department of the Government. The head of that department is the legal adviser of the Government, and of all the departments of the Government, and in my judgment that department alone should retain the necessary legal assistance and should advise the various public departments. I have heard this matter discussed by the last Minister of Justice the hon. Mr. Doherty, and I remember hearing it discussed during the former Liberal administration. The truth is that under the present system each department is acting for itself in regard to practically all the legal matters, while at the same time the head of the Department of Justice is nominally responsible for the administration of justice and the conduct of legal affairs throughout all the departments of government. I believe that the legal talent in the various departments should be concentrated in a single department. I think there would then be a considerable saving, and even if there were no saving it is proper that it should be done. I believe that in England they have certain law officers of the Crown, as we have here, but they are all in their proper department and advise the various departments of the public service; and if outside advice is sought, or extra work has to be done by solicitors, it is the Justice Department of Great Britain that employs them. They are responsible for every department and I think that system is the one we should work out here. To me it is an anomaly that, for instance, the solicitor of the Customs Department, or the solicitor of the Interior Department should advise that department and carry on legal business in the department, as is done in hundreds of cases, without referring the matter in any way whatsoever to the Department of Justice. During my term in the Department of Justice I saw case after case where there was a variance between the ruling of the Department of Justice and the ruling of the solicitor for the particular department involved. The thing is bound to happen. I know that Mr. Doherty had very serious views on the subject and I believe if the matter were tackled, money could be saved and better administration would result. In addition to that, we would have one single head responsible for the administration of all law in all departments. I would ask the ministers to consider the question, and see if they cannot concentrate and amalgamate in this instance, just as the minister is endeavouring to do in the matter of national defence.

Mr. MARTELL: In reference to the departmental solicitor, while I quite agree with a great deal the hon. ex-minister (Mr. Guthrie) has said, I think it is a matter of great convenience to the departments to have their solicitors in the building where the department is situated. Very often matters come up which are purely of local interest to the department. They are not establishing any new point of law. For instance in the Department of Marine and Fisheries there are cases where a contract has to be drawn as regards the collection of spawn for salmon breeding purposes, or there are cases where they have to draw a short contract between some people who are collecting the spawn, or short term leases. Probably these contracts will expire in six months or a year, and the deputy minister or the official concerned can go to the solicitor in that particular department, give instructions to him and have him draw the document, whereas if the department had to take these matters to the Department of Justice they would remain there for five or six weeks before any reply would be given, and sometimes the contract would not be entered into because it was too late. Moreover the Department of Justice, if it has not improved very much of late years, has no officer who is fully qualified to deal with particular branches of the law. They may have no officers who are qualified upon the law relating to marine and fisheries. The law official for the Marine and Fisheries Department should be thoroughly conversant with maritime law. I think there have been cases where the decision of the Department of Marine and Fisheries has been at variance with the decision of the Department of Justice, and the Department of Justice has over-ruled the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The matter has been pressed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries with the result that the Department of Justice has had to admit it was absolutely wrong. I think it is most absurd that a man in the Marine and Fisheries Department who is qualified in regard to maritime law should be compelled to submit his opinion to the Department of Justice perhaps to a man who from the maritime point of view would be termed a "land-lubber." The majority of those in the Department of Justice do not know the stern of a boat from the bow, the keelson from the keel, or larboard from starboard. They are not expected to know, because the majority of them were trained in law schools, or in portions of the country where shipping is not an important thing. I think, therefore, that it is a very good practice to have in the different departments as solicitors men who are well qualified and well acquainted with the branch of the law which is apt to come under the cognizance of that particular department, and I believe that is the reason why the conditions which obtained in the past as regards departmental solicitors still continue. They have obtained for the past twenty years, but if the hon. gentleman's views are to prevail then it should be a condition precedent that the Department of Justice allocate to the different departments men who are thoroughly qualified to deal with the particular phase of law applicable to the department to which they are allocated.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Even on the statement of my hon. friend from Hants (Mr. Martell) an expert in maritime law in the Department of Marine and Fisheries may be a very good lawyer and may advise his minister or his department in a certain way, but the man who is responsible to this House and to the country for all the advice given to this Government is the Minister of Justice, and it frequently happens that he knows nothing whatever of the advice that has been given by a body of solicitors in the various departments. That has happened time and again. The one responsible head has never heard of it, and if it is only a matter of getting experts in the various branches, if they do not have them in the Department of Justice, they can get them; that is where they should be. It would be more convenient, and work could be done more expeditiously if they were there, and it would mean a considerable saving.

Mr. MARTELL: If it is the practice now, I know it was not the practice in days gone by for the departmental solicitor to give advice on any matter that might be regarded as a matter of governmental policy. I understand the practice was that he merely advised on local matters, which were merely of temporary moment, but not of any great importance as affecting the government's policy from the legal standpoint.

Mr. GUTHRIE: They have gone further than that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would appear from the estimates that the architect has died or been retired, and lower amounts have been placed in the estimates, indicating that a new man is coming in. I suggest to the minister that before he takes anybody, either as architect or secretary clerk, but especially the first, he consider the advisability of abolishing the position. I never saw any need of the architect. There was an architect. I think in the course of nature he now is an officer no longer. It is worth considering whether there should be a successor appointed. As to the secretary clerk, I found the officers of the department faithful and efficient, but I must say that I never was persuaded that they were overworked, and I made up my mind that I would not interfere with the course of Providence, if they were reduced in number.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In reply to the hon. leader of the Opposition, it has occurred to me, although I am speaking largely from hearsay, that there is a large number of Indian schools—rightly or wrongly I have been hearing of some of them—that require some attention. It is not absolutely necessary that a man should be an architect to inspect a building, but there is some construction to be done, and undoubtedly there are many architects in other parts of the service of this Government, and there may be no great necessity for this particular official in this department. Indeed I may say, in enlarging upon what my hon. friend has said with respect to solicitors, that there does seem to be overlapping, if one can judge by a simple glance at the Estimates of the Civil Service. I have forty odd surveyors in the Interior Department, I think, in addition to the assistants. True they do a valuable work, and there is provision in this estimate for them. I am inclined to agree with my hon. friend in the suggestion that something might be done to prevent overlapping. I am somewhat in agreement with the statement of my hon. friend who has just spoken on behalf of the departmental solicitor. He might very well be an official of the Department of Justice, under the control of that department, and I may say for the benefit of my legal friends that in the small province from which I come we had one department under the control of the Attorney General, and did not have solicitors in any of the other departments, but I am surprised to hear them say that lawyers disagree. They should not, on matters of this character, where no very serious questions are involved. I quite understand the necessity for those particular individuals in those particular departments, but I think they should be under the control of the Department of Justice.

Might I answer the question of my hon. friend (Mr. Jacobs) as he is desirous of having it upon the record? I have made a rough estimate of the Indian population; I am not sure that I am correct, but I will, with the consent of the Chairman, give it by provinces. The figures are as follows:

Province	Population	Number of reserves
Nova Scotia	2,031	45
New Brunswick	1,846	26
Prince Edward Island	292	2
Ontario	20,969	138
Quebec	13,366	20
Manitoba	11,927	68
Saskatchewan	10,431	89
Alberta	9,332	61
Northwest Territories	3,620

This statement does not give the number of reserves in the North West Territories.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about British Columbia?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The population is 20,744. I cannot say whether the Yukon in included in that or not. I have not the figures for the Yukon.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The total is, I think, about 91,000.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I made a rough computation showing it to be a little more.

Item agreed to.

Civil Government—Mines—salaries and contingencies, $514,862 50.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a substantial increase.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): A very considerable increase will be found in the estimates for the Department of Mines. This is one of the departments in the success of which, outside of the Department of Agriculture, I am more interested than in that of any other department of the Government. We are continually speaking about the future of Canada, and I think it is well said that if we are to make a success of Canada, we must make our agriculturists successful; but in the same breath I would say that it is necessary that we carry on legitimate research work in connection with the vast stores of minerals contained within the boundaries of this country, and hand in hand with the development and success of agriculture, should go the success of mineral development in Canada. In the province from which I come, the question of mineral development is a very live one, because a great deal of wealth comes from the products of our mines. One need only mention that, of the tonnage carried by the railroads of Canada, 44 per cent represents the products of the mines.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is that not mostly coal from the United States?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Not altogether. A proportion of it is coal from the United States, but the balance is the product of our mines. The products of the mines of the United States travel over short distances in Canada, by rail from Port Arthur to Winnipeg and slightly beyond the latter point, and throughout the province of Ontario. I mention this merely to point out the desirability of proper research work being carried on in this particular department.

I found, on taking charge of this department, that, owing to the very rapid development in Canada during the period of the war, we lost the services of a number of officials of the department, who were very important to its success. We have in the province of Alberta two or three highly skilled men, who should, in my opinion, be in the Mines Department of the Dominion of Canada to-day. One of them is a chemist, who is experimenting in clays with the idea of solving the problem of a mixture of clays that will make a road surface that will stand the weather conditions of our province. He is having splendid success. We have not in that province, as, indeed, in many other parts of Canada, road metal either of gravel or of rock for the purpose of surfacing our roads, and this gentleman is working in the Science Department of the University of Alberta, endeavouring to solve this problem. Alongside of him is Dr. Stansfield, a chemist who is experimenting with the briquetting of lignite coal. He is working there on the problem of the extraction of oil from the tar sands found in the vicinity of Fort McMurray, north of Edmonton, in that province. Speaking of agriculture, I think that, perhaps, no greater benefit has accrued to the Canadian farmer than the development of "Marquis" wheat by Dr. Saunders, and in the same way, I am asking for an appropriation to carry on investigational work in the field of mining, increasing the staff of men who will perform geological field work through this Dominion wherever there appears to be a favourable opportunity. They will map the area and furnish the information to men who are desirous of pursuing the business of mining, in order to attract them to Canada to develop those vast natural resources which we possess. I dwell upon this because I believe it is an important work, and I believe this money that I am asking Parliament to vote will be well spent and will come back a thousand fold to the people of Canada if it is spent in a proper direction. That is the statement which I have to make in this connection. There is an increase of nine officials, principally young men who will go out on investigational field work during the summer months. The rest of the increases, so far as I know, are statutory increases, a matter over which we have little or no control.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In general I agree with the minister as to the value of the department from a practical standpoint, and as to the wisdom of not too strictly confining it in the matter of expenditure. But what he says as to the department can be said with equal force of, I should say, 50 per cent at least of the services of the Government, though with less force as to the rest. This is scarcely a year for expanding the overhead charge of any department. Last year, when there was considerable criticism, there was a reduction in the expenditures from the year before. This year the increase is about $18,500 over last year and about $17,000 over the year before. This is a pretty substantial increase. I would ask the minister to consider if it would not be possible to obtain the services he requires without expanding the vote. I know there is always a tendency on the part of deputies, indeed on the part of good deputies, to increase the number of their officers. I have no fault to find with the Deputy Minister of Mines. Indeed, I think he is an excellent official. As a matter of fact, I selected him myself.

Mr. McMASTER: No higher praise is possible.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I say, he is an excellent official; nevertheless the tendency on the part of the very best men is to seek to expand the number of men around them. It is human nature, and if the minister will look down through the estimates I think he will see a few cases where, at the first opportunity, he might very well effect an economy. For example, it will not decrease the mineral output of the country if we did without an ethnologist. I believe that an ethnologist has been added at $3,300. How will he increase our mineral output? I may be wrong but I understand that this persons studies the remains of prehistoric man. Then, why should there be an ornithologist in the Mines Department? In the Interior Department the minister will find that there is a Parks Branch under a very competent official who pays particular attention to the bird life of Canada, which he has taken very practical steps to preserve and increase. He has done admirable work, which is of a practical nature. But why should we study ornithology as a scientific pursuit in connection with the Mines Department? I do not see that any practical service could be rendered that branch by the study of ornithology.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): He is an addition this year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Well, at least the ethnologist appears to have been added by the minister, that is, if I read the item correctly.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I do not think that either the assistant or the chief ethnologist is an addition. I agree with the leader of the Opposition in his criticism of the gentleman who looks after the birds, but I think that the ethnologist was in the department when the right hon. gentleman was there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the minister is wrong. I do not see an ethnologist in the list last year, and if he looks at the item he will see that $3,300 is provided for this officer this year. Further down the list an assistant chemist is added, and on the next page there are added a principal account clerk, principal clerk book-keeper, and a senior translator. Really I do not know what need there is for a translator in the Mines Department. There would be need for one in the Indian Branch, because there is a language to translate, but not in the Mines Department.

Mr. JACOBS: They need the translator in studying prehistoric man.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That might be so, but I do not think that they often find literature among the remains of prehistoric men. Now, at various points down there have been additions, and almost everywhere increases in salary, varying considerably. It seems to me that if the minister would go over this list with his deputy carefully he could come within last year's figure, and at the same time meet all the really practical requirements of the department.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The translator, I understand, is at work preparing detailed reports of the department in French. The additional clerks are in connection with the Explosives Branch. Perhaps my hon. friend will know more about that branch than I do, but I believe that that branch is a necessary addition to the Mines Department, and they are expanding it this year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But why expand it? It has been a part of the Department of Mines for years.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It has not been in existence very long—about four years, I think.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Five years.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): It was established for the purpose of preserving life and property, and I think it is of considerable value. Outside of one or two of the officials mentioned, my hon. friend will find that the nine persons that have been added are largely young men who will go out on field work. I am informed that during the war the department was depleted to a great extent. I think my hon. friend will agree that in pre-war days there was really a larger staff in the department than there is to-day. At least the deputy minister so informs me. The study of the structure of the earth's crust with respect to the location of oil and minerals is a very important work in this country, and I should like this vote to stand for this purpose. It may not be all used; we may not be able to get the men. As a matter of fact, that was one of the difficulties which my hon. friend had to contend with when he was the minister of the department; men could not be secured. More than that, the department could not hold the men at the salaries that were paid. Now, I am very desirous to see economy exercised in every department of the Government, but it must be recognized that we have to pay larger salaries to men who go into this class of work and who make investigational research their life work. No one can estimate the value of this work in dollars and cents, and at this stage of the development of Canada it is important that we attract all the capital possible to this country to develop our resources. That is what I have in mind in increasing research work in the field this year by the addition of a few young men who will spend the summer months in various parts of the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is a great deal in what the minister says. It is true that during the time I was minister we were not able to hold the good men, and some perhaps not so good, at the salaries we were paying. At that time owing to the general commercial conditions very high salaries were offered in private service, particularly for expert geologists.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): And for chemists as well.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. They were attracted by those offers and accepted them, and had the vacancies been filled immediately we would have had to fill them at a scale that I thought we could not maintain after the war, and certainly we would not be able to reduce it, for that is virtually never done. Therefore it seemed to me that in the public interest it would be better to wait until men could be secured at a more reasonable scale of salaries rather than throw out of line the scale for similar work in all the departments, because if men were brought in at a higher scale in one department that scale would have had to apply throughout the other departments. I see no objection to these positions if properly qualified men can be secured at reasonable salaries to do the work, so long as the offices are for the achievement of practical mineral work. But, for example, if the Vertebrate Palaeontologist has been taken away by the attraction of a high salary from a private company, I do not see that the vacancy should be filled. And my criticism still stands as to the Ethnologist. For the life of me I do not know why that position has been created. Nor would it occur to me that there is any need at all for an extra translator. Very often it happens that each department feels it has to have a translator of its own, and that translator has to have an assistant under him. It seems to me that if the translators on the principle suggested by my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) could be brought together to do the translating for the various departments, there could be a very great reduction in their number. Last year we had only one here; this year I notice an extra translator has been added. I have reviewed only a few. It is such positions as those that I should like to see reduced whenever it can be done without breach of contract with any of the men.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I agree with a great deal that has been said with respect to this matter, and as I am in charge of four departments employing a good many civil servants, I want to have an investigation conducted to ascertain whether or not we are now over-lapping in certain directions. If we are, then it is within the power of the minister to reduce the positions. I am not able to say at the moment whether all of those officials are required or not, but I agree with what the right hon. leader of the Opposition has said, that in appointing Mr. Camsell he chose a very efficient official. From the explanations Mr. Camsell has given me I think he is desirous of getting results with the minimum amount of help. But I am pleading for sufficient money to employ those young men who are taking scientific courses in our universities, and during the few months of the summer season to put them out on this investigational work in order to secure results that will be valuable to those who are interested in our mineral development. I agree with my right hon. friend that those who invest money in such development require a very considerable amount of capital for the purpose. Therefore it should be our business to attract to Canada all the capital we can for the development of our mineral resources. I am not able to say at the moment that every one of these positions can be filled, but if they can be, and parties can be put out to gather valuable information for tabulation and use, it will be to the advantage of the country, and that is why I am asking for this vote.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Does the minister know of any member of the government who is going to ask the House to accept lower estimates for the current fiscal year than for the fiscal year just passed?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I have just finished the estimates of a department that is asking for a smaller vote—the Department of Indian Affairs.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I am sorry I was not in the House at the time. But with that exception every department has shown an increase in its estimates for the current year.

Mr. BELAND: There was a reduction in my department.

Mr. RYCKMAN: There were several etceteras added to the estimates of the minister's department.

Mr. MURPHY: In my department there are very substantial reductions and no etceteras.

Mr. RYCKMAN: We have not come to that department yet.

Mr. MURPHY: Not yet.

Mr. RYCKMAN: But I ask hon. members who have listened to the proposal put forward if it is not the fact that upon the right hand side of the Estimates the amount is less than that appearing on the left hand side. In a word, these increased figures are characteristic of the Estimates so far, including what the minister proposes in this instance. The Department of Agriculture, wherein I expected my hon. friends to my left would have sounded the note of economy, has submitted estimates, and notwithstanding the provisions of the Civil Service Act we have found at the foot of the column an addition made for such sums as the minister might seek to add in case of promotion.

Some hon. MEMBERS: That is too bad.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been called to account by two ministers, and that is enough. But I should like hon. members opposite to me, hon. members to the right of me, and hon. members to the left of me, to tell me of any single manufacturing concern in Quebec, Ontario, or in the West that within their knowledge has increased the salaries of its staff for the current year. I pause for any hon. member to rise in his place and say if that has been done. But we have had here with depressing uniformity, one case after another of ministers standing up and asking to be accorded the privilege of increasing the salaries of officials in their respective departments. Now, that is wrong. The country, irrespective of parties, is determined that economy shall be practised. A system of rigid economy coupled with intelligent business management, is what the country is looking for, but I submit that we are getting neither economy nor good sound business management.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have gone down the list a little more carefully and would draw the minister's attention to these additions—particularly the office of Ethnologist; I should like him not to forget the office of the Ethnologist. Then I see there is an Associate Vertebrate Palaeontologist. As far as I know that position has nothing to do with mines or mineral development.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Those men are employed in making and arranging collections.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There have been added also two associate mineralogists. I do not say that they are not necessary, but I really do not feel that they are. There is also an associate physical anthropologist. It is some days since I studied anthropology, but I do not think that position is very closely related to mineral development either. On the next page there is a principal account clerk, a principal clerk book-keeper and two engineers, Grade 1, added. I do not know what these engineers drawing a salary of $1,680 are for. I do not know what particular work they have, but I think it is worth inquiring whether they are necessary. The assistant chemist may be passed along with the associate mineralogists. I notice that a translator has also been added. That makes three translators in the Mines Department, where I feel fairly satisfied there is no need of that number. Then there is a stores clerk added, near the bottom of the list—why, I do not know.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There are only nine new positions including the young men I have mentioned who are going out into the field. The others are promotions. The titles I do not pretend to understand. Apparently the service generally has gone mad over giving official titles. I will give the list of new positions included for 1922-23 and of the positions dropped which were included in 1921-22:

My hon. friend will see that there are twenty-eight new positions and that nineteen have been dropped, which makes a net addition of nine.

In reply to my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Ryckman), who has spoken so heatedly over salary increases, let me say that the members of this Government have little or nothing to do with those increases. It is true that an official may be recommended for promotion by the deputy minister, but it does not follow that the promotion will be approved by the Civil Service Commission. They decide whether the promotion shall go through, and fix the salary.

Mr. RYCKMAN: If the Civil Service Commission fix the salaries, how was it that the Department of Agriculture was provided with a certain appropriation to take care of promotions? If we have a certain sum to take care of promotions, why can we not provide for decreases. That is what troubles me.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): If you vote the minimum salary and the individual is promoted, you have no money to pay him, so you must either vote the salary he will receive if the expected promotion goes through, or vote a lump sum to take care of expected promotions. That is what has been done in nearly all these cases, with possibly the single exception I have mentioned where it happened that the two salaries were voted. In the case of the Department of Agriculture a lump sum was voted to take care of expected increases. But the point is that neither the minister nor the deputy minister controls the salary; that is fixed by the Civil Service Commission. We can recommend a promotion, but it does not follow that it will be approved; we do not control promotions.

Mr. RYCKMAN: The minister says that he cannot control the promotion, yet in the vote that was before this House yesterday a certain sum was provided to take care of promotions.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I thought I explained that. I said that in certain departments a lump sum was voted to take care of expected promotions, and that in others the expected salary increase was voted. It would undoubtedly tend to a great deal less confusion if either the one or the other course was followed in all departments, and undoubtedly that will be done next year.

Mr. LEWIS: With respect to the men who are going out to do field work, I notice that opposite these positions are certain salaries. Are these salaries for the year, or are these university students simply paid for the few months they are out in the field?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The salaries are on a yearly basis.

Mr. KNOX: The minister has stated that a number of men will be sent out on field work this year. I should like to know how many of these parties will be sent to northern Saskatchewan.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot say offhand as to Saskatchewan, but I think I am correct in saying that there is an arrangement with British Columbia that certain investigational work will be carried on there each year. I know that in Alberta the local government frequently makes representations to the department, and I believe individuals do also, asking that certain areas be investigated. In the northern part of both these provinces a considerable amount of work has been done. I cannot say at the moment just what territory will be covered by the field parties this year, but I am given to understand that we endeavour to send out parties wherever there are indications that a field requires investigational work.

Item agreed to.

Post Office Department—salaries, $1,118,648; contingencies, $168,000.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Postmaster General): In connection with this item the committee will observe that there is a decrease in the number of employees as compared with the number last year, and also a decrease in the salaries to be paid. Last year there were 951 employees in the Inside Service; this year there are 806, or a decrease of 145. The explanation regarding these decreases will be found at page 102, at the end of these estimates, under "Civil Government." Forty-seven positions have been abolished. Sixty-seven positions are now in the Outside Service that were previously in the Inside Service and these, I may explain, consist of positions in the branch dead letter offices throughout the country. Then there were six positions not required and which were done away with, and twenty-six unclassified positions not required which were also done away with. Last year, the committee will observe, the salaries amounted to $1,297,146. This year they total $1,118,648 or a decrease of $178,498. In all other respects I may observe that the estimates of this year for civil government for the Post Office Department are substantially the same as those for last year. The committee will further observe, under the head of contingencies, three items, the total of which last year was $156,000; this year the amount is $168,000. Two of the items are identical in amount; the other, that for printing and stationery, shows an increase of $12,000. Last year the amount voted was $63,000. This year the amount asked for is $75,000, and the explanation is the increased cost of supplies and materials. These are the chief features of the estimates for civil government as they appear before the committee.

Mr. HANSON: The minister has stated that the increase of $12,000 in the cost of printing and stationery is due to the enhanced cost of printing material. It would occur to the ordinary mind that the reverse should be the case because the cost of paper, for example, has been very considerably reduced in the last twelve months. If that is not the case in this particular instance I think there must be something wrong with my hon. friend's printing department. I would like to know if the expenditure of $75,000 refers to payments made to friends of the Government, or does it represent payments made to the Printing Bureau? There are various ways of subsidizing the press friendly to the Government. I would like to know therefore if this is some government pap that has been thrown out to friends in the newspaper business or whether it consists of money paid to another department?

Mr. MURPHY: The suggestion contained in the concluding remark of my hon. friend falls on unaccustomed ears: I have no knowledge of any pap thrown out to any supporters of the Government. I may explain for the benefit of my hon. friend, who has asked a very proper question, as well as for the benefit of other members of the committee, that this money is disbursed through the Printing Bureau and not by the Post Office Department. All the supplies are purchased through the Printing Bureau, and the practice followed there will be explained by my colleague in the Government who has charge of that department. As to the other observation of my hon. friend that the amount of this vote should be less this year than last, because of a decrease in the price of paper, might I point out to him that he has not taken into account the ext quantity of material required by reason of the continuous increase in the business of the Post Office Department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of the diminution in numbers the minister has stated that sixty-seven represent positions formerly in the inside service that are now in the outside service. So that the reductions appear to be 47, 6 and 26 respectively—positions abolished by Order in Council; positions not required, and unclassified positions not required. Is the minister in a position to tell us the dates when these reductions were made by Order in Council? that is to say the dates of the forty-seven reductions, the six not required, and the twenty-six unclassified not required?

Mr. MURPHY: In reply to my right hon. friend I am informed that these reductions were made by Order in Council between the 15th July last and the 15th January last.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought so. Therefore I will assume that the applause coming from my left was intended for this side of the House. Now I am sure the minister will be frank enough to say, as well, that these reductions followed the re-organization which the late government put into effect for which it got so much abuse from the press of Ottawa, particularly the press of Montreal, and which doubtless was the cause of our losing some seats. However I am quite content that seats should be lost in order that the public interests might be served, and the encomiums of my friends to the left are now sufficient reward for me.

Mr. LEWIS: Instead of there being a decrease in the estimates I think the minister will find, if he will deduct the salaries of all the other positions that have been abolished, that there was an increase in salaries to the amount of $34,554.

Mr. HANSON: Oh, say not so.

Item agreed to.

Department of Public Works—salaries, $583,035; contingencies $94,000.

Mr. RYCKMAN: Is this an increase?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a decrease in salary, and a small increase in contingencies, but I do not think the decrease is anything at all—I speak now from memory and subject to correction—comparable to decreases which have been made continuously in that department because of the reduction of the work. That department has become pretty nearly all overhead. It is top-heavy. I know that the minister has been in office for a less period of time than his colleagues, but I am satisfied that there is not a department of the Government in which the minister can, with better advantage, direct his energies towards reorganization than the Department of Public Works. The work of reorganization that we had under way, and which should be continued now beyond all doubt, went through the Customs and Inland Revenue Departments, the Post Office, the Printing Bureau and reached the Public Works Department. It was done against great obstacles and in the face of the bitterest possible criticism, because when you start that kind of work you know what criticism is. I suggest that he should apply that reorganization to the Public Works Department, and he will be astonished at the saving he can make for the country. I must admit that he may possibly be a little surprised by the abuse brought upon his own head, but I know that he will be courageous enough to face it.

[Mr. Murphy.]

Hon. J. H. KING (East Kootenay, Minister of Public Works): Just a short explanation of the estimates. There has been a net reduction this year in the amount voted for salaries of $37,465. There will be some thirty-four employees dropped from the department, and we shall carry twenty-three vacancies. Some of those will be filled, and some probably will not be filled. The number of employees in the department has never, since 1913 or 1914, been as low as it is this year. There has been a gradual decrease. This year the total will be 295 as against 325 last year. In the contingency vote, there is a decrease in printing, the vote being $14,000 this year, as against $19,600 last year. In clerical and other assistance, there has been an increase of some thirteen employees who are being carried under the vote this year, but who were placed under other votes last year. There is a reduction in travelling expenses and also a slight increase in sundries, but the net decrease is some $37,000.

Mr. LEWIS: We have become used to hearing about increases in salary, with the statement that the Civil Service Commission is responsible for it. Take the second item, assistant deputy minister, the salary has been decreased $600. Is that the same assistant deputy minister, or is this a new one coming in?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There is a new one coming in at a lower salary.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is it necessary to have two travelling paymasters, one at $2,700 and one at $2,475, and also filing clerks, one at $2,160 and one at $1,920? I do not think there is a commercial concern in the Dominion of Canada which pays any such price to a file clerk. I think the usual salary is $50 to $75 a month.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): These officials travel from one portion of the country to another on a certain work the department is carrying out. The salaries are fixed by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. HANSON: There is an item here of $48,000 for travelling expenses; can the hon. gentleman tell me how much was expended last year?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am afraid I have not that information here.

Mr. HANSON: For the benefit of new members, it would be a great convenience if we knew what was the expenditure in the preceding year. We are entirely at a loss—and I am sure the minister is in the same position—to know about what has been spent. I should like to point out to the minister that his department is carrying on practically no new capital expenditure. The only expenditure of any importance on the Island of Vancouver has been stopped altogether for reasons that seem good to the Government, and yet the country is asked to vote a very considerable sum of money for travelling expenses for officials of the head office of this department when there is little or no public work of the character to which it could be applied going on. It occurs to me that this is a large sum of money to vote under that head. I think the minister will agree that I am right in that. Would it be possible for the deputy minister, who is present, to give us the information as to what was spent last year?

Mr. CAMPBELL: I am not altogether satisfied with the answer regarding the file clerks. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to mean that the salary of those file clerks was fixed at $2,100?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I thought the hon. gentleman was speaking of paymasters.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I spoke of paymasters and file clerks. There are quite a number at $2,100. Most commercial concerns hire a young boy or girl at $50 or $75 a month to fill similar positions.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The heads of the filing department should and would receive very good salaries. The junior file clerks do not receive large salaries, but the work is important, and the heads, no doubt, would receive very good salaries.

Mr. CAMPBELL: These are evidently not heads. On page 95 there are two file clerks, one at $2,160 and one at $1,920. Then on page 96 seven file clerks ranging from $2,100 down. Further down nine file clerks from $2,100 down. These cannot be all head file clerks.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think, as the hon. gentleman states, they are paid from $2,100 downward according to their grade as fixed by the commission. The salary, I believe, is also fixed by the commission as applying to the departments generally through the whole service.

Mr. CAMPBELL: A salary of $2,100 is too much for a file clerk. No business concern will pay such wages as that. Could the minister tell me what would happen to the working of the Civil Service if the House cut down that item, or the minister himself cut it down?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I would hesitate about recommending anything of that kind. I imagine the head filing clerk must be a competent man and one that can be relied upon. The salary proposed is not large for a position of that character and responsibility.

Mr. CHEVRIER: Are these salaries the result of the classification by the Griffenhagens or are they fixed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I understand they are the result of the classification made by the Arthur Young Company.

Mr. PARENT: The same thing.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not the same thing at all. The classification work of the Arthur Young Company was done under the Civil Service Commission by men selected by them. The Civil Service Commission made the classification. The reorganization, which resulted in the great reduction in the Post Office Department, was the work of Griffenhagen. I pause, in order that that may sink in. There is no Griffenhagen work in this case and, consequently, we do not see any names at the last omitted from the list of clerks. On the contrary, while, in the civil government estimates, there is a reduction, not a very large one, and one which, I think, should be larger, probably due to retirements and deaths, there is an increase, I notice, in the contingencies, and that increase in the face of the fact that the estimate for Printing and Stationery is very considerably reduced, doubtless because last year's estimate was not all used. The estimate for contingencies is increased from $15,000 last year to $31,000, due to the insertion of an item for clerical and other assistance. That is, it is more than doubled. I submit, right at this point, that the committee is entitled to know now—and I know of no reason why the information is not available—the expenditure for last year. Perhaps it is a little early to know it right up to date, but certainly the minister should be armed now with information that would enable us to estimate almost exactly the expenditure for last year. Otherwise, how can we know whether these are proper appropriations or not under the heading of contingencies? I venture to suggest that the amount spent last year is, in both cases, less than the amount asked for this year by the minister. I see that several officers are added to the list. For example, why should we need an assistant chemist in this department? It is really strange to me that a chemist should be needed at all; but with an associate chemist provided for, as is shown at the top of page 96, why have an assistant added as an additional officer just a little further down the list? If a chemist is needed in the Public Works Department, one would think the associate chemist would be sufficient without its being necessary to have an assistant chemist. On page 95, there is an item "senior mechanical engineer (heating and ventilating)," at a salary of $2,820, added in a department, the service of which is continually contracting, and is certainly not to be increased this year. Why then create these additional positions? I press chiefly for information as to the amount spent last year, and whether the department intends to apply to the Public Works Department the reorganization work that resulted in the saving in the Post Office Department.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think my right hon. friend knows that the information is not available. The books of the department have not been closed for the year, and the information cannot be given definitely to-night. I am advised that we have not the information in our notes. It would seem to me that that information could be had at any time in the House, but it is not available in the department at the present time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the minister's deputy would tell him that. When I spoke, I said that they could not tell exactly. This is only the 4th of April, and the fiscal year ended on the 31st March; but undoubtedly the officials of the department could tell within sufficient limits that this committee would be quite satisfied. Otherwise, how are we to know whether these are right amounts to vote or not? That is the principal element of the information we ought to have in order to decide. It may be all right to give us the information later, but the money will have been voted then.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I regret the informataion is not available to-night, and it would not be advisable to make a guess.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is available in the department.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It would be with time and investigation and the accounts for the year closed, but they are not yet closed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister say whether they propose to carry out in the Department of Public Works the reorganization work, to which I have just referred, and to see what can be saved to the country by so doing?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It is the purpose of the department and myself to make savings and to cut the service wherever possible. We have already indicated that in the amounts asked for this year, because we show a direct saving of some $37,000. With the statutory increases, which are applicable to various officials of the department and which will be paid this year, we are still able to show that decrease. It is my desire—and I know I shall have the co-operation of the head of the department—to cut the service down as far as it can be, while, at the same time, retaining its efficiency as an organization.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The minister shows a reduction of staff from 325 last year to 295 this year, or a reduction of thirty. Then, in the contingencies, he shows, under "clerical and other assistance," an increase from $15,000 last year to $31,000 this year. What is the reason of this increase of $16,000, when a general reduction is going on? One thing, which, I think, is known to every member of this committee, is that the work of the Public Works Department has been decreasing very rapidly since the years of the war, and it should be back to pre-war levels and, perhaps, lower. During the war, with very few exceptions, public works were not constructed in Canada, and there has not been a necessity for the tremendous staff that the department has been carrying.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I tried, at first, to make that clear. Some thirteen clerical officials had been transferred from other branches of the service, and they are to-day being carried under the contingency appropriation.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I should like the minister to explain to the committee just exactly what jurisdiction the Civil Service Commission has in connection with fixing salaries. There seems to be a considerable misunderstanding about that.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am not sure that I could make an explanation as clear as it would probably be given by another minister. The matter has been referred to before in the committee. As I understand the matter, the Civil Service Commission grades a position, with a minimum and a maximum salary for that position and a clerk entering the service receives the minimum and is increased from year to year until he reaches his maximum.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): Is it not a fact that these salaries are fixed by statute and not by the Civil Service Commission?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. STEWART (Leeds): I understand that statutory increases are provided and that the commission merely classifies the employees.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BOYS: I am not satisfied with the answer given to the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). He mentioned some of the ideas I had myself, and I had a motion which I intended to move unless the minister could answer the hon. member's questions to my satisfaction. My hon. friend called attention to the fact that we have a reduction of 30 clerks. Last year there were 325 as against 295 this year. It is admitted on all hands that there is a decrease in departmental work, and it seems a most extraordinary thing, under these conditions, that you should have under the heading "Contingencies clerical and other assistance" an increase from $15,000 to $31,000. The explanation given is certainly not satisfactory, and I therefore move, seconded by the member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) that the item of $31,000 appearing on page 97 of the estimates for clerical assistance be reduced to $15,000.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There has been a transference of thirteen employees from various branches, and they are now being paid from the contingency vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is that done?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Surely my hon. friend is not serious, unless he wishes to wipe out a portion of the service. Thirteen employees who have been previously paid by other departments, mainly in the engineering branch, are now being paid from the contingency vote, which is increased from $15,000 to $31,000. The result of my hon. friend's motion would be to dismiss those officials from the department, because there would be no money to pay them.

Mr. BOYS: If these thirteen employees are not now in the engineering branch, why do not their offices appear in the estimates?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They are not permanent appointees.

Mr. BOYS: Is there a corresponding reduction in some other department? From what department or departments have these transfers been made?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They are mainly from the engineering branch.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not dispute the minister's good faith in his answer, but really it makes nothing clear to me at all. The present practice surely is not a proper one. How can the minister justify taking officers of the department out of the regular category, where the salary of each man is laid down, and lumping them all together under contingencies, asking the committee to vote just a lump sum without any particulars whatever? The various offices ought to be designated here. This practice should not be followed at all.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Item 168 on page 42 provides for the salaries of engineers, inspectors, superintendents, draughtsmen, clerks and messengers of the outside service. The vote for that service last year was $542,000 as against $500,000 this year, or a reduction of $42,000. Now, the additional $16,000 in the item on page 97 is a part of the saving of $42,000 in the estimate on page 42. Salaries paid under that vote last year have been transferred to the contingencies vote this year.

Mr. HANSON: Were these thirteen men, who are now to be paid out of the contingencies vote, formerly engineers in the outside service?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): These officials were employed in Ottawa in the engineering branch, and were later transferred to other branches. They are temporary employees who will receive their salaries from the contingency vote this year.

Mr. BOYS: Is it not possible for the minister to find out how this $31,000 is made up? If there are clerks to be paid

I do not desire to press the motion, but I think we ought to get definite items to show how this increase of $16,000 is made up. That information ought to be available.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I will give the names of these employees transferred. They are:

making a total of $30,620 for salaries.

Mr. BOYS: Are they all temporary?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why are they needed with a diminishing department?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am informed all the clerical staff are needed in carrying on the work of the department.

Mr. BOYS: Have many of those officials been in the Service for two, three or four years?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Some have been in the Service for three or four years.

Mr. BOYS: Might they be described as junior file clerks, messengers or assistant accountants, and, if so, why are they not specified in the ordinary way?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): As the salaries would indicate, many of them are junior clerks.

Mr. CHAPLIN: Was the vote of last year, $15,000, sufficient to take care of the salaries of these clerks?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand that thirteen clerks have been brought in. I am not hard to satisfy, but I really do not want to go away with the answer that those clerks were all needed in the department. That answer does not leave me any the wiser. How is it that a department whose services are contracting, and rightly so, needs those thirteen additional clerks?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They were in the service before, carrying on very much the same work.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why is the change made?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A matter of book-keeping in the department. They were not detailed before, but last year were carried in a lump sum under engineering and other votes; this year they are carried under the contingencies vote.

Mr. BOYS: The minister gave the total in round figures at $31,000, but I am not sure whether the total number of clerks was thirty or thirty-one.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Thirty in all.

Mr. BOYS: So as a matter of fact if we add the thirty to the two hundred and ninety-five, we find there are just as many clerks to-day as there were last year.

Mr. FIELDING: As the item appeared in the estimates it certainly conveyed the impression that there was an increase which needed explanation. I think the minister's explanation makes everything clear. Many of the clerks are paid out of contingencies. In this case the department, for book-keeping purposes, have transferred from one branch of the service to another these thirteen clerks. If it meant that thirteen additional clerks had been brought into the department at this time it would be a just cause for criticism, but I think the minister has made it clear that they were not brought into the service but were merely transferred from another vote, so that there has been no actual increase.

Mr. BROWN: It would seem that while there was a reduction from three hundred and twenty-five to two hundred and ninety-five, that these thirteen clerks brought in from another department would reduce that reduction of thirty to a net reduction of seventeen?

Mr. FIELDING: They were not brought from another department but were transferred from another branch of the same department.

Mr. BROWN: That means a net reduction of seventeen?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. FIELDING: May I suggest that on the question of reductions generally I agree with what has been said, that as the work of the Public Works Department is being restricted it certainly should not lead to an increased expenditure. But may I not submit that it is rather unreasonable to expect that a new minister who has only recently taken office would be able to reorganize his department in a few days and determine what reductions should be made? He is bound to take the estimates of last year as his basis. If later on he can reduce the staff, well and good. Take the question of dismissals, the minister may find the number of his officials is greater than is needed, and if a proposal is made to dismiss those men summarily he will find very strong representations made as to the hardship entailed. I submit it is fair and reasonable for the House to expect reductions, but that it is not reasonable to expect them to be made right away. It seems to me that it is not unfair that ministers should ask for their estimates pretty much on the lines of last year, and the House should rely on them, with the money placed at their disposal, to make every reasonable effort during the year to guard against increased expenditure. I do not think the House expects the Minister of Public Works, or any other minister, with the short time at his disposal to be able to reorganize his department at the present time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think any member of the House would say that we have been unmindful of the fact that the Minister of Public Works is new to his office. We have kept that in mind in all our questions and criticisms. We are simply seeking to get at the facts. The minister has made, not boasts, perhaps, but has taken credit for a reduction of thirty persons in the civil government vote. Now will he be good enough to tell us, as did the Postmaster General a few minutes ago, when these thirty reductions were made? I know there have been retirements from the Department of Public Works, especially large numbers of retirements from the engineer's branch.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Seven of the reductions were due to death, seven to resignation, seven to retirement, and there were eleven transfers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When were the seven retired?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Five in July 1921; one in July 1922—

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hardly; we are not there yet.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They are practically all in July 1921, except one.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All the retirements were made in July 1921?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did not all the resignations also take place about the same time?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The resignations took place in May, July, October and December last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So the retirements and resignations all took place last year, and the rest are due to death, so the entire reduction in staff is due to Providence and the late government. Now we will see to whom the increase in staff is due. I remember quite well that in the engineering branch to which the minister has referred, page 42, very substantial reductions were made in the face of bitter criticism. I would just like to know whether it is to avoid some of those reductions that the thirteen men are brought from that branch now and added to the civil government vote under contingencies.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): These thirteen were not concerned in that reduction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: These are thirteen more not required under the engineering vote, but they are not the thirteen that were retired by the late Government. That is what I understand the minister's answer to be, that these are thirteen not required in that service, but they were not retired by the late government. There were others that were retired, but not these thirteen.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): No, they were not retired. They have been employed in other branches.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So the method this Government adopts when men are not required in the engineering branch is not the method adopted by the late government of letting them out, but to bring them out of the department into the contingencies vote under civil government.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): This year we are carrying some twenty-three vacancies. The late Government carried thirty-three last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I stated is correct, then, so that whereas Providence and the late government made the reductions the minister himself is wholly responsible for the increases.

Mr. FIELDING: A very unusual combination.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They often worked together.

Mr. BOYS: I notice that the minister in one of his explanations gave as one of the reasons for the increase, the transfer of thirteen clerks, but what I cannot understand is why these thirteen are brought from one branch of the Department of Public Works into another where there is no work for them to do. If the minister could show that there was work for them to do, I would not be disposed to press my motion. Why are these men needed in the branch to which they have been transferred?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There has been a decrease in the amount of work in the engineering branch, but in the accounting branch, I am advised, there has been some increase. These people have been transferred to other branches where there has been an increase of work.

Mr. BOYS : How could there be an increase of work in the accounting branch when there is less work going on in the Public Works Department? The Minister of Finance has rather intimated that there was an effort on our part to embarrass the Government.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not say that. It is fair criticism.

Mr. BOYS: I want to assure the committee and the Finance Minister that no such thought is in my mind, and if the minister could give me a satisfactory explanation I would not press the motion, but I do think we ought to be given some better explanation than has been given so far. If the work of the whole department is decreasing, there must be less work to do in the accounting branch, and if these men are not needed there, they might as well stay where they are. It seems to me we have been given no explanation of that whatever, and until we have, I do not see why this money should be voted.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): A large number of these persons have been transferred from the engineering branch to other branches of the service where there are vacancies to be filled.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Mr. BOYS: It is not a case of vacancies because you would not need the extra money for that. You had $15,000 before, and you are getting $31,000 now. You are increasing the number of clerks in this particular branch where there is less work to do. That is what the minister does not explain.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are not increasing the staff. We are filling vacancies with officials who are not required in other branches of the service. There is no increase. As a matter of fact, there is a decrease in the civil government salaries vote this year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: On account of reductions and resignations that we effected last year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am not quite satisfied that this item is right. The minister perhaps is under some disadvantage because he has not yet had sufficient time to familiarize himself with the workings of his department. I think it is only reasonable that he should have more time, but this much has been made clear, and it is some satisfaction to find that it has been made clear, that the whole reduction in this department is due to the action of the late government, that the whole reduction of 145 in the Post Office Department is due to the action of the late government, and that the claim of the Militia Department that 400 were let out on the 1st of April is wholly due to automatic reductions. So that this much applauded action on the part of the Administration in the direction of economy has very little foundation in fact. Only a day or two after these Estimates were brought down I saw some notice in one of the newspapers in the reading room of the number of reductions made in the various departments, but so far as our examination has proceeded, it appears that all these reductions were made under the late government, and so far as any one knows, the present Government has not made any reductions whatever in the Civil Service staff. That much has come out in the discussion, so I think if it has cleared up nothing else, the discussion has been worth while.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Would it be possible for the minister to classify by occupation the thirty officials who are to be paid under this contingencies vote?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I would like to know the sex of these engineers who have been transferred from one branch to another of the department.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They are not engineers, but clerks, stenographers and messengers, some male and some female.

Mr. RYCKMAN: How many of each sex?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There are thirteen females, I think, in the list.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Is it not possible to classify them having regard to the occupations that are set out on pages 95 and 96?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I see no reason why they can not be classified. It has not been the custom, however, I understand, to set out the classification in this vote. I understand they were carried under the general vote last year.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I fear I have not made myself clear to the minister. Is it not possible to classify the particular employees under the headings as they appear here in order that we may know to which class they belong? That is to say, there are different classifications of stenographers and filing clerks. Cannot we get the particulars under these headings?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Messrs. Smith, Bouchard, Grace and Stewart are clerks, the rest are clerk-stenographers.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Will the minister then explain why the thirty persons of such occupations as are likely to be employed by the department are not included in the classification on pages 95 and 96?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They are not permanent but temporary employees.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No reason has been given yet, and I am quite sure the minister has the information at first hand to show why they should be moved. It is a mystery to me why they should be moved from one branch to the other. It would appear, although I may be wrong, that they are not needed in the engineering branch at all. I know no reason why they should be there, and it would appear that the duty of the department would be to reduce the engineering branch instead of doing what has been done here. The minister may be able to refute that presumption, but I think he should secure the information that would enable him to do so for the committee. Furthermore, we ought to have before we pass these contingencies an estimate, at least as close as possible, of the amount expended last year not only as regards civil government but as regards especially the amount required to provide for new appointments at the bottom of page 96. I would suggest that the committee rise and that the minister be prepared—I know he can be prepared quite readily from his department—when we meet again to give us this information.

Mr. FIELDING: The item might stand until the next meeting of the committee. In the meantime we might proceed with the civil government estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. BOYS: Under the circumstances possibly I might be permitted to withdraw the amendment now, and if the information which the minister submits to the committee at its next meeting is satisfactory it may not need to be moved.

Mr. FIELDING: Let the item stand.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the committee that the hon. member have leave to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think both had better stand until the next sitting. I would much prefer that being done and I would object to the amendment being withdrawn now.

Item allowed to stand.

Department of Trade and Commerce—salaries, $418,020; contingencies, $22,000.

Mr. STEVENS: I have no desire to enter into a very lengthy discussion of the business of the department under the estimates for civil government, but there are many questions that will arise when the main estimates of the department come up. I would therefore like to ask the minister for a brief statement at this stage, if he would be good enough to make it, in regard to the proposals of the department as to the extension of trade. I put a question on the Order Paper the other day, which I have not under my hand at present, asking particularly regarding the extension of trade to Mexico. The answer was quite satisfactory in a sense—that is it indicated that the minister was alive to the desirability of extending trade, but it was not very definite. There was one point in particular I desired to ask the minister about. That was as to the proposal for establishing steamship connections with Mexico which apparently have a very promising outlook; and if the minister could indicate whether steps are being taken to actually put into effect steamship connections on that route it would be very gratifying to know it. Furthermore, the reason I am pressing this point just at this time is I do not think there should be any longer delay in the matter than is absolutely necessary, and if we wait for information until the main Estimates come along it may involve a delay of a month. I think the steps which have already been begun for that service should be continued, and if the minister is in a position to let us know what has been done the information would be very welcome indeed.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce): When the general Estimates are up and we have under consideration the question of the extension of trade I shall be very glad to go fully into the subject of trade with Mexico and other parts of the world. It is only fair to say that my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) initiated an inquiry into the possibility of trade with Mexico; I found the documents which indicate this on file when I assumed the administration of the department. We are making a careful study of the possibilities of trade with that country and also as to the wisdom of encouraging the development of such trade owing to the recent disturbance in Mexico. It is a little premature just now to make a statement as to whether or not the Government will subsidize a line of steamers to Mexico. I am sure my hon. friend will agree with me that in such a matter it is better to move slowly, and be sure of results, rather than to encourage a trade that might not perhaps prove profitable to the Canadian people. I hope, however, that when the main Estimates come up we will be able to afford information that will not only be satisfactory to my hon. friend but encouraging to the country.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): May I ask the minister to explain why such a large increase has been made in the salary of the director of commercial intelligence, viz., from $6,000 to $6,900? That official is now receiving a larger stipend than the deputy minister?

Mr. ROBB: That is one of the very questions I asked myself when going through the estimates—why it was that the director of commercial intelligence was paid a higher salary than the deputy minister.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. MEIGHEN: He never was.

Mr. ROBB: He is.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, he is now.

Mr. ROBB: I understand this is under the re-arrangement made by the Civil Service Commission and the general statutory allowance made in the regulations provided under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I really do not like to doubt the minister.

Mr. ROBB: The Civil Service Commission fixed this salary, and it was submitted to the previous government and they approved the increase authorized by the commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: From $6,000 to $6,900? Who is the Director of Commercial Intelligence.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Poussette.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And the Civil Service Commission fixed his salary at $6,900—over a deputy minister?

Mr. ROBB: With the possibility of his going to $7,200, and the government of which my hon. friend was the Prime Minister approved of the regulation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have no recollection of it. I would like to be favoured with the papers by the minister. I am sure he has looked it up or he would not make the statement, but I do not think there is any other similar instance in all the civil government estimates.

Mr. ROBB: I quite agree with my hon. friend on that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman explain why there is added to the list a publicity assistant and a junior departmental librarian as well? One would not think it was time to add those officers, and a senior photographer as well. I am told a lantern slide artist has been added also. I would like to hear the minister attempt to load this on the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. ROBB: For the information of my hon. friend, I may say to him that I have such confidence in my predecessors that I have accepted these estimates, number of employees and the salaries, plus the usual allowance made under the Civil Service regulations, exactly as I found them when I came into office, and I shall have to look to my hon. friend for an explanation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That will not go down at all. It was the habit, under the old government, for the minister to review the estimates submitted to him by the officers of the department. The time for reviewing estimates had not arrived on the 29th December. The time for reviewing the estimates by the officers came between that time and the time when the hon. minister assumed office. That is the unfortunate thing about it. These estimates would have been reviewed had there not been a change. However, the minister considered it his duty to take whatever was put before him. Really it is just as disgraceful to load it in that way on the late government as it would be to load it on the Civil Service Commission. Has the minister no better explanation as to why these offices were added? I know the numbers are the same as the year before, but if the minister had not created these offices there would be a diminution. These were not here before. The minister can see no provision was made last year for them. These were additions. If they had not been created, then there would have been diminution, but not by any act of the minister. I will venture to suggest that he has not retired one man or one woman from the department.

Mr. ROBB: Or added one.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh yes. How do you account for asking the House to vote $1,320 for a lantern slide artist, when the House did not vote a dollar last year? Then we have the publicity assistant. These were not in last year's estimates at all. The estimates may have been submitted to the minister by his officers, but what I am complaining of is not the work of the officers but the work of the minister. Why are these additions made?

Mr. ROBB: Surely the hon. gentleman would not expect me immediately on coming into office to go through the department and discharge men that his ministers had placed in office, as between the time the Estimates were passed last year and the time I assumed charge of the department?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister last year could not place anyone in office unless there was a salary for him. There was no salary for him last year. These are salaries to be provided next year.

Mr. ROBB: I found that out when I came into office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How was this lantern slide artist paid? There was no salary for him last year.

Mr. ROBB: He would be paid out of contingencies would he not? However, during the interim, he has been re-classified and given a standing, and I found this condition when I assumed office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister has the same amount for contingencies this year as last year, why does he not reduce his contingencies by this amount?

Mr. ROBB: Would the hon. gentleman recommend that we reduce them?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would, yes. I observe that I do not get any favourable response.

Item agreed to.

Secretary of State—salaries, $132,732.50; contingencies, $28,800.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We are not told in advance what items are going to be taken up. Unlike the last department, this estimate shows a slight decrease, but I have not the slightest doubt that, common with the others, the decrease was made before the hon. gentleman had a chance to change it. The number of officers is 96 as against 105. Will the minister explain how the reduction came about and when?

Hon. A. B. COPP (Secretary of State): I venture to say that the reduction is not really fifteen, because it is a transfer from one classification to another. I think the real reduction is only six.

Mr. MEIGHEN: When was that made?

Mr. COPP: Made by the deputy minister before I came in or since.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. minister surely would not suggest that the deputy would dismiss people without his knowledge; so that if he knows of no reduction, these were all made before he came in.

Mr. COPP: These items were given to me by the deputy. I made no reduction myself, but I was glad to see a slight reduction in these estimates, and if there is any credit due to my hon. friend in this respect, I am the last one to attempt to take it away from him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not bothering about that, but I want to know the facts. There is a reduction of six in the number of employees. He says he made no reduction himself. He retired nobody. I do not suppose his staff under him are retiring people without the knowledge of the minister, and consequently all the retirements were made before he came into office; so that the reduction is entirely due to his predecessor in office. Is that not correct?

Mr. COPP: I do not know when the reduction was made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did the hon. minister make it himself?

Mr. COPP: I made no reduction, except that made by the department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The reductions were probably made before the hon. gentleman came into office.

Mr. COPP: I made no reduction except what was recommended to me by my officials.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the minister tell me one single retirement that was recommended to him and that he made?

Mr. COPP: I accepted the statement given to me by my officials when they brought the estimates to me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I wonder why the minister is there. We may quite as well have this put before us simply by the deputy. The minister does not answer my question at all. Since he has taken office, has he retired one officer of his department, or has he not? I do not know of any way of answering that question except "yes" or "no".

Mr. COPP: I have not dismissed an official from my department since I came in.

Mr. MEIGHEN: So all the retirements were made before the minister took office.

Item agreed to.

Civil Government—Public Archives—salaries and contingencies, $79,680.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is an increase in salaries.

Mr. COPP: I do not think there are any except statutory increases.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the minister's enthusiasm for economy such that he feels he could make some reduction in the Public Archives? I do not wish to say a word against the retention of the work of the archives; every country must provide for its archives. Still, if the minister is consumed with a passion for economy, the reproductive activities of the country would not be at all impaired if economy was applied to the Department of Public Archives.

Mr. COPP: I think the work of the Archives branch with regard to the affairs of this Dominion should be extended rather than curtailed. We have in the person of Dr. Doughty, deputy minister of this branch, a man who has done splendid service and who has collected a great mass of data regarding matters relating to the whole Dominion. I have had a number of compliments paid to Dr. Doughty through me on the splendid work that he has performed. I have not yet had an opportunity of studying the department myself; but if there is an opportunity of making any reductions or bringing about economy, I would be very glad to assist and co-operate with all hon. members. I feel it would be a splendid thing and an afternoon not lost, if every hon. gentleman would make it a point to visit the Archives branch some afternoon in order to see the splendid work carried on by it. I take no credit for the work myself; but I feel that we have in Dr. Doughty a gentleman who is doing splendid work in this branch. I am sure, if I have the privilege of presiding ever this branch for another year, I shall be able to give more information to the committee in regard to it. If there is any reduction my right hon. friend could suggest that could be made without interfering with the work of the branch, I should be glad to consider it.

Mr. HANSON: The third official in the list is the Assistant Director of War Trophies. These war trophies would, I should think, have been distributed months ago amongst the various municipalities and public bodies to which they were destined. In my province, you will see them dotted all over the landscape, and we are very proud to have them. Is this man to be a permanent employee of the department, and are we to keep him forever at a salary of $3,360? There would seem to be an opportunity for the minister to exercise that disposition of which he has just given verbal testimony.

Mr. COPP: The information I have is that we have a very large number of these war trophies yet on hand for distribution.

Mr. JACOBS: I notice in this list a book binder at $31 a week We had one lone book binder last year. This year we seem to have abolished him. Can the minister tell us why?

Mr. COPP: Economy.

Mr. JACOBS: Are we going to do without any binding? How are we going to preserve these valuable documents unless we have a book binder?

Mr. STEVENS: We replaced him by a high binder.

Mr. JACOBS: A hide-bound Tory? Have we abolished book-binding altogether in the public archives?

Mr. COPP: I cannot give my hon. friend the information. I do not know whether they had a book binder there, or whether his services have been dispensed with or not. The item is a small one, and I fancy the books will be bound whether this official is kept at this wage or not.

Mr. JACOBS: Bound by whom?

Mr. STEVENS: Would it not be likely that, under the efficiency efforts of the late government in the improvement of the Printing Bureau, in the gathering together of a large number of miscellaneous small printing plants under the bureau and the reduction of the cost of that establishment, this work is performed now at the Printing Bureau instead of at the Archives?

Mr. JACOBS: Is that a fact or merely a theory?

Mr. STEVENS: I think it is a fact and a testimony to the efficiency of the late government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And $500,000 a year was saved in the bureau in addition to the fact of our taking care of the extra work.

Mr. JACOBS: How is it then that the hon. gentlemen find themselves on the other side of the House?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because of the failure of my hon. friend and those around him to state these facts to the electorate, and because, where my hon. friend did not have the hardihood to state himself what was in the interest of his party in the way of misrepresentation, there was always around him and through the press an army which was competent to do that.

Mr. JACOBS: Therefore, I conclude the people of Canada were fools.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman is not very far wrong.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I really thought the hon. member had used the word "fooled." The hon. gentleman is only wrong to this extent, that the "s" should be changed to "ed."

Item agreed to.

BRITISH PREFERENCE AND CANADIAN SEAPORTS

Mr. HANCE J. LOGAN moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the British tariff preference should be confined to goods brought into Canada through Canadian seaports.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the tariff preference granted by this country on goods of the mother country and most of the dominions was distinctly a family matter. It created a very favorable impression throughout the Empire, and inspired the greatest of all living imperial poets to write those wonderful lines—

A Nation spoke to a Nation,
A Queen sent word to a Throne,
"Daughter am I in my mother's house,
But mistress in my own.
The gates are mine to open,
As the gates are mine to close."

I desire, to-day, Mr. Speaker, to advocate that the gates of a foreign country shall be closed to this preference, freely given by the daughter to the mother.

I submit you cannot build a nation upon pure materialism. In order to make a great country, you must create a national spirit. We need, I submit, in Canada, more intense Canadianism. What we lack—and I know not the reason—is that patriotic fervour that is so great an element in the building of national character. I desire to proclaim to the world that Canada is self-reliant and independent of other nations, and I desire, as far as I can, to impress upon certain dealers in goods on the other side of the Atlantic that this country is not bound in fields of ice during four or five months of the year.

A few years ago the British Medical Association met in Toronto. They were sending out some specimens or some articles, required for demonstration. The association meeting was held in August, and on the box containing these articles for demonstration was written in plain English "Please protect from Frost". A merchant in Ottawa ordered certain Christmas goods in London to be delivered via the Canadian Pacific Railway Steamships. He received a letter in the early part of December stating that they regretted very much that they could not get these goods away before the Canadian ports had frozen up, and, therefore, they were sending them via New York. Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is time for us to declare, to the people of England at any rate, that we have ports in this country, both on the Atlantic and the Pacific, which are open the year around.

This policy which I advocate has been proclaimed ever since Confederation, and even before. One of the leading policies of Canada has been that Canadian trade shall be carried through Canadian channels. Why did we build the Canadian Pacific Railway except to create trade east and west and west and east? The Intercolonial, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the National Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern were constructed largely to build up an interprovincial trade in Canada east and west and west and east. Even before Confederation this was a vision of our forefathers. It was eloquently expressed by the fathers of Confederation. The Hon. D'Arcy McGee, the great Irish-Canadian orator and statesman, speaking in the Confederation debate said:

One reason why I, in season, and perhaps out of season, have continued an advocate for an Intercolonial railway has been that first, closest and most lasting connection of these Lower Provinces with the continental trade system, might be established by and through and in union with Canada.

The same policy applied to the building extension and enlargement of the canals of Ontario and Quebec. The advantages of the policy which I advocate would not, by any means, be confined to the Maritime Provinces or to the ports of St. John and Halifax. It would be to the advantage of all ports in Canada. The English fall importation would largely come in through the ports of Quebec and Montreal, and importations from different British possessions, particularly New Zealand, to which the British preference applies, would be brought in via Vancouver and Prince Rupert.

The cost of every carload of freight sent from the maritime provinces or British Columbia is increased because of the car having to be hauled back empty or nearly so. The cost of every shipload of freight from Montreal, Quebec, Halifax or St.

John to the Mother Country, or from New Zealand to British Columbia, is increased on account of the lack of return cargo. I would like to impress upon my colleagues that the lack of a westbound cargo is the weakness of our transportation system with Great Britain. We can send over wheat and lumber, and fill the ships, but they often come back empty, only carrying ballast.

It would create more competition among ocean freight carriers. Vessels sailing to certain ports would charge lower rates if they were assured of a return cargo. If more ships were provided with return cargoes it would mean lessening of freight rates; in other words, if we had competition rates would be lowered in both directions. I have before me a letter from one of the steamship companies in Canada in which I find the following statement:

> From my experience of 25 years I may say that steamers on the westbound trip from Great Britain or Europe are rarely full of cargo the vessels depending almost entirely on the freight from Canada to Great Britain and the continent for their earnings. That sufficient tonnage could not be obtained to carry the traffic is, from my experience, incorrect. The fact of the matter is that all the large lines coming to Canada, if the traffic was obtainable could place a larger number of steamers on the several routes. The lack of business, especially on the westbound voyage makes it unprofitable. In the winter months, when the boats run to both Halifax and St. John if full cargoes were obtainable to Canada we could give lower freight rates on goods carried from Canada than when earning practically nothing westbound, which is pretty much the case at present.

Mr. BAXTER: I should like to suggest to my hon. friend that if he cannot get real sympathy, he might, at least, appeal for the apparent sympathy afforded by silence in this House, so that members who are interested in what he says may have an opportunity of hearing him. It is an impossibility to hear him at present.

Mr. LOGAN: Thank you. Referring to sugar, he said:

> A large amount of the traffic that comes to Canada finds its way via New York and Boston. Nearly all the sugar for the Montreal refineries comes via New York, whereas if the preference was only given to sugar coming direct to Canadian ports it would benefit Halifax and St. John, give employment to an extra number of steamers, give a large extra revenue to our railroads and leave a large amount of money in Halifax and St. John and also Montreal.

The Canadian Pacific, having their steamships on the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, would be able to give as cheap a rate of freight from ports in Great Britain as any American steamship line with connecting lines of railway, because of their desire not only to give westbound freight to their ships, but to give westbound freight to their railway system.

Mr. CRERAR: What steamship company is represented in what my hon. friend is quoting from?

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Speaker, I trust I shall make my voice heard in this chamber. I want to ask my hon. friend what steamship company is represented in the quotation which he has just given to the House.

Mr. LOGAN: I would rather not at the present time, disclose the name. I would be very glad to give it privately to my hon. friend.

An hon. MEMBER: Louder.

Mr. LOGAN: The acoustic properties of this chamber are a tragedy in this $12,000,000 structure, because I can assure you, Sir, that we sit here hour in and hour out and cannot follow speeches made by hon. members sitting only a very short distance away.

But let me continue. The Canadian Government Merchant Marine, which to-day is not particularly busy, would have more demands made upon it for freight service, and when that freight is delivered to the railways, no doubt the Canadian Government railways, at Halifax, St. John, Quebec, Montreal, Vancouver, or Prince Rupert, would be very glad to secure the added freight to increase their revenues. If, for instance, an importer of goods in Vancouver to-day makes a purchase in London, the goods are very apt to be sent on an American ship via New York. Then, naturally, they will be forwarded on American railways as far west as possible, so that the only part of the freight receipts on that bundle of goods that would go to a Canadian transportation company would be the freight from a junction on the Pacific coast as near as possible to the city of Vancouver.

An objection has been raised to this policy that it might be resented by the people of the United States of America. We heard this same statement made when the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) brought down the preferential tariff in 1897. But I submit that we need not fear this bugaboo, that the bonding privilege is just as important, if not more so, to the United States of America than it is to the Dominion of Canada.

Even if the policy I advocate were an interference with the bonding privilege, we would only be carrying out the historic policy of the United States of America which, ever since it has become a nation, has put upon its statute books, the very class of legislation for which I am asking to-day. In 1817, 105 years ago, Congress and the Senate passed the following:

> Commerce between the territories shall be regarded as coastwise and shall be confined to vessels built in the United States, officered by the United States citizens, flying the United States flag.

That has been their policy during all these long 105 years since this legislation was placed upon their statute books.

Without, I hope, wearying the House and without quoting too many statutes, let us follow their policy through the years. In 1868, their navigation laws as to transportation of merchandise were extended around Alaska. When they had taken possession of the Hawaiian islands, let us find what legislation they passed in this regard. It will be found in an act which was passed in April, 1900, and which reads:

> The coasting trades between the islands aforesaid and any other portion of the United States shall be regulated in accordance with the provisions applicable to such trade between two great coasting districts.

Let us take Porto Rico. You will find, in an act pertaining to that island, the following:

> The coasting trade between Porto Rico and the United States shall be regulated in accordance with the provisions of law applicable to such trade between any two great coasting districts of the United States.

Not only did they throw their coasting laws around Alaska on this continent; not only did they reach out to Porto Rico; not only did they go to the middle of the Pacific with their coasting laws, to cover the Hawaiian islands; but even to the Antipodes this law follows, and we find, in reference to the Philippine islands, the following statute:

> No merchandise except supplies for the army or navy shall be transported by sea, under penalty of forfeiture thereof, between ports of the United States and ports or places in the Philippine archipelago, directly or via a foreign port or for any part of the voyage, in any other vessel than a vessel of the United States.
> Section 2. That on and after April 11, 1909, no foreign vessel shall transport passengers between ports of the United States of America and ports or places in the Philippine archipelago, whether directly or by way of foreign ports under a penalty of $200 for each passenger so transported and landed.

That is a law of the United States of America to-day. Yet, we are to be told that we must not confine the British preference, this family arrangement, as I have stated, to Canadian ports because, forsooth, we might offend the United States of America. If we take that stand, we must admit that we are not independent; that we are not a self-reliant nation; that we cannot depend upon the facilities that are provided in our own country. We cannot maintain the dignity of national citizenship if we adopt such a position and do not declare, by this legislation, our independence of the United States of America.

I shall briefly outline the history of this policy in this House which I am advocating to-day. In 1904 I had the honour to move a similar resolution and in 1907 it was my pleasure to see that resolution incorporated in the Budget of that year; incorporated, however, with a proviso moved by the then Prime Minister that it should come into operation by Order in Council. I propose now to read for the benefit of the House one or two extracts from speeches made by the leading men of this country at that time. An hon. gentleman, whom I am glad to see with us to-day, although we do not agree politically, the Nestor of the House—I refer to the member for South York (Mr. Maclean)—in 1907, speaking on my resolution, used the following language:

> I intend to give this proposal not only my sympathy, which is sometimes of the cold potato nature, but my vote as well. I have no great belief in a measure of trade based on a preference, where the Government offering it asks for nothing in return, and where the Government receiving it does not see the propriety of giving anything in return. On that ground alone I would vote for the proposal.

He goes on:

> The best and only way to improve our Canadian ports is to direct to them all the trade we can control. In the case of the preference, we can more or less control that trade, and if we have confidence in our own ports, and if we are spending millions and millions to develop a national transcontinental system, it is our duty to endeavour to develop these ports on the lines laid down in the resolution.

I am glad to quote another hon. member who is also with us to-day. Let me read from the remarks of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). Speaking in 1904 in reference to a similar resolution, he said:

> It is a subject on which there is need of education, not only outside of this House, but possibly inside the House. I am aware that possibly, from some points of view, objections may be raised to the motion of my hon. friend; but, for my own part, I am heartily in favour of it, and if he decides to divide the House upon it I shall have pleasure in giving my vote in support of the motion. For the purpose of the present budget and the present condition of affairs we cannot deal with it. But I hope there will be such an educational movement on the question that, at no distant day, we may adopt it as part of our practical legislation. If that can be done at no distant day, no one will rejoice more than I shall. I think that the reasons that my hon. friend has given in support of his motion are strong, and I believe that the more the subject is discussed, the more likely we are to reach the conclusion that he has reached after so much consideration.

Let me now quote from one who, in the councils of the nation at that time, was even a higher authority than the present Minister of Finance. Our late lamented chieftain, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, speaking in 1907, is reported in Hansard (page 4323) as follows:

In view of the different opinions expressed to-day upon this very important question, it ought not to be difficult for the House to come to a unanimous conclusion. Every member who has addressed himself to this question has, with one exception—the exception of my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Kemp)—pronounced himself in favour of the principle of this motion. My hon. friend from East Toronto is the only one who has taken exception to the principle itself. But doubt has arisen as to whether, admitting the principle, the time is opportune for declaring such a policy as that embodied in the motion of my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan). My hon. friend's resolution is quite in keeping with the policy followed by this country for the last fifty years, namely, the developing of Canadian trade within Canadian channels. Everybody in this country for the last fifty years, especially since the inauguration of Confederation, has followed such a policy. Fifty years ago, when we began to build railways, we began to build them north and south, and the objective point of all of them was some American port. The ports of Boston, New York and Portland were the three through which we got our imports in the winter. But after Confederation we began to build up another policy. We began to dispense with American harbours and to bring the trade to our own ports. This policy we have followed to the present day and with a reasonable measure of success. Take our importations from Great Britain; from seventy to seventy-five per cent come through Canadian harbours and only twenty-five to thirty per cent through American ports. The question now is whether or not, following out that policy, we are in a position to adopt the policy proposed by my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan). He proposes that the benefit of British preference should be given only to such goods as come through Canadian ports.

At page 4326, Sir Wilfrid continues:

But I look upon this motion as a completion of the policy which we inaugurated four years ago when we resolved to construct another transcontinental railway from the Pacific to the Atlantic ocean. When this railway is in operation, as by the terms of the contract it must be in operation in the month of December, 1911, then will be a fitting time to adopt this policy. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would not be disposed to agree altogether with the motion of my hon.

friend if it is intended to apply it in the month of May, 1908; it will, however, fittingly apply in 1911 when the transcontinental railway will be completed. Then we shall have two competing lines from the maritime harbours to the great new centre that is developing west of the great lakes, and then when the people of the Northwest will have two lines in operation to carry their imports and exports, we will be in a position safely to apply the policy indicated in the motion of my hon. friend from Cumberland.

Referring to any possibility of the abrogation of the bonding privilege, Sir Wilfrid said:

Now, would the adoption of this policy at the present time have any effect upon the bonding privilege? I do not think so. The bonding privilege merely gives us the privilege of carrying our own goods through their territory, and gives them the privilege of carrying their goods through our territory. But if we choose by domestic arrangement to bring trade into our channels, we do not merely abolish the bonding privilege, we simply become independent of it. Well, Sir, was not one of the objects we had in view when we introduced the policy of building a new transcontinental railway to get rid of our dependence upon the bonding privilege? Our policy is to be free of the need of using American harbours and of the need of a bonding privilege; we desire to be in such a position that at all times we can bring our imports and send our exports through our own channels independently of American harbours and the bonding privilege. Moreover, we are to remember that the benefits of the bonding privilege are reciprocal. The Americans use our territory and we use their territory. But if it should come to this, that the bonding privilege were taken away from us by the United States, we can take away from them the bonding privilege which they enjoy of carrying their goods through our territory, and in that case I think the United States would have more to lose than we would have. However, I would be sorry if it ever came to that; we do not want to have with our American neighbours any but the most friendly relations. I would be sorry if the bonding privilege was interefered with, but if it is ever interfered with at all, I am ready to say that in my humble judgment we have less to lose than our American neighbours, and they would hesitate before interfering with the bonding privilege. They may do so, however. Twice already they have threatened us with the destruction of the bonding privilege, and at that time it would have been a serious blow to us, because we were not equipped then, as we shall be by and by, to be able to do without it. When we have another transcontinental railway in operation I think we shall be absolutely independent of the bonding privilege.

Sir Wilfrid concluded his statement by saying:

The motion of my hon. friend is all right; it is a little premature.

He then moved the following amendment, which was carried unanimously.

That on and after a date to be named by the Governor in Council the British preference shall apply only to goods brought into Canada if shipped through a Canadian seaport.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the time has long gone by when the policy then made a principle of our tariff should have been put into force. At that time, as you know, Sir, we had only one transcontinental railway, and that circumstance constituted an argument against the adoption of this policy, because the people in the West said: You will put us at the mercy of one single line of railway north of lake Superior. That, too, was the objection of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. But in 1907 he stated that we would have a second transcontinental line, and could in 1911 adopt this policy. Well, today we have three transcontinental railways instead of two; and if we could adopt this policy in 1911, we are in a still better position to adopt it now. Before the time arrived when Sir Wilfrid Laurier promised that this policy would be brought into force a change of government took place, and the matter has been lying dormant ever since. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is a policy which should now be incorporated in our tariff when the Budget is brought down this session.

There has been, however, some progress along the lines which I advocated. For instance, I turn to chapter 13 of the statutes of 1921 and I find that the West Indies Trade Agreement, enacted May 3 of that year, contains the following passage:

> The Government of Canada on giving six months' notice may provide that, to be entitled to the concessions granted in Articles II and III, the products of any of the colonies aforesaid shall be conveyed by ship direct without transhipment from the said colony or from one of the other colonies entitled to the advantages of this agreement into a Canadian port.

I find that on the 4th of the following month legislation was passed to further amend the customs tariff, 1907, the act being cited as The Customs Tariff Amendment Act, 1921, and section 2 thereof reads:

> 2. Notwithstanding anything in this Act, goods, other than tobacco, cigars, cigarettes, spirituous or alcoholic liquors and articles specified in Schedule A of The West Indies Trade Agreement Act, the product or manufacture of British Honduras, Bermuda, the Bahamas, Jamaica, Turks and Caicos Islands, the Leeward Islands (Antigua, St. Christopher-Nevis, Dominica, Montserrat, and the Virgin Islands), the Windward Islands (Grenada, St. Vincent and St. Lucia), Barbados, Trinidad and Tobago, and British Guiana; when imported direct therefrom shall not be subject at any time to more than fifty per centum of the duties imposed on similar goods as set forth in the general tariff under regulations by the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue.

So some progress has been made along the lines which I and other members of this House have advocated during a good many years. If "Canada for Canadians" is a good policy, then "Canadian ports for Canadian ships" ought to be equally as good a policy.

But, Mr. Speaker, I may state frankly that I do not intend to press this motion to a final vote, for I do not expect the Government to commit itself and enunciate its tariff policy until the Budget is brought down by the Minister of Finance. But I do expect the Government to enact what Sir Wilfred Laurier promised in 1907 would be put upon our statute books in 1911. I expect the Government to adopt a policy which will be thoroughly Canadian, and to declare to the world that we have well-equipped summer and winter ports. We have spent millions of dollars upon these ports in the last few years. Recently sixteen million dollars have been spent on the great port of Halifax, while millions more have been spent upon the ports of Quebec and Montreal and upon our Pacific ports; and hundreds of millions of dollars have been expended in the building of railroads to carry goods east and west. We have talked about building up a "United Canada". Surely there is no one in this House who would object even if in the beginning the adoption of this policy resulted in an increase of one or two cents a ton on the transportation of our freight, which increase I do not admit. I presume that this matter of freights may be gone into by my hon. friend from St. John and Albert (Mr. Baxter), who is to follow me in this debate. But I do desire to point out that even if the putting of this policy into effect did cost us a few cents a ton more on freight, surely it is worth that to be independent of ports of the United States. That country has shown its independence all along the line: its people glory in their ports—and they use them. Let us do the same, so that at this time after the awful cataclysm of war "out from the mists of humanity's sorrows" Canadians may take their stand, certain of their destiny, and with heads erect proudly declare that they will patronize their own seaports on the Atlantic and Pacific—seaports which are open the year round for commerce with the whole world.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend (Mr. Logan) has wandered far afield for argument on this question. I purpose to confine my arguments strictly to the resolution before the House. The British preference was embodied in the Tariff Revision Act of 1897, becoming a part of the Laurier-Fielding tariff at that time, and it did to some extent lighten the burden which protection had placed on the consumers of this land. I think the preference then on most goods stood at about 33⅓ per cent, but from that time down to the present this preference has always been a bugbear to the protected interests of this country. The Conservative Opposition from 1896 onward never had any policy but that of more protection and less British preference, and it was always ready to endorse any further measure of protection introduced by the Liberal government between 1897 and 1911. So it was at the instigation of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, who objected to British competition, that the revision of 1904 considerably whittled down the British preference. This was done on the eve of a general election. Again in 1907 it was somewhat further curtailed. To-day it stands in our tariff schedule just a little better than the favoured nation treatment or the intermediate tariff. But, after all, the greatest preference to-day is on goods that we do not get from Great Britain. I think that the beneficiaries of protection, realizing that it is not possible to further whittle down the British preference and still recognize it in the tariff schedule, are taking other means now to rid themselves of British competition.

When the Laurier-Fielding tariff was brought down in 1897 not one manufacturer could say that he lost anything from the protection which was afforded him from 1879 onwards. Preference for Great Britain was the only departure from the old National Policy, and advantage accruing to the consumers of this country under this preference was adequately taken care of afterwards by an increase in the general tariff. At all the tariff inquiries since then, in 1905-06 particularly, the farmers of the whole Dominion, as well as importers of textiles in the eastern provinces, commended the British preference and asked for a repeal of the amendment of 1904 which curtailed it. That curtailment was made at the instigation of the protected interests of this country. The farmers particularly commended the preference because it gave some relief from the tariff, and because it served as a tie with the mother country. We realize also that as a result of the good feeling it engendered, a sentimental preference for Canadian agricultural products prevailed in Great Britain. On the other hand, it is on record that the Canadian manufacturers who assailed the British preference at that time spoke of London and Liverpool as "foreign", and referred to any Englishmen who came to this country in the interests of trade as "foreigners". The word "foreign" was particularly noticeable in the petition presented by these gentlemen at Three Rivers in 1906 on behalf of higher duties on British imports. I take it, Sir, that the present resolution, though it may not be proposed by my hon. friend for that purpose, will have the effect of more completely corralling the consumers of this country for the benefit of the already over-protected interests.

There are four columns, so to speak, in our tariff schedule as it stands to-day. There is the free list, the British preference, the intermediate tariff, and the general tariff. I think, Sir, it would have been more consistent if my hon. friend had advocated that we compel all goods that come in free to come through Canadian ports,—and this would apply also to goods coming in under the intermediate tariff or the favoured nation provisions. But why, oh why, single out goods coming in under the British preference?

My hon. friend completely gave away the argument when he said that the Canadian Pacific railway had been built to keep trade going east and west. That old sentiment of "Canada for the Canadians" is a played out joke so far as Canadian interests are concerned. If the hon. member wanted to keep trade going east and west, it would have been more consistent for him to advocate that our Atlantic ports be thrown open to the free entry of British goods. The resolution is a camouflage of intent to curtail British competition, and I for one am going to oppose it.

Hon. JOHN B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and counties of St. John and Albert): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to take this opportunity of demonstrating, in small measure at least, that substantial unity of thought which is characteristic of our people down by the sea,—a line of thought which, I believe, is neither selfish nor un-Canadian; a line of thought which will never express itself in such terms as to give rise to a doubt that we stand for Canada for the Canadians, first, last and always.

It does not seem to be necessary this afternoon, or, perhaps, on any occasion, to discuss very seriously the tariff question from the standpoint of protection. Until this country can find some new, great and unexpected source of revenue, something upon which the people of Canada will be willing and glad to be taxed, we shall have to depend upon customs duties for a very great part of the revenue necessary to carry on the business of the country. It is idle to talk of throwing away a protective system—or a tariff system, which is practically the same thing—throwing it away, as if Canada could administer its affairs upon wind, pure and simple.

The only argument so far advanced against the reasons stated by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) in support of his resolution is that the proposal is a nefarious attempt to throttle or lessen the effects of the British preference. Now, if we can get somewhere out of the heavens and get down on the plain earth and talk to one another as sensible beings, we will not find any very nefarious plot behind the resolution proposed by my hon. friend, and concurred in, I think, by a good many hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. It is not necessary to make aspersions upon the policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Canadian manufacturers, or anybody else. Despite some things which have occurred since the opening of the session, I still believe that the aim of this Parliament is—as the aim of preceding parliaments has been and of succeeding parliaments will be—to bring about the substantial unity of our Canadian nation. But we cannot obtain that unity unless we have mutual understanding and mutual confidence. It will not do for representatives of any particular section of the country to take the intolerant attitude that some other portion of the country is not entitled to be heard. The views of all must be considered, and when they are fairly considered, when the hearer honestly strives to put himself in the position of the other man, then something practical, something useful, will be secured toward the solution of the questions here proposed to be resolved.

I was sorry, Mr. Speaker—it may have been unintentional—but when my hon. friend (Mr. Logan) was speaking I found it impossible even at this short distance from him to follow his entire speech. Had I been able to hear the whole of his remarks it is quite possible I would have been in substantial accord with all that he said. At the present moment I can only say that I am in accord with the portions of his speech that I did hear. But why did I not hear the whole of my hon. friend's speech? I was as attentive as I could be, but all his utterances failed to reach me. I fear that an unfortunate phrase, uttered by a great Canadian statesman many years ago, has still its unfortunate effect upon the mind of this Chamber, and to some extent upon the mind of the country. We do not forget that a really great man, who occupied a commanding position in the old House of Parliament, and whose name will go down to posterity, unfortunately once said one of those clever things that rankle, and sting, and burn, and do not make for peace and mutual understanding. I refer to the occasion when those unfortunate words were uttered which designated the maritime provinces as "the shreds and patches and ragged remnants of Confederation." In that day, I fear, an attitude of thought was formed which possibly has persisted to the extent that when my hon. friend rises this Chamber says, "Oh, that is simply a matter of those maritime province people and it will keep; we can have a quiet little conversation." Well, if we are to take that attitude toward the maritime provinces, and if we are to take that attitude of at least superficial indifference to the West—unless we are trying to obtain the votes of the West for the moment—we will not solve the problems of Canada.

Now, I shall not occupy much time, but may I plead that the representatives of the other portions of Canada take just a few moments for thought relative to the problem which has been enunciated today. I think they will not find in it any disguised monster which seeks to assassinate our Canadian manhood or our Canadian commonwealth. I think they will find after thorough examination, a simple, plain business proposition that any man can understand, and that a sense of justice will recognize as a thing that is not only fair to certain localities, but is good for this country as a whole.

Now what does this proposition mean? Speaking as a representative from a constituency in which there is one of these ports, the port of St. John, which naturally would be affected, let me take you for a moment or two to that port and ask you to look around. It is a small port but within the circle of it you find construction which has been carried out by the people of St. John at their own expense and what for? Their own benefit you will say, of course. Yes, primarily. They built wharves at their own expense that they might induce the trade of the world to float through a part of the province of New Brunswick in its entrance to Canada. They demonstrated the value of their port; they begat the confidence of the Canadian Pacific Railway in that port. As the result of that great experiment the Government of Canada undertook to supplement the expenditure, and have spent millions in that port to promote the handling of Canadian trade through Canadian channels. That principle has been followed, sometimes more and sometimes less closely, without the slightest regard to the succession of governments which we have had in the last twenty-five or thirty years. It has become a national principle, a principle well expressed by that gentleman of whose great statesmanship we all show our appreciation, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. His aim, as he expressed it, was never to be satisfied until every pound of Canadian freight that could possibly be brought through Canadian channels was so brought. I stand here as a Conservative, but that doctrine is good enough for me, and I believe it is good enough for the people of Canada. I have no quarrel with the source from which it came; I only want to see Sir Wilfrid Laurier's desire carried into practical effect for the good of the whole country which he undoubtedly loved.

Now I said that the Government of Canada had spent many millions of dollars in the port of St. John. We have not there a system of control by a harbour commission. I regret that we have not, but it is not a topic of discussion at the present hour. You go to Halifax, the other important port in the maritime provinces, and you find that large amounts of government money have been expended there for the very same purpose, and for a proper purpose—the equipping of a national port. You have not there, I think, a harbour commission either. But go to the port of Quebec; there you have a harbour commission, and you have the credit of this country at the back of the people who administer the affairs of that port and rightly so. You have the same thing at Montreal and you have also at Vancouver. Now you have the people of Canada, as taxpayers, directly interested in the success or failure of the flowing of trade through these ports. I ask you as business men is that worth consideration or is it not? Is it worth doing something that will bring more trade, and will render less probable an avalanche of accumulated debt falling upon this country? Is it better to develop trade through these ports and by the tolls which are collected put beyond possibility any defaulting in the interest upon the bonds and the consequent drain upon the federal exchequer? This is a very simple proposition.

How is the principle embodied in this resolution to be carried out upon the Atlantic seaboard? It is no use for us to simply say that we want people to bring in British goods through Halifax or St. John, or both, and in the summer time through Quebec and Montreal. They will not do it merely because we ask them. Is it possible to lay down such a line of policy that they will find it to their interest to bring their goods into our ports and thereby support those public expenditures by the proper contribution, which contribution otherwise would go to ports in a foreign country? That is simply what it is; that is what we are asking. It does not reduce the tariff preference by one tittle. You will get just as low custom duties if the goods are coming in through Vancouver or through the ports of Montreal or Quebec, or Halifax or St. John.

It has been suggested that there might be something more in the way of railway charges. I am not sure that I am totally in accord with the hon. member who advanced that view. I believe that the principle in railway management is a sound one, that the long haul should be at lower rates than the short haul in order to overcome the natural obstacle of distance which creates so much difficulty in handling the commerce of this long drawn-out country. I believe it would be possible, especially by means of the ownership of the government system of railways in conjunction with the practical control which the Government has over the majority of the ports of this country, to so organize co-operation between the railroads and the ports that the importer in the interior would not pay any more for his freight.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): What about the Grand Trunk and the city of Portland?

Mr. BAXTER: Well, if this Government chooses to make Portland a seaport of Canada—

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): It already is.

Mr. BAXTER: —if this Government chooses to make Portland a seaport of Canada, it cannot expect support from any one on this side of the House, and I do not think it will get much support from hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MALCOLM How are you going to give public ownership a fair trial if you discriminate against one of the ports of the national railways?

Mr. BAXTER: I do not undertake to discuss that question this afternoon; it is not necessary to discuss it; but I am not at all afraid of the challenge. I do not think it requires any genius or even statesmanship and I do not think it requires more than the most ordinary form of administration, to be able to discard the port of Portland, or, at all events, to put it into such a position that anyone seeking to export or import goods would use the ports within our own territory by preference. Personally, if I were handling the problem, I would tell my hon. friend exactly how I would handle it. I would impose a differential toll against the port of Portland, and make it more expensive to bring goods from that port, or take them out by that port, than by Halifax or St. John. In other words I would shape the railway policy so as to build up this country instead of building up another country, and if my hon. friend is interested in pursuing that branch of the question, I will refer them to the files of the St. John Globe and the St. John Telegraph during the last campaign, where they will find that they were attacking the preceding government because, they claimed, that government was building up Portland, Maine, at the expense of our country, and they were demanding that that should not be done. If my hon. friend will get in line with the St. John Globe and the St. John Telegraph, the exponents of his party, that will be perfectly satisfactory to me, and he will be pursuing a policy exactly on the line that I desire to see pursued. And, had the former government not been defeated, I would have been advocating that policy in its councils. If, however, the hon. gentleman chooses to turn his back upon the organs of his party, if he chooses to stand as an advocate of Portland, Maine, all I can hope is that he will stand alone in this House.

Something has been said with regard to the possibility of retaliation. I think, so far as I could hear, my hon. friend was dealing with that question extensively, and I do not wish to travel over the same ground again, but we might just as well talk of retaliation with regard to any item of the tariff. There is no magic about the British preference, it is nothing more nor less than an item of the tariff, a means of raising revenue, or of protecting the industries of this country. It simply says: We will protect our industries a little less against the manufacturers of Great Britain than we will against the manufacturers of United States or elsewhere. If that is not cause for retaliation in itself, if the United States and other countries do not choose to say: If you do not give us entry into your markets on the same terms as the Mother Country, we will boycott you,—what possible reason can they have for saying it if we draw the line a little further and say: We will only give you the benefit of that tariff when you bring your goods into Canadian seaports. I would like to go one step further and add "and only in British or Canadian-owned bottoms". I believe the Government and the House would do well to think of the possibility of utilizing our Canadian Government Merchant Marine for the importation of goods, with a special preference because they are Canadian bottoms owned by the Canadian Government. I do not care how much you limit it, the goods will get in, but we may just as well foster our own enterprise and look after our own country.

We are perhaps in rather a peculiar position in the ports of Halifax and St. John. Both ports have done much to attract this overseas trade. It has had beneficial results in both localities. It has increased, to some extent, our population. It has certainly increased the population of both cities, but I would like to tell my hon. friends who live inland that in both those cities there is not yet any domination of trade. We have not the wholesalers there who are handling the products of Canada and filling the ships with cargoes themselves. The financial centre, the great trading centres of Canada, are not down by the sea. We have to depend entirely upon other localities to provide our cargoes. The result is that, so far, all that we in the maritime provinces get out of this trade is that we are what I might call hewers of wood and drawers of water. We have added to the labour of our port. We have got also a certain market for supplies to the vessels. All this, manifestly, can be increased, if you will, where possible, bring the trade of Canada through our gateway. More than that, in time, when our ports develop to the proportions we are seeking and hoping, you will eventually find men at those ports who will begin to direct at least a part of the commerce of the world. Now, is what I am going to propose fair or is it not? Gentlemen come here from the centre of this country and make their feelings manifest through many modes of expression. They say, "Consider our situation, consider the difficulties with which we have to struggle, consider the work we did as pioneers in this country, and give us some relief from customs duties and from this, that and the other thing." I say to you who put forward those propositions: "Look also down by the sea and visualize the difficulties through which our people have gone when we helped to form Confederation and to mould this Dominion of Canada, and will you say to us that we are asking anything unfair if we seek to have the Dominion held together, not merely by the bonds of steel that have been run across it at an expenditure of millions upon millions, but by a bond of sentiment from the Pacific to the Atlantic which will strive to deal justly with all parts of Canada, and which will rejoice in the expansion and development of every part?" If we can get that spirit, my hon. friend's motion is assured of success. I suggest that, instead of withdrawing the motion, the hon. gentleman should slightly modify it. I do not put it as a matter of dictation to the Government, nor do I believe in an hon. member proposing a resolution simply for the purpose of dropping it after discussion. I want to see something real as the product of an hour's discussion, and I would suggest that the hon. member amend it and make it read:

That in the opinion of the House it is desirable the Government should consider carefully the limitation of the British tariff preference to goods brought into Canada through Canadian seaports.

In that form it would be a strong expression of opinion that it is desirable the Government should consider. On the other hand, it will not place the Government of the country in a position of having a policy dictated to it in advance of its own consideration. I trust that it may be possible for my suggestion to be accepted.

I apologize for having detained the House at such length but if anything I have said will have the effect of helping to solve, even to a small extent, the problems we have in the maritime provinces, I shall feel that I have not wholly lost the time I have occupied in the House this afternoon.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, the resolution which has been moved by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), and which, I think, I may say, without transgressing the bounds of good taste, has been seconded by the hon. member for St. John and Albert (Mr. Baxter), is one that, if it were to receive the serious consideration of this House, would, indeed, be an important resolution. I am reminded, however, that the hon. member for Cumberland stated that he had been preaching this doctrine in this House for twenty-odd years. He does not appear to have made a great deal of progress in that time, and I venture the prediction that he will still be preaching it for another twenty years, without getting very much further on; nor am I convinced that the exhibition we have had this afternoon of a very fine bit of team work between the hon. member for Cumberland and the hon. member for St. John and Albert,—who usually do not see eye to eye on questions before this House—has advanced very much the cause for which this resolution stands. Indeed, I was almost of the opinion, when I listened to the hon. member for Cumberland, that he should be sitting over beside the hon. member for St. John and Albert.

The hon. member for Cumberland argued that this is a necessary measure to provide traffic for our Canadian railways. You, Mr. Speaker, and the House, will observe that, if this resolution were incorporated into the law of Canada, all goods coming from Great Britain to Canada, in order to secure the British preference, would have to come through Canadian ports. That is the whole purpose of the resolution. My hon. friend argues that this would furnish additional business for Canadian railways, and he states that the Canadian railways were built to carry traffic east and west. That is not altogether true of the Canadian Pacific railway, nor is it true of the Intercolonial railway. The Intercolonial railway, as every hon. member, knows, was built as a part of the understanding in connection with Confederation, and the Canadian Pacific railway was built to link up the eastern provinces of that day with the new province of British Columbia that had come into Confederation in 1871. Consequently, these roads were not built primarily for the purpose of carrying traffic east and west. The hon. member for Cumberland also argued—and his contention was supported by the hon. member for St. John and Albert—that the passing of measures of this kind would really result in lower costs to the Canadian people. They argued that ships carrying goods to Europe had difficulty in getting return cargoes to Canadian ports, and that if this measure were passed and British goods compelled to come in through Canadian ports, that would give these vessels the return cargoes they require and, consequently, bring about a reduction in freight rates. That is the most fallacious argument that could possibly be advanced in support of the resolution, because the facts of the case are precisely the reverse. Why is it that ocean freights from Atlantic ports in the United States to Great Britain are usually more favourable than from Canadian ports? It is due to the fact alone that vessels plying between American ports, such as New York, Baltimore, Newport News, Boston and Philadelphia, and European ports, can get return cargoes from Europe for American ports when they cannot get return cargoes for Canadian ports. Anyone knows that who has had any experience in export business.

Mr. BAXTER: Does this not provide return cargoes to some extent?

Mr. CRERAR: I will deal with that matter just in a moment. I have had some experience in this because for a good many years the company with which I have been and am still identified was a large exporter of grain from America to Europe, and it was invariably found that better conditions governing export, both in the securing of charters and the rates of freight, could be obtained from American ports than from Canadian ports. Why was this the case? Simply because the return traffic from Great Britain and Europe comes in immensely greater volume to United States Atlantic ports than it does to Canadian ports, for the reason that the United States has a population of 108,000,000 or 110,000,000 people against our 9,000,000 or 10,000,000 people, and consequently importations from Europe to supply the needs of that great United States population give the traffic for the west-bound trip. My hon. friends seek to reverse this. By an enactment of the Parliament, they seek to create a condition that will throw trade out of its normal, natural channel into an artificial channel created by this Government. I submit that is not in the interest of the Canadian people as a whole. My hon. friends may argue with considerable force that this may be of some advantage to the ports of St. John and Halifax; but if it be of advantage to those ports, that advantage will hold for only a certain period of the year. As everyone knows, these ports are winter ports. Their harbours are open the year around. The great harbour of Montreal that is, after all, the greatest seaport in Canada by all odds—

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: I note I have some support for that idea. The great harbour of Montreal is open only a portion of the year, and when Montreal is open, St. John and Halifax get practically no business whatever for points west of Montreal. Consequently, this proposal, that by arbitrary legislation of this Parliament we shall create artificial trade routes in order that our Atlantic seaports—and I have no wish whatever to say anything in disparagement of them—may enjoy a more profitable business for a few months in the year, is a proposition that is totally absurd and that should not command the support of this House.

There is another feature of the matter. If the purport of this resolution were incorporated into our Canadian laws and all British goods came in through Canadian ports, what guarantee can my hon friends give that the freight rates on those goods will not increase from Canadian ports to the interior where they are consumed? At the present time, with these goods having the privilege of coming in through United States ports in bond, we have the element of competition in transportation costs. That element would be completely eliminated were the resolution of my hon. friend carried.

We have heard a good deal of talk from my hon. friends about being independent of the United States. Now, Sir, I thought the time had passed when any hon. gentleman in this House was of the opinion that this or any other country, in matters of trade, can live to itself alone. That is simply impossible. In fact, as the years go on the interdependence of nations in matters of trade is growing, and there is an increasing realization of the fact; and to argue that we must be independent of the United States in respect of any matter of that kind is but to make a sort of patriotic appeal that has no basis whatever in real patriotism.

There is another fact in connection with this question which perhaps has a more remote bearing upon it, but which, nevertheless, should not be overlooked. It is a well-known fact that eastern American cities, particularly the seaboard cities, were among the strongest believers in reciprocity in natural products between Canada and the United States. I think it is of some value to Canada to have that feeling existing in that country. My hon. friends to the right of me, I know, have no faith in the value of reciprocity to Canadian development. I trust that that feeling is not shared by my hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan). If these favourable trade arrangements with the United States are to be secured, they are to be secured, not by our taking any step that would antagonize a body of opinion in that country that is now favourable to the proposal, but by our cultivating that opinion in the hope that eventually a satisfactory arrangement may be brought about.

There is something else, too, that should not be ignored. Within recent years there has been a steady growth in the amount of American business that has been carried through the port of Montreal. Why do nations have their trade carried in this way? Business concerns and individuals, who are buying goods from foreign countries and selling in return, buy and sell those goods along the lines that are most advantageous to them, and if goods are coming through the United States now, what is the explanation of that fact? The reason is simply because the Canadian people and Canadian firms can secure those goods more cheaply in that way than in any other way. And are we to set up an arbitrary provision of this Parliament that will compel the people of Canada to purchase the things they need from Great Britain through an arbitrary channel that will increase the cost to the consumers? That is a point that must not be overlooked in considering the question; and if we undertake to create a discrimination, in the matter of these importations, against the United States seaports, may we not reasonably expect that opinion in the United States—if indeed their government does not—will set up contrary discriminations against our port in Montreal? I am a great believer in the future of the port of Montreal, because the great business that lies away back in the interior can come down to Montreal by boat in the open season of navigation, and be transferred to the ocean liners that carry the goods to their ultimate markets. I trust, therefore, that the Government will not listen to the admonitions of my hon. friends from Cumberland (Mr. Logan) and St. John (Mr. Baxter), so far as this question is concerned.

My hon. friend from St. John introduced the tariff, and said that protection was necessary in this country for the purpose of securing a revenue. I do not propose to debate that question to-day, because it is not particularly germane to the resolution under consideration; and I endeavour in this House, I am afraid not always successfully, to confine my remarks to the subject matter under discussion. But I may be permitted to say that if my hon. friend from St. John thinks that a tariff of 30 or 35 per cent, for instance, on woollen goods coming into this country—I take that as an illustration—facilitates the getting of revenue through a customs duty, I think he has something yet to learn. Let me say once more, what I have said in this House before, that a tariff based on the needs of revenue is a totally different thing from a tariff based on the principle of protection. So far, some of my hon. friends have not been able to grasp that fact. I agree with everything that my hon. friend from St. John has said, or anything that any one else can say, in regard to the need and desirability of binding this country together. We know that there are diverse elements in the population of Canada. We have a country that is flung across the American continent for over four thousand miles, and we have a danger of sectional differences. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the possibility of removing these differences is not advanced by any resolution such as is submitted to this House this afternoon by my hon. friend; and on the high ground of Canadian national unity I would appeal to the hon. member to withdraw his motion. Anything in this Dominion of ours that seeks to advance the interests of any single section of the community at the expense of the rest of Canada does not make for national unity. I know that the part of Canada from which I come is sometimes regarded as having a narrow, sectional outlook. I am aware that that view is held; but I have never, at any time or place in this country, discussed our national problems from that angle. We must find common ground on which to appeal to the Canadian people to build up a united Canadian nation, and I submit that the purpose of this resolution, instead of advancing that ideal, as my hon. friend from St. John suggests, would on the contrary retard it. For that reason, if for no other, I shall oppose the resolution if it goes to a vote.

Mr. MANION: I desire to ask the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) a question, the purpose of which is not in any way to refute any of his arguments. He says that he has declared several times in the House that a revenue tariff is not the same as a protective tariff. I absolutely agree with him, but I should like to have him explain, although perhaps it may not be altogether in order, what he means by this statement.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know whether or not I am in order in answering the question, but the statement I made was that a tariff based on the needs of revenue is a different thing altogether from a tariff based on the principle of protection. No matter what the duties may be, any tariff affords protection incidentally. That is a fact that any one who knows anything about tariffs admits.

Mr. MANION: Not if it is on non-competing articles.

Mr. CRERAR: That is true, but we are discussing all goods coming into the country. A tariff for the purpose of revenue is a different thing from a tariff designed to keep goods out of the country in order that the home manufacturer may benefit.

Mr. JAMES MALCOLM (North Bruce): I had not intended to speak on this resolution, but I asked a question of the hon. member for St. John, and in reply he referred me to some campaign literature in connection with the election. I was not in the province from which he comes at the time of the election, nor have I seen any of the literature to which he refers. I find myself very much in accord with the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), but I should like to point out that there has been a very considerable amount of criticism of the Government's attitude on public ownership of our railways from various members on the other side of the chamber. They have intimated that it is doubtful if the Government will give public ownership a fair trial. But no hon. member can doubt that the Grand Trunk Railway system is to-day a national possession, and that if public management fails in the operation of that system, we will have to seek other means of operating it. However, so long as it is a national asset, it does seem to me that the principal port of the Grand Trunk Railway system, the port of Portland, is being directly discriminated against by this resolution, and I do not understand why it should be discriminated against before the Minister of Railways has had an opportunity of laying his railway policy before the House. I also find myself very much in accord with the hon. member for Marquette as to competitive freight rates. The only point to which he has not referred is that we are receiving package freight in mixed cargoes through American ports; but this is because a solid cargo of mixed merchandise would not be available from Great Britain, France or any other European country, simply because the volume of our imports is limited in comparison with similar imports by the United States. Therefore the Canadian importer gets the benefit of the freight rate from Portland, but if this resolution were adopted he would be discriminated against and, in fact, penalized.

I am just as much in sympathy with the viewpoint of hon. members from the maritime provinces as anyone can possibly be, but it seems to me that it would be a fatal mistake for us to discriminate at this time against the Atlantic port of the Canadian National railways, and therefore I hope that this resolution will not be pressed at least until a time when we will not be so directly interested in Portland as one of our National railway ports.

Mr. L. H. MARTELL (Hants): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate, but it seems to me that the principles of my party would be absolutely ignored if this particular resolution were permitted to pass. We have been told a great deal by some speakers about national unity; but if we are to have national unity we must of necessity get away from sectional interests. While the port of Halifax is not far from the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and the port of St. John is not a great distance away, nevertheless any resolution which would have for its object the forcing of trade to those ports at the expense of cheaper goods to our people I think should not be tolerated.

I believe that the British preference should be increased, and I am one of those bold enough to state that I hope I shall see the day when we shall have absolute free trade with the Motherland. If we pass this resolution to-day to force goods getting the British preference to come through Canadian ports, we are in effect supporting what is practically an argument to bolster up that false principle of protection against which I shall always raise my voice. If my constituents wish to receive goods, they naturally desire to buy them at the cheapest possible prices. Therefore any resolution which would compel them to pay more for those goods would be inimical to their interests. I care not whence these goods come, I care not through what channels they are introduced into Canada, my object is to see that the people who bear the burden and heat of the day get their goods with the minimum amount of protection and consequently at the cheapest possible cost. Therefore I am not prepared to record my vote in favour of anything which may mean simply a slight advantage probably to one or two localities but must inevitably result in the absolute elimination of cheaper goods for the people at large. I think that the British preference should be gradually increased so that the day may not be far distant when our toilers will be able to buy cheap goods without putting money into the pockets of manufacturers who are being protected to carry on industries that are not indigenous to our soil. I say without fear of contradiction that the principles of Liberalism in which I was raised have always taught me to look forward ultimately to free trade in this Dominion.

Mr. L. J. LADNER (Vancouver South): I do not see why hon. members from Nova Scotia should feel that they alone are concerned about our coast ports; at any rate, British Columbians always like to have their say when it comes to a discussion of such matters. One interesting feature has been disclosed in this debate. It is not so much a question in my opinion, Mr. Speaker, whether the motion before the House has any merit one way or the other, but this debate, like many others, has disclosed the fact that there are two lines of thought permeating our public men, evidenced more strongly in our Progressive friends than in any other political body. It will be found in the debates—and I do not say it by way of disparagement—that our Progressive friends base public policy essentially upon economics. As between the two great parties it will be found that the outlook in formulating public policy for parliamentary action is not confined to the economic, but takes in the political and national aspect. My hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) perhaps does not agree with me in this, but I leave it to hon. members generally to confirm my statement that in this discussion, as in many other discussions, his party is mainly influenced by the consideration that a policy is to be measured by its consequences in dollars and cents rather than in its consequences on our nationhood and our national outlook.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if the war has taught us one thing—and we can learn much from the war—it has taught us that all these picayune economic advantages which may be gained in a temporary fashion, by legislation or otherwise, fade to nothing when the conflict of arms takes place as it did in the great war; As a result of such conflict one great principle is established, one on which the members of this House are solid—and we have the history of our country to back us—and that is the principle of the necessity of developing an outlook for our nationhood and the maintenance of our national entity, and this you cannot do if you compromise our most vital economic interest by associating with another country from which you cannot be extricated in times of economic difficulties. I see my hon. friend smiling; perhaps he wishes to put a question to me.

Mr. FORKE: The hon. member insinuated that we in this part of the chamber were lacking in patriotism. Will he state exactly what we are seeking that we are not willing to extend to all the people of the Dominion?

Mr. LADNER: I did not make the suggestion that my hon. friends were lacking in patriotism. In no part of Canada did the people exhibit a greater sense of responsibility or a more loyal sentiment during the war than the people of the prairie provinces. But what I say is that in connection with matters which have been discussed in this House the economic aspect has been too much emphasized; the question is always asked, what is to be the result in dollars and cents? My point is that we must take a broader view of these matters; we must evidence a spirit of co-operation throughout all parts of the country. It may be necessary for one portion of Canada to give way in some degree as respects their individual interests, for the benefit of the whole country—as has been so well expressed by the hon. member for St. John City (Mr. Baxter) in connection with Nova Scotia. The purpose of this resolution is a very fair one: it is national in its outlook; it has the national welfare in view. The Liberal-Conservative party has always taken the attitude that in developing our nationhood we should not stress too much the economic aspect; we should, in questions of either national or international import, consider the political as well as the economic point of view. We must maintain ourselves as a national entity, as other countries are doing, and as was found necessary on the part of the most highly developed form of nationhood during the war. Without that, we might have been submerged; without that, other countries might have been submerged. With that other countries have lived; with that, Canada will live—if we do not think too much of the economic aspect of these questions.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, it was not my thought in the first place to take part in this debate, but the hon. member who has just sat down (Mr. Ladner) has given me a text. We have heard something from him, as we have from the hon. member for St. John and Albert (Mr. Baxter), about national unity; and it was very noticeable that while according to the Rules of the House they addressed Mr. Speaker, both of them directed their remarks toward hon. members in this corner of the Chamber.

The hon. member for St. John and Albert rebuked us for what seemed to him to be our failure to grasp the situation as it related to the Dominion as a whole. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, that no one more than I would decry any attempt to set race against race or section against section. But when the hon. member who has just taken his seat tells us that the Conservative party above all other parties is animated by sentimental considerations and that dollars and cents do not enter into its discussion of these matters—well, that is something which up to the present we have not understood.

Let me say this in regard to national unity. As I have said already, certain remarks were directed to our corner of the House, especially, perhaps, to those representing the West. If there is any feeling of resentment—I say, if there is—in the prairie provinces to-day against other portions of the Dominion, it has been brought about by the attitude of ownership that has been assumed by other parts of the Dominion in regard to the West. Has anybody ever heard it stated that the Canadian Pacific railway was built by the prairie provinces and for them alone? Yet I am sure that that attitude of ownership, which, I say, has been taken in the past, will be taken again when the question of the natural resources comes to be discussed. When the plea is made for national unity it must not be forgotten that during the past fifty years the West has had good reason to believe that it has been considered a fair subject for exploitation on the part of those who live in the East and extreme West. So that sometimes when we are asked in the interests of unity to forego certain things or to refrain from seeking certain advantages, we are asked to do what the lamb did—lie down with the lion, but inside.

The economic aspect of the question has been very fairly set forth by our hon. leader (Mr. Crerar). When the people of the West are asked to agree to a proposal of this kind they will need to be shown a good deal. Much has been said in the past about a certain Wood from Missouri. Well, there are a great many people from Missouri in the West, in the sense that they will need to be shown and shown very clearly that a proposal of this kind will not mean the imposition of an additional burden upon them. My experience in the West goes back over forty years. I recall very clearly the difficulties and the hardships of the pioneers who sought to develop our part of the country and make it what it is to-day. The prairie provinces have furnished a great market for the East as well as the West. Without that section of the Dominion, I venture to say, the interests of the East would long ere this have ceased to enjoy the prosperity they are enjoying to-day, and would, perhaps, show a greater tendency than they do now to establish trade lines north and south.

Mr. MURRAY MacLAREN (St. John City and Counties of St. John and Albert): Mr. Speaker, the terms of this resolution are based on broad national grounds. In matters relating to Canada as a whole, the various sections of the country must proceed as a unit so that we may have a uniform and satisfactory system throughout. One might suppose, upon hearing the remarks of the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), that this is a local question; that it relates simply to the welfare of St. John and Halifax. I assure hon. members that that is anything but the case. It is true that benefit would result to St. John and Halifax, but there are other ports in the maritime provinces besides those two. Further, I believe that if this proposal were carried out there would be ports in the maritime provinces in the furture that we do not know of to-day. In other words, it would lead to the development of our maritime ports.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Sitting suspended for Royal Assent to bill.

A message was delivered by Colonel Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate.

And having returned,

The Speaker informed the House that the Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General had been pleased to give in His Majesty's name the Royal Assent to the following bill.

An Act for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service of the Financial year ending on 31st, March, 1923.

Mr. MacLAREN: I was urging, when interrupted by the summons to the Senate that this resolution and the principle it embodies should be regarded from a high and broad national standpoint, as a question affecting the interests of Canada as a whole; that the suggestion that it was being brought forward to benefit a few individual points was an incorrect and restricted view; and that if you entertained it, it would weaken the outlook regarding the development of this country, because, Mr. Speaker, this question affects not only the seacoasts and seaports of our Dominion, both on the Atlantic and Pacific, but also the whole maritime position of our country. I wish, therefore, to support this resolution which has been brought forward by the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) with very much satisfaction.

Mr. A. J. LEWIS (Swift Current): I wish to say a few words in regard to this resolution, and I do so with diffidence, besause the hon. gentleman opposite quoted extracts from speeches of such men as Mr. Fielding, Mr. Maclean, and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and it would seem presumptuous on my part to differ with these great men. At the same time I feel that every one has a right to his own convictions. I do not believe that you can build up a nation, or develop Canadian sentiment, Canadian spirit, on an artificial restriction. I believe that we must build on some surer foundation than the benefit that will be enjoyed by certain individual people. It seems strange to us to hear people speaking as though we of the Progressive party did not believe in the unity of Canada. I can readily understand that people from various provinces will have different conceptions with respect to this question but it seems to me that the great benefit from the adoption of this resolution would be enjoyed only by a certain class of people. While the mover of the resolution was speaking I was endeavouring to find out whether his object was, to increase the revenue, or increase Canadian trade in Canadian ports, or on the other hand, to make conditions more difficult for the Canadian consumer. He said that this latter was not the view at all. He camouflaged it by saying that the real object of this resolution was to create a national spirit, and if anything to intensify Canadianism. But if it is possible to intensify Canadianism by bringing all British goods through British ports, and the hon. gentlemen opposite, and hon. gentlemen to my right, are sincere in that desire, then, in order to give further effect to their wishes, I will propose an amendment to the resolution, so as to make it read as follows:

That in the opinion of this House the British tariff preference should be increased 25 per cent on all goods brought into Canada through Canadian seaports.

That to me, will show whether there is sincerity in the motion, and whether it will mean greater trade for Canadian ports.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is moved in amendment by Mr. Lewis, seconded by Mr. Brown;

That in the opinion of this House the British tariff preference should be increased 25 per cent on all goods brought into Canada through Canadian seaports.

Mr. LEWIS: If this matter is coming to a vote, and if it is going to be considered when the tariff is under discussion, I will withdraw the amendment at this time.

Mr. FIELDING: That is better.

Mr. BROWN: Did Mr. Speaker read my name as seconding the motion? I do not want to second it.

Mr. SPEAKER: The amendment imposes a tax and cannot be moved by a private member of the House. However, I understand the hon. gentleman wishes to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): I agree with the statement made by the hon. gentleman from St. John and Albert (Mr. MacLaren) that this question should be regarded from a broad national standpoint. And it seems to me if you regard it from that standpoint, the resolution stands condemned. So far as I can see, national unity can only be established on one basis, and that is the belief and conviction on the part of every section that each is getting a square deal from every other, and I regard this particular resolution as an indication, an evidence, an example, of the desire to exploit some sections for the benefit of others. I wish to oppose the resolution for that reason, and for the reason that I regard Canadian unity as something highly to be desired and sought after.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I shall take up only a short time in discussing this resolution. I dissent somewhat from the statement made this afternoon that an issue must be broad and appeal to many people if it is to be an issue for the purpose of binding the country together and promoting the idea of nationality. I have been in this House for a long time now, and my experience in studying developments that have taken place in the House and in Canada, is best expressed by this little rhyme:

> Little drops of water,
> Little grains of sand,
> Make the mighty ocean,
> And the pleasant land.

Nations sometimes come into being on account of great events, such as the late Great War; but the bulk of our national progress, as I have read history and seen its development in this House, is made little by little, chip by chip. The hon. member (Mr. Logan) who introduced the resolution to-day, did me the honour of quoting something which I said in this House some years ago, and my opinion remains the same. He also quoted the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who was then and is now in the House, in the same direction. He also quoted Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the same direction. Go where you will, you will find, in this country, many people who believe in our nationality, in the future of Canada, and who believe that our success as a nation is to be achieved by one thing at a time, by moving in a certain direction, our progress involving, as all progressive measures do, not so much agreement as concession by one portion of the country to another. If I read history aright, the manner in which we have made headway in this country is by one section being broad enough to recognize the claims of another, and by mutual concessions.

Let us come back to one or two other points that have been brought up this afternoon. Mention has been made of the port of Portland. I am an absolute believer in the future success of our national railways. The appeal made by an hon. gentleman opposite that we might, in some way, hurt our investment, or the future of our Canadian National railways, if we passed an act discriminating against imports coming in by Portland and thence by our railways, and that thus we would be injuring ourselves, has some force in it. But that question came up in regard to our possession of railways in the United States, and it was argued not so long ago that we should not own railways in the United States; that they would resent our owning railways in their country and we would resent their owning railways in Canada. During a certain period in our history, the American government controlled railways in this country, and we are now controlling railways in their country. If the matter comes to the broad issue of national railways, I may say that I am prepared to-morrow to see our Government allow the United States government, if it sees fit, as a national proposition, to take over the Grand Trunk and also the Canadian Pacific in so far as they lie in the state of Maine, that section of the Grand Trunk between Detroit and Chicago, and Canadian Pacific sections that run to Minneapolis and St. Paul. Indeed, I hope they will take over those sections of railway that Canadian railway companies or this Government own in the United States, provided they take them over and consolidate them into a national system owned by the people of the United States. Then, having that control, they will co-operate with us in regard to these two national roads for the development of the commerce of this continent. That is my answer to that proposition.

As to this special proposal to make a discrimination on goods that are routed to this country by Canadian ports, I still believe we can afford to make these concessions. No progress is made simply by benefits secured for everybody; progress is made by concessions that one makes to one's neighbour, by co-operation. Co-operation is the word. We must co-operate in order to build up our ports. Every one knows that the future is not clear to us at present. Let me tell my hon. friends from the West that, if they hope that a people that is wholly pastoral or agricultural, is going to maintain its nationality, they are mistaken because nationality can be maintained only by organizing a country industrially. Some day we shall see the necessity of making these concessions for the benefit of our ports. It is claimed there is a menace to our country from Asiatic inroads through our ports on the Pacific; but these people may come from a purely national and patriotic point of view to develop those ports, and it is concessions like these and a policy of the character contained in the resolution that, while they may interfere with the interests of the individual or of sections of the country, may benefit the country as a whole.

How are we going to get lower freight rates in this country? I spoke of this matter the other day, and hon. gentlemen must know what is going on in the United States. There is a prospect of securing lower freight rates in this country by the development of the St. Lawrence waterways, and this development will bring seaports into our upper lakes and even up to the waters of the Saskatchewan and the Assiniboine. We want all the sea ports we can get; but we often cannot develop them by a broad policy, and we must do this by making headway a little here and a little there. I read in the press this morning some news which may interest my hon. friends from the West, namely, that the leader of the Imperial Government announced in the British House of Commons that they are prepared to have the question of the British embargo on Canadian cattle come up again in that House, and the announcement goes even further, that the vote will be open and that members of the House will have an opportunity of voting whether or not they are in favour of the removal of the restriction that that Government, in the interest of protecting the British cattle breeder, have insisted on in the past. That may be a small matter to some people; but it is by constant agitation on our part, partly by farmers in the different provinces, that some headway has been made in this regard, and it is by small concessions that these successes are eventually achieved.

It is not by advocating any broad principle of British preference or free trade. We cannot have absolute free trade, but we need protection, because that is the only policy that will develop our industries, make us strong, and provide the sinews that go to make a sturdy nationhood. I have every sympathy with the West and their aspirations, but the national policy of protection—the policy of Sir John Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier—is the one we need in Canada; and possibly the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), when tariff proposals are disclosed, will be persuaded to base his policy on the necessities of the whole country.

I have not heard a single argument to-day that would induce me to abandon the view I stated on the floor of the House in support of a similar resolution some years ago. During my time in this House I have observed that the national progress of the country has been due to legislation of this kind. The reasons for the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway were largely embodied in the remarks of my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) to-day. The Canadian Pacific railway and the Transcontinental have broadened to meet the requirements of the whole country; and anything that is done to meet the claims of the West must also have regard to Canada at large. For the protection of our own interests, I agree with the member for St. John (Mr. Baxter), we should increase the use of our own ports by our own ships. We have a large fleet of ships now that were built for an emergency. They are not doing much and they ought to be put to use so that we might have lower rates, both in taking our own goods to foreign markets and in bringing cargoes to our own people. I trust that hon. members will not forget the views of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as quoted to-day, in regard to the development of our ports. We cannot depend on American ports; we must have our own. It is absolutely essential for a nation, if it wishes to maintain its integrity, promote its future prosperity, and realize its visions, to be broadly organized in the matter of transportation. It is as much in the interests of the people to develop the country's trade by means of its ports, as it is to have a tariff that will promote industry.

Moved by all these considerations, I still hold that no great mistake would be made by enacting legislation of this kind which proposes to build up our ports and, through them, our railways, and to do so in the light of the experience of the United States. The most highly organized nation in the world to-day is that republic, and its success is founded on a national policy. The greatest producers of food in the world at the present time are those people of the United States who have had the good fortune to control the Mississippi valley, which is rich in corn, coal, cotton, wheat, live stock, and meats of all kinds. The United States has been the most protective nation, and it has had the broadest national policy of any country in respect of its ports, and all the utilities established for the purpose of developing the trade and commerce of the people. They are so pronounced in this policy that they discriminate against us. The farmers of the United States have a national policy in agriculture, and a bill is now in progress through Congress establishing a high tariff which is backed by the farmers' bloc, with its chief mouthpiece in the farmers' organization.

My hon. friend, the second leader of the House (Mr. Crerar), does not realize how far his arguments are taking him. In Japan they used to have a Mikado and a Tycoon, and perhaps we have them in this House to-day. The hon. member does not realize that the farmers in the United States have a policy which discriminates against us, but which nevertheless is designed to make them the greatest country in the world. There is a diversity of employment in the United States and they have large industries that give employment to many simply because they have pursued a broad national policy and have built up the country at every point. They have highly developed their railways, their industries, and their agriculture, and have made concessions here and there, in all cases from the national rather than the sectional point of view.

Some hon. member has challenged us to give any instance where the Progressive party has advocated any sectional policy in this House. Well, I should not like to see my hon. friends from the West taking any narrow stand, and that is why I say that we should consider this question in a broad spirit. I am very much in sympathy with my hon. friends, and I think I can say that I am more of a democrat in many respects than they are; and I believe I am as progressive as they themselves. But I differ from them in some ways, and if there is one difference in particular between us it is the fact that I like to take the broadest national view of any question that comes up, mainly because Canada is still in the period of its formation. And while there has always been a difference between the public men of the country as to what policy will conduce most to its development, I do not think there is any doubt that the national policy, not only in regard to the tariff, but also in the matter of building up our own ports and railways, is the best.

I will take the view that the Minister of Finance will make no mistake if when he introduces his Budget he recognizes that in some way the development of our ports should be encouraged. I hope hon. members on the other side of the House will not think that I disagree so much with their views as with the relative merits of those views. I believe more and more in the policy of this country being based on the development of our nationhood along the line of having diversity of employment as a result of encouraging all kinds of industry, and of making our ports the complement of our railway system.

Mr. LOGAN: Mr. Speaker, as I stated when I introduced this motion this afternoon, I do not intend to press it to a vote because I do not believe it would be constitutionally right that the Government should be asked to commit itself on a tariff matter in anticipation of the Budget to be brought down by the Minister of Finance. But in withdrawing this motion I am constrained to say, that some of the speeches delivered in the course of this debate have been very disheartening to those of us who desire to build up a great and united Canada. If it has come to this pass, that there is nothing in the cry of "Canada for Canadians", then God help Canada! When we reflect that every day freight given the advantage of the British preference is passing the port of Halifax—probably one of the four best ports in the wide world—to be landed in the port of New York, seven hundred miles further by sea than our port, upon which we have expended sixteen or seventeen million dollars—and for which my hon. friend from Marquette cannot deny responsibility because he was a member of the government that voted millions of dollars for the terminal port facilities in that harbor and the building of grain elevators in St. John and Halifax—we must ask ourselves: What has it all been for if not to create Canadian trade through Canadian channels?

It is unfortunate that in this debate we have heard so many inconsistent statements. Surely my hon. friend from Marquette does not say that if you have a full cargo both east and west you do not secure better rates on your eastbound cargo? He needs no knowledge of ocean freights to appreciate that; his own common sense must force him to that conclusion.

It is unfortunate that whenever we move a resolution in this House it should give rise in the minds of many of my hon. friends to the suspicion that there must be some ulterior motive influencing us and inimical to the interests of agriculture. I want to assure you, Sir, and this House that behind this motion there is only the desire, to build up a more united and independent Canada to give more business to our ports and railways, and to show the world that we can do business on the northern part of this continent without having to depend on the ports of the United States. If the contrary is true, what did we build the Grand Trunk Pacific for? Why did we spend two or three hundred million dollars in building this transcontinental railway if there is nothing in this proposition of east and west traffic? The attitude of some hon. members seem to be: Let the grass grow on the wharves of Halifax and St. John. What do we care so long as we can get our grain sent across the Atlantic one or two cents a bushel cheaper via Portland, Boston or New York? That attitude is discouraging to a Canadian. And then as if to accentuate the inconsistency, my hon. friend, after making a long speech denouncing this resolution, proposes that we should increase the British preference on British goods coming through canadian ports! "Consistency, thou art a jewel."

I urge upon the Government that they consider this matter very seriously, and I can only hope that when the Budget is brought down the Finance Minister will declare that this preference—which, as I have said, is an arrangement between mother and daughter—shall be confined to goods landed at Canadian ports. We have not had time to discuss this matter at length, but had I the opportunity now I would demonstrate conclusively that the argument advanced by hon. members in opposition to this resolution has been based upon wrong knowledge. I would prove that the freight rate to-day between Liverpool and Winnipeg, via Canadian ports, is not any higher than it is via New York and Boston; in fact, in some cases it is lower.

Mr. CRERAR: If that is the case, might I ask my hon. friend why do these goods not come in through Canadian ports at the present time?

Mr. LOGAN: On account of our not patronizing Canadian liners as we should, we have not the same frequency of service as they have through New York and Boston because we do not give our freighters sufficient eastbound traffic.

The hour for adjournment has almost arrived and the time is too short for me to go into this argument at any greater length; therefore, in accordance with my previously announced intention, I now withdraw the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the unanimous consent of the House that the hon. member have leave to withdraw his motion?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Granted.

Motion withdrawn.

At six o'clock the House adjourned without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, April 6, 1922

The House met at three o'clock.

PENSIONS' COMMITTEE

Mr. HERBERT MARLER (St. Lawrence-St. George) presented the first report of the special committee appointed by the House to consider questions relating to pensions, insurance and re-establishment of returned soldiers and any amendments to the existing laws in relation thereto which may be proposed.

He said: This report recommends that the quorum of the committee be reduced from 15 to 9 members, and your committee recommend that leave be granted them to sit while the House is in session. By special permission of the House, I would move that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Mr. MEIGHEN: Notice was given yesterday of a motion to concur in the second and third reports of the Committee on Agriculture. If action is to be taken on this matter—and some action should be taken, yea or nay—there should certainly be no delay.

Mr. KAY: If the right hon. gentleman will look at the Votes and Proceedings of to-day he will see that notice of this motion has been given for to-morrow.

Mr. SPEAKER: If it is the unanimous wish of the House, the motion which has been fixed for to-morrow can be debated to-day.

Mr. BUREAU: Who blocked it yesterday? I understand this resolution was blocked yesterday by the right hon. leader of the official Opposition (Mr. Meighen).

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is quite correct. The motion for concurrence came up yesterday, and it could only be adopted by consent. We had not known that there was to be a motion to concur. I certainly wanted to consider it. For me, twenty-four hours is sufficient for consideration. I am prepared to wait twenty-four hours more if it is desired by any hon. member of this House but I think it my duty to say that the sooner we dispose of this matter the better, because very much hangs on our disposition of it.

Mr. BUREAU: I understand the right hon. gentleman insisted on the rule being followed, and it is being followed. Now he wants to break the rule, or make an exception by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPEAKER: It could only be proceeded with to-day by unanimous consent. So, it will stand.

REDISTRIBUTION

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I beg to put to the Government a question of which I gave notice, as to whether they proposed bringing down, at this session, a measure providing for redistribution.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The Government has no desire to delay the bringing down of such a measure, but the Government does not wish to proceed with undue haste in the matter. As my right hon. friend knows, a measure of redistribution is one that is likely to occupy a considerable share of the time of the House, both in committee and in subsequent discussion in the chamber; and as it is not anticipated that there is any desire for a general election between now and the end of the year, the Government has felt that redistribution might well stand until the next session of Parliament.

LIQUOR IMPORTATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Centre Vancouver): I should like to ask the Government a question in reference to a despatch which I saw in the press this morning and which refers to an interview given by Mr. Manson, Attorney General of British Columbia, in which, according to the despatch, he states there is to be introduced into this House by the Government during this session, certain important legislation which will serve to restrict the importation of liquor into provinces in which liquor is sold only by the governments of such provinces. Is such legislation coming down? And, if so, would it not have been better if the Government had taken the House into its confidence, the Prime Minister having frequently stated that to be his doctrine, than to have this announcement made to the public press?

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I am unable to speak for any person other than myself. The subject which my hon. friend has just discussed is under consideration at the present time, and the House will be informed as soon as it is definitely decided whether legislation will be brought down or not. I think I shall be able very shortly to inform my hon. friend as to what will be done in the matter.

Mr. STEVENS: No decision has been reached in the matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There has been no final decision.

CIVIL SERVICE BONUS

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): Has the Government come to any decision in reference to the Civil Service Bonus?

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): This matter also is under consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

The House again in Committee on Bill No. 27, respecting the Department of National Defence, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Mr. GRAHAM: We discussed this matter the other day in Committee of the Whole on the resolution. I do not know that I can add anything to what I said the other day concerning the contents of the bill.

On section 4—services included:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I submit that important clauses of this bill should be read out to the committee, so that members may have a better understanding of them.

Mr. GRAHAM: There was a good deal of discussion the other day on this clause, which relates to the inclusion of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. There was, of course, a difference of opinion as to whether this force should be included or not. Almost every member of the House had a good word to say for the force, but they differed somewhat on the advisability of maintaining the force at its full strength. There seemed to be a general consensus of opinion that perhaps it would not be wise to include in the Defence Department the control of the mounted police, the argument being that this force was created as a civil and not a military force and should remain such. I do not feel like combatting that view to any extent, as undoubtedly the facts stated are correct. This much, however, the committee will bear in mind, that, in taking this step, we shall be unable to carry on the economies that were expected to be effected by the combination of executive staffs of these two branches. As was stated the other afternoon, it was thought that the civil staff of the mounted police could, in a large measure, outside of temporary employees, be worked into the new department without hardship to any person and with increased efficiency of the combined

Department of Defence. If we accept the proposal that the police branch be not attached to the Department of Defence, we shall not be able to do that. I think it is fair to say to the committee—I forgot to mention this the other afternoon—that for the last couple of months the Minister of Militia has been administering the Mounted Police. It was in the Justice Department when the Government came into power, and it was transferred or attached to the outside, without giving authority to the minister.

I believe it is the opinion of the committee generally that the Mounted Police might be greatly reduced in numbers. Of course, if we intend to restrict the activities of the force to the unorganized territories the force will be very small. There will always be work in connection with the Mounted Police in the city of Ottawa and vicinity. I would not say that the work of the force ought to be restricted altogether to the unorganized territories. I have communicated with the several provincial premiers, and while I have not heard from all, the correspondence that I have so far received leads me to think that perhaps it would not be wise, all at once, to withdraw all the forces from the provinces. As our object is not so much to stand on technical differences as to protect the people where we can, I want the committee to consider what the various premiers have said. I will not encumber Hansard with all the letters but will give a synopsis of the reply from each province. Ontario thinks that the Canadian Mounted Police would be of material assistance in the enforcement of law and order if proper co-operation between the Dominion and the province could be established. The Prime Minister of Quebec thinks that some use might be made of the Mounted Police in Ungava and the northern portions of that province, but so far as the older and settled parts are concerned he does not think that it is wise to continue their services.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. GRAHAM: The province of Nova Scotia thinks that some advantage might be gained if it were able to call upon a federal police at any time. As regards Saskatchewan, Premier Martin thinks that some arrangement should be made such as existed prior to 1917, by which the Mounted Police should have charge of the enforcement of criminal law. The province of New Brunswick was somewhat canny; it has not so far replied. Its premier thinks that the maintenance of a force there might cost the province something, and the matter has not yet been decided because it would depend on the services that could be rendered. In some cases it might be well to ask the provinces assisted to help in some of the expense. No replies have been received from British Columbia, Manitoba, Alberta and Prince Edward Island. Under the present circumstances I think it is impossible for us to come to any fast and firm decision as to what we should do, but I take it as the view of the committee that, whether or not the Mounted Police be included in the new Defence Department, the number of men in that force could be materially reduced. As I pointed out, I do not strongly hold the view that it ought to be brought into the Department of Defence, for the reason adduced by hon. gentlemen, that it is a civil force; and as the estimated economy to be effected by the amalgamation of the two executives cannot be expected if the police be not taken absolutely into the Defence Department, it will not make any material difference as to the authority of the Government to reduce the police force to any size it may think wise. To meet the wishes of the committee I move that in line 3 of the section the words "Air and Police" be struck out and the words "and Air" be substituted therefor.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I highly commend the minister for his decision. It is true, it robs the bill of about its only radical feature, but it is a wise move to leave the Mounted Police out. The Police, as has been stated, is a civil force. I do not see, however, that the minister's point, that he is going to be disarmed from effecting economies, has any force. If the Mounted Police are left in the Militia, then the officers of that department will be in control of the force. As minister of that department my hon. friend will be requisitioned for the services of the Mounted Police, and gradually in the public mind the opinion will grow that the force are a part of the military organization of Canada. Now, they are no part of the defence of the country; they are a part of the force for the maintenance of law and order, which is not a function of the Militia or the Defence Department. It is far more a function of the Justice Department, and previously the Dominion Police were under that department. When the Mounted Police came in they remained under that department for a time, and then both went under the department that had controlled the Mounted Police before. While the Department of Justice is not responsible for the maintenance of law and order, nevertheless its functions are closely related thereto, and by placing the police under that department and utilizing its officers, economy can be effected in that way, just as well as in the Militia Department, if it is really desired to eliminate high-paid officers. I was glad to hear the minister's remarks about the reduction of the Mounted Police. I do not doubt that a reduction could now be effected; but if I measure the opinion of the minister aright it does not differ very much from my own, that anything in the nature of reckless or wanton reduction now would be very poor economy, and instead of meeting public opinion would go in defiance thereof. I hope the force will be reduced to the utmost extent possible, consistent with serving the purposes of the Mounted Police, but no further. The minister in his communications with the premiers of the provinces has so far received the replies which I should have expected. I do not like to prophesy, but I think that when he hears from the other premiers in the West they will give very much the same judgment as that of the premier of Saskatchewan. By the way, I observed applause when the minister stated that the police would not be required in the older parts of the province of Quebec, but might be used in the district of Ungava. Why the distinction? If the maintenance of law and order is wholly a provincial function, and if we are not justified in assuming any part of it, we have no more right to go into Ungava than into the older parts of Quebec. They might be able to use the police more in Ungava, it is true, but the principle of the division of constitutional jurisdiction applies just as much to Ungava as to the city of Montreal. It is a question of expense, that is all; and the force may be needed as much in Quebec as in any other province. If we are to maintain a fluid reserve force for the purposes for which the police are established, it is hard to justify saying to three, or four or five provinces: "We will maintain a force at your disposal, subject to your requisition," and to three or four other provinces: "The force shall not be subject to your requisition at all." I do not know how that stand could be justified, and consequently the minister's present state of mind is about the right one —to reduce where he can. We are getting further from war conditions and some reduction may be possible, but the main purpose of the Mounted Police will not permit of any wanton or reckless reduction of the force, or the contraction of its utility from the purpose which it is now constituted to fulfil.

Mr. BAXTER: The section refers to the "Militia," the "Military, the Naval," and other forces. Is there any possible distinction between the "Military" and the "Militia" forces? In other words, is there any military in Canada which is not militia, either active or passive?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. BAXTER: That is part of the active militia of Canada?

Mr. GRAHAM: I may not get the military terms right, but we generally refer to the volunteer force as the militia, and it is so described in the British North America Act.

Mr. HANSON: So far as I am aware there are no Mounted Police in New Brunswick, nor were any ever brought in except under requisition. There is a detachment in Halifax. Are the provincial authorities bound to pay for the services of the Mounted Police when they are requisitioned for local duty?

Mr. GRAHAM: As a matter of fact, under the statute the Mounted Police are not requisitioned, but the militia; and under the same law the local authority is supposed to pay the expenses incurred.

Mr. HANSON: That is under the Militia Act?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes. I suppose the same principle would apply if the municipality requisitioned the services of the Mounted Police, although the law makes provision only for the militia to be sent in answer to a requisition from the local authorities.

Mr. HANSON: About a year ago there was trouble down east and the municipal authorities, through the Attorney General, as I understand, requisitioned the Mounted Police. Would the expenses incurred be payable by the municipality?

Mr. GRAHAM: I cannot answer that offhand, but I imagine the municipal authorities would have to bear the expense. It is merely a matter of opinion. There is an account, if I remember rightly, between a municipality and one of the departments for something, but I would not like to say whether it relates to the requisitioning of the Mounted Police or not.

Mr. HANSON: For a great many years Fredericton, which is in my constituency, was the headquarters of a detachment of the Royal Canadian Regiment, and the Government acquired considerable property there. For the most part that property is situated on one side of the principal street, and since the termination of the war it has not been utilized by the Militia Department. At the moment the buildings are being occupied temporarily by the New Brunswick Liquor Commission under a terminable lease. Is it the intention to re-establish at Fredericton any portion of the permanent forces? If not, would the minister consider the sale of any portion of that property? I think the citizens would like to see the military school re-opened and a portion of the regiment again quartered at Fredericton. If on the score of economy that cannot be entertained—as to which I express no opinion—I would point out that this very valuable property in the heart of the city might very well be placed upon the market. I know at least that one of the local banks would like to purchase a portion of it as a site for a bank building. This would relieve the situation so far as available business lots there are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. This discussion is scarcely relevant to the particular clause under consideration, but perhaps the minister is willing to answer the hon. member's question.

Mr. HANSON: I was almost through, and perhaps I may be permitted to finish my remarks.

Mr. GRAHAM: Perhaps it would be better, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member should be allowed to conclude his remarks.

Mr. HANSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have no desire to transgress the rules of the House. This is an important matter, and my only excuse for dealing with it now is that I may not have an opportunity to speak to it again. I should like the minister to consider the advisability of putting that property on the market. The suggestion was made when the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) was Minister of Militia, but no decision was ever reached. I hope the minister will take the matter into consideration so the people down there may know what, if anything, is to be done.

Mr. GRAHAM: I realize that we are both out of order, Mr. Chairman, but if you will permit me I will deal with the hon. member's question. I would not like to give him any encouragement respecting the re-establishment of a militia unit at Fredericton, because we are trying not to increase the expenditure of the Militia Department. The Government, through the Militia Department, owns a great deal of property throughout the Dominion, and if I thought this a good time to put it on the market I would do so, but I am inclined to think that we would not be able to realize what we paid for these properties if we attempted to sell them now. However, if the city or the bank has any offer to make to the department it will be considered.

Mr. BAXTER: There has been some employment of the Mounted Police in St. John in connection with immigration. A detachment of about six men go there each winter for that purpose. Of course, that is not a municipal expense in any way.

Amendment (Mr. Graham) agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

On Section 5, sub-section (2)—Officials:

Mr. MEIGHEN: This does not imply that even nominally there is any presumption that they are not still officers? Would it not be better to read—

Mr. GRAHAM: When the Governor General signs this bill and it becomes law, there is a new department created, but the old departments that become the new have passed out of existence. Under this act it may be presumed that all these appointments that we have in the departments now will be nullified. It might be presumed that their classification would be nullified—

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is just the point.

Mr. GRAHAM: —and the object of this section is to enable us to carry into the new department the employees of the old departments without having to go through all the formality of having the Civil Service Commission appoint them. In other words, their services would be continued, but any deviation from the principle of simply transferring a clerk from one department to the other at the same salary and under the same classification will have to receive the approval of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That would hardly go far enough. Do I understand the minister to say that so far as the exercise of this power does not consist in merely transferring an officer to a position of the same rank in the new department the Civil Service Commission will have jurisdiction just the same as in the case of a new appointment or promotion?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes. No power is given to the minister to place anyone in a new position without the consent of the Civil Service Commission. An example of a deviation from the principle which I have referred to would be this: an office might be abolished and the employee transferred to a position of similar status and the same salary. We would ask the Civil Service Commission for authority to do anything of that kind.

Subsection (2) of section 5 agreed to.

On subsection (3)—appointment of officer to exercise powers of the deputy:

Mr. MARTELL: Is it intended that the official here referred to shall receive, in addition to the salary of a deputy head of a department, extra remuneration as a member of the Defence Council?

Mr. GRAHAM: Not at all. The Naval Service is peculiar in itself, as those who have administered that department know, and, for the present at least, the Government is desirous of retaining the services of the present Deputy Minister of the Naval Service, who understands the work of that department better than any one else, even the Deputy Minister of the Defence Department. In the Naval Service Department there are many technical branches, such as hydrographic surveys, radiotelegraphic service, and that kind of thing. I take the House into my confidence and say I want the authority to retain Mr. Desbarats, the present occupant of the office, as deputy to manage that part of the service, for a time, at least. He will receive no additional salary as a member of the Defence Council.

Mr. MARTELL: His salary as deputy is $6,000 a year?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. MARTELL: I have been told that the object of this provision is to give him $3,000 in addition, which would be unfair to the other deputies.

Mr. GRAHAM: No, not at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If you are going to have two deputy heads you will not accomplish what the bill sets out to attain. It is true that there are many branches of the Naval Service Department, but when they are all added together, the department is really an exceedingly small one. The proposal here is merely to change the title of the Deputy Minister of the Naval Service and take him into the Defence Council. He will get the same salary; he will rank as deputy head; to all intents and purposes he will occupy the same position that he occupies to-day. That is not an amalgamation at all. The late government brought together the Inland Revenue and the Customs Departments. In each of these departments there had been a deputy minister, but we let one go and brought the two services together under a single deputy head. I am satisfied that there is in the Department of Militia a deputy minister who can take care of the whole amalgamated service—a man of long experience, of great intelligence and capacity for work. It looks to me as if this proposal was put forth merely for the purpose of including somebody whom the Government did not want to displace and to continue him in the same rank and at the same salary. I would like to know more of the reasons for retaining Mr. Desbarats, or anybody else, in the rank of deputy head. The work can all be done by a single deputy minister. You can save $6,000 a year by striking out this subsection; I certainly am opposed to it.

Mr. MEWBURN: A few days ago I commended the minister for his efforts in bringing these departments together, his aim being, as I believed, to bring about greater efficiency and economy. But I cannot see where the economy will come in so far as this particular appointment goes. In bringing the two departments together there should be only one deputy minister. Of course, there would be at the head of the military branch the Chief of the General Staff, and at the head of the naval branch a technical officer whose advice could be sought in matters pertaining to that part of the service. But if the two departments are to be merged to have only one deputy head will result in greater economy and efficiency.

Mr. GRAHAM: Yesterday my hon. friends were warning me very strongly against depriving any official of his position; they seem to have changed their attitude since then.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, no.

Mr. GRAHAM: However, that is only on the side. Besides, I would not expect the hon. gentlemen to admit it so soon. My hon. friends who have presided over the Militia Department have never had the Naval Service under their jurisdiction, so I warn the committee—

Mr. MEWBURN: I had it for six months, with militia as well.

Mr. GRAHAM: Well, that was temporary. No one has a higher opinion of the Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence than I have. I have known him for a great many years; he is a man who has given great service to this country, particularly during the last few years,—service which, perhaps, we did not appreciate during the busy period of the war. But as I have said, the Naval Service is of a peculiar character, and the Deputy Minister of Militia, for a year at least, will have all he can do to work out the other branches. I do not agree with the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) that we cannot bring about any economy. Although the Deputy Minister of the Naval Service, for the present at least, will be responsible for that branch we do propose to amalgamate the accounting staffs, the buying and selling staffs, and so on, and have the work done, as far as possible, in one office only.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Whom will that staff be under as a deputy head?

Mr. GRAHAM: That will be by agreement, but largely, if not altogether, I think, under the Deputy Minister of the Defence Department. These economies can be effected without abolishing the position of Deputy Minister of the Naval Service. I have studied this thing for the last two months and I want to assure the House that the practical way of effecting this amalgamation is to allow us to retain the Deputy Minister of Naval Service to look after that branch of the department for a year at least, until we get the other branches thoroughly absorbed. I would not propose this if I did not think it was absolutely necessary.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is practically the organization we have now. We have a Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries now, Mr. Johnston, a Deputy Minister of Naval Service, Mr. Desbarats, and a Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence, Sir Eugene Fiset; and the only change you propose is to take the Naval Service into the other department under the Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence, retaining the Deputy Minister of the Naval Service, Mr. Desbarats, but calling him something else. That is not a consolidation or amalgamation, to my way of thinking. I feel sure that you could drop Mr. Desbarats and carry out your scheme without him, saving the country $6,000 per annum. You would depend then for your guidance in regard to matters pertaining to the Naval Service upon an expert in that department. By the present scheme you are just continuing another deputy head, without giving him that name, saving the position perhaps for—what shall I say?—a friend, political or otherwise.

Mr. GRAHAM: It makes a difference to my hon. friend, I suppose, who is being hit.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not simply a matter of saving $6,000, but once you retain the deputy head of that department, he is going to concentrate his energies upon holding the whole department. He will consider every time he gives up a man that he has made a surrender to the other deputy, and the other deputy in turn will consider that everything he does in the way of compromise is a surrender. In a word, the minister is maintaining an organization that will prevent him from accomplishing anything in the way of the object he has in mind. Perhaps not wholly prevent him, but it will prevent him to such an extent that he will never get very far. He is putting obstacles in his own way that he will find it very difficult to surmount. Why could not the same thing be done in this case as was done when the Inland Revenue Department was amalgamated with the Customs Department? Where are the different circumstances? The Inland Revenue Department had been wholly distinct from the Customs; the officers were distinct; the deputy head was distinct; the work was wholly distinct, just as distinct in every particular as is the work of the Naval Service from the work of the Militia Department to-day. But we let go Mr. Vincent, the Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue, and placed the two departments under the Deputy Minister of Customs. It is true we were not at all harsh with Mr. Vincent. He got a year's salary, perhaps a little more, and I would have no objection to Mr. Desbarats being treated the same. But when you maintain the deputy head, you maintain the department, and there is no consolidation; you may call it consolidation, but it is not consolidation at all. The minister in the first ten minutes this afternoon, wisely, I think, dropped about half of this bill. If he insists on holding this clause, I think he is dropping the other half.

Mr. STEVENS: I am somewhat surprised at the apparent indifference of the minister to this point. As I understand the minister's attitude, it amounts to this really—that the Deputy Minister of Naval Affairs is so well posted in his duties that the minister desires to retain his services, changing his title, but paying him the same salary and allowing him to maintain virtually the same authority. For the clause provides that he shall "exercise and perform all the powers, duties and functions vested in or exerciseable by the Deputy Minister of the Naval Service." Could a more complete definition of a deputy minister's functions be given than that? If he is to perform these functions it is not changing the status of the gentleman at all; but that is not what I rose to observe.

My hon. friend says that he is desirous of bringing these two departments together under one head. He admits that in the Deputy Minister of Militia he has an excellent officer who can handle the whole business. I am going to tell the minister and the House my frank and blunt opinion of the other gentleman, whom the minister appears to be anxious to retain. I have during the past eleven years gone to the Naval Service Department on many occasions, and whether it was through purposeful stupidity or absolute incompetence, I do not know, but I never could get from the Deputy Minister of Naval Affairs any satisfaction at all, and he is the only civil servant of standing in Ottawa I would say that about. But I did and have got the information I desired through assistants of his,—I could name two or three but I shall not do so—the chief officers of his staff, not naval officers, but civil servants in that department. They have been able to give me all the information I desired, and that courteous treatment which is due to any person in Canada from a civil servant; and they have exhibited a competence and a knowledge of the business of the department which transcended that of the deputy minister by a great deal.

Now if the minister desires to co-ordinate these two services, he has at his disposal excellent sub-officials capable of taking the lead as branch heads, without maintaining the two departments distinct and separate, as will certainly be the case if this clause carries. I hesitate to offer a resolution on the spur of the moment, but I think the minister would be well advised to consider the replacing of this official provided for in sub-clause 3 by a branch head, just as we have in a dozen different departments; —in the Interior, for instance, where you have several branch heads but only one deputy minister who is supreme over all the branches. I certainly think the minister ought to give a little more consideration to this than apparently he is doing. He is a very good-natured gentleman, but we want something more than mere courteous treatment. I think if he would let the clause stand and at another sitting of the House give us the result of his mature consideration, it would be better. Otherwise I think it would be desirable to take some action now in having the clause struck from the bill, but I do not wish to do that.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is immaterial to me.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think the minister should assume that attitude. I am not approaching this matter with any desire to destroy the value of the minister's effort. I approach it with a desire to assist the minister in obtaining what, I think, the House desires to obtain, namely, the amalgamation of the two departments.

Mr. GRAHAM: I only rise to point out to the House that this is the first time I have ever heard of Mr. Desbarats being anything but capable and courteous. I know him well; I have known him for years before I came here. Sometimes of course in our enthusiasm even a member of the House will ask a deputy for things which he ought to ask from the minister, because the minister only has authority to do these things; some of them a deputy should not do. My hon. friend suggested, rather sneeringly, that I should give this matter consideration. I can assure him that I have given it consideration every day for the last six weeks, and I think I can arrive at a conclusion that will satisfy myself after six weeks study of a matter that he can dispose of in half an hour. I want to give the committee all the information possible. My judgment and the judgment of the Government, after fully considering this question of retaining the Deputy Minister of the Naval Service, is that the only satisfactory way, under the conditions, to bring about this amalgamation, which must come about gradually and cannot be the work of a moment, is that the able deputy minister should be retained for the time being in his present position as head of the Naval Service branch..

Mr. CRERAR: It does not seem to me that any very serious objection can be taken to the proposal of the minister in this respect. I have no desire to enter into any discussion of the merits or demerits of Mr. Desbarats. I have always understood he was a highly efficient officer, but, as I understand it, what the minister is proposing is that the services of Mr. Desbarats may be available for a period until the organization is complete, and he has given some reasons for that course. The clause authorizes the Governor General in Council, on the recommendation of the minister, to appoint this officer. It is merely a permissive authority. I quite agree that a good deal of exception might be taken to having a department with two gentlemen in the capacity of deputy ministers, and I am not going to discuss the merits or demerits of Major General Fiset. As far as I know, these gentlemen are both very capable men. It seems to me, however, that we should give some latitude to the minister in carrying on the reorganization, and my hon. friends to my right are scarcely quite consistent in the position they have taken on this question; because, if I recall aright, when this matter was first under consideration a few days ago, both my hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) who was the Minister of Militia in the late government, and his predecessor, my hon. friend from East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn), took the position quite strongly that officers in the Militia Department should be looked after. I believe that latitude should be given to the minister to carry on this re-organization in the way he thinks best for the service. If there are two deputy ministers next year, or the following year, and this Parliament is asked to vote their salaries, the question then can very well come up for reconsideration. We are not passing legislation that will put this matter away beyond our control. The principle is sound, and once the principle of a bill is sound —and I think the minister's explanations are fairly reasonable in respect to carrying it out—then I think he should give the minister the necessary latitude to carry it into effect.

Mr. DUFF: I think, perhaps, nobody in this House or outside of it has criticised the Naval estimates more than I have. I am opposed to the present so-called Canadian navy, for the simple reason that it is no navy, and never will be any navy, and is only a waste of money. But I agree with the hon. gentleman from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) when he says the minister should be given a chance to re-organize his department, and should have the advice, for a short time, of the gentleman who has been deputy head of naval affairs. I do not see how the re-organization is going to take place, in view of the fact that we now have only one cruiser and two destroyers, to protect the Atlantic coast from the people who may come down from Greenland some night and destroy all our cities, or to protect the Pacific coast from some other enemy who may come from Alaska. And this cruiser and these two torpedo boats, I may say, have been hibernating in the West Indies for the last six months. I say we have no navy, and the quicker we get clear of these boats the better, and the quicker we clean up the $215,000 voted last year for overhead expenses in Ottawa, in regard to the navy, which would be voted this year, the better. I say that the Minister of Militia should have a chance to keep Mr. Desbarats for one or two years, until the mess is cleaned up. I cannot agree with the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) that Major General Fiset can do the work in connection with the Naval Department. Would the hon. gentleman say, if something happened Major General Fiset, and he resigned, that Mr. Desbarats could do his work in the Militia Department? Of course he could not. Neither could Major General Fiset, good a man as we all know he is, do the work which Mr. Desbarats does in regard to naval affairs. I say, certainly, let us have economy, not only in this department but in other departments, but for the present, much as I am opposed to the so-called Canadian navy, and much as I would like to see the whole thing wiped out, I agree with the hon. gentleman from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) that for the present Mr. Desbarats' services should be retained.

Mr. GUTHRIE: As I understand the proposal, it is not merely for the present time, or in the nature of a temporary proposal at all. The hon. gentleman from Marquette intimated that during the process of reorganization it would be well to retain Mr. Desbarats. This is a permanent arrangement, not for the process of reorganization at all. My hon. friend from Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) says that it is necessary to retain the services of Mr. Desbarats for a year or two years, and let us do it. If that were his suggestion, it would alter the situation very much.

Mr. DUFF: Could we not amend the act next year?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We can amend any act of this Parliament whenever we like, but we must go on the assumption that this is a permanent arrangement and not a temporary one. That is what the bill says, and it says nothing about a temporary arrangement, so that we must assume and presume that it is the ordinary permanent appointment. I draw a strong distinction between a person in the position of Mr. Desbarats and a person in the position of one of the higher offices of that department, to whom I referred a few days ago. I thought I made myself clear on that occasion; if not, I shall try to do so now or later on during the discussion of this bill. I say that we should retain as far as possible the services of those men who, through their ability and experience, and through gallantry in the field of action, have risen to high command and high military positions. That is a principle, I submit, that we should maintain.

Subsection 3 of section 5 agreed to.

On subsection 4—Controller:

Mr. CARROLL: I ask the Minister of Militia, have they a purchasing commission connected with the department, or is it just one officer in the department?

Mr. GRAHAM: We have a purchasing department, but it has no connection with the Purchasing Commission. I pointed that out the other night that two or three of the gentlemen in this department are doing the work of clerk. They were on the list of the Civil Service Commission. They were given the title of "assisting purchasing agent," and they are doing the work in the department. And this department, and all departments, whether they purchase through the Purchasing Commission or not, are responsible for their requisitions, and the details afterwards pass through the Purchasing Commission for confirmation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If I understand aright, the position of controller, to be created under this section, is largely that of a chief accountant or a paymaster-general or something of that kind. He is not a purchasing agent in any sense of the word. He is in the nature of a chief accountant in the department.

Mr. GRAHAM: I tell the House frankly I have not seen the man, and have not appointed him at all, and possibly I may transfer some one in the department, but with my casual observation in a large department of this kind I think the financial end could be managed more successfully if they have a shrewd financial man to oversee all the expenditure of money in the department particularly as the other branches also are being brought in. I was calling him "financial comptroller," and my object was to get a good, able business man, whom I could consult in connection with all expenditures of every branch of the department, a man who would be responsible to myself and the deputy head for every dollar expended.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is this the creation of a new position?

Mr. GRAHAM: Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL: How was the financial end of the department handled before?

Mr. GRAHAM: We have an accounting branch, an audit branch, and a paymaster's branch, and it maybe that I may take one of the men in charge of these branches. I admit I had in mind doing something else. If we were running a business of this magnitude as a private concern, we would have some man of the description I have given, and he could possibly save his salary in a month. If, in the department, there is a man of that capacity that I could appoint to this position, it would be my object to do so; but if I did not find such a man, I wanted to feel free to go into the business world to find one.

Mr. MEWBURN: The minister is on absolutely sound lines. I know, from my short experience while I was in charge of the Militia Department, there was sadly needed a capable business man to oversee the finances of the organization.

Sub-section 4 of section 5 agreed to.

On sub-section 5—holder of any position abolished may be appointed to another position:

Mr. MARTELL: Is there in the Militia Department a practice whereby a man who occupies a certain position under which the department should have all his time, is given some other work to do which he should do in his time, but for doing this work, he is given another salary?

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not know of a case except that of a deputy minister in several departments, who have a combination of salaries. As to the ordinary civil servant, I do not know of a case. I have been asked that question several times in communications, and I asked my department to make investigation, but up to date, I have not found such a case.

Mr. MARTELL: Does the minister not think it would be fair to the House and to the country to give a deputy minister a straight salary without giving him so much for this and so much for that? In that way, the people would know exactly what salary he was receiving.

Mr. GRAHAM: The salary of my deputy minister has been explained in this House several times. I shall be glad to explain it again, but I think the question is hardly germane to this discussion.

Mr. CHURCH: I hope the minister will not overlook the importance of retaining those high officials of the Militia Department, men like Sir Henry Burstall and Major-General MacBrien. It has cost a great deal to produce military experts like those men, and their services are necessary. While the principle of the bill, which is to effect co-ordination of and economy in the various branches of the service which have to do with the defence of the country, may be all right, I am of opinion that if these military experts were retained, perhaps in another sphere of activity under this clause of the bill, they could effect a great deal of economy. I do not think the country expects very much curtailment in military expenditures; you may spend a great deal of the nation's money and not get very much for it. The question is not the amount of money which is spent, but how it is spent. I hope the minister will not overlook the fact that highly trained officials like these can save the country many millions of dollars, not only in the Department of Militia, but in other affairs. Officers whom I have consulted in No. 2 Military District, the Toronto District, are of the opinion that it is a retrograde step for the Militia Department to lose the services of these high experts at such a critical stage in the history of this country, just after the war and begin everything over again. At such a time as this we need the services of these trained men and we should retain them. I feel that an economy will be effected by retaining their services, and I hope the minister will consider the suggestion which I have very humbly made.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will the minister tell the committee which of the principal officers are likely to lose their positions in the service by reason of this amalgamation? In the papers we have seen that Major-General Sir Henry Burstall and Major-General Gwatkin are both to be allowed to retire. Are any of the other chief officers to be retired likewise?

[M. Martell.]

Mr. GRAHAM: I would not like to be held as making a pledge, because conditions might change, but there is no need for alarm. The suggestion of dispensing with the services of any of these officers has not been considered at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The point is simply this that the minister is dispensing, or has dispensed, with the services of one of the most experienced and one of the highest in rank of the officers in Canada. I think the retirement of Major-General Sir Henry Burstall has already taken place officially. As I understand the matter, he is now out of the service, and so, I believe, is Major-General Gwatkin. In the case of the latter, the facts are not quite the same as they are in regard to Sir Henry Burstall. Major-General Gwatkin is a very able Imperial officer, who came to Canada shortly before or during the war, who has remained in Canada since and whose services were of the greatest value to Canada during the war. I understand that Major-General Gwatkin is entitled to an Imperial pension. At the conclusion of the war, he was virtually retired or retiring from the service, and his services were enlisted by the Canadian Air Board. For the past year and a half or two years he has been in charge of the Canadian Air Service, and it may well be, in his case, that retirement is proper. I know that he has no very great desire to continue in the service, and he rather helped us out in a situation which we had on hand a year or two ago. His services to Canada, however, have been of the highest. He is a very able and tried experienced officer, a man who made his mark in the Imperial service long before he came to Canada.

The case of Major-General Sir Henry Burstall is a litle different. That officer is a Canadian, a man now of military age, I believe only 51 or 52 years old, a man who joined the Canadian service as a provisional lieutenant away back in 1888 or 1889, a graduate of our Royal Military College, a Staff College man—for he went to England and took there, at the expense of this country the course which many of our leading officers have received. He there obtained that special and particular knowledge which is so hard to acquire, namely, the knowledge that is necessary for a staff officer. The hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn) a day or two ago mentioned in the House that staff officers were, perhaps, not as highly appreciated by ordinary individuals as they should be. But there is no question about the fact that the greatest difficulty in time of trouble is to secure competent staff officers. It is not a hard thing to get an ordinary officer. He can be trained easily and without much loss of time. The staff is a very different thing. It requires a long course of training, and for that reason we in Canada for many years back have been accustomed to send a number of our most prominent and most promising officers to the Staff College at Camberley to take the necessary course. Only a few days ago General Sir Arthur Currie discussed the question with the newspapers in Montreal. He strongly objects to any proposal to retire Major General Sir Henry Burstall from the service. He points out that you cannot easily get men to fill positions like his. We want in the service men who have the qualifications and experience. We have trained such men and paid the expenses for that training, and these men, who have acquitted themselves well, have now the advantage of four or five years' experience of actual warfare. They are thoroughly competent and in every way equipped, by education and otherwise; and now because there is a re-organization of the Militia you let out one of the most effective and useful of officers. Is there not in this re-organization some place where a man like Sir Henry Burstall can be utilized? Can he not be put in charge of some necessary and suitable work in order that the valuable services of which he is capable may be retained? Surely his experiences and his ability are worth a lot to the country. Why dispense with him? That is the point I want to have cleared up. I sincerely trust that all these officers on the headquarters staff who have had experience are going to be retained. The minister does not want to bind himself in respect of them, but here is a specific case where a man has already been retired. Again I ask, is it not possible in the Militia of this country to maintain the services of a man who has done such excellent work and acquitted himself so admirably, and who should be a very valuable officer in the department?

Mr. MANION: As one of those who served at the front, I may say that General Burstall, who was a staff officer over there—

Mr. GRAHAM: He was more than a staff officer.

Mr. MANION: Yes, he was in charge of the Second Division, and I met him in the lines on many occasions. There was no man I know who served over there, with the possible exception, of Sir Arthur Currie, who had a higher standing with the men of all ranks than General Burstall. I desire to do him that justice. I am aware that the minister himself spoke highly of him the other day, but it has been a puzzle to me, since reading in the press that he is to be retired, with a pension, I believe, to understand, on what grounds he is being dispensed with. As the ex-Minister of Militia (Mr. Guthrie) has said, no man in Canada has a better standing in military matters than General Burstall.

Mr. CARROLL: If the stand taken by the member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) were to be taken as a sound basis for the department to go upon, then I should think that care would have necessarily to be taken of every man who made a splendid record at the front in the war. I have no doubt that the gentleman in question not only made a splendid name for himself, but also enhanced the reputation of the Canadian soldiers. We must remember, however, that thousands of other men did exactly the same thing, though perhaps they did not all win so brilliant a name.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But I have referred to men of the permanent force who in their boyhood agreed to serve the Government of Canada in that force, and have done so ever since. Now the Government is turning them out.

Mr CARROLL: My hon. friend is now, of course, on safer ground. But we are coming to the time when we shall have to reduce the expenditures of the Militia Department, in common with all the other departments of Government, and it is essential that we make a beginning. And because a man has given the best in him to the service of the permanent force of Canada is, I submit, no reason why he should be retained if he is not required. Not only that, but an hon. member tells me that this gentleman is getting a pension, which I hope is a reasonable pension for one in his position. I do not think that that is an unreasonable ground to take in a matter of this kind. Personally, I hope that the time will soon come when we shall be able materially to reduce the burden of the Militia Department, and I trust that the minister in the next few years will be able to rid his department, always under fair and reasonable terms, of very many of those who are now employed in it, and who are not actually giving, in the present condition of the country, services commensurate with the salaries they are receiving.

Mr. MEWBURN: I do not wish to weary the House with any long quotations, but I read a few days ago a speech made by General Sir Douglas Haig, who, as we know, was in command of the British army in France. In unveiling a memorial at Camberley Staff College, which I think is recognized as the greatest staff college in the world, General Haig said:

> In the desire to retrench, and especially to economise on defence forces, there is a great danger that governments may go too far. The staff has always been a favorite target for those who do not understand either it or its functions.

Further on he says:

> A nation industrially efficient and with a sound national character can improvise much in war, as our history in the war has shown; but principles are things that cannot readily be improvised. They have to be evolved by deep study and clear thinking through many years, tested often by the touchstone of experience. Our two staff colleges and the "p.s.c." officer gave us the sound military principles on which the war was fought and won.

He goes on to speak of the work of staff officers in France and also of the necessity for ensuring that future generations shall reap the benefit of their experience. I quote further:

> Whatever a nation may do, it is a mistake to imagine that an army can muddle through a great war and reach victory at the end against an efficient and highly trained enemy. The handicap we started with from the smallness of our military forces could never have been overtaken if the pre-war training of our regular army, the military education of its officers, and its system of organization and command, had not been all on the right lines. It is no small consolation on such an occasion as this to feel and know that the work done in those old pre-war days has been amply vindicated. * * * Let those who write ignorantly of the safe and easy life of the regular staff officer come and study this memorial, and remember that this is not the full tale of officers who held staff appointments and gave their lives in the war—

And so on. Whatever the minister has in mind regarding any reduction in the staff, I do hope that the country will not lose the services of those officers who made good in the war, who distinguished themselves, and who are now able to impart their knowledge to the generation that succeed them. I sincerely trust that other officers to come will have the privilege of acquiring some of the knowledge and experience which these others have gained.

[Mr. Carroll.]

Mr. CLARK: There is an impression in the House which I desire to correct to some extent, namely, that these officers who are now in the permanent force are there of their own desire. To my knowledge a great many of the senior officers are men upon whom great pressure was brought to bear to remain in the service after the war. Most of the others were already in the permanent forces. By far the majority of both senior and junior officers retired and went back to their civilian occupations when the war was over. As one hon. member put it the other day, those officers returned to the plow, and returned gladly, and to-day they are doing their duty as citizens. But certain officers and non-commissioned officers who devoted themselves exclusively to the service before the war and won the seniority in the field, have remained in the service under pressure, brought to bear by the Department of Militia when the war was over. Those are the men, I think, whom the country wants to see retained, the men who know, and those are the men who, if we are ever again faced with war, will be responsible for organizing our military force on a basis which will enable it to be administered efficiently, and so save the lives of thousands of men who might otherwise be sacrificed. Had Canada been equipped with the officers who to-day are in the Militia Department, I have no hesitation whatever in saying that thousands of our soldiers would not have been sacrificed as they were. The same condition applied to the British army and to every other army in the late war. Has it ever occurred to hon. members why Germany was able to withstand the onslaught of so many other nations? Mr. Chairman, it was because at the outset she had the benefit of a thoroughly trained and organized army. If we cast aside the men who have the knowledge and the training, we are, so to speak, cutting our own throats, and if another war should occur the absence of these trained men may mean the sacrifice of our sons to no purpose.

Subsection 5 of section 5 agreed to.

On subsection 6—provision for retirement, etc.:

Mr. GRAHAM: If economies are to be effected it is possible that the services of some of the minor officers may have to be dispensed with on account of the work being diminished. Such a case as this might arise: an officer at the time his services were dispensed with might be within one year of the conclusion of the term which would entitle him to a pension. Under this subsection I want to make it possible for him to qualify for his pension. I have been considering it for the last day or two, and I think we would be sufficiently generous if we changed the three years to two.

In reply to my hon. friend in reference to the gentlemen he has named, I fully agree with everything that he has said regarding their qualifications both as gentlemen and officers. I do not like to discuss in Parliament the names of such distinguished men. I might say, however, that Sir Henry Burstall had attained the highest position possible in the militia, what we call the blue ribbon—he had become Inspector General. I think I was not ungenerous in my recommendation, for he was entitled to a pension. I repeat, I do not like to discuss these gentlemen in public, because certainly it is no fault of theirs in the way of lack of qualification or ability that they are being retired. The record of Sir Henry Burstall and of General Gwatkin is well known to all of us and will bear comparison with the record of the most distinguished military men in any country.

Mr. CALDWELL: I think there is a serious principle involved in this clause. Having been a member of the Pensions Committee of this House for two years past, if this clause carries I do not see why the returned soldiers should not ask that their disabilities be considered, although they occur two years after their discharge from service. I think you are establishing a very dangerous precedent in passing this clause, and so far as I am personally concerned I do not think it is wise to entertain it. I am again a member of that committee this year, and I feel that the idea of adding two or three years to the length of service in order to grant a man a pension is absolutely unsound. I know of many cases of real hardship under the provision of our Pensions Act, that if a soldier's disability occurs after a certain limited time after his discharge he is not entitled to a pension. But if this consideration is to be extended to the men affected by this bill, I think the Pensions Committee will approach their duties next week with a very different idea as to what is just and right in regard to pensions for disabled men.

Mr. GRAHAM: My hon. friend is in error and is apparently confusing entirely different classes of pensions. This has nothing to do with the Pension Board.

Mr. CALDWELL: I understand that. This is a Civil Service pension.

Mr. GRAHAM: There are several acts involved in this clause, but it does not give a pension to any person—

Mr. MEWBURN: It is not a disability pension at all.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is it.

Mr. CALDWELL: I understand that.

Mr. GRAHAM: It does not give a pension to any person who is not entitled to one; but it does put us in a position to deal a little more generously with officers or civil servants who have to be retired. It does not deal with pensions for disability due to war service; it applies to another act altogether.

Mr. CALDWELL: I thoroughly understand that, but I cannot help thinking that the minister is confusing the point. This man would not be entitled to a pension unless he had one, two or three years' more service than he actually had to his credit at the time of his retirement. Therefore by giving the Governor in Council authority to add from one to three years to this man's service he is entitled to a pension which he would not otherwise be qualified for. I understand that it is not a disability pension, but a civil service pension. I have no great quarrel with civil service pensions, although there is a considerable body of opinion that holds the principle to be rather unjust, for people in all walks of life do not get pensions when they become too old to work. Personally, I think civil servants should be paid salaries sufficient to enable them to accumulate enough during their official life to provide for their old age. If they are to be given a pension, I think they should contribute as those do who receive the benefit, for instance, of an old age pension fund.

Mr. MEWBURN: Of course, other pension acts are involved here—what is known as the Calder Act, and any other Civil Service pension law that may be in force. But under the Military Pensions Act the contributions of the members of the permanent force made the fund absolutely self-sustaining. That condition, of course, could not prevail during the war, when the casualties became increased beyond anything we had ever experienced.

Mr. CALDWELL: That puts a different aspect on it. I had understood that the Government contributed large sums toward these civil service pensions.

Mr. MEWBURN: This is a military service pension, not a civil service pension.

Mr. CALDWELL: I still contend, however, that this clause is unsound. I am sure that hon. members have been disappointed in the minister's civil government estimates, as, indeed they have been with nearly all civil government estimates so far brought down. The Finance Minister made it plain the other day that the Government had not said they would practise economy this year. I was a little disappointed in that.

Mr. FIELDING: Oh, no; I did not say that.

Mr. CALDWELL: Well, that they had not made any statement with regard to economy; I do not want to misquote the minister. We certainly expected a saving in the Militia Department by the co-ordination of these different arms of the service. We all feel that in the years to come, expenditure for military purposes should be reduced, and I see no reason for increased expenditure now under the head of civil government in connection with the administration of this branch of the service. I do not approve of this clause, and I do not think it should carry.

Mr. GRAHAM: I move that subsection 6 be amended by striking out the word "three" in line 26 and substituting therefor the word "two."

Amendment agreed to, and subsection as amended agreed to.

Section 5, as amended, agreed to.

On section 6—regulations:

Mr. GUTHRIE: What is the meaning of the words "such regulations as are deemed necessary or advisable?" Would not "necessary" be sufficient?

Mr. GRAHAM: It is the usual wording, I suppose; I am not accustomed to the intricacies of legal phraseology. Certain regulations which might not be absolutely necessary might be advisable for the purposes of economy or for other reasons connected with the proper carrying on of the work of the new department. All the regulations which have been promulgated in connection with these different branches will have to be revised, and the new regulations will embody all the necessary features of the old ones.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—powers vested in ministers and deputy ministers under various acts, to be vested in Minister and Deputy Minister of National Defence:

Mr. GRAHAM: I move to strike out on page 2 all the words from and including the words "'the Royal Canadian" in line 38 to and including the words "Revised Statutes" in line 41. The purpose of this amendment is to strike out all the words relating to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 9—functions of Defence Council:

Mr. GRAHAM: I move that the words "Air and Police" in line 33 be struck out and that the words "and Air" be substituted therefor.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

Bill, as amended, reported.

SALARIES ACT, AND THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT, AMENDMENT

On the motion of Hon. George P. Graham (Minister of Militia and Defence) Bill No. 14, to amend the Salaries Act and the Senate and House of Commons Act, was read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On section 1:

Mr. GRAHAM: The object of this bill is to make it possible to pay the head of the new Defence Department, whose title is being changed by the bill we have just reported.

Bill reported.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT BY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL OF THE ADDRESS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a message from His Excellency the Governor

General, signed by his own hand, reading as follows:

I have received with great pleasure the address you have voted in reply to my Speech at the opening of Parliament, and thank you for it sincerely.

BYNG OF VIMY, Government House, Ottawa.

SUPPLY

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Civil Government—Public Works—salaries, $583,035; contingencies, $94,000.

Hon. J. H. KING (East Kootenay, Minister of Public Works): When these estimates were under discussion on Tuesday evening last, there was a desire expressed by some of the members of the committee for a fuller explanation with regard to the transfer of certain employees from the engineering branch, outside service, to other branches of the service. At that time I stated that these officials were not permanent officials, had not been classified and admitted into the service as permanent employees, and that being temporaries, they would naturally come under the contingencies vote. I find that that statement is confirmed by a letter written in October of last year, when the chief accountant advised the Auditor General that it would be necessary on account of these transfers being of temporary officials to have them put under the contingencies vote instead of the outside vote. I think that explains the situation satisfactorily. It was also suggested that I should give the committee the total expenditure last year under the civil government vote. I find that the expenditure last year amounted to $557,545.52. It was also suggested that I should explain the item at the bottom of page 96 of the Estimates, "To provide for new appointments if required, $5,000." That item is to provide for unforeseen expenditures. It may become necessary to make one or two new appointments this year, and it is for that reason this item has been put in.

5 p.m.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Should that really not be counted as a contingency? Is it customary—as far as my knowledge goes it is not—to put an item under details of civil government such as appears at the bottom of page 96, "To provide for new appointments if required, $5,000"? I would think that was a contingency if ever there was one, and that if a new appointment is necessary or desirable during the year it would be charged to your contingencies vote. In the minister's statement, it will be noticed the total expenditure under contingent account in this department was $557,545.52, while the estimate last year was $620,000. Therefore, there was a saving of about $63,000 in the estimate of last year. That makes a pretty favourable showing for last year. Then during the present year the estimate is $583,000 plus $94,000 of contingencies, being far in excess of all that was spent last year, and in addition, I point out, referring to the last line on page 96, they propose to take power to spend $5,000, without knowing what they want it for. I submit that this $5,000 should be struck out, and that the expense, if incurred at all, should be charged to contingencies. If the Government knew what they intended the money for, or what work had not been done that they wished to provide for, I could understand the item, but at present I think it should be struck out.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): My hon. friend realizes, I think, that the same item was carried last year in the Estimates, and it was for a very good purpose, because the private secretary's allowance was paid from that item last year.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Why should it not be paid out of contingencies?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Under the act I am advised the Auditor General would not allow it.

Mr. HOCKEN: Under contingencies, there is an item "Clerical and other assistance, $31,000." Would not that cover any possible new appointments that might be required for which you put in the $5,000?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I am advised that it would not carry a permanent official, a private secretary, or officials of that character, but that it would carry temporary employees.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Permanent officials, of course, should be named. Their offices should appear in the item. That is the reason the Auditor General would not allow it to be charged there. They should appear among the officers, detailed, one by one. Why provide a salary for the employment of officers that this House knows nothing about?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think the right hon. gentleman realizes that in a department spending some $15,000,000, cases might occur where a new official would be required.

Mr. MEIGHEN: He could be taken on temporarily.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): It occurred last year when the same vote was shown in the Estimates and it became necessary for the minister to charge under that vote the payment of his private secretary, and the amount is not an unusual one. You find it in other departments, and it is placed there for the purpose of meeting any unforeseen condition that might arise.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Does the minister not think the principle is wrong? I assume we did it last year. I do not know whether we did it or not, but the minister states that we did, and we will assume we did. Is it not a wrong principle to have a vote in contingencies for clerical and other assistance of $31,000 and then, in addition to that, to vote $5,000 to provide for another contingency? If any extra assistance is required during the present year, is it not possible and proper to pay, out of the contingency vote, for clerical and other assistance? If you charge it to that account, will the Auditor General not pay it? I can understand that if you were making a permanent appointment the Auditor General might say "I cannot charge that to contingency account." But as my right hon. friend and leader has pointed out a permanent appointment should be specified directly in the Estimates. What I object to is carrying a contingent vote for clerical assistance of $31,000 on one page of the Estimates, and another contingency vote, of $5,000 blank, at the bottom of page 96 of your Estimates. You have really two contingency accounts and I think one of them should be stricken out. I appeal to the minister's own judgment. Is it not fair and proper that the $5,000 item should come out, and if the minister will suggest it, I think the committee will act upon it.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I can assure my hon. friend that, as far as I am personally concerned this item in the estimates is there if necessity requires. I trust it will not be required or used. But these items were presented to me on the basis on which they were made out last year. You accepted that estimate last year and thought it was a proper one, and I, in the short time I have been in office, am not disposed to disturb that estimate, but if it is not required it will not be used.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is not the principle upon which we vote money in this House. The minister must show to the House in some reasonable manner that the money is going to be used. We do not give a blank cheque. We do not say "We will vote you $50,000, and if you do not use it, well and good". Some scheme must be laid before the committee on which they can act. My hon. friend comes before parliament and says this was there last year, and it is there this year. Well, if it was wrong last year, I suppose it is wrong this year. Unless there is some reasonable explanation of why that $5,000 appears in the estimates, I think it should be struck out. If the contingent vote for clerical assistance is too small, it should have been made $36,000 instead of $31,000. Does not that suggestion appeal to the common sense of the committee? Why have two contingency votes in the estimates of one department. If they want more than $31,000, make it $36,000. I think that $5,000 item can be eliminated.

Mr. HOCKEN: I sympathise with the minister. We all know he has been thrown suddenly into something with which he is not familiar, but I draw attention to the fact that last year the amount for clerical and other assistance was placed at $15,000, and this year it is $31,000. There is an increase of $16,000, or, if you take the whole item, you find an increase of $7,600. Now, surely, if you are going to add $7,600 to contingencies, you do not want the $5,000 to which reference has been made. If you strike out the $5,000, you still have $2,600 more for contingencies than you had last year.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I think my hon. friend must understand there are two contingency votes here, apparently. This $5,000 I tried to explain was the contingency vote for the permanent service and may not be required. It might not have been required last year, but experience did show it was required last year to pay the minister's secretary, and as far as an increase of $16,000 under contingencies is concerned, I took occasion the other night to point out that last year, under the general vote in the engineer's department, these officials had been carried, but that this year some thirteen of them were being transferred. They would be paid this year from the contingency vote, having been transferred from the engineers' vote of last year. I do not think I can make that any more definite or clear.

There is a certain amount required for the payment of a number of civil servants. Last year they were paid from the engineering vote. This year they are going to be paid from contingencies.

Mr. HOCKEN: Is the engineering appropriation reduced?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): Why is the average salary in this department nearly $400 higher than the average salary in the Department of Agriculture? Is this department more important to the country than the Department of Agriculture, to justify this condition?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): I would think, perhaps, the explanation would be that, in the Public Works Department, you would have a larger technical staff, men drawing, probably, larger salaries.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton): The average salary is about $400 higher in the Department of Public Works than in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): More technical, I think would be the explanation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that is partly the explanation and also this, that the Department of Agriculture has been expanding more rapidly than has the Public Works Department. The officers in the latter department, as a consequence, are older and have been in the service longer, and, as a result of that, they, perhaps, enjoy a little higher classification. The more recent the appointment of officers, the lower would be the average salary.

I quite admit that the minister's explanation as regards the $5,000 item is clear; there is nothing in the way of ambiguity about it. I know what he is saying; I know what he means; but the comment I make is that it has no force. The minister simply says, as to this $5,000: "It was there last year."

Mr. KING: And used.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Very well. Possibly last year there was no provision, in the usual way, for the private secretary, and the minister made provision in this way instead. That explanation may have been given—I do not know. But the minister knows whether he needs this for his private secretary or not; and if he does not need it, why have this special appropriation? I have looked through about one-half of the Estimates; I have not had time yet to go through them all; but so far as my information goes, I cannot find such a vote anywhere else. The minister's reasoning would be just as good if he said: "The appropriation last year for clerical assistance was $15,000; that was right, so I will take it this year." He does not say that; he says: "I want $16,000 more," and the only reason given is that he is taking in thirteen men from the engineering branch. Does he need them in this service? If he does not, why does he not let them out of the engineering branch, as last year we let out numerous employees. What does he need the $5,000 for? Where is the work? What does he require the extra $16,000 for? Where is the work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): As regards the thirteen men to whom the right hon. gentleman refers, these have been in the service for many years.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have not been in this service; they have been in the engineering service. Does the minister need them in this service? What is the work?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Some of these people have been in their present positions for a number of months, one from August, 1, 1921, another from October, 20, others from January, 22, March, 20, July, 19 and so on. They are gradually being placed in vacancies that occur from time to time in other branches.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is in the engineering branch?

Mr. KING (Kootenay) No.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what the minister has been saying. They have been in the engineering branch and paid under that vote.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): They have been in other branches of the service, but heretofore they have been paid out of the estimate for the engineering branch.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do I understand the minister to say that their duties are not being changed at all; that they are doing just what they were doing before?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then what is the explanation of the change in the Estimates?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): There was last year a memorandum to the Auditor General from the Chief Accountant advising a change in payment in this way. It was suggested that owing to their being temporary employees and not permanent, they should be paid from contingencies. That is a matter of record. The memorandum states that these men were employed for a number of years prior to 1919 in the engineering branch, their appointments having been made on the order of the then Minister of Public Works without reference to the Civil Service Commission, and without any certificates being issued by the commission in any of these cases. It further states that their positions have been classified by the commission; that recently, owing to the shortening of the staff in the engineering branch, these men have been transferred to other branches to fill vacancies as they occur; that they are doing purely civil government work, but that as they have never received certificates of permanent appointment, it is impossible to charge their salaries to the appropriation for civil government salaries. That is I imagine, the reason why the change was made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is to say that some time ago, owing to the contraction of the other branch and their being required in civil government work here, they were transferred but continued to be paid in the engineering branch. That is the explanation.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That has some force with me, but now the minister is back on his $5,000 estimate. What of it?

Mr. FIELDING: The minister, finding that appropriation last year, might be pardoned for copying it and considering that it was required. I think, in the matter of preparing estimates, it would have been better, if, as in other departments, an amount had been inserted for the private secretary. If, however, the item was in the Estimates a year ago, I do not think we can blame the minister for continuing it. If he has the private secretary to pay out of the vote, clearly he will have only a small amount left.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the minister would say that it is required for the private secretary, then he would be giving an explanation that the committee could consider. He has not said that, and I presume the private secretary is provided for.

Mr. KING (Kootenay): We are carrying the proper allowance for the private secretary over and above this.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then the explanation, so far, shows that this is not required.

[Mr. J. W. King.]

Mr. GOULD: Possibly the minister would answer a question that would apply to every other department of government. Who are the minister's advisers who compile these lists?

Mr. KING (Kootenay): The heads of the various branches of the departments are the advisers. This item of $5,000 is immaterial to me and it may be dropped. It is put in there by the officials of the department, and it very distinctly says what it is for—perhaps not an unwise provision —to provide for new appointments, if required.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is a wrong principle, one that I cannot find elsewhere. I accept with pleasure the minister's suggestion that it be dropped.

Mr. GOULD: There is, as has been shown by an hon. member, an average difference of $400 between the salaries paid in this department and in the Department of Agriculture. I understand the reply to be that a greater degree of technical knowledge is required in this department. When the Minister of Agriculture had his estimates before the House a few nights ago it was distinctly shown that that department was in dire need of experts. The minister even declared that he was unable to secure enough money to obtain the experts in the entomological, research, and other branches necessary to combat the various pest nuisances which agriculture has to contend with. Now it appears that this department can and does afford to pay an average of $400 more in salaries to its officers than the Department of Agriculture can pay to their men. I have persistently contended for the past two years in this House that the Department of Agriculture has the right to pay the same salaries to its officials and technical men as this or any other department pays. The Department of Agriculture, I hold, should be put on the same basis as this department in the matter of salaries paid to expert men.

Mr. CALDWELL: It was shown the other night that the Department of Agriculture had lost two of its most valuable men because their salaries were not sufficient. They had better offers abroad which they accepted. I do not think that that department should be discriminated against in that way.

The CHAIRMAN: It has been moved by the Hon. Mr. King (Kootenay) that the item be reduced by $5,000. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

Item as amended agreed to.

Governor General's Secretary's Office: Salaries, including Governor General's Secretary, addition to salary authorized by R. S. c. 4, $3,600.

Contingencies, including allowance of $600 to A. F. Sladen, Private Secretary, $66,600.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): There is absolutely no change from last year; the totals are the same. The salary of the Governor General's secretary is paid in part by vote of Parliament and in part by statute.

Mr. CALDWELL: What is the full salary of the Governor General's secretary?

Mr. FIELDING: Parliament votes $3,600 and $2,400 is provided for in the Revised Statutes. That has been the practice for many years.

Item agreed to.

Finance—salaries, including the Deputy Minister of Finance at $10,000, and the Librarian at $2,000, $413,545; contingencies, $50,000.

Mr. FIELDING: Thsse estimates follow closely the estimates of a year ago. The number of officials is substantially the same, and in the total amount there is a small reduction. There are two special increases to which I shall refer in a moment. Apart from this, whatever changes are proposed are due to the classification and the usual statutory allowances. There is one item which at first sight appears to be a new one: accountant, grade 6, at $4,020. There is no corresponding sum in that estimate a year ago. There is, however, really no change, the gentleman being already in the service. He is merely put into another grade. He begins now at the salary he has hitherto enjoyed, but in his new grade he will have an opportunity of climbing up. There is an increase in connection with the librarian. That is a special recognition to an old gentleman who is now considering an early retirement. The effect will be to add a little to his slender retiring allowance, and I think that in consideration of the circumstances the committee will hardly take exception. The larger and important increase is that given to the deputy minister. I find that several of the deputies are receiving $10,000 a year. I think it will be admitted that the Department of Finance is as important as any other department of the Government. As a matter of fact, I know, and my predecessors no doubt know, that in more than one instance we have lost capable men from the department because of the insufficiency of salaries. It will be agreed, I believe, that if $10,000 is a fair salary for a deputy minister in any other department, the like salary ought to be paid the deputy minister of the Department of Finance, whose position is certainly not less important than others. I ask the committee to vote this sum.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is true that the Deputy Minister of Justice receives $10,000, but I am not aware at the moment of any other deputy that gets this salary.

Mr. FIELDING: There are others.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think that the Deputy Minister of Militia, being a member of the council in some way, gets that salary, but he does not receive the extra amount as deputy minister of the department. If I remember rightly, he draws just $6,000 as deputy. If there are any others who get a higher salary I have never known the fact. I do not dispute that, to get the right man to fill the responsible position of Deputy Minister of Finance, it is necessary to pay the salary proposed, but I fear that unless resistance is shown this practice will spread rapidly. In the Department of Justice, it must be admitted, to get a man of the capacity requisite for the position of deputy minister, you cannot pay less than is given to-day, and the country would lose infinitely more in a week by having a deputy minister of inferior ability than it would lose in a year by giving the additional pay. It is a position requiring a professional man of the very highest order. In this department the reason for the increase can be differentiated, but I hope these increases will not proceed further, because if we have just one more instance I am afraid a similar increase will go all through the list. While I am on my feet may I ask, is the report correct that to make room for the Minister of Public Works another officer was added to this department, namely, the elected member for the constituency now represented by the minister; and, if so, is that reflected in this vote?

Mr. FIELDING: It is not touched by this vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will be in another vote.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Mr. HOCKEN: The minister gives two contradictory reasons for making these increases. He first increases a man because he is inefficient or has reached an age when he ought to retire. He has increased the salary of the librarian because he is going to retire, and I presume if he were an efficient officer he would be retained. Then the minister increases the salary of another officer on the ground of efficiency. I would point out that if the House adopts this increase, next year you will have to pay the Deputy Minister of Public Works $10,000, and that will carry from him to the Deputy Minister of the Interior and the Deputy Minister of Railways, and so on to all the other departments.

It will be observed that the deputy ministers' salaries have been fixed generally at $6,000. Now you fix one of them at $10,000, and naturally and inevitably every deputy minister will want to be placed on a par with that increase—he will feel he has a right to it. I doubt very much whether the Deputy Minister of Finance has any heavier responsibilities than the Deputy Minister of Public Works. The Public Works Department requires a permanent head with a great deal of experience and ability and, sometimes, resistance, and so far as the actual work and worries of office are concerned I think the Deputy Minister of Public Works should get more salary—if there is going to be any difference at all—than the Deputy Minister of Finance.

My argument is this, Mr. Chairman, we fixed $6,000 as the salary of deputy ministers; that was an increase of $1,000 on the old scale. Now, that strikes me as being a pretty good salary. We will say that these men are capable and efficient; I believe they are. But the $6,000 that they earn is as much remuneration as they could command in private employment if you take into account that when they retire from the public service they get a retiring allowance. Let a man go into private employment at a salary of $8,000, or possibly $10,000—a substantial increase, it may be said, upon the government scale; but it must be remembered that when the private employee ceases to be able to work he has to fall back upon his own reserves, while a man occupying the position of a deputy minister falls back upon the pension list and continues to live at the expense of the country when he retires. I submit therefore that if you take that into account and a good many other things also, a deputy minister is much better off. For instance, a man in private employment has to make good in everything—he has to show results or he loses his job. On the contrary, a man in the public service is not required to make good in the same way, and that is an important consideration when you are fixing salaries. Take that into account as well as his pension, his short hours of work, and all the other advantages and perquisites of his office, and I submit that $6,000 is good pay for a deputy minister.

These deputies were satisfied to accept $5,000 until a couple of sessions ago, when the salary was raised to $6,000. This looks to me, Mr. Chairman, like the beginning of an agitation within the service to boost the salaries of deputy ministers, and they have selected my hon. friend's department as the place of attack. I would warn the House that if this increase is granted we may expect every session to be met with demands from deputy ministers for a similar increase. It does not seem to me that this is the time to add $4,000 to the salary of a public official. If $6,000 was enough during 1921, it is surely enough now, and it is going to be worth a good deal more as time goes on. Conditions are stabilizing in this country—they must if we are going to carry on—the cost of living is coming down, but the rate of salaries is going up, and not going up by small increases, but by chunks of $4,000.

I think this proposition is simply outrageous, and I am surprised that my hon. friend, who has preached economy so effectively all through the country, should be the first to propose a sixty-six per cent increase to one official in his department, knowing as he must, with his long experience in this House, that every deputy minister will be clamouring for similar treatment. I am sure he is putting upon his colleagues a load of responsibility from which they should shrink, and which should have led them to say to him: "No we won't make this increase this year." I submit that this $4,000 should be struck out. I notice all the way down that there are increases. I presume that these other increases are made in accordance with the Civil Service rates, and are statutory—I do not know whether I am right or not—but certainly we should not add four-sixths to the salary of one official

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Chairman, it is quite refreshing to find ourselves now in an absolutely different position to any we have heretofore been in when considering the estimates of a minister who knows very well exactly what ought to be done in his department, and who, besides that, is very deeply concerned in all matters of economy. In the first instance I would point out that we find ourselves in this happy position, that at least so far as one department is concerned we have in charge an authority who knows exactly what ought to be done, and he admits that that department was economically and properly administered by his predecessors. I also wish to point out to my hon. friends to the left that so economically was that department administered that the average salary there is only $1,124.

Mr. CRERAR: That may not be an evidence of economy.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think it is.

Mr. MURPHY: Is my hon. friend taking into account the defalcations?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am glad to say that those defalcations do not amount to very much. Certainly there never should be defalcations, and the late government did everything it could to discover just what they were and to punish the defaulters. But I am not taking that into consideration, nor was my hon. friend when he was considering salaries. Another time perhaps we might say something further about that matter, but this is not an appropriate occasion.

As I say, the average salary of that department amounts to only $1,124 a year. Now there is a slight increase in numbers, so it cannot be said that we had too many employees there. As to the duties of the office, I do not think that hon. members really appreciate the weight of responsibility that does rest upon the officials of that office. At one time the finances of the country were of a very different character to what they are to-day. To look after the national debt alone imposes a tremendous responsibility upon the Deputy Minister of Finance. What the minister has said in connection with the difficulty of keeping men in that position who can do the work is perfectly true. I know what the troubles have been in the past, and I appreciate my hon. friend's troubles now. I am convinced that the work is cheaply paid for at $10,000 a year. I endorse very thoroughly what my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) said, that this vote ought not to be made use of for the purpose of increasing other salaries generally. I would like to ask the minister whether or not the auditors who have been going through the department are proceeding with their work and whether it is his hope, as it was mine, that we shall be able to get as a result of this examination such a system of pre-audit as will make impossible any further defalcations. We have to-day accountants and book-keepers in every department. My idea is that that is an entirely unnecessary expense; we ought to have everything of this kind brought into the Finance Department. The Minister of Finance should have proper control over the country's finances, something which he has not at the present time.

Mr. FIELDING: I thank my hon. friend for his explanations and comments. The auditors to whom he refers are still engaged in the work, and I have every reason to believe that they are doing it efficiently. No doubt good results will ensue.

Mr. CHAPLIN: What is the age of the deputy minister?

Mr. FIELDING: The age of the present deputy minister is fifty-nine. The minister himself does not confess to any such age.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister is still a very young man. It was the deputy minister, not the minister, about whose age I was inquiring.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: Is this 66⅔ per cent increase for the deputy minister fixed by the minister of the department, or by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. FIELDING: The Civil Service Commission have nothing to do with fixing that salary. The deputy minister is not subject to Civil Service rules.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: For how many years is this 66⅔ per cent increase to be continued?

Mr. FIELDING: From year to year, as it pleases Parliament. The vote comes before Parliament every year. The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) was slightly mistaken in several respects. In the first place, I regret that his watchful eye did not perceive this thing at an earlier period; the attack which he says is being made might have been made some years ago. There have evidently been allowances to deputies that he has not been aware of. Several deputies receive $10,000 a year; as a matter of fact there is one other official in the Finance Department who receives that sum. There has been much talk about the lower officials not being well paid. I think if there is any room for criticism it is that the higher officials and technical officers who have large responsibility are not sufficiently paid. We must pay these men enough if we are to keep them. With reference to the remark of my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin), I may say that the Deputy Minister of Finance has been nearly forty years in the service, but in asking this increase I am thinking not only of the man, but of the office. The time is not far distant when the deputy minister will wish to retire, and I think we ought to provide for this office a salary which will attract a good man. I am persuaded that in this case it is not wise to have an underpaid man.

Item agreed to.

Civil Government—Immigration and Colonization—salaries and contingencies, $263,265.

Hon. CHARLES STEWART (Argenteuil, Minister of the Interior): Last year the vote for salaries was $193,257.50; this year it is $213,265, an increase of $20,007.50.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How much of the $193,257.50 was spent.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): All of it. The annual statutory allowances approved by the Civil Service Commission are, for the lower grades. $60 per annum; for the intermediate grades, $120, for the higher grades, $180. These amount to $7,932.50. The increase in rates of salaries of officials reclassified during the fiscal year amounts to $5,685, making a total of $13,675.50. There were but two actual increases in staff, occasioned by the appointment of a secretary to the deputy minister at $1,500 and a female investigating officer at $1,230. Six officials included in the civil government contingencies this year, and accounting for an increase in that vote of $10,000, were paid out of the general contingencies vote last year, and were therefore not charged against civil government contingencies in 1921-22.

Mr. CALDWELL: You mean, they were paid out of the vote for the outside service?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Exactly. There was one male investigating officer, grade 1; one female investigating officer, grade 1; one clerk-stenographer, one accounts-stenographer and two junior clerk-typists at $600 each.

[Mr. Fielding.]

The contingency vote is based on the actual amount expended last year, and includes the necessary funds to meet the travelling expenses of our head office officials, printing, stationery, temporary clerical assistance, and sundry expenses. The amount of $40,000 voted for 1921-22 has been found insufficient to meet these expenses up to March 31, 1922, and the department has been obliged to obtain a Governor General's warrant for $12,000, which amount will be included in the supplementary estimates for 1921-22. The accountant tells me that $2,000 of that $12,000 is unexpended, and although the books are not actually closed for the year, it is expected that only $10,000 of that Governor General's warrant will be spent. Hence we are asking that $10,000, the amount expended under Governor General's warrant last year, be added to the contingency vote for the coming year.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. STEVENS: I was attending the meeting of the Committee on Agriculture before six o'clock and, therefore, I was not in touch with what immediately preceded the rising of the committee at six o'clock. I wish to ask the minister in regard to Mr. Duncan Marshall, to whom reference was made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell). The minister will remember that when the estimates of the Department of Agriculture were before the House, we queried him regarding the payment of this gentleman and the purposes of the trip he was undertaking to Florida. The Minister of Agriculture, I thought rather unkindly, turned the responsibility over to my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart). As a matter of fact, I think it is a little unkind on my part to press for information from him, because I think he is wholly innocent of offence in this regard, and has been perhaps the victim of one of the mysterious temptations which we understand are now current in this Green Chamber. But we were told by the Minister of Agriculture that Mr. Duncan Marshall had been sort of wrested from him by the Minister of the Interior. He said that frequently there was a sort of exchange made between ministers regarding officials of the departments, and the Minister of the Interior had pressed very earnestly for the loan of this brand new $6,000 official. The Minister of Agriculture also said that Mr. Marshall had been sent by the Government to Florida on a mission in connection with immigration. I should like to ask the minister (Mr. Stewart) to tell the House very frankly exactly what Mr. Duncan Marshall's mission to Florida was, and I desire to say to him, so that he will not be taken by surprise later, that I am frightfully sceptical of the strict accuracy of the suggestion of the Minister of Agriculture that his mission was in any way closely identified with a necessary public service, and I think we might as well know frankly what Mr. Marshall is doing in Florida, why he is down there, and why the public money is being spent in that way.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I shall be very glad indeed to answer the hon. gentleman. I have never been in Florida and cannot speak with authority with respect to the advantages of sending one of our officials down there. However, Mr. Marshall is not an official of the Department of Agriculture. Mr. Tolmie, who is in charge of the exhibits of the Department of the Interior, went to the Tampa Fair and put on an exhibit largely because, I am informed, it is the rendezvous of a very large number of Americans from the central states, who go down there and spend the winter months. He asked that a lecturer might be sent down to address a gathering on one of the days designated as Canada's day. Mr. Marshall was here and available and was sent down to deliver one address on a day specially dedicated by that fair to Canada. He made the trip, was gone one week, and for that time the department had not the services of Mr. Marshall.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the minister not think that is some distance to send a man to make one address before the class of people who would be assembled at Tampa, Florida, for the exhibition of the wares of Florida? What object could be gained for the country is a mystery to me. If there is one part of the world from which we expect no immigration, it is the sands of Florida, where they grow oranges and pineapples, and where people go to sit by the fireside and to spend their time keeping alight the last flickering tapers of their lives. That is what they go from the central states for.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken. It is not the old people who go there from the central states. There is a large temporary population, who remain there for several weeks, and a number of families from Iowa go there, if my information is correct. I am aware of the fact that it is a winter resort, and a great many people from Canada and the northern states go down there. I quite agree that they would not be induced to come to Canada, and I do not want to be dragged into a discussion of what is going to happen in the central states, as far as immigration is concerned, but there is not any doubt that we are going to get a considerable number of people from the central states, if information coming to hand is correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The last people we would get would be people from the central states who go down to the Tampa exhibition. They are well-off people who have time to spare, and who are in the evening of their days.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think my hon. friend is wrong again.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not at all, I have been down there myself, but only for about three or four days, and it would take the minister a lot more time than this evening, and tomorrow evening, and all this session, to convince me that there was any bona fide purpose of getting immigration, or interesting people in immigration, by the visit of Mr. Marshall to Tampa, Florida.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Perhaps the whole question of the Canadian exhibit, so far as the Department of the Interior was concerned, was a mistake. However, I found him down there on an expedition which must undoubtedly have cost a considerable sum of money, and I am informed by Mr. Tolmie, who is in charge of the work, that it was a considerable advantage to Canada. I cannot speak authoritatively. I am only voicing the opinions of the officials.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How many others were there?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I think two others, in addition to Mr. Tolmie.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Four altogether?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The cost would run into many thousands of dollars.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot say. I have no information.

Mr. MACLAREN: I notice the appointment of three new officials as immigration investigating officers. What duties do these three new officials perform?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): They are not three new officials; they are promotions. I explained that before the House rose at six o'clock. There is an addition of two, one being secretary to the deputy minister, the other being a female investigating officer. Those are the only additions to the staff. They may have different titles, but they are officials who were in the department.

Mr. MACLAREN: What does the female investigating officer do?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): She might perform any number of duties.

Mr. MACLAREN: I asked what duties she performed.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Naturally, she would be carrying on investigations in connection with female immigrants who come to our ports. She might be investigating the question of females who were subject to being deported. She is simply an addition to the woman's organization of the department.

Mr. MANION: There is, throughout the country to-day, a widespread feeling that one of the very important necessities of Canada is a proper immigration policy. I should like the minister, if he can find it convenient at this time, to tell the House and the country something of the plans which he intends to put into operation to bring to Canada greater immigration than occurred during the years of the war.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would ask my hon. friend to delay that request until the general estimates are taken up. Before they are passed, I intend to take some time in explaining to the House some things that we propose to do in the way of securing immigration. Frankly, I am not in a position at present to go into the matter. There are still pending some questions that I would like to have settled. I think it is known that I am getting assistance from the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Low), the hon. senator Dandurand and the hon. senator Bostock. We have some matters on which we have not definitely made up our minds, and in regard to which we are desirous of recommending some changes. I am not, at this time prepared to speak upon those matters, and I would prefer to cover the whole field when we take up the immigration vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a fact, is it not, that, notwithstanding the war, which, of course, stopped all immigration and, indeed, caused emigration for war purposes, there was more immigration to Canada in the last decennial period prior to the census than in the ten years preceding?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I could not speak authoritatively with regard to that. I have not made an examination of the reports for the years mentioned by my right hon friend. Perhaps that information is correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I find it in the census statistics. I was struck by the fact that it was so much out of harmony with speeches made in the late campaign by the minister and his colleagues.

Mr. MANION: What are the figures of the immigration into Canada from 1915 on?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The figures are:

1915	144,789
1916	48,537
1917	75,374
1918	79,074
1919	57,702
1920	117,336
1921	148,477

Mr. MEIGHEN: 1913?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): 402,432.

Mr. MANION: I knew these figures roughly myself because I had seen them a short time ago; but the reason I asked for them was that I wanted the minister to point out to the committee what is really a fact and something the people will be pleased to hear. While an immigration of 48,537, in 1916, was the lowest figure reached by this country in many years, even before the late Government went out of power, immigration had got back to 148,477. Therefore, the country, it seems to me, may feel well assured that immigration into Canada is coming back to what it was before the war; that is, so far as we wish it to come back. I shall be very much interested when the minister makes the statement he speaks of. I hope, when his estimates come up, he will be able to give the House a complete statement of what plans the Government proposes to carry out.

Mr. HOEY: How many native-born Canadians left this country for the United States during the past decade? I have in my possession an announcement that reminds me that a million and a half native-born Canadians have left Canada for the United States since 1911. I think the country should know that.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I doubt if I could give the number of native-born Canadians who have left Canada, although the census figures will show it, in comparison with those who came to Canada as well as the birth rate. To say just what proportion of those who left were native-born Canadians, would be rather difficult.

Mr. HOEY: That statement has been given wide publicity. It was published recently in Maclean's magazine. From personal observation, and from looking at the matter from the viewpoint of a detached and disinterested student, I believe the statement to be absolutely true. Some one said that, in the old days, the test before you could get into the asylum for the insane, was a water test; that is to say, a water barrel without a bottom, was placed in a certain position. There was not, I am told, even a false bottom in it. The man who was seeking admission was asked to carry water and to put it into this bottomless barrel. If he continued to carry the water without protest, he was considered a fit subject to enter. If he refused, why he was turned out. It seems to me that we might seriously consider the advisability of stopping the leak.

Mr. MANION: While I cannot contradict the figure given by my hon. friend, I should very much doubt if any such number as one and a half millions left Canada for the United States in the last ten years, and I do not think any such statement can be proved. The minister should, at the very earliest opportunity, give the exact figure if it is possible to obtain it. I believe a figure has been given, but that included, not only native-born Canadians, but any others who might have come to this country from any of the countries of Europe.

Mr. HOEY: Admitting that, does the hon. member not think that a tragic situation in view of the fact that we ought to have better opportunities in this young nation for men to make a living, and that we would have, were it not for the economic policies that have been followed ever since Confederation by both historic parties in this country?

Mr. MANION: Can the hon. member tell me why so many people are emigrating from free trade England?

Mr. HOEY: Does the hon. member think that the comparison is fair, as between Great Britain and Canada at this stage in the development of both countries?

Mr. MANION: Well, we might compare Great Britain with Germany. Before the war the protectionist policy of Germany was increasing the population, and the movement was into that country and not away from it.

Mr. MORRISON: That was during the last two years before the war, when they were preparing for the fight.

Mr. THURSTON: What extra travelling does the minister propose for his officials this year, and for which he wants this additional $10,000?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The estimate for the past year was $40,000. In addition, an Order in Council was passed granting $12,000 to meet expenditures for the year 1922. That does not appear in the Estimates; they did not spend the full $12,000, having still $2,000 on hand. We are simply asking for the actual amount spent last year.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is there more business in the department than previously? There is practically no immigration to-day, and I think that we might do without the vote entirely.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): There is a vote of $6,000 for a deputy minister. How long has the deputy been in the department? Was he in the service and in this particular department before he was made deputy?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The appointment was made either at the end of September or about the 1st of October.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): How long had the department been without a deputy before he was appointed?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): This is the first deputy.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Does the minister consider the work of the department sufficient to warrant this new appointment? Although a vote went through last year for the same amount, the minister says that the appointment was made in the fall of the year. Does he intend to keep this official?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): My experience with the department is brief, but I have some important things to say about the Department of Immigration. I do not agree with the hon. member who said that we should wipe out the whole vote, because I think that if the department were utilized in the way it should be, very substantial results could be obtained. I do not desire to be in the slightest way understood as reflecting on the work of the department in the past, because I know nothing about what it has done. I do know, however, that once you place the agriculturists of Canada in the position in which they should be, you will have a field for immigration into Canada. When you have done that you will need a Department of Immigration, and having charge of four departments, I think that if there is work enough for a minister in this department there should certainly be work for a deputy.

Mr. CALDWELL: I am glad to hear the minister say this, because it is evident that the Government intends to make agricultural conditions such as to encourage immigration into Canada—something that, I think, is sadly needed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be still more interesting if the minister would tell us what means he hopes to adopt.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): The minister is asking for $4,500 for a commissioner of United States immigration. Has this official to do with immigrants coming from the United States exclusively?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Will the minister give, roughly, some comparative figures to show the immigration from the United States as compared with other countries, so that we may judge whether this official is warranted.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The following are the figures showing the immigration from the United States:

1915	59,779
1916	36,937
1917	61,389
1918	71,314
1919	40,715
1920	49,656
1921	48,059

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): What was the immigration from other countries in 1921?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): All the other countries are apparently grouped together, Great Britain and the United States being separate. The immigration from Great Britain, during the years I have given, was:

1915	43,276
1916	8,664
1917	8,282
1918	3,178
1919	9,914
1920	59,603
1921	74,262

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Apparently there are more immigrants coming from Great Britain than from the United States. At least, there were in the last two years of the period. Now what are the duties of this Commissioner of United States Immigration? I suppose he must have a special office with some assistants, whereas the immigration from Great Britain does not seem to require a special official.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): There are nineteen offices in the United States at which immigration agents are stationed. I cannot give their names and locations, but that will come up in the general vote. Mr. White, who is in charge, is an officer of considerable experience in American immigration. Since taking charge of the department I have frequently consulted him. He is here at my request as I am anxious to get the views of the man on the ground. He visits the various offices scattered throughout the United States from the Pacific as far east as Chicago. He supervises the work and generally keeps in touch with the activities of the various agencies that seek through advertising and other methods to obtain suitable immigration.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): This work is all under his supervision.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes.

Mr. McMASTER: Have we any proper method of determining the number of people who leave Canada?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I cannot give a very definite answer with respect to that, but offhand, I think it would be difficult to arrive at the correct figures. Of course, the census returns would give some indication.

Mr. McMASTER: It seems to me it is just like keeping your accounts on one side of the ledger only, if you count the people coming in and do not count the people going out. As most people travel by rail, and as our immigration officers are on all the trains, I think these officials might as well count the people going south and those going north. We cannot have any real knowledge on which to base a proper immigration policy unless we have all the facts, and I would urge upon the minister to take counsel with the able men of his department in order to devise some method of obtaining these facts. I think they can be obtained.

Let me add, that while we are passing estimates it is the most tiresome thing in the world if members will not speak out—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. McMASTER:—It is annoying not to hear the question as well as the answer. The acoustic properties of this Chamber are excellent if members will only speak in something higher than a conversational tone.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. McMASTER: If you talk as if conversing to a friend in a small room, you cannot expect to be heard in a chamber of these dimensions.

Mr. HOEY: I would suggest that our immigration agents in the United States be instructed to receive native-born Canadians when they arrive there and help them to get comfortably settled; also to keep a record of the total number who go over there every year.

Mr. EVANS: Does number five on the list, Chief Inspector of Immigration, mean a medical inspector?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): The inspector in question is Mr. Percy Reid, who has charge of the western section. Mr. Little has charge of the eastern section.

Mr. EVANS: As to medical inspection?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Oh, no.

Mr. EVANS: How is this medical inspection carried out? It seems to me that some of the present regulations dealing with the inspection of immigrants on the other side of the Atlantic are decidely obnoxious. I am advised that this medical inspection is conducted in a most unscientific and unsanitary manner. An old friend of mine coming across not very long ago told me that not only the immigrants but the saloon passengers boarding the ship at Liverpool were subjected to unheard-of indignities, an officer using his fingers to manipulate the eyelids of each passenger, without cleansing his hands between each operation. It did not matter what any of these passengers were suffering from, whether barber's itch, cancer or granulated eyelids, it was all the same to this officer, and as a result of the rough and unsanitary method adopted one lady suffered very severely with her eyes all the way over. I believe in thorough inspection of immigrants, but surely it can be done in a scientific and humane manner. But apparently the Liverpool treatment is mild compared with what takes place on this side. At the port of landing here is where the real embargo begins—a kind of slaughtered-on-the-dock, as it were. It is a shameful thing for this nation that men and women of all classes are herded together in pens waiting for inspection. I think that state of affairs should be altered at once.

Mr. SPENCER: I am going to give the House the type of advertising that was circulated in the States some years ago to attract immigrants to this country, because I hope that future advertising will not be along the same lines. Referring to the western provinces, where settlers were invited to take up land, the advertisement ran something like this:

> It was a common thing up there for the farmers to grow from forty to fifty bushels of Number One wheat to the acre. What one man can do, another can do. Those farmers up there have more real money to spend than any other people on the American continent.

We have been wondering why people attracted to this country by such immigration pamphlets do not remain here. Is it surprising that immigrants become disgusted, and leave when this sort of pamphlet entices them to pick up gold bricks, and instead they find a lot of hard work. I hope that this is not the sort of advertisement that is going to be circulated in future, unless we want to lose most of the immigrants who are attracted to this country by such misrepresentation.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I would like to add to what has been stated by the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Evans) in regard to medical inspection on the other side of the Atlantic. I have a case on my hands now of a Scotch family, the members of which bought their tickets and checked their baggage about a year ago. After they had gone through the preliminaries and were ready to sail, a doctor stopped one of the children, a little girl, on the ground that she was mentally deficient. These people had sold all their goods in order to put themselves in funds for the voyage, and as a result of the doctor's action they had to postpone their voyage, and go to work, boarding out all the time. After a year the doctor finally passed the girl, and the family are ready to come to Canada, but they have spent all their money and are unable to pay their passage. Surely there is something wrong with the machinery of inspection when a case like this can happen.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I intend to deal with a great many of the questions that have been raised by hon. members with a view to prevent the recurrence of such cases as have been mentioned, but I regret that I am unable to do so to-night because we have not yet come to any definite conclusions as to what is best to be done.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): I notice that the staff of this department has been increased by six. The minister shakes his head. Well, one hundred and twenty-six and six make a hundred and thirty-two, which is the number given for the current year. What is the explanation?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Simply this: two of them are additions—the secretary to the deputy minister, and the female investigational officer. The others were in the department, but were paid last year from the general contingencies vote; they are now transferred to the civil government vote.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): When were these two added?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): In September and October.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): Just about the time the new deputy minister was appointed. I wanted that answer in relation to my other question about the deputy minister. The right hon. leader of the Opposition stated the other day when the estimates of some other department were under consideration that when a new deputy head is appointed, he wants a staff. That is proved here; we have a new deputy head who takes on two people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just one, I understand.

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): Yes; the other, the lady investigational officer, was attached to the women's branch.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain): She would come under the supervision of the deputy, would she not?

Mr. STEWART (Argenteuil): I would not think so.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand she came on some time before the deputy was appointed. As regards the Department of Immigration, I would like to make one comment in view of certain observations that have been made. Up to the war our immigration had increased almost continuously. It was at its highest point just before the war—some 448,000 in one year. The population undoubtedly was increasing—not, of course, at the full speed of the immigration returns and of the natural increase as well, but, proportionate to that, the increase was equal to that of any other country. The United States itself has a tremendous immigration. Every country in the world has immigration. It is true, as my hon. friend (Mr. Manion) says, that the immigration into Germany was the least marked of all, particularly subsequent to 1878. But every country, particularly every northern country, has immigration. Our immigration figures are most satisfactory up to 1914. Naturally the war practically put a stop to immigration; everybody knows the reason why. With the cessation of hostilities the Department of Immigration was reorganized to meet the situation. The returns for last year show results; the returns for this year, I have not the slightest doubt, will show good results as well. Indeed, we might have had hundreds of thousands more immigrants—and no one knows this better than the minister himself—had we opened the doors and let them in. But the laws of this country, and the will of the people reflected in those laws, are such that we do not propose to open the doors indiscriminately to immigration. A great deal of the expense, a great deal of the executive activities of the department, are directed to the selecting of immigration, the weeding out, at the proper point for doing so of those who come. I should be sorry indeed to see anything in the way of slackening of energy on the part of the Immigration Department. Certainly there is work enough there for a good deputy; the bigger and the abler the deputy, the better results we are going to have. If there is any department of government in which I would like to see increased rather than diminished activity, it is the Department of Immigration and Colonization. Furthermore, in western Canada at the present time, as all of us know, there is a great voluntary movement, a big voluntary organization, which is interesting itself in colonization. I have not myself gone fully into the details of its organization, but I know many of those who have put themselves behind it and are determined to make it succeed. That organization should have close relations with the Department of Immigration and Colonization, and the work of the two together should, I think, go a long way to solve the problem of peopling the near-railway lands of western Canada. The time now is not to talk about slackening down the activities of the Immigration Department, but rather to speed them up. We are sufficiently past the war to get the impetus we need so much in this country. The nation that is going to succeed best in the post war period is the nation that directs its immigration policy along soundest lines and puts the most horse power and momentum behind it.

Mr. JELLIFF: Mr. Chairman, I did not have the slightest idea of saying anything in regard to these estimates, but I wish to support as strongly as I can the remarks that have just been made by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). If ever there was an occasion for liberality in connection with our immigration policy, it is the present. It is only a year or two since, under the influence, I presume, of the leader of the Opposition, something like $500,000 was appropriated by the government to carry out surveys and plans for the redemption of southern Alberta through the irrigation projects that have been set on foot in that province. I want to give the hon. leader of the Opposition credit for hard work and painstaking effort in connection with these projects. Now, what is our position to-day? I am not going to depend too much upon my memory to-night, because I did not expect to speak on this subject. But of the 12,000,000 acres to the south of Calgary that are within the boundaries of the area affected by the drought, 5,000,000 acres approximately are in the hands of farmers. In that area there are 20,000 farmers, or, allowing four to each family, a farm population of 80,000. With the help of the government they have started to lay out and extend their surveys to redeem that whole country from the affliction of drought. Let me point out to you what that means. Take Lethbridge as a centre, and draw a circle which will include the affected area. In 1915, the year of our bumper crop in that part of the country, we shipped from that area 41,000,000 bushels of grain. In 1916 we shipped 39,000,000 bushels. A dry season followed, and in 1917 the crop yield dropped to about 18,000,000 bushels. The drought and the dry seasons continued, and in 1919 only 4,000,000 bushels were shipped from there.

The CHAIRMAN: I would draw the hon member's attention to the fact that we are on item 7, the vote for immigration and colonization.

Mr. JELLIFF: I will attempt, Mr. Chairman, to connect this up, if you will allow me to place a few figures before the committee. The area which in 1915 produced 41,000,000 bushels of grain for shipment, produced in 1919 only 4,000,000 bushels. In 1919 we shipped 4,000,000 bushels only, but 1920 was a better year, with more moisture, and our shipments rose to 19,000,000 bushels. Then last year again we had dry conditions and our shipments decreased to 7,000,000 bushels. So you will see how important a national problem it is when production drops down to almost one-tenth between the years 1915 and 1919. There is only one way to solve the problem and that is to place the farmers on a basis where they can depend upon sufficient production to make a living for themselves and their families, and the way to do that is to introduce artificial irrigation throughout that territory. That is what we are doing. Those farmers have bonded their farms for that purpose to the amount of $40 per acre.

Now the application my remarks have to the item under discussion is simply this: This is a question of colonization. The individual farms out there are large in area, and the farmers, in order to make a success of irrigation, must subdivide their farms into plots not exceeding 160 acres each, and engage in a more intensified agriculture. For that purpose immigrants have to be found and brought into this country who are acquainted with irrigation methods. That must be done through the Department of Immigration, and the department must have sufficient funds available and enough men at its disposal to go out into the irrigation districts of the United States and carefully select immigrants who have had experience in irrigation methods. Every town and every city in southern Alberta is interested in this question; our railroads depend upon it, and I trust that when the minister brings down his final estimates they will contain an appropriation to help fill up that southern Alberta country with a suitable class of immigrants who will help subdivide these lands and bring up their families on them.

If that is done that whole territory instead of being a liability, as it has been at times in the past, will be a positive asset to the whole country. I might mention that in the Budget recently brought down by the government of Alberta quite a sum of money is provided for this same immigration work, which really should be carried on by the federal government, and I think I am quite within my rights in urging that this Government should at least go fifty-fifty with the province of Alberta in backing up that project and settling the country.

Mr. IRVINE: Do I understand that my hon. friend has moved for an increase in the vote for that purpose?

Mr. JELLIFF: No, I simply suggested that the supplementary estimates should contain an appropriation for that purpose.

Customs and Excise—salaries, $559,385; contingencies, $48,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I notice that there are in this department 94 clerks, costing $125,250, who are engaged in statistical work. As this is not constructive work, I think we could pare down the item by at least $100,000.

Mr. CRERAR: I have been doing a little research work in respect to the cost of civil government in this country, and I find that in respect to the Department of Customs the total cost of civil government twenty years ago was $41,690: ten years later, in 1913, it had risen to $276,000, and the amount which my hon. friend is asking the committee to vote this year is $559,000. That is a very considerable growth. The expenditure has practically doubled in ten years, for the Department of Customs alone.

Hon. JACQUES BUREAU (Minister of Customs): The Inland Revenue Department does not exist separately now; it is merged with the Department of Customs.

Mr. CRERAR: There is still an increase of over $200,000. Perhaps my hon. friend could give some explanation of that very considerable increase.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend has quoted the figures of ten years ago. Ten years ago we collected $73,000,000 at a cost of $2,187,174.76. In 1921 we col-

9 p.m. lected in round figures, $209,000,000 at a cost of $5,000,000. As my hon. friend knows, these estimates cover both Customs and Excise. I would point out that although in item 13 on page 8 there is an apparent increase of $10,745, that is really a sub-normal increase. The normal increase would be about double that amount. We have 231 clerks in the service who are entitled to statutory increases, and if conditions were normal the salaries of last year would be increased this year by $17,945. Now, there is an increase of $10,000 which I may explain. Some hon. gentleman referred to a remark which had dropped from the lips of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) that when a new minister came in he wanted a staff. I think it is only right he should have one, and when I was on the other side of the House I always advocated that, not only should a minister have a staff of his own, who should follow his fate, and when the minister goes out should go out with him, but that the members of the House are entitled to secretaries of their own. I do not think it is right that we should send our private papers down to a room where there are 50, or 60, or perhaps 100 stenographers, and where the papers would be open to the curiosity of all-comers. But this increase of $10,000 is due to the fact that we have taken advantage of a clause of the Civil Service Act, which provides that in any case where the commission decides that it is not practicable, in the public interest, to apply this act to any position or positions, the commission may, with the approval of the Governor in Council, exclude such position or positions in whole or in part from the operation of the act. Under that recommendation, the commission have excluded certain positions; for instance private secretary, secretary-clerk as they call him, and the secretary to the executive, one senior clerk-stenographer, one clerk-stenographer and one confidential messenger. That accounts for the increase. As I said, if things were as usual, we would have the ordinary amount of salaries, plus the statutory increase of $17,945, but this increase, with the $14,160, will make a total of $32,105. The salaries of nine positions, amounting to $12,630, have been discontinued during the past year, and a reduction of $8,730 has been effected by promotion, transfer, etc., making a total saving of $21,360, or a net increase of $10,745. I may say that the positions to which the minister was allowed to make appointments in his department are those which I have enumerated, secretary clerk, $3,360; secretary to the executive, $1,860; senior clerk-stenographer, $1,630, clerk-stenographer, $1,260, and confidential messenger. So that this is not an increase, it is a sub-normal increase.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not quite understand the minister. Does he say there are twenty-five less employees now?

Mr. BUREAU: Apparently, there are nine less.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I thought he said there was a saving of twenty-one employees. Amounting to how much in money?

Mr. BUREAU: $12,000 odd.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When did that take place?

Mr. BUREAU: That took place during the year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: When?

Mr. BUREAU: I could not say the date.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Before the election probably.

Mr. BUREAU: Before and after.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: How many after?

Mr. BUREAU: I cannot say from memory, but I know I have seen cases where the positions were not filled.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman tell us how many positions were dropped, whether by complete retirement, or under what is known as the Calder Act, prior to the end of the year in his department? I think he will find that before he had any opportunity to reverse the policy very considerable economies were effected there.

Mr. BUREAU: I am informed not in the inside service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They were nearly all in the outside service, but these were in the inside service; I think there were nine anyway before the end of the year, besides scores in the outside service.

Mr. BUREAU: I am informed not, but I have not had time to go through all the —I do not know how to qualify it—all the doings of my predecessors. I have no doubt I will have a job when I go into it, but I will go into it and give the information to my hon. friend. If he wants credit for all the good that he has done, I am not in a position to refuse it, because I do not know anything about it, but next year I will be able to give him credit for all he deserves, and blame him where he deserves it, and I have no doubt upon which side the balance will be.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nor have I. The Postmaster General has a much larger department, and he is no abler a man than the hon. gentleman. How was it he was able, three or four days ago, to give us all the information while the Minister of Customs, whose department is not of the magnitude of the Post Office Department is not able to give us that information?

Mr. BUREAU: If it will soothe the feelings of the right hon. gentleman, I will bring it down. You cannot expect me to have all the information at my finger-tips. The Post Office Department may have more officers, but they are not scattered all over the Dominion, and they have not as difficult duties as the officers of this department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps the other minister was not afraid of giving credit to us for the work we did.

Mr. BUREAU: I have never been afraid to give credit to hon. gentlemen for what they have done, because it has not amounted to much.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am sorry the minister has a sort of off-period to-night, but we will wait in patience.

Mr. MILLER: Does the question of liquor export in Saskatchewan fall under this department?

Mr. BUREAU: No, that would come under the outside service; this is only the inside service.

Mr. CALDWELL: It is for external use—not internal.

Mr. BRETHEN: I notice here that a sum of $548,640 was asked for 1921-22, and the sum of $607,385 is asked for 1922-23, so that we must accept the minister's explanation of the sub-normal increase, but I would like to ask the minister, in view of the fact that the imports had decreased from $1,305,593,000 a year ago to $778,702,000, why there should not be a decrease in the expenditure?

Mr. BUREAU: I may answer the hon. gentleman that we have not only to collect the revenue, but we have to protect the revenue. Now there has been put under the charge of the Customs Department the sales tax, which involves a lot of work, the prohibitive legislation and the bonding of liquor in the dry provinces.

An hon. MEMBER: What provinces are they?

Mr. BUREAU: Provinces that are supposed to be dry but which are importing more liquor than the wet provinces,—for export purposes, I suppose. The legislation passed by those provinces has given rise to a lot of illicit distilling, boot-legging and moon-shining.

Mr. BRETHEN: Would that be outside or inside work?

Mr. BUREAU: Outside. When we talk about inside work, we must not forget that all the outside work has to come to the inside,—the head office. There is only one control in the Department of Customs. What these men do must be controlled. I would not be able to give my hon. friend any information this evening, if all the various officials in the outside service did not reuort to the officials in the inside service. It is only in that way that we can control them and compile the information in our statistics.

Mr. SALES: I notice in the list of officials a supervisor of drawback claims and, lower down, four checkers of drawback claims, costing us altogether $6,360 for the four checkers and $2,520 for the supervisor or a total of $8,880 to superintend drawback claims. I do not know how much it cost us to collect the amount, but this drawback business seems to be an expensive one.

Mr. BUREAU: Drawbacks each year amount to about $15,000,000, and they have to be very closely watched and controlled. That cannot be done unless we have properly qualified officers for the work, and we cannot get them unless we pay them a sufficient salary.

Mr. CRERAR: I notice further down on the page a provision for sixty two customs excise statistical clerks, involving an expenditure of $91,000. The other evening, when the estimates of the Labour Department were under consideration, I drew to the attention of the committee the fact that the Labour Department appeared to be building up a statistical branch with an expensive staff to look after work that might very properly be done in the Bureau of Statistics. Would it not be possible to have this work done in the Bureau of Statistics, where they have all the equipment and machinery for doing it at a much less cost than it is done in the minister's department?

Mr. CAMPBELL: Before the minister answers, I would remind him of the figures I gave a few minutes ago of 94 clerks engaged in statistical work, and costing altogether $125,250.

Mr. BUREAU: These clerks are engaged in getting statistics compiled from entries which are kept under the Customs and Excise Act for the Trade and Navigation Report. These statistics are issued monthly. They are taken from all the invoices that are scattered over all the ports in the Dominion. They are transferred afterwards to the Department of Trade and Commerce. This work could not be done otherwise, because those invoices cannot be made open to the public; even under the act they are considered confidential.

Mr. CRERAR: Would it not be possible to have the compilation of those statistics done in the Bureau of Statistcis?

Mr. BUREAU: No, because the invoices are in the various ports of the Dominion. They come to Ottawa afterwards; but if they were to be handed over to some other department, we would lose control absolutely, and if anything should happen after an entry was put through, we would not have the entry with us; or we would have to make copies, and that would involve another expenditure without any corresponding benefit.

Mr. HARRIS: Have the secretary-clerk and the confidential messenger, mentioned in the list as additional for 1922-23, taken the places of men who, perhaps, had charge of that work in the former ministry; and, if so, do they intend to stay with the department, or will the minister take them with him when he goes?

Mr. BUREAU: The situation is just as I have stated. I will not take them with me when I go, but they will go when I go. Not a man, woman or girl in the general office, or the minister's office, has been removed. These are employes the minister has a right to have in his office, and their life in the service is equal to the life of a minister as a minister.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): It appears a new position has been created, that of General Executive Assistant. Was this office in existence last year?

Mr. BUREAU: No. This office has been created as part of the reorganization of the department. As I said a few minutes ago, both Customs and Excise have been combined with the result that a large direct saving has been effected. I will give credit to my hon. friends for having brought that about. I did not do it, but I am carrying on the plan of the reorganization.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Just one deputy minister?

Mr. BUREAU: He is not a deputy minister; he is Commissioner of Customs and Excise. He was Commissioner of Customs, and he, who was heretofore deputy minister of Inland Revenue, is now assistant commissioner of Customs and Excise. Instead of having a collector of Customs and a collector of Inland Revenue, we have one collector of Customs and Excise at each port. My hon. friends may take credit for that. It is a feather in their cap. I am going on with my explanation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: A little louder.

Mr. BUREAU: My hon. friend understands. He hears me quite well. This business requires reorganization which has been commenced, and, as I have said, legislation in the various provinces has created a great deal of preventive work and the sales tax has also created a great deal of work. I do not think the House is desirous of merely having taxes imposed. The imposition of taxes would not pay our debt very fast; we have to collect the taxes. The collection is the important part, and to collect the taxes, we must have a staff to do the work. The staff has been found insufficient to do the work properly. As I said a few minutes ago, the outside work comes inside. The commissioner and the assistant commissioner are not able to cope with the work which is imposed upon them. The minister himself is not able to attend to all the work of receiving delegations from morning till night. This takes another officer whom we are going to call General Executive Assistant, who is going to be an assistant to all these officers in the department. For this position a man is required who knows thoroughly the customs laws, the excise law, all the regulations that are passed by the department, who is familiar with seizures, with all the routine of the department, who knows the interpretation to be given to the various items of the tariff, the various regulations that are being passed, who can assist the minister to receive delegations, and who can be a supervisor of all the work done in the department and be in a position, by his knowledge and experience, to control it. This is an absolute necessity; otherwise, the officers at present in the department could not cope with the work.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): A little further down the list I notice a supervisor of refund claims and further on four checkers. Will the minister explain just what are the duties of supervisor of refund claims?

Mr. BUREAU: Those are refunds of overpaid duties. All those claims for refunds, after they have passed through the hands of customs officer at the port, come to the department, and they have to be checked and controlled. This supervisor certifies all claims that are made and the moneys paid back for refunds.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Do I understand that those are corrections that have been made by officers of the department? In other words, are they mistakes that must be corrected?

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, very often a man will import some goods, and they turn out to be not according to the order. In that case, if, within the time allowed by law, he returns the goods, he is entitled to a refund, because he does not use them. There may be errors in the invoice or in the appraisal. Sometimes, machinery that comes to this country does not suit the purpose for which it was ordered. It is returned, and it would not be fair to keep the money collected as duty upon such goods. We refund the money to the importers. I understand that the money saved pays the salary of the officer in charge, and the staff as well, ten times over.

Mr. BROWN: Does the refund include the moneys that are paid back to certain manufacturers when goods are exported?

Mr. BUREAU: The manufacturers are given a drawback of 99 per cent of the duty on raw materials entering into the manufacture of goods that they export.

Mr. EVANS: The minister says that the important thing is to collect the revenue. I would suggest that the really important thing is to retain the revenue, and not pay some $15,000,000 back to the manufacturers in the form of a drawback. What percentage of the duty is paid in the shape of drawback, and on what articles?

Mr. BUREAU: It would be difficult to answer that question in detail offhand.

Mr. EVANS: Does the minister think that it is good business to pay $10,000 for handling $15,000,000 in the way of drawback? My hon. friends to the right contend that we should have a tariff in order to get a revenue. Well, is it a sane policy to pay $15,000,000 in the form of a drawback on raw material when our own natural resources are undeveloped?

Mr. BUREAU: A rebate of 99 per cent of the duty on raw materials entering into the manufacture of articles that are exported is allowed. The manufacturing of these goods provides labour in Canada, and we desire to encourage our export trade. We lose nothing. We did not have the raw material, but we had the benefit of the labour, and we keep one per cent of the duty to pay expenses.

Mr. BROWN: I would ask the question put by the ex-Minister of Finance so persistently in the Tariff Commission: Where do you get your revenue?

Mr. BUREAU: We get it from the articles that are imported and remain in Canada for consumption. We get our revenue from the excise and income taxes and the sales tax. That is where we get our revenue; but we want to encourage Canadian industry.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. BUREAU: If foreign material is required for the manufacture of goods in Canada we tell the manufacturer to bring in that material and pay the duty, and when he exports the goods we will refund 99 per cent, keeping one per cent for the trouble of putting through the entry.

Mr. CRERAR: I want to draw a point to the attention of the minister and also to the notice of my hon. friends to the right, who appear to be getting a great deal of satisfaction out of his remarks. We import steel and iron from the United States for the manufacture of agricultural implements. On that material we pay a duty. The Canadian manufacturer makes the implements and if he sells them in Canada the cost to the Canadian consumer is increased by the extent of that duty. I think my hon. friend will agree in that statement. If, however, the manufacturer exports those implements to the United States he gets a drawback on the duty. So that the actual fact of the matter is that our Canadian manufacturers are thereby enabled to supply the American farmer with Canadian implements cheaper than the Canadian farmer can obtain them in Canada. Does the minister think that that is a desirable policy?

[Mr. Evans.]

Mr. BUREAU: Rolled steel and pig iron when used in the manufacture of mowing machines, reapers, harvesters, binders, and attachments for binders get a drawback of 99 per cent. The American does not enjoy the advantage of making the implements, and I do not think that Canadian implements, by reason of the drawback, sell cheaper in the United States than in Canada.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. BUREAU: I am glad to have even one solitary voice in support of my remarks. My hon. friend says that these implements would be cheaper in the United States than in Canada. I am not able to go into that question now, because I do not know the price of agricultural implements in the United States, but it has been the practice to pay this drawback and it is intended to encourage manufacturing on this side of the line. If you have to import raw material it is only fair that when you do not consume the finished product here you should get a rebate upon it. We do not lose anything because our workmen are employed.

Mr. EVANS: What are the chief articles on which this drawback is paid?

Mr. BUREAU: There are various kinds of raw material on which the drawback is paid, but I cannot name them offhand. If the hon. member will put a question on the Order Paper I will see that he gets the information.

Mr. HALBERT: Does the minister think that one per cent pays the full expense in connection with this matter?

Mr. BUREAU: I am informed, not.

Mr. HALBERT: I was thinking that if it did, and you could run the whole department as cheaply as that, you could save money.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): Is it not a fact that a drawback is paid on the duty on raw materials that go into the manufacture of implements sold in Canada?

Mr. BUREAU: In the Customs Tariff Act, at page 96, under the heading "Goods subject to drawback for home consumption" in article, No. 1002, there is a list of articles on which a drawback is given.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That provision was made at the time of the last reduction in duties on these articles. Is it not a fact that by means of the rebate or drawback as it is called on the raw material, the export trade thus developed adds to the scale of production that it brings down the cost of the manufactured article in the home country?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. EVANS: Why is it that we do not use our raw materials in the manufacture of these goods? Since we are told that we should develop our natural resources, why do we import such raw material as iron and steel and other things that enter into the manufacture of implements to-day when our own forests and mines abound in these things and 250,000 men are idle at home? Is this the policy that we are going to maintain as a national policy?

Mr. MILLAR: Mr. Chairman, I asked a question a little time ago, but I did not get an answer from you, nor from the minister, and I rather think he treated it as a joke. I should like to know now, through the chairman, if remarks regarding export liquor houses in dry provinces are in order?

Mr. BUREAU: That matter will come up later, Mr. Chairman, when the outside service is discussed. I did not treat the question as a joke. It is a very serious question and I am ready to discuss it with my hon. friend when the other estimates come up.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I understood that point to be well covered by your ruling, Mr. Chairman, on the first day that estimates were submitted. You then ruled that the general policy of the department, whether directly or indirectly connected with the item before the committee, might be discussed within reasonable limits. Therefore with that ruling in effect it is perfectly clear that the hon. member is in order in discussing the outside service.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the question?

Mr. MILLAR: The province voted "dry" by a very large majority, and yet there are export liquor houses in operation that can not be controlled by the provincial government, and up to the present time the federal government has refused to take action for their suppression. Those houses serve as supply depots for the bootlegger, and also for those who are running liquor across the line into the United States, cars going backwards and forwards at all hours of the night. The work of the police who are kept there in an effort to control the situation leads sometimes to danger to life, because these liquor runners are armed and desperate men. What is the attitude of the minister towards these export liquor houses?

Mr. BUREAU: I do not think they are under our jurisdiction, Mr. Chairman, because they are duty-paid liquor stores, and the moment we get our duty we have no more control over them. If my hon. friend means there are any bonded warehouses, my reply is that we do not grant any licenses for them unless we have the consent of the attorney general in the province. There are only two bonded warehouses in Saskatchewan, the licenses for which were granted long ago. I think my hon. friend is dealing with a matter which comes more under the jurisdiction of the provincial government than of this Government.

Mr. MILLAR: There are more than two. I think I am using the proper term, "export liquor houses."

Mr. BUREAU: They are not bonded warehouses.

Mr. MILLAR: I have received several petitions from local people protesting against those export liquor houses. The Minister of Agriculture was, I believe, in the provincial house when this controversy took place. The provincial government has always taken the attitude that it has gone as far as it possibly could in barring those houses.

Mr. BUREAU: It is not a matter within our jurisdiction.

Mr. MILLAR: The question has been discussed many times as to who is responsible, and we are led by the provincial authorities to believe that the federal government is responsible.

Mr. BUREAU: No, Mr. Chairman. They are not bonded warehouses, they are duty-paid warehouses, and entirely under the control of the provincial government. I am informed that there are only two bonded warehouses in Saskatchewan, and that the licenses for those were granted quite a while ago. I am also informed that the licensees have only been granted sufficient time to liquidate their stock, and have no right to import any more liquor.

Mr. MILLAR: I am told there are seventeen such houses.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it not a fact that the licenses were granted under the approval of the attorney general of the province?

Mr. BUREAU: That has been and still is the policy of the department. We do not grant any licenses unless we get the approval of the Attorney General attached to the petition for the license; at the same time we have the designation of the warehouse by him.

Mr. GOULD: Perhaps I can throw a little light on the subject. The majority of the warehouses referred to by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Millar) are in the electoral district of Assiniboia, and, along with him, I have received many petitions protesting against their continuance. Likewise, I personally know of some of the acts done because of these warehouses. I believe there are twelve or fifteen on the southern line in my own electoral district.

Mr. BUREAU: They are not ours.

Mr. GOULD: Last year I placed questions on the Order Paper concerning those warehouses, and the replies given to me by the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue I accepted in good faith. Those replies were to the effect that the Dominion Government did not have any bonded warehouses there. Premier Martin took exception to that, and I believe he carried on a discussion with the then Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue, contending that the Dominion government was responsible, and repudiating the answers which had been given to me. When I returned home I complained that I had not been taken into the confidence of the premier of Saskatchewan and that in the provincial campaign he had used the information given to me by the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue.

As it appears to me the circumstances are these. On our referendum in Saskatchewan we voted for only a partially "dry" province, and not for a "bone dry" province. But it appears that certain liquor interests throughout Canada—and the charge is made that Jewish capitalists are at the back of it all—made application to the provincial government for the privilege of erecting warehouses in Saskatchewan. In my questions I used the word "license," but it seems that the authorities of Saskatchewan contended that I should have employed the word "tax." A tax of $1,000 was imposed for the privilege of erecting each of these liquor houses. I believe that at the last session of the legislature that tax was increased to $5,000. In correspondence and in discussion I have taken the ground: If you want to carry out the wishes of the people of the province, as expressed in the referendum, why do you not impose a million dollar tax?

It seems to me that if the license had not been granted by the provincial govenrment the federal government would have had nothing whatever to do with the export business, because the buildings would not have been there. I protest in the name of decency and good government against those buildings being permitted, because the traffic carried on by means of them is a menace to life and property and a disgrace and shame to the community. The women in those localities fear to remain alone because of the traffic that is being carried on by the rum-runners, desperate characters that come in all the way from as far south as Oklahoma in big cars, as many as eight such cars loaded with liquor leaving one small town in an afternoon. This is a condition that I object to, and I would be glad if something could be done to remedy it. For myself—and I am sure I speak also for my people—if it is a matter of the department losing revenue, I would rather see it go without one cent of revenue if the result would be to do away with the abuses to which I refer.

Mr. BUREAU: The liquor to which my hon. friend refers is duty paid liquor, stored with the consent and on the responsibility of the provincial government. We did not get a cent of revenue from it. It was in the province before the law came into force. The moment the duty on it was paid, the liquor belonged to the individual and the Crown had no control over it. There are no bonded warehouses for export licensed by the Dominion government in Saskatchewan, with the exception of the two that I have just referred to. These two were licensed with the approval of the Attorney General of Saskatchewan.

Mr. BAXTER: I would not like the statement made by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), that the cost of Canadian goods to the Canadian consumer is increased by the duty, to pass wholly without challenge. There was a case not long ago in New Brunswick where it became necessary, through default under a contract, for the person entitled to certain goods to purchase them in the American rather than in the Canadian market. The result was that with practically the same freight mileage, the cost of a farm article of similar character delivered in New Brunswick was higher than the Canadian cost by the amount of the duty, showing that the Canadian manufacturer did not take advantage of the duty. The statement of the hon. member for Marquette was, no doubt, made in good faith, but I think it was an attempt to sum up the prejudices of the party which he leads against the customs tariff of this country. It may have been based upon an observation made at some time or in some place under fortuitous circumstances, but in my judgment it is not a correct summing up of the general operation of the tariff. The round of applause with which he was greeted was not so much an expression of a concurrence in his view as it was a protest against the administration of a customs tariff.

Mr. IRVINE: In answer to a question put, I think, by the hon. member for Marquette, did I understand the minister to say that the increase of $10,000 was due in part to his employing certain persons who would leave the department when he left?

Mr. BUREAU: Part of the increase is due to that.

Mr. IRVINE: Is that ordinary patronage?

Mr. BUREAU: It is ordinary necessity, for the proper working of the minister's office.

Mr. IRVINE: I do not think it is ordinary necessity. I am opposed to the voting of $10,000 simply in order that a minister may have his staff leave when he goes. It is bad policy, because the efficiency they have acquired while under him is lost to the country. I am opposed to that kind of thing.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): The right hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Meighen) made the statement that the practice of paying drawback claims on raw material entering into the manufacture of implements sold in Canada commenced seven or eight years ago, at the time of the reduction of the duties on agricultural implements. Is that correct?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I said I thought it took place on the occasion of the last reduction. But it may not have been at that time, for there was a reduction since—I think it was in the spring of 1919. I am not positive as to my information, but that is my impression.

Mr. KENNEDY (Glengarry): I thought it was rather new light on this subject of the reduction of the duties on agricultural implements. The minister has in his department a tax-collecting organization, and within it there is another and smaller organization to hand back a portion of the taxes he collects. As has been suggested, the most important function of the tax-collecting agency is to retain the taxes collected. I submit that the minister should consider the advisability of adopting a saner policy in this regard and do away with the organization which has been set up within his department—not by him, of course—for the purpose of handing back a portion of the taxes taken in. He has a supervisor with assistants who receive salaries amounting to $8,000 for the purposes of these refunds. Would it not be better for the department simply to collect such taxes as they intend to keep?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Can the minister give us any information as to the amounts refunded on duties collected on farm tractors under $1,400 in value? A rebate of these duties was authorized, I understand, in 1919. Some hon. gentlemen to our left have been criticizing the refund of duties, and I think it is important that the committee should know how much is refunded on tractors inported into Canada for farm purposes.

Mr. BUREAU: All tractors valued at $1,400 and under were entered free of duty under the order of remission and refund. There was no refund, because they were entered free.

Mr. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): How is it that Canadian manufacturers are importing steel and iron from the United States or elsewhere when we have down in Nova Scotia a steel industry whose workmen are employed only on half time? Is that encouraging home industry?

Mr. BUREAU: That is a matter I would have to consult the manufacturers about. It is more related to their business than to the administration of this department.

Mr. CALDWELL: With regard to the remark of the hon. gentleman for St. John and Albert (Mr. Baxter), he surely knew better than to make the statement he did that the duty does not enhance the cost of goods purchased in Canada. Does my hon. friend tell me that Henry Ford does not take advantage of the duty on automobiles when we are paying $260 more for a car on the Canadian side than on the American side?

I was also surprised to hear the ex-Minister of Finance say that farm machinery did not sell dearer in Canada than the United States, because when the Tariff Commission sat in New Brunswick last year I supplied the commission with a very comprehensive list setting forth the figures at which a certain firm was selling farm machinery in New Brunswick and in the state of Maine, at two points only six miles apart. The figures were very much higher for New Brunswick than the state of Maine. We paid as much as $65 more for a potato sprayer in New Brunswick than our neighbours paid for the same article in the state of Maine. This present year we are paying $9 per ton more than they are paying in Maine for the same fertilizer shipped from a Canadian factory. I have the two price lists on my file upstairs, printed in a Canadian office, for fertilizer shipped from a Canadian factory. Going into the state of Maine, this fertilizer passes over two roads, and a longer haul, whereas it has only one road to pass over to reach the county of Carleton; yet it is selling for $9 more per ton in Carleton county than in the state of Maine. There is absolutely no manufacturing done at this fertilizer plant in Canada; they simply import the chemicals free of duty, mix the ingredients, barrel the fertilizer, ship it out, and sell it to the American consumer $9 per ton cheaper than to the New Brunswick consumer. Last year the difference in the price was $15 per ton; I have those price lists too on my file upstairs, on the company's own bill head, for this fertilizer shipped from a Canadian plant.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Would the minister say how much was expended under this vote last year?

Mr. BUREAU: This is the first year of consolidation so it is pretty hard to tell, but I am informed that practically the whole salary list was paid, and that about $42,000 was expended under contingencies, with some bills still to come in.

Mr. McTAGGART: I understood the minister to say that the total revenue for excise and customs in 1921 was approximately $209,000,000 collected at a cost of approximately $5,000,000. How much of that was excise and how much customs revenue?

Mr. BUREAU: The customs revenue for 1920-21 was $179,695,137.72 and excise $116,918,750.31.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Caldwell.]

Charges of Management—amount to be voted, $965,000.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): It will be noticed there is a small reduction in the offices of the Assistant Receivers General and Country Savings Banks. This is due to some readjustment and the dropping of some temporary clerks.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And the closing of one office I think.

Mr. FIELDING: I think perhaps so. There is an increase, apparently a large one, for printing, advertising, inspection, express and so forth. That is largely accounted for by the express charges on gold. As the House is aware, the export of gold from the Dominion by private parties is forbidden; the gold from our mines is received by the Government and refined at the Mint. Then we have to express it to the United States, and the express charges on our shipments to the United States have increased very largely, but a gratifying feature of that increase is that it really represents a large increase in the output of our gold mines. For example, in 1918 our Canadian gold refined at the Mint was about 300,000 ounces; in 1919, 500,000 ounces; in 1920, 750,000 ounces, and in 1921, 1,100,000 ounces. All this passed through the Mint and had to be sent to the United States. That is the chief explanation of that increase.

10 p.m.

There is a small increase for brokerage on the purchase of sinking funds, but that is governed entirely by the amount that may be purchased.

At the bottom of the list there is an increase of $100,000 for clerical assistance in connection with the transfer and registration of bonds, the flotation of loans, and so forth. The House is aware that we have to look forward to the issuing of very large refunding loans. That is the chief explanation for the very considerable increase in this item.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: With respect to the last item, I take it from what the minister says that this is to cover the cost of a refunding loan for the issue of $184,000,000 falling due in December. I take it that it is for the purpose of looking after a domestic loan that this money will be required.

Mr. FIELDING: I think that is probably correct, although we have not yet made any final determination. It is, however, for refunding a domestic loan.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The only reason I rose was to say that if it was for a foreign loan, accompanied with the usual underwriting, and the like, the increase seems unnecessary, but if it is for a domestic loan there is no doubt my hon. friend requires the vote.

Mr. GARDINER: Would the minister explain the item of $400,000 for printing Dominion notes?

Mr. FIELDING: This is the same amount as voted last year. It is the amount paid to the company which has the contract for printing our Dominion notes. There has been in that service of late years a considerable increase, explained simply by the volume of notes which the trade of the country requires.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend referred to the question of refunding loans. I think in one of the early discussions of the session reference was made to some financing in New York in regard to railway loans, and the remark was made, I think, by my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) that he approved of that method of financing, because it avoided the payment of commission. I should like to know from my hon. friend the minister whether or not that loan of $11,000,000 in New York was arranged without the payment of any brokers' commission.

Mr. FIELDING: I contemplated at a later stage making a full explanation of that, but I have no objection to answer at once. We did not exactly advertise, but invited proposals from leading financial houses in New York. They named their price and we got their price, and no commission in any shape or form was paid, as far as I am aware.

Item agreed to.

Uuforeseen expenses, expenditure thereof to be under Order in Council, and a detailed statement to be laid before parliament within fifteen days of next session, $75,000.

Mr. FIELDING: Experience has shown that the appropriation in that respect has been insufficient, and we have been called upon to meet the difficulty by Governor General's warrant. I think it will be found that we will require the whole sum. It is difficult to estimate in advance what may be required. Experience has shown that $40,000 is insufficient.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I would like to ask what the amount paid last year was, and for what purpose?

Mr. FIELDING: The deputy informs me that, including the Governor General's warrant, the expenditure of the last year will be about $78,000.

Item agreed to.

Grant to the National Battlefields' Commission:

(a) for expenses of administration..	$ 6,000
(b) for expenses of the National Battlefields' Park..	35,000
(c) for maintenance of Martello towers	1,000

Mr. CHURCH: With reference to this vote for the National Battlefields' Commission which has done good work, while there is no objection to this expenditure for maintenance of the national battlefield's park in the province of Quebec, I should like to ask the Government to consider the advisability of extending this work to other portions of Canada. I might refer to the ruined battlefields of the war of 1812 in the Niagara district. It would be a good thing for the people of Canada if something were done to commemorate and mark these battlefields. Those in the Niagara district are to-day in ruins and nobody knows who owns them. I hope the Government will take this matter up and do something. Then, there are the battlefields of the North West Rebellion, 1885, and also of the war of 1837. I hope this Government will consider this matter and extend these grants so as to include the various other battlefields in other parts of Canada which are in a neglected condition. I hope the Finance Minister will give the House some idea as to whether it is the intention of the Government to extend this work to the other battlefields of Canada. People from the United States who have visited the Niagara district have been much surprised that Canada is so far behind the times. If you go to Chattanooga in the southern states, and to the valley of the Cumberland, where Grant made his reputation in the war between the North and South, you will see how the United States people have remembered those who fought for their country, and have beautified the battlefields and have commemorated the deeds of the fallen.

I realize, of course, the financial situation and the high cost of money, labour and materials in these days, but I hope the Government will look into the matter with particular reference to the Niagara district.

Mr. FIELDING: I am thankful for what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Church) has said, and I am sure his words will meet with the sympathy of the House. For the moment, I could not make any official statement, but his suggestion will receive due consideration. I can only deal with this particular appropriation which is confined to Quebec, but the matter as mentioned by my hon. friend will not escape our attention.

Item agreed to.

Canadian Press Limited.. .. .. .. $50,000
Canadian Press Limited.. 8,000

Mr. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): I would like an explanation of these two items. I do not understand them.

Mr. FIELDING: The general object of these items, I think, ought to commend itself to the House. It is intended to assist the Canadian press in the distribution of news in a larger way than they could possibly do with their own resources. I think there is very strong reason why we should try to make the different sections of Canada better acquainted with one another. The press is not always wealthy. There is a long stretch of country between our eastern provinces and our western provinces which produces nothing in the way of revenue to the newspapers and it is, I think, largely for the purpose of bridging that long distance. At all events, it is not a source of any great wealth to the Canadian press. It helps them to give service which they otherwise would not give, and I think it is of the utmost importance that the various sections of Canada should be better informed of what is going on, each knowing the other section of Canada better than it does to-day. How far this is effected by the appropriation is a matter to be considered. I think the object of the appropriation is one which will readily commend itself to the House.

Mr. EVANS: I would like to ask the minister if all the newspapers in the country will receive a subsidy out of this fund?

Mr. FIELDING: I think it is open to all who are willing to participate and to contribute their share of the expense.

Mr. EVANS: I ask this question, because I read the other day, in one of our most influential journals, that it was a kind of tyrannical institution; that it has the right to say who shall be members of it, what papers shall be established, what shall be sold and so on.

[Mr. Fielding.]

Mr. FIELDING: It is an association of newspapers, and I suppose, like all other associations, they make their own regulations for their government. I am informed that no representations have been made by any newspaper against it. My impression is that every newspaper in Canada has an opportunity of participating in it, if the proprietors are willing to do so. If that is not the case, I shall be glad to look into the matter, because the association should be open to all.

Item agreed to.

Canadian Press Ltd., $8,000.

Mr. FIELDING: This is a continuation of an old grant designed for cable service between Great Britain and Canada. It was established a good many years ago, and I believe I had something to do with the establishment of it. It was a service in which the late John Ross Robertson took a warm interest; he was its chief advocate and promoter. It has been continued in later years, and, so far as I know, it has given satisfactory service. It is distinct from the ordinary news service in Canada; it is devoted to cable service.

Item agreed to.

Grant to the Victorian Order of Nurses, $5,000.

Mr. FIELDING: This is a grant that has been given for a number of years, and I think the committee generally realizes that the service is an excellent one.

Item agreed to.

Grant in aid of the Canadian General Council of the Boy Scouts Association, $15,000.

Mr. McMASTER: What was the amount last year?

Mr. FIELDING: This is a case in which we are increasing the grant. The cases in which increases have been made are not very numerous. It was represented that the service was a very deserving one—indeed, we all feel that—and that it needed this additional amount. Indeed, a larger grant was asked. His Excellency the Governor General is Chief Scout; but Dr. Robertson, whom we all know in connection with the agricultural work of the country, is its chief director, and it was his eloquent persuasion that induced us to put this increased item in. It is an object which has the sympathy of the country generally, and that is my justification, if it be a justification, in asking for an increase.

Mr. McMASTER: There are, throughout the country, hundreds of worthy organizations that deserve grants if we had the money to subscribe to them; but in the financial position in which this country is now, I do not think we should increase three times the Government grant to this very worthy object. I am not complaining about the Boy Scouts; no doubt they do splendid work, but this does not seem to be the proper time for increasing the expenses of the country. We have given a grant of $5,000 to the Victorian Order of Nurses this year, and I think they received the same amount last year. I am not complaining about that. Someone says that they should have $10,000. I suppose if they had all the money we would like them to have, they might have $25,000 or $100,000. That is not the point. There are hundreds of worthy objects throughout the country, and that we should single out this worthy object for three times the grant of last year is something that I would like to protest against respectfully.

Mr. MARLER: Can my hon. friend point to a more worthy object, one that has more far-reaching effects than the Boy Scouts Association?

Mr. McMASTER: I do not know whether I am called upon or have a right to judge of the Boy Scouts as compared with hundreds of other worthy organizations. That is not the point. My hon. friend (Mr. Marler) has not quite grasped the point. I thought I had made it perfectly clear that this is an excellent institution. But until we meet, with ordinary revenue, the ordinary expenditure of this country, I, as a member of this House, and as representing the farming classes of the eastern townships, who are seeing their own revenues cut in half, am going to protest against any increase in the public expenditure of this country except for absolute necessities.

Mr. MARLER: I accept my hon. friend's rebuke and, no doubt, the House does, in the same spirit.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I wish to go on record as most heartily supporting the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) in opposing this $10,000 increase.

Mr. FIELDING: The speech of the hon. member for Brome is so much in line with my thought on other questions that I have difficulty in dissenting from it. I am not going to break my heart if the committee does not want to increase this grant. It is for the committee to decide. There are exceptions to all rules and if there is anything in which we are willing to make an exception, it would be in regard to the boys of the country who are going to be the men of to-morrow, the men who will be our successors at no distant date. I think this Boy Scout movement is a very commendable one; but I am not going to urge this inceased grant on the committee. If any hon. gentleman thinks this a grave departure from our sound policy of economy, he can divide the committee on the question; but I am not going to support him; I am going to have the liberty of voting against striking it out. I am not, however, going to urge this upon the committee at this late hour.

Mr. FORKE: I am just as anxious for economy as any one in this House and will cut down the estimates wherever possible; but I have had some experience of the Boy Scout movement, and as I have no boys of my own, I am not speaking for myself in this case at least. There is no greater or more important work being carried on in Canada to-day than the Boy Scout movement. I have great respect for the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) but I do not think he has looked at this matter in all its bearings and in every phase in which we might consider it. As has already been remarked to-night, the boys will be the men of to-morrow; they will take up the burden, and I hope they will carry the flag a great deal better than their fathers have done. No dollar that is spent is lost when it is spent in bettering the conditions of these same boys. I have much pleasure in supporting this appropriation at this particular time.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I have much pleasure in endorsing what the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Forke) has just said regarding the Boy Scouts. I have a boy who is a Scout, and I do not think this money is thrown away. I think it is one of the best expenditures the country can make.

Mr. WARD: I wish to concur in all that the hon. member for Brandon has said; but I can go back to my constituency and find a whole army of boys who have not clothes enough to go to school with, and it is a crime for us to spend money in this way while there are boys who have not clothes to go to school with and whose parents have not money with which to buy them proper clothes.

Item agreed to.

Loan to provincial governments to encourage the erection of dwelling houses, $9,550,080.

Mr. FIELDING: It was originally provided that $25,000,000 might be devoted to this purpose. Some money has been spent from year to year, and this is the balance of the $25,000,000. It takes the shape of a loan to the provinces that avail themselves of the arrangement, and as they pay interest it is not an unprofitable expenditure.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: While the original appropriation was $25,000,000, my recollection is that last year, owing to representations by the Committee on Soldiers' Re-establishment, the Dominion held itself open to increase the appropriation to $31,000,000 in order to make further advances to the provinces in proportion to population. Have any provinces taken advantage of that offer?

Mr. FIELDING: The amounts paid to date are:

Nova Scotia	$1,100,000
Manitoba	1,975,000
Ontario	8,750,000
New Brunswick	1,525,000
British Columbia	1,701,600
Quebec	2,056,620

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Have any provinces received their full quota?

Mr. FIELDING: Manitoba and New Brunswick, I understand, have taken their full proportion. The original appropriation was increased in order to allow an additional grant to be made to Ontario, but it is based on population.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As I understand it, this is merely a revote of what was unspent last year.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Mr. McBRIDE: Is this money spent by the provinces in organized or unorganized districts?

Mr. FIELDING: The provinces determine on their own responsibility how the money shall be expended. They deal with the details. We advance the money and they are free to apply it subject to the general regulations.

Mr. McBRIDE: There should be an understanding that the unorganized districts should have the same privilege as the organized districts. I know a great many farmers in our district who would like to take advantage of the loan, but they cannot participate in it because they are not in an organized district. It is not right for us to advance money that serves the purpose of increasing the population of the cities. The cities are top heavy, and we should give more consideration to the country.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend's district will have to look to the provincial government. I have no doubt that, in any case, the provincial government would be desirous to meet all demands. It is not, however, for us here to say how they shall spend the money. We loan the money and they must take the responsibility for its application.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think that we have already advanced British Columbia its full quota.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes, British Columbia has received its full share.

Item agreed to.

Grant in aid of the Dominion Council of the Girl Guides, $3,000.

Mr. FIELDING: The member for South-east Grey (Miss Macphail) is not present. If she were she might possibly claim that we were not dealing fairly with the Girl Guides. This is an appropriation that has been made for several years, however, and I am sure it will have the sympathy of the committee.

Mr. McMASTER: If the Boy Scouts have been trebled, why not the Girl Guides? I believe in equality between sexes.

Mr. FIELDING: If my hon. friend will serve notice that we ought to increase the grant we will take it into consideration.

Item agreed to.

To provide for Canada's proportionate share of the cost of expenditure made by the Imperial War Graves Commission—probable amount required, $669,410.

Mr. FIELDING: This is our share under an agreement between the Imperial authorities and the Canadian government. The Imperial War Graves Commission have intimated that they will need this amount during the year.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I suppose the House may assume that the difference in vote is not the result of any change of policy, but is merely carrying out the request of the commission?

Mr. FIELDING: Entirely so. We have made no change of policy whatever.

Civil Government—Health—salaries, $147,307.50; Contingencies, $71,000; Total, $218,307.50.

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): Is there any satisfactory reason for the increase of $4,000 for travelling expenses?

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Health): This increase is mainly in connection with the enforcement of the Opium and Narcotic Drugs Act. Illicit trade in these drugs is apparently on the increase in some of the provinces, especially in the large cities, and to cope with the situation it is necessary for our officials to travel more than in previous years. Their travelling expenses are very closely controlled and examined by the department. There may be some portion of the increase connected with the Food and Drugs Act, but the main increase is in connection with the Opium and Narcotic Drugs Act.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister I know has given very close attention to this matter. Could he state whether he will be prepared to introduce any amendment of the act to meet the representations recently made to him?

Mr. BELAND: It has been my privilege to receive an important delegation from British Columbia, composed of members from that province regardless of their political affiliations, and of some gentlemen from outside, in connection with the suppression of this illicit traffic. The matter is receiving our most earnest and favourable consideration in so far as some amendment of the act is concerned. I cannot say to-night what the nature of the amendment will be, but we hope to be in a position to satisfy my hon. friend and those who accompanied him in the delegation.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: What was the cost of the department last year in regard to salaries?

Mr. BELAND: The amount expended to date is $135,496.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: Will an opportunity for discussing the Inspection Act as applied to immigrants be afforded when the main Estimates are brought down? I assume that that medical inspection takes place under this act?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: As there was an expenditure of only $135,000, I suppose the saving was occasioned by dropping certain employees?

Mr. BELAND: The difference between the amount asked for last year, $157,000, and that asked for this year, $147,000, is accounted for by the transferring to the Food and Drugs Act branch of a number of analysts and one food inspector because they reside outside Ottawa.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid my hon. friend does not quite catch my point. He is showing why he can get along more cheaply this year than last; but I was rather wondering why it is costing more money to get along this year, because while $157,000 was voted last year, as a matter of fact only $135,000 was expended, yet my hon. friend wants $147,000 this year. There is an increase in expenditure with a reduced staff.

Mr. BELAND: A number of those officials were made permanent during the year, and consequently they are paid for only a part of the year.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is it not a fact that the work of this department has decreased through the administration of the Fertilizer Act being transferred to the seed branch under the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. BELAND: I am informed that this is a very small item indeed.

Item agreed to.

Civil Government—Royal Canadian Mounted Police—salaries and contingencies, $52,245.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Militia and Defence): Mr. Chairman, as we have already agreed in the House that there shall be a reduction in the Mounted Police force, I have suggested to the commissioner and the comptroller that we should not provide by these estimates for any additional permanent employees. I would therefore move that the item for salaries be reduced by $5,982.50, and that the figure "10" under the first column, 1922-23, page 83, be changed to "2".

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: In view of the large decrease in numbers, I suggest that my hon. friend might simply take last year's vote.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is a slight increase to provide for the statutory increases in salary for the present employees. We shall have to let that stand as it is until we decide what reduction shall be made in the Mounted Police.

Mr. LEWIS: If you are going to take away this provision for eight additional employees, why make the reduction only $5,000?

Mr. GRAHAM: The reduction is practically $6,000; it is $5,982.50.

Item agreed to.

Civil Government — annuities — salaries, $22,320.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This department was attached to the Post Office Department, but it has been transferred to the Department of Labour.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has any further progress been made in the sale of annuities?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I shall have to wait until the items in the main Estimates are under consideration. I cannot say offhand what progress has been made.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 10.48 p.m.

The House met at three o'clock.

THE GRAIN TRADE

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION

Mr. W. F. KAY (Missisquoi): I move that the second report of the committee on Agriculture and Colonization be concurred in.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the report, concurrence in which is now sought, comes from the Committee on Agriculture which met about five days ago. It reads:

> That without delaying investigation by this committee as to the advisability of the re-establishment of the Canada Wheat Board, the matter of the constitutionality of such re-establishment be referred to the Supreme Court of Canada and that every effort be made to secure decision at an early date.

There had been, in this connection, referred to the Committtee on Agriculture the subject of handling the wheat of this country, and although the reference was not correctly or, at least, not adequately made, the intention was, no doubt, to ask the committee to consider the subject in three aspects: First, whether the Wheat Board, with all its old powers and duties, should be re-established; or, second, whether there should be established a Government organization to handle and dispose of wheat committed to it by the voluntary act of the producers; or, third, whether the whole question should be left to what was described as co-operative action on the part of the producers themselves. The reason I say that the matter was intended to be referred in that form is because, in that form, the intended reference was described by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in his speech on the Address. Consequently, though the words of commitment were narrow, I apprehend that a third report recommending a fuller reference will be adopted and the reference widened accordingly. It will be recalled that the former Wheat Board, that is the Wheat Board, established by Order in Council of July 31, 1919, which Order in Council was continued by this House very shortly afterwards in the same year and later on confirmed by legislation in the spring of last year, had very ample powers in a sense, indeed, monopolistic powers. It had certain control over the elevator system of our country and over the transportation of grain committed to it, and certain priorities and extraordinary rights which at the time it was deemed wise to repose in the board. That Wheat Board was discontinued—or rather the time that was originally given to it as its term of life expired, and consequently, no act of discontinuance was essential. It handled the wheat crop of 1919, and having so disposed of its duties, it ceased to exist. In the spring of 1920, there being some doubt at that time as to what would be the condition of the buying market in Europe, and also as to what would be the policy of the United States, whether that country would remain in control, in some form or another, of its wheat marketing, or whether it would revert to the old marketing conditions, Parliament, on the advice of the government of the day, passed legislation empowering such government, if in its opinion conditions so demanded, to restore or to continue the Wheat Board as it had been established, for the purpose of taking in hand the crop of 1920. The government of the day did not exercise that power. European countries were no longer purchasing, as they had been doing, through the single agency of the British Government, which in turn acted through the British Wheat Commission, but were buying through agencies—although Government agencies—active in competition the one with the other. Besides, the United States Government had abandoned all attempts at wheat control, or marketing control of any description as regards grain, reverting instead to the old market conditions. In view of these facts the late Dominion government exercising its judgment did not re-establish the board.

Some time after, a grain inquiry commission was instituted under the Inquiries Act, upon complaint, which had become very general, that there were abuses in connection with the handling of the grain trade of western Canada. That commission was enjoined; the Order in Council establishing it was challenged, and that Order in Council was declared invalid by a judge of the King's Bench of Manitoba. Subsequently, upon appeal—and in all modesty I call this to the attention of the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), whom, had he not shown the contrary in his speech on the Address, one would have expected to be already aware of the fact—the validity of the Order in Council was established, the powers of the Government to pass it were confirmed. This matter was decided by the Court of Appeal of Manitoba.

In view of the evidence adduced before that commission, and in view of the very evident condition of dissatisfaction throughout the West over the whole question of purchase, storage, financing and disposal of its grain, I, in the late campaign, proposed an alternative, namely, the second alternative recited by the Prime Minister in his speech on the Address: that is to say, the establishment, not of a board with compulsory powers, not of a single agency excluding all other agencies of sale, but of a board with ample powers to receive, move, finance, and finally sell, and distribute the proceeds of, all grain committed to its charge by the will of the producer. I am not proposing to discuss now the merits of this plan or of any of the plans to which I have made allusion; I do not purpose even to discuss whether or not the late government took the right course in this regard. That question does not arise on the motion of my hon. friend the Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture (Mr. Kay). But a review of the facts such as I have given is necessary in order that what I have to say anent this motion may be the better understood. The demand for the old Wheat Board that was made has been received by the committee who, proceeding to deal with the question, have made a report to the House that while they were considering the wisdom of its re-establishment—whether or not differing in personnel—the Government refer to the Supreme Court of Canada the question as to the power of this Parliament to establish such a board.

Now, I submit to the House that if we concur in this report it is going to be impossible to meet the situation for the coming summer. I do not pretend to judge the full measure of those who demand the establishment of the old Wheat Board with all its powers, but I do say that there is a very strong body of support for that proposal. Of its numbers, its strength, and its right to be heard before a committee of this House and this House itself, there is no question. But there are those among its numbers—I do not know what proportion, but I should say a substantial proportion, I think I can say the majority—who, while they urge strongly, under what they describe as abnormal conditions existing now, their right to the advantage of the old Wheat Board, with all the means of disposal it afforded, during this year and perhaps next year, at any rate while these conditions prevail; nevertheless do not ask that the board be established as a permanent institution. They insist only that it be put into operation to take care of the situation during this period of abnormalcy. Their insistence is mainly that it be established for the purpose of taking care of the wheat crop of this year. There are, I do not know how many, but doubtless a considerable number, who would favour the establishment of the board permanently. But however great their numbers may be, the number of those who want it, not on a permanent but on a temporary basis, is far greater. Of that there can be no question. Consequently this House, before it takes any step that will put it practically out of its power to comply with this demand, must very carefully decide, yes or no, thereto. Whether the demand is right or not, of its very nature it calls for a decision by this Parliament at an early date.

What will happen if this resolution carries? This House will have instructed the Government of the day to submit to the Supreme Court of Canada a definite question, namely: Is it within the competence of the Parliament of Canada to re-establish the Wheat Board with the powers vested in it under the Order in Council of July 31, 1919, as confirmed by Parliament? Be it noted, there is no question at issue at all as to the powers of the Governor in Council. The committee realized that fully in this report. There is no doubt at all that the Governor in Council has no such powers now; but the question is whether the Parliament of Canada has such powers. It was the Parliament of Canada that acted before. Parliament confirmed the action of the government, because the government had to act, if it took any action at all, before Parliament met, or there would have been no time to take in hand the 1919 crop. Parliament confirmed the government's action, and the question is: Has Parliament the right to do what Parliament actually did in the special session of 1919? If that question is submitted to the Supreme Court of Canada, assuming, as I do, that every effort will be made by the Government to prosecute the suit to a decision—I will not be asked to assume any more, indeed I think I am liberal enough when I assume that much—is there any substantial hope that we shall get a decision from the Supreme Court of Canada, upon which we can act, within such time as will enable us to dispose of the question at this session? Who are entitled to be heard before that tribunal? Well, the Government of Canada will be heard. They will undoubtedly be there by counsel, endeavouring, I presume, to establish the power of this Parliament. I would also expect that some, possibly all, of the provinces of Confederation, whether unitedly or separately, would appear before the Supreme Court on the issue. I would expect the Grain Exchange to appear before the court. Possibly the Grain Exchange would come individually, or perhaps forty companies strong, as it has been known to come before the courts of the country before. How many companies of the Grain Exchange are going to be heard? Can they be denied a hearing? I would expect, as well, the millers' association, and perhaps individual milling companies would want to be heard. I would expect that the railway companies would be there, and possibly our banks as well. It is a matter that interests in an important degree many great fields of enterprise in this country. There would be inevitably a warring clamour of interests before the court; and when any one of those interests could establish a prima facie case for postponement, how could the court deny a postponement? I know of interests that would have a lot to gain by a postponement; I know of interests who would desire postponement. In the hands of able lawyers, I do not know of any kind of case that is more easily made out, than a case for postponement, and I for one would despair, were I acting for the Government in such a connection, of any early decision, no matter how assiduous and vigorous was my conduct of the case.

But, suppose we get a decision, is there anything to prevent an appeal to the Privy Council? There will be one, you may be sure, if the case goes in favour of our powers. And if there is such an appeal who is going to take care of the 1922 crop of wheat?

But, beyond that, suppose my conjecture as to what is going to occur on the argument of this case before the Supreme Court is wrong, and we find lawyers, opposed perhaps from forty different angles, all in agreement to press the case to a decision in order that Parliament may act in the light of that decision; suppose that happens—which would be a miracle—what then? We get a decision. Is the decision going to be of great practical value? Is it going to be of a character that would enable Parliament to act in a practical way? I do not think it can be. In the original statute twenty-seven different powers were given to the Wheat Board; starting with A, B, C, continuing through the whole length of the alphabet, and still one more. There were multiplied duties besides imposed upon the Wheat Board. The Supreme Court would have the power to go into one and all of those powers and duties. But I do not know that it would do so. It might say: Here is a power that we find the Parliament of Canada cannot repose in the board; it is ultra vires; therefore we need not decide the other points at all.

But suppose the court went on and decided one and all, supposing they did everything, assume, indeed, a set of facts the most adverse to my contention possible, suppose they deal with A, B, C, and so on all through the list. What then? Assume they decide that we are ultra vires as to the whole twenty-seven, it might still be that by a modification, perhaps an unimportant modification, of each one we could come well within the powers of this Parliament, and at the same time establish a board so armed and equipped that it could substantially meet the ambitions and desires of those who seek this method of the disposal of their grain. The judgment, when it comes, shall not in all probability be such to enable us to act on it in a practical way.

To sum up what I have argued so far. First: follow this course and you are plunged into the caldron of litigation, from which in all human probability you will not emerge until it is too late for you to act with much value this session. Second: though there may be harmony, and all go smoothly to an early verdict, the judgment alone will not be of such a final, definitive and detailed character as to be what we want in building the fabric of legislation.

Then I am asked: What are we to do? Well, I would advise Parliament to say to the committee: Go back and do what has always been done,—take the advice of the law officers of the Crown. When you decide just what you want, the principle you want to follow, the body you want to establish, the powers you would like to give it, go and sit beside the law officers and ask them: How far in that direction can we go and be as safe as any one can be from the threat of injunction? There is no difficulty about taking that course. I know it may be said that possibly after you take their advice you may be faced with an injunction afterwards. Why, so you may be, whatever you do. But in the light of the decisions that have so far been handed down, particularly in the light of the decision a few months ago by the Court of Appeal of Manitoba, I do not think there would be any great difficulty on the part of the law officers of the Crown in so framing legislation that we would be tolerably, if not wholly, safe from the danger of successful injunction at the instance of any litigant.

Mr. CRERAR: Might I interrupt my right hon. friend? Is he arguing on the basis that the enactment by this Parliament would confer all the powers that the original Wheat Board had?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid I have not been fully understood. I say, suppose the committee decides: We would like the Wheat Board; but if we cannot have the Wheat Board with all its powers, we would like to get as close to those powers as we are sure we can safely go. Then let them express that desire through the Government to the Justice Department, and have the Justice Department frame legislation which will in the opinion of its law officers reach as far as this Parliament can go. That seems to me the practical and sensible course to take.

Let it be remembered that there has been expressed some doubt as to the power of this Parliament in regard to the entire handling of the grain trade. We may be in some danger there even as we sit now. But the fact is this, the grain trade has become of such a character, it is so interprovincial, it is so broadly Canadian, that whatever may be the constitution of this country, that trade must be under the control of legislation enacted by this Parliament,—under the control of federal authority. And if there is successful attack that goes to the root of our power in this matter, I for one would be prepared to support legislation which would address the Imperial Parliament in terms requesting an enabling amendment of our constitution.

I express here no opinion one way or the other on the merits of these different proposals; I am not arguing for the Wheat Board, nor against it; I am not arguing for a voluntary government board, nor against it; nor am I advocating abandoning the whole difficulty in a spirit of laissez faire to what is called "co-operation." For the present it seems to me the sensible step to take is to let the committee decide after hearing evidence and arguments what they believe would be best in the interest of the whole country, and let them express their decision in a resolution. Let the committee as well go, through the Minister of Justice, to the law officers of the Crown and arrive as closely as may be done at the expression in statutory form of powers within the competence of Parliament which in the judgment of that committee should be vested in the board which they think this Parliament should create. That is the alternative course that I propose.

I only want to impress this thought upon the committee before I sit down. You never can get wholly out of danger of litigation, no matter what you do. But take the course proposed in this matter from the government side and you will wave good-bye to any wheat board established by any act of Parliament this session. I do not know of any way by which a decision could come in time to be of any value except by general concurrence adverse to our powers. In a word, take the course proposed in the motion and you ditch the whole question; you abandon it; you are done with it. That, in my judgment, would be the practical result. I urge on the contrary that the other course be followed; and I therefore move:

That the said report be not concurred in but be referred back to the Committee on Agriculture for further consideration.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter underlying the reference to the Committee on Agriculture, the second report of which has brought about this discussion, is one of the very greatest importance. There is no question what the opinion of western Canada is—not only of the agricultural portions of that part of the Dominion, but of its business interests as well—as to the urgency of this matter of the re-establishment of the Canada Wheat Board. I could, if this were the proper occasion, give many reasons why it is in the national interest that the Wheat Board should be re-established along the lines advocated by the memorandum submitted by the Canadian Council of Agriculture to the Government, and later, referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The conditions in the West have been of an extraordinary character. I am not overstating the fact when I say that an overwhelming majority of the farmers of western Canada conducted their business last year at a loss. One reason why they have had such a poor return for their year's labour was the manner in which their grain was marketed under the exceptional conditions prevailing throughout the world. We cannot throw into the markets of Winnipeg, forty or fifty or sixty million bushels of wheat a month and expect the markets of the world to absorb it as freely as it is offered for sale without a considerable depression in prices. That constitutes one of the strongest reasons why action along the line of re-establishment of the Canada Wheat Board should be taken.

I am, therefore, quite in accord with what my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) has said as to the urgency of this matter. In fact, I wish to express my delight at the interest he is manifesting in it. I recall that back in 1920 the government of the day was empowered to re-establish the Wheat Board under act of this Parliament, and one of the first things my right hon. friend did after he became prime Minister was to announce to the country that no wheat board would be re-established,—and the need for it then was fully as great as it is to-day.

There is, apparently, a doubt whether this Parliament has the power to pass legislation enabling the Wheat Board to function, as it did function, when it marketed the crop of 1919. My right hon. friend has refrained from giving an opinion upon that question; probably he has a doubt in his own mind whether Parliament has that power. Being a layman and unfamiliar with the tenets of the law, I certainly would not venture an opinion on the point. But I know that the view is held by eminent legal gentlemen that a doubt exists whether Parliament has the power to pass legislation creating a Wheat Board with compulsory powers, that is, with powers to pass regulations and orders compelling farmers to sell their grain and market it through the agencies created by the board. The position taken in the committee was inspired by the desire to clear up that doubt, if possible, before any such legislation was passed. The report of the committee suggests that, without delaying an investigation by the committee of the merits of this method of marketing the grain, steps should be taken to secure from the Supreme Court of Canada at as early a day as possible a decision as to the power of Parliament in the matter. I think that view was expressed by the committee in order that, if possible, the legal doubt hanging round the thing might be cleared up.

My right hon. friend argues that there would be a great deal of delay in getting such an opinion from the Supreme Court. That might be; I am not familiar with the regulations governing the Supreme Court and I am not in a position to say with what despatch they could consider this matter and come to a decision upon it. I have it in mind, however, that in the summer of 1917, when a question arose over the powers vested in the Government under the Military Service Act in the city of Calgary—

Mr. MURPHY: In 1918.

Mr. CRERAR: I stand corrected—it was in 1918. As to the powers vested in the Government under the Military Service Act, a question arose in Calgary which necessitated a submission to the Supreme Court. If I recall the circumstances correctly, habeas corpus proceedings were taken to release a young conscript who had been imprisoned for violation of some of the provisions of the conscription law, and the Supreme Court of Alberta sustained the injunction. In that case it was necessary for the government to determine quickly just what the legal status of the conscription law was, and I recall that steps were taken at once to have a stated case placed before the Supreme Court, and the court gave its decision within a week of submitting the case. It does seem to me that it would be possible, if the Government used despatch, to get a decision from the Supreme Court as to the powers of Parliament in this matter in a very short time. I do not think there is any one, either in this House or outside, who approaches this question with the honest desire to get the best possible conditions established for the marketing of grain, who would wish to see the Wheat Board re-established, and then find it, after it had started operations, hung up in the air and unable to continue its work.

Legal gentlemen in private conversation with me have also cited the case of the Board of Commerce. This act creating the Board of Commerce was passed by the preceding parliament in 1919, conferring very wide powers on the board in the matter of the regulation of trade. I think it will be in the mind of every member of this House that that legislation was contested in the courts and that the Board of Commerce was restrained and put out of business as a result of the decision of the Privy Council.

Those are some of the considerations that moved me in my consideration of this matter. I recognized, and the committee recognized, the urgency of the case by urging that the Government should secure a decision from the Supreme Court as quickly as possible.

My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, who, I am free to confess at once, has had eminent legal experience, seems to be of the opinion that a decision could not be secured from the Supreme Court in any reasonable length of time, and he suggests instead that this matter should be referred to the law officers of the Crown.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Supreme Court might give an adverse opinion at an early date, if it was the general opinion of the court that Parliament had not this power, but in my judgment certainly we would not get a favourable opinion in time to deal with the matter this session.

Mr. CRERAR: That is a matter, again, in which I am upon rather unfamiliar ground. I would be of the opinion that if a majority of the Supreme Court gave a decision in favour of the contention that Parliament had the power to create this board, that would be ample warrant for the Government going ahead and establishing it; but in any case I have no fault to find with the suggestion of my right hon. friend that the matter be referred to the law officers of the Crown. The only point in respect to that is that there would perhaps be a doubt as to the conclusiveness of an opinion handed down by the law officers of the Crown.

I want to repeat, this is a matter of urgent importance and one on which action should not be delayed a moment longer than is absolutely necessary. I do not know what action the committee might take, assuming that Parliament had the power to pass legislation creating the board, but I do say this: I think the committee whose reports we are considering were perfectly well intentioned in the matter when they desired to ascertain the exact legal position, and at the same time have their inquiry proceed, as indeed it is proceeding now, as to whether the re-establishment of the board would be a desirable course to take.

Mr. EULER: For the benefit of those of us who do not belong to the Agricultural Committee, perhaps my hon. friend would explain whether the doubt with regard to the power of Parliament bears on the primary power of Parliament to establish a Wheat Board or is the doubt merely with regard to the compulsory feature that is mentioned?

Mr. CRERAR: The doubt exists, I think, in the minds of the committee, as to the power of Parliament to pass legislation creating a board with compulsory powers such as the powers the board had that was established in 1919.

Mr. EULER: It is the compulsory feature as to which there is a doubt?

Mr. CRERAR: The compulsory feature. It is not necessary to have action from Parliament, I take it, for the creation of a voluntary pool, but there is no doubt that if such action were necessary Parliament has the power to pass legislation creating a voluntary pool, such as my right hon. friend advocated during the election. But that is more a matter for action by the Government than by this Parliament.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax): Is it the view of the committee that the creation of a Wheat Board with powers less than those of the original Wheat Board would be satisfactory to the interests in the West that are affected? In other words, would a Wheat Board without compulsory powers be satisfactory?

Mr. CRERAR: I think I may say that such a board would not be satisfactory. The memorandum of the Council of Agriculture which gave rise to this question asks specifically for one thing and one thing only, and that is the re-establishment of the Canada Wheat Board with all the powers it had in 1919. That is what the memorandum asks for, and that is what we are considering in the matter.

I do not know that any harm could come from a further reference to the committee, as my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition suggests. It might be that the collective wisdom of the committee could proceed a little further in considering this question, although I must confess I am rather doubtful of what results could be obtained from such a reference back. However, it might be productive of good results, and is a step that I think could be adopted by the House.

The main thing I want to emphasize is the urgency of action in this matter. If the doubt could be cleared up quickly as to whether Parliament has the power to re-establish this board, I think it would be distinctly in the national interests that that be done. It may be that an opinion from the law officers of the Crown, as my right hon. friend suggests, would carry with it a greater degree of conclusiveness in the public mind than seems to me now probable or likely, but in any case I see no reason why that action should not be taken by the Government. Let the Government, through the law officers of the Crown or through the Supreme Court, find out what the powers of Parliament are in this matter, and in the meantime let the committee proceed with its inquiry and bring in a report based on all the evidence that is placed before it. I think it would be of great service if the powers of Parliament in this matter were determined as quickly as possible.

In closing, I simply wish to say that this is a matter of very great urgency, and I trust that it will receive the consideration of this House from that angle, and that angle alone.

Mr. JOS. T. SHAW (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I venture to address the House on this question, because in my judgment it is one of the pressing problems of the hour in so far at least as the western part of Canada is concerned. Let me at the outset state quite frankly that I am in favour of the re-establishment of the Wheat Board. I am not prepared to say that I favour that as a permanent arrangement, but I certainly am in favour of it as a means of taking care of this year's crop and perhaps of next year's crop as well. Now, I am not by any means alone in that contention. I understand that the United Farmers in the province of Alberta in convention assembled have practically unanimously favoured the creation of this board, and the farmers of Saskatchewan, and I believe also the farmers of Manitoba, with equal unanimity have concurred in the views of those of Alberta. If, therefore, the Wheat Board is to be of any value for this particular year it is necessary and urgent that every effort be made by this Parliament to ascertain whether or not the reappointment of that board is in the interest of this country.

I endorse the remarks of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) on the subject of referring this matter to the Supreme Court of Canada. It is true, as the hon. member for Marquette has stated, that in the military case, the Lewis case, which arose I believe in the city of Calgary, a decision was given by the Supreme Court in one week; but hon. members will realize that that case is entirely different from this, because there the accused himself was anxious to have it determined whether or not his liberty should be taken away from him in the particular manner complained of. In the present instance reference to the Court could only be made after a very careful study of the questions involved; and of course this would take considerable time, because the constitutional questions involved are serious and extremely difficult. Not only that, but the Supreme Court must necessarily give ample opportunity for the provincial governments, and the various interests concerned, to appear and to prepare their cases and to present arguments before it. Now what I suggest, Mr. Speaker, is this: It is absolutely physically impossible to have the Supreme Court of Canada give a decision in this particular case in anything like the limited period suggested by the hon. member for Marquette; it seems to me the result would be that this matter would be long drawn out. A litigant—and perhaps there would be many of them, and also various conflicting interests, before the Supreme Court—who felt dissatisfied with the decision of the court would have the right of appeal to the Privy Council, and then the matter could not possibly be determined until long after the 1922 crop had been cut and harvested. Now my suggestion is simply this—and I will not detain the House longer—that the matter should go back to the committee with instructions that they should consult the legal staff of the House —and I think everybody will agree that the legal staff are indeed able, in connection with the particular constitutional problems involved—and ascertain whether or not valid legislation can be passed, or whether in the event of legislation being passed, enabling legislation might also be passed by the various provincial legislatures, the converse of what has been done in connection with liquor legislation. I simply make the suggestion because I seriously contend that the adoption of the report of the committee means that we simply embalm the Wheat Board in litigation long before it is born.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The amendment of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition is to the effect that the committee be permitted to reconsider its own report. The report of the committee was, I understand, a unanimous report. One or two of the members of the committee have since expressed their views in a manner which would indicate that they desire to reconsider the report. I can see no reason why under the circumstances, they should not have this privilege.

Mr. E. J. GARLAND (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, before the matter is finally dealt with I want to touch on one feature of the case which has not yet been alluded to. With a great deal that the leader of the Opposition, the hon. member for West Calgary, and the hon. member for Marquette have had to say I most heartily agree, but there are some other matters that perhaps should be brought to the attention of the House. The illustration of the Board of Commerce has been mentioned and it has been pointed out that should this legislation be put into operation, and part of the crop be taken off, an injunction might then be served upon the board with very serious consequences. That might be the case but I submit that although for many years the Canada Grain Act has been in question, yet because it has been of inestimable value to the nation as a whole and because its operation was a matter of national good, no one has yet contested the validity of that act. If the Wheat Board should be established and the fact of its being for the general good of the country recognized by this Parliament, no one will seriously question the proceedings of the board while it is operating temporarily.

4 p.m.

Mr. ROBB: Is it not a fact that the Canada Grain Act is now being attacked in the Manitoba courts?

Mr. GARLAND (Bow River): I do not know whether it is or not. If such is the case then I am slightly at fault in that regard. The other matter to which I wish to refer has reference to the widening of the powers of the Committee on Agriculture. I for one am absolutely free to say that I would encourage the widest possible investigation into anything that would promise relief to the conditions in western Canada; but in this particular instance I would like to call attention to the fact that there is no demand for anything else but the Wheat Board; and as was stated in answer to a question by an hon. member opposite a moment ago, nothing but the re-establishment of the Wheat Board, with powers almost identical with, or similar to, the powers of the old board would satisfy the West at this time, in my opinion. So far as my own constituents are concerned, and to them I owe a duty in this matter, I must say that I cannot support anything but the re-establishment of a board with powers similar to those of the old board. I stand most decidedly in favour of that policy.

Now I do not think at this time it is proper to go into a discussion as to the value of the board. That can very properly be done in committee, but when this matter is being referred back to committee for consideration I would also submit that the committee be advised to follow this procedure: First, to consider the recommendation of the Canadian Council of Agriculture. When that is absolutely disposed of, one way or the other, let the committee take up question number two, and afterwards question number three. Because, I do not think we should close the doors to an investigation into any matter that may be productive of good. Nevertheless, the chief question before the committee, and the one that was referred thereto by this House for a decision, is the one question of the appointment of the Canada Wheat Board.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): The question raised in this discussion, as to the legality of the proposed Wheat Board, involves the most interesting constitutional point and one which I think, in the interests of the people of the West, as indeed of the whole country, ought to be settled along lines that would leave no doubt as to the power of this Parliament to deal with the subject. The suggestion that the determination of the constitutionality of such legislation should be deferred—a suggestion made by the leader of the Opposition—does not seem to me to be one which would be in the interest of the gentlemen from the West or of their constituents. A matter of so much importance as this ought to be determined by that court in Canada which has the power of saying what the constitutional rights of this Parliament and the various legislatures are. It might be proper to enable this committee to go to the limit of what seems to be the powers they have under the advice of the law officers of the Crown; but I think those who are very much interested in this matter would be well advised if they would join in urging that the Government should take steps for the early and final solution of the legal powers involved.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) referred to the fact that a decision had been given not long ago as to the power of this Parliament to constitute the Board of Commerce. That decision was one upon which the members of the Supreme Court of Canada divided equally. The judgment of Mr. Justice Duff upon that subject was strong and clear; and, looking at it, as I have since this discussion came up, I find that he laid down principles which, if they are followed by the courts in dealing with this subject, would make it clear that this Parliament has no power to constitute a board similar to the Wheat Board of 1919. His judgment was confirmed by the Privy Council in a deliverance so clear that every hon. member, who is acquainted with legal matters and who follows this case, will realize that this Privy Council decision is one of the most important decisions given of late years. Let me submit this statement by Mr. Justice Duff as regards the question of the power of this Parliament in dealing with matters of this kind. He states:

> The creation of an authority endowed with such powers of fixing the terms of contracts in relation to specific articles appears to involve an interpretation of the words, "regulation of trade and commerce," much more comprehensive than anything contemplated by the decisions and judgments referred to above. I have indicated the principle which in my opinion is deducible from Parson's Case (1), namely, that section 91-(2) does not authorize an enactment by the Dominion Parliament regulating in each of the provinces the terms of the contracts of a particular business or trade, for the reason (put very broadly) that such legislation involves an interposition in the transactions of individuals in the provinces, within the sphere of property and civil rights and local undertakings not contemplated by section 91-(2).

Further, he states:

> I cannot discover any principle consistent with these conclusions, upon which an enactment delegating to a commission the authority to regulate the terms of particular contracts of individual traders in a specified commodity according to the views of the Board as to what may be fair between the individual trader and the public in each transaction, can be sustained as an exercise of that power;

That language of Mr. Justice Duff which was confirmed in terms by the Privy Council, seems to me to lay down principles which materially interfere with the theory that a Wheat Board can be legally constituted. As I say, the decision given by the Lords of the Privy Council on this matter went further than most lawyers anticipated that it would have gone. It was held previously that the fact that section 91 of the British North America Act gave to this Parliament the right to deal with the regulation of trade and commerce, carried with it certain ancillary powers, which enabled this Parliament to go further and deal with matters which might fall within the purview of property and civil rights, subjects within the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures. But this declares that the powers which this Parliament assumed in order to pass the Board of Commerce Act and to give that board power to deal with certain matters which might arise in certain provinces of the Dominion, were not ancillary to the regulation of trade and commerce and were beyond the power of this Parliament. It seems to me, in view of this decision, hon. gentlemen who, I know, are interested in this subject and are anxious to see the business and trade of this country, especially in the great West, put upon a solid footing, would be well advised if they saw to it that steps were taken, at as early a date as possible, to have a decision by the Supreme Court as to just what this Parliament can do in regard to this Wheat Board.

Mr. T. H. McCONICA (Battleford): Mr. Speaker, I had not purposed discussing this matter, and I will speak of only one or two questions that have been presented. It has been urged that it is beyond the powers of this Parliament to pass legislation compelling individuals to sell their property to any particular board. I apprehend that is the law; I apprehend it will always be the law. But is such a power necessary to the enactment of legislation that will bring about that which we seek and that which is asked for by the people of western Canada? What is the situation to-day? The people of western Canada are not asking this Parliament to regulate the trade of selling their wheat to neighbours; they are asking this Parliament to determine how their wheat shall be marketed in the markets of the world, how it shall be handled by the great transportation companies of our country, what agencies shall engage in the commerce of handling the wheat of western Canada. Those powers have been vested in governmental authority for years. Every bushel of wheat that has gone out of western Canada since the enactment of the Grain Act, has gone out under the regulation of laws passed by this Parliament, and it will continue to do so. We ask that that power be placed in the hands of a government board, and that power may be properly placed there. Under our constitution, trade and commerce are within the purview of this Parliament. That has been the case with our Grain Act. It is suggested that the constitutionality of the Grain Act has been challenged. Possibly, there may be features of the Grain Act that are unconstitutional; but are they necessary features? I think not. The only question that I have heard raised was whether the provision in regard to the forfeiture of certain overages to the Government was constitutional. Probably it is not. I do not apprehend that the Government has a right to take private property without paying for it. But is it necessary that such a power be put into the hands of such a board? Most certainly not. The question is raised whether the right to issue a license is not a provincial right. It is a provincial right as to three particular kinds of licenses — keeping a hotel, acting as an auctioneer, or running a saloon; such licenses must be issued by the province. But the elevator business is not auctioneering, nor hotel-keeping, nor running a saloon; and when the provision covers those three powers, does it not withhold the balance of the power? This matter should go back to the committee. I believe that when this legislation is proposed, it will be attacked, and if we present a case to the Supreme Court any blackleg lawyer, who represents some curbstone broker, can hold it up for two or three years. In the meantime, where shall we be in the West? I ask that this matter go back to the committee and that we have legislation drawn that will effect the purpose which we seek. It may not be couched exactly in the language of the old bill, but it must be such as will give the people the relief they desire and that we need most sorely.

Mr. ROBERT GARDINER (Medicine Hat): On the question of enlarging the powers of the Committee, I would emphasize the remarks of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Garland). We in western Canada are not asking for any voluntary wheat pool or any other system of marketing grains, except under such conditions as prevailed under the old Wheat Board. If the Committee has extra powers conferred upon it, I would suggest that it confine its activities, as far as possible, to looking into the question of a compulsory Wheat Board.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West): Supporting the action of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), I would point out that if the report goes back to the committee and the law officers of the Crown are able to produce an act that in their judgment will be constitutional, we shall be that much further ahead than if we appealed to the Supreme Court. Even if a Wheat Board is appointed by Parliament and an attack is made upon it, we shall certainly be as far ahead as, if not further than, if we submitted a stated case to the Supreme Court of Canada. If Parliament puts through legislation and it is subject to attack in the courts, it will reveal to those who are anxious to have the Wheat Board established, the persons, firms or interests that are trying to frustrate that desire. And that, I submit, would be something worth while discovering. I notice that my hon. friends, who know more about farming than I do, do not want a permanent Wheat Board. I have said in this House before that one thing which, in my judgment, Parliament ought to do is to prevent, as far as it can, any speculation in foodstuffs. I may be somewhat straight-laced, or possibly I do not understand some particular phases of the question; but to me it seems almost a crime to permit such speculation in food as raises the price to the consumer and reduces the return to the producer. I have always thought that a permanent Wheat Board that would get the most that was possible for the producer, and at the same time protect the consumer, was legislation that we might very well pass in this House. As I say, my hon. friends from the prairies do not seem to believe in a permanent Wheat Board, and I concede to them a greater knowledge of the case than I can possibly have. But they would gain more, in a matter of great urgency, by having some measure passed by Parliament, after being properly considered by the officers of the Crown, than if they submitted the question to the Supreme Court.

LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I move, seconded by Mr. Fielding, that the following proposed resolution be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the House:

[Mr. Hocken.]

Resolved, That it is expedient that Parliament do approve of the following Treaties, of which copies have been laid before Parliament:—

The Treaty between the United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, for the limitation of naval armament, which was signed at Washington on the sixth day of February, nineteen hundred and twenty-two;

The Treaty between the United States of America, the British Empire, France, Italy, and Japan, to protect neutrals and non-combatants at sea in time of war and to prevent the use in war of noxious gases and chemicals, which was signed at Washington on the sixth day of February, nineteen hundred and twenty-two;

The Treaty between the United States of America, Belgium, the British Empire, China, France, Italy, Japan, The Netherlands, and Portugal, to stabilize conditions in the Far East, which was signed at Washington on the sixth day of February, nineteen hundred and twenty-two;

The Treaty between the United States of America, Belgium, the British Empire, China, France, Italy, Japan, The Netherlands, and Portugal, relating to the Chinese customs tariff, which was signed at Washington on the sixth day of February, nineteen hundred and twenty-two;

The Treaty between the United States of America, the British Empire, France, and Japan, for the preservation of the general peace and the maintenance of their rights in relation to their insular possessions and insular dominions in the region of the Pacific Ocean (and the accompanying Declaration), and the Agreement between the same Powers supplementary thereto, which Treaty and Agreement were signed at Washington on the thirteenth day of December, nineteen hundred and twenty-one, and the sixth day of February, nineteen hundred and twenty-two, respectively; and that this House do approve of the same.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Will the Prime Minister give us an idea on what day he is likely to take up this resolution?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Possibly Wednesday of next week, but not before. I shall inform my right hon. friend definitely later on.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (Westmount-St. Henri): Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to direct the attention of the Government to an article published in La Presse of last night on the St. Lawrence waterway scheme. Is it a fact that negotiations are proceeding directly between the British Embassy at Washington and the American Government with regard to this matter? If so, what does the Government intend to do to vindicate our national status, if we have any?

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): The Prime Minister has not caught the question of my hon. friend. All I can say is that we have no knowledge of any negotiations on the subject.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

On the motion of Hon. G. P. Graham (Minister of Militia and Defence) Bill No. 27 respecting the Department of National Defence was read the third time and passed.

SALARIES ACT, SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AMENDMENT

On the motion of Hon. G. P. Graham (Minister of Militia and Defence) Bill No. 14 to amend the Salaries Act and the Senate and the House of Commons Act, was read the third time and passed.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENT

Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 25 to amend the Penitentiary Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The explanation of the Minister of Justice was almost negligibly brief on the introduction of this bill. Perhaps he will give us a better explanation now.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: As I said in introducing this bill, when a prisoner is sent to a penitentiary, the warden cannot receive him if he is suffering from an infectious disease, and there is no provision in the statute to authorize the return of such prisoner to the jail whence he came or to any other institution, to be treated. We propose by the amendment to remedy that omission in the statute so that in such a case the prisoner may be sent back to the provincial authorities for treatment and returned to the penitentiary when cured.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time, and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

On section 1—prisoner may be kept in penitentiary, etc., until necessary documents, including a certificate of health, are delivered to warden:

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Section 45 of the Penitentiaries Act reads:

> Whenever a prisoner is ordered by competent authority to be conveyed to any penitentiary from any other penitentiary, or from a reformatory prison, or from a jail, there shall be delivered to the warden of the penitentiary receiving such prisoner, together with all other necessary documents, a certificate signed by the medical officer of the institution from which prisoner has been taken, and countersigned by the official in charge of the penitentiary, reformatory or jail from which such prisoner has been taken, declaring that such prisoner is free from any putrid, infectious or contagious disease, and that he is fit to be removed.

Then, section 46:

> The warden shall receive into the penitentiary every convict legally certified to him as sentenced to imprisonment therein, unless certified by the surgeon of the penitentiary to be suffering from a dangerously infectious or contagious disease, and shall there detain him, subject to the rules, regulations and discipline thereof, until the term for which he has been sentenced is completed, or until he is otherwise legally discharged.

These are the sections proposed to be amended by the bill. The amendments are found to be necessary by the provincial authorities.

Mr. MANION: I notice that the amendment makes no mention of a hospital or similar institution.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: No, the prisoner has to be sent back to the jail from which he came. No special hospital is provided.

Mr. MANION: But suppose the jail has no infirmary, for example, in connection with it?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: He can be treated in the jail. There is a department for such purposes in almost every jail in the country, I think.

Mr. GUTHRIE: When I had the honour of acting as Solicitor General, a number of cases arose in the Department of Justice upon which this amendment would have a direct bearing. The difficulty was that in some of the jails in Ontario, and in many similar institutions in Nova Scotia, there was no proper arrangement for the custody of prisoners suffering from contagious diseases. The matter was brought to the attention of the law departments of the various provinces on more than one occasion, but they did not seem to recognize it as their duty to provide suitable quarters for such cases. There is no doubt that hardship and difficulty resulted to prisoners because of this condition. I can recall several cases in Ontario where prisoners had contagious diseases of a very virulent type, and the placing of these men in the ordinary penitentiaries would be just ground for objection on the part of the other convicts. On the other hand, there is no adequate facilities in the local jails to take care of these prisoners, and what is to be done in the circumstances is a rather difficult problem.

Men who are the victims of a loathsome disease are sometimes sentenced by judges to penitentiary terms. They are first confined in the local jail, and orders for their removal to the penitentiary arrive in due course. But they should be accompanied by a certificate as to health before being admitted into the penitentiary, otherwise trouble might ensue among the other convicts. If they are returned to the local jail, the same difficulty may arise there, or the unfortunate man may receive no adequate treatment. In a number of cases while I was in that department, persons suffering from certain diseases were treated in the local hospital under guard. Frequently we had to release prisoners for the purpose of having serious operations performed on them; they were released on parole or under guard and after recovery were brought back to the penitentiary. But some new system should be evolved. The authorities in charge of the provincial jails should be compelled to see that some proper treatment is accorded to prisoners who are so afflicted. Personally, I think the amendment proposed by the minister is a proper one and ought to be adopted. But it does bring up that broader question: what are we going to do with the unfortunate criminal who is condemned by a court of law and does not receive proper treatment in our jails? If he is treated in the jail, what are you going to do about the other prisoners who are there and who are liable to the contagion?

Mr. MANION: Not only are the prisoners—the diseased men as well as the others—to be considered in this matter; it affects the public generally. If a number of prisoners take ill, say, with scarlet fever, diphtheria, or any other contagious disease, the expense to the country is increased. I do not know whether another clause could be added to the amendment to provide for this. I notice that the minister shakes his head; apparently it cannot be done. Now, I have been in some of these jails—though not as a prisoner—and I know that often there are no facilities for caring for men afflicted in this way. I suggest to the minister that if something could be done to provide for these cases it would be in the interests not only of the prisoners concerned, but of the public as well.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We are now legislating in respect of penitentiaries, which are under the jurisdiction of the federal government. We have no power to legislate for the provincial jails. As to the cases my hon. friend mentions of contagious diseases in certain jails, I do not know much about the other provinces, but I had the honour of being Attorney General of Quebec for some fifteen years, and I know that when such cases arose there the prisoners were sent to a hospital and returned to the jail after treatment. If the matter is to be dealt with as regards the provincial jails, it must be done by the provinces themselves. As to the penitentiaries, we do the best we can. We are legislating to give full protection to the prisoners, and I have reason to believe that even under the law as we had it before, full protection was given them. We are providing here that the provincial authorities may take a prisoner suffering from a contagious disease and treat him in a jail or some hospital if that is found necessary.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I agree with the minister that we are legislating in regard to our own penitentiaries, but we must remember this—that the judges who administer our criminal law, which we pass, convict these men, and sentence them to the penitentiary. The penitentiary is under our jurisdiction and if we pass this act and a man suffering from a contagious disease is sentenced to a penitentiary and that sentence is not carried out by reason of his disease, he is readmitted to the county jail, which has no adequate means of taking care of him. I know county jails in the province of Ontario, and apart from those in the larger cities I do not know of one that has any facilities at all for caring for convicts suffering from a contagious disease. We pass the criminal law; we appoint the judges who administer it; our appointees sentence the convict to the penitentiary, and now we are passing a law which says that unless the convict is in good health he cannot be admitted to the penitentiary; he must go back to the county jail whence he came, where there are no proper facilities for looking after him. I agree that we have no authority over these county jails. That is the difficulty of the situation, and in correspondence I have had on that matter when we have suggested that the county jail should be put into a condition to attend to these prisoners we have been practically told to mind our own business. There is the difficulty, and it is that I wish to point out.

Mr. CALDWELL: There is another point involved that has not been touched upon, and that is that if a prisoner is sentenced to serve a term in a federal prison, and is afterwards under this legislation sent back to a county jail, the cost of maintaining him is thrown back on the county, when by right it should fall on the Dominion. Am I right in that?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Yes.

Mr. BAXTER: There seems to be a lack of provision as to who is to pay for the medical attendance necessary. There is something also in the draftsmanship of this bill which requires a little attention. It proposes to amend section 46 of the present act by adding at the end the following:

> Provided that a convict, if certified by the surgeon to be suffering in manner aforesaid, may remain and be kept in his former custody until his condition shall in the opinion of the surgeon justify withdrawal of the certificate.

Now you have the sentence of the court, which says that he shall go to the penitentiary. Then, under this provision, if the convict is suffering from a contagious disease, the sentence is suspended, and the will of the surgeon is substituted for everything else. Suppose the surgeon finds him incurable—and he may well be possessed of a disease which is readily communicable and is not curable—apparently then he would remain in the jail for life at the cost of the municipality, which has to maintain the jail. The municipality would have to pay for his board and medical attendance. Of course, no such result is contemplated, but it seems to me there is a deficiency in the structure of the Act in not providing for a resumption of the jurisdiction of the court which sentenced the convict.

I may also add to what has been said on the subject of the unfitness of the county jails. There is not in the province of New Brunswick one jail in which it would be humane to keep a prisoner who is suffering. In the city of St. John—I do not say the jail there is the best—the jail is utterly inadequate. There are no proper accommodations, and it would only be inflicting unnecessary cruelty on a man under sentence to compel him to be looked after in such a place. I trust that this matter will receive more consideration. I am satisfied that every one in the House wants to accomplish the most beneficial results, but from my knowledge of the local conditions I think the county jails are not fit to look after convicts suffering from contagious disease. I think it would be far better, and much more humane to segregate such cases in the penitentiary and treat them there.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid I do not wholly agree with those who have spoken on this matter. I would not like to see legislation passed which virtually threw upon the Dominion government the care of incurables by the mere act of the incurable committing a crime. The incurable, in so far as he requires care at all, is the ward of the provincial authorities, and the upon the Dominion government the care of him. Consequently, in endeavouring at least to rid the Dominion of the obligation of accepting a charge which constitutionally is a provincial charge, I am wholly in sympathy with the minister. I only make this comment; in legislating that the man may remain, are you also legislating that the province must keep him? If you are, I am afraid you are doing worse than establishing a wheat board. Can this Parliament legislate to compel the province to maintain a prisoner who has been sentenced to the penitentiary?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I may say that this request has come from the provinces themselves. I do not anticipate any difficulty over it. This has been the practice for years, and there has never been any trouble. In the past, no person suffering from a contagious disease could be admitted to a penitentiary. The prisoner has to be sent somewhere to be treated, and as he comes from the province, if he is suffering from a contagious disease he is sent back to a jail in a district of the province. There is only one question before us, because the question of maintenance does not come in now, and that is the treatment of prisoners suffering from a contagious disease. We could give them their liberty, but they have to be kept somewhere, and the provincial authorities say: Let us take them back to our jails or hospitals, and we will treat them. If any complaint should come from the provincial authorities, we shall consider it and try to settle it to the satisfaction of the province.

Mr. CALDWELL: What has been the practice in such cases in the past?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: The provincial authorities now take the prisoners back to their jails, but there is a doubt whether they have a legal right to do so, and it is to remove that doubt that we are proposing this amendment.

Mr. CALDWELL: This amendment does not change the practice at all?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: Not at all.

Mr. SEXSMITH: In the county of Lennox that has always been the practice. If a criminal in the jail is sick, we take care of him in the hospital, and return him to the jail when he is better.

Mr. ANDERSON: I was surgeon to a county jail in Ontario for about twenty years, and I would point out that no prisoner is sent from a county jail to the penitentiary without the surgeon's certificate that he is free from disease. If he contracts the disease on the road to the penitentiary, the governor of the jail would refuse to take him back. The governor of the jail would not consider that he was entitled to take charge of a man because of his suffering from an infectious disease. Furthermore in the smaller jails in the counties of Ontario absolutely no provision is made for the treatment of diseased patients, and no accommodation exists for them except in the corridor or in the cell—there is not even a hospital ward in the majority of these institutions. Consequently, if a prisoner suffering from an infectious disease is returned to one of these jails he is put in with the other inmates and thus becomes a menace to their health as well as to the health of those philanthropic people who pay visits to the inmates from time to time. There is likewise a lack of hospital accommodation, I think, in connection with the jails in the smaller towns. Under the circumstances I think it will be found that the jail governors will refuse to accept prisoners suffering from infectious disease and will send them back whence they came.

Mr. LOGAN: According to the Minister of Justice we are by this legislation only making legal what has been done without authority in the past. Let me say a word or two in reference to the condition of our jails in the province of Nova Scotia. I can supplement what has been said of conditions in the other provinces by stating that I do not know of a jail in my own province even in the city of Halifax, that is equipped to look after a prisoner suffering from infectious disease. There is, on the other hand, a possibility that such legislation as this may make it easier to retain men in the local jails; it has occurred to me that such a thing might be possible by connivance between the local medical officer and the friends of the prisoner. I think I can remember in the practice of my profession the attempt being made to retain a man in a local jail in order not to have the stigma put upon him of having been an inmate of a penitentiary. It does seem to me also, as has been suggested by my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) that there is some danger of perpetrating an injustice upon the local authorities. Because, in Nova Scotia, the cost of maintaining a prisoner in jail devolves upon the municipal authorities, in the county of Cumberland, for example, that cost is borne by the county council and not by the provincial authorities. There may be very good reasons for the municipalities objecting to paying for the maintenance of prisoners who have been sentenced to the penitentiary; but there is one thing that we should do as far as we possibly can, and that is to provide humane treatment for the poor devil who has been jailed whilst suffering from an infectious disease. Cases have come under my personal observation of men who have been forced to lie in a pretty close cell, destitute of even sanitary arrangements, suffering and almost dying from infectious disease, and nobody seemed to worry very much about them. I think it would be better practice, wherever possible, to get a man who has been sentenced to the penitentiary sent to that institution as quickly as possible because proper hospital accommodation is obtainable and the needed facilities to look after his particular case.

Mr. BOYS: It is not the province upon whom the financial responsibility rests, and that is a fact I would like to bring to the attention of the minister. I can quite understand the provinces being satisfied with this as legalizing a practice heretofore obtaining, but it is the county that bears the entire cost in connection with these jails—even the surgeon is paid by the county. Now what does this legislation mean? It simply means that it is left to the local municipality to take care of any expense that may be occasioned by the present amendment. They have not the necessary facilities to care for those suffering from infectious disease, and it is not at all likely that those facilities will be provided. It seems to me that if this amendment is to be adopted the rights of the municipalities should be safeguarded by some scheme properly worked out. If the provinces would undertake this responsibility all well and good; but if they will not do so it simply means that these patients will not get the requisite treatment. It seems to me that when a man receives a sentence which takes him to the penitentiary he becomes a charge upon the federal authorities and it is for them to see that proper care is taken of him. Whether they should go to the extent of providing facilities for treating such patients locally is a doubtful point; but I can assure the minister that legalizing a practice which has prevailed in the past will not do away with the trouble. After all it is most important to see that proper treatment should be provided for these men. That cannot and will not be provided in the local jails, the expense of whose maintenance is now entirely borne by the counties.

Mr. RANKIN: In the province of Ontario the Public Health Act prohibits the transfer from one municipality to another of any person suffering from infectious disease. Therefore a prisoner suffering in this way could not be transferred from the penitentiary to a local jail or otherwise without violating the Public Health Act.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: We are not proposing by this legislation to change what has been the practice in the past; all that is being done is to legalize the existing procedure. As to the question of expenditure the obligations of the provinces are not being increased; they will in the future be the same in this respect as they have been in the past. One hon. member stated that the expense in these cases is paid by the counties. In our province that cost is borne by the provincial authorities. If parliament decides that we should take charge of the prisoners from the day they are convicted, whether they are suffering from infectious disease or not, that is another matter. We are only asking here that the mode of procedure under which the provincial authorities have acted in the past shall be legalized. I cannot say what the experience has been in other provinces but I am not aware that a single complaint has ever been made on this account in the province of Quebec. Another objection raised is that if the law is amended in the manner proposed, a prisoner may be detained in a provincial jail for the whole term of his sentence, which might be for four or five years. But it should be remembered that the time spent by a prisoner in a provincial jail or a provincial hospital will be counted on his sentence; and should there be any doubt on that score the Minister of Justice would certainly liberate the prisoner upon the expiration of his term. Therefore, considering all the objections and all the observations which have been made in regard to these two amendments which I have the honour to propose, I do not see that we can do more to-day than what is proposed in them. We say that we go according to the old rules; we refuse to receive, in penitentiaries, prisoners if they suffer from infectious or contagious diseases, and we authorize the provinces to keep such prisoners in their charge, to treat them and, if possible, to cure them. I have reason to believe that the explanations I have given are sufficient to convince hon. members of the necessity of these amendments.

Bill reported.

SUPPLY

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Civil Government—Insurance—salaries, including Superintendent of Insurance, $1,000 additional to salary authorized by 7-8 Edward VII, Chap. 69, and contingenciss, $117,385.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): There is a small increase in the salary item. That we must expect as there is a constant increase in the insurance business. The number of officials is one less; but, against that, there is an increase in the contingency appropriation, out of which temporary employees will be paid. The increase in the volume of insurance which has to be handled by the department, is very great. Let me give these figures for the purposes of illustration. In 1915, the total fire insurance in force was $3,531,620,802. In 1920, according to the latest figures with which I have been furnished, it amounted to $5,969,872,278. The percentage of increase between 1915 and 1920 in the total fire insurance in force is 69. Between those two years there is an increase of 91 per cent in the net fire insurance premiums received, an increase of 103 per cent in the total life insurance business in force and an increase of 185 per cent in the amount of new life insurance issued. Altogether, these figures indicate, as they must, that there will always be a growing business in that department and this growing business will call, from time to time, for some increases. The additional amount asked by the superintendent is not large, and I am quite sure it will be only in harmony with the growth of the business.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I observe, of course, what the minister himself has remarked, namely, that efforts at economy in this case have again resulted in an increased expenditure of about eight or nine per cent. I was glad to hear the Minister of Finance particularly acknowledge that, with increase in the functions of government, in the business of government, there necessarily will be some increase in the cost of operation, and, in a word, that if that goes on, as it has been going on, the cause of economy must be confined pretty much to propaganda.

Mr. FIELDING: It is rather too early to expect any government to indulge in economy in regard to Civil Service departments before there is any opportunity of making any inquiry. As regards my department, I make no boast of economy. I have not dismissed anybody; I took the estimates as I found them last year and I made a few changes. As time rolls on, I hope we can manifest economy in these branches. For the present, I suppose most of the ministers will be obliged to accept, in large degree the estimates of the past year, and time must be allowed for any economy to be exercised. At any rate as regards any branches with which I am connected, I am making no boast of economy at the present time. What will be done in the future remains to be seen.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That remark applies with some force to cases like those of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. King), possibly the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) and, perhaps, some others; but if there is one case to which it does not apply, it is that of the Minister of Finance himself. He was Minister of Finance of this country for fifteen years, in the very department in which he is now. He knows the organization of the department. Even in the ten years during which he was out of office, he followed its work and development very closely. I do not doubt at all that he knows intimately most of the higher officials of the department. They are the same people who were there in his time. This is something that he has at his fingers' ends. The Minister of Finance is all too modest when he seeks to convince me that three months would not be ample time for him to see if there was any extravagance in his department in the matter of civil government. Three months! Why, in three weeks, the Minister of Finance would have a pretty good idea; but with all his experience and knowledge of the department, with all his concentration on that department, for that has been the work of his life, he is now compelled to come to this Parliament and, in every instance so far, not to confess his total inability to ask for any reduction, but rather to ask for something more.

Mr. FIELDING: If, in the last three months, I had nothing to do but study the Civil Service, in all probability my right hon. friend's remarks would be to the point; but, if he does not know this fact, I have had a great deal to do during the past three months. There are a number of vacancies in my department; my predecessor left some, and they have not been filled yet for the reason that I have not had time to investigate the matter. I have as much desire for economy in my department as I commend to my brother ministers, but time must be allowed for the exercise of economy; it cannot be accomplished in a day.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I trust that is not an intimation that all the vacancies in this department are to be filled. The appropriation put through amounts to about $413,000, and my recollection is that what it costs to run the department is $350,000. I recognize that my hon. friend will have before him circumstances which may require the extra vote. For instance, supposing that he puts into effect, what I think would be a very proper reform, the centralizing of all the bookkeeping of the country in the Finance Department, he may want more money; but I hope, simply because there are vacancies, my hon. friend is not going to fill them at the present time.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend left some vacancies, and I may say that I intend to have some of them filled. They will have to be filled by the Civil Service Commission. I do not want to call in question the wisdom of the Civil Service Commission, but I am not sure, under the machinery we have in the Civil Service Commission, we shall get the best men. Some of these vacancies will certainly be filled, and I do not hesitate to say that the men of my department are overworked. We are, however dealing at present with the Insurance Department. I think in that respect there is no ground for criticism.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have never disputed the desire of the minister to reduce, and he will search my remarks in vain for any suggestion of the kind. But he said enough before I spoke, and if he did not he has certainly said enough since, to show that though he has had other things to do he has had ample time to look into his department. Having done so, he comes here and says: "I have gone into the department, and though I have not had as much time as I shall have, I have had opportunity enough to discover that there are quite a lot of vacancies which I must fill because the men are overworked."

Mr. FIELDING: That is a perfectly correct statement of the matter.

Item agreed to.

Auditor General's Office—Salaries, including Auditor General at $1,000 addition to 7-8 Edward VII, Chap. 6, $253,885; contingencies, $34,000.

Mr. FIELDING: The item shows an increase. The Auditor General states that provision is made in his estimates for six additional audit clerks and six more junior audit clerks. He says that the preparation of the annual report for the past fiscal year was completed about the end of February, 1922. It is hoped to have the report for the current year much earlier than this date next year. To do so it will be necessary to have additional help. He says:

A number of the clerks now temporarily employed have qualified for permanent employment. I wish to retain the services of those who are rendering efficient service rather than have them assigned to another department and inexperienced clerks sent me in their places.

It is important that the Auditor General's report should be got out at an early date in the session, as hon. members will no doubt readily agree, because that document has a considerable bearing on the business of the House; and if the additional clerks whom the Auditor General desires will help to get that important report out at the beginning of the session, I am sure the committee will commend the increase for this purpose.

Mr. GOULD: Is the current report true, that the Auditor General is retiring?

Mr. FIELDING: He has intimated his desire to retire and it is expected that leave of absence will be granted him up to the first of October, at which time it is contemplated he will retire. He has been for no less a period than fifty years in the public service.

Mr. GOULD: In connection with the estimates of several departments, members have repeatedly inquired upon whose recommendation the civil servants are appointed, and it was stated in reply a few nights ago that they were employed on the recommendation of the deputies or other officers higher up in the service. I think that is a most arbitrary proceeding. Members of Parliament, who are responsible for moneys voted in this House, desire to do everything possible to promote the efficiency of the public service. But we are led to believe, in certain instances, that departments are overmanned and officers higher up overpaid, as evidenced in the frequent increases asked for in civil government estimates. In view of this fact I have wondered whether it would not be advisable to appoint a parliamentary committee at this session to look into the various departments, with the deputy ministers and other officers of the Government, to ascertain and report to Parliament in what directions possible retrenchment, without impairment to the efficiency of the service, might be effected. I think there is good work in that connection that a special committee of the House could undertake, and I am sure that deputy ministers would co-operate with such a committee. I offer this merely as a suggestion.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Although there is a blanketing of officials in this item, there seems to be a considerable amount carried in the contingency vote, as well, for clerical and other assistance. It is suggested that certain temporary employees will be put on the permanent staff. I hope the minister will not transfer them all to the permanent staff, because the permanent staff is ample as it is. I had hoped that the department might be brought up to something like a state of modern efficiency, so that the requirements of modern business might be met, providing a proper audit that would adequately safeguard the Treasury, especially in regard to petty cash items. If that is to be done the department will have to be largely reconstituted. Otherwise my hon. friend will find that the character of the work will not conduce to a proper up-to-date system such as I suggest. I hope, I repeat, that he does not intend to place all the temporaries on the permanent staff, because we have enough permanent employees as it is. But if he does so, surely he will not need the vote for clerical assistance.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not know how the word "blanketing," as it is used frequently in connection with the Estimates, originated. If it means the transfer of temporary employees to the permanent list, it will be found that during the past year a good deal of that sort of transfer was made. I cannot say that the present Government has done nothing of that kind, but I do know that efforts have been made in the various departments to transfer many of the officials from the temporary to the permanent list and the matter has been held for further consideration. I agree that when you transfer a man from the temporary to the permanent list he acquires a larger vested right and it is harder to displace him. For that reason we are resisting the movement to transfer temporaries to the permanent staff. I concur in what my hon. friend says regarding the desirability of a reorganization of the department; but that will take time, and for the moment we must accept the organization as we find it.

Item agreed to.

To provide for the expenses of work in the interest of fire prevention, to be carried on by the Department of Insurance, $17,000.

Mr. FIELDING: The work of this branch is carried on by the department in co-operation with the Dominion Fire Prevention Association. The increase in the vote is due to the expenses of an investigation, undertaken at the suggestion of the association, of roofing materials with a view to determining their safety from a fire prevention standpoint, as well as their durability and cost. There is also being conducted at the present time an investigation of matches. A resolution of the Dominion Fire Prevention Association some months ago recommended that, if possible, legislation standardizing matches manufactured or imported into Canada be sought, and it is probable that legislation for this purpose will be submitted during the present session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand that there is a Dominion body, known as the Dominion Fire Prevention Association, and that this is a grant to that body?

Mr. FIELDING: I understand they work in co-operation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is, the Insurance Department and the Dominion Fire Prevention Association.

Mr. FIELDING: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The money, then, is checked out for the individual purposes of the association by the Insurance Department?

Mr. FIELDING: It is a government grant, and subject to all the principles governing such an appropriation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then it is a grant?

Mr. FIELDING: I think it is paid out by the Superintendent of Insurance upon evidence that the conditions set forth have been complied with. I am not familiar with the matter, but that is my understanding. Being a Dominion grant, it must of course be subject to Dominion orders.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the point I am at. I have come to the conclusion myself that many of these Dominion grants would be better restricted than amplified. I pretend to no special knowledge of the work of the Dominion Fire Prevention Association, but I had to do with other bodies, and I think the practice of turning over our money to organizations of this kind, to prosecute special work that they are interested in, must be confined within very rigid limits indeed, and an examination made of the actual work done with the money from the Treasury and also with the money contributed from other sources to the same end. I found instances where these organizations had merely constituted themselves an agency, always under salary, for handling Dominion moneys to further purposes that they, of course, exalted to the skies, but that really did not get very far.

Mr. McMASTER: The Alpine Club, for instance.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Alpine Club $1,000 has bothered my hon. friend for years, but if he would not strain at the gnat so often he might reach the camel.

Mr. FIELDING: There are occasions when grants are made as lump sums to various organizations, and they of course have to assume the responsibility of administration. My impression is that this grant is not exactly of that type, but that it is a matter in which the Superintendent of Insurance exercises an active part. If there is any doubt as to that, the item can be held over. But at any rate I will call the attention of the Superintendent of Insurance to my right hon. friend's remarks, because I would agree with him that Parliament should have some assurance that these grants are being applied to the purposes for which they are designed.

Item agreed to.

Agriculture—Experimental Farms, $1,315,000.

Mr. TOLMIE: In view of the increased expenditure, would the hon. minister kindly explain?

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Chairman, a going concern like these farms cannot be administered with any degree of success without a corresponding increase in expenditure. I am sure my hon. friend from Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) has frequently noticed in the past that opportunities of spending a little more money on these experimental farms have increased, but during the war the vote was held down, and properly so I think. Since then conditions have not improved very much, from a financial standpoint, and in fact the vote is still being held down.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think there was a continual increase during the war.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: And there will be now; but notwithstanding that there may be an increase in some items, the expenditure generally is being held down. There are twenty-two experimental farms located throughout the Dominion, and certain extensions are made from time to time of the work they are engaged in. As we go over the vote I shall be able to explain in detail how the aggregate is made up. A new farm was established last year at Swift Current that my hon. friend is familiar with. It is in a very primitive condition yet, and a reasonable amount of expenditure has to be incurred in order to get it properly launched. The vote does not contemplate the addition of any new experimental farms this year. An item will be found later of possible expenditure for the acquisition of necessary land in the event of one or two more farms being established, but that would be as far as we would go this year.

Mr. HANSON: This is a very large amount of money and we are not supplied with any details. I am interested, as one of these experimental farms is situated in my constituency, and I know its work has been curtailed very much, in fact too much it is claimed. Will the minister give us details of this vote?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We have a mass of information here, Mr. Chairman, but it would not be convenient to burden the committee with the whole of it. If my hon. friend will particularize what he wishes to be informed about I shall be glad to help him. We have all the farms tabulated here. Beginning in the east, we have farms at the following points: Charlottetown, P.E.I., Kentville, N.S., Nappan, N.S., Fredericton, N.B., St. Anne de la Pocatière, Que., Cap Rouge, Que., Lennoxville, Que., La Ferme, Que., Kapuskasing, Ont., Morden, Man., Brandon, Man., Indian Head, Sask., Rosthern, Sask., Scott, Sask., Swift Current, Sask., Lacombe, Alta., Lethbridge, Alta., Agassiz, B.C., Invermere, B.C., Sydney, B.C., and Summerland, B.C. There are also a certain number of sub-stations.

Mr. HANSON: How much was spent on the Fredericton farm last year, and how much is proposed to be spent this year? Is the vacant position of superintendent of that farm to be filled right away?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The total amount spent last year was $40,482. The position of superintendent has been vacant for some time and is in the process of being filled. The position will have to be advertised by the Civil Service Commission, and that usually takes a couple of weeks. When the applications are all in, there will be the usual procedure of appointing a board to examine the applicants.

Mr. HANSON: How much is to be spent this year?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: $42,882, an increase of nearly $3,000.

Mr. HANSON: The work of that farm has been very largely curtailed; it does not appear that there will be any extension of activities in the coming year. I wish also to point out that in order to encourage good men to remain in the service, the principle of promotion should be adopted. The superintendent of the farm resigned last year, and the work has since been carried on by a man born on a good New Brunswick farm. He had the advantage of living on that farm for a considerable length of time, and subsequently had the advantage of experience in a banking institution. He has been acting as assistant superintendent for the past three years. I hope that his claims to promotion will be given serious consideration. The department can exercise considerable influence in the appointment of a new superintendent, and I trust that the principle of promotion will commend itself to the minister and his officials as applying to this case. It will not be a popular move if some one who is not now in the service is appointed to that position, and if what I have heard is true, it is the intention to bring in an outsider.

If such a course is followed it will not commend itself to the people of that community.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The principle enunciated by my hon friend is quite sound. I do not know the gentleman to whom he refers; I understand his name is Taylor.

Mr. HANSON: I do not happen to know him, either. I am not interested in him personally.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The principle is sound, and should be followed wherever possible. I would not like to say just how much influence we have in the matter of the appointment. If the deputy minister and myself, and, we will say, the Director of Experimental Farms, recommended that this man should be appointed, it would no doubt have some influence on the commission. Sometimes such representations have effect; at other times they do not, according to how strong our case is and what the other applicants are like. I take it that the advisory board would be governed by the ability of the various applicants, though they would no doubt take into consideration the fact that a certain employee was in the line of succession.

Mr. LEWIS: The suggestion has been made that the amount of this vote seems rather large, but considering the importance of agriculture I do not think it is at all excessive. In fact, I think it could be largely increased with a great amount of profit to the agrarian interests of Canada. The minister, speaking of the farm at Swift Curent, said that it was in a very primitive state. Did I understand him to say that a sum would be included in the Supplementary Estimates to provide this farm with buildings, or is the amount for that purpose included in the general vote for experimental farms?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Certain minor buildings will be taken care of by this vote. It is quite probable that when the Supplementary Estimates come down they will contain a further sum for buildings. That, of course, will depend on the condition of the finances of the country.

Mr. LEWIS: Will the minister give me the same information in respect to the Swift Current farm that he gave the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson), in respect to the amount spent last year and the appropriation for this year?

Mr. MICHAUD: The minister says that money will be voted to provide new buildings that are urgently needed to meet the conditions of agriculture in the West. Agriculture is a line of work which should not suffer through lack of this equipment, and we should not hesitate to vote the money necessary for that purpose. There are other parts of the country where money could profitably be spent on buildings of this kind, and I reserve the privilege of speaking on this subject on the first opportunity when other estimates are presented.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: With regard to the inquiry of my hon. friend (Mr. Lewis), I may say that there is an item of $75,000 in the Public Works estimates for repairs and extensions which would take care of certain necessary building at these various experimental farms. As I have said, the matter of going on with new buildings of any considerable size is still under consideration, and if any provision under that head is to be made, it will have to be included in an additional vote to be brought down later.

Mr. LEWIS: The minister said that $40,000 odd would be expended on the farm to which reference was made by the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson). Would he give me similar information in respect to Swift Current?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The amount spent last year was $19,450. This year is is $25,450.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is any appropriation included in this item to open up an experimental farm in northern British Columbia? We have a large area up there which is rich in an agricultural sense, lying in the neighbourhood of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. The conditions there are different from those existing in any other part of British Columbia, and different from those on the prairie. It is a country that will be very valuable in the future as a live stock country, and more particularly as a dairy country. It is very productive in the way of hay, roots, and such things as are necessary for the proper carrying on of dairying. The area up there is immense. It is a country that at the present time is perhaps a little subject to frost, but it is one where an experimental farm would render very valuable service, indeed, if established in the near future, to the settlers in that part of British Columbia. I would be glad to know if there is an appropriation included in this item for that purpose.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is one place I had in mind when I spoke of experimental farms. There is an appropriation of $30,000, but just where it will be expended I cannot say. It will take some time to select the locality. I am in hopes that next summer I shall be able to visit that country. The locality we had in mind for an experimental farm out there is on the main line of the Grand Trunk Pacific between the main range of mountains and the coast mountains. That is a splendid territory capable of a great deal of development in a colonization way. Of course, we cannot expect new settlers with very little resources to do much demonstration work and make a living. So far as my information goes, that will be the next district to have an experimental farm, but before making any decision I would like to visit that country, not only for that purpose, but for many other reasons. I had the pleasure of discussing this matter with a number of members from British Columbia, and they seemed to think that an experimental farm somewhere between the main range and the coast mountains is the proper place; but just where I am not prepared to say at the present time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: How many experimental farms are there in British Columbia at the present time, how many substations, and how many demonstration farms?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: There are four experimental farms, one sub-station, and I believe twelve illustration stations. I will give my hon. friend a list of them later. These illustration farms are small allotments running from twenty-five to forty acres, frequently leased from a local farmer. At all events, that is the usual practice on the prairie.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I should also like the number of substations and illustration farms in each of the provinces, with their area, also the amount expended in connection with each of them, particularly the expenditure, outside of the civil government vote, for the permanent farm labour on each farm, the wages of the foremen, superintendents, and so forth.

Mr. CALDWELL: May I ask if the minister expects to get a successor for Professor Saunders, who carried on insect pest research work in the maritime provinces, also what is being done with regard to devising ways and means of overcoming potato disease, finding out the cause and the best preventive measures.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I can now give my hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) a list of the illustration stations in British Columbia: Armstrong, Barriere, Comox, Frances Lake, Kamloops, Kerville, Prince George, Smithers, Salmon Arm, Telkwa and Vanderhoof.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I would also like to know the revenue derived from the farms in each of the provinces.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I presume my hon. friend means the gross revenue. There is not very much net revenue.

Mr. FORTIER: Are the expenses of the illustration farms included in this item? Is it the policy of the Government to establish more illustration farms in Canada?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In reply to the first question, yes. With regard to the establishment of more illustration farms, in the natural development of an institution of this kind there will, of course, be more farms. There are not very many in the different provinces, partly due to the fact that some of the provincial governments, the Ontario government, for instance, have taken up this kind of work, in a measure, and partly because there has not been a great demand for it, and such demand as there was, was being gratified. I remember that in the western provinces this work was being taken up in a small way before the Dominion government went into it. It is not an easy matter to get a suitable location and a suitable farmer to take charge of one of these illustration farms. The work is not overpaid, and it requires a lot of time and care, and a man with an experimental turn of mind, but in the majority of cases we are fairly successful. Occasionally we get a man who does not come up to our expectations, and in that case we eliminate him and get another man. There is no capital outlay in connection with these farms, except in one or two instances in the Peace river country, where a certain amount of capital has been expended. As a rule the land is just leased, the farms ranging from twenty-five to forty acres. We do not undertake much risk in these matters but occasionally our anticipations may not altogether be realized. Even so, I think the work can be extended with advantage.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: There is an increase in this item of $44,360. The minister has already practically promised about $30,000 of this increase for a farm in the northern part of British Columbia which will not leave very much money for meeting the necessities of other provinces. I would think that the province of Ontario is entitled to be treated more generously in the matter of farms of this character, but if the minister's plans are carried out there is not very much likelihood of it receiving more liberal treatment.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I may inform my hon. friend that there was no absolute promise given to my hon. friend from Victoria city. Accompanying any such promise was the reservation that I would like to see the locality, not in connection with this farm alone, but because many other reasons render a visit to British Columbia desirable. With the information at present at our disposal that is where the next experimental farm should be located. If my hon. friend can throw any additional light upon the matter that will help to change my opinion, as well as that of the Director of Experimental Farms, I shall be very glad to receive it from him. I hope I have an open mind on the subject. As a rule, however, these farms, when established in new territory prove far more useful than when located in the older parts of Canada. How can we teach Ontario people to farm when a hundred years of actual practice has done that most effectively?

PRIVATE BILLS

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 3, respecting The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.—Mr. Clark.

Bill No. 9, respecting The Canada Trust Company.—Mr. White.

Bill No. 10, to incorporate Canadian General Insurance Company.—Mr. Lanctot.

SECOND READING

Bill No. 28, respecting The T. Eaton General Insurance Company.—Mr. Sheard.

VANCOUVER, FRASER VALLEY AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY

On the motion for the second reading:

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), and some opposition has been raised to it. He, unfortunately, is not in the House to-night, but he requested me to ask for the permission of the House to move the bill into second reading, to have it referred to the proper committee, and to have that committee, a little later, appoint a special day on which all the opposition may be brought against the bill. If that is satisfactory to the House, I beg to move the second reading of the bill.

Mr. W. G. McQUARRIE (New Westminster): This is a bill to which I would direct tne particular attention of the House, because if this bill passes, it will have the effect of taking all the street railways in British Columbia out of the jurisdiction of the local authorities and placing them under the jurisdiction of the Dominion and the Board of Railway Commissioners. As stated by the hon. member who preceded me, there is a great deal of opposition to this bill. It is opposed by the Union of British Columbia Municipalities, the Union of Canadian Municipalities, and practically all the municipalities in which the company operates.

Mr. MANION: If I may interrupt the hon. member, I have received objections to the bill and was told by the promoter that if any objections should be made to its having a second reading I should let it stand. Rather than have objection carried further, I would move that the bill stand.

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): I understand that there are representatives here now from Vancouver and elsewhere in British Columbia who are opposed to the bill. It is possible that if the bill does not get the second reading to-night it may not be ready for reference to the Committee on Railways by the 25th, as arranged by its promoters from the West. I also am inclined to oppose such a bill but as the representatives are here from the West now, perhaps the hon. member, unless he desires to delay it, might allow it to go to the committee where it will be properly threshed out.

Mr. McQUARRIE: In the circumstances I will not discuss the bill further at this stage.

Motion agree to and bill read the second time.

SUPPLY

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee rose at six o'clock, Item No. 41, page 22 of the Estimates, was under consideration. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. SALES: Before we rose at six o'clock the minister was making some rather pertinent remarks regarding the value of experimental farms in new districts, and he seemed to be questioning the value of those in the old districts. I would call his attention to the situation in his own province with which he is very well acquainted. At Indian Head there is a farm which has been in operation for some years, I do not know just how many. By the Auditor General's Report for 1920 I see that that farm cost $44,482 that year, while the income from it was only $2,955.66. We have at Saskatoon, as the minister well knows, a large farm operated in connection with the university, at which all kinds of experiments can be conducted; forty-two miles distant is the experimental farm at Rosthern, and about one hundred miles west of it is another at Scott. Now, realizing the importance of economy at this particular time, I am wondering whether there is not a certain amount of duplication there—whether all that experimental work could not be better carried on at Saskatoon and the money thus saved employed usefully in some other direction. I am also wondering whether these farms as they become better established cannot be made self-sustaining. When one looks at the immense amount of money spent on them, and the small returns received from the sale of produce, the contrast is striking.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is a very interesting and important question. I think every member of the committee will recognize that no matter where the experimental farm may be located, there will surely be some local benefit accrue from it. When we rose at six o'clock I was discussing the relative values of experimental farms in old and new districts. I believe that in the new districts we will probably get three or four times as much value in proportion to our expenditure as we get in the older districts. That will hold good whether it is an old farm in a new district like Indian Head, or a new farm in an old district in Ontario. But inasmuch as the old farms were established at Brandon and Indian Head when these were new districts, naturally we are rather disposed to continue them.

With regard to the farms at Scott and Rosthern I think the latter was located before the university was established at Saskatoon, if I remember rightly.

Mr. SALES: I think so.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That accounts for its proximity of only forty miles. The farm at Scott is in a peculiar district in regard to soil, which is of an entirely different character to that around Saskatoon, and therefore I suppose the distance of only one hundred miles was not considered an objection to its location at that point. But quite apart from that, I cannot help thinking that since the University of Saskatchewan has been established at Saskatoon as a state university, that is, combining in its curriculum agriculture as well as the arts and sciences, the whole question of duplication might be considered. We have not yet had sufficient time to deal with it conclusively. But for the sake of standing by what is generally looked upon as a good thing, I do not think we should countenance duplication such as my hon. friend refers to. I have discussed this matter with Dean Rutherford of the Agricultural College on more than one occasion, having in view the possibility of some time merging those farms into the activities of the university. That can only be accomplished by the joint action of the province and the Dominion, but it is worth considering. As a good many of us know, the university authorities look forward to establishing a number of stations throughout Saskatchewan tributary to the university, and it occurs to me that some of these farms that we look upon as instances of duplication might be made part of the university's activities. Possibly the work might be entered into jointly by the Dominion and the province, we still retaining supervision over the work for a time, at all events.

There is no doubt that with respect to the older established farms we feel sometimes that we do not get full value for what they cost us. But it must be remembered that the value of the Indian Head farm when the old territories of Alberta and Saskatchewan were one was simply incalculable.

Mr. SALES: Agreed.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But that was thirty years ago. Despite present conditions, I feel almost like continuing that farm even though it may have passed the point of maximum usefulness for the sake of the work it has done in years gone by. But apart from sentimental reasons, there is no doubt the day will come when these older farms will be required for other purposes, such as stock breeding and multiplying certain new varieties of grains developed at the experimental farm here. For those purposes they are still useful, but a large proportion of their usefulness for the purposes for which they were originally designed has automatically passed away. That is unavoidable, and cannot be regarded as in any sense derogatory to the general plan of experimental farms.

But the point I wish to bring out is that during the first twenty-five years an experimental farm in a country like that is at its period of maximum usefulness to the community: that maximum, however, gradually declines as we pass into a new era, until finally the time arrives when we have to consider the question of soil fertility and cognate matters.

Mr SALES: I agree thoroughly with what the hon. minister has said with regard to the usefulness of these farms for the first twenty-five years, and as to their further usefulness afterwards as to stock breeding and seed multiplying areas. The only point I had in mind was not the cutting down of the estimates, but of seeing that we get as full value as we possibly can for the money spent. I know that he is so thoroughly familiar with his province that it is only necessary to draw his attention to the matter for him to do his very best to that end.

Mr. KNOX: The minister mentioned the differences between the soil at Scott and at Saskatoon. There is a vast portion of the province of Saskatchewan lying north of those points that has no experimental farm, and the difference in soil is far greater. I refer to the country lying north of probably townships 43 and 44. This is generally known as park country, and is devoted principally to stock-raising and dairying, besides raising grain fairly extensively. I hope the minister will keep this in mind so that if there is any change in the arrangements that portion of the West will be selected in which to conduct experiments. There is ample opportunity for establishing experimental stations in that northern country.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I gather from the information given by the minister that there are twenty-two or twenty-three experimental farms in the Dominion. How many of these are located in each province? And what is the basis for apportioning so many farms to each province?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not think there is any recognized basis. In the older districts they had to do without experimental farms in the earlier days. For instance, if one hundred years ago a philanthropist had offered to give assistance in this respect—for there was no government money for the purpose in those days—there would have been many opportunities for the establishment of experimental farms in the old provinces of Ontario and Quebec. But to-day the tendency—and I think it is a correct one—is to establish these farms where they will do the most good, to assist the new settler in demonstrating the capabilities of the particular area in which he has cast his lot rather than oblige him to do the demonstrating himself and at the same time try to make a living. In such cases the government comes to the rescue. Such is the farm at Indian Head, referred to a few moments ago by the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. Sales). Such is the one we have in view along the line of the Transcontinental in British Columbia, about which the hon. gentleman for Victoria city (Mr. Tolmie) spoke. The requirements of some of the provinces are not so great in this respect; they are settled and established; their people have for the last hundred years been demonstrating the possibilities and capabilities of those areas. I do not think it would be wise to establish an arbitrary basis, relating to population, geographical division, or otherwise, upon which the opening up of experimental farms should be carried on.

Mr. CARMICHAEL: I judge from the remarks of the minister that there is no particular basis upon which these farms are established; I presume the district that brings the greatest pressure to bear upon him gets the farm. I remind the minister, then, that our district is new, and assure him that we are going to bring a lot of pressure to bear upon him in the near future.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have particular sympathy for my hon. friend, because I have had very pleasant relations with that territory.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I have always felt that legislation originating in this Parliament is of a federal nature, and that we should look at things from the point of view of the general welfare of the whole country, not from the narrow or provincial point of view. But I am inclined to think that instead of broadening out, instead of having an outlook more national in its character, we are really becoming more provincial than we were a few years ago. I am sorry to have to admit it, but that seems to be the case. I believe there has been a disposition on the part of the older provinces to meet the requirements of the newer districts so far as that can reasonably be done. It is a somewhat significant thing that of late years there has been a tendency to make it appear that the agricultural industry has been receiving great consideration at the hands of the government. I am not now referring to any particular government; this has been the case with all governments. There has been a tendency to vote large sums of money for agricultural purposes, sometimes with no proper conception of what real value shall be obtained for the expenditure made. In some instances where large grants have been given we have not received, I am inclined to think, the value that we should. Furthermore, the provinces are not as careful in the expenditure of grants made to them by the federal government as they would be of moneys raised by themselves. I am satisfied that in our own province—and I am referring now not only to experimental farms, but to other things for which we have been voting money—there is a tendency to say: Well, this money comes very easily; we will let it go very easily.

I hope no one will think that I underestimate the value of experimental farms. In fact, I attach much more importance to them and to their value than the Minister of Agriculture does, judging from his remark that after a farm has been established for twenty-five years, seventy-five per cent of its value disappears. On the contrary, my view is that the older the province or district becomes and the more the science of agriculture develops from year to year, the greater is the need for experimental work. I am not sure that some of the difficulties which are being experienced in some of the newer districts could not be overcome if we had better system of experimental farms, and the work was brought home to the people a little more closely than it now is. While the land is new, rich and fertile, it is an easy matter to settle on it and carry on what is called farming, but a great deal of which is not farming at all but exploitation of the fertility which has been stored up in the soil for centuries.

So far as Ontario is concerned, we have never taken exception to any grants that have been made for experimental farms in the newer districts. But I hold in my hand a pamphlet issued and circulated all over Canada by the Dominion Experimental Farm, on the face of which is a map indicating the location of the various farms, throughout Canada. It is somewhat significant that from the Central Experimental Farm, located at Ottawa, in the extreme eastern part of the province, you can go west for five hundred miles into what is a fairly good agricultural district in Ontario and you will not find another experimental farm, with the exception of a small experimental station for tobacco growing in the county of Kent. Moreover, there are three, four, or five farms in each of the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba. When you come to Ontario there is practically a blank; when you come to Quebec, you will find that it is dotted with farms, and so on down through the maritime provinces.

Now, this thing has surely reached the stage where we shall have to register some objection to what has been going on. It is true that in 1916 a farm was established in the bush in northern Ontario, and I believe it is doing good work,—I was a strong advocate of having something done there. But that does not remedy the difficulty. The old settled districts of Ontario have been forced to establish farms themselves, and between those farms and the Dominion system of experimental farms there is no connection. We were passing estimates last night to encourage immigration: you will find that the first thing a prospective immigrant wants to know is what are the possibilities of the various provinces, and he will naturally look at the report of the experimental farms as found in these circulars and in other literature sent out by the Experimental Farms branch. An injustice is done to Ontario, or to any other province, when it does not figure prominently in these publications.

The statement has frequently been made that the Central Experimental Farm near the city of Ottawa serves the whole province of Ontario, and that the money expended in connection with that farm is money expended on the province of Ontario. I think any one who understands the situation will agree that the Central farm has been located near this city for the benefit of the whole Dominion, and that many of the officials connected with it are carrying on their work in the different provinces. The Central farm consists of 467 acres and was established in 1886. There is one feature about the Central farm to which I am going to call the attention of the committee, and I am not bringing this matter up to-night simply because we have a new government and a new minister, because I have done the same thing when conditions were different. I have pointed out before that there is an absolute waste of money in connection with our experimental farm system, and that we do not get that efficient supervision and management to which we are entitled. On looking over the public accounts for the present year I was somewhat surprised to find that notwithstanding the deflation which has taken place in practically every other branch of the service, there was expended on the Central farm near Ottawa during the past year for ordinary farm labour no less a sum than $179,387.18. That is an increase of about $40,000. I do not know whether the increase in the estimates before us is to meet the deficit the minister expects next year. It is true that he gave what practically amounted to a promise to establish a new farm in British Columbia if conditions warranted it, but an increase of $40,000 for farm labour on this little farm close to the city of Ottawa is surely something that requires an explanation under present conditions. An experimental farm in order to render service must show that it is able to practise the methods it is endeavouring to teach. Otherwise, if it merely exists for conducting experiments, it need not be conducted on so large a scale. This increase in the cost of farm labour at the Central farm will seem strange to many who have not inquired into this matter, but I have seen this increase going on year after year. I have paid close attention to what is going on, and I am satisfied that the Central farm near Ottawa is more of a show place for visitors from all over the Dominion than it is an experimental farm. It is all very well to grow tomatoes and oranges in January and February under glass, but is that rendering any good service to the people of this community? Is that the sort of experiments we want? The province of Ontario is establishing a new farm in the county of Kent, with a view to developing the possibilities in that part of the province. We have also a fruit farm at Vinelands in the Niagara district. The returns show that the province of Ontario grows practically all the tender fruits, and yet the province itself has to establish and maintain these farms. The Dominion government has absolutely refused to give any assistance. There is another farm at Kemptville, which was established and is maintained by the provincial government. Then there is the experimental farm in connection with the agricultural college at Guelph, which is also maintained by the province. This province pays nearly one-half of the customs revenue of the country, about 48 per cent, and yet it is compelled to establish and maintain its own experimental farms. We get practically no consideration from the Government in this matter.

The minister states that an experimental farm cannot do the good in an old settled district that it can in a new country. That may be, but I believe there are about twenty-five illustration farms in the province of Quebec, and not one in the province of Ontario. An illustration station or something of that kind might be all that would be required in a new district, where you have not the facilities for carrying on scientific work. I pointed out a year ago when the estimates of this department were up for consideration that the factory output of dairy products in one small county of Ontario was greater than the output of the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and British Columbia combined. This goes to show what can be done by intensive farming, and it is something that an experimental farm should bring home to the people. The experimental farms should blaze the way and show the people of this country that they can practise what they preach; they should lead, and not simply follow. Otherwise, the money expended is very largely wasted.

The minister pointed out in his opening remarks that a farm was going to be established in the province of British Columbia. I believe there was some idea last year, and it may still be under consideration, of establishing a flax experimental station somewhere in western Ontario. I am not sure whether the purchase of a site has been made. It is true that during the war flax growing increased very considerably in Ontario. In one part of western Ontario people went into it on quite a large scale, and many of them were practically ruined as a result. As long ago as I can remember there have been numerous flax mills in western Ontario, and looking over the territory where they were located forty years ago you can see the effects of flax growing in that district up to this day. In the months of June and July those lands are as yellow as can be with wild mustard which was introduced and went to seed on these lands, and it has been impossible to eradicate it. You could not induce any one in that district who had experience in the growing of flax in the early days to engage in that industry to-day. There may be a considerable amount of flax being grown in western Ontario to-day, but that is only a temporary condition, because we cannot compete with the cheap labour of such countries as India, Belgium and Russia, where they have grown flax successfully for years. I know there are experiments being conducted at the Experimental Farm along that line, and during the time flax growing was a profitable industry no doubt such experiments served a useful purpose. That is the great value of an experimental farm.

But I want to emphasize the fact that the newer districts are not so much in need of experimental work as the old districts are. It is in the latter that scientific methods must be applied, and we must adopt different methods from those we have followed in the past even in the old districts, if we are going to successfully compete with other agricultural countries where labour and land are much cheaper. All you have to do to realize that fact is to look at the imports into Canada. Then you will find that even with conditions as they are at the present time, staple commodities such as we can grow without any difficulty in this country are being imported and sold in our own markets notwithstanding the fact that we have very substantial duties upon such importations. Imagine, if you can, the conditions such as we have had during the year, ending on 31st March last, when over two million pounds of butter were brought into Canada from Great Britain under the British preference and sold to our people. Let me remind my hon. friends to my left that exporters from Great Britain can send commodities into Canada at a cheaper rate than they can be imported from United States. Millions of pounds are being imported into the Dominion under the conditions as they now exist. Look at the imports of bacon and beef, and other food products that are entering the country. Look at the quantity of eggs which is now being imported into Canada under the conditions I have described. We must adopt different methods if we are going to compete with other countries; although I understand the policy of hon. members opposite, and of hon. members to my left, to be to put all foodstuffs on the free list. The Lord only knows what will happen to the Canadian farmer when that day comes, because under the present conditions it is utterly impossible for the farmer in the old districts to compete with the outside world in production of their foodstuffs.

I ask the minister to say to-night whether he can—with all the money that has been spent, amounting to a million and a quarter or a half of dollars—state the actual cost of production of one of the articles I have mentioned at the farm? He is unable to do so, he makes no attempt to comply with the request. Individual farmers are conducting experiments along this line and are able to do so; but if you wait for information from the experimental farm on that question you will wait a long time.

Now, these are some of the things that I think might well engage the attention of the Government and Parliament on this occasion. I say we are not getting value for the money we are expending in this direction; and it is not fair to those who are engaged in agriculture to point to the millions of dollars that are being spent for supposedly agricultural purposes and then say, "How well you are being taken care of." Before the House rose at six o'clock I asked some questions with regard to the number of experimental farms in each province with a view to ascertaining the cost of carrying on these farms and the revenue derived therefrom. I think the minister and those associated with him in the department should be able to place before the committee some of the actual benefits that have resulted from the experiments carried on at these farms. They should be able to show what the actual cost of production is, and whether such methods of farming could be carried on at a profit or not. To my mind that is one of the important things that an experimental farm should be able to demonstrate. I would ask the minister therefore whether he is able to give the committee the information asked for in regard to these matters.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: My deputy has the information here but it is not classified in exactly the way in which my hon. friend wants it. While he is compiling it in the desired form I might answer my hon. friend in respect to two or three other matters. My hon. friend from South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) has almost convinced me that the province of Ontario is very much slighted in the matter of the distribution of experimental farms. If with all this new information he has placed at my disposal I can equalize these matters somewhat I am sure I shall be delighted to do so. I am informed that one experimental farm has been established of recent years at Kapuskasing. My predecessor in office, very wisely, I think, on the advice of his deputy and the Director of Experimental Farms located that farm in what is known as New Ontario along the line of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. If any error was committed in this respect Mr. Burrell was at fault but I do not think he did err; it was a logical thing to do. There may come a time when we will have sufficient revenues to establish these institutions in the old as well as the new districts; but so long as our means are limited surely the new districts are the proper places in which to establish these farms in order to obtain the maximum results from the money expended. I am told there has been a tobacco station established at Harrow.

Mr. GRAHAM: It is in my riding.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, in the county of Essex. I think it is one of the greatest possible compliments to old Ontario that her agriculture is in such a highly developed condition that she does not require any of these experimental farms or demonstration stations. Our forefathers did the demonstrating in old Ontario fifty and one hundred years ago at immense toil and labour. To-day Parliament comes to the assistance of the new districts and undertakes demonstrations which the old pioneers in Ontario had to do for themselves.

My hon. friend seems to be quite positive that we have not been able to demonstrate at the Central Experimental 9 p.m. Farm what it cost to produce various commodities. Even if that were true I do not think we would be subject to any great amount of censure, because you cannot farm on a commercial scale when you are carrying on experiments at experimental farms or demonstration stations. I do not know that any such institution in the world was ever expected to show as good results as a farm conducted on a commercial scale. Notwithstanding that fact, however, I am informed that many of the Government bulletins and pamphlets do contain figures of the very nature the hon. member desires, showing exactly the cost of producing butter, eggs, meat and many other commodities grown on the farm. Such a thing is not always done by experimental farms because as a rule the showing obtained by them is not as good, measured by dollars and cents, as in the case of commercial farming. That is not the way we measure the value of the experimental farms; but, however, that is too big a subject to enter upon to-night. I merely give the hon. member the information he asks for and I do not make these remarks in any spirit of criticism of my hon. friend. I would say this however: There is a general impression—formed from speeches made sometimes in this House or from careless remarks uttered by gentlemen outside—that these experimental farms are simply huge centres of slothfulness and uselessness, just simply a resort where people can congregate, a sort of haven of refuge, a sort of agricultural senate as it were. That is not the case. Then we have another class of gentlemen—I will not say in the House although I have heard it myself—who never miss an opportunity of slandering the Civil Service of this country, claiming they are enjoying huge salaries, and that they are tumbling over each other and working only one-half the time. Personally I do not believe the greater part of that kind of talk. I have not discovered it at all events. That kind of cheap popularity does not go very far.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is the hon. gentleman sure about what he says regarding the Senate?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I was just in need of an illustration at the time, and I could not think of anything else.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman may have ambitions himself before long.

Mr. McBRIDE: I should like to say a word in connection with the establishment of an experimental farm at some point along the line of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I fully agreed with the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) when he said it would greatly contribute to the welfare of the district if an experimental farm should be established in that part of the country. There is a growing community; in fact, no other community that I know has a brighter prospect than the one along the line of the Grand Trunk Pacific if the people there are properly looked after in this matter of agricultural education. Many people are coming in from the prairie provinces and settling; and numbers of our returned men have settled there. It is a new district and the people do not know what they can grow to the best advantage and in greatest quantity, so that it is in the interest of everybody that an experimental farm should be established there. An hon. member stated that the growing of flax impoverishes the soil. I worked in the old country on a farm where flax had been grown for a hundred years; it is being grown there still, and I believe it will be grown there for another hundred years. Flax is one of the best paying crops that they have in the old country, and I do not think the hon. member who made that statement was speaking from practical experience. I think the Minister of Agriculture is using very good judgment in proposing to establish an experimental farm at some point along the Grand Trunk Pacific. Such a farm would do a great deal of good, and I hope the hon. members on this side of the House will support the proposition.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Is an experimental farm going to be established at Candora, Saskatchewan? A few years ago the department purchased a quarter section there for that purpose; but for some reason nothing was done. The people in that district are anxious to know whether an experimental farm is going to be established there.

Mr. WARD: When the minister is spreading these farms around, I hope he will not forget Dauphin.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I should like to hold out some hopes to all hon. gentlemen with regard to this matter, and I believe I can. My deputy informs me that the item of $30,000, of which I spoke before six o'clock, as being for the establishment of one farm, is for two farms. One of them is to be established along the line of the Grand Trunk Pacific near the coast. I do not know where the other one is to be established, and I want to keep all hon. members guessing with respect to that. If hon. members have any recommendations to make, I would ask them not to do so by correspondence, as I am overwhelmed now. As they see me in the corridors and elsewhere, I shall be happy to receive representations. I may say that many places have been mentioned as second choice. It is thought that in these new districts, $30,000 would be sufficient to buy two new farms without very much building on it, and that is the first step towards the establishment of an experimental farm. Therefore, there is hope for all members yet, even though the tentative selection with regard to British Columbia becomes a permanent one.

I have now the information for which the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) asked. It is as follows:

Prince Edward Island—1 experimental farm.
Nova Scotia—2 experimental farms with 12 illustration stations.
Quebec—4 experimental farms, with 33 illustration stations and 1 tobacco station.
Ontario—2 experimental farms, with one tobacco station at Kent.
Manitoba—2 experimental farms.
Saskatchewan—4 experimental farms, with eleven illustration stations.
Alberta—2 experimental farms with two substations and 13 illustration stations.
British Columbia—4 experimental farms, with 1 sub-station and 12 illustration stations.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I think the figures which have just been submitted by the minister substantiate practically every word that I said. I was a little surprised that the minister should make any reference to anyone making remarks with a view to obtaining some cheap popularity. As regards the Civil Service, I made a statement regarding the amount paid for farm labour on the Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa, the amount being $179,600, which I considered was altogether out of proportion to the necessities of the Central farm. Before six o'clock, the minister practically told us that there was $30,000 in the Estimates for an experimental farm in British Columbia. He says now that there is apparently a demand from practically every constituency for an experimental farm; that three of them are going to be established, and, consequently, he is going to keep us all guessing, so that we shall all be in good humour and hopeful as long as no more definite information than that is furnished. This is a serious matter, and it is one that it is not very pleasant to refer to. I have criticized sometimes when people thought that I should not criticize; but I believe I have been sincere in every word that I have ever uttered in regard to the injustice that has been done to Ontario. The minister very glibly refers to Ontario, and, according to him, it is a great compliment to the people of Ontario that they do not require experimental farms. They do require experimental farms; they are establishing them, and they are paying for them. Because the Dominion government will not do that they have to do it themselves. The minister made reference to the farm at Kapuskasing. I referred to the fact that a farm had been established at Kapuskasing down in the bush where an illustration farm would do just as good work as a farm involving a large expenditure of money. But before that farm was established, the province of Ontario established, near the Grand Trunk Pacific, at Monteith, an experimental farm which had been conducted for a number of years before the Dominion government established the one at Kapuskasing. Even with the experimental farm at Kapuskasing, what do we find? We find another one in Quebec a short distance from it. Consequently, these two farms are very close together; but for over 500 miles west from the Central Experimental Farm, you will not find another experimental farm in the chief agricultural district of Ontario. We are not clamouring for the establishment of experimental farms; we have not been urging their establishment upon the Government, because, during the last few years, everyone knows the need for economy. The time has surely come when we must practise economy everywhere, in this House and outside of it, if we are going to overcome the difficulties with which we are confronted. There is no need of imagining that, by making appeals for assistance in a certain locality or constituency, we are going to get something for that constituency and that we are going to overcome our difficulties in that way. We must assist the Government to the utmost of our power in endeavouring to meet conditions which are very difficult. That is the reason why I am pointing out these things and stating that this extravagance which is being practised on the Central Experimental Farm, must cease, or we cannot expect to see practised in other branches of the Government that economy which should be practised.

It is really worth while studying the Auditor General's Report. We have been paying a bonus to the civil servants, and that bonus has been going to men engaged as labourers on the Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa. That method applied throughout. Many of these people were hired for a few months, but a great many were employed by the year, and in addition to the salary they drew they were given a bonus. I do not know whether that was the case last year, but certainly it was the year before. The experimental farm system in this country has become so lopsided that I think the remarks made by the member for Saltcoats (Mr. Sales) might very well be considered. If some provinces have to do all this work, I think the time has arrived when each province should conduct its own experiments. Certainly one province should not be discriminated against and another province shown favour. There should be a more equitable system than the one now in vogue.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: While Ontario really has only two experimental farms, nevertheless in this Central Farm there is more work being done and more money spent than in any other province in the Dominion.

Mr. LEGER: The minister says that there are in New Brunswick one experimental farm and twelve illustration stations. What are the locations of these stations, and where is the experimental farm?

Mr. PRITCHARD: Are there any demonstration farms in any of the provinces?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: They are really all demonstration farms. They are usually classified into experimental farms, demonstration farms, and illustration stations. These are all really interchangeable terms, but by usage they have been applied to designate particular kinds of farms.

Mr. PRITCHARD: I have listened with interest to the discussion for several minutes, and I think profitable contributions have been made by the member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) and some other members. I sympathise with a good deal of what the minister has said. The experimental farms have done good work in the various provinces throughout the Dominion, and I agree with the minister to this extent, that there is perhaps more need of experimental stations in new sections, because settlers going into these places do not know what the land is adapted to grow, and the Government should bear the expense of experimenting on crops in those sections for a time. In Ontario we need a demonstration farm. My idea of such a farm is one conducted under the supervision of government officials on a purely self-paying basis, so that the actual expense to the Government would be very little if any. I have thought for some time that the ideal experimental farm could be conducted in such a way that all that would be required to prove whether or not it was successfully managed would be the expense of a book-keeper. Such a farm should have the services of a graduate of one of the Ontario agricultural colleges. Let him turn his college education to practical account in the locality in which he is stationed, and demonstrate to the people that farming can be carried on successfully. He could eliminate a good deal of the cost which we have in connection with the experimental farms to-day. We should encourage, through our agricultural colleges and experimental farms, the proper use of a system of book-keeping. Every successful farmer should keep a system of books and from time to time, or annually, examine them to see whether there has been a profit or a loss for the twelve months. In other words, the farm should be managed, so far as its accounts are concerned, just as an ordinary business is conducted. I do not see why this cannot be done in the older parts of the provinces, at any rate, in connection with the government experimental farms. The expense entailed by this system would be trifling to the Government, while the educational value to the people would be very considerable indeed. I submit that this is something we need very much, and this is what I mean by a demonstration farm.

Mr. SALES: I agree with my hon. friend (Mr. Pritchard) and I have been thinking about the same thing for half an hour. As a matter of fact, I had, written on a sheet of paper, a suggestion which I will now offer to the minister, that in addition to the $30,000 for the new provinces that need experimental farms, he could save $30,730 on Rosthern and $26,256 on Scott, by placing these farms on a commercial basis. They are well located, their lands are good, and they have good buildings; and I would charge them a moderate interest, say 5 per cent, and let them pay their way and prove that farming can be made a commercial success. Since coming to Ottawa and attending the meetings of the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization, I have found that a good many of our friends think that we are pulling a sort of poor mouth and stretching our tale of woe a little too much. They cannot believe that conditions are as we say. Well, here is a chance for the Government themselves actually to prove where the fault lies and whether the farmer is really a poor business man who does not work long enough hours. I find in the Public Accounts that the farm at Rosthern pays $14,443 for labourers' wages, in addition to a superintendent and assistant superintendent at a total of nearly $6,000 more, while Scott pays $17,500 for labour and overseeing. I know men who work farms of the same size from which they do not receive a total income in any way approaching these amounts spent in wages. I am sure the minister and his department would perform a really useful service if they would put two or three of these farms on a real commercial basis for a few years.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): The other night I asked the minister a question with regard to the record of performance in the poultry industry and he informed me that the matter would be taken up to-night. Previous ministers in the late government put into effect a record of performance of a practical nature along the lines suggested by the member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland). In the year 1919-20 there were entered 4,437 birds, of which 823, or a percentage of 16.7, received certificates for 150 eggs and over per year, while there was a small percentage, 1.8, that got the advanced certificate for 225 eggs. All these birds had to lay eggs of at least two ounces in weight. The next year the number of birds entered was increased to 7,158, or an increase of 69 per cent. This year the number is 11,489, or 80 per cent of an increase, with 122 breeders. Does the minister intend to keep pace with the increase in these birds and follow up the work started by the late government, which is of a practical character and from which much benefit can be derived. If he does that, and it is increased to the extent that seems probable with the work started on the first of November next year, I should like to know if he has made any provision in his estimates for, say, doubling that line of work.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. The work is well begun, and I think I cannot do better than continue it.

These are the names of the stations in New Brunswick with the counties and operators:

Name of station	County	Operator
Apohaqui	Kent	J. H. Manchester.
Adamsville	Kings	J. A. Arsenault.
Boundary Creek	Westmoreland	M. Steeves.
Little Shemogue	Westmoreland	A. Oulton.
Lower Derby	Northumberland	W. R. Taylor.
Middle Coverdale	Albert	H. E. Mitton.
Millville	York	P. Graham.
Perth	Victoria	R. J. McCrea.
Rexton	Kent	J. G. Dickinson.
Woodstock	Carleton	E. W. Turner.

Replying to the hon. members for Dundas (Mr. Elliott) and Saltcoats (Mr. Sales) with respect to operating these farms on a commercial basis, that used to be discussed many years ago when these farms were first established. It was often contended, that even the experimental farm at Ottawa should show a profit, and the gentleman in charge of it at the time was occasioned a good deal of worry because he could not show a credit balance. Well, if it is a real experimental and demonstration farm, I do not think it ever will show a profit in dollars and cents; in fact, I do not see how it could be done. I need not point out to the committee that there are limitations which make it impossible to operate any of these farms on a commercial basis. No plan of farming will show a profit equal to the plan followed by the peasant proprietor. How is government operation of a farm to compare with private operation? How can you make a comparison from which it is possible to draw any intelligent conclusion? There will always be a certain amount of "frills" connected with government operation, no matter how carefully the farm may be managed. The average man looking on realizes that the manager of one of these experimental farms has the whole resources of the Dominion behind him, and if his crops are ruined by hail he is not "up against it". Therefore Mr. Average Man knows that the socalled commercial possibilities of such a farm would be of no avail to him. But we are entering upon a very practical age, and I shall be delighted if anyone will show me how our administration of any farm, whether at Rosthern, Scott or anywhere else, can be such as to combine benefit to the surrounding country and commercial profit.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I do not think the minister is taking the right interpretation. As to making an experimental farm a paying concern, I think there is no one so foolish as to even dream of such a thing. But it has been contended that some of this land that is being used for illustration and experimental purposes, but particularly for the former—we have not any illustration farms in Ontario, although I see there are thirty-three in Quebec and fifteen in the western provinces—could be utilized to demonstrate whether farming can be carried on at a profit. I do not think it is too much to ask that that should be done, in view of the fact that every dollar that has ever been asked for experimental purposes has been ungrudgingly voted. After all these years, and in view of the present very trying conditions for those engaged in agriculture, it is only fair that some object lessons should be available that would help them very considerably.

Mr. BROWN: Knowing the conditions of farming, does not the minister think it would be a valuable thing to this country if what we have often contended could be abundantly demonstrated, namely, that farming can only be carried on profitably where we have a large amount of unpaid labour in the shape of women and children? We have made that assertion very frequently in our conventions, and I do not think it can be contradicted. We have been contending for some time, and we are trying to contend here, that under present conditions, and applying purely commercial principles, farming cannot be made a success. We are sometimes told that we are not businesslike in managing our farm affairs, and then we have the admission—and I believe it is a true admission—that the only man who can get the most out of farming is he who, like the peasant, gives himself wholly to it and has the assistance of his wife and children.

In the Committee on Agriculture to-day it was suggested that we should adopt dairying to a larger extent. Now, the only man who can make money out of dairying to-day is the man with a growing family whom he can exploit for a little time during their growing years and get their unpaid labour, and then they are driven from the farm. It would be a very good thing if that could be so clearly demonstrated on one of these farms that every one in Canada would understand the condition that agriculture is in.

Mr. LEGER: There are some sections of our part of the country in which experimental or demonstration farms should be established in order to encourage the farmers. We have an experimental farm in the extreme west of the province, but it is some hundred miles from the shore counties, where there is a large area of great agricultural value. Farming is certainly the backbone of the country and it should be encouraged in every possible way. I would invite the minister's attention, therefore, to the case of my province. We are certainly not doing as well as we should, due to the fact that in some sections we have no encouragement whatever in the way of experimental farms. The illustration stations may be very good, but they serve only the district immediately surrounding them, which is a very small area indeed. I would invite the minister to visit our part of the country and see the conditions with respect to farming there; he might be encouraged to do something in this connection. As I have intimated, the western part of the province is well looked after, but the eastern part, along the north shore, has been neglected. I would ask the minister to give this matter his serious consideration.

Mr. WARNER: We are talking about experimental farms and demonstration farms, and I am rather afraid we are confusing the two. As I understand it, an experimental farm is a farm that will do many things that we are not expecting a profit from—I mean, directly, on that farm. The minister is justified, I think, in saying that he does not think it possible to put an experimental farm on a commercial basis. However, there is room for experimental farms, and, as some hon. members have said, there is room for demonstration. An experimental farm can demonstrate, more or less, but a demonstration farm would have to work along the line upon which the ordinary farmer carries on his actual work, and not very much experimenting could be done if it was hoped to make a profit. That is why the ordinary farmer expects the Dominion experimental farms to experiment; he does not want to have to do it himself. I support the idea of demonstration. We have had farms that we called demonstration farms in Alberta. I am not prepared to say just how much they have demonstrated, but I do not think they have made much profit. I do think they have made a mistake in going into the experimenting line; in my opinion, the purpose of a demonstration farm should be to demonstrate whether the methods we know of can be made to pay. The difference, then, between a demonstration farm and an experimental farm should be kept in mind. Some of the money spent in experimenting may be quite unproductive of results; in other cases, the results attained may be worth much more than the cost—that is the way we have to look at the work of an experimental farm. A demonstration farm which can make a success of the employment of scientific methods would be just as valuable to Canada to-day as an experimental farm. I would not expect it to make money, but if it can be done, I would like to see it done. But I would like to see these two things, demonstration farms and experimental farms, looked at from a different standpoint, rather than one taking the place of the two.

Mr. STANSELL: The minister has stated that the farm here at Ottawa, which is known as the Central Experimental Farm but which most of us call the Dominion Experimental Farm, is receiving more money than many of the others put together. I am quite willing to admit that I have a very high opinion of the work that is being done there. But it has occurred to most hon. members that owing to its geographical location this Central Experimental Farm is of equal value to Ontario and Quebec. I would not have mentioned this had it not been for the fact that in answer to a question put by the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland), the minister stated that outside of the Central Experimental Farm, which, as I have pointed out, serves equally the two old provinces, there are two smaller illustration or experimental farms in Ontario and thirty-eight in Quebec. I am sure that many of us have wondered what conditions gave rise to the necessity for a difference of thirty-six as between the two provinces.

Mr. SPENCER: A statement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) a few minutes ago brought to my mind a subject to which I have given a great deal of thought. He said that in order to make farming pay it was necessary to have a peasant proprietorship. Too many people have been thinking along these lines and making statements of this kind. At present, high as wages are, those paid on the farm do not equal those paid in other industries. That is one of the reasons why it is difficult to get the very best class of labour on the farm—and it is only the very best class of labour that you want on the farm. Just as much skill is required on the farm as is necessary in any other industry; in many respects a great deal more skill is required. This matter of a man working a farm on a family basis, that is, using his family to work that farm without wages, does not tend to the ultimate good of the country. When the people are ignorant you can do that sort of thing and keep the boys at home. But when they begin to know anything at all; when the boys and the girls go to school, they soon learn where the highest wages are paid. Just as soon as they are old enough to work they will leave the farm for higher wages. You will never have a successful immigration until you put the farming industry on a business footing where it can be made to pay. I saw in the paper the other day that the farmer and labour elements would never agree, because while labour wanted an eight-hour day, the farmer wanted a fifteen-hour day. I want to assure the hon. members of this House that the farmers do not want a fifteen-hour day, and the sooner they get down to an eight or a ten-hour day the better they will be pleased, and the better it will be for the country. You can never build up a country by asking a certain part of it to work for fourteen or sixteen hours a day, while the rest of the country is working a much shorter day. We hear a great deal nowadays of the back-to-the-land movement, but the people who are advocating that are the ones who do not intend to go back to the land themselves. Just as soon as the Government can demonstrate that farming conducted on rational lines can be made to pay like any other business, even if a few extra hours have to be put in, then you will have immigrants coming to this country and they will stay here. But as long as you are content with saying that farming can only pay when it is conducted on the family basis, where the family work themselves without wages, you will never populate the country.

Mr. PRITCHARD: I do not think the minister quite understood my suggestion. I quite appreciate that the experimental farms can do a good deal for every province in the breeding of live stock, poultry and that kind of thing, and experiments along that line carried on at the Central Farm here will be just as beneficial as experiments carried on in British Columbia. My suggestion was not to carry on a demonstration farm at all like an experimental farm, with expensive buildings and lands, but to take a graduate of the Agricultural College and put him on an ordinary farm, let him run it in a businesslike way, and simply go over his books at the end of the year, to see if it is possible for a capable man to make farming pay. All the expense the Government will be put to will be that of auditing his books. If you cannot show that a capable man can make farming pay, you will not get many immigrants coming to this country to farm. This Government, so far as I know, has never done anything to show that farming can be made to pay if carried on in a businesslike way.

[Mr. Spence.]

Mr. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): I was encouraged to get on my feet when I heard the minister say that demonstration farms are of greatest benefit in the new territories. In my constituency, up in the Peace river district, we have a great new territory. I am not now asking for a demonstration farm, though some people up there have been asking for another one. The great difficulty there at the present time is freight rates. The Peace river country lies three to four hundred miles northwest of Edmonton. There is an experimental station at Beaver Lodge, and I believe that the gentleman who is in charge of that station is within measurable distance of proving that clover seed can be grown as a commercial proposition there. I believe he is badly handicapped for money this year, and I would ask the minister to take in consideration the needs of that part of the country. If the farmers can grow clover seed there on a commercial basis, the freight rates would not be nearly so oppressive as at the present time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: In reply to my hon. friend who spoke of the large number of experimental farms in the province of Quebec, some thirty-eight in number, he made the mistake of bunching them all together. Thirty-three of these are just small illustration farms of twenty to twenty-five acres, and the farmer is paid about four dollars an acre for operating the farm. There is no overhead expenditure, no capital outlay, and few signs to indicate that it is a Dominion Government illustration farm. There are only four experimental farms in the province of Quebec, the other thirty-three being illustration stations that have been located where they were asked for. These farms in the province of Quebec have nearly all been organized during the last two or three years, and whatever credit may be coming to any one in connection therewith may be credited to the gentleman who preceded me in this office. I think some credit is coming to him, because these farms are doing a useful work. So let us get rid of the idea that there are thirty-eight experimental farms in the province of Quebec as against two in Ontario. The reason there are thirty-three illustration farms in the province of Quebec is that the people of that province have applied for them, while there have been very few applications, until quite recently, from the province of Ontario. Applications are beginning to come in now, however, and we anticipate locating a number of these farms in Ontario this summer.

Mr. WHITE: There was nothing to indicate whether the farms in the list the minister read out were three acres or three hundred in extent, and that is how I got my impression that there were many more experimental farms in Quebec than in Ontario.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Quite right. Replying to my hon. friend who stated that a farm cannot be made to pay except as a self-contained unit operated by the members of the family, I think the past year has demonstrated that. As a matter of fact it was demonstrated in this province forty years ago when I was here. There were very few farms here then, more particularly in eastern Ontario, that were not operated as self-contained units, each supplying within itself a great deal of the raw material that went into the clothing of the family, as well as its food. Very few wages were paid out in this province forty years ago. In the western provinces as a result of the deflation of prices, on the one hand, and the high cost of farm implements and equipment, on the other, we have not been able to make it go under a system of hired labour. And if you had happened to go through the constituencies as I have—for example I passed through the constituency of the hon. member for Saltcoats (Mr. Sales) just as harvest was beginning this year; the rust struck that country pretty severely and everybody was rushed on the farm—you would find families there with the boss—as we call him—on the binder, or a boy, maybe only thirteen or fourteen years of age, on the binder, and the parents and a number of children doing the stooking—a self contained unit. That may not be the ideal way to farm but that was the way in which the province of Ontario was largely pioneered—by self contained units.

When I said that the best way to get men on the farm to-day was to operate the farm on the principle of peasant proprietorship, I did not mean to imply the introduction of the peasant system as it exists in the older countries of Europe. The term "peasant proprietorship" is one that is used by economists or at least it was formerly used by writers on political economy in contradistinction to the system of owning and operating large farms. The principle of peasant proprietorship is that under which you own and operate your own farm and receive all the profits. The term I used is one employed by economists in describing the difference between small farms—a self contained unit operated by the owner—and a large farm owned by a landlord and operated by a tenant.

Then the hon. member for West Edmonton (Mr. Kennedy) spoke of the eight hour a day system, meaning by that, I presume, working eight hours before dinner and eight hours after dinner. The eight hour day was introduced in the Old Country during the war and there was a great deal of money paid for overtime. I cannot hold out any hope, unless the cost of operating in other respects is very substantially reduced that our hours will be very much lessened. After all, our rules are largely what we make them ourselves.

Mr. WARD: Would the minister advise that one of his little farms be conducted on an eight-hour basis just to demonstrate what beef, butter, eggs, and other foodstuffs would cost to produce on a farm run in that way, with time and one-half for over time?

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): I do not want to occupy too much of the time of the committee but several allusions have been made to the experimental farm in this city. I rise in order to pay my respects to that institution. Situated as it is with the acreage available and with the number of buildings it has occupying the land it can not very well be conducted any differently from what it is at present. The branches conducted at the farm include health of animals, poultry, astronomical observatory, geodetic survey, and chemical laboratory. These all occupy space that really should be devoted to agricultural purposes. If I had my wish the minister should be placed in possession of sufficient funds to buy four hundred acres that immediately adjoin the farm. Then he would have an area of land that would not be cluttered up with buildings and would really be conducted as a farm should. At present the farm resembles nothing so much as a small hamlet surrounded by a nice lawn.

So much for the matter of the farm. There is a question I would like to ask the minister. Under Order in Council dealing with the Canadian standard for eggs, all Canadian eggs that are exported from this country must bear the Government inspection stamp on both ends of the case. I would like to know from the minister if it is the intention of the department to make the same regulation apply to eggs imported into this country. For instance, a large quantity of eggs enters Canada from the United States and a very great quantity of highly flavoured eggs comes here from China. I would like to know from the minister if the same regulation should not apply to these importations that exists in the case of our Canadian exported eggs?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will reply to my hon. friend's question when we come to take up the live stock vote.

Mr. SALES: I notice that further down the list there is a vote for cold storage warehouses.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We will come to that later; we are now dealing with the vote for experimental farms.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The minister has practically ignored my request for some explanation as to why there is an increase of over $44,000 for experimental farms; he does not deem the request to be worthy of consideration. It appears, however, that he is dangling the greater part of this increase before somebody as likely to be expended for a new experimental farm; but he does not know and cannot inform the committee where it is going to be. It is a new experience, I think, for Parliament to be asked to vote such a sum as $44,000 without any information being vouchsafed as to what the money is intended for, and where it is to be expended. It is true the minister announced that he had in the back of his mind an idea that $30,000 was to go to the establishment of a farm somewhere in the northern part of British Columbia, but in saying this he ridicules the idea that there should be in an old province like Ontario any necessity for experimental farms. Under the circumstances I move seconded by Mr. Senn:

That item No. 41, being the estimate for experimental farms be reduced by $44.360.50, or the same amount that was voted in 1921.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Before the amendment is put let me say that there was no intention on my part to overlook my hon. friend's question. I have been trying to keep track of various questions that have been put and to give the desired information with respect to all of them. If I can be charged with anything it is with being too detailed in my explanations. But I did inadvertently overlook that particular question of my hon. friend. However, I have the information here and there was no intention on my part to ignore it. There is no desire to conceal anything, because there is nothing to conceal. If there is an increase in the vote it is because the experimental farm system is growing and when that is the case we require more money. The increase is intended to cover new work in plant pathology. That has reference to plant diseases, including such diseases as rust; and if we spent $400,000 in that direction and secured a cure for rust it would be money well expended. I wish I could find the best available man in this continent for that work. If I could obtain the necessary salary to get that man and keep him, then we would be able to show a little better results than we are now able to produce. But, on account of being hobbled, handcuffed and hamstrung in connection with securing men and paying salaries, we have to take what we can get. This often means that we do not get results at all. There is an increase in wages. Wages have not gone down yet; they may go down; but when you have a good man on an experimental farm, you cannot reduce his wages. During all the time that I have been farming, I have not been able to say to an old, experienced hand: "I am going to reduce your salary." To say that would be an intimation to him to go, and he would take it in that way. It is not good policy to reduce the wages of good men. As a matter of fact, if I carried out one-half of the representations made to me and, sometimes, by hon. members, I would have four times as many men on the Central Experimental Farm; but the number is being kept down. A farmer has to have sufficient help for spring requirements, and in order to have men, he has to get them a little in advance. If he is sufficiently advanced in his work as he should be, these men will be waiting anxiously to jump to the land. I would imagine, if we sent a committee out to the Central Experimental Farm, they would find, at this particular time of the year, when the advent of spring is awaited, apparently too many men there; but in ten days or two weeks from now these men will be all busy at their respective duties.

There are, on that farm, some thirteen different divisions, and everyone of them is growing. If they were not growing and developing their usefulness, they should not be there; and if they are going to grow and develop and serve the country properly, the country must be prepared to pay for them. Instead of reducing this estimate, I should be apologizing for its being so small, because that is the way I feel about the matter. Since I had my civil government estimates under discussion, one of the best men in those thirteen divisions has left us simply because we are not paying him a sufficient salary to retain his services. I cannot give the committee his name, because his resignation is not public yet; but he is one of my best men in one of the most important branches. He is leaving us because he has an offer of $2,100 more than he was getting from us, with a prospect of an increase running up to—well, I will not say, but so much larger an amount than we are giving that we cannot hold him. If you put second and third class men on experimental farms and then equip those farms with what you like, you can spend a great deal of money and get very little result. But if you increase the value and quality of your "key" men by twenty-five per cent, you will have results worth while, and whatever, within reason, it takes to get those "key" men, should be paid. A $6,000 or $8,000 man will do infinitely more and better work and give better service along the line of plant pathology than three, four or five men of a cheaper class whose salaries may aggregate no more than that of the one man. This is one of the reasons why, in my estimation, we are not getting along faster in the matter of plant pathology. We have not got the best men and these salaries will not secure the best men.

My information is that owing to the high cost, chemical supplies and apparatus in the division of chemistry have been allowed to run down. As a matter of fact, nearly all these appropriations are smaller than were required in past years, and the result is that many of the farms have been handicapped in their work. It is true that the amount is larger than in the preceding year, but it is not enough to take care of the requirements of the farm. I have about half a page of reasons why this estimate is required, and the fact is that every one of these thirteen divisions is increasing its usefulness.

The hon. member for Carleton Mr. Garland) put a question with regard to poultry. At no time in the history of our country has poultry raising been so important as it is at the present. While we are importing Chinese eggs, we are exporting more high class eggs than we are importing of poor ones. We have a slight overage, and the same thing is true with regard to butter. We are importing butter from New Zealand and Denmark, but we are exporting more than we are importing. There is plenty of room for improvement, but you are not going to get improvement by putting cheap skates on experimental farms.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I was asking for an explanation with reference to the expenditure on farm labour, and the minister has not given it so far. He says: "There are a whole lot of boys there possibly standing around at this time of the year and you cannot get good farms by employing cheap skates." About $100,000 is being asked for under the head of civil government, for this experimental farm in addition to what I have been referring to. In 1920, the amount under the heading of Civil Government was $93,295, and it has been increased considerably since then. I do not know what the exact figure is at present; but there has been an increase of upwards of $40,000 for ordinary farm labourers on this farm, which is not a very extensive one. The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Garland) says that it looks like a park. There is somewhere in the neighbourhood of four or five hundred acres in it. In the beginning of his remarks before six o'clock, the minister said that he thought that $30,000 of this amount would be expended for an experimental farm along the line of the Grand Trunk Pacific in British Columbia. Now he says that it is for this and other experimental farms. Until we have some well-defined, clear statement, I think we would be voting money very recklessly in increasing this estimate to the amount asked for. I know some people will say: "Oh, you are voting to reduce the amount that the Government is ready to vote for agricultural purposes." If this was for the benefit of agriculture, or if it was the intention of the Government to see that there was to be an equitable distribution of the services of experimental farms in this country, the matter would be entirely different. But if some province has to do all this work itself and to pay for it, and, at the same time, to help to maintain farms in other provinces, that is absolutely unfair, and I am not going to vote in favour of such a proposition.

Amendment negatived.

Item agreed to.

Entomology, $28,000.

Mr. SPENCE: It seems to me that each departmental head is trying to see how much more he can spend than the other, and the harder it is to get money the more some of these gentlemen want to spend. This vote is for entomology and the next, administration and enforcement of the Destructive Insect and Pest Act, shows an increase of $45,000. I think there are altogether too many fads being introduced. First we have an increase of $2,000 on entomology and then $45,000 on this next item alone, for a fad.

Mr. MacKELVIE: I am not thoroughly in sympathy with the remarks of the previous speaker inasmuch as there is ample room for the expenditure of a great part of this appropriation in a manner that would benefit a large section of the community. I do not know what explanation the minister may have for the increase in regard to the Destructive Insect and Pest Act vote, which the hon. member (Mr. Spence) has referred to, but I know where a large proportion of it might be applied with a possibility of great results. When we considered these estimates a few evenings ago some very interesting information was given to the House regarding this particular branch. We were told a good deal about what had been effected and what remained to be done in the way of combatting the enemies of field crops and standing timber. In my own constituency we are continually forced to conduct a warfare against fruit pests. We spray continuously during the spring and summer months to keep down the common pests of the orchard, such as green aphis, woolly aphis and oyster bark scale, which, if not brought under control, would put an end to all hope of profit from the orchard business in British Columbia. I must give the Department of Agriculture the credit which is due it for having co-operated efficiently and successfully, and along very well arranged lines, with the provincial government of British Columbia in the control of these pests. The minister has in his department a gentleman who has been almost of infinite service to us in British Columbia, although unfortunately he is no longer completely at the disposal of the province. I do not mind mentioning his name in the House; I refer to Mr. R. C. Treherne, than whom I doubt whether there is, in the whole range of the minister's officials, a more competent man. In fact, I think I should be safe in saying that there is not in the service of any other government a man better calculated to safeguard the interests of the public, in the particular line of activity he follows, than Mr. Treherne. There is an opportunity to greatly enlarge the activities of the department in connection with the most dangerous menace that threatens the fruit growers of Ontario, British Columbia, or any other section of the country where apples are produced. I refer to the codling moth. In one section of Washington, in spite of the fact that last year the district of Wenatchee expended $24 per acre in spraying to cope with that moth, the fruit growers lost a trifle over a million dollars in affected fruit. Hon. members can understand, in the light of such a fact, with what apprehension we view the danger of having that pest introduced into British Columbia. From 1905, when the pest was first noted in Victoria, up to last year, we have had fourteen outbreaks of this particular nuisance. Two-thirds of them were successfully coped with and the pest eradicated, but only for a while, because with refrigerator cars coming in from infested districts it is next to impossible to keep the pest out. I shall not enlarge on this subject but I could prove that a very considerable amount of money could be profitably spent in combatting this menace in Canada. I have in my hand a resolution forwarded to me from one of the Farmers' Institutes of the district from which I come, and a copy of which, I believe, has also been sent to the Department of Agriculture. After reciting in a general way the dangers and difficulties with which they have to contend the resolution goes on to say:

> Be it resolved that we, the members of this Institute, go on record as being in favour of the enactment of any such legislation as will prohibit the importation of apples and pears from infected districts into Canadian territory.

This is a large question and one on which perhaps the minister is not prepared to give a definite statement this evening. But if possible I want to convey to the institute some answer which would give them an inkling of the intentions of the department. The minister is perfectly aware that other countries have passed legislation of this kind. Japan has a law keeping out fruit from countries infected with the codling moth. Australia has legislation which prohibits the importation of fruit from any country infected with fire blight, which is a far less serious menace than the codling moth. It cannot be successfully proven that fire blight can be propagated by mature fruit brought into the country, but there is no doubt in the world that our infestation in British Columbia came originally from pears brought from California. In other sections of which I have knowledge the infection came from apples brought from Ontario; and in spite of the constant vigilance of the provincial and Dominion officials it is one hard, long fight to keep the pest under control. I should be glad if the minister could give information as to whether he has answered the request from this Farmers' Institute, or has given it any consideration.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have much pleasure in giving the hon. member the information sought for. The first increase of $2,000 under the Entomological branch vote is intended to cover the purchase of additional apparatus and library supplies and also to provide for the employment of additional temporary employment during the summer, when the demand from the farmers for assistance in combatting insect pests is greatest. The member for Assiniboia (Mr. Gould), and no doubt all other hon. gentlemen, will understand that. The insect pest, of course, is developed in the summer time, and during the last four or five years many parts of Canada have had a very much higher average temperature than in the previous five years, with the result that new varieties of insects have developed in the country that we never heard of formerly, or rarely if we did. The corn borer, for instance, has troubled us for some time; and although we have had the grasshopper in the West for some years, we never had it in Saskatchewan to any extent until within the last four or five years. The hot weather and dry season develop their own insects, and the further south you go towards the gulf the more insect pests you encounter, which shows that there is a relationship between heat and the number and variety of pests that are to be found in a place. In the Destructive Insect and Pest Act vote there is an increase of $45,000, an increase that is substantial and yet small when you appreciate the amount of work that is to be taken care of by the vote. The entomological vote is really divided into two sections, entomological and botanical. They are naturally more or less interwoven. They appear here in this form and have been so divided every year I suppose. They should be dovetailed into each other. The appropriation for this section last year was $108,000, the estimate for this year is $140,000, an increase of $32,000. Statutory increases in salaries account for $5,000, while the appointment of an increased number of seasonal officers, as well as additional permanent officers, takes $6,000 more. For providing for emergencies and for scouting for brown-tail moth, alfalfa weevil, corn-borer and grasshopper work an increase of $5,000 over last year will be required. It might be stated that an emergency arose during the current fiscal year in connection with the reappearance of the corn-borer in western Ontario. No emergency fund was provided last year, consequently a Governor General's Warrant had to be issued to cover the cost of this work. A further sum of $15,000 is estimated for the purchase of two vacuum sterilizers, one for the port of Montreal and one for Vancouver, these to be used for the sterilizing of plant material imported, to prevent the introduction of insect pests. That is the entomological section of this insect pest legislation.

Mr. BAXTER: Was part of this vote used for the searching out and destruction of the spruce bud worm?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, partly. That comes more particularly under the Department of the Interior. They solicit the services of our men at times, and we do a certain amount of aeroplane scouting over the timber limits where this worm is at its worst. Then, acting on our reports, the lumberman can exploit his limits before the timber is destroyed. After the coniferous trees are partly killed by the bud worm the destruction is completed by the bark beetle. A good deal of this work could be taken care of by the provincial authorities, and no doubt it is, and if greater precautions were taken to burn the debris after the lumberman completes his operations it would possibly prevent some of this trouble.

Mr. BAXTER: The money cannot be better spent in assisting the provincial authorities, because the preservation of our forests is of national importance. The destruction of our forests in New Brunswick by these insect pests is stated to represent thirty per cent of our forest wealth.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Recently a gentleman called on me and told me an alarming story about these insect pest invasions. He expressed the opinion that unless measurements are taken to protect our coniferous trees from the depredations of these pests we will not have any pulpwood at the end of ten years.

Mr. LEGER: That is right.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is a very serious statement, and I merely give it for what it is worth, but judging from the aeroplane scouting reports the depredations are very extensive and can be plainly seen from the air. The spruce bud worm is followed by the bark beetle, which completes the devastation, and if the lumbermen do not cut down the affected timber it is soon completely destroyed.

Now the botanical section. The appropriation for this section last year was $82,000, the estimate for this year is $95,000, an increase of $13,000. Of this amount $8,000 is intended to cover the extension of potato inspection work, at present carried on most extensively in the maritime provinces, to western Canada also. The remaining $5,000 increase is required to provide for the establishment of an additional plant pathological laboratory in Quebec, and to pay salaries of officers at the new laboratory at Summerland, B.C., not provided in last year's estimates. Here are the appointees with the expenditure involved that will take care of some of the work referred to by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie):

Fruit Insect Investigations—
1. Insect Pest Investigator, 5 Months at $90 per month, Victoria, B.C., laboratory	$450
1 Insect Pest Investigator, 5 months at $90 per month, Vernon, B.C., laboratory	450
1 Junior Clerk-Stenographer, Vernon, B.C., laboratory	600

I had the pleasure of visiting some of the orchards at Nelson three or four years ago and was very much interested in their difficulties not only in connection with the codling moth—I do not think it was a trouble at that time—but in connection with many other kinds of pests that seem to be ready to attack almost every form of plant life when you get a summer sufficiently warm to develop them. Here is the item:

Codling Moth—In the province of British Columbia the entomologist in charge of our activities has acted in an advisory capacity in field control operations, basing such operations on the knowledge resulting from life-history studies made from year to year by our officers. In the dry belt of British Columbia there are 1,165,369 apple and pear trees. The value of the apple crop alone to the growers for 1921 is estimated to be over $4,500,000. So far the codling moth has been controlled, but if it were allowed to become generally distributed, the losses from its ravages would in five years, including extra orchard control practices, would undoubtedly reach a total of $1,000,000. For the conducting of the control measures recommended, the Provincial Department of Agriculture appropriated $15,000 in 1921. Our officer in charge for British Columbia has completed an investigation which indicates that fifty per cent of the empty railroad cars entering British Columbia from eastern Canada and the United States, to be used for the carrying of fruit, contain either larvae or pupae of the insect, and to this source the chief infestations have been traced. A method of treating empty cars with live steam to destroy all insect life present has been tested during the year, and it is hoped this measure of control will become a recognized practice.

Mr. MacKELVIE: One question in regard to the resolution I read. Has the minister given any consideration to placing an embargo against fruit coming in from infected districts?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We all have a feeling in the West that there are enough restrictions already against the importation of fruit. Out there we like to get a certain amount of fruit early in the season, and the more restrictions placed on importation the greater difficulty we will have in getting that fruit. But I think there should be another way of correcting that. There is no doubt that the infestations of the codling moth are due very largely to the carrying of infection by the fruit in the cars. But there should be some method of checking it besides that suggested by my hon. friend—an embargo against importation. Am I correct in understanding that that is the suggestion?

Mr. MacKELVIE: It is suggested in the resolution placed in my hands by this institute for presentation to the minister—that is all.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: If it became a serious menace and that were the only solution, it would be well worth considering. A serious disease sometimes requires a serious remedy.

Mr. MacKELVIE: Of course, if we had the guarantee that every refrigerator car or freight car which contained fruit coming into any orchard district would be thoroughly treated by some superheating process which would destroy the larvae or cocoon, that would largely solve the difficulty.

Mr. TOLMIE: I think the point taken by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie) and emphasized in the resolution he speaks of is well worthy of consideration. There is real danger from having our orchards badly infested with the codling moth, and I do not think it is good policy to wait until the pest gets really bad in this country before taking measures to combat it. I would respectfully suggest to the minister that this matter be investigated very carefully indeed, and that every possible step be taken now to prevent a further infection of our orchards through fruit imported from other countries. The hon. member for Yale has pointed out that Australia and Japan have adopted measures to keep out the infected fruit. We might carefully study those measures, and if they are really valuable and can be applied to our conditions, we should adopt them.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion on this vote for entomology, and I want to back up what has been said in regard to the necessity of protecting our orchards and our farms to the greatest possible extent. Last fall I went through southern Ontario and visited some of the sections where the corn-borer was at work, and the condition of some of the corn fields was appalling. The operations of this pest have reached the point where we cannot afford to relax our efforts to combat them, and we should be ready with the money, if we have to get it by Supplementary Estimate, or by Governor General's Warrant, to meet the situation; otherwise our agriculture will receive a very bad setback. I want to endorse any work that is done along these lines.

Mr. GOULD: If there is any fault to be found with the item under discussion it is not that suggested by the first hon. member who spoke to the item and who questioned what we were going to do with a paltry $28,000 in the face of the depredations of insects against the products of our farms, our orchards and our forests. The minister gave as one reason for the existence of these pests the excessively hot seasons which we have recently experienced. I would add to that another reason: since Confederation we have had in this House men of the same mind as the hon. member who first spoke on this item, and the result has been, as I have stated on the floor of this House on many occasions, that agriculture has been starved. We have had men who have had no appreciation of the value of agriculture, its necessities, or its enemies—and all the enemies of agriculture are not quadrupeds and centipedes; some of them are bipeds. That is what is the matter with this vote. As I have pointed out time and again in this House, agriculture has been acknowledged on political platforms as the greatest thing in all Canada, as the backbone of the country, but when it comes to the floor of this House we find that "the greatest industry in Canada" is given the smallest vote of any department of government. A few years ago it was a paltry $3,000,000. On a previous occasion I pointed out in the House that, according to figures supplied by the Government themselves, the injury caused to agriculture alone was estimated at $125,000,000. According to information which came to my office, and to which, I think, the Minister of Agriculture also referred, it was estimated that over $1,000,000,000 was the extent of the loss to our forests through the depredations of flies and other insects upon our spruce trees. Then, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie), there have been the attacks of insect pests upon our fruit areas. Yet we have an hon. member standing up and condemning the Minister of Agriculture for asking for another $2,000 in the entomological branch. I hope that next year—though I do not hope the conditions will warrant it—in the interests of research work, and with a view to finding out means of preventing these depredations, this vote will be increased to $50,000. I hope the minister will have sufficient money to engage the services of real men, men of science, men who will work diligently along these lines. Now, I have indicated what is the matter in Canada at the present time; we have not had the proper perspective. It is false economy to cut down estimates of this kind, and I was pleased to hear the remarks of the hon. member for Yale and the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Tolmie) in support of this item and against the criticisms of the hon. member who first spoke to the item. The appropriation is a very small one; it should be larger, so that we could have the kind of men who would discover means of combatting these pests. Did we not hear one of the ministers say a few nights ago that an increase of $400 by way of salary was necessary in his department because his department required men of greater expert knowledge than did the Department of Agriculture? But no department requires men of greater knowledge, information and scientific attainments than the Department of Agriculture. I would support the minister therefore, in every honourable means to secure enough money to enable him to pay his employees salaries equal to those paid in other departments of government.

Mr. SENN: I concur in the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria city (Mr. Tolmie) with regard to the operations of the corn-borer in southern Ontario. I myself come from that district, and I know that the corn-borer is a great menace to corn growing in that part of the province. I would like to ask the minister if his department has estimated the loss which has occurred through the depredations of that insect during the past year and what are the prospects of success in the employment of methods of eradication.

Item agreed to.

Agriculture—cold storage warehouses, $26,000.

Mr. SALES: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. CRERAR: What does this vote cover precisely? Does it cover grants to cold storage warehouses?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. HANSON: Where are they situated?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The committee will remember that the Cold Storage Act was amended a few years ago to restrict the grants to municipal cold storage plants. That change means that not so much is paid out in subsidies, because the public are not taking advantage of the act as an assistance to a municipal proposition to the same extent that they would in the case of a co-operative enterprise. Before the act was amended, thirty per cent of the cost of erection was paid out by the government, but since the amendment only one or two plants have attempted to take advantage of it. It might be proper to consider at some time whether we should not revert to the old order.

Mr. MARTELL: Has the minister received any correspondence from farmers' associations in Nova Scotia with a view to the establishment of a cold storage plant in Nova Scotia, in Halifax, say, for the use of the farmers, for the storage of perishable goods shipped there for export?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I understand that some representations have been made from that city with a view to having a government cold storage plant erected there, but nothing has been done as yet. We did contribute to the construction of a pre-cooling plant in the Annapolis valley for the storage of fruit before shipment.

[Mr. Gould.]

Mr. MARTELL: Will the minister be prepared to receive a deputation on this question at any time?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes; but I do not know that there is any provision for straight government construction.

Mr. TOLMIE: How many of these government-aided cold storage plants are there in Canada, and what provision is made for the storage of small quantities of meat and fruit by farmers in the localities where these plants are located?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Unfortunately, just about the time we were beginning to speed up and make grants under the act, it was amended and made to apply only to municipal plants. The number of plants erected under this act from the beginning, in the Hon. Mr. Fisher's time, is thirty-four. I think the act was amended in 1917. The total refrigerating space is 5,244,258 feet, and the total cost $2,408,354. The farmers have the same rights in the matter of storage as any one else. I know that in Saskatchewan there is a special apartment allotted for the storing of meat, vegetables, fruit, butter and so forth, but particularly meat, by the farmers. There is a room set aside exclusively for that purpose at the plant at Melville so that the farmers can put in a quarter of beef or mutton and other farm produce. There is no regulation providing for that, but I think all the plants provide accommodation for that purpose. If at any time the operator desires to exclude farm produce, I think he could do so simply by pleading there was no room.

Mr. TOLMIE: What is the charge for storing?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: While the subsidy is in abeyance, the operators are usually pretty good and are not tempted to inflate the storage prices. At the opening of a new institution the rates are fixed between the government and the operator, and if any changes are required afterwards, that is done by negotiation. The rates have been changed from time to time. If the operating cost increases, inevitably the storage rates should increase. The weak point is that after the subsidy has been all paid there is difficulty in properly controlling the rates. I know that for some years after the subsidy has been paid the different plants submit new schedules of rates to the department, recognizing its right to oversee the rates, but in law there is some doubt whether we have the right to compel them not to exceed certain rates.

Mr. TOLMIE: Under the law, have not the rates to receive the approval of the government?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. CARROLL: The cold storage plants have been a great blessing in many ways, but I would point out to the minister that there has been considerable anxiety in certain of our large industrial centres regarding the operation of some of our cold storage warehouses. The fault found with those plants that are run by large corporations, who store goods in these warehouses for sale later, is that the foodstuffs are kept for too long a period. That has the effect of enhancing the price. They wait until the particular products they are handling, such as eggs, meats and other foods, become scarce throughout the country and then unload them at a higher price. Has the department any regulations governing these particular aspects of cold storage?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is the popular impression that there is a certain amount of villainy in the handling of this cold storage business but I have not found it so—I think there is a whole lot of misconception about the industry. Cold storage is one of the greatest blessings we have to-day in taking care of perishable products, but I suppose like many other blessings you must have control of it. For example a fire is a nice thing to sit close to on a winter's night but it is a dangerous thing if left uncontrolled. Cold storage is the same. Run under proper control it is one of the greatest means for developing the live stock industry that we know of. There is at present a certain amount of control over cold storage but I think it should be tightened up some and our jurisdiction in that respect established more clearly than it is. There should possibly be more regulation as to the length of time the storage of meats is permitted. I may say there is a provision in the law now as to that, and I understand from my deputy that regulations regarding it were drafted a few years ago and submitted to the Department of Justice. The decision was that we had no authority to carry them out. I am not familiar enough with the details to speak with any positiveness on the matter, but it appears we were told we had not authority to do as was contemplated, and that, I think, is the position in which the matter stands at present.

Mr. CARROLL: I notice that an hon. gentleman in another House has introduced a bill regarding the matter.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes in the Senate.

Mr. CARROLL: A bill was introduced, I think, in the session of 1913, but it received scant courtesy from the House at that time. There is an undoubted grievance in connection with cold storage warehouses. For example, a cold storage warehouse in the city of Montreal a few years ago got a corner on the egg market. Eggs were held up until they became a scarce commodity and then unloaded on the public at a very high rate. That is the thing the people in industrial centres have a right to protest against. There is no doubt in the world that cold storage plants have been a great benefit, but when such plants are subsidized by public money the Government should exercise sufficient control over them as to render impossible the things of which I have complained.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Might I ask my hon. friend if the plant to which he refers was a subsidized plant?

Mr. CARROLL: I so understood, but I am not in a position to say definitely.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I shall be very pleased to look into the matter.

Mr. CRERAR: In respect to what my hon. friend from Cape Breton has stated, my recollection is that there is a cold storage warehouse under control of the Harbour Commissioners at Montreal.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, a very good one.

Mr. CRERAR: A very good one. I took a good deal of pride in that. It was originated when I was at the head of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think my hon. friend borrowed the idea from Saskatchewan.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, that is where a great many good things come from and some indifferent things also. But in respect of the cold storage warehouse which is under the control of the Harbour Commissioners in Montreal, is that not available for public storage?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: If it is available for public storage, that should get over the difficulty raised by my hon. friend from Cape Breton, because any merchant or wholesale man would be at liberty to purchase his eggs and have them stored in this public cold storage warehouse and shipped out at his disposal. Is that correct?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes. They are just beginning to use that cold storage warehouse now. I have had inquiries from Regina in regard to the rates they were charging in Montreal and from that fact I know the warehouse is being used. There is a certain amount of competition, and keen competition where there is a large number of these plants and I want to congratulate the hon. member (Mr. Crerar) in connection with that cold storage warehouse. It would have been a great service to the country if it had been built a few years sooner, especially during the war.

Mr. MARTELL: What action has been taken in the past to protect the public against impure foodstuffs? Do inspectors visit these plants regularly to see that the food commodities are in good condition? Because in the city of Montreal as well as in the much vaunted western Canada hundreds of tons of chickens were taken from cold storage warehouses and destroyed on account of being unfit for human food. What measures are taken to guarantee the public that they will get pure food from these plants?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I may say that when a cold storage plant is subsidized it has to be ok'd by the department and during the process of construction a constant inspection is maintained to see that the plans and specifications are lived up to. So long as the subsidy, or any portion of it, remains unpaid we can maintain inspection. But there is no regular inspection and we have not the control that we would have if such an inspection were carried out. There certainly is a weakness there which should be corrected somehow. I have not as yet, had the necessary time to look into this matter and determine the extent to which an inspection might be carried on.

Mr. MARTELL: There is a Food Inspection Act under which, for example, government inspectors visit different stores from which they take samples of maple sugar and have them analyzed in order to determine whether they conform to a certain standard of purity. If the minister has power to do that, why has he not the power to carry out a regular inspection of cold storage plants in order to see that the food products stored therein are fit for human consumption?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think that is a matter that would devolve on the provincial and Dominion boards of health.

Mr. MARTELL: The inspection to which I refer is, I think, practically carried out by the federal authorities.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: It is a matter under the control of the Dominion or provincial Department of Health.

Mr. MARTELL: Is that an opinion given by the Department of Justice in writing?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I think it is an opinion given in writing.

Mr. MARTELL: I think the minister should bring that information down to the House.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I will do so if my hon. friend will call for a return.

Mr. TOLMIE: I would like to suggest that as it is now eleven o'clock and as a number of hon. members on this side who would like to take part in the discussion of these items are not present, the committe should rise.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We had better pass this item.

Item agreed to.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Before the House adjourns, if I might be permitted with the consent of the House, I should like to suggest to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that, when the House adjourns over the Easter recess, we adjourn from Tuesday evening instead of from Wednesday evening. As we sit for only three hours on Wednesday, that is all we shall gain by sitting on that date. I find that some hon. gentlemen from the prairie provinces desire to avail themselves of the Easter recess to go home. If they leave on Tuesday night, as I understand the matter, their days throughout the rest of the week are charged up against them. If my hon. friend would agree to change the motion to read that we adjourn from Tuesday evening instead of from Wednesday, many members on this side of the House would appreciate that very much.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister: The Government has, in this matter, only one wish, and that is to consult the convenience of the members. I had heard that a number of the members desired that the House should adjourn on Tuesday, and I take it that it is the general wish of the members that the suggestion just made by my hon. friend be acted upon. If so, I shall have pleasure, at the close of to-night's sitting, in giving notice that, when we adjourn on Tuesday next, the House shall stand adjourned until the following Tuesday.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

Monday, April 10, 1922.

The House met at three o'clock.

BANKRUPTCY ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): On behalf of the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), I move for leave to introduce Bill No. 45, to amend the Bankruptcy Act.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

Mr. McMASTER: I am sorry that the only copy I have of the bill I have sent to the Speaker, and I am not familiar enough with the measure myself to be able to explain it. Perhaps the House will allow it to be introduced, and discussion may be had on the second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT, 1919, AMENDMENT

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): In the absence of the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), I beg to introduce Bill No. 46, to amend the Railway Act, 1919. The bill provides that a return ticket issued by any railway company between any two points in Canada shall be accepted by any other railway company whose line runs between the same termini.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome) (Translation): On behalf of the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs); I move for leave to introduce Bill No. 47, to amend the Criminal Code.

Should hon. members of the other side of the House wish for any explanations, I am ready to give them.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

GRAND TRUNK ARBITRATION

COMMENTS OF ENGLISH NEWSPAPER

On the Orders of the Day:

SIR HENRY DRAYTON (West York): I desire to refer to a matter that has already been brought to the attention of the House by my hon. leader (Mr. Meighen). It is a question that deeply involves the fair fame and good name of Canada, and for that reason I bring it forward again. I refer to the attack made by The Outlook on Canada and Canadian institutions. When the matter was before the House on the previous occasion, the Government took a position similar to that taken by the leader of the Opposition; but I regret that, apparently, they have not been able to make very much headway in dealing with it. I notice that The Outlook, far from desisting or apologizing, has returned to the charge, according to The Globe of Saturday, April 8. For the first time now we have an opportunity of studying this article. The Outlook is printed in London, I think, but I do not know anything regarding its standing, and I am perfectly convinced that both the British Government and the English people would just as much resent the attack made upon Canada as this House ought to resent it. I shall read one or two paragraphs from the article, which has been widely distributed through the press of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not know that the hon. member is strictly in order, but as the matter to which he refers seems to cast a reflection upon the honour of this country, I think it is of sufficient importance to warrant being brought before the attention of the House in order to elicit from the Government some statement regarding the facts. I would ask the hon. member, however, to refrain from reading any extract from the newspaper in question.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Instead of reading, I may point out that the newspaper states that it is now more than two years since the previous government, by daring and unscrupulous trickery, befooled the railway organisation into an arbitration. The publication attacks the standing of the gentlemen who took part in that arbitration, and it is utterly at variance with the truth when it claims that Sir Thomas White, who was one of the members of the board, was a member of the "inner ring" of the Meighen government. Of course, every hon. member knows that he had nothing to do with the Meighen government, but had resigned from the House, if I remember rightly, before Mr. Meighen assumed office.

The article further goes on to say that, notwithstanding the tremendous increase in the cost of railway operation, the Canadian Government, for the purpose of forcing this railway completely into its power, steadily refused to give any rate increase until the fifteen per cent increase was allowed in March 1918. Well, as hon. members know, and as the fact is, there was no refusal by the Government of any application for a rate increase, the whole matter being in the hands of the Railway Commission.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask the hon. member to refrain from making any comment or argument. I understood that he wished simply to call the attention of the Government to some very libellous statements reflecting on the honour of Canada and of the Canadian Government which have appeared in the London press. Having done so, he can ask what is the attitude of the Government with regard to those statements, but he should not enter upon any argument or comment.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Mr. Speaker, that is what I am endeavouring to do. but it is rather a large field to cover. However, I will be as brief as possible. I want to point out to the Government that the effect of the article is, in the first instance, a libel not only upon Canada, not only upon the Government of that day and upon the present Government, not only upon Canadian tradition, but something which is still more reprehensible,—an evident attempt by indirect means through the press to force this country into an abandonment of its rights, a veiled threat that unless exactly what the financial press of London thinks ought to be done by this Government in regard to the Grand Trunk is done, no further moneys can be raised in England for the development of Canada.

Now, my submission to the Government, Mr. Speaker, is that this article and this propaganda constitute a direct contempt of court. And other means apparently having failed, I would ask the Government as to whether or not they are taking proceedings for contempt of court against this newspaper or any other newspaper engaged in similar propaganda. We must bear in mind that the very issue which is dealt with by this newspaper is now before the Privy Council by the express consent of the Canadian Government.

I would further point out this:

> Contempt of court by speech or writing may be scandalizing the court itself, or by abusing parties to actions, or by prejudicing mankind in favour of or against a party before the cause is heard.

I am reading from the laws of England, not from Canadian laws. It is laid down by English cases that:

> There cannot be anything of greater consequence than to keep the streams of justice clean and pure, that parties may proceed with safety both to themselves and to their characters. Speeches or writings misrepresenting the proceedings of the court or prejudicing the public for or gainst a party are contempts. Nothing is more incumbent on courts of justice than to preserve their proceedings from being misrepresented nor is there anything of more pernicious consequence than to prejudice the minds of the public against persons concerned as parties in causes before the cause is finally heard.

It is pointed out by a well-known authority on English law, that one of the most mischievous things you can have is trial by newspapers when a trial by one of the regular tribunals of the country is going on,—just what we are having in this case.

In view of the authorities, which are perfectly clear, I desire to ask the Government what action is proposed to be taken against the publishers of this article.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised that my hon. friend should seek to give so much publicity to this matter. When it came up last week the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) took exception to an article in the same newspaper as reflecting upon the honour of this country. In reply I said that in so far as that article reflected upon the honour of this House or this Parliament, I placed myself in entire agreement with him. Clearly that states the position before the world to-day as to Canada's attitude. So far as the article reflects in any way upon any transaction of this Parliament, we give it no credence whatever. But when my hon. friend (Sir Henry Drayton) suggests that we should enter into a controversy with any section of the British press, I fear he is going rather far afield.

I cannot see that any further action is necessary on the part of the Government than simply to repeat that in so far as this article reflects upon the honour of this House or Parliament, there is no hon. member who would countenance it for a moment. The article has been replied to in other newspapers, and I think the English public will judge the source from which this and similar articles emanate, and will be as ready to appreciate the truth as any one else. In a word, I think my hon. friend is unduly sensitive with regard to this particular subject.

THE GENOA CONFERENCE

LLOYD GEORGE MEMORANDUM AND RESOLUTIONS, CONFERENCE AT CANNES

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask my hon. friend, the Prime Minister, if he would bring down for the information of the House the aide-memoire presented by Lloyd George to the Cannes Conference which laid the foundation for the Conference that is being opened in Genoa to-day; and also if he would bring down a copy of the resolutions passed at the Cannes Conference. I think we are entitled to this information since Canada is being represented at the Genoa Conference. If he could bring these memoranda and resolutions down to-morrow and have them incorporated in Hansard, the material would be available for hon. members' information and consideration in relation to this very important conference.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I can assure my hon. friend that I shall have this information brought down to-morrow. I think it is in the Department of External Affairs at present.

Mr. CRERAR: I understand that these documents have already been published in the British press so there is no reason why they should not be laid on the Table.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

EASTER ADJOURNMENT

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House proceeded to Government Notices of Motion.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I should like to amend the motion which appears on page 22 of the Orders of the Day, so that the motion will read:

That when this House adjourns on Tuesday, the 11th instant, it stand adjourned until Wednesday, the 19th instant.

I might say that I have been consulted on this matter and that all parties are agreed to the change being made.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King, the House returned to "Orders of the Day."

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CALGARY MILK INQUIRY

Mr. SPENCER:

1. What was the total cost of the Milk inquiry held by Major Duncan Stewart in Calgary, Alberta, from January 23, 1920 to June 17, 1921?

2. What amount did Major Duncan Stewart receive per day for his services, and what was the total amount received by him?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. $701.

2. $20 per diem if occupied a whole day on investigation, and a proportionate amount when occupied part of the day. The total amount received by him was $701.

INTERNATIONAL LABOUR CONFERENCE

Mr. NEILL:

1. Was the Dominion Government represented at the first International Labour Conference held at Washington in October and November, 1919?
2. Were the provincial governments represented at the said Conference?
3. Was a draft convention passed at the said conference committing the Governments represented at the conference to the acceptance of an eight-hour working day, as recommended by article four hundred and twenty-seven of the Treaty of Versailles?
4. What action has been taken or is contemplated by the Dominion Government to give effect in Canada to any such draft convention?
5. Pending the passage of legislation, will the Government give instructions to have an eight-hour day put into effect on all Government works, whether performed by day labour or under contract?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. Yes.

2. The provincial governments were not represented in the conference, as the provinces are not members of the international labour organization. They were, however, represented in the Canadian delegation to the conference, since on the invitation of the Dominion Government each provincial government named an adviser to the Dominion Government delegates.

3. and 4. A draft convention was passed, Canada participating as a federal state and subject to the limitations as to federal states in these matters set forth in Article 405 of the Treaty of Versailles. The Department of Justice having decided that the subject dealt with fell within provincial authority, the Dominion Government referred the draft convention to the several provincial governments as the authorities competent in the matter. Consideration is being given at the present time to suggestions which have been received from certain of the provincial governments for calling a conference for discussion of this matter between the Dominion and the provinces.

5. The practice with respect to works performed for the Dominion Government requires that the working hours shall be in conformity with the practice or law of the locality. Since the provinces are understood to have the representations of the convention under present consideration, in the opinion of the Government a change of practice or policy at the present time might only serve to create a misconception and confusion or to prejudice the position of the provinces in dealing with this matter.

POST OFFICES—BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. NEILL:

1. What is the gross revenue of the following post offices in British Columbia for the last fiscal year—Courtenay, Union Bay, Ashcroft, Ladysmith, Port Alberni?
2. Which of these offices are located in buildings owned by the federal authorities?
3. If the answers to questions one and two show that Courtenay has the largest postal revenue of those named, and is the only one not located in a building owned by the federal Government, will the Government place an item in the Estimates to erect a post office at Courtenay?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. Revenue for eleven months, 1st April, 1921, to 28th February, 1922: Ashcroft, $4,371.87; Courtenay, $6,073.92; Ladysmith, $6,526.54; Port Alberni, $4,267.18; Union Bay, $1,954.37. As the cash accounts from these offices have not been received covering the period to the 31st March, 1922, it is impossible to make out the revenue for the year ended on that date.

2. Union Bay, Ashcroft, Ladysmith, and Port Alberni.

3. When expenditure on new works can be resumed, matter will be considered.

Mr. ERNEST LAMONTAGNE

Mr. DENIS (St. Denis):

1. Is Mr. Ernest Lamontagne at present employed in the Montreal Post Office?
2. If so, does he hold a position as senior clerk at Station N?
3. When was he first made a senior clerk?
4. Who did he replace?
5. What position did the said Lamontagne previously occupy?
6. Did he pass any examinations?
7. Was public notice given by the Civil Service Commission of the vacancy?
8. If so, how many applications were received?
9. Was an examination set for the position?
10. If not, what were the qualifications of the said Ernest Lamontagne to fill the position?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. Yes.
2. Yes, senior postal clerk.
3. 1st December, 1921.
4. Mr. Joseph Hebert, who was demoted.
5. Postal clerk.
6. Qualifying examinations, 1915.
7. Yes, it was advertised as a promotion competition among the permanent employees of the Montreal post office.
8. Thirty-three applications.
9. An examination of the relative experience of the candidates, together with a rating on their seniority and efficiency and fitness, was the determining factor of the examination. Written tests are generally objected to by the employees in the case of promotion competitions, and these are resorted to only when absolutely necessary.
10. Answered by No. 9.

1. What railway companies carry His Majesty's mails in Canada?

2. Contracts are not entered into with railways for carrying His Majesty's mails, the conveyance of such mails being provided for by Section 115, of the Post Office Act, which reads as follows:—

> His Majesty's mail and persons travelling therewith on postal service, shall, at all times when thereunto required by the Postmaster General, be carried on any steamship or steamboat navigating the waters of Canada, and on any railway in Canada, and with the whole resources of the railway company if required, on such terms and conditions and under such regulations as are made by the Governor in Council.

Mail services on railways are established or terminated in accordance with the requirements of the Postal Service, and the detail thereof authorized by Order in Council.

Payment for conveyance of mail by railways is made on a car mile basis, and the existing rates per mile authorized by Order in Council P.C. 472, of the 19th February, 1921, in effect since the 1st of March, 1921, are as follows:—

For a full postal car service	34·7c.	per car mile

For special passenger trains	2.17	"

3. Instructions issued under date of 13th December, 1920, by the then Minister of Railways and Canals were to the effect that the Post Office Department should see that the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway were fairly treated in connection with mail service—neither given an unfair advantage. In every case the department is governed by the requirements of the postal service in the territory served by the railway. Any further intention on the part of the Government will be announced in due course.

PROTECTION OF WORKMEN AGAINST ACCIDENTS

On the Order:

That, in the opinion of this House, in view of the fact that there has been a law in effect for some time protecting workmen against accidents while engaged in their work, it is desirable that same protection be afforded to all workmen contracting sickness while performing, or due to the performance of their work or trade.—Mr. Deslauriers (St. Mary).

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion the resolution as drafted affects the civil rights of the provinces as provided in clause 92, sec. 13 of the British North America Act. If the resolution had reference to public works of the Dominion alone there could be no objection to it; but I do not think that any resolution of this Parliament can bind the provincial governments as regards a purely civil contract.

I would rule, therefore, that the resolution be re-drafted or dropped.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PROPOSAL TO CONFINE TO UNORGANIZED TERRITORIES

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should be confined to Territories not included in any Province of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as there has already been some discussion regarding the work of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, I presume it will not be necessary to deal at length with this resolution. I would point out that the original operations of the police were confined to unorganized territories and had to deal with questions affecting the pioneer settlers, and I think we all recognize that excellent work was done under the rather primitive conditions which then prevailed in the Canadian Northwest. However, after the war was over, there came a transformation in the character of that police force, and they were asked to do the work of looking after those suspected of being alien enemies, and also, a little bit later, to watch those suspected of fomenting sedition or of being connected with industrial disputes. I think, probably, enough was said the other day to illustrate that there has been what I think we might almost call an abuse of power in connection with the activities of the force. For example, literature was seized on general warrants. I know of one instance, which I may mention by way of illustration, in which a library belonging to a gentleman—now an alderman in the city of Calgary, a very estimable citizen there,—a library which he had brought out from the Old Country some years before, was seized by the Mounted Police. He has been unable to obtain any definite information with regard to what was done with his books, much less to have them returned, and I am credibly informed that some of these volumes are now in the library of the Mounted Police barracks at Calgary. Books that were seized at the time of the raids on the homes of workingmen in Winnipeg were burnt by the cart load in the public incinerator in Winnipeg. A teamster, a very religious man, rescued one of these books from the flames and brought it to me. It was a Life of Jesus. Curious that that should be one of the seditious documents taken presumably from the home of one of the workers. I know that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, during the war, entered a library at Regina and took out of that library a copy of Myers' "History of Canadian Wealth" a book which was widely circulated by the Grain Growers' Guide two or three years previously—a book written largely in the library of this Parliament. Its statements are supported by documentary evidence. I do not know whether it is considered undesirable for the people to know how these huge fortunes have been built up here in Canada.

I referred on a previous occasion to the surveillance that, according to the reports of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, has been maintained on labour activities. The Labour people throughout this country resent the fact that a police force is sent to spy upon their movements. I do not read that the police have ever been detailed to be present at the meetings of, we will say, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, or of the Bankers' Association, or of boards of directors of our railway companies, yet some of us might think that possibly these organizations are doing as much to stir up revolt in the minds of the common people of this country as the utterances of some obscure labour man in Prince Albert or Lethbridge. It is rather significant that, although there are so many men who have been demobilized in this country, the Government of Canada has had to pay for recruiting for this force in Great Britain. There is no doubt that the force has become one of the spending departments of the Government, nearly $4,000,000 being spent upon it last year. What province, I ask, really wants this force at the present time? I am quite sure that the provinces which I know best—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta—are not very desirous of having it. The great majority of the people resent having the force within their provincial boundaries, and I am not at all sure that these eastern provinces have relished the idea of having a police force, operated from Ottawa, stationed in their various towns and cities. I hold in my hands a resolution adopted at a regular meeting of the Board of Directors of the Grand Army of United Veterans held at Toronto, February 11th, 1922, which reads:

> Motion:—J. F. Marsh—J. Vallentine, "That this Dominion Board forthwith make representation to the Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, Premier of Canada, and his Government, requesting the advisability of demobilizing the Royal Mounted Police as at present constituted, as it is the decided opinion of this Board, after full investigation, that there is no further necessity for the services of Dominion Police in organized territory and recommend the re-organization of the Royal Canadian Northwest Mounted Police at its pre-war strength." Unanimously Carried.

I very well remember when the mounted police first came over the mountains to British Columbia, and the effect upon the workers there. We had a despatch from Ottawa stating that there would be demobilization of a very large number of returned men at the coast, that this might very likely mean unemployment, that unemployment would lead to industrial unrest, and hence that a detachment of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were to be sent over the mountains to British Columbia. I think hon. gentlemen may imagine the feelings of the returned men at the coast when it was expressly stated to them that, since they, on their return, were likely to be out of a job, they were to be clubbed into submission by the Mounted Police. Last year nearly $4,000,000 was spent on this police force, and only a little over half a million on unemployment relief. I think it would not be asking too much to suggest that these figures should be reversed, and that the larger amount should be spent in trying to relieve unemployment, rather than in being prepared to club the desperate unemployed into submission.

The last point which I make is that, after all, according to the division of functions in federal and provincial affairs, it has generally been considered that the administration of justice lay with the provinces and not with the federal authorities, and I take it that we would be proceeding on safe ground if we did not further centralize power in federal government with regard to the administration of justice. Those of us who knew anything of the inside of the industrial dispute in Winnipeg in 1919 recognized very clearly that it was a very dangerous precedent when the then Minister of Justice appointed a deputy minister in the city of Winnipeg and proceeded to administer justice within the province of Manitoba. My resolution calls for the placing of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police on their pre-war basis. The force was organized to deal with conditions in unorganized territory where there was no proper police provision. Since that time the Canadian Northwest has been organized into provinces and each province now has its own provincial police force. I would urge upon this House that the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police be again restricted within the bounds of territories not yet organized into provinces.

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Militia and Defence): This is a much larger question than may appear on the surface. My hon. friend has referred to the pre-war basis of the Northwest Mounted Police. The House will understand that prior to 1920 Canada had two forces, one known as the Dominion Police and the other as the Northwest Mounted Police. In 1920 these two forces were amalgamated under the title of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. They are, to all intents and purposes, at the present time, one force, but the Mounted Police proper does not comprise the full number of the men who now form the united organization. The passing by this House of a resolution demanding that the government restrict the activities of this force to the unorganized territories would hamper the government to a large extent in carrying out the policy which it hopes to make definite before many months. Speaking technically, on absolutely legal or constitutional grounds, my hon. friend is right that the provinces ought to look after the maintaining of order within their several territories. As I pointed out the other day, several of the prime ministers of the various provinces have suggested to the government that they do not go as far as this resolution would indicate, but that while agreeing to lessen the number of these forces, they would be loath to see the entire force of the Mounted Police withdrawn from their provinces, particularly from some parts of it. It is not easy just at the moment to take a definite stand as to these particular provinces. Even to-day I received a letter from the president of a board of trade in an important town in Ontario, begging me that, whatever else might be done, we should not withdraw the Mounted Police from that territorr and giving the reasons for it. I have a great many letters of this kind from mayors and private citizens. These are questions that we must carefully consider when the time comes for action in reference to this body known as the Mounted Police. I agree that constitutionally my hon. friend is absolutely right, but in working out the affairs, particularly of a new country, we are not always safe in adhering to the letter of the constitution. Sometimes we even have to violate almost the letter of the law, in order to be practical. I think the most practical magistrate I ever knew in my life knew the least law of any magistrate that had ever held office in Ontario. It was in a part of the country where every day common sense sometimes over-rode the law.

As to the amount of money spent on the Mounted Police, I can assure the house that the Government has in mind greatly reducing this amount of expenditure. We believe the time has come—and I think the House will agree with that conclusion—when the force known as the Royal Canadian Mounted Police can be greatly reduced, and if parliament had not urged strongly that the management of this force should be taken out of the Militia Department, I had hoped to have some suggestion to make along that line; but the House having taken this attitude, we will have to begin over again, and it will take a little longer. I might take the House into my confidence to this extent, to say that I have asked Deputy Commissioner Starnes to suggest a plan for the reduction of his force in order to bring it nearer into conformity with the present-day need. I would assure my hon. friend and the House that, so far as practicable, we intend to confine the activities of the force to the unorganized territory, but in some instances the work which I believe ought to be done will be greatly hampered if the House pass this resolution and tie the hands of the Government.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): I referred the other day to this question, and I say that I entirely disagree with the principle laid down, that the administration of the law is a matter for the provinces. As the Dominion increases in importance and in subjects that are within its jurisdiction, it must maintain order, peace and good government throughout its area. I entirely dissent from the statement that the provinces are to be the interpreters of the rights and the duties of the federal government. The special officers of the Attorney General of the United States, backed by the thousands of special agents, under them, were in Washington throughout the whole of the Disarmament Conference, and were responsible for the maintenance of peace and order while that conference lasted. The President, the Attorney General, and all his attorneys in the United States are thoroughly organized to preserve good government, and I should not be surprised to see the President, before this week is over, take charge of the mines of the United States if the disturbances increase. In the early history of the American Union the responsibility rested mainly upon the states to see that peace and order were observed. But in the one hundred and fifty years' experience of that country the federal power has been gradually growing, the number of federal courts has increased, the number of officers necessary for the enforcement of federal law greatly added to, and more and more responsibility has been placed on the Attorney General through the hundreds of officers and local attorneys under him. The jurisdiction of the federal courts has also been gradually extended, and it has been found absolutely necessary to have not only attorneys, and local courts, but all the machinery essential for the proper enforcement of federal decrees. The same thing is coming in Canada. We have taken over the railways, and our federal laws concerning those railways cannot be properly administered except through the aid of a federal force. All through the war, whenever any consignment of money was entrusted to the express companies, there were always two members of the Mounted Police force to take charge of it. I have myself seen these escorts on trains coming into Ottawa. We have an Attorney General in Canada who is responsible for the administration of federal law, and in the Old Country there is an Attorney General for Scotland and one for Ireland.

Mr. GRAHAM: There are no provincial governments there.

Mr. MACLEAN (York); Scotland and Ireland have their Attorneys General and local organizations. But here is the point: Scotland Yard is at the disposal of the Attorney General of either Scotland or Ireland for the preservation of law and order in their respective territories. The more I observe the trend of things the more am I convinced of the necessity for a police force of some kind for the proper enforcement of federal law. There are thousands of officers now in the United States who have been appointed for the sole purpose of enforcing the prohibition law; and so long as federal laws are being enacted, and new social problems connected with government are cropping up, the more responsibility will the federal power find itself compelled to shoulder. I should not like to see the Minister of Justice, the Attorney General, or the Prime Minister of Canada without an efficient police force at his disposal. I do not propose for one moment to justify what has been done in cases that have provoked criticism, and for that reason I shall say nothing regarding the use of federal officers for putting the law into effect in Winnipeg during the strike; I shall say nothing regarding the requests of various people scattered throughout the Dominion for a federal force; nor will I refer to the action of the federal force in the past. I do think, however, that there should have been more courage in the defence of the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) in advocating the maintenance of the force. I agree with him that it should be cut down in the interest of economy. But, I repeat, you cannot have a federal power without some kind of police force to carry out its decrees. I do not suppose there were twenty federal officers in the United States in the early days of that country, but to-day there is an immense organization and secret service force at the disposal of the Attorney General, besides millions of money. If we in Canada desire to vindicate the British North America Act we must stand by the federal power and provide the necessary machinery to enforce the laws which the federal Parliament enacts. We have a Supreme Court, a Court of Exchequer, a Board of Railway Commissioners, and we have a minister in this House charged with the collection of customs duties and the putting down of smuggling and all illicit business of that kind. Let us, therefore, strengthen the hands of those who are charged with the enforcement of these laws. The provinces do not like to enforce federal laws, and there is the expense in connection therewith to be considered. The municipalities evade their responsibilities in some cases, and to-day in Ontario we find Mr. Drury putting through the legislature a law for the establishment of a provincial police with men scattered throughout the province for the enforcement of provincial law. That is only another form of the same problem we have here. If you undertake the responsibility, as the federal authority, of enforcing the decrees of your courts, you have also to assume the responsibility of maintaining peace and order and good government, if the provincial authorities fail to undertake that responsibility; and especially you have to assume this responsibility now in view of the great developments along these lines which have taken place in the United States. I have already referred to the precautions taken by the United States Government while the Conference for Disarmament was being held in Washington, to prevent bombing outrages or any other attempts to disturb its proceedings. As a result of a long-drawn-out legal fight between the federal and state authorities, the States Rights party of the United States has absolutely broken down for all time.

That is the situation in the United States, and we are reaching pretty much the same state of affairs here. While I do not dispute what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Woodsworth) has said with regard to recent strikes, I do not think he has made out a case against the continued maintenance of the mounted police for the preservation of peace, order and good government. As a matter of fact, the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) has not had the courage to state what his views are in relation to this question. But he must know that some such force is absolutely necessary for the purposes I have enumerated, and that it should be under the administration of either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (West Toronto): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) referred to the strike of 1919. In my judgment what happened there in that year is the best argument that can be advanced for the maintenance of the Mounted Police as an efficient force to uphold law and order. Let us recall for a moment what took place there. An incipient revolution broke out; the municipal authorities were unable to control the situation; the men who planned the revolution had the local police under their control—they went on strike. The provincial authorities were unable to restore order, and if it had not been for the Mounted Police and for the action taken by the federal authorities, we would have had Soviet government in Manitoba.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is what was aimed at, Mr. Speaker; there cannot be any doubt about that. If the attempted revolution had succeeded, the aim of those promoting it was to extend it to every city in the Dominion. Well, if we should have a recurrence of a similar trouble, and if the municipality was unable to act because its police force was corrupted, and the provincial authorities were powerless to restore order, what would happen unless you had a force capable and well-trained to cope with such a situation? I know there are some men in this country who would abolish all police forces, and those are the type of men who are trying to destroy the municipal police as a force for the maintenance of order. Now, I do not believe that the men who talk in that way in the name of Labour represent Labour in this country at all. I sit in this House, Sir, for a constituency in which there are 80,000 working people.

An hon. MEMBER: It must be Toronto.

Mr. HOCKEN: I sit for a constituency in the city of Toronto a mile and a quarter square, with not a vacant lot in it, and scarcely a man there but works for his daily bread. So I claim that I can represent Labour on the floor of this House as well as any other member. I go further, Sir, I say that I am as good a friend of Labour as there is in this House. And I have a record as a labour man and as a friend of Labour that I will set against the record of my hon. friend any day. Further, in the city of Toronto, where my record is known, the labour men trust me as their friend. I have, I suppose, a larger number of foreign workingmen in my riding than are to be found in any other constituency in Ontario, if not in the Dominion. At least, from twenty-five to thirty per cent of my constituents are of foreign origin. A few of them talk red revolution and Sovietism, but they are only a handful and do not represent the working people of this country. And if there is a constituency which will send men here who believe in Sovietism and red revolution, why, that only emphasizes the necessity of maintaining the Mounted Police as an efficient force for the preservation of law and order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. Does the hon. member imply that I stand for Sovietism and red revolution?

Mr. SPEAKER: There is no such implication contained in anything I have heard falling from the lips of the hon. member for West Toronto.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member "doth protest too much." He is too sensitive on that particular point.

I want to argue for the continuance of the Mounted Police as an efficient federal force, and, that the recent history of this country proves that the continuance of that force is absolutely necessary; and I referred to what took place in the city of Winnipeg in 1919 to confirm my argument.

As the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) has pointed out, a very large part of the work of this force is that of secret service. Perhaps my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg would say there is no necessity for a secret service; but looking over some of the events that have happened lately, I think such a service is essential, and if we are to have a secret service, what better type of men could one assign to it than the men who have been trained in the traditions of the Northwest Mounted Police? There is a force that throughout its history has won the confidence, respect and admiration not only of the people of this country, but of other countries as well, especially of the United States, where the administration of justice has come in comparison with the administration of justice in the Dominion. To confine the activities of this force to the Arctic Circle would be a very grave mistake, and I think it is absolutely necessary to have on hand as an efficient secret service, and as a force that can give the requisite service in cases of emergency, this Mounted Police force.

When my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg assumes to speak for Labour in this country, I do not think that he is representing it at all. He certainly is not representing what is known as international trades unionism, the only sane kind of unionism that we have in this country. I am an advocate of international trades unionism because it believes in the fulfilment of contracts,—they were the men in the city of Winnipeg who were forced by their international office to go back and keep the contracts that they had entered into. I say that labour operated under principles of that kind will strengthen the position of the workingmen, make him respected all over Canada, and give him a place and standing in the community that he can never have if he runs wild and follows the lead of Red agitators.

Mr. IRVINE: I would like to ask the hon. member if the international trades union movement in Toronto has endorsed him as their labour representative?

[Mr. Hocken.]

Mr. HOCKEN: I say this in reply to that question: international trades unionism has not endorsed any candidate in this House, but I represent more international trades unionism in this House than my hon. friend does from his constituency. I will go further than that: if my hon. friend could take a poll of international trades unionism in Toronto I would get more votes than any man in competition. I would get them on my record, a record of friendship for the cause of Labour; because I know what it is to work for wages, to work longer hours than my hon. friend ever worked, and to make sacrifices that I am afraid my hon. friend never made. That is why, Sir, in my city I have the confidence of the men who are connected with the international trades unionism of Toronto.

I submit that the history of this country during the past few years proves that whatever else we have in the way of police and national defence, we have to maintain the Mounted Police as a numerous and efficient body—as numerous as the requirements call for, and as efficient as it has been throughout all its history.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Just before the question is put, I would like to draw my hon. friend's attention to a point which may possibly have escaped his notice and also the notice of the House. The resolution reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should be confined to territories not included in any province of Canada.

In proposing this motion, the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) has, no doubt, regarded the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as being identical with the old Royal Northwest Mounted Police. If so, I should inform him that two years ago, by Act of this Parliament, the nature and complexion of the force was considerably changed. The name was changed from "Royal Northwest Mounted Police" to "Royal Canadian Mounted Police"; and subsequently, under certain powers conferred on the Governor-in-Council by statute, the Dominion Police were welded in as part of the Royal Canadian Police. To-day, therefore, what was the old Dominion Police, the men who amongst other duties have to do with the policing of Parliament Hill and the Government buildings, are part of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and if the resolution were to be carried in its present form the police who appear round these buildings would under its terms have to be abolished. I may say to my hon. friend that there were a good many who expressed doubt as to wisdom of the course the Government of the day was nursing in changing the headquarters of the Mounted Police to Ottawa and merging the old Dominion Police with the new organization.

As the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) explained this afternoon, the Government has under consideration certain changes in regard to this force. Many of us are strongly of the view that the old Dominion Police should be distinct altogether from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and that is one of the matters under consideration in connection with the readjustment of these forces. With that explanation, I think my hon. friend's purpose may have been served in the discussion which we have had. I do not think the motion should be allowed to carry in its present form without the House understanding that it would abolish the forces used for Dominion Police purposes, as well as those used in the provinces for the purposes of the Mounted Police generally.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): I find myself in general sympathy with the purpose of this resolution, although I cannot by any means agree with some of the arguments that my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) has advanced in support of it. I stated my position on this question the other day when the bill of the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) to amalgamate the defence arms of Canada was before the House. I wish briefly to re-state that position: I consider it is no part of the business of the federal government to do police work in the provinces, and it is on that ground that I think the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police should be confined to the unorganized territories. I agree with the view expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King)—well, I shall not refer to it as his view, because I did not understand that he expressed it as the opinion of the Government; but it is my view—that the Dominion Police that formerly did the work of policing the Government buildings and carried out the secret service work of the Government, should be dissociated from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and restored to the position it formerly occupied.

The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) has argued, with his usual vigour, that the federal government should make provision for federal enforcement of federal laws. That was not the understanding at the time the Dominion of Canada was formed; the enforcement of law was left to the provinces; and I think there it should remain. As to the part played by the Northwest Mounted Police in the Winnipeg strike or in connection with the other troublous periods through which we have passed, no blame can attach to them, for they simply carried out orders. The police must always carry out orders given to them by those charged with the responsibility of seeing that the law is enforced. I am not arguing on the merits or demerits of the Winnipeg case; I merely wish to lay that down as the consideration that should govern in the matter.

The item of expense is a very considerable one. We are asked to vote this year almost $3,000,000 for the maintenance of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and in view of this circumstance—I express my own personal view alone—I submit that the activities of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, as they are ordinarily understood, should be confined to the unorganized territories and that the Dominion Police should be re-established to do the work that they have always done around Ottawa and as well the secret service work of the Government.

The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) raised the point that a police force of this kind was necessary to maintain law and order, to meet emergencies such as, he said, existed in Winnipeg in 1919—although my own view is that he has somewhat overdrawn the picture in respect to that occasion. But we had the means of meeting such emergencies before the Royal Canadian Mounted Police were located at Ottawa; the militia of Canada could be called out to maintain law and order in such cases, if the municipal or provincial authority was unable to do so. I do not like the idea of developing the notion throughout this Dominion that the federal government should be charged with the enforcement of law that hitherto has rested in the provinces alone.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is my duty to point out that clause 4 of rule 21 provides:

> In all cases the reply of the mover of the original motion closes the debate, but it is the duty of Mr. Speaker to see that every Member wishing to speak has the opportunity to do so before the final reply.

So, if any other hon. gentleman wishes to speak before the mover closes the debate, he must do so now.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): I do not think it is necessary to debate the resolution very much particularly as there has been no very serious objection offered to it. The position of the Government, as it has been expressed, is towards the object of the resolution, I gather. I am also in agreement with the statement that has been made by the leader of the Progressives (Mr. Crerar).

The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken), however, presumed to state a case to the House and endeavoured to prove the absolute necessity for this particular force being retained in its present function and control. As that has been the only argument that has been advanced against the resolution, it might be well for me simply to point out—although I do not think it is really necessary, because I am sure the House saw for itself—that the hon. member failed absolutely to establish his case. He did tell us that there was an incipient revolution at Winnipeg at a certain time, but he failed entirely to prove it. I think I am as near the truth when I say there was no incipient revolution in Winnipeg, and still nearer the truth when I say that the trouble in Winnipeg, so far as prolonging the disorder was concerned, was actually due to the action of the Mounted Police. Therefore I claim that the point that the hon. member for West Toronto attempted to make was not established at all. His boasting about his ability to get votes may have some bearing on this subject, although I must confess I fail to see what, but inasmuch as he has introduced that point, I might say that it is not a conclusive proof of the intelligence of the men of the labour movement at Toronto that they should give the hon. member more votes than anybody else. I have my doubts, however, about his endorsation by the organized labour movement of that city and their anxiety to get votes for him. I have the honour to be one of the representatives of the organized labour movement of Canada, that sane labour movement to which he refers, and I believe that that sane labour movement would concur in the spirit of the resolution before the House, that there is no necessity for duplicating our forces, but that, on the other hand, it would probably lead to much conflict between the provincial and Dominion authorities, and that it would be better that the Mounted Police should fulfil its function of policing the territories that are not now under the provincial government.

[Mr. Speaker.]

One more thing and I am through. The hon. member for West Toronto also made another wise statement. He said that he knew of a great number of people who wanted to do away with all police whatsoever. If he knows people of that kind, they must be in Toronto; I do not know anywhere else where they could be. I want to dissociate myself from any such people. We recognize, of course, the necessity for maintaining law and order, and are just as ready to see that that is done as my hon. friend. There is no implication in this resolution that police forces should be eliminated. The resolution merely seeks to define what shall be the real function of this force, whether it shall be continued as a spy system on the labour forces of this country, or whether it shall be confined to its original and proper function of policing the unorganized territories of Canada.

Mr. JOHN MORRISON (Weyburn): I have listened to the debate with a great deal of interest. The hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) and the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) have, of course, a full right to their opinions and to their expression in this House, and I hope that they will accord to me and others the same privilege. I have lived in the West for twenty-three years and have seen quite a bit of the workings of the Northwest Mounted Police out there, having been a justice of the peace for a few years. I cannot agree with my friends who are representing Labour in this House in the accusations they have made against the Northwest Mounted Police. I have seen those men abused when they were trying to carry out their duty, but I have never seen them fail in the discharge of their duty. I have never seen them oppress people. I have seen them handled pretty rough and when they have had to fight back, but I think any man who is worth anything will fight back when he has to. I think the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg is prejudiced against the force because of his experience with it during the Winnipeg strike. My hon. friend says that there was no incipient revolution at Winnipeg. Now I have a card here that was issued at the time of the Winnpeg strike, and I want to read it so that everybody can judge for himself as to the nature of that movement. It was issued to the lumber camps throughout British Columbia and is the same as was issued in Winnipeg, I am told. It reads as follows:

Workers!

Your recent fight by means of the "strike" to secure an eight-hour day and better working conditions has failed. You know the reason. Lack of courage on the part of some mill men and the importation of scabs—spineless creatures. However, there is no need to be discouraged as the fight is not yet lost. You have another weapon, and a good one, sabotage. Lay down on the job. Sabotage by a hundred and one tricks resulting in the withdrawal of efficiency. You can win and kick the boss in the ribs at the same time.

The real loggers are leaving the G.T.P. and the boss can not make out with prairie chickens.

That was the name for the homesteaders who took the place of the strikers. It goes on:

Lay down on the job!

In a short time the boss will realize that it is better to give eight hours, clean camps, better conditions and good food all round and thus get the real loggers to stay, than to mush around with prairie chickens and bush-whacking homesteaders.

Lay down on the job!

Get fired. What of it? You don't own that job. It is lent to you only so long as you produce profits for the boss.

Lay down on the job!

It is your most potent weapon. Go to it. Most of the bosses along the line are not worth 30 cents. Bust'em! The one you can't bust you can get fired. Hutton for instance.

That is where I picked up this card.

Mr. IRVINE: What is the hon. member quoting from and when was it written?

Mr. MORRISON: If the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) will keep quiet and listen, he will find out.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not competent for an hon. member to interrupt unless with the permission of the hon. gentleman who is addressing the House.

Mr. MORRISON: The card goes on:

Lay down on the job. Sabotage!

Ask your fellow worker how the woods and mill mens' strike was won in Washington, Idaho, in 1917. Lay down on the job. Workers of the world, unite. You have nothing but your chains to lose and the whole world to gain.

Now those men were threatening to burn the sawmill with the consequent destruction of a million dollars worth of property, and we had to use force to quell the disturbance. We could not get the provincial police, we could not get the Mounted Police—they were all busy. I have quoted this card to show hon. members that this was an attempt at breaking down that law and order which most of us are standing up for and whose observance we are trying to maintain. It is all well enough to say that the local authorities can deal with a situation when it arises; but I agree with the hon. member from West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) that there are times when the Mounted Police can control disorder much more efficiently than the local police, and they have done it on many occasions.

My hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg said that most of the people do not want the Mounted Police. I do not know on what foundations he bases his claim to speak for the majority of the people, or where he obtains the evidence that they sympathize with his view. I think they do want the Mounted Police. There were four millions spent in 1921 on the force the hon. gentleman says, and less than half a million on employment doles. Well, it is too bad we have to spend such a sum as four millions, but as long as there are such disorders as those to which I have referred I would be willing to spend twice that amount in order to maintain order. I am friendly to Labour but I am not in sympathy with them when they take such a course as I have pointed out. I am a Labour man and to some extent a capitalist too; but I have to work and I would like the little money I have to earn something too. I do not want conditions to prevail under which there would be no security for a man's home or his business.

In Winnipeg, during the strike, defiance of law and order were manifested. The operation of public services of all kinds was stopped and there was even interference with the delivery of milk to the hospitals. If such a thing as that does not constitute a hardship for poor people I do not know the real definition of the term. I think the labour people have been very poorly led. If I submitted to the leadership of others for twenty-five years and at the end of that time found myself penniless whilst those leaders were in comfortable circumstances I would think I had been misled. To my mind the gentlemen who have been speaking for Labour are not in reality Labour's true friends; they are mistaken in the methods they advocate for curing the evils of which they complain. Most of us wish to see better conditions brought about for labour—most of us indeed labour ourselves—but there is a proper way to bring about that improvement. To protest against the police and to abuse them—and I am sorry to say that some critics are all too prone to follow that course—will never result in improved conditions. I think it is far easier to get those in authority to listen to reason than ignorant labouring men such as are engaged in fomenting strikes of the character described. Personally, I stand for the maintenance of the Mounted Police in Canada.

Mr. GEORGE BLACK (Yukon): I represent the constituency described in this resolution as "territory not included in any province of Canada," and I propose to speak to this motion although it is not of so much importance to me as it is to members representing provincial constituencies. As a Canadian, and as a resident of British Columbia, I wish to say that I would be very sorry indeed to see the Royal Canadian Mounted Police removed from that province. It is admitted I think, even by the mover of the present resolution, that the force should not be removed from unorganized territories. Having resided, for the past twenty years in a territory where there was no other police force than the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, I can speak with experience when I say that that force, at all times and under all circumstances, has discharged its duty in a manner which merits hearty commendation rather than criticism or abuse. The Northwest Mounted Police, as has already been said this afternoon, has excited the admiration not only of Canadians but of people throughout the length and breadth of the world as an efficient and admirable force. My experience of their conduct has been gained as a citizen and from practice in the courts where I have assisted, or have opposed, the police in various prosecutions; and I can say without hesitation that on all occasions they have conducted themselves in a manner that is above criticism. Even in cases where the evidence in their possession showed the accused to be a criminal they have invariably acted with perfect fairness; and I have never seen them hesitate to bring forward evidence tending to indicate innocence as well as evidence pointing to guilt—their submission of cases in the courts has been invariably characterized by fairness. After such an experience of the conduct of the force as that I am bound say that when I hear undeserved criticisms directed at the force it excites a suspicion in me as to the reason for such action. If we have in this Dominion forces that would upset legally constituted authority, or would proceed in other than a constitutional and legal way, and a Dominion force is required to prevent their activities I say that the operations of the Mounted Police should be continued throughout the length and breadth of Canada. After all, who is the best judge as to whether this force is needed or not? I say the Government of the day is the best qualified to pronounce upon that point; and if the Government, after advice from the Department of Justice, feels that it requires this force it is perfectly justified in maintaining it. Furthermore I have not the slightest doubt that if any one province of Confederation intimated to the federal authorities that the presence of the Mounted Police was distasteful the Dominion government would not hesitate one moment in removing the force from that province. I think the question can very well be left in the hands of the Government of the day regardless of what its political views may be. The Mounted Police throughout all the years of its existence has not been administered in the interests of any particular party. It has been the same fine force, all through the years of its history, regardless of the political views of those at the head of affairs of the Dominion, and I say we can very well leave this matter in the hands of the Government of the day. If the federal government thinks it needs the force it will continue it: if it thinks the force is not required it will remove it or cut its strength down to the number required. Personally I believe it would be unwise to handicap any government by passing such a resolution as this at the present time.

Mr. T. W. BIRD (Nelson): I was in Winnipeg during the strike to which allusion has been made this afternoon and I think I can give unprejudiced testimony as to what happened. Living four hundred miles from that city and being there at the time on a visit I was not in the same inflamed state of mind as perhaps some of the parties to the controversy were. I want to say for the information of those who got their impressions of what occurred at that time through the press, that the disturbance in Winnipeg was subsequent to the action taken by the Mounted Police and not prior to it. As an unprejudiced, and I hope fair-minded, witness. I believe sincerely that there would have been no disturbance whatever had the Mounted Police not intervened.

I was in Winnipeg for two days, which included the time of the strike, and I never missed a single meal. I enjoyed all the comforts of life during that period, and I never perceived at any moment anything like an incipient revolution. I agree with the statement of the labour member from Winnipeg, when he says that the labour men are not of the type that would be implied from the speech of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken). These men are so much in earnest that they sometimes become extremists, yet I believe they belong to the type of sane labour representatives. I desire to give my personal testimony at this time to that effect. I am speaking without any prejudice. I have never had any association with labour and never in contact with it, and view it without prejudice of any kind. I always feel, however, that I must be on the side of the under dog. To that extent, perhaps, I am a little biased. I want the members of this House to disabuse themselves of the idea that was propagated by the newspapers that there was anything like a Soviet revolution in Winnipeg, because such was not the case.

Mr. O. R. GOULD (Assiniboia): I wish to associate myself with the sentiment expressed by the hon. member for Nelson (Mr. Bird). Although he has not spoken from real experience of labour conditions, I may say that I can speak from such experience to a certain extent. In my younger days I had something to do with labour organizations, and was among the actual labourers and realizing and knowing the conditions which are forced upon one, there is a memory and sting left that will never be removed, and until men live through these conditions and realize them, they will not know the story, and should not stand up in this House as authorities upon the subject. They must have the experience before they can speak on these matters. The hon. member for Nelson referred to the strike in Winnipeg, which was magnified by the press report. There was little trouble before the red uniform of the Mounted Police was seen on the streets of Winnipeg, with the avowed object of suppressing whatever movement was on foot, whether the movement had any justification or not. I state further that I believe it was the propaganda of the government of the day. At the time of the revolution, or of the trouble, in Winnipeg—revolution, so called by the papers—we were sitting in Regina, an organized body of farmers, who were supposed to be the authors and finishers of another Soviet or Bolshevist movement, according to the sentiments advertised and expressed throughout the country by the then government and word came to eighty-five of us, who were an executive representing the various electoral districts of Saskatchewan, "For God's Sake hold firm." That was the word that came to the executive who sat in Regina at that time. Oh yes, the government of the day were frightened. I might recall to the minds of the members who sat in this House two years ago the fact that the then hon. member for Calgary, when this or a similar question was being discussed, rose in his place, and said "What would this country do if red revolution broke out"? That was the sentiment behind the government when they brought into force the amalgamation or co-ordination of the Mounted Police and Dominion Police as explained by the present Minister of Militia and Defence, (Mr. Graham). I want to state that if the present Government is following out that principle, or accepting it as a principle, I do not agree with it. Further than that I recollect that when the debate which I have just mentioned took place in this House two years ago hon. gentlemen who now constitute the Government were rising in this Chamber and endorsing the principles as outlined in this resolution, but there is silence to-day and I think the country will ask the question: Where is the consistency? The knitted brows of the earnest workers are no longer in evidence. Where is it now? Do they believe or have they lost faith? That is the question as I see it.

I might state that I have lived in that western country for 31 years. I have been in close association with the Mounted Police. I have known of their activities. They are human. The human element enters into them as well as all others. They are a body of men who individually and collectively will go out into the waste areas of the West and they will bring in the recreant or Indian. They will go out into the vast country alone, being away months, they will perform great feats of valour, but I say that history will record a distinct mark between the time of the amalgamation of the two forces. The old Northwest Mounted Police do not like to hand down the traditions which they erected as a body, and let the newly organized force share with them the halo and glory which is theirs. This new force has to establish a record before the old Northwest Mounted Police will allow the glamour and glory that attached to the old force to be shared by the present organization. I believe that as a body of men they should be again organized under the old name, with the same work to do. Whether in organized territories or whether under provincial jurisdiction or new jurisdiction, those men will go back and perform the work the authorities ask of them.

The old Northwest Mounted Police—I have heard them express this sentiment many times—do not wish to be incorporated with a body of men who have to go into urban centres and suppress disturbances, because their conception was that they were established, as I have related, to go into the wider areas, to hunt what might be termed the horse-thief or the recreant, or even the Eskimo, to administer justice and to keep order. That is why the term "mounted" was applied to them. They have done their work well. I think there is a work to be performed yet in that regard, and my sentiment would be that the unorganized territories of this vast country alone require police of that nature. I think that another force of a Dominion character might be created in this country, but do not associate them with the old Northwest Mounted Police.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): I think it is very unfortunate that we have had two questions confused. It will be very difficult for some of us to vote intelligently on this matter, in view of the confusion of these two issues. I think, as the Prime Minister pointed out, that probably the resolution is more far-reaching than the mover intended, and I believe it would be in the interests of all concerned that it should be withdrawn. If there was a resolution that was directed against some of the orders that were issued to the Mounted Police in those days I would myself heartily support it. I think, however, it might be well if this House would forget some of the things that happened in war time. There was a spirit of hysteria abroad. Undoubtedly the Mounted Police had duties committed to them that were not pleasant for them to perform. I may say that the present police force has some duties committed to it that are rather degrading to a police force. The suppression of race track gambling is degrading to such a force. If we could clearly separate the two issues that are placed before us, I think it would be very much easier to vote intelligently on this resolution. For my part I have no hesitation in condemning some of the orders that were issued to the police. As I said, things were done that would reflect no credit on those responsible for the issuing of the orders in those days. But just at the present time it is not possible for us clearly to distinguish between those who were responsible for issuing the orders and those who were charged with the responsibility of carrying them out. I should not like now to cast any reflections on the Mounted Police as such. Undoubtedly they did things which were disagreeable and distasteful to them; but I submit that in view of the confusion of those two issues it would not be possible for us to vote intelligently and I think the resolution should be withdrawn.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and Counties of St John and Albert): I am not sure that in the interests of the country it is well to have the resolution withdrawn. It is perhaps as well for the chamber to take a vote and to stand up either for the Reds or against them. In the course of this debate there have been some expressions from hon. gentlemen which, whether so intended or not, were in my judgment nothing more or less than a simple pandering to the forces that seek to disorganize our social conditions as they exist. It is not a question of three or four million dollars; we can deal with that on the Estimates, as also with the question as to the number of the men and their location, It is not a question of administration, because the force could be administered separately from the other branch of the force, the Dominion Police, as we know them. I believe we had better go straight to the part of the resolution that is simply intended to emphasize a remark that fell from an hon. member recently, that the rioters in Winnipeg rioted because of the sight of a Mounted Police uniform. In the name of all that is common sense, what reason has a decent British subject, a Canadian subject, to revolt or riot at the sight of His Majesty's uniform? I do not know any decent, law-abiding citizen or man who ought to be outside a gaol who would find good cause, in the appearance of that uniform, for rushing into riot, fray, revolt, or any other species of law breaking. Let us have no pandering to those who would subvert our social organization. Treat the resolution in the sense in which it is intended, to withdraw the forces, which are capable of protecting organized, peaceable, decent society, from the places where they can combat riot, revolution and disintegration. That is the question, and I shall have much pleasure, and feel I am doing my duty, in voting straight against any such proposition.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I cannot very well see my way to withdraw the resolution. It seems to me that the dicussion has been extended much more widely than the resolution itself would justify. A good deal has been said with regard to the Winnipeg strike, which was introduced incidentally by myself. I do not very much blame hon. members who have referred to the strike for the way in which they have done so, because I know the information that went out through the press at the time. Those of us who live in Winnipeg, whether members of labour organizations or not, learned in the course of the long-drawn-out trials, how false those newspaper representations were. I may be permitted to call attention to the fact that I myself was one of the men charged with sedition at that time. And I was returned to Parliament not from a purely labour constituency by any means, but from Centre Winnipeg itself, which was represented here last year by Major Andrews, and I received a majority of some 3,740 over the man nearest to me. That in itself, I think, is sufficient to refute a great many of the charges that have been made by hon. gentlemen who have lived at a distance and have not known the details of the events in Winnipeg. As to the character of the charges that were made at that time, and the tactics pursued by those who were prosecuting, I do not think I can do better than quote one charge of sedition made against me personally. I shall read one count only, and you will see how Red I am:

The Jurors aforesaid do further present:

4. That J. S. Woodsworth, in or about the month of June, in the year of Our Lord One Thousand Nine Hundred and Nineteen, at the City of Winnipeg, in the Province of Manitoba, unlawfully and seditiously published seditious libels in the words and figures following:

"Woe unto them that decree unrighteous decrees, and that write grievousness which they have prescribed; to turn aside the need from judgment, and to take away the right from the poor of my people, that widows may be their prey and that they may rob the fatherless.

"Isaiah (10: 1-2)"

"And they shall build houses and inhabit them; and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them. They shall not build and another inhabit; they shall not plant and another eat; for as the days of a tree are the days of my people, and mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands.

"Isaiah II (65: 21-22)."

I think, Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to be the only man in the history of British court procedure who has been charged with sedition for quoting from the King James version of the English Bible. I read this charge simply because it would be incredible to any one who was not familiar with the viciousness of the attack which was made upon labour people at that time, and with the misrepresentations which were circulated throughout the length and breadth of Canada. Labour men were charged with conspiracy. I think that one of these days we shall be in a position to show where the real conspiracy was. I have ventured to speak even thus far with regard to this question simply because there has been in the past either no representation, or a very slight representation, of the labour position on the floor of the House, and I think that is one reason why the country at large has been so misled regarding the real aims of labour.

The charge has been made that some of us do not represent International Labour. I may say that the only labour organization with which I was ever connected, and from which I received a withdrawal card, was the International Longshoremen's Association, Local 38-52. I would ask the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) whether he is in as close touch with labour as that. I do not know, I merely mention it. The political end of the labour organizations is in most cases entirely distinct from the industrial end. So it is natural that we do not represent some particular craft; we come here to represent the great body of labour. I think the fact that we are here surely gives us the right to speak on the floor of this House for at least a section of labour.

I would call attention to this fact, too, which is not generally understood: that it was the president of the Trades and Labour Council (International) of Winnipeg who gave the strike order; it was the secretary of that council who sent out that strike order. These men were then Internationals, they are Internationals still. At the time that strike was ordered there was no thought that it was anything else than an International movement, although undoubtedly there had been a movement towards the formation of a more efficient organization.

I might say further in regard to that strike—into details of which I have no thought of entering—that the trials clearly showed that while there were charges of an attempt to set up a Soviet government, an attempt at revolution by force of arms, yet notwithstanding all the searches of the Mounted Police from coast to coast the authorities failed to discover one single gun. Labour men may be fools, but certainly if they had intended an armed revolt one would suppose that they would have had at least a few guns in their possession. Nothing could have been further from the thoughts of these men. I say most emphatically that that strike arose as an industrial dispute over questions of higher wages and an interpretation of the principle of collective bargaining. It is quite true that under the old law of conspiracy—which had been almost obsolete in Great Britain for a hundred years, and which admitted a very wide range of evidence,—the procedure dating back to the Star Chamber days—it is quite true, I say, that under that almost obsolete law six of the men on trial were committed to gaol. But I would point out that there was such a revulsion of public opinion in the city of Winnipeg that the day these men were liberated three of them walked into the provincial legislature of Manitoba. Another man charged, Mr. F. J. Dixon, the leader of the Labour group in the Manitoba House, was given the most overwhelming majority ever accorded to any man in the city of Winnipeg. Surely this is evidence sufficient to show that the great mass of the people were misled as to the real character of that strike.

I do not know that any connection at all was shown by the hon. member between the document he read, purporting to emanate from the lumber camps of British Columbia, and the Winnipeg strike; hence it is not necessary to discuss its contents.

I confess that this matter is somewhat involved, as the Prime Minister has shown. The Dominion Police force was amalgamated with the Royal Canadian Northwest Mounted Police, it is true; but we have to deal with the situation as it is to-day, we have to deal with the Canadian Mounted Police. Now, my resolution would confine the activities of that particular force, as now constituted, to the unorganized territories. If it is found wise by the Department of Justice that a new Dominion police force should be organized, that can be done, but that does not interfere with the policy with regard to this force. So I think we must decide on the policy to be adopted by the people in relation to this matter.

The very attitude taken by some hon. members is what influences me very strongly to plead that this force should not again be used as it has been used in the past. The fact is that Labour has been misunderstood and spied upon, and that in industrial disputes armed force has been used to quell labour opposition. The hon. Minister of Militia called attention to the fact that he had resolutions from certain boards of trade advancing reasons—which he did not give—why this force should be retained. Well, I can very readily understand that the Winnipeg Board of Trade most decidedly would advance reasons why the Mounted Police should be retained. It was the representative of the Citizens' Committee—a body which was really a creature of the Board of Trade—who was at the time of crisis appointed Deputy Minister of Justice. The House will appreciate the resentment of labour when the man who all along had been acting as spokesman for the Citizens' Committee—the employers' committee—was suddenly clothed with extraordinary powers to administer "impartial" justice. There was the difficulty, and it was that action which provoked resentment in the minds of labour towards the administration of justice at that time.

I would call attention to the fact that, although it has been stated that an attempt was made to set up a Soviet republic, yet, at that very time negotiations were being carried on between the provincial government and the workers, and had it not been for the precipitate action of the Mounted Police, or the authorities that ordered out the Mounted Police, we would not have had that shooting in the streets of Winnipeg. This is the reason why we should have another way of dealing with such a situation. The fundamental difficulty at that time was that an industrial strike had arisen on a larger scale than ever before had been known in this country. If a Soviet was established in the Labour temple—I say, if—if a body there assumed somewhat larger powers than it should have done, there was also another Soviet in the board of trade rooms which had also assumed governmental powers. In this contingency the municipal and provincial authorities stood helpless. The federal authorities remained inactive until a crisis developed, and then they came in with a club and made things all the worse. That was really the situation.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I would plead that we have reached a point in the history of Canada where industrialism has developed to such an extent that we shall have to deal with these disputes as they arise, not by brute force but rather by reasonable methods—when instead of spending $4,000,000, as has been suggested, in order to crush labour, if necessary, I would say: Let us rather spend $4,000,000 in studying this problem and in placing our industrial relations upon such a basis that we will have no need to call in the Mounted Police to settle any of these disputes. To-day we face the need for reconstruction, and I plead with the members of the Government to give us a lead along these lines. The Prime Minister has already in his book, Industry and Humanity, outlined some of the principles which might, if adopted, prove a solution. I do not know that we all agree with his proposed solutions; but I say: Let us give those principles a chance, and let us in any case seek to do this work in a constructive fashion.

But, after all, this is rather beside the original purpose of the resolution. We are past the war period; we are, I hope, past the period of hysteria inspired by the war. With the provinces thoroughly organized, I do submit we ought to be in a position to revert to the previous arrangements, and to confine the activities of this force as it now exists to the unorganized territories. I firmly believe that we are on good constitutional grounds, as the Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) admits, when we say that the administration of justice should be left with the provincial authorities. If they find at any time that there is a situation which they cannot control, it is then for them to call in the aid of the military authorities, not before. The very presence of a body of this character, is, as I stated the other day, an irritant. I think I can speak for a very large number of labour people at least when I say that if this force were taken out of this work of espionage, of this work by which they enter the homes of workingmen and seize literature, by which they act as agents provocateurs, it would go a long way toward establishing a better condition of affairs in the industrial life of Canada.

Mr. W. C. GOOD (Brant): May I be permitted to ask the hon. gentleman a question? Would his resolution, if adopted, commit the Government to immediate action, and has he made allowance for the point mentioned by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) as to inclusion or exclusion of the Dominion Police? I think it is necessary that he should answer this question before we can vote on the resolution.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman can be allowed to answer only by leave of the House. He has exhausted his right to speak.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Answer:

ST. JOHN TERMINAL FACILITIES

Mr. THOMAS W. CALDWELL (Victoria and Carleton) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the Government should consider the advisability of providing terminal facilities at the port of St. John, New Brunswick, to enable Canadian grown potatoes to be shipped during the entire year from a Canadian port.

Mr. SPEAKER: In my opinion this motion is out of order, as it calls for an expenditure of public moneys.
