House of Commons Debates

OFFICIAL REPORT

Wednesday, March 8, 1922.

This being the day on which Parliament is convoked by proclamation of the Governor General for the despatch of business, and the members of the House being assembled:

William B. Northrup, Esquire, M.A., K.C., the Clerk of the House, read the House a letter from the Governor General's Secretary, informing him that the Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, would proceed to the Senate Chamber on Wednesday, the 8th of March, at 3 p.m., to open the session.

A message was delivered by Colonel Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:—

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

His Honour the Deputy of His Excellency the Goverior General desires the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the Chamber of the Honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate Chamber, when the Speaker of the Senate said:—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I have it in command to let you know that His Excellency the Governor General does not see fit to declare the causes of his summoning the present Parliament of Canada until the Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law; but to-morrow, at the hour of three o'clock in the afternoon, His Excellency will declare the causes of calling this Parliament.

And the members being returned to the Commons Chamber:

ELECTION OF SPEAKER

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Northrup, we are assembled as members of the House of Commons, in virtue of a royal proclamation summoning the Fourteenth Parliament of Canada. We have just been reminded by the representative of the Crown that, with the commencement of a new Parliament, our first duty is to elect a Speaker. This obligation is in accordance with long established usage of Parliament. It comes down to us as a part of our inheritance of British Parliamentary institutions. It links our political liberties with those of ancient origin.

I need not remind the hon. members of the dignity and importance of the office of Speaker of the House of Commons. If I do so at all, it is because the gentleman whom I am about to propose and to ask hon. members to elect, possesses in such marked degree the qualities expected of the "First Commoner", that a mention of some of these requirements may serve to arouse a consciousness not less of the extent of our opportunity and obligation than of his merit.

I suppose the most venerable of the duties of the Speaker is that of being the channel of communication between the Commons and the Crown. There was a time when the discharge of this duty demanded not less of courage than of courtesy; to-day it has become the least arduous of all the Speaker's obligations. The relations between the Crown and the people were never happier than they are to-day, whether this be said of His Majesty the King and British citizens throughout the globe, or of His Majesty's representative in Canada and the representatives of the Canadian people here assembled. The adequate discharge of this honourable duty need cause us little concern.

It is as presiding officer of this House, and the custodian of its honour and rights and privileges, that the office of Speaker places upon its incumbent obligations and responsibilities of the highest order; and demands of him the noblest qualities of intellect, of temperament, and of heart. He must have a thorough knowledge and wide experience of the rules and procedure of the House. He must be possessed of calm judgment and of quick decision; he must combine firmness with impartiality and patience; and he should have, withal, a generous disposition and a goodly understanding of human nature. These are many virtues to be sought in one man; I believe they are all possessed by the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux).

The hon. Mr. Lemieux has been a member of the House of Commons of Canada continuously for over a quarter of a century. If we except the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), who entered Parliament in 1892, and the hon. member for Laval-Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier), who was also returned at the general elections of 1896, I think I am right in saying that this is a distinction not enjoyed by any other hon. member of this House as to-day composed. Seniority of itself does not always constitute a claim for recognition or preferment. Where, however, as in the case of the hon. member for Gaspé, it is combined with exceptional endowments and distinguished service, it becomes a first consideration.

It has been more or less a tradition in this House that in successive parliaments the speakers should be chosen alternately from representatives of English and French origin. In the last Parliament, the Speaker was of English descent. It is fitting, therefore, that on this occasion we should select as Speaker one whose ancestry links him with the great race who were the pioneers of early discovery and settlement in what is now our Canadian Dominion.

In this our practice has differed in an essential particular from that followed in the British House of Commons, where the Speaker, once elected, is honoured by being re-elected to the Chair at the beginning of every new Parliament, so long as he remains a member of the House of Commons. I think we would do well to consider carefully the obvious merit of the British practice. It has been established as the outcome of long years of parliamentary experience, and its advantages in many particulars are apparent. This, however, is a matter which the House must decide for itself, and which cannot be determined except by the decision of successive parliaments. For the present we will not err if we hold to the custom we have thus far followed.

Whilst there may be reasons why, on occasions, we should keep in mind differences which owe their origin to circumstances wholly beyond our own control, it is an infinitely finer conception of public duty which causes us to place the emphasis, in our national affairs, not on what we have of difference, but on what we hold in common; in other words, on what as Canadians we share of which we may be justly proud. May I remind hon. members, in this connection, that few public men in our history have served their country with rarer fidelity, with more distinction, or at greater sacrifice, than the hon. member for Gaspé. Whether it has been as an able parliamentarian upholding British traditions on the floor of this House, or as an administrator of important departments of the Government, or as our country's representative on ceremonial and diplomatic missions in different parts of the world, Mr. Lemieux at all times has fulfilled the trust reposed in him with credit to his fellow-countrymen and honour to himself. His only son, to whom with parental pride he had looked to bear his name in like distinction of public service, lies among the number of the immortal youth of our land whose lives were given in the cause of the world's freedom.

Where death has placed its hand, we cannot enter. At best we can do scant justice to public sacrifice of any kind; but we can cherish what we hold in remembrance of patriotic service alike of the living and the dead; and it is therefore with feelings of gratitude and pride that I move, seconded by Mr. Fielding:

The Honourable Rodolphe Lemieux, K.C., LL.D., member representing the electoral district of Gaspé, do take the chair of this House as Speaker.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): The duties of Speaker have been well and, indeed, very gracefully defined by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who makes this motion. The qualifications of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) for this high office have also been well and amply defined by my hon. friend, and in his statement of those qualifications I desire to concur, rather than to differ. I rise not at all to make criticism of the choice of the Prime Minister, as a member of this House, of the hon. member for Gaspé as Speaker of the Fourteenth Parliament. Indeed, the Hon. Mr. Lemieux, associated as he has been with the House of Commons now for some twenty-five years, through most of that time in a position of high responsibility, always in a position of keen activity, and displaying throughout the entire period a marked knowledge of the history of our own land and of the Motherland, and particularly of parliamentary practice and of constitutional government, is, in point of experience and learning, undoubtedly amply qualified for the position of Speaker of this House.

I desire to comment, however, on one aspect of the situation. The choice of Speaker is the choice of this House. The House chooses and elects its Speaker; he is in no sense the choice of the Government —in no sense the choice of the Prime Minister. In the British House this has been the practice since the earliest times; we have followed that custom in equal degree and with equal fidelity. Indeed, in the British Parliament it has never been the practice even for a member of the Government to move or second the selection of a Speaker; that is left to the private members. In our Parliament we have not in that special regard followed the British practice. No one would deny that a member acceptable to the Administration should be selected; but I do deny the right of the Administration—the right of the Prime Minister—to announce to this House and to the country in advance whom we shall select as Speaker. I know of no instance where that has been done in our previous history. But, when the present Government was chosen, when after long and laborious incubation the names came to the light of day, the Prime Minister issued a statement on December 30 last, in which he announced that the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux would be selected as Speaker of the House of Commons. That was assuming a function not his own, a function in no way appertaining to the Government. It was his function to choose his ministers; it was not his function to choose or announce a Speaker. Indeed, it was no less than a discourtesy to this House to say in advance whom we should select as our Speaker.

That is in no way meant in disparagement of the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux). I do not suppose he was a party to the announcement. I believe his knowledge of our traditions is such that he would not be a party to such an announcement; and I join in every word of commendation of him in so far as his personal qualifications go. But I do not want those words to be understood as exculpating him from the penalty which he must pay for some of the speeches he made in his own province in order to secure the result which took place there on December 6. This, however, is not the appropriate place to refer in terms of controversy to those speeches. It would be most inappropriate were I now to even make mention of discussions of legitimate topics, though I might differ, and wholly differ, from assertions contained therein though made as assertions of fact. But certain lines of discussion may be indulged in in this country which are beyond the pale of political propriety, because if the example were followed by others it would be incompatible with our national life. In such unwarranted discussion the hon. member for Gaspé undoubtedly indulged.

Reference was made by the Prime Minister to the fact that only two other hon. members, elected as far back as 1896, sit among us to-day. My attention had not been previously drawn to the realization of that sad truth. It illustrates the uncertainty of human life—and it illustrates as well the mortality of political existence.

When reference was being made to the qualifications of the hon. member for Gaspé, and when claim to fidelity to parliamentary practice was being made on the part of the Prime Minister, I could not help but think that one custom which we have followed for many years, if not back to Confederation, has been disregarded in this instance. It has been the practice to promote him who has occupied the post of Deputy Speaker, if he is so fortunate as to be returned, to the position of Speaker in the succeeding Parliament. That was followed in the case of one hon. gentleman still a member of this House whom we are glad to see among us, representing, I presume, his former constituency, the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil). That was also the case in respect to the Hon. Louis Philippe Brodeur, who, having been Deputy Speaker for some years, succeeded in 1904 to the position of Speaker. It was followed in the case of the Hon. Albert Sevigny, who, having been Deputy Speaker, succeeded the Hon. T. S. Sproule as Speaker in 1917, and it was followed in the case of the late Speaker, Mr. Rhodes. That it has not been followed in the present instance cannot be attributed to lack of qualification on the part of the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin). I doubt if this House has ever been favoured with a deputy speaker who possessed greater qualifications for the duties of the office and who in their discharge met in higher degree the favour of all sides of this House. In the course of the exercise of his duties he manifested that diligence and strength of character, that stern impartiality and courage, that are so essential in a speaker of the House of Commons. The four years of his experience as Deputy Speaker would only add to his value were he now promoted to the position of Speaker. It is not for the Opposition to choose a Speaker; it is for Parliament as a whole. But I think it would have been most appropriate if the Prime Minister, in declining to follow the practice that has so long prevailed, had favoured the House with an explanation of why he had cast aside in this instance the hon. member for Shefford. We on this side, while offering no objection at all to the selection made—indeed, while honouring our fellow member, the hon. member for Gaspé—do feel that we are entitled to be told why the practice in the case that I have just mentioned, where the duties had been so conspicuously well fulfilled, has not been observed.

We open now the Fourteenth Parliament. One could not venture a desire for that Parliament the realization of which is more vital to us all than that the discharge of its functions will be characterized by that dignity, that devotion to the public interest, that regard for the public weal and for our traditions, our history, our past and our future, that has characterized the Parliaments that have gone. I believe that in the hon. member for Gaspé we start well on that path. I believe he will contribute well to our following it, and if it is the desire of the House that he be chosen as Speaker, I assure him that on our part we shall pay him the respect and deference that is his due and that is due to any who occupy that exalted post.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Leader of the Progressive Party): Mr. Northrup, this is one of the most important matters that can come before the House for consideration. The position of Speaker is, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has pointed out, one of very great responsibility; one that has attaching to it much of the tradition upon which our free parliamentary institutions have developed. It is indeed a very responsible post. I do not wish to associate myself with all that my right hon. friend the member for Grenville (Mr. Meighen) has said; with some of his criticisms I would, perhaps, be inclined to agree. At any rate, I have to say this: the Government, of course, are entitled to the selection of the Speaker. That being the case, they have made an excellent choice in the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux). He has been associated with this House for a great many years and is well acquainted with parliamentary procedure. In this Parliament, I am reminded, there are over one hundred new members; and I have no doubt that that excellent good humour, that patience and consideration which have always characterized the hon. member for Gaspé will enable him to assist these new members in the preparatory stages of their parliamentary work.

I agree entirely with the observation made by the Prime Minister, and also alluded to by my hon. friend from Grenville, who leads the official Opposition, that the British practice, whereby the speakership of the House of Commons does not change with the election of a new Parliament, might very well be introduced into our assembly. There is much to commend that practice. We were fortunate in the Speaker we had in the last House of Commons. We were fortunate, too, in the Deputy Speaker of that House, the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Boivin). I recall the facility with which the hon. member for Shefford could dispose of that multitude of Bills having to do with divorce which come from across the way, and I would like to have seen that energy applied to the conduct of the general business of this House. I have no doubt, however, that my hon. friend from Gaspé will do equally well, and I can promise him that so far as the "dilapidated annex" in this corner of the Chamber is concerned, we shall give him our very best support. I am sure that the choice will prove a happy one, and I have no doubt that the very important business of the House will, under the aegis of the hon. member for Gaspé, be conducted with due regard to all the traditions of the high office he is about to fill.

The Clerk of the House declared the motion carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente, and Honourable Rodolphe Lemieux, member for the electoral division of Gaspé, duly elected to the Chair of the House.

Honourable Mr. Lemieux was conducted from his seat in the House to the Speaker's Chair by Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King and Hon. W. S. Fielding.

Mr. SPEAKER-ELECT said: Madame; Fellow Members of the House of Commons: I must thank you from the bottom of my heart for the very high honour you have unanimously bestowed upon me. I know full well my unfitness for this high office but I trust that with the loyal co-operation of both sides in this House I shall be able to maintain with firmness, tempered by impartiality, the rules which unfortunately in the past I myself have honoured more in the breach than in the observance.

From this moment on I cease to be a party man; I become the servant of the House and in a broader sense the servant of the country, of which you are the direct, and I should add, the graceful expression.

I have sat, as has been stated, for twenty-five years in the House of Commons. I hope to live up to its traditions and to its memories. It shall be my endeavour in my administration of the rules of the House and in my interpretation of the constitutional usages to maintain and preserve those traditions, customs and privileges, and above all, that freedom of speech and that dignity and decorum in debate, which have come down to us through precedent and precedent from the Mother of Parliaments, the British House of Commons.

Madame, mes chers collègues, je vous remercie du plus profond de mon cœur du témoignage de confiance que vous venez de me donner si unanimement. Je sais que je n'ai pas la compétence voulue pour faire dignement honneur à la position, mais vous pouvez compter sur mon impartialité et sur ma fermeté afin que les règlements de la Chambre, règlements qui nous sont venus de très loin puisqu'ils datent de la monarchie anglo-normande dont nous sommes les héritiers au Canada, soient respectés. C'est ainsi que nous donnerons à nos délibérations la dignité voulue. J'espère qu'avec votre concours je serai à la hauteur de la situation et qu'ensemble nous maintiendrons les traditions, les us et coutumes, les privilèges, la liberté de parole qui nous viennent du plus grand, j'oserais dire du modèle des parlements modernes, le parlement britannique. Encore une fois, mes chers collègues, merci du plus profond de mon cœur.

DEPUTY SERGEANT-AT-ARMS

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Sergeant-at-Arms, with my approval, has appointed Louis Charles Panet, Esquire, to be his deputy during the present session of Parliament.

ADJOURNMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the adjournment of the House:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I think that the House will expect me to make to them at as early a date as possible a report of the proceedings, or at all events of the part taken by myself and by my colleagues, as representing Canada, at the recent Conference in Great Britain. I have been favoured with a complete report of the Conference proceedings myself, but it comes to me marked "Secret," and of course necessarily is in some degree of that character. For the purpose of making the representation I would like, it will be essential that I review my own position, and to make that understandable, the position taken by at least some of the other representatives there on various matters of great consequence. I should not feel free to do so, unless I had a definite word and liberty given as to what use I might make of the report that is to hand. I therefore would ask my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to communicate with the Prime Minister of Great Britain and secure as far as possible liberty to me to quote from the Report of the Conference and to secure as well a statement of such limitations and reservations as he feels in the general interest should be imposed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be very pleased indeed to give consideration to the matter to which my right hon. friend has referred.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would ask as well that the Government lay on the Table, at the Opening of Parliament, if possible, a copy of an Order in Council, which has been referred to in the press—I do not know whether one was passed—in reference to the transfer of certain fishery rights from the Dominion to the province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 3.55 p.m. Wednesday.

Thursday, March 9, 1922.

The House met at Three o'clock.

OPENING OF THE SESSION

Mr. SPEAKER read a communication from the Governor General's Secretary announcing that His Excellency would proceed to the Senate Chamber at 3 p.m. on this day for the purpose of formally opening the session of the Dominion Parliament.

A message was delivered by Lieut.-Col. Ernest J. Chambers, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

Then the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux, Speaker-elect, said:

May it please your Excellency,

The House of Commons have elected me as their Speaker, though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me. If in the performance of those duties I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons whose servant I am.

The Honourable the Speaker of the Senate addressing the Honourable the Speaker of the Commons then said:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Excellency the Governor General to assure you that your words and actions will constantly receive from him the most favourable construction.

Then His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to open Parliament by a Speech from the Throne.

And the House being returned to the Commons Chamber:

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to state that the House having attended on His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate Chamber, I informed His Excellency that the choice of Speaker had fallen upon me, and, in your names and on your behalf, I made the usual claim for your privileges, which His Excellency was pleased to confirm to you.

BILL INTRODUCED

Bill No. 1, respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office—Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a Speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I desire on this occasion to assure you that it is with great satisfaction that I meet the Parliament of the Dominion for the first time since my arrival in Canada, and avail myself of your assistance and advice in carrying out the important duties that His Majesty the King has entrusted to me as his Representative. It is, indeed, a great privilege to be called upon to administer the affairs of the Dominion and to associate myself with you in the work you are about to begin.

Our Dominion has not escaped the world-wide economic disturbance and industrial depression but has suffered less from it than other countries. Keen observers of the business barometer feel that the worst is about over and that at an early date we may look for a substantial revival of activity.

In many parts of the Dominion continued depression of business naturally produced, in a much larger degree than usual, the misfortune of unemployment. Whilst of the opinion that unemployment relief is fundamentally a municipal and provincial responsibility, my Government has felt that as conditions have arisen in a measure out of the late war, they would be justified in continuing for the period of the winter months the expedient of supplementing by grants from the Federal Treasury the relief contributions of Provinces and Municipalities for the purpose of alleviating actual distress.

The decline of prices in farm products in 1921, as compared with the prices of previous years, has seriously affected agriculture in many parts of the Dominion. The ill-effects of this inevitable deflation have been emphasized by restricted markets and the absence of any corresponding reduction in the cost of production. While improved methods of culture, grading and storage of farm crops in some parts, and greater diversification in others, would materially better conditions, it is apparent that adequate markets and marketing facilities and reduced transportation and production costs lie at the root of the problem. Recognizing such to be the case, my advisers have lost no time in seeking to gain more favourable conditions of sale and marketing for the products of the farm. Communications have been opened with the authorities of other countries looking to an extension of trade and a widening of Canadian markets, and conferences have been arranged between the railway authorities with respect to the reduction of rates upon basic commodities.

You will be invited to consider the expediency of making some changes in the Customs Tariff. While there are details of revision, the consideration of which will require time and care that are not at present available, there are features of the tariff which it is felt may properly be dealt with during the present session.

In order that Government ownership and operation of our national railways now extending through every province of the Dominion may be given a fair trial under the most favourable conditions, it is intended at an early date to co-ordinate the Government-owned systems in the manner best calculated to increase efficiency, and to effect economies in administration, maintenance and operation. The whole transportation situation is one which will require your best attention. It weighs heavily upon our national finances. To assist in obtaining the information essential to an exact understanding and an adequate appreciation of the problem in its many bearings, it is proposed to supplement the work of co-ordination by a thorough enquiry.

The stream of immigration to the Dominion was much interrupted and restricted during the war. Now that the blessing of peace is with us, a renewal of efforts to bring in new settlers must be made. My Government are fully alive to the importance of this question and will use every reasonable endeavour to attract to our country people of the most desirable class, with particular regard to settlement on our undeveloped lands.

The work in connection with the re-establishment, medical treatment and vocational training of former members of the Canadian Forces is being sympathetically and energetically prosecuted. The care of the disabled still demands the best thought of those who are charged with the duty of administering the benefits provided. It is intended, during the coming session, again to consult Parliament concerning some of the problems still remaining.

The long standing question of granting the control of the natural resources of three Western Provinces to their respective Provincial Governments has engaged the attention of my Ministers. Sympathizing with the desire of the authorities of these Provinces, which have now advanced to maturity, to have the same control and management of their resources as is possessed by the older Provinces, my Government have made a proposal to the Governments of the several Provinces concerned, which it is hoped may lead to a satisfactory settlement of the question at an early date.

With the object of promoting economy and increasing efficiency, a Bill will be submitted to you, providing for a Department of Defence, in which the various branches of the defence forces of Canada will be co-ordinated under one ministerial head.

During the interval since the last Parliament, there has been held in Washington on the invitation of the President of the United States an International Conference to consider an agreed limitation of armaments and in connection therewith to reach an understanding concerning the political relations of the Powers interested in the regions of the Pacific and the Far East. From this Conference treaties of far reaching consequence have resulted. It is the opinion of my advisers that approval of Parliament ought to precede their ratification on behalf of Canada. The treaties with appropriate explanations will accordingly be placed before you during the session.

As the result of recent discussions among the Powers, it has been decided to hold at Genoa a conference with the object of securing, through frank and amicable consultation among the nations who have been at war, a concerted effort to repair the grave dislocations in the economic and financial field that have everywhere followed the war. The Government of Canada has been invited to participate and delegates have been appointed for the purpose.

An invitation has been extended to the Government of Canada by the Government of the United States to take part in a Postal Conference, at which all phases of mail communication from one country to the other may be fully discussed. Reciprocating the spirit that has prompted the invitation, the Canadian Government will, in due course, appoint representatives to meet the representatives of the United States for the purpose mentioned.

Members of the House of Commons:

The Public Accounts for the last fiscal year will be laid before you. At an early date the Estimates for the coming year will be submitted. In their preparation imperative need for economy has rendered necessary the non-inclusion of many undertakings, appropriations for which must await a more favourable financial situation.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

In inviting your careful consideration of the important matters which will engage your attention, I pray that Divine Providence may guide and bless your deliberations.

On motion of Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King (Prime Minister):

That the speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both Houses of Parliament be taken into consideration on Monday next, and that this order have precedence over all other business except the introduction of bills until disposed of.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Before the motion carries, I would say that I had no intimation from the Government,—which I know will surprise hon. gentlemen across the way —as to what the intentions of the Government were in regard to the conduct of proceedings this week. It seems to me too bad if the entire week is to be devoted merely to formalities. Would it not be possible to take the Speech from the Throne into consideration to-morrow?

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: (Prime Minister) Mr. Speaker, I regret that there has been any oversight in informing my right hon. friend of the customary procedure at the opening of parliament, but I had assumed that his experience in this House would have sufficiently acquainted him with what was customary on the opening day. I think, when we consider that hon. members are gathered together for the first time in this new Parliament, it will probably be consulting the convenience of all parties if we follow the custom of the past and adjourn after to-day's proceedings until Monday.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is by no means the invariable custom to do so. The late Government managed to get down to business sooner.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend will have ample time to discuss all matters. I might observe to him that in his impatience to make his announcement to the House yesterday he did not so much as permit His Excellency the right to read the Speech from the Throne before informing the House as to what business he would like to have taken up. We on this side will do everything necessary to facilitate the business of Parliament, and I think we can get on without the suggestion of my right hon. friend.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees of this House under Rule 10; said Committee to be composed of: Messrs. Beland, Robb, Low, Kyte, Papineau, Tolmie, Boys, Johnston (Last Mountain), and Forke; and that that portion of Rule 10 limiting the number of members of the said Committee be suspended in relation thereto.

Motion agreed to.

WEEK-END ADJOURNMENT

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING: I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Fielding:

That when the House adjourns this day it do stand adjourned until Monday next, the 13th instant, at three o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) presented the following message from his Excellency the Governor General:

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons a certified copy of an approved Minute of Council appointing the Honourable H. S. Beland, Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment; the Honourable J. A. Robb, Minister of Trade and Commerce; the Honourable T. A. Low, Minister, and the Honourable John E. Sinclair, Minister without Portfolio, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as Commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the Eleventh Chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, intituled "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

Annual Report of the Department of Agriculture for the year ended March 31, 1921.—Hon. Mr. Motherwell.

FISHERY RIGHTS

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I lay on the table of the House copy of Order in Council requested by my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) yesterday, authorizing the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to undertake the administration of the fisheries in the tidal and navigable waters of Quebec that are accessible by way of navigation from the sea.

PRIME MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

COPY OF PROCEEDINGS TABLED BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I lay on the table of the House a copy of "Proceedings of the Conference of Prime Ministers and Representatives of the United Kingdom, the Dominions, and India, held in June, July and August, 1921—Summary of Proceedings and Documents." This is a copy of the report of the Conference of Prime Ministers which was laid on the table of the House in Great Britain. I may say that a little over a month ago I communicated with the authorities in England asking for a number of copies of this printed document in order that each member of the House might have a copy for his own perusal. I am informed that these documents were shipped from England about the twenty-fourth of last month, so they may be here at any time. The Under-Secretary of State will see that each member is supplied with a copy as soon as they are received.

My right hon. friend yesterday, referring to the proceedings of this Conference, stated that certain of them were secret and asked me to communicate with the Prime Minister of Great Britain in order to find out what part, if any, of the secret proceedings he would be at liberty to disclose. A good deal has been said by my right hon. friend in regard to the equality of status of the different countries comprising the British Empire. I would say that I see no necessity for our asking Great Britain what we may do in reference to any conference of Prime Ministers. As I look at the proceedings I find that representatives of Australia, New Zealand, South Africa and India were present, and I should think there would be quite as much reason for communicating with Australia and South Africa as with Great Britain in regard to what part of the proceedings should be made public in this Parliament. There is equal reason also to ask the Government of this country what its view is as to the proceedings and what action should be taken with respect to regarding any part of them as private. I may say to my right hon. friend that this is a public document and that he or any other hon. member of this House is at liberty to quote any part of it. In regard to any proceedings that were secret, I have no doubt that my right hon. friend was a party to any arrangement that was made as to the secrecy of the proceedings and he must use his own judgment as to what he will disclose or withhold in regard to that part of the Conference.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it is true that all parties to the Conference had equal status, but my hon. friend must remember that the Conference was called by the British Government and that the Secretariat has issued the report thereon. It is, therefore, the right of the British Government to say to what extent the part taken by those representatives must be regarded as secret. I have asked my hon. friend to find that out; if he declines, he takes the responsibility.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I wish to make my position perfectly clear. I simply take the ground that the Conference of Prime Ministers was a conference of the representatives of different countries, all of which were met on a basis of equality. For that reason I do not propose to return to the colonial status so far as this country is concerned, by asking permission to quote from the report.

LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I lay on the table of the House copies of the treaty concluded at the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments held at Washington from November 12, 1921, to February 6, 1922, signed on behalf of Canada. A report on this conference will be prepared by Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, who was Canada's representative at the conference, and will be presented to Parliament in due course.

Mr. CRERAR: May I ask my hon. friend if those documents will be printed and made available for the information of members of the House?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly. As soon as the report of Sir Robert Borden is received it will be printed. The treaties also will be printed and attached as appendices to the report.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the adjournment of the House:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the motion carries I find it necessary to make a request similar to the one I made yesterday, because of the impending debate on the Address and because of a reference in the Speech from the Throne. It is this: that there be laid on the table of the House on Monday, if at all possible,—at the earliest possible day, at any rate—a copy of the correspondence that passed between the late Government and the Government of Australia, particularly the Prime Minister of Australia, and between the members of the late Government and myself, with respect to reciprocal trade with Australia. This correspondence commenced about May or June, 1921.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 4.20 p.m., until Monday, March 13.

Monday, March 13, 1922

The House met at Three o'clock.

RECIPROCAL TRADE WITH AUSTRALIA

CORRESPONDENCE TABLED BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) asked me to lay on the table of the House correspondence between the late Government and the Government of Australia with respect to reciprocal trade relations between Australia and Canada. I have gathered together such papers as I am able to find in the Department, but the file does not appear to be complete, and I have asked that further search be made for other papers. Those that I am now bringing down are the only papers that thus far have come to my notice.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): I mentioned as well correspondence between members of the late Government and myself. I refer particularly to correspondence that passed between the Acting Prime Minister and myself while I was at the Imperial Conference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the correspondence which I have just brought down.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY Mr. E. J. McMURRAY, SECONDED BY Mr. PAUL MERCIER.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. E. J. McMURRAY (North Winnipeg) moved:

That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, offering the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is customary, and courtesy requires, that as mover of this Address I should express the appreciation of my constituents and myself for the high honour that has been done to them and to me. This constituency of North Winnipeg which I represent is one of the most cosmopolitan in Canada by reason of the varied ethnic elements of its population, many of them people from Central Europe, who, as new Canadians, I am pleased to say, Sir, are rapidly acquiring the manners, characteristics and habits of old Canadians; and because of their racial origin they appreciate very much the honour that has been paid to them by having their representative move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

It is a pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate you, and to congratulate ourselves, upon your appointment as first Commoner. Your wide experience as a parliamentarian, as a cabinet minister, and as a barrister will be of inestimable service to us as we deliberate in this assembly, and I trust, Sir, that you will be long spared to give us your advice and guidance.

The poet has said:

The old order changeth giving place to the new; and we have in this House for the first time a lady member—the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). I am sure that when I say we all appreciate her presence here my words find an echo in the hearts of all.

During the past year the term of Governor Generalship of the Duke of Devonshire, who and whose family in many ways have been connected with Canadian life, terminated. Baron Byng of Vimy, a man who as commander of our gallant divisions in the war had won a high place in the hearts of the Canadian people, has succeeded to that office. I am sure, Sir, that it will be filled by him with satisfaction to us, and I trust that his tenure of office will be pleasureable to himself and to his family.

This new Parliament, the first expression of the will of the Canadian people after the war, meets under unusual circumstances. Both at home and abroad conditions are abnormal. Four years of war have rendered Europe not the Europe of old. International trade had drawn us close together, the world had grown smaller. Any serious disturbance of trade or of affairs in Europe must affect every nation, and we in that regard have been affected with the rest. Those circumstances and conditions we cannot control. But throughout the whole of her history Europe has survived tremendous catastrophes; there is in European civilization an inherent strength, a capacity to reestablish itself. Already the situation is clarifying; already the stars are beginning to to shine in Europe's dark night. The Washington Conference on the Limitation of Armaments, which has just closed, is, let us hope, the morning star that ushers in the dawn of a day of international harmony and concord. The reference to that Conference in the Speech from the Throne is a matter of satisfaction. I was particularly struck with the intimation that the treaties there arranged are to be submitted to the consideration of this House; it is a vindication of the assertion that has been made by Mr. Lloyd George, by Mr. Smuts, and by Mr. Hughes, that we are a nation in every sense of the term.

We have domestic problems, the outcome of which we can more or less control; the exterior problem we cannot so much control. We have a stupendous financial burden, the greatest in the history of this country, involving an indebtedness which can only be carried by large annual outlays. We have also a very difficult railway problem. Our state-owned railroad system, one of the largest in the world, is being operated at an annual deficit of many millions. The rates are so high to-day as to thwart and stifle industry and to defeat the very object for which they were established. This railroad system—a portion of it—has been actually wished upon us; like a starved and emaciated foundling it has been left at the door of the Dominion and the Dominion must perforce take it in and, we hope, rear it and develop it to strong and healthy maturity. Private ownership as applied to much of this road, Sir, has proved to be a failure. Private ownership has laid the burden and asked that we take it up and carry it. That being the case, state ownership should be given a chance. Not for a year or two, but for a reasonable length of time, having regard to prevailing conditions, to the vastness of the project and to the failure of private ownership, state ownership should be given a reasonable opportunity to demonstrate its capacity to deal with this tremendous problem.

Those who have travelled over the state-owned road from Quebec to Edmonton must have been struck with the fact that no railway line on the American continent runs through a better, a more productive, a greater freight-yielding country. In Northern Ontario and Northern Quebec there are probably twenty million acres of fertile land, capable of producing our ordinary cereals, land which will some day be very thickly settled. It is estimated that between Edmonton and Winnipeg, within a distance of ten or twelve miles on each side of the road, there are some ten million acres of unoccupied lands; from Edmonton out to the Coast the line runs through a more or less productive region. It is said, Sir, that comparisons are odious, but one cannot help remarking, merely for the sake of illustration, that the Canadian Pacific Railroad does not run through any section of country so productive as that traversed by the old Grand Trunk Pacific and the Transcontinental. There is a small strip of rocky land along the line of the state-owned road between the Quebec border and Edmonton, covering a distance of some three hundred miles, but even that area is more or less heavily mineralized. It is a matter of great satisfaction that in the Speech from the Throne it is stated that there will be a co-ordination of the various railroad systems making up the National Railways which will ensure better management and bring about economy in operation.

Closely connected with these two great problems, the national indebtedness and the national railroads, is the question of conditions pertaining to agriculture. Agriculture is the basic industry of Canada; in it we Canadians, speaking from the financial point of view, live and move and have our being. During the war agriculture was a paying industry, but following the termination of the war prices have fallen or have become unstabilized, through the costs of operation—of farm machinery and of labour—continue high. That has been the condition of agriculture throughout Canada. Moreover, a high tariff wall has been raised against us in the United States in the form of the Fordney Bill. In adition to that, the crops of the West last year suffered from heavy rains and there was a consequent lowering in the quality of the grain produced and in the price obtained. Agriculture in Canada to-day, therefore, is becoming an unprofitable occupation.

It was with pleasure that I heard in the Speech from the Throne, Sir, that the policy of the Liberal party of the past and as set down in their election platform was to be brought into effect as far as possible during this session, in a consideration of the tariff and a reduction as far as possible of the duties on certain commodities. The tariff operates, Sir, as a rule to the advantage of the few and to the disadvantage of the many, and the deductions to be made will be in the interests of the producer as well as of the great body of the consumers. These reductions can be made without violence, without dislocation of industry; they will be in the interests of the country as a whole.

While on the subject of agriculture, to those of us who came from Western Canada, which, after all, commands a very high place in our agricultural production, it was particularly gratifying to hear that the natural resources of the three western provinces were to be dealt with and some form of settlement effected, if possible. We of the West, and particularly Manitoba, have long awaited such a step. We want only what is fair and reasonable, we want only what we believe is constitutionally ours; and I repeat, it was a great pleasure to me as a westerner to hear in the Speech from the Throne, the first time, I believe, any such intimation has been given in that way, that a settlement of this long outstanding question was under negotiation.

Undoubtedly, it is an evidence of the goodwill of the Government and of the people of the East towards the people of the West. In this connection I cannot help making reference to the gracious act that has been accorded to the West by the province of Quebec in providing a constituency and a seat for the Honourable the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Mr. Stewart). That gracious act was indicative, I believe, of the goodwill of the people of the East towards the people of the West, of the French-speaking people towards their English-speaking compatriots.

The Speech from the Throne in its opening paragraphs contained a reference to unemployment, and intimated that the Government would continue, at least for the present year, measures of relief in that connection. Unemployment is a painful thing. It is with us very largely because of the dislocation of business caused by the war. Many returned men and many skilled artisans are idle, and it was therefore very gratifying to learn in the Speech from the Throne that there has been an appreciation of that condition.

Then there is the question of the returned soldier. Some arrangement must be made in that regard. We cannot do greater honour to the soldier, the living or the dead, than to provide for his dependents, and for those who have been disabled. We cannot do too much, within reason, in that regard.

These problems that we have to face are tremendous; they cannot be minimized. They are problems worthy of the calibre of the Canadian people. Our problems are great, but compared with the lot of other people we, in this country, are comparatively fortunate. Canada can be compared to a young athlete who has been stunned in a struggle, only to rise stronger to continue the battle to ultimate victory, like the fabled wrestler of old who when he touched his mother earth only rose the stronger. Time and tide are with Canada. Time runs in Canada's favour. The recuperative powers of a country are a combination of its resources and its people, and the history of Canada has proven us to be an intelligent, industrious, and resourceful people. Our resources are very great, in fact, almost illimitable when compared with most other countries. We have a vast extent of fertile land, some three hundred million acres, of which but one-sixth, or some fifty million acres, is under cultivation. We can produce food in as great a variety as the German Empire, and yet the German Empire, by reason of its food supply, was capable of defying the world in arms for a period of years. The German Empire is a mere pigmy compared with Canada in the area of its fertile food-producing land. We have vast forests, some five hundred thousand square miles, two hundred thousand square miles of which is saw timber. And yet with these vast forests we actually have Germany to-day, with its forests planted on the sand dunes, competing against us in the American markets in the pulp industry. Great as is our fertile land in Canada, it constitutes but about fifteen per cent of the total area of the country.

We have also over two million square miles of mineral lands. The mineral lands of Canada are unusual and different from those found almost anywhere else. As a rule, in the matter of minerals, Mother Nature has hidden her jewels well, but we have that great pre-Cambrian range extending down from the north and crossing into Minnesota and Michigan. We have merely touched the fringe of its wealth. Yet we have the Cobalt and the nickel mines of Sudbury—the Hollinger gold mine—the Flin Flon, with its twenty million tons of copper—we have that great iron range extending down into Minnesota—we are on the edge of the great copper ledges of Michigan. Great as are our agricultural resources, high as Canada stands in the agricultural world to-day, some day in the future she may stand still higher as a mineral-producing nation.

We have in our oceans and inland waters vast resources in fish. In water powers we stand second in the world. Undoubtedly, in the very near future water power will take the place of coal in our homes and in our industries; it will operate the transcontinental trains.

In addition to all these resources our railways are built, the trunk lines at least; we have built our canals. The stage is all set. What do we lack? Canada lacks but two things. We are short in man power, and short in capital. Is there a solution to the great problems that we have to face? What must we do to be saved financially? There is only one way in which wealth can be produced and that is by the application of labour to the natural resources direct or indirect. We must deal with our great resources as an individual would deal with his. We must assist in permitting the free development of these resources, and we can assist by providing markets. As Robert Ingersoll so beautifully said, "And prosperity, when it comes must come over the golden grain fields, past the flaming forges and the whirring wheels, greeted and grasped by the countless sons of toil."

For the building up of our country, for the development of its resources, and in order that we may be prosperous and rich individually, we must bring to our country wealth-creating labour and capital. And I believe, Sir, that the time was never more suitable than at present—owing to the dislocated conditions of affairs in Europe consequent on the termination of the great world war—for the bringing to Canada the very cream of Europe's wealth-producing people. The same would hold, Sir, in connection with attracting settlers from the United States. The stage is all set for the resumption of our development from the point where it was temporarily stayed. Where should we have been, Mr. Speaker, had the trade arrangements that had been established, the wider markets that had been secured, been permitted to continue? Had war not intervened, with these resources where would we have been to-day? Who can tell? As I have already said, the stage is set, Sir. We have no creed problems and no racial problems in Canada such as they have in Europe. We have all the conditions necessary to enable us to forge ahead.

It is true, Sir, that we cannot offer people free homesteads such as have existed in the past, but we can offer them cheap lands—lands close to railroads, lands with all the conveniences of good roads, schools, and every other advantage attendant upon them. It was by a system of immigration that the United States grew up to be the great nation that she is to-day, the paragon of the world so far as wealth and increased population is concerned. And in past years wealth was produced with great rapidity in Canada. So able an observer as the late Viscount Bryce marvelled at the rapid creation of wealth in this country.

It is very interesting—and I will not detain the House long in this connection—to consider the growth of wealth in Canada under an active immigration policy. In the year 1896 there were five millions of people in this country, in 1911 there were seven millions, an increase of forty per cent. In 1896 the exports and imports of Canada amounted to $223,000,000, and in 1911 the figures had increased to $798,000,000, or over 300 per cent. In 1900 the mineral products of Canada amounted to $47,000,000; in 1910 they had increased to $122,000,000, or a gain of 250 per cent in ten years. In 1900 the capital invested in manufactures in Canada was $446,000,000; ten years later the amount had increased to $1,247,000,000, or a gain of 275 per cent. The value of the manufactured products in 1900 was $481,000,000, whereas in 1910 that value had increased to $1,165,000,000 or 250 per cent. Those products in the last ten years, or in 1920, have more than doubled, and to-day amount to some three billions. In the growth of agriculture there has been the same marked increased. In 1900 there were some 16,000,000 acres of land under cultivation in Canada. In 1910 that area had increased to 30,000,000, a gain of 14,000,000—the area of cultivation practically doubled. In 1900 there were 338,000,000 bushels of grain produced, and in 1910 the figures had increased to 583,000,000, an increase of 250,000,000 bushels. In 1911, the number of horses, cattle, and swine had increased by one million each. In cultivated lands from 1910 to 1921, despite the war, there was an increase from 32,000,000 acres to 52,000,000 acres, a gain of 20,000,000 acres.

Now, Sir, to meet this situation what must we do? We must bring immigrants to Canada to fill the vacant spaces of the West and help develop the country's great resources. The call is for men, men, and yet more men. We must attract capital to Canada; we must provide conditions under which capital will come to this country and be safe in its investment here.

I was glad, Sir, to note in the Speech from the Throne that already steps had been taken by the Government to make provisions for obtaining wider markets. These markets must be found. We must consider the Orient, we must consider Mexico. Coupled with these measures we must bring science to our aid. We must prevent national waste, such as the terrible destruction of our forests by fire. By national thrift and saving—the replenishment of our seas, the refertilization of our fields, the replanting of our forest, by planting a tree wherever we cut one down—our future will be eventually assured.

But, Sir, we have another and greater work to perform. We cannot be great and rich, we cannot develop our resources, unless peace and concord dwell within our borders. National duty must never permit class selfishness to usurp its functions. We must build up in this country a democracy sound, and sane, and loyal to the core to Canada. We must have the fullest scope of liberty within our borders. Where liberty dwells license will not exist; license only follows upon the heels of tyranny. Sir, during the last few years democratic principles have had a rough time of it in our country. Perhaps we must make allowance for the consequences of war, and if we do probably some justification may be found for the curtailment of free institutions and the loss of a certain amount of liberty. But at the termination of war that restraint should have been lifted and we should have reverted at once to our old institutions. The condemnation of the late Government by the people of Canada at the last election, so decisive, so absolutely overwhelming, was the united protest—the united and indignant protest—of the people against political autocracy. The people, Sir, could not and would not forget government by Order in Council and specially constructed Election Acts. The status of the Canadian, Sir, as a citizen, in the last few years had sunk very low. May that time never come again. Under the new regime these conditions never will again obtain. Liberalism is associated absolutely with personal liberty. On personal liberty the British Empire was built. And, Sir, while it was not contained in the Speech from the Throne, I would like to see the last Act enacted by the late Parliament, the Election Act, which deprived a large portion of the electors of this country, particularly in my own constituency, from participating in the inalienable right of selecting and electing a Government—I would like to see that Act repealed and disappear from our statute books. As long as it continues in force it is an insult to these people, a degredation to ourselves, and a blot upon our statutes.

When we read the history of Europe and reflect upon its past wars and catastrophies, when we contemplate Europe to-day, with the decimation of its population by wars and famines, when we think of the tragic story of Ireland within our own Empire, with all its tale of sadness and of sorrow, and when we reflect that in this Canada of ours, two of the world's most virile races, high in courage and proud of lineage, but with a difference in speech and religion, with the true spirit of democracy, with mutual toleration and forbearance, for upwards of a hundred years have lived together side by side, and developed the free institutions which we enjoy to-day; when we realize that these wars of Europe have largely been the result of race creed and race difference, Sir, the concord prevailing in Canada must be cause of great satisfaction to us. The same spirit that existed between the French and the English in this country we must exercise towards the new Canadian who is with us in many thousands in the West to-day, who will come to us more and more as time progresses. It was no statesman's hand that spread the weed seeds of dissension to the detriment and injury of his country.

We have occupational troubles in Canada, as other nations of the world have had, and as other members of the British Empire are experiencing. There are troubles between labour and capital in this country, and they must be dealt with. There must be a spirit of toleration, a spirit of reasonableness. With this, and under the guidance of the eminent gentleman, the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Mackenzie King), with his deep theoretical knowledge and wide practical experience, and of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock), these problems should be easily and readily solved. There has grown up in this country, or is said to have grown up, a spirit of antagonism between the agricultural interest and the manufacturing interest. These interests are undoubtedly dependent one upon another. We must approach them in the same spirit that has worked out so successfully between our French-Canadian people and our English-speaking people. We must not deviate from the path of reasonableness and fairness in dealing with these questions, and must cast aside everything which is not in the common interest of our country. In a spirit of toleration we must deal with the great problems placed in our hands. We want Canadian people, in the words of Kipling, to realize that "there is no East, no West, border nor breed nor birth." And I recall the very appropriate words of one who in the years gone by sat in this House as a minister, who said, in the words of poetry:

> What matter if at different shrines we kneel unto one God,
> What matter if at different times our fathers won the sod,
> One in name, one in fame,

—the Canadian should ever be.

The question of tariff is a very important one. I notice in the Speech from the Throne a reference to the postal conference to be held between Canada and the United States. That indicates a friendly spirit. The Fordney Bill is not framed specially against Canada, and I understand there are possibilities of some trade arrangements being made with them.

I note also the co-ordination of all the branches of defence under one head. That is indicative undoubtedly of a period of economy in the administration of affairs, and I close with the golden words of one, ever respected by political friend and foe, a truly great Canadian, who left his mark forever upon this country, words uttered a short time before his death to the young Liberals of London, Ontario. I refer to the gifted leader of the Liberal party. He said to these young men—

> After a long life I shall remind you that already many problems rise before you, problems of race division, problems of creed differences, problems of economic conflict, problems of national duty and national aspiration. Let me tell you that for the solution of these problems you have the safe guide and unfailing light if you remember that faith is better than doubt and love than hate. So live, so strive, so serve to do your part, to raise ever higher the standard of life you live in.

I have the honour, Sir, to move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. PAUL MERCIER (Westmount-St. Henri) (Translation): Mr. Speaker: The opening of the fourteenth Parliament of Canada took place with the prescribed state ceremonies and amidst the concourse of the people mingling their voices in praise to God and our Sovereign King George V.

I highly appreciate the honour conferred by the Prime Minister in calling upon me to second the motion to the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. This honour reflects highly upon the electors of the division of Westmount-St. Henri.

Rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that in rising amongst this distinguished assembly of the nation, I realize fully all the responsibilities which, at this moment, devolve upon me. Once my task is fulfilled my one regret will be that of not having been equal to the mission so kindly entrusted to me. I therefore beg my fellow members to be indulgent and rather attribute to my lack of parliamentary experience the deficiencies of my debut in this House.

To second in my mother tongue the motion for the Address is to seize upon a pleasing occasion to pay homage to my Sovereign, my country, my province and my race; it is at the same time to perform a duty towards our ancestors for the heritage which we have inherited in the form of the British North America Act; it affords the thankful son an occasion to remember his native province; it moreover testifies to the return to our best traditions; it is to trace our constitutional liberties back to their origin; finally, Mr. Speaker, it is to sanction anew the official use of the French language in the debate on the Address and in the administration of the affairs of the country. General elections took place on the 6th of December last. The Meighen Government and its followers had not the satisfaction of seeing their deeds and their political programme endorsed by the people. On the contrary the Canadian people placed their trust in the Liberals, made them their authorized mandatories under the direction of a Liberal ministry, having as its leader the young and brilliant successor to Laurier, the hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King. The country welcomed the new ministry composed of distinguished statesmen, and in the true spirit of our constitution, all responsible to the people. Just as in 1896, when the Laurier ministry assumed power, the Canadian people look forward with confidence to the future, trusting in the guiding light of those who henceforth designated to safeguard our Canadian traditions, direct the destinies of the country.

Within these parliamentary walls raised with such splendour from their ashes, Mr. Speaker, I feel throbbing in the elite that surround me, symbolising the nine provinces of Confederation, as it were, the anxious soul of the country. Canada is suffering from the consequence of the world-wide crisis; an epoch of heavy responsibility is its lot. Its revenues are no longer adequate to meet the national debt and to enable the federal administration to carry on. The country is anxious and suffering through unemployment; the wheels of industry are running slow. Our citizens bear up with sacrifices, proving by their quiet and dignified attitude that the solidarity in misfortunes must one day or another, earn them a better fate. As a representative of the people, I shared the intimate thoughts of my electors and with them I was most desirious to hear from the Governor General's lips, in the Speech from the Throne a message of good wishes and also the Government's programme of legislation in the course of the present session.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to greet His Excellency the Governor General, official representative in Canada of our Sovereign. Lord Byng of Vimy is not unknown to us. Our soldiers knew him on the battle fields of Flanders; he was their general and led them through the raking fire of Vimy.

Together they participated in the same victories. On the return home, our warriors joined in praising his urbanity and eminent qualities of his heart and soul. Better than anyone, His Excellency, will understand how our Canada has grown by the warlike prowess of our triumphant armies and by the ashes of our illustrious dead, who peacefully rest over there, on the battle-fields of Flanders and on the plains of Champagne.

I moreover greet, and in this circumstance I firmly believe that I shall again have the entire approval of this House, the new Speaker, the hon. member for Gaspé, that loyal friend, grandson of a true patriot and father of a hero. His twenty-five years of exemplary parliamentary life, his uprightness, his judicial and profound knowledge of the rules and regulations of this House, had for a long time past truly designated him for this princely Chair.

Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I second the motion for the address because I realize that the Government has understood, under its true aspect, the economical situation and by its programme will live up to the requirements of the hour. Guizot, the French historian, said:

"In well administered States, the greatest concern of the government is for the improvement of economic conditions in their widest sense. Large amounts are voted favoring agriculture, industry and commerce."

These statements cannot be gainsaid. If the government of a country does not endeavour to advance agriculture, industry and commerce, it will proclaim itself to be a weak and unprogressive administration, the country will remain in a state of stagnation and poverty and failure will be the lot of its people.

These hard truths, Mr. Speaker, are worthy of reflection. These great misfortunes must be avoided and forestalled. I notice by the Speech from the Throne that the King Government recognize those duties and that agriculture, industry and commerce will receive their entire solicitude as well as the administration measures with which they are closely linked.

I agree entirely with our Government's views on this subject of general interest, and let me point out to you why we must encourage to-day more than ever, agriculture, industry, commerce and their attributes amongst which I mention immigration and the labour question.

Agriculture is bound with the future of our Dominion. Rightly is it said that our country is the granary of the empire.

The history of the world teaches us that the ancients held in honour agriculture, and put it to an intelligent use, except during the epoch of their downfall. Agriculture was the source of prosperity of the European countries. It has been the dawn of our progress and it is yet one of the factors which shall assure our prosperity. Liberal governments have always understood that the agricultural budget should include generous subsidies. Therefore, within the bounds of its revenue, the Government will favour a sound agricultural policy permitting agricultural science to develop continuously, and the farming industry to rest on a solid foundation. True, Mr. Speaker, America and Australia are new countries where as a matter of course, farming is pursued on a large scale, where returns from the land are prompt; but it is necessary all the same, to assist our a[illegible] more than is being done, by [illegible] and scientific methods. Acting [illegible] touch with the provinces, the Dominion government will not fail to realize its cherished dream, that of upholding agriculture as the corner stone of our material and social progress.

The interest which the Prime Minister, following in the footsteps of Laurier, has shown to the agricultural class, will the better convince the latter of the nobleness of its calling, and that it is absolutely essential to our country. In thus preventing the emigration of our own people to foreign lands, the homestead should become an earthly paradise rather than the neighbouring towns where the sons and sometimes the fathers are unfortunately attracted.

We have reason to be proud of our Canada, Mr. Speaker, for it is one of the few countries of the world where there is yet hope for honest and civilized working souls, far from the war troubles of old Europe.

A great foreign immigration may begin to flow in on a large scale during the course of the next two years. It seems to me that the Government holds decided ideals on this score and it is to be congratulated. The Government should entertain a just but strict policy of immigration, a policy truly national. It will surely see to it that our country is not overflowed by foreigners unused to our customs and traditions.

"We must not forget says the economist Chandèze, that the consequences of immigration for the country receiving it depend on the fitness and the resources possessed by immigrants. Slightly trained to labour, inclined toward city life, turbulent, they are a disturbing factor rather than an element of prosperity. The only kind of immigrants we are at present in need of are those who are laborious and lean towards farming life,—they will have every chance to settle definitely and to assimilate themselves rapidly. But if they come in too great numbers, if they are not merged in the population of their adopted country, they may perhaps remain strangers."

Let us bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that from a social and economical point of view, immigration has always had serious consequences, both to the immigrants themselves and to the countries to which they immigrate.

Chandèze further adds: "According as their education and other influences of their home surroundings have fitted or unfitted them for emigration, and that such surroundings are or are not fostered by ad hoc institutions, emigrants in their new settlement improve their condition or degenerate."

This view of immigration which I just pointed out seems correct. I rejoice that it is the reflex of the Liberal policy and well applied it will lead our country to happy results. To chosen immigrants coming to our soil, colonization and agriculture offer a vast field of action. The Dominion and its multiple wealth suits them. There is still room in the nine confederated provinces for all commendable ambitions. The Dominion Government must be the best adviser of the provinces, and by frequent interprovincial conferences, the provinces, acting, as much as possible, along the same lines, will find that, through the impetus of a proper immigration policy, the limits of the colonization and settlement areas will recede.

These various undertakings, Mr. Speaker, which have for their object the production and circulation of wealth, go under the name of industry. At all times industry has existed in this country, and the different governments have aided in its expansion. We, of the Liberal party, know more than ever the part which industries, large or small, play in the activity and future of this country. This vital question should be considered most carefully so that the producer and the consumer may obtain satisfaction by means of a tariff adapted to present needs and circumstances.

It is necessary that our commerce and our markets should attract the attention of purchasers and consumers, of whatever country, European or American, they may belong to. It is necessary that both find all commercial advantages desired on the Canadian market; and to reach this, progressive legislation should be enacted in favour of Canadian industry and commerce. Our commercial relations should be extended and revised if need be. We must find and send to foreign countries the best commercial agents so as to do justice to our manufactured products and provide markets for them under fair conditions. Why do industrial and commercial conditions seem to us more alarming than ever? Mr. Speaker, the problem is easily solved. It is because until these latter days, the best and sometimes the only clients in certain industries, were the governments. Times have changed. The normal industrial and commercial conditions are returning. The manufacturer and the merchant will in the future depend on the pre-war customer, the usual consumer. This great industrial and commercial prosperity was fictitious as regards its effect on the nation. Therefore industry must pick up and recover just like private individuals. The hour of national reconstruction with all its hopes has struck and as Sir Wilfrid Laurier so well predicted, the twentieth century belongs to Canada. Industry, in all its accepted forms, must be upheld, be it called extractive, manufacturing, commercial or transport, because they all depend on one another, have a common goal and in completing one another form an entire circle of economical activity.

Mr. Speaker, to industry and commerce the question of labour is intimately linked. I see by the Speech from the Throne that the Government wish to closely study this question and already a hymn of thanks arises from the heart of the Canadian workman. In this period of crisis and of upheaval, the capitalist and the toiler have need of uniting if they truly have in view Canadian unity. As soon as the toiler of this country will have met with the sympathy and attention which he well deserves, and it is my humble opinion, without touching on any of the disastrous doctrines of socialism, he will at all times rise to the height of the occasion. Through these intermittent periods of unemployment, he has been magnanimous in his conduct. He never had the intention, as was so justly remarked the other day by one of their leaders on a delegation to Ottawa, to belittle any government, but on the contrary to co-operate to the best of his ability in the country's interest. However, in return he expects a legitimate and effective protection from the Government, a legislation which will give him hope of more favourable conditions of employment and compensation. It is with pleasure that I see that this question is under consideration and will be solved by the department to the advantage of all interested.

Justly does the Canadian workman hope, for the present Liberal Administration was born from the popular vote, and knowing its responsibilities, of an incomparable importance in our political history, it will strive for unity, right and justice.

Representing in this House an electoral division for the greater part made up of workmen, and knowing these good people, having witnessed the throbbing of their generous heart under their working blouse, I can vouch that the workman of my county, like others, understands that he has to work with the ultimate end of the greatest possible production in order to establish abundance and competition of products in the world's market. In so doing, he will have been a help to his Government, he will become the recognized artisan of the falling cost of living already but too high, the comforter of human misery.

And we on this side of the House, witnessing such a noble act on the part of the working class, shall continue to believe in the just administrative principles bequeathed by Laurier and which our party has always extolled in its programme and which the people accepted at the last general election, that is: that the individual of whatever art or trade, commerce or profession he may be, is indispensable on this earth; that classes must exist, help one another, love and respect each other in order to re-establish peace in this world and thereby assure the success and the welfare of humanity. This is, Mr. Speaker, the true doctrine; no other exists, to follow or to invent in order to make a people happy.

I admire the reference in the Speech from the Throne, which draws our attention to the fact that in the hard times we are experiencing a wise economy must be sought by all the federal departments if we wish that Canada, burdened with heavy debts by the different administrations that have followed one another since the year 1911, meet her obligations. Official figures speak more plainly than words and sarcasm. On January the 31st, 1922, our debt amounted to more than two billions of dollars. Our current revenue on January the 31st, 1922, amounted to $318,489,889.74. The expenses incurred by the late government for the fiscal year ending on March 31st, 1921, required the enormous sum of $361,118,145.21. We must conclude, taking into account these figures, that the financial position of Canada must be judiciously looked into if we wish to maintain our national credit. It is absolutely necessary to make the best possible use of our revenue; to see that such an important problem as the railways be solved not in the interest of individuals, but in the interest of the whole country; to reduce the expenditure of the various departments to the minimum of their needs; to reclassify the Civil Service, if need be, in order to secure in every case the greatest efficiency and also that every civil servant may prove his actual usefulness by his daily labour. This economy which we are now preaching with a view to restoring our national credit, will show to the citizens of Canada that the hon. Prime Minister and his colleagues are conscious of their responsibility. No doubt, during this much confused period, they may rely on every member of this House who sincerely wishes for the prosperity of this Dominion.

Before I resume my seat, as I cast my eyes upon this House, I realize better now than I did at the beginning of my remarks, that it is composed of three parties. The division of the old Canadian political system into two great parties, Liberals and Conservatives, seems to have disappeared, at least for the present. The Conservative party died away, even in time of victory, and like an autumn leaf, was carried away by the passing breeze of Unionism. Since 1911, the Liberal party alone remained in existence. It remained the party of the people, of the humble and of the mighty, of the poor as well as that of the rich; untouched by the conflict of opinions which has destroyed everything else, it will live to promote the actual interests of the country.

There is a third party, named the Progressive party. At its head and in its ranks there are experienced men who are filled with the best public spirit.

The people of Canada, however, have looked at those political changes with some apprehension, but always confident in the destinies of the Liberal party and in the King Administration they look forth to the days of resurrection.

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am able, with, I believe, more than even the usual sincerity, without reservation, insofar as their personalities are concerned, to congratulate the mover and the seconder of this motion. To come into this House for the first time and address his fellow-members is no easy matter for a young member of Parliament. I, of course, was able to follow more closely the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) than the hon. member for Westmount-St. Henri (Mr. Mercier) who seconded the motion. With the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for North Winnipeg, I find myself in concurrence to a greater degree than I had expected prior to his rising and, I think I may add, to a greater degree than he expects even now. I am not able to share all his hopes as to what is to be the fruitage to come from this Speech from the Throne. Indeed, I may venture to predict that before the session is over he will find himself a great deal nearer the depths of distrust and despair in which I am now than the high level on which he has commenced. He has, however, acquitted himself creditably to his constituency and creditably to the province which he alone represents on that side of the House.

The hon. member for Westmount-St. Henri has come to this Parliament preceded by a reputation which does him honour. Though I was not able to follow his utterance with that degree of certainty that would enable me to refer to it particularly prior to translation, I am sure he has vindicated his reputation as a public speaker at least in point of clearness of enunciation, in point of natural decisiveness and graciousness of speech. Those of us who have spent many years, many of us the best of our years, in public and parliamentary life, gladly welcome new talent amongst us. There is room in the politics of Canada, there is room in the work of this House, for the best and most promising of our young men, and the welcome that I hope I may be permitted to extend to the mover and the seconder of this Address goes with equal sincerity to all who come among us on all sides of this assembly; and possibly I may add that it goes as well to many good friends, although my opponents politically, who, after severance from public life, are back with us again.

I add especially a word of welcome to the first lady member of the House of Commons. The last Parliament, by a very large majority, almost by a unanimous decision, conferred the franchise on women, and conferred upon them as well the privilege of candidature for the Commons of Canada. To be the recipient of the first expression of confidence by a constituency is an historic honour, and I know I express the feelings of all, when I put into words the hope that she will vindicate the confidence that the last Parliament has reposed in her sex, do credit to herself and to the constituency that she represents.

This House meets under a new Government and under a new Prime Minister. The Prime Minister who leads this assembly now has come to his high office at an early age. He has had considerable association with public life in a conspicuous way. Notwithstanding the feelings many of us have of opposition, of, indeed, antipathy, to the methods indulged in by himself and his followers, by which their so-called success was achieved, we all, as Canadians, wish him long service in the life of this country. We shall give him fair play in the work of this House; we shall do our part to contribute to the success of this Parliament; and I, for one, wish him personal success. Before I sit down, I shall have something to say in explanation of the words I have uttered as to the character of the campaign that preceded the last contest. I do not do so in any spirit of resentment to the people of this country; I do not do so at all out of any personal regret I may feel at not holding high office still; indeed, I speak in all sincerity when I say that it is well that young and, indeed, sometimes untried figures come to responsibility in our public life. Alternation of party control is good—those of us who know what the burden has been during the past ten years will understand what I mean. I do not think the years ahead will be so strenuous; I hope they will not; but aside from all questions of public policy, it is well that those who are fresher to the task and who perhaps bring new points of view should assume from time to time, the responsibilities of administration.

There has been comment in the speech of the mover of the motion, and there is reference in the Speech from the Throne itself, to the conference that has just been concluded at Washington. I am sure the words of the Speech in that regard and the words of the mover of the motion as well find unanimous and hearty echo from us all. The purpose of that conference is not misunderstood by those who have read the press. I was anxious—and I think I succeeded in my desire—not to impart into the late party contest any questions of external policy of this country, any question as to the conduct of our affairs in relation either to the Empire or to the outside world. It is, however, only fair to say that in the bringing about of that conference this country took its part as other countries did, and in the earnest hope that something real, something practical, has been effected in the alleviation of the woes and miseries from which the world has suffered and suffers to-day in the lifting of the clouds that are before the world to-day, Canada's anxiety, Canada's earnestness takes second place to that of no other country in the world. That the Conference has had practical results should be a matter of congratulation; that there have been practical results I have no doubt at all. I am sorry that the purpose of the conference, that Canada's participation therein, should have been a subject of misconception even in the last election contest in Canada; but it is well in that respect to let bygones be bygones, and I make no further reference thereto.

The first paragraph in the Speech from the Throne makes comment on the present condition, commercially and industrially, of this Dominion. All of us were glad to see that paragraph inserted, and I think we understand the significance intended thereby. It is as follows:

> Our Dominion has not escaped the world-wide economic disturbance and industrial depression, but has suffered less from it than other countries. Keen observers of the business barometer feel that the worst is about over and that at an early date we may look for a substantial revival of activity.

Those words are true. I find no mention in the Speech from the Throne of a very outstanding fact that might, I think, have appropriately been referred to—namely, what has been disclosed as regards our population in the recent census returns. It is true that those returns are not to the last fraction of percentage complete, but they are substantially complete, and what is known of them is a matter for congratulation on the part of all our people. Our population has increased from less than seven and a quarter millions to well over eight and three-quarter millions. In a speech which I read in the press recently, delivered by the chief statistician of the Dominion in the city of London, he called attention to the fact that the rate of increase has in these ten years been the fastest of that of any English-speaking country in the world, inclusive of all the British Dominions and the United States. We have passed the 21·5 per cent rate—that is the highest rate. In that speech emphasis is laid on the fact that this increase has been achieved against the handicap of the war. And Mr. Coates says that Canada would have passed the nine million mark but for the losses in men and women and in the birth rate due directly to the war. The fact, however, that we have surpassed the record of the world in this regard, at a time when the greatest difficulty was encountered in doing so, and when some of the other great countries of the world outside the English-speaking countries sustained a loss in population, is a matter for pronounced congratulation.

This increase in our prosperity, as evidenced by our increase in population, has been accompanied by an expansion of our trade unprecedented in our history. Our trade has expanded to proportions undreamt of ten years ago. In making that statement I have reference not to the inflated figures that obtained during the war, but to the 1921 figures obtained during the very depths of the post-war deflation. Comparing those figures with the figures for the ten years preceding 1911, our exports have multiplied almost three times over in that decade, as opposed to the increase of less than twice in the fifteen years that went before. Therefore there was a very considerable basis of fact for the assertion in the Speech from the Throne that this Dominion, which took a place of honour and of great value in the most terrible conflict the world has ever known; this Dominion that performed the stupendous task of placing on another continent five hundred thousand of her sons; this Dominion that took upon her back a debt of over $2,000,000,000 for the sole purpose of prosecuting to victory a war for human freedom—this Dominion finds itself to-day, as acknowledged in this Speech, in the best position of any country in the world. And I am disposed to believe that when the Speech from the Throne enters into the realm of prediction it does not go too far. It states that to keen observers of the business barometer the worst is over, that the year 1921—which I have just compared with the year 1911—was the year of greatest deflation, the year of heaviest reaction. That prediction placed alongside the assertion of fact as to our present condition, should bring comfort and cheer to us all.

I wonder if hon. gentlemen opposite would recognize any comparison between this very frank acknowledgment in the Speech from the Throne and some of their literature and speeches in the late campaign. Was it a picture of confidence that they drew? Was it a comparison favourable to Canada that they made with other countries of the world? It was not. I have before me some of the speeches made and pamphlets issued by the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin). I understood that until he reached this House he was in a state of exceeding doubt, not to say irremovable despair, at the awful position into which this country had fallen. He was associated in those feelings with the present hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Mitchell), who felt that the condition of the country was so desperate that he should resign his post in the government of his Province and devote his capacities to the rehabilitation of the Dominion financially and commercially. I have before me some utterances of both these hon. gentlemen. In a manifesto, issued at, I fear considerable expense, and appearing among other publications, in The Montreal Standard of the 5th November last, the following is given as a description of our plight—I would like it placed alongside of the paragraph that I have just quoted from the Speech from the Throne.

"Our country," said Mr. Mitchell, now hon. member for St. Antoine, "is passing through a crisis."

After passing through four years of war and sacrifice which did it credit, Canada to-day is reeling under a burden which would crush many nations less courageous than ours. With a war debt unparalleled in the history of this land or any other with a population the size of ours;—

This land that is now acknowledged to be the best of any in its relative position in the world.

—with a gaping wound in the body politic which only the best physicians gathered together in counsel can heal;—

And which I assume, this Speech from the Throne is designed to heal even in this present session.

—with a railway deficit which would rock to its very foundation; with a merchant marine, the national credit of any land with a population of nine millions; with a national revenue which is declining day by day while our burdens and liabilities increase, Canada to-day is looking in this direction and in that direction to find a way to meet the terrible storms that are ahead.

An hon. MEMBER: And they have found it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They have found the way, and the way is designated in this Speech from the Throne, which, as hon. members will see in a few minutes, promises to do in every regard just what they found the late government doing, and insofar as it does not promise to do what they found the late government doing, promises to think about the subject. The manifesto continues:

With these huge undertakings, either one of which alone is sufficient to cripple Canada, this Dominion is sick commercially and weakened financially.

I will refer to other portions of this address when I come to other subjects treated of in the Speech from the Throne.

The hon. member who is now the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) speaking in his province also in the course of the campaign, gave utterance to sentiments that painted an equally doleful picture. He seems to have declared even that our population was diminishing. I see he gives mute indication of dissent, but I have the declaration attributed to him before me now. He stated as well that trade was falling; that unemployment was rampant; that bankruptcy was at hand; and that, indeed, we were going to fall into the hands of the United States unless the people arose to a sense of the appalling condition they were in,—in other words, unless they elected him and his party to power. On the 3rd of December he is thus reported in Le Soleil:

Sir Lomer Gouin received an ovation when he entered the hall. He warned the electors against the stratagem of the Conservatives—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I paused there purposely in order that the opportunity for applause might come. I will wait now for the applause that will finish the sentence:

—the stratagem of the Conservatives, who, once elected, will take away from us our railway shops and managements, thus depriving at least 50,000 of our workingmen who would be compelled to exile themselves.

In which the hon. member, now the Minister of Justice, deliberately associated himself with the most disreputable political roorback that ever disgraced the politics of any country.

Again, in a speech at Three Rivers on 21st November, the Minister of Justice said:

> In case the Meighen or Crerar Government be adopted—

My hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) is in the same boat as myself.

> In case the Meighen or Crerar Government be adopted, farm land will be taxed, as well as urban and rural dwellings and the house of the rich as that of the poor. If we maintain the Meighen Administration, not only will your lands be taxed but you will never be so close to that annexation, which will soon be a reality in this country, if Meighen is elected.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: And hon. gentlemen say "hear, hear."

> Already, so to speak, he said, our country is palsied, and halted immobilized in its expansion.

This country which, let me repeat, is acknowledged in the Speech from the Throne to be in the soundest position of any affected by the war.

> It makes no more progress; its population decreases while its indebtedness increases to a huge extent; its trade diminishes every month; uncertainty and uneasiness obtain everywhere, according to the own admission of the Prime Minister, and minds heretofore optimistic foresee only bankruptcy and annexation. The people are giving way under the burden of taxation, and in spite of that, deficits accumulate. Dulness is experienced in Government administration; industry is standing pat; trade is stagnant, and on the approach of winter unemployment prevails throughout the country. How can we be charged with exaggeration when the highest financial authorities of the country are frightened?

I draw the attention of hon. gentlemen to my left to the quotation of the hon. Minister of Justice of "the highest financial authorities" being frightened because of the course pursued by the late Administration.

Now, I need not make reference to utterances in the late campaign by which the entire anti-conscription feeling of any part of this country, but particularly of the province of Quebec, was turned against the late Administration. This from "Le Soleil," however, is typical:

> The people's forces consist of all those who have wept when they saw their sons being hunted for the slaughter; of all those who were deceived by the false promises of ministers; of all the heroes who were deluded by those who drove them to carnage.

That is worthy of memory, and I am sure it will be remembered and will be done justice to by the hon. member (Mr. Crerar) who leads the Progressive Party and who had part with us in the, not pleasant but necessady, tasks—and onerous tasks they were—imposed upon us during the conduct of the war. I doubt if I could point to any hon. gentlemen opposite coming from that province—although I think I should exculpate the hon. Minister of Justice in this regard—who did not make use of that appeal; who did not point out as the chief sin of the late Government that, in a time when the country was rocking in the very worst convulsions, struggling through the very darkest nights of a terrible war, that Government sought to carry out the undoubted mandate of the people to impose compulsory and equal military service throughout the length and breadth of our land in order that the honour of the nation might be maintained, in order that the men who fought for us might be supported —in order, in a word, that we might do in the best way we could what we deemed to be our duty in the most awful crisis of the world's history.

Now I pass to other and to me—because I do not desire unnecessarily to harp on the past—more pleasant subjects, so far as discussion goes, enumerated in the Speech from the Throne. The Speech makes reference to the return to the western provinces of their natural resources, and in a somewhat boastful way refers to the fact that already a definite proposal has been made to the prime ministers of the western provinces for the return of those resources. The Government appears to feel that as a consequence a settlement of the question is at hand. On the same subject the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) too, is optimistic. He is hopeful that something will be done at once. It is stated in the Speech from the Throne that a proposal has been made to the several governments of Western Canada looking to the return of those resources. What the proposal is is not vouchsafed in this Speech. However, there has been given to the press, and to the public through the press, a full statement—I believe it is a full statement—of what the Government has proposed. That, I might remark, has been done notwithstanding the many protestations of the Prime Minister that Parliament always had to know Government policy ahead of the press and of the public. In the letter which has been given publication, the Prime Minister proposes to the three western provinces that the resources withheld from them when those provinces were established, or what remains of those resources, should now be transferred to them by federal statute, and that each of them should in return release any claims it may have to the extra indemnity which at the time of the original withholding of the resources was given to the provinces concerned. One would think by the emphasis and the advertisement given to this action on the part of the Administration that it was a new and wholly original thought.

The House, of course, is aware that for ten years that precise proposal has been before the western provinces. It was made ten years ago by the then Prime Minister, Sir Robert Borden. It was repeated afterwards, repeated by myself specifically in 1920, when I attained the premiership, in letters to the prime ministers of the western provinces. But from the first the proposal has been rejected; it was rejected in 1911, and every year since, and it stands rejected to-day. I do not know what value there is in making the proposal once more, nor do I quite understand the complacency evidenced by language which indicates that in making the proposal which in the past had been rejected, all eyes are turned to the future and to this "new method" of solution. It is true that that letter goes on to propose arbitration as a means of solution if this offer is again refused, but we have no intimation either in the letter of the Prime Minister to the three western provinces, and much less in the Speech from the Throne, of the nature of the arbitration that is to be conducted or the character of the tribunal that is to be erected.

As hon. gentlemen know—and no one knows it better that the Hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) for no one was more emphatic than he in the claim that he made when Prime Minister of the province of Quebec—the assertion has been persistently made on the part of British Columbia, on the part of the province of Quebec, on the part of the province of Ontario, and possibly more emphatically still on the part of the three Maritime Provinces, that they as provinces have a claim in respect of those resources, and have a claim particularly in regard to any adjustment of provincial subsidies that may be made as a result of the return of the natural resources. Is each of these provinces to be represented on this board of arbitration? Let the Prime Minister now make good his boast and tell this Parliament. Let us know, first, whether the province of Nova Scotia is to be represented, whether the province of British Columbia is to be represented, whether the province of Quebec is to be represented, and whether the province of Ontario. I do not know how there can be an arbitration with their approval unless they are represented, and if there is to be an arbitration board on which all provinces are represented, on what principle and by what right is any such arbitration board going to assume functions that are essentially functions of the Parliament of Canada? All these provinces are represented here. They have sent their representatives to this Parliament. Why, the leader of the Government elected one of his supporters in this House, even the hon. member who succeeds him in the representation of the county of Prince, by advancing a claim on behalf of Prince Edward Island that that province had millions of dollars of interest in the resources of Western Canada. I read from an advertisement published under the heading "Why vote for MacLean?" Among other reasons, none of which appeal very strongly to those who have had experience in this House, the following is given:

> Because by doing so you will be upholding your birthright in the public domain of the western provinces, in which millions of dollars are involved and justly coming to us, in spite of Mr. Crerar's contention and assertion to the contrary, and we can surely do with that money now.

Again I ask, are we to acquiesce in a proposal which proposes to erect a tribunal, composed of representatives of all the provinces, to be substituted for this tribunal in which the constitution vests responsibility for apportioning the rights and claims as among all the provinces of Confederation? Is Parliament to make that surrender? It is for this Government—this Gevernment whose members for years criticised the late Administration because we were not able to get the representatives of the various provinces to agree upon any terms that would have been acceptable to Western Canada, and which belaboured us for the delay that intervened—to come to this Parliament with a proposal which they believe will commend itself to a majority, a proposal not for the abdication of the rights of this Parliament but for the assertion of those rights in solving a problem that Parliament alone can solve. Let the Prime Minister come down with a proposal that commends itself to a majority of Parliament, and then it will become the law of this land. But, is something to become the law of this land because it happens to commend itself to certain others selected by the Government to represent the constituencies of this country when it does not commend itself to those selected by the people to represent those constituencies? I venture to recall the assertion I made early in my address and to ask the hon. member for North Winnipeg not to forget that before this session is over, and still more, before the end of sessions to come, the optimism excited in his breast by this sentence in the Speech from the Throne will be very much lower and darker than it is just now.

I see in a statement, evidently issued officially or semi-officially, that the government of Manitoba has resented the proposal to accept a return of the resources and release all the extra subsidy that came to take their place, and further that if an arbitration board is to be appointed, the Manitoba Government is going to be represented by the Attorney General of the Province, by the hon. member for South Winnipeg (Mr. Hudson), and by one other —three representatives from the province of Manitoba; and the prediction is made—a prediction that very probably will come true—that if this course is adopted it will take several years to get the accounting done and come to a decision.

Now I come to a paragraph in the Speech of His Excellency which, in its comparative innocence, is really fitted to be historic—I refer to the paragraph dealing with the Customs Tariff. Hon. members should keep in mind, as I refer to this subject, the declarations in this House on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite—when declarations were made to get votes, declarations of definite and specific policy were made and voted for year after year. They should remember how anything in the way of delay was deprecated and berated. They should remember how we were told, session after session, that there was no need for any tariff inquiry, that the way was clear for action, that there was no need for delay at all—the proper course was to act and to act at once. Hon. members should keep in mind, as well, the specific commitments of hon. gentlemen opposite, made with all the sanctity of democracy in a great convention held in this city in August 1919, commitments that have a very peculiar ring when contrasted with this pallid, barren paragraph in the Speech of His Excellency to-day. The paragraph in question reads as follows:

> You will be invited to consider the expediency of making some changes in the Customs Tariff. While there are details of revision, the consideration of which will require time and care that are not at present available, there are features of the tariff which it is felt may properly be dealt with during the present session.

[Mr. Meighen.]

What are the features, what are the "changes" alluded to? The hon. member for North Winnipeg assumes that this means a revision of the tariff downwards. I am afraid he will look long and patiently for any mention of the word "downward" in the paragraph. There may be revision upward, there may be revision
5 p.m. downward, there may be no revision at all, there may be inconsequential changes; but Parliament is not advised what shall be the character or the nature of the subjects dealt with. In such a position has the Government placed itself in its first session in office—this Government that obtained the seats it occupies this afternoon by specific, definite, and understandable pledges to the people of this country; this Government which obtained seats in this House because candidates now sitting behind it pledged themselves to their constituents that those promises—promises that everybody understood—would be made good as soon as the Liberal party was returned to power. I have before me those pledges and those commitments but is it necessary to read them? Have not hon. gentlemen read the commitment of 1919; has it not been placed on the pages of Hansard, over and over again? Did not the present Prime Minister—speaking in this House in the month of June, 1920, almost a year after the convention—pledge himself that when returned to power the resolution in question would be made the law of this country. Do hon. gentlemen not remember? Did not the present Prime Minister—speaking at various places in the country in the fall of 1920—bind himself to the terms of that resolution, and declare that by it he was going to stand or fall? Did he not, as respecting many of those terms, commit himself definitely even in the summer of 1921? I am quite aware that his language moderated after he was joined by the present Minister of Justice, after the resignation and candidature of the Provincial Treasurer of the Province of Quebec, and after those interests that to-day are responsible for his elevation to the Prime Ministership came and exercised their sway in the councils of his party. I know that it was in the fall of 1921 that he preached throughout Canada the doctrine of the chart, that all the commitments of the 1919 convention were merely indications of the direction in which he should proceed, and that as to how far he proceeded, or whether he proceeded at all, he was going to be governed by the wisest councils of the men around him, knowing quite well that to his left—if he obtained power—would sit the present Minister of Justice; knowing quite well that to his right would sit the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) who had frankly declared to the people of the country that this platform was only made to get in on well knowing also that he would have near him the present Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Graham); knowing too that he would have behind him, and directing his conduct, the powers centred in and spreading from the city of Montreal who are responsible for his elevation and for his position to-day.

Then it was that the doctrine of the chart was promulgated, then it was that the guarded empty language came into use on platform after platform—about a tariff for revenue, about a tariff for producer and consumer, about a tariff for the home—then it was that all these phrases came to mind, and the hon. gentleman sought by means of them to escape from the commitment which he and his party had made in the month of August, 1919, upon which he accepted the position of leadership that has brought him the Prime Ministership of this country but which binds him in the same degree to-day as when he was simply leader of the Liberal party. I do not need to remind the House of all these commitments, but possibly it would be just as well to read them in order that they may stand alongside of the aggregation of letters of the alphabet that is supposed to denote the Liberal policy as respects the tariff now that they have attained power. Here is what was resolved upon at the Liberal convention in 1919:

> That the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reduction of the burdens of customs taxation be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance: First, diminishing the very high cost of living which presses too severely on the masses of the people; Second, reducing the cost of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the Dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress and prosperity of our country;
> That, to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all products of wheat, the principal articles of food, farm implements and machinery, farm tractors, mining, flour and saw-mill machinery and repair parts thereof; rough and partly dressed lumber, gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils, nets, net-twines and fishermen's equipments, cements and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties, as well as the raw material entering into the same;
>
> That a revision downwards of the tariff should be made whereby substantial reduction should be effected in the duties on wearing apparel and footwear, and on other articles of general consumption (other than luxuries), as well as on the raw material entering into the manufacture of the same;
>
> That the British preference be increased to 50 per cent of the general tariff.
> And the Liberal Party hereby pledges itself to implement by legislation the provision of this resolution when returned to power.

The day of the return to power has come. The hour has struck and the moment is here. I would not expect that they would embody this resolution in the Speech from the Throne, because that is not the custom, but I would expect that the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne would be comparable in principle and would intimate a fulfilment of the resolution. I ask this House and my hon. friends to the left, whom I endeavoured to persuade many a time of the very truth that is revealed before their eyes to-day: do you find in the Speech from the Throne the slightest intimation or promise or hint that anything will be done, even of the very nature of that delineated in the resolution of 1919? Are we to expect it? Proud hearts beat with hope as does the heart of the hon. member for North Winnipeg. I ask particularly the hon. member for Marquette (Hon. T. A. Crerar) to answer this question. I wonder now whether my analysis of the sincerity of hon. gentlemen opposite, made last session and the previous session, which I am sorry the hon. member for Marquette did not receive very well, will not prove more accurate than the hopes that even he sometimes gave expression to.

It is not hard to find the reason for the change of heart. The hon. gentleman who leads the Government in, I think, the last speech he made, at least one of the most recent speeches, declared that there was virtually no difference between his stand and the stand of the progressive party. He described their principles as the principles of Liberalism, to which he says he is prepared to give a very wide interpretation. In that I thoroughly agree with him, because the interpretation he has given to Liberalism has been so wide as to include every side of every question under the sun. Indeed, under his aegis, Liberalism has become merely a synonym for political dishonesty.

I refer to a speech, which, I think, was made in the province of Quebec, at a banquet given to celebrate the victory of the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries

(Mr. Lapointe). In that speech the Prime Minister declared that the principles of his party, of this broad Liberalism, were identical, or, I think, he used the words, "were the same in aim though not the same in name" as those believed in and supported by my hon. friends to my left, that there was a difference only in affiliation—no difference in principle at all, and that he confidently relied upon them to co-operate with him in order to put into effect what he proposed to put into effect during this Parliament.

Now I am going to quote some of the principles or rather the promises upon which some of the hon. gentlemen opposite have been elected to this House, upon which hon. gentlemen in the Government have been elected to this Parliament. Perhaps I should start with the speech of the hon. Minister of Justice. I do not think he will repudiate the pamphlet which I hold in my hand, because on its face there is a very excellent photograph of himself. It is printed in French. I think I had better attempt the translation for the reason that my translation will be more nearly correct than my pronunciation of the original. The pamphlet reads:

> Sir Lomer Gouin is a partisan of moderate protection. He is in favour of the Laurier tariff, and he does not believe that Canada ought to be converted into a sort of dumping ground for the goods of other countries, but on the contrary, by means of moderate protection of our national industries, not only the interests of manufacturers who have their capital invested, but those of the working classes who depend on those interests, ought to be protected.

Now it would be difficult to state more clearly, more definitely, or more firmly the principles that we frankly stood for in the last campaign, than they are here expressed by the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin-.

I pass from the enunciation of the tariff position of hon. gentlemen opposite, as expressed by the Minister of Justice, to the position taken by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Mitchell). In a document to which I previously referred he first of all dealt with what he called the dilapidated condition of the nation and then with the tariff. I have just read from the pamphlet of the Minister of Justice a statement to the effect that he stood for moderate protection which he said was the Laurier tariff, that he stood indeed for adequate protection, which he said was the Laurier tariff. I now come to a definition of the Laurier tariff by the hon. gentleman from St. Antoine, as follows:—

> The Laurier tariff means a tariff that will keep Canadian manufacturers in business and guarantee them a fair profit, foster new industries, while at the same time giving a square deal to the consumers.

Whoever heard a clearer definition of protection? Then he goes on:

> In 1896 Sir Wilfrid Laurier was face to face with a problem of industry similar to the one we are faced with to-day, when there are hundreds of thousands of our workmen out of employment. What did he do? He created a tariff board, and sent it through Canada, inquiring into the effect of the tariff upon local industries and conditions. We would do the same to-day, and be guided by the best trade experts available. We would devise means of encouraging and stimulating our industries, means which would extend old industries and bring new ones to Canada, just as the Government of Sir Lomer Gouin at Quebec made Quebec the centre of the world's pulp industry and asbestos industry, we would help to build up our cities, give more employment to our workmen who, would in turn provide a better market for the produce of the farm. Thus the farmer would see created for him right in his own country, the greatest and surest market of all for his own produce, not subject to Fordney tariffs and the whim of statesmen of other nations.

This is a definition of the tariff principle which the Prime Minister declares is the same in aim, the same in principle as that of hon. gentlemen to my left, by which declaration he hopes to lure and entice them, if not to his side, at least to his support.

As regards the railway problem—I will not deal with it now, but it would be too bad not to read the first sentence of the speech in that regard:

> My stand on the railway question—

Says the hon .member for St. Antoine.

> —is just as clear and pronounced as it is on the tariff.

It will be noted that in this declaration that I have read, a commitment is made that the Liberal party, if returned to power, will appoint a tariff board and will be guided by its results. The Prime Minister, however, is committed on platform after platform, not only not to provide a tariff board, but to do at once what he is pledged to do in the declarations of the Liberal party. I have before me his commitments in that regard. I would like this declaration, for example, to be read in association with the tariff pronouncements of the Speech from the Throne. He states that the Prime Minister preceding myself, Sir Robert Borden, in the month of August, 1920, had stated that before revision there should be an enquiry. He repudiates the thought of an enquiry.

That is—

He said,

—what every Government that has no policy of its own sets out to do. What we want in Canada is not more enquiries and government by commission, but government by a Government which has a policy that is known and approved, and which helps to meet the necessities of the hour.

What is the "time and care," declared to be essential in the Speech from the Throne, for, if not for enquiry; and if it means enquiry, how is enquiry to be conducted by a Government headed by a Prime Minister who says enquiry only means that they do not know what to do themselves and have no policy? But that is not the only declaration. Speaking at Calgary on the 11th October, 1920, the Prime Minister made this statement:

We feel that there is no necessity for a tariff commission or any other like expedients to point the way to what is obviously demanded in the interests of consumers and producers as respects the necessities of life and the instruments of production; but that a downward revision of the tariff and, in some instances, its complete elimination should be immediately effected.

Now, I would like hon. members, some of the expectant ones, like the hon. member for North Winnipeg, and all of those to my left, to wait and see how the tariff proposals of this session will comport with the language that there must be at once substantial reductions on the necessaries of life; that there must be downward revision of the tariff, and in some instances, its complete elimination, and that done and effected immediately. Further on, he states that there must be put on the free list and at once all farm implements and machinery as well as other articles enumerated in a speech which he made in the city of Saskatoon. Let hon. members wait and see how far that is accomplished this session. Let them wait and see the fruitage of this reference to the tariff in the Speech from the Throne that we are considering now. It will be recalled that in the official commitments of the party, of which hon. gentlemen opposite are the representatives in this House and which this Government represents in authority in Canada, there was a precise promise that farm implements and machinery would all be placed on the free list, and as shown in my quotations later, there was a definite pledge by the Prime Minister that no enquiry was necessary for that purpose, but that the reduction would be effected and effected immediately. Those who are too optimistic, however, might read the manifesto of one hon. gentleman who sits opposite to us in this House, the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond). In that city farm implements and machinery are manufactured. It will be recalled that the late Government, in the revision of the tariff in 1912, reduced the duty on those articles of consumption on the farm—farm implements and machinery—to a very substantial degree. They were reduced until they became the lowest in the whole customs schedule of this country. Those that were dutiable at that time were reduced from an average of about 21 per cent to 14.6 per cent, and indeed the principal ones were placed at a duty of 12½ per cent. Because that was done, there arose in the city of Brantford a candidate representing hon. gentlemen opposite, who declared to his electors that there could not be anything in the nature of free trade in Canada.

With the balance of trade with the United States so much against us no further lowering of duties is possible. The thousands of unemployed workmen in Brantford at the present time must realise that their unhappy condition is owing to the action of the Government, which reduced the duties on agricultural implements, and maintained free trade in binder-twine, cream separators and tractors.

The candidate of hon. gentlemen opposite contested the city of Brantford, and issued this proclamation containing that, the sole reference to the tariff, appealing to his people to denounce and defeat the late administration because of the reductions they had made in the duties on farm implements and machinery and because they had maintained free trade in binder-twine and cream separators. But that is not the most significant fact. With a platform in his pocket, with a platform committed to him by that convention to which repeated reference was made for so many months by hon. gentlemen opposite, a platform declaring that all those implements would be made free if hon. gentlemen were returned to power, and made free immediately, the Prime Minister himself went down to the city of Brantford and urged upon the people the election of the candidate who ran upon the programme that I have just read.

This is the commitment as regards tariff matters of another hon. gentleman who represents a Montreal constituency in this House. I note the levity with which hon. gentlemen opposite receive all references to their past commitments. It indicates how seriously they view political promises. It indicates that once they have got their reward, once they have reaped the fruit of their professions, those professions and promises go into the discard and are forgotten. It indicates that when the hour for bringing down those "some changes" in the tariff comes, there will be about as much resemblance between the actual legislation and the pledges of the past as there is between darkness and light. The hon. member for St. Lawrence and St. George (Mr. Marler) declared his tariff faith as follows, and upon this he was elected:

> That the tariff should be framed with the assistance of such scientific or other board acting in collaboration with a committee of Parliament, with the object in view of providing the revenues required for the administration of the country— the maintenance of established legitimate industries, the encouragement of new industries— the promotion of trade with other countries, consistent with the above objects— and with due regard to the economic rights of the consumer.

As clear and unequivocal a declaration of the principle and practice of protection as any candidate for Parliament ever made. By those means the government now in power obtained office. While their candidate in North Winnipeg was publishing the promises of 1919, while their candidate in Centre Winnipeg—and I have his declaration before me—was casting far and wide a circular in which he pledged himself, and declared his party was pledged, to put into effect the pledges of 1919, while every candidate that supported them in all the provinces of the West right to the Rocky Mountains was binding himself and his party to those pledges and getting votes upon the strength of those pledges, these hon. gentlemen, now elected to this House, were pledging themselves and their party to exactly the opposite course, and by that means they were elected. So the Government is bound to betray those who supported the present hon. member of St. Antoine (Mr. Mitchell), it is bound to belie the declarations of the present Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), it is bound to take his electors into camp and deceive them; or it is bound to carry out the pledges they made to the whole people—pledges that were ratified, confirmed, repeated and voted upon by immense sections of this Dominion. That is the position hon. members supporting the Government are in, that is the position the Government itself is in. Far be it from me to make the claims of a prophet, but I know something of the preponderance of influence in the present administration, I know something of the source of the momentum that put them into office, I know something of those who bought and paid for a programme and who expect delivery of the value thereof, and in my own mind I have not very much doubt as to what will be the measure and character of the "some changes" referred to in the customs tariff paragraph of the Speech from the Throne.

I pass from that subject to refer to the declaration as regards railways. Of that I have less criticism to make. On the subject of railways it is declared, as though it were a matter requiring the attention of Parliament—and as I understand, speeches from the Throne are intended to lay down a programme for the consideration of Parliament during the ensuing session—that there will be co-ordination of the railways owned by the people of this country. This is the paragraph:

> In order that government ownership and operation of our national railways now extending through every province of the Dominion may be given a fair trial under the most favourable conditions, it is intended at an early date to co-ordinate the Government-owned systems in the manner best calculated to increase efficiency, and to effect economies in administration, maintenance and operation. The whole transportation situation is one which will require your best attention. It weighs heavily upon our national finances. To assist in obtaining the information essential to an exact understanding and an adequate appreciation of the problem in its many bearings, it is proposed to supplement the work of co-ordination by a thorough inquiry.

A Speech from the Throne, written by a Prime Minister, who, within a few months of writing that speech, had declared to the people that an inquiry is only suggested by a government that has no policy at all! It will be noted how sedulous the draughtsman of the Speech from the Throne has been to use the most evasive and nebulous terms at his command. He does not say there is to be unification of the roads owned by the Government; he does not say there is to be amalgamation; he does not say all are to be brought together as one system, as was the intention of the last Parliament, and, is the intention of the law today. He says: There is going to be "co-ordination,"—a word chosen because of its elasticity, because its exact meaning is at least capable of more interpretations than any other word that could have been used. I hope, however, that the meaning that will appeal to most of us is intended, namely, that there will be actual unification, in order that the advantages and economies incident to unity will be provided; in a word, that all intended by the statute of this Parliament will be carried out. I hope that is the intention of the Administration. If it is, I can assure the Prime Minister on the part of those whom I represent in this House that he will have our assistance to the full in the carrying out of that policy.

I have no objection to reference to this being made in the Speech from the Throne; indeed I welcome it; but it does not provide material for the consideration of Parliament. This policy is already imbedded in the law of the country to-day. The Government need no legislation to carry it out. The Canadian National Railway Act of 1919 provides that roads from time to time owned or controlled by the Administration may be brought under the National system and operated as a unit in the same way as the roads at that time were being operated. From time to time the late government brought one road after the other under that system. The Grand Trunk Railway system alone now remains outside. As respects that system, the arbitration following its acquisition by the government was proceeding up to the time I arrived home from England in the summer of 1921, when the matter of the general election had immediately to be taken into account, and during the campaign no one would suggest that any action should have been taken to bring about that amalgamation, the last step of the whole process; it had to wait and did await the judgment of the people. But the intention of the late government as embalmed in the legislation of this House is apparent, and to do what is set out in the Speech from the Throne is only to carry out what is already expressed in the statute books of this country. I say again that I hope the language means the bringing into one unit of all our railway systems in order to get the advantages of co-ordination and unification. By that I do not imply that there cannot be that measure of local supervision that is so essential to the best management. That measure of local supervision, I, on the advice of the best experts at our command on the National Railway Board, stated was the policy of the late government, recommended by the board. With the Grand Trunk coming in and the entire mileage owned by the people of this country brought into one system, there should be what are called grand divisions, whereby, without in any way impairing the advantages of unification, a measure of local supervision in the operation of the lines would be feasible.

All these things are quite consistent, but there must be unification. There must be one system; there cannot continue to be two. The late Government proceeded on that principle and carried it out to a great extent; all that is left to be done is to bring in the Grand Trunk. Let that step be taken. May this paragraph in the Speech from the Throne mean that this will be done without delay; and if it is done it will have the support of those who stand behind me in this Parliament. But I am afraid that if the Government take that step they will have difficulty with those around them; either that, or hon. gentlemen around them will have difficulty with their constituents.

I see in front of me now hon. members who are committed to their constituents to an exactly opposite course. I see in front of me those who have pledged themselves, not that the National Railways will be unified but that they will be disrupted; not that the National Railways will be co-ordinated, but that they will be disintegrated; not that the National Railways will be maintained out of politics, managed by a business board and all brought under that business board, but that portions of the system will be taken back into politics as they were in politics for many decades I see in front of me also those who are pledged against a continuance of national ownership and operation—yea, I see its bitterest enemies, its stoutest foes, in the ranks of the Government itself. I know the Prime Minister has declared, and I see a reference to it in the Speech from the Throne, that national ownership and operation shall be given a fair trial, but I for one, am apprehensive of the fairness of the trial to be given national ownership and operation at the hands of its inveterate enemies. I am apprehensive that it is not the desire of hon. gentlemen opposite that the utmost possible success shall follow that trial. because I know there are hon. gentlemen on that side who would be infinitely more pleased by the utmost possible failure than by the utmost possible success. I know there are hon. gentlemen elected to support this Government who have declared themselves on principle opposed to government operation not only of railways, but of everything, and who have pledged themselves to their constituents to do everything in their power to stop the wheels of government operation at the earliest moment. I know there are those who declare not only that the acquirements of the roads never should have taken place, but that now they are acquired the proper policy to pursue is to get rid of them at the earliest possible day. Some would turn them over to the Canadian Pacific—even among those whom I see in front of me, hon. members supporting the Government. Some would sell them for a dollar—they have so little use for them.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: "Hear, hear" from the hon. member opposite; but he is going to be asked to support what is described as, and promised to be, a fair trial of government operation. I venture to suggest that government operation would have received a much fairer, a much more useful and much more successful trial at the hands of those who were its friends and wanted it to succeed; at the hands of those who in the difficult position in which they found themselves after years of railway blundering, took the best and the only course this country could take in its own interests and for its own protection in the acquirement of these roads.

Mr. CANNON: And you made a lovely mess of it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Pardon me? I did not hear: The hon. gentleman will not repeat. I looked opposite during the speech of the hon. member for North Winnipeg, I heard his references to the railway history of our country. I heard him say that the late government found on its doorstep bankrupt roads—found there railways that he described as starved and emaciated foundlings; as he spoke, on the faces of some I saw a smile, at least a gleam of approval, but on the faces of others I saw a scowl of resentment. I thought I would like to hear some of the private conversations between the hon. member for North Winnipeg and others when he went outside and beyond the pale of this House. But he spoke the truth. The late government found itself the recipient of all the penalties, the heir to all the railway blunders of this country. The late government found itself with four or five thousand miles—yes, nearly six, of prematurely constructed railway mileage. The late government found itself the mortgagee of railways that were ill-conceived, that were constructed to a grade far beyond the requirements of the country and at a time far in advance of the country's needs. The late government found itself administering the affairs of a nation over railroaded by four to six thousand miles, and as such mortgagees—private ownership of that mileage having irretrievably failed because of the blunders of the projectors, in which the government that preceded the Laurier government were coadjutators and co-operators—in order to protect our position as mortgagees, to protect ourselves as the inevitable owners of a large and almost barren mileage—a mileage that we could not help becoming possessed of—and in order to make that mileage possible of ultimate success through the acquisition of the systems that it was built to be a complement of, the late government took the course that it did. Now, this country has got upon its back an impossible mileage of railways, railways that never could be made to succeed run by the government or by a company as single separate systems. We have something which, now that all are collected, possesses in Eastern Canada an excellent gathering system, and that possesses in Western Canada the finest gathering system there. We have an immense mileage, but it is a system that is complete,—burdened, I know, with large transcontinentals built long before their time; burdened, I know, with transcontinentals that should never have been projected, to which the country was irrevocably committed by the government that preceded us and necessarily doomed to deficits for years to come on that account. But we have a system that is a system. We have a system to-day in which the people of this country can take pride, in respect of which they may have hope, and which they know can reach the day of solvency and of surpluses sooner than it possibly could have reached that day had any other policy been adopted.

Hon. gentlemen talk about handing it back to private ownership. Let them come forward with their proposals. Hon. gentlemen opposite are elected by the forces opposed to public ownership in this country, by the forces opposed to public operation in this country, and they know what those forces are. They know who were around them in the late campaign. They know that the interests that they pictured day after day and night after night as having their hands on my neck and as dictating the policy of the late government—they knew at the very moment in which they spoke those very interests were backing them in the contest, determined to secure their election. They know they sit opposite me now elected by the powers they have denounced. They know that some of the heads of those interests have been favoured by them even since they came into office. They know that very little has been done—indeed, nothing at all except, forsooth, that which was the policy of the late administration as to the unemployed about whom they shed tears abundant in the course of the campaign—while nothing new has been done as to them, a lot has been done for others. There has been a lot by way of recognition of the men—very wealthy men—whom they berated with all the ridicule at their command and whom they pictured as our supporters and our friends.

Now then, if they mean to carry out the pledges they have undoubtedly made to those who put them where they are, they are in a position to carry them out better than they were when they made the promises long ago. If they are against public ownership and operation, do not let them argue that it is impossible now to bring private ownership back but that it was possible before. The system that we own to-day is a system that would appeal to private capital certainly better than anything we could have owned if we had not acquired what we have now. Now, if they have courage to make good the understanding with those who supported them abundantly and generously, if they have the courage to deliver the goods, let them come forward with their programme to this House; I assure them we stand where we did when we adopted the policies. We stand where we did then. We believe these roads can be made a success under fair trial. We believe that if their friends, those who want them to succeed, were in charge of their destiny they would be made to succeed, and the results of the last few months are encouragement to us in that belief. But I must say I have distrust of the future. I have distrust of the conduct of these roads when influential men in charge of our country's affairs to-day, and because in charge, responsible for those appointed to take care of these roads, are the sworn enemies of the very principle entrusted to their care, the sworn enemies of public ownership and operation in every way, men whose reputation as public men and business men is based upon their declared antagonism to the system now entrusted to their charge. So let us watch the progress of government operation in the next few months. Already we see the interesting process under way. This government operation and co-ordination are to be accompanied by an inquiry. I do not know who are to make the inquiry. I do not know just what they are inquiring for. I know the hon. member for St. Antoine has his ideas about an inquiry. He said in a public speech published under his photograph that we ought to get the best railway men we could, not from this continent, but from Europe and other continents, and that they should sit down and think the whole subject out, and he promised that if they would do that—these experts from Europe and, I suppose, from Africa—when they got through he would sit down and help them come to a decision, and he promised that the solution would be a solution "without deficits." I do not know whether the inquiry foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne is to be an inquiry at the hands of Europe and Asia, or Europe and Africa, but while this inquiry is proceeding I venture to predict that one thing will be taking place. I venture to predict that the propagandist will be at work, and that there will be over-flooding this Dominion an anti-government operation propaganda designed to turn the minds of the people of this country in disgust from the public ownership of railways; and that propaganda, the signs of which we see already all around, and under the onrush of which we sit at this very hour, will be powerfully financed by interests most friendly to this Administration. That is what the people of this country will see. All the while that this nominally fair trial is being held, these forces will be at work, and these forces are very confident they can succeed.

At Six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at Eight o'clock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: (Resuming): Mr. Speaker, I had reviewed some of the methods adopted by the leader of the Government, the members of the Government, and members supporting the Government in connection with their advocacy of railway and other policies. Let it not be understood that I have exhausted all ammunition in that connection—I have only commenced. The list is a numerous one whether on the subject of railways, whether on the subject of the tariff, whether on the subject of any other of the questions that they brought to the front throughout the land in the places and from the angles that they thought would pay. On all of them every possible phase of opinion was by some one of them held. I am in a position, and would undertake now, to name a supporter of the Government who was elected because he took any certain view and had that view accepted: and I would, at the same time, be prepared to name another supporter of the Government—very probably a member of the Government—who was elected because he preached exactly the opposite.

Something is said in the Speech on the subject of wider markets for our products. I think there is more said about it in the Speech than we will hear of during the course of the session. It is said there, also, for the benefit of the farmers of our country, that there ought to be more diversification, there ought to be better methods of culture, and there ought to be better methods of grading; but I am sure those of us on this side of the House, of whatever party, could not help but note that one subject that is of moment—a subject indeed that has earned a position of great importance, particularly in our western country—is entirely ignored. There is indeed a member of the Government elected on the solemn pledge to re-establish the Wheat Board in this country. I refer to the Minister of Agriculture. There are other members who contested on their behalf and members sitting to my left who advocated that policy. The Government is in power and is responsible. For myself I took a stand on that question that I do not think anyone had any difficulty in comprehending. I did not believe in the re-establishment of the Wheat Board as a monopolistic body, I did not believe that the conditions prevailing in the world markets to-day were such as to justify or demand that step; but I did believe that the time had come, when better marketing facilities should be given, and I stated to the people of Western Canada that if returned to power those facilities would be provided by the establishment of a board by the Government which would be prepared to handle all the grains of our country that the producers of those grains chose to commit to its charge, and would handle those grains by the methods, and with adequate powers,—save monopolistic power,—such as had the Wheat Board that handled their wheat in 1919-20. There was no misapprehension as to the meaning of my statement. Of course it would not have done for the opponents of myself and the then Government to have concurred—that might possibly have helped us. There were those who complained, and complained bitterly that the Government had done much while in office without resorting to a general election, and that is quite true. But those who had complained that we took great and important steps, without the mandate of the people, expressed by a general election, found it necessary in this instance to get on exactly opposite ground, and to say that because I asked the mandate of the people I was playing politics and was not sincere. However, they succeeded in doing their part in preventing the establishment of that board by that course of conduct.

There is, however, a member of the present Government who expressed himself most definitely, who issued his manifesto in print and resorted to the public press regardless of expense—and I am sorry to say in some cases regardless of veracity. He is now in power and able to give effect to his views. Is he going to do so? I have heard—I may be wrongly informed; I did not see it in the press myself—that he takes the ground that those promises were made with the understanding that he would be a private member of Parliament and are not applicable now that he is a member of the Government. But the hon. member is in a rather difficult position in that regard because concomitantly with the pledge that he would put into effect this platform, he also described himself as the future Minister of Agriculture. What is his position to-day? Is he prepared now to fulfil the pledges he made to the people of Regina? What is the policy of the Government? It is worth while, apparently, to tell Parliament what is to be done on subjects that require no legislation, and no change of policy at all, but it is not worth while to tell Parliament what the Government proposes to do on the subject of the marketing of the grain of this country? Is the Government going to let this session go by without any action? If it does it will be too late for 1922; if it does there will be no relief for the grain growers this coming year; if it does there will be many in our western land who will have a very different opinion of the present Minister of Agriculture from that previously held owing to declarations by himself and by the propagandists behind him.

There is a question that I would like to put to the Administration:

Where have the advances been made with a view to securing what they describe as wider markets? We see in the press—though we do not see it in the Speech from the Throne—the announcement that advances have been made to the United States of America; that the Minister of Finance made another trip down to Washington in the supposed belief that he would achieve some practical result in this respect. We are also told that, as well, efforts have been made to establish reciprocal relations with Australia. Apparently the Goverment have in mind—but I must say that in my own judgment it is only apparently as far as one of those countries goes—the making of a reciprocity pact, one with the United States and another with Australia. As far as the United States are concerned, I expressed the fear that the desire was only apparent. I believe on the part of most members of the Government, and I am inclined to believe on the part of the preponderating element of the Government, the only purpose was a mere gesture, knowing full well its futility, in order to see if they could lure behind them, without the reward of office, the honourable gentlemen who sit to my left.

In so far as that subject is concerned, my position has been well known for years. I do not believe advantage can be gained for Canada, I do not believe advantage can be gained for any country, only a fraction the size of its neighbour, the competitor of that neighbour in every field of its enterprise, by tying itself to a trade treaty with that neighbour. Reciprocity with a country which is not a producer in surplus of our products is something that should be sought for and should be gained, if at all possible; that is something which would be of advantage to both countries. Reciprocity with Australia is something which should be obtained, if we are able to obtain it for Canada. Reciprocity with the West Indies, who produce goods that we do not produce in surplus, who consume what we produce in surplus, is desirable. Reciprocity with a country in that position should be the object of our policy. The late government achieved it with some of these countries. The late government tried to achieve it, and did everything in its power to achieve it, with Australia, and before retirement from office I was instrumental, by interviews with the Prime Minister of Australia, in securing his influence to have inserted in the legislation of that dominion power to its government to negotiate reciprocity treaties with the other dominions of the Empire. I pressed that upon him. It was inserted and after I returned communications passed with a view to securing practical results. The legislation of the Commonwealth of Australia came into effect only, I think, in the fall, and some time late in the fall, of 1921; consequently the government of that dominion was not able to take action upon it during the life of the late government. I earnestly hope this Government will press for fair terms of reciprocity with that dominion, and I earnestly hope they will meet with success. But Sir, in regard to the United States of America, reciprocity with that country of the nature of that which they achieved, and which the people of this country rejected in 1911, could, I think, lead to no good object for this Dominion, it could, I think, only succeed in tying our hands fiscally, in subordinating us more and more, as years would go on, to the commercial domination of the republic. I think hon. gentlemen will agree that now in opposition I take no different stand from that which I took in office, and that I took no different stand in office from that which I had taken throughout the country, before acquiring the reins of power. In all modesty I venture to suggest that those opposite consider now for the first time an example of that kind.

It is stated now that they are making a powerful effort for the reduction of freight rates. Reduction of freight rates is a vital question in this Dominion. That freight rates must come down is axiomatic, but I had thought that the control of freight rates had been, even by hon. gentlemen opposite, placed in the hands of a railway board, which had been given a judicial status, which had been given ample power, and whose duty it was to do the right thing in this regard. I know that in the late campaign hon. gentlemen, hoping to secure votes thereby, ignored their legislation, ignored the status of the board, played before the electors as if it were the duty of the Government to derogate from its own legislation, the duty of Parliament to derogate therefrom, to invade the domain of a judicial body, and to do what alone a judicial body was empowered to do. I know they sought to raise a wave of prejudice against the Administration by ignoring the Board of Railway Commissioners, and I know, besides that, one member of that Government, not content with that offense, went on and sought to curry the favour of his electors by pledging himself to remove the Chairman of that Board. I have not observed in the Speech from the Throne, nor have I observed in any of his post-election utterances a reference to that subject. However things are done sometimes that are not in the Speech from the Throne, and now that the member for Regina (Mr. Motherwell) has fulfilled one, only one, of the pledges he made, namely, the pledge to be Minister of Agriculture, the House will look to see what progress he makes in the fulfilment of the others. Yes, we must have a reduction of freight rates. The Railway Board has the subject before it now, and has heard the evidence. If hon. gentlemen feel that the Board is not doing its duty, that it is not discharging the sacred and most vital trust reposed in it by this Parliament, ratified and confirmed by the verdict of this country, then it is the duty of the Administration to act with reference to the Railway Board. The Government say that they have brought the heads of the two railway systems together. Mighty achievement! Have they not been together every week, every month for years gone by, conferring over this subject and that? Railway rates were reduced last fall. In the latter part of the summer the rates on some basic commodities were substantially reduced. Later on a general 10 per cent. reduction took effect. But since the present Government has come in, since the late Government went out, there has been nothing but advertisement on the subject. So far nothing has been done.

What is the composition of this Administration? We are told it is a Liberal Administration, that there is nothing in the way of compromise in it. All sections, all corners, all elements are of a pure and undefiled Liberalistic type. Well, according not only to the press, but according to hon. members of this House, that is the case through no fault of the Prime Minister (Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King). I know it is in his mind at the present time that he preceded the elections by loud denunciations of coalition. I know that he depicted the extravagances, the evils and the compromises that coalition engendered, and declared time and again that the country was sick of coalition and that he would have nothing to do therewith. Speaking at North Bay on the 1st of December last he stated:

> The country is sick unto death of coalition with their log rolling and expensive attempts to satisfy this party and the other.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: "Hear, hear," say hon. gentlemen behind him. We will wait for the "hear, hear," when we see the other side of the picture as presented by the present leader of the Government. When we come to actions, very often the colour is wholly different than when we are in the realm of promises. That, however, was not the only place. Speaking at Newmarket on the 20th of January—this was after the election—he declared himself as against coalitions; but before, at Saskatoon and in many other points in Western Canada, he warned the Progressives that unless they supported him before the election, they need look for no favours at his hands, nor for any share in the government afterwards.

As for what took place, the country is not yet advised by the leader of the Government. I am not one of those who would argue that it is the duty of the leader of a government, elected as the head of a party, to disclose the invitations, to disclose the negotiations, if you will, he may have had with one of his followers, one elected with him, one supporting him in his campaign, as to admission to his Government. I am aware that I was held responsible for disclosure of even such negotiations as that. I will make no such claim with respect to any leader of a government; it is not proper, it is not right. But when a leader of a government sets about to negotiate with a leader of another party not elected on his platform, not supporting him in his campaign, not one of his own party at all, the leader of a wholly separate group, a wholly separate party, then it has always been the practice and it is the duty of the leader of the Government to make known to Parliament and to the country what those negotiations were, what the offer was, and all the details thereof.

That duty the leader of the Government has not yet performed.

It was possible that he approached the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), the leader of the Progressive party, and invited him to desert the Progressive forces, to abandon his party as a separate organization and entity, and to come over and join the party of which the Prime Minister is the head. That was one course which he might have adopted. Another course that he might have adopted was to have gone to the leader of the Progressive Party and ask to negotiate on a coalition basis for the joining of their forces and arriving at a common line of policy. Coalition is one thing; abandonment of party and alignment with another is a wholly different thing. Those are the only two courses, and what we desire to know, what Parliament has a right to know, what Parliament cannot be denied, is which of those two courses was adopted. Does anybody opposite know which course was followed? Do hon. members for Montreal know which course was followed? Do they know which course was prevented? Do they know what were the terms given to the missionary of the hon. gentleman who proceeded to the city of Winnipeg to lay them before the leader of the Progressive party? Do his following in this House know what those terms were?

Mr. DUFF: Certainly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They certainly do. Who is the hon. member who knows? Speak out. Since the Gordian knot was cut, not by the leader of the Government, but by the master of the Government who sits to his left, since the banns were forbidden by him—

Mr. MARTELL: You are the King maker.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does the hon. member mean by that?

Mr. MARTELL: You say the banns were forbidden by the hon. member. You have made him Prime Minister and you have made the hon. member a member of the administration by your autocratic actions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have been charged with autocracy; I have been charged with much that is wrong; but I have never yet been charged by a chagrined and disappointed country, nor even by the Prime Minister himself, with having made him.

Mr. MARTELL: Your record has made him Prime Minister, apart from his ability.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is true that since the contest, since the banns were forbidden, the Prime Minister has made reference to the negotiations, but the attenuated character of his utterances is very marked indeed. He stated, speaking in Quebec, that he had invited the Hon. Mr. Crerar, leader of the Progressive party, to come into his Government on one condition and one only.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I interrupt my right hon. friend? Would my right hon. friend read any remarks of mine in which I mentioned Mr. Crerar's name?

Mr. MEIGHEN: When my hon. friend was speaking at Newmarket on the 19th January, the following assertion was made. If it did not refer to the leader of the Progressive party, it would be interesting indeed to know to whom it referred.

> Over and over again, I have said that the Progressive party was a sort of advanced Liberal group. I decided I would be true to what I said in that regard and I made known to Progressive leaders that I was prepared to take into my Cabinet representatives of the Progressive party on one condition, that they come into a Liberal Cabinet.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Did that refer to the leader of the Progressive party, or did it not? I do not know what the purport of the Prime Minister's interruption was.

The explanation given was that he invited Progressive leaders to join his Government, but to join it "as a Liberal Government"—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I hope the Progressives will note the enthusiasm with which that quotation is received by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I hope as well that hon. gentlemen opposite will note the coolness with which it is received in the Progressive party. That is to say that they desert the party, that the leader deserts the party that he led into the contest, abandon it and join this Government as a Liberal Government. That is one course that might have been followed. Do hon gentlemen think that was the course that was followed? Apparently, a few minutes ago there were some hon. gentlemen who would like to proclaim that they did think so. I know they would desire that that was the course followed, but I am afraid we cannot accept it unless we impugn the honour and the word of an hon. member of this house. We have had no version of those transactions from the leader of the Progressive party himself. I think we should have had a version from both leaders. When in 1917, the then leader of the Government, Sir Robert Borden, approached the leader of the Opposition of that day with a view to coalition, the negotiations between the two were embodied, under the joint supervision of both, in written documents which immediately afterwards were given to the country, and indeed were later placed upon the pages of Hansard.

This country was advised fully of the negotiations. But how different to-day at the hands of him who never tires of protesting about the rights of Parliament—who never ceases so to protest save to violate those rights himself. Yes, he said, I adopted the first way, I only asked him to leave his party and join us.

But we did get an insight into the negotiations later, and, I am bound to say, if my judgment is of any value at all to hon. members, a pretty faithful insight. The present hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Gardiner), speaking on the 15th day of January last at the city of Calgary before the United Farmers of Alberta in convention assembled, is reported in a Canadian Press despatch as follows—and if this report is in any sense incorrect, I would be glad indeed to have it corrected by any hon. gentleman here, particularly by the hon. member for Medicine Hat:

Mr. Crerar stated, he said, that there were two sections of the Liberal party,—

I have heard that belief expressed before.

—one progressive and the other autocratic—

Think of it!

—but that the larger portion was progressive. The position, he said, was that if they allowed the Progressive party to take the place of the Opposition, the autocratic members would seek to take control of the progessive section of the Liberal party, and that it was up to the progressive farmer members to see that that did not occur.

These are the words reported by the present hon. member for Medicine Hat as spoken by the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) at Saskatoon, for be it remembered that after the terms of the present leader of the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King) were laid before the leader of the Progressive party through this missionary to Winnipeg, that leader thought it worth while to call together his followers at the city of Saskatoon and to take their opinion of the suggestions made and of the terms offered by the leader of the Government. Does any man who knows the hon. member for Marquette imagine that he would call his followers together at Saskatoon in order to put before them the suggestion that he should abandon them and go over to the Liberal party? Then the report of the hon. member for Medicine Hat as to this Saskatoon conference goes on as follows:

Mr. Crerar therefore proposed that a coalition arrangement—

Remember, a coalition arrangement.

—should be effected between the progressive Liberals and the Farmers, and a resolution was offered embodying the arrangement, but attention was called to the fact that the Alberta delegate, Mr. Gardiner, had not expressed his opinion.

Then Mr. Gardiner's opinion in antagonism to the suggestion of the resolution is recited. The hon. member for Medicine Hat goes on to say:

There was no question in my mind but that Mr. Crerar was there for the purpose of forming a coalition of the Progressives with the Liberal party.

A much more detailed, a much more understandable, and infinitely more creditable account of the proceedings than that contained in the mere assertion that all the leaders of the Progressive party were asked to do was to leave the party they were leading and come over to the Liberal fold as members of the Liberal government.

Now, let us have the facts as between these two versions. On the one hand is the assertion of the Prime Minister; on the other are not only the assertion but the detailed revelations of the hon. member for Medicine Hat, and as well the inference, naturally arising in the minds of reasonable men, that any such naked proposal as that declared to have been made by the present leader of the Government would never be such as would warrant the leader of the Progressive party calling his followers together, even to suggest to them that it be accepted. The country should know what was offered. What were the articles of policy that were offered to the Progressive party as the terms of coalition? What was to be the membership of the Government? What were the inducements laid before hon. gentlemen of the Progressive party that as a party would warrant them in taking such action as this?

I can not leave the subject without commenting that the resolution passed by those assembled at Saskatoon, according to this report, was to the effect:

That the leaders of the Progressives, especially Mr. Crerar,—

Those words "especially Mr. Crerar," apparently were struck out before the motion was put.

That the leaders of the Progressives were tc be at liberty to do so that is go in on a Coalitior basis but "on their own responsibility."

I am somewhat mystified as to what the effect of such a resolution would be. Would "tacit consent" be given to the formation of a coalition provided the leaders proceeding to do so "on their own responsibility?".

Mr. CRERAR: I am not at all clear what my right hon. friend is quoting from. Will be kindly inform me?

Mr. MEIGHEN: As I stated, I am quoting from a Canadian Press despatch from Calgary the statement made there by the present hon. member for Medicine Hat as to the occurrences that took place in the city of Saskatoon on the occasion when the hon. member for Marquette met his followers there.

So we will expect to-night when the leader of the Government speaks that he will for the first time take us into his confidence and frankly and fairly tell us what the terms of those negotiations were, whether he only offered the hon. member for Marquette and the other Progressive leaders inducements to come over to his party and enter his Government as members of his party, or whether on the other hand he did what the hon. member for Medicine Hat in detail declares he did, and what all the circumstances of the case would lead us to believe was actually the fact—whether he offered terms for a coalition of another party with his own in order that he might have the numerical strength he desires for the conduct of affairs in this House.

Now, I have passed from one article to the other as the subject is remotely referred to in this Speech from the Throne. There is not enough of legislation proposed in this document to occupy much of the time of Parliament. There is not indeed enough foreshadowed in this Speech from the Throne to cover as much work as the late Government, when they were in office and when immense work had to be done, disposed of in a day or at most in a week. All that is here foreshadowed can be dealt with in a very short time indeed.

Oh! I note one omission. I wonder if it has not occurred to hon. members. Are you aware, Mr. Speaker, that there is no announcement whatever in the Speech from the Throne that responsible Government has been restored in Canada; no declaration to an anxious public that our emaciated and mutilated constitution has been resurrected and rehabilitated to its pristine integrity? Why, even the hon. member for North Winnipeg was impressed by the protestations of the present Prime Minister in the election contest on that subject. Look, he says, at the Speech from the Throne. Are we not actually told that the treaties into which Canada has entered at Washington are going to be submitted to Parliament? What a concession to democracy! What a vindication of Parliamentary practice! What a restoration of the rights of the people! Well, were treaties never brought to Parliament before for ratification? Were treaties ever accepted, save only when there was no possible way of avoiding it and in cases of virtually no consequence, except after those treaties were brought before this Parliament and ratified? The late government always did it. But the member for North Winnipeg says: Order in Council government is gone.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Order in Council government is gone; "Hear, hear" say hon. gentlemen opposite. Will the hon. gentleman tell us when he speaks how many Orders in Council he has passed since he attained office two months ago? Will he tell us anything his Government has done save by Order in Council? Does the hon. gentleman have in his mind Orders in Council passed by the late administration in unnecessary anticipation of the will of Parliament, subject to ratification—orders that he believes should not have been passed? Let him name one and I will undertake now—yes, if he will permit me, I will do it before this debate is over, though I have not the right to speak twice—to name him one passed in his two months of office that offends more in that respect than any offence he can even attribute to any Order in Council passed by the late administration. I will undertake to name him Orders in Council that not only unnecessarily transcend the powers given this Government by the Parliament of Canada but that in my judgment, transcend even the powers of Parliament itself. The hon. gentleman has laid on the Table some of the Orders in Council that he has passed. He has laid on the Table Orders in Council that do not even pretend to be within the powers of the Government. I am free to say that there come times when a government must, in the discharge of its bounden and inescapable duty, take courses in anticipation of the will of Parliament. This Government has taken those courses, but the most extreme exercise of Order in Council government that this or any Parliament has ever witnessed has been that indulged in by the very gentlemen who sit opposite us now, led by him who made it his boast on every platform—and an easy boast it was; it really meant nothing in the world; it was only the text of a sermon at his hands—made it his boast that he was going to abandon Orders in Council and restore responsible government to a waiting people. Yes, my hon. friend is in office.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am quite aware that hon. gentlemen opposite conceive that to have been really the only thing they ever had in mind. I must say their conduct through the campaign made it only too evident that the mere triumph of party was their ultimate ambition. They conceived that to be the whole purpose of politics. No principle can be said to have been decided in the late contest; if so, what was it? I pause for a reply; does anyone penetrate the silence? Was the principle of our railway policy decided? If so, will the hon. Minister of Justice tell us what the verdict was? Was the principle of our tariff policy decided? If so, will the hon. Minister of Agriculture and the hon. Minister of Justice just confer with the hon. Minister of Militia and tell us what the verdict was? No; carrying a campaign on in that way does go to the very roots of responsible government. The course pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite was that of adopting a platform in every constituency—any platform in any constituency moulded to suit what they believed would best appeal to that special district. Following a course of that kind in a campaign puts it above the power of any people to declare their will on any definite subject that comes before them. No; hon. gentlemen are there because, assisted by the influences that I described before the House rose, they suceeded in raising a veritable deluge of misinformation and misrepresentation a deluge that submerged the deliberate judgment of the people of this country. Hon. gentlemen rejoice in glee because of that success. Ah, let them rejoice; but those practices cannot be indulged in without thought of the penalty to come, without rememberance that the day of reckoning is sure to follow. I venture to suggest that as the hours of this session advance, still more as the weeks and months of this Parliament pass by, hon. gentlemen will come very definitely to the conclusion that more and more surely the day of reckoning is at hand. The people of this country, witnessing from every quarter of the Dominion how they have been deceived and how infamously pledges made to them have been broken—because no matter what this Government does its pledges are bound to be broken—witnessing, I say, how they have been deceived and betrayed, will visit upon the heads of hon. gentlemen opposite the penalty that they have earned and from which I assure them they shall not escape.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my first word must be one of congratulation to you, Sir, upon having received the unanimous election of this House as its presiding officer. I only re-echo the sentiments we heard expressed on Thursday last when I say that hon. members, irrespective of party, feel confident that you will discharge the great responsibilities and obligations of this important position in a manner worthy of its highest traditions.

May I at once thank my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) for the kind personal words at the beginning of his address. It is a pleasure to me to recall that some twenty-five or thirty years ago we were associated as fellow undergraduates of the same alma mater, and that since then, notwithstanding the severe strain that the differences of public life and opinion sometimes place upon personal relationships, we have continued our friendship unbroken. I reciprocate the good wishes he has expressed in reference to myself; indeed, I will go further than my right hon. friend and say that I hope he may be spared many years to fill the position which he now occupies.

I am very happy, Mr. Speaker, to join with my right hon. friend in the words of congratulation which he extended to the mover (Mr. McMurray) and to the seconder (Mr. Mercier) of the Address. As the right hon. gentleman has said, it is never an easy matter to address Parliament; it is always a difficult matter for one to speak in Parliament for the first time. But when that effort comes at the beginning of a new Parliament, it is indeed under circumstances the most trying and the most difficult with which a new member can possibly be faced. I think that all of us who have had the privilege of hearing the hon. member for North Winnipeg and the hon. member for Westmount-St. Henri this afternoon will feel that they were singularly fortunate in their broad grasp of public questions and in the vision they manifested in presenting their views. They bring to this House not only wide information but a high degree of debating ability. In their able addresses they have done great credit to themselves and honour to their respective constituencies.

It is appropriate, Mr. Speaker, at this time, having regard to the motion for an Address to His Excellency, that we should make some reference to the circumstance that not only have we a new Parliament and a new Government, but that we also have in our midst a new Governor-General. I am sure that all the hon. members of this House are glad to have this opportunity of welcoming to our Dominion Their Excellencies Lord and Lady Byng. We have been singularly fortunate ever since the days of Confederation in having had as the representative of the Crown in Canada illustrious and distinguished statesmen, men distinguished in arms or in politics, who have brought to our new country many of the benefits which come from the larger life and thought of the Old World; but never before have we had a Governor-General whose life and fortunes have been so intimately linked with the lives and fortunes of our own citizens as is the case with the present Governor-General. We welcome him to our country. Perhaps I could not better express what I believe to be the national sentiment than to say that the people and the ministry have the same confidence in His Excellency as a constitutional ruler that our brave soldiers had in him as their general when he led them to victory in the Great War.

I think, Sir, it is also appropriate that we should make mention on this occasion of the recent marriage of Her Royal Highness the Princess Mary. I am sure that the members of this House will be pleased to have conveyed to His Majesty through you, Sir, the Speaker of the House, the congratulations of the Commons of Canada upon the marriage of Her Royal Highness to Lord Lascelles, who for some time was on the staff of a previous Governor-General, and is well known in our country. We hope that their marriage will be fraught with great happiness and blessing upon their lives and other lives associated with them.

May I also, Mr. Speaker, join with my right hon. friend in welcoming to this Parliament the lady member who has come to us from Southeast Grey (Miss Agnes C. Macphail). I could not but think that my right hon. friend's remarks would have been still more felicitous had he not been a member of a government which at a previous election denied to a very large proportion of the women of this country the right of the franchise. It is still more unfortunate that among the women of this country who were denied that privilege and right was the hon. member for Southeast Grey who is sitting in this House of Commons to-night. My right hon. friend has at last received his answer from the women of this country to the action which disfranchised such a large percentage of their number in the election of 1917.

Mr. Speaker, I turn now to make mention of a regrettable incident that serves to remind us of the passing of time and the brevity of human life. I wish to recall the sad circumstance that even before Parliament was summoned, one of the hon. members-elect was taken from us within twelve days after the last general election. I refer to the hon. member-elect at that time for Argenteuil, the late Mr. Peter McGibbon. Mr. McGibbon sat in this Parliament with members of the previous House. He was of a retiring disposition and did not take any very active part in the debates, but he was always faithful in his attendance in the House of Commons and very faithful in the discharge of his duties to his constituents. I know I express the wish of the members assembled here when I say that we desire to convey to the widow of the late Mr. McGibbon our sincere sympathy with her in her bereavement, and with the members of her family as well.

May I come now to some of the remarks of my right hon. friend? Perhaps I should congratulate him on the length of his remarks. He has kept the House for a long time for one who has undergone the strain that he has of late. He does not seem to have lost his power of utterance in regard to many questions. I was hoping that he would be perhaps a little more chastened than he appeared to be. My hon. friend has a way of speaking which at times savours considerably of bitterness, and I fear that his remarks to-night had just a shade of disappointment in them as well. There were many things he said which under other circumstances I am sure he would have expressed a little more happily. However, I do not wish to dwell upon what to him are painful recollections of the late campaign. I would not refer to them at all except for the circumstance that my right hon. friend took up a good deal of the time of this House in recalling many of the incidents and matters connected with the campaign.

He also found fault with us because certain matters were not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. He said that we should have included mention of the census, that we should also have included some mention of the return to responsible government. Why, my right hon. friend has only to look across to this side of the House to see that responsible government has come back again in this country. Why should we make mention in the Speech from the Throne of anything so obvious? The election was fought on that issue. My right hon. friend has not yet wakened up to the significance of his own defeat. We on this side of the House who during the last Parliament were on the other side contended that when my right hon. friend held the position of Prime Minister he held it, not as the elected representative of the people, but as one who had usurped the rights of the people. We carried our appeal from this Parliament to the country, and the country supported us in that appeal.

I was somewhat surprised that my right hon. friend should have made the reference he did to the province of Quebec. As far as I could judge his remarks, their purpose was, if possible, to stir up anew racial strife and differences in this country. That is a very bad beginning for my right hon. friend in the position which he now holds. May I bring this significant fact to the attention of my right hon. friend? If the verdict of the province of Quebec was solidly against him and those who surrounded him in the last election, so was the verdict of six out of the nine provinces of this Dominion. My right hon. friend tries to attribute his defeat in one province to special reasons. Let me tell him that there was but one main issue in the recent campaign, and it was equally the issue in all the provinces of this Dominion. The people wanted in power a government that would represent the people, and they wanted out of office a government that had usurped the rights of the people. It is perfectly true that in the province of Quebec the following of my right hon. friend was completely obliterated. Every seat in that province was lost to him and carried to this side of the House. But what was true of the province of Quebec was equally true of the province of Nova Scotia. There my hon. friend lost every supporter that he had, and to-day every member from the province of Nova Scotia is sitting on this side of the House.

Mr. DUFF: He deserved to lose them.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What was true of the province of Quebec and of the province of Nova Scotia was equally true of the island province, Prince Edward Island. Every single member from the province of Prince Edward Island occupies a seat on this side of the House.

Now I come to the western part of this country. Take the province of Alberta, the province of Saskatchewan, and the province of Manitoba; my right hon. friend has not sitting behind him to-day a single member from any one of those provinces. How can he endeavour to stir up strife in this country along racial lines?

Mr. MEIGHEN: How many supporters has the hon. member behind him from those provinces?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me say one word further: I have spoken of six provinces out of nine in which my right hon. friend has not a single follower in the present Parliament. Take the remaining three provinces. My right hon. friend, I believe, has behind him at the present time some fifty representatives from the three remaining provinces. Mr. Speaker, if you deduct the number of constituencies that returned him followers by a minority of votes, it will be found that his following is reduced in numbers to a number equal to the number of Cabinet Ministers with whom he went to the country.

Was there ever such a humiliating defeat! Twenty-two followers is all that my right hon. friend has back of him of hon. members who have been returned to the present Parliament by a majority of the votes of their constituencies. Under these circumstances is it not surprising that my right hon. friend finds it difficult to discover what the true significance and meaning of the verdict of the people of this country is?

My right hon. friend made reference to some of the literature issued in the late campaign. He seemed to have a particular fondness for producing documents which carried portraits of one kind or another. I would say to my right hon. friend that he should not take too seriously much of the campaign literature that was issued on any side. I think I need only remind him of one poster that had something to say about a very distinguished public man. This poster asserted that the statesman in question was much needed by Canada; but the country did not think so. My right hon. friend ought to be the last to take too seriously to heart the literature or the pictures that appeared in the newspaper press and on the bill boards, during the campaign.

We contended in the last Parliament that the House of Commons was not a representative House, that the Government was an irresponsible and not a responsible one, that my right hon. friend was an unelected and not an elected Prime Minister, and it was with that appeal we addressed the people of this country. To-day we have a Parliament that is representative of the people, to-day we have a Government that in the truest and broadest sense, is responsible to Parliament as well as to the people and I think my right hon. friend may cease to be alarmed as to how the affairs of this country will be carried on during the next few years under these new auspices.

To come now, Mr. Speaker, to some of the concrete matters touched on by my right hon. friend, may I speak first of the question of the return to the western provinces of their natural resources? My right hon. friend said that for ten years past an offer had been made to the western provinces along the lines of the proposal that has recently been made by the present Government. He pointed out a little later, however, that the offer which had been made by the present Administration was not confined to one method of solution only but that an alternative method was also suggested. My right hon. friend spoke about an offer of an arbitration, and seemed to think we on this side should endeavour to settle that question by appointing arbitrators from the different provinces of the Dominion. No one knows better than my right hon. friend himself, that that is the very course that the western provinces have objected to so strongly in the past. There was nothing in my communication to the Premiers of the provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan which spoke of arbitration. I made a reference to an accounting in matters of financial obligation between these provinces and the Federal Government, but that is a very different thing to an arbitration of a character likely to cause embarrassment and that will bring no fruitful results. May I read from the letter which I sent to the Premiers of the different provinces. The apposite paragraph is as follows:

> If however, the Government of the Prairie Provinces would not be satisfied with such an arrangement,—

That is the one similar to the offer which had previously been made—

> —but would prefer an accounting between the Dominion and the Provinces from the beginning, by an independent tribunal, we would not object to such a plan. In any agreement that might be come to along these lines it would be, of course, necessary that adequate provision be made for crediting the provinces with all moneys received by the Dominion and charging to the Provinces all outlay by the Dominion, directly or indirectly, in relation to the management of the resources. Any award duly made by the tribunal should be binding on both sides. Any sums found to be due by the Dominion to a Province or by a Province to the Dominion might be capitalized and interest adjusted in connection with the annual Provincial subsidy.

Another point to which I would like to draw attention is this: The concluding paragraph of the letter from which I have just read is in the following words:

> I need hardly add that of course any arrangement that might be made would be subject to the approval of the Dominion Parliament.

My right hon. friend tried to convey the impression that in some way the Government was prepared to hand over their natural resources to the western provinces and under the arrangement deny to the other provinces of the Dominion any rights that they might have. Nothing can be clearer than what I have just read to show that the proposal the Government has made is one which carries with it the right of every province of this Dominion to have any claims it may have against the western provinces taken into due consideration in any accounting that will be made in the settlement of these natural resources claims.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps I misunderstood the letter. Does my hon. friend mean that when this commission makes its award, on the basis of accounting as he states, that award shall be submitted to Parliament afterwards for its approval?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It need not necessarily be a commission. We have offered the western provinces to meet with their representatives. As a Government we are prepared to discuss with them the return of their natural resources. It may be necessary to go into a strict accounting of all the moneys due by the provinces to the Dominion, or by the Dominion to the provinces. Whether or not it will be necessary to do more than employ expert accountants for that purpose will depend largely on the attitude which the western provinces take. Whatever course may be necessary—and that is a matter for negotiation—to arrive at a final conclusion as to what is just and fair, it must carry with it the condition that the arrangement reached must be subject to the approval of this Parliament. This means that every province represented here will have, through its representatives, the right to say whether or not the settlement made is fair and just in the interest of all the provinces of the Dominion.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What is the meaning of the words "That the award shall be binding on all parties"?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend and I were trying to settle a difference between us, and we made that difference subject to the finding of some third party, conditional upon that finding being accepted by the representatives assembled here, we would have exactly what I propose now.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not final at all. If it is, the word final has no meaning.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It reaches a degree of finality that my right hon. friend and his Government were never able to reach. If there is any possibility of getting this question settled—and it is a question that ought to be settled, and settled as quickly as conveniently can be effected—this method which has been proposed would appear to be the most effective and the best.

My right hon. friend made some reference to the question of treaties. He spoke, and I thought rather slightingly, of the remarks of the mover of the Address when my hon. friend from North Winnipeg made reference to the clause of the Speech from the Throne which implies that all treaties should be submitted to the approval of Parliament. My right hon. friend asked: when did his Government not submit its treaties to Parliament? The treaties in question happen to be the recent treaties arising out of the Conference for the Limitation of Armaments at Washington. Whether it was to matters concerning that Conference to which my right hon. friend alluded or not when he said that certain misrepresentations of his attitude had been made during the campaign, I cannot say, but I venture to assert at the present moment, that if it had been left to my right hon. friend to settle the question as to how these treaties were to be finally signed, in all probability our Dominion would have had no representative at that Conference at all. I have here a statement which was made by the Right Hon. the Prime Minister of Great Britain shortly after my right hon. friend returned from the Conference of Premiers. It reads:

> As regards the Dominions and India, it was arranged at the recent Imperial Conference that His Majesty's Government should represent the whole Empire at Washington.

That was the position in which the treaty matter was left at the Imperial Conference attended by my right hon. friend.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Are you reading the whole statement? I cannot think that that statement was made in that naked form. If so, I would dispute it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will read my right hon. friend's own statement which is just as naked as the other, and I think he will discover that its meaning is quite apparent. It was during June, July and August that my right hon. friend attended the Conference. On the 18th of October my right hon. friend handed out the following statement to the press of this city:

> As the result of recent telegraphic communications between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, it has been arranged that a representative of Canada should be appointed as a member of the delegation which will represent the British Empire at the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments and on Pacific and Far Eastern Questions summoned by the Government of the United States to meet at Washington on November 11th. The Canadian Government have accordingly appointed Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden G.C.M.G. as the representative of Canada for this purpose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The right hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," but does he note the date of this particular communication, the 18th October, 1921? It was in June, July and August that my right hon. friend was at the Prime Ministers' Conference. It was between the time my right hon. friend was at the Prime Ministers' Conference in England and the date of his issuing the statement I have just read that the Prime Minister of Great Britain said:

> As regards the Dominions and India it was arranged at the recent Imperial Conference that His Majesty's Government should represent the whole Empire at Washington.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I wish to state again, that the hon. gentleman has failed to quote such language from any statement of mine, and I was no party to such an arrangement.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let me then say what will be familiar to many hon. members of this House, that after the Imperial Conference the Prime Minister of South Africa, General the Right Hon. J. C. Smuts, having read the statement I have just quoted from the Prime Minister of Great Britain in which the latter says that it had been agreed at the Conference that His Majesty's Government would represent the whole Empire at Washington, made the declaration that, so far as South Africa was concerned she did not propose to return to the colonial status, but was going to maintain the status which she had won at the Peace Conference at Paris at the conclusion of the great war, and that South Africa would not be represented by a delegation to be named by the British Government to take its instructions from the British Government but that she would be represented by one of her own delegates acting under instructions from the government of South Africa, representing South Africa as one of the countries belonging to the British Empire, or not be represented at all. If Canada was fortunate enough to be represented at the Conference at Washington by her own representative we have to thank the Prime Minister of South Africa and not the late Prime Minister of our own country for the fact that we had that representation. I might add by way of confirmation of what I have just said, that in a cablegram of October 8th Lord Curzon, British Minister of Foreign Affairs, said to the British Ambassador at Washington:

> We leave to the sole discretion of the United States' Government what powers are to be invited.

He went on to say later:

> His Majesty's Government would now prefer to include the Dominion point of view.

So that as regards representation at Washington there seems to have been three stages. First the understanding arrived at during the conference of Prime Ministers in which it was apparently agreed that representation at Washington would be by the British delegation appointed by the British Government, receiving its instructions from the British Government and reporting to the British Government, Canada to come in or not to come in according to the decision of the British Government. Then there was the second stage.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rise to a point of order. I have made a statement on the subject to which the hon. member continuously refers, a subject within my own knowledge which he persists in contradicting. He has no right to do so. I stated I was no party to any such arrangement at the Imperial Conference that Canada should be represented merely by a delegation appointed by the British Government, taking its directions from the British Government, nor was such an arrangement arrived at while I was a member of the Conference. Our negotiations took place in this regard by correspondence, and from the first I insisted that we should name our delegate and that that delegate should take his instructions from us.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no desire in any way to contradict my right hon. friend, but I confess that when the Prime Minister of Great Britain makes a statement which he gives to the entire world, which was accepted in South Africa and which was accepted in Australia as being a correct statement, I find it somewhat difficult not to accept that statement as correct.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would remind—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would remind the hon. gentleman that I was not there to the end of the Conference.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): That is a way out.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think if my hon. friend is pleading that he was not present, he should not be so emphatic as to what took place.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am emphatic as to what I was stating.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am responsible to what I was a party to and only that.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order, order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not know what my right hon. friend is responsible for, but I do know that we prorogued this House in time to allow him to be present at the proceedings of the Conference, and I am sorry that he has to make the statement that he was not present at one of the most important meetings of the Conference.

May I pass to another matter which my right hon. friend felt somewhat sensitive upon, and that is the statement in the Speech from the Throne in reference to the revision of the Customs Tariff? My right hon. friend, in the course of his remarks, repeatedly said to the hon. members of the House that they should not take too seriously what appears in the Speech from the Throne, that probably before the end of the session they would be considerably disappointed. I have here his exact words. In one place he said that the optimism excited in the Speech from the Throne would probably be "greatly depressed" before the session was over, that the Speech from the Throne was apt to be made up in part of forgotten promises and pledges. He referred in his graphic way to the Speech being "an aggregation of the letters of the alphabet". I am not surprised that my right hon. friend has the opinion he has of declarations in the Speech from the Throne, when one considers how he carried out the pledges which were made in the Speech from the Throne as presented to this Parliament last year. May I, for the purposes of making clear the point of view of the present Administration, quote to my right hon. friend the respective paragraphs in the Speeches from the Throne of this year and last year in regard to this important subject of the tariff? The Speech from the Throne of this year as presented by the present Government reads:

> You will be invited to consider the expediency of making some changes in the Customs Tariff. While there are details of revision, the consideration of which will require time and care that are not at present available, there are features of the tariff which it is felt may properly be dealt with during the present session.

My right hon. friend characterizes this paragraph as "pallid and barren." Those are the words he applies to the reference in the Speech to the subject of tariff revision. I am quite prepared to admit that the language of that paragraph is not overdrawn. But let me contrast with it the language of the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne of last year which my right hon. friend was responsible for having presented to this House. Here is his reference on the subject of the tariff:

> My advisers are convinced of the necessity for revision of the Customs tariff. In order to secure the most complete information a committee has conducted an extensive and thorough inquiry and has secured the views of all parties and interests in every province. The hearings necessary for this purpose have now been completed, and the conclusions founded thereon will be submitted to you in due course.

That paragraph may not be pale, pallid, barren; but I much prefer the one to which my right hon. friend has taken exception, which means what it says, to a paragraph that proved to be without any meaning and wholly untrue, and that has never been fulfilled in any particular.

My right hon. friend asks: what are the changes that are to be made in the tariff. He knows very well that the occasion of the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne is not a time to discuss tariff changes. I think he may feel well assured that the pledge made will be carried out during the course of the present session, and I think that not only he, but hon. members of this House and the country generally, will rejoice that they have, in the person of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), the one man above all others, in this Dominion, in whom the people of Canada, irrespective of party, have the utmost confidence in dealing with financial and tariff matters.

My right hon. friend seemed to be grieved that during the course of the campaign, in touching on tariff matters, I had made use of a little simile which served to describe my attitude in relation to the management of public affairs and to the tariff in particular. He seemed to think that in dealing with these important public matters, I should not have spoken of a chart and compass, and he sought to convey the impression—at least I thought he did—that in some way or another I had resorted, during the course of the campaign, to an attitude which was wholly new, and which was giving me some means of escape from dealing with tariff matters other than that which I had previously taken. He referred to the convention of the summer of 1919 and intimated that at that convention a platform had been drafted to which I was necessarily obligated, and that in some way I was betraying that whole convention, in the recent campaign, in not going forward with that platform in hand and saying that regardless altogether of existing conditions or the language therein contained, I was supporting it exactly as expressed. In order that there may be no doubt as to the position I took at the time of the convention of 1919 in reference to the platform as laid down, let me read the words which I addressed at that time to the assembled delegates. I have in my hand a copy of the proceedings of the Liberal Convention, and at page 199, my right hon. friend will find the following:

> I should be unworthy of any measure of the confidence you have so abundantly bestowed were I not fully conscious of my own lack of Parliamentary experience, my own lack of training in public life, my own limitations in a thousand and one directions adequately to meet the obligations of this great duty, this great honour, which you have conferred. I should despair altogether of being able even to attempt to discharge its obligations were it not that I know that one who is called upon to accept the office of leadership must first and foremost be the willing servant of all, and that in seeking in the spirit of service to meet the wishes of those who have chosen him as their leader, he may look for guidance and counsel to the great forces assembled about him. . . . . I hope you will feel that in seeking to do the work of the Liberal party in the way I believe the Liberal party would wish it to be done, I shall rely upon the counsel of those who are outstanding in the ranks of the party, the Liberal members of the Senate, the Liberals in the House of Commons, the leaders of the party in the several provinces, the representative men who are gathered together here; and that in this way I shall find a compass which will point the direction that ought to be taken, and will point it aright.

If more is needed, that more is to be found in the platform which has been laid down by this Convention. That platform, ladies and gentlemen, is the chart on which is plotted the course desired by the people of the country, as expressed through the voice of the Liberals assembled here. So, with this chart and this compass, forgetting the things which are behind, and stretching forward to the things which are before, let us press on from this moment, a great, a united, a mighty force, making ever for new liberty, for wider freedom, for greater righteousness, in the public affairs of this nation; press on, ever more zealous and united, till we have reached the goal where the principles and policies laid down on this historic occasion will have become, through legislation, part of the law of our land.

That was the position which I took on the occasion of being honoured with the leadership of the Liberal party at the convention of 1919. That is the position which I took during the recent campaign, and that is the position which I take at the present time. I look upon these questions of Government, not as questions to be decided by any one man, but as matters requiring the most mature and careful consideration which it is possible for men of many points of view, assembled together, to give to them, and as long as I have the privilege of being entrusted with the responsible position which I at present enjoy, I shall ever look to the able men who are associated with me for the guidance and direction which I need in regard to these all-important public questions.

May I pass on from this subject, because the question of the tariff will come up at an appropriate time and need not be dealt with further at this moment, and speak just for a minute in reference to the subject of railways which was also alluded to by my right hon. friend? The leader of the Opposition stated that there was no need for having any reference in the Speech from the Throne to the subject of railways because it did not involve legislation. I am sure that if my right hon. friend looks over previous speeches from the Throne with the preparation of which he has had to do, he will find references to many subjects which do not require legislation one way or the other. The reference may not have been necessary on the ground that it did not involve legislation; but it was necessary that the country and Parliament should be informed at the opening of Parliament exactly as to the purpose of the ministry with respect to the National railroads which are in our possession at the present time, and the most appropriate place to make such a declaration was in the Speech from the Throne. The statement of the Government's position has been made, I think, with sufficient clearness to be intelligible to all hon. members of the House; but I would remind my right hon. friend that the proper person to discuss railway policy is the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy), and I would prefer, until he has had an opportunity of addressing members of the House, to defer saying anything further with respect to the meaning of co-ordination as set forth in the Speech from the Throne. I think the language must be perfectly clear to hon. members. If there is any doubt as to what is in the Government's mind, that doubt will be dispelled by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Kennedy) himself.

I cannot however, let pass what my right hon. friend said in reference to the present position of the country and its railways. As I listened to his remarks it seemed to me that they implied that when the Administration of which he was a member took office the country was overburdened with railways, and that that was the reason why we have the serious railway problem we have to-day. If what my right hon. friend says is true, that when the Administration of which he was a member came into office the country was, to use his expression, over-railroaded, I am at a loss to understand how he can defend the extent to which railway construction was carried on after 1911. Let me read from a report which I think he will quickly recognize and not be apt to dispute. I have in my hand the report of the Royal Commission to inquire into Railways and Transportation in Canada, made by Sir H. L. Drayton and Mr. W. M. Acworth. I think the former gentleman is the hon. member who sits to the left of the leader of the Opposition. What does the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton) say in that report? To quote from page 10:

> In 1901, with a population of 5,371,315, Canada had 18,140 miles of railway in operation; roughly a mile of railway for every 300 inhabitants. In 1911, the population had increased 34 per cent to 7,206,643, while the mileage had increased by 40 per cent. to 25,400 miles; a mile of railway to every 284 inhabitants. Since 1911—

Which was the time that the Administration, of which my right hon. friend later became a member, took office,— > Since 1911 the population has, it is understood, not much increased, but the railway mileage open and under construction has grown to 40,584 miles. In other words, Canada has to-day—

That is, 1919.

> —taking the present population as 7,500,000, only 185 inhabitants to support each mile of railway.

In addition to that statement I have also here the evidence of a gentleman who was called before the Select Standing Committee on Canadian National Railways and Shipping at the last session of Parliament, the evidence of Mr. A. J. Mitchell, one of the directors, and vice-president, of the Board of Management of the Canadian Northern Railway system. At page 107 of the report of that committee the following appears from his evidence:

> For the year ending June 30th, 1914, the Canadian Northern Railway system had an operating mileage of 4,563 miles, with gross earnings of $23,781,328. Last year, for 1920, the mileage was 9.788 miles in operation, and the gross earnings were $68,541,393. In other words, there was over double the mileage in 1920 that there was in 1914. To be exact, 5,225 miles were added to the Canadian Northern Railway for operation since June 30th, 1914.

Let my right hon. friend reflect that 1914 was the year the war commenced. Then, if at any time, we should have ceased railway building. He will surely begin to see the extent of the responsibility of his Government in permitting the continued building of railways. We were already over-railroaded, as my right hon. friend says, yet we continued to build to the extent of 5,225 miles. My right hon. friend fails to place responsibility for the railway situation where it properly belongs.

The position we are in to-day is due in large part to this excessive construction during a period when construction should have been discontinued altogether. It is due further to the fact that the government which succeeded the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, instead of seeking to carry out in a sympathetic way the large vision which prompted the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific, a vision which foresaw a great national highway connecting the waters of the Atlantic with those of the Pacific in a manner which would serve to unite this country, industrially, politically and commercially,—instead of seeking to realize that vision sympathetically, the government of which my right hon. friend was a member did all in its power to make that project a failure.

My right hon. friend had a good deal to say this afternoon as to the success of government operation depending upon who was administering national affairs. I could not help thinking that at the time he was speaking of the fulness of his heart and knowledge. He has had to do with the administration of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the other railways and he knows, perhaps better than anyone else in Canada, how a road can be made a failure if you do not wish to make it a success. So far as this Administration is concerned, I will not for one moment accept any of the insinuations or suspicions of my right hon. friend in regard to its intentions in administering the national railroads. We intend to give government ownership of the National system, which as the Speech from the Throne states now extends through all the provinces, the fairest trial under auspices the most favourable it is possible for a government to secure. We go into it with all sincerity and in the hope that we may make it a success. I will say with perfect candour that there are hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, as I know there are hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, who doubt very much whether public ownership can be made the success which private ownership might. But there are others who believe that it can be made a success, and so far as it is possible for this Government to demonstrate what can be done under government ownership, it is our intention to see that it is done.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend had something to say in regard to the marketing of wheat. He took exception to the fact that there was no mention in the the Speech from the Throne of the method which the Government proposed to adopt as respects marketing facilities for this great commodity of Western Canada. If there is an omission in the Speech in that particular, it has been made designedly. I think I am right when I say that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition has one view, which he has expressed, as to the way in which wheat should be marketed, but that view does not accord with the view which my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) holds. I think there are others who hold yet another view. If I am correct, there are three main bodies of opinion as to the manner in which the marketing of wheat may best be carried on. The first may be described as the compulsory wheat board method, such as we had in Canada in 1919. The second is the voluntary wheat board method, such as my right hon. friend advocated during the campaign. The third is the farmers' own co-operative method carried on by the co-operative companies, such as the United Grain Growers, of which the hon. member for Marquette is president, and the Saskatchewan Co-operative Company, they holding the view that these co-operative companies should handle the crop themselves. Here are three bodies of opinion, each of which is entitled to consideration. The Government is anxious in this matter to do the best it can to serve the interests of Western Canada. Under the circumstances, is it possible to devise a better method of ascertaining what is likely to be of most service to those interests than that this question should, during the present session, be referred to the Select Standing Committee of Agriculture, with power to go carefully into the whole matter and report to the House as to which if any of the three methods it would recommend, or what course it thinks can be taken with most advantage? I may say that the Government has decided that that course will be adopted with respect to this important question. I hope that on that committee we shall have representatives from all groups in this House so that the policy ultimately adopted will be based upon the best information that can be obtained.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have touched on most of the points which my right hon. friend dealt with in the course of his remarks. He made some reference to the reduction of freight rates, but I think I will leave that matter also until my colleague the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) has occasion to speak on the subject. I might point out, however, that while it is perfectly true, as the leader of the Opposition has said, that the Board of Railway Commissioners has power to regulate the railway rates, there is nothing which precludes the Administration from using its influence to bring together the different railway companies with a view to their taking, of their own accord, a course which should result in a reduction of freight rates on basic commodities in the best interests of all parties concerned. That step has already been taken and we hope that the railway companies will see the wisdom of speedily bringing about a reduction on basic articles. If it is not successful, then it will be for Parliament to consider other methods which will, perhaps, be more effective.

My right hon. friend concluded his address by making reference at considerable length to negotiations that took place prior to the formation of the present Administration. A little earlier in the course of his remarks he taunted me with having given a somewhat broad interpretation to the word "Liberalism"; indeed, he went so far as to say that I had made the word almost synonymous with "political dishonesty." Well, may I say to my right hon. friend that at least I have never been ashamed of the name of the party with which I have been connected. When my right hon. friend was in power in a previous Administration, it was first of all, I think, the "Liberal-Conservative" Administration. That name became questionable, and my right hon. friend was one of those who helped to give the new Administration the name of "Unionist." That name lasted for a short while, but it became even worse, and when my right hon. friend's predecessor went out of office, my hon. friend took it upon himself to insist that the party should have a new name and gave it the name "National Liberal and Conservative"—whatever that meant. That was his first act in becoming Leader of the Government. I now understand that my right hon. friend's party has just held another caucus, and that this time he has insisted on another change. He calls his party once more "Liberal-Conservative." Well, I do not know what interpretation may be placed upon the word, "Liberal" in that case, but if I am to judge the meaning of the word by hon. gentlemen who surround my right hon. friend at the present moment, for my part, I should never stretch the word "Liberal" sufficiently to include any of them. Speaking of "political dishonesty," if he wishes to avoid the charge, I think my right hon. friend should come right out and call his following what it is—"Tory"; a Tory administration of the old type. May I suggest to my right hon. friend that when he is criticising others in the language they use he should be a little more careful. If there is one gentleman more than another in this country who is apt to use extreme and at times offensive phrases, it is my right hon. friend.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, with respect to the negotiations which preceded the formation of the Government, that I have nothing to conceal; indeed, I am only too happy to have opportunity to repeat on the floor of the House what I have already said publicly. I do not know that there is any obligation upon the leader of a Government to explain any of the negotiations relating to the formation of a ministry; on the other hand, I am quite willing, if only to satisfy the curiosity of my right hon. friend, to give him the fullest and most candid account.

When I was called upon to take the responsible step of forming a government, I naturally, Mr. Speaker, looked over the situation as it presented itself as a result of the elections. I saw that in three of the western provinces the representation in this Parliament was for the most part Progressive, with two or three exceptions it was exclusively such. During the campaign I heard, and I read also in a number of papers, declarations made by candidates to the effect that as Progressives they were really Liberals; that their point of view was a Liberal point of view. I was perfectly sincere when I said, and I repeat it here, that I believe many of the hon. members who belong to the Progressive Party regard themselves, if you like, as Progressive Liberals. May I say that in so far as the word "Progressive" indicates an attitude, my hon. friends of the Progressive party will find the present Government wholly in sympathy with them. The word "Liberal," to my mind, has always stood and will ever stand for progress. To the extent to which my Progressive friends use the word "Progressive" as indicating an attitude to be taken toward questions which come before Parliament for discussion; to the extent to which that word is synonymous with "Liberal," they will find this Government wholly in sympathy with them. So far as the word may have any meaning which relates it to class, there may be a difference between us; because Liberalism implies a point of view which embraces not merely one class but is broad enough to include representatives of all classes who take a like attitude upon public questions. The fact which confronted me when I was forming the Government was the circumstance I have just mentioned, that in three of the provinces, the representation was almost exclusively Progressive representation. To my mind there can be nothing more unfortunate for this Dominion than that any part of it should have cause to feel that it is not to have its voice in the councils of the country. I feel that the whole purpose of Confederation itself would be menaced if any great body of opinion, any considerable section of this Dominion of Canada, should have reason to think that it was without due representation in the shaping of national policies and in the carrying on of our public affairs. I was anxious,therefore, that so far as the Government I was endeavoring to form was concerned, Western Canada would never be able to say that the Liberal Party adopted other than a generous attitude toward those who opposed some of its followers. So, Mr. Speaker, I made it known to gentlemen who, I believed, were representative of Progressive thought and opinion that I was prepared to consider taking into the Government members of the Progressive Party who enjoyed its confidence; but I made it quite plain that I would only consider that representation on the basis of its coming into a Liberal Administration. I was quite sincere when I said during the course of the campaign that I thought coalitions were a mistake. We have only to recall the Government of which my hon. friend was a member to realize how costly coalitions are, to realize how full of compromise and how inefficient they are. What the country needs most, and I believe British parliamentary practice has gone far to prove it, is an administration sufficiently of one mind and sufficiently strong to be able to adopt policies of great national importance and carry them through in a way that will help to make for good and strong government in the country. That was the position which I took in regard to our western friends in the formation of the Government. I take that position to-day and I will always take it as long as I have to do with the affairs of the government in this country. Any body of opinion in Canada which represents itself as Liberal will be entitled to a place in the councils of this country, but it must be for gentlemen themselves to say whether or not they wish to have their views regarded as Liberal, or as of some other point of view. All I wish to make plain at the moment, Mr. Speaker, is this: If we are to have a happy, a united and prosperous Canada, we must seek at all times to give, so far as it may be possible, representation to kindred bodies of opinion in the work of the administration of our country. I am sorry that we have not in the Government at the present moment representation from that large Western group. I say it in perfect frankness, and I say it simply because I feel that the more united those of us are who are opposed to Toryism, the more likely we are to secure the enactment of Liberal policies. But what we have been unable to do as a Government, I hope we shall be able successfully to do in this Parliament. In other words, I hope that it will be possible for this administration to make it plain to hon. members that the Cabinet regards itself not as some group of supermen imposing their will upon the House of Commons, but as a committee of the House of Commons, responsible to the House of Commons, anxious to get the freest and fullest discussion of all public questions, and willing to carry out the will and the wish of the House of Commons to the best of their ability.

May I say, and with this I wish to conclude, that I agree with the hon. mover of the Address (Mr. McMurray) that the people of this country are greatly indebted to the sister province of Quebec for having through one of its constituencies afforded a place in this Parliament and in the Government, to a gentleman who for many years held the position of Prime Minister of the province of Alberta. I think my friends from Alberta sitting opposite to me will agree that he enjoyed the confidence of the people of that province as few men have ever enjoyed it, also that, notwithstanding circumstances which limited followers of the Government so far as Western Canada is concerned to the numbers they are, that in the choice as Minister of Agriculture of this Dominion, of my hon. friend from Regina (Mr. Motherwell), who for thirteen years was Minister of Agriculture in the province of Saskatchewan, and in the choice of the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), who, as I have just mentioned, was for many years the Premier of the sister province of Alberta, western opinion is represented at the council board and there is reason to feel that full consideration will be given at all times to the needs and to the rightful aspirations of the Western provinces.

We have a great country, but we can only keep it great as we have all parts united and contented. That, Mr. Speaker, above all else will be the aim of the present Administration, to see that every shade of opinion, other than that to which we are diametrically opposed, every shade of Liberal and Progressive thought is duly considered in the shaping of the policies of the Government and in the carrying out of those policies. In that way I believe, now that we have a new Parliament and a new Government, we may look forward to a new era of prosperity, contentment and happiness and, above all, of unity in our Dominion.

On the motion of Mr. Crerar the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 9.58 p.m.

The House met at Three o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—WEDNESDAY SITTINGS

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Fielding:

> That on Wednesday the fifteenth day of March instant and subsequent Wednesdays to the end of the session, the House will meet at three o'clock in the afternoon.

I may say in regard to this motion, Mr. Speaker, that during the sessions of the previous Parliament the House assembled at two o'clock on Wednesdays instead of three. Experience, however, went to show that meeting an hour earlier on one day of the week resulted in a good deal of confusion, inconvenience and embarrassment, and I think it will probably better serve the convenience of all members if we assemble at the same hour on Wednesday as on other days of the week.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a variation of a long standing rule of the House, but by way of trial I offer no objection to it at the present time.

Motion agreed to.

GRAIN INQUIRY COMMISSION

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) if any report has been made to the Government by the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission appointed by the late Government, known in Western Canada as the Hyndman Commission, and if so, whether such report will be made available to the House. I should like also to ask whether the Government has a copy of the evidence taken, and if it is the intention to submit such evidence to the House.

Hon. J. A. ROBB: (Minister of Trade and Commerce) There is a voluminous amount of correspondence in the department, but no definite report. The expense of printing this evidence would be considerable. I see no objection to supplying it to my hon. friend if he so desires, and if the House decides to bear the expense of printing it there will be no objection to that being done.

Mr. MEIGHEN: May I ask the minister if it is the intention of the Government to continue the work of the commission?

Mr. ROBB: Well, the Wheat Board have apparently discontinued their own work. They have run out of supplies.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Wheat Board?

Mr. ROBB: The Grain Commission.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. McMurray for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Monday, March 13.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, my first words this afternoon shall be words of congratulation to you, Sir, upon your elevation to the position of First Commoner of the land. The office of Speaker in the greatest deliberative assembly of the nation is one of much responsibility. I think the House has been happy in its choice, Sir, and I have no doubt that hon. members will give you every assistance in the maintenance of that order and decorum which are necessary for the proper conduct of the public business.

It is appropriate also that I join with the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the words which they have uttered with regard to the appointment of His Excellency Lord Byng to be Governor General of Canada. A good many of us have pleasant recollections of the late Governor General, the Duke of Devonshire. I have no doubt that the present Governor General will soon gain from the whole of the Canadian people that esteem and respect that he gained so rapidly among the Canadian soldiers when he was their chief at the front.

I wish also—and I feel a particular pride in doing so—to say a word of welcome on the part of my fellow Progressive members here to the new lady member of this House. I think it is particularly fitting, Mr. Speaker, that the first lady member elected to the House of Commons, marking a distinct step in progress, should be elected as a member of the Progressive Party. We have recently given the women of Canada the franchise. I am a thorough believer in that reform; I believe that the women of Canada can make a great contribution to the public life of the country, and I have no doubt that our new member will make a valuable contribution to the work of the House.

I wish also to say a word of felicitation, not only because it is customary but because I think it can be sincerely offered upon the present occasion, to the mover (Mr. McMurray) and to the seconder (Mr. Mercier) of the motion we are considering. It is not a light ordeal for a new member to speak from his place in this House for the first time; I recall my own experience in that connection. But I know I am well within the judgment of the whole House when I say that the hon. member for North Winnipeg discharged his duty yesterday very well indeed. Unfortunately for me I do not speak the graceful language of my hon. friends from Quebec and I was therefore unable to follow in actual text the address given by my hon. friend who seconded the motion. But I am bound to say that of the many admirable speeches that I have listened to in the French language none has impressed me more than the speech I heard from my hon. friend yesterday.

It is proper that I should make some reference to the speeches of my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) and my hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). If the speeches we had yesterday from our hon. friends, Mr. Speaker, are an indication of what we shall have throughout the whole session and this Parliament, I can well believe that we are in for some interesting times. I should like to have seen a little more discussion of the really serious problems that are facing this country. The business of this Parliament is very serious, and I hope I am not giving any offence to my hon. friends when I offer them this advice, that it would be well in the future to give more consideration to the great problems that are facing us in this country.

My hon. friend who leads the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) had a good deal to say as to the character of the campaign carried on in some parts of Canada by my hon. friends on the Government side. Well, I had some experience myself of the character of the campaign carried on in some parts of the country by my hon. friends on the other side of the House, and I dare say that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition had a similar experience, but I must say that he was living perilously near a glass house when he was making those charges. I am among those who believe that the election campaigns of this country, whether federal or provincial, should be conducted as far as possible upon the basis of a clear and honest discussion of the issues before the people. I conceive that only in such a way can the best government be secured. I have no patience with the character of the campaign that was carried on by some of my hon. friends on the Government side in the province of Quebec, both in respect to the question of conscription and the question of the tariff. As far as Western Canada was concerned, and Eastern Canada too, very largely, on what basis was the campaign against the Progressive party and the Progressive candidates carried on? On a basis of utter and gross misrepresentation. As far as Western Canada was concerned, the record of the Government and the question of the tariff were discussed very little. I discovered in the election contest recently closed that I had become a most dangerous character in this Dominion, and if some of the things that I heard were said about me and about some of my associates sitting behind me, in the last election campaign in Western Canada were true, I certainly should not be occupying a seat in this House of Commons to-day. I say again, let us endeavour to free our minds of these things, for there are great and vital issues before this country at the present time. Let us concentrate our attention upon these issues and endeavour to seek a solution for our problems along the line of what will be in the best interests of our country. On no other line can I conceive that we can discharge our duties to our constituents as we should.

We have had a change of government, and we shall wait with interest to see what benefits that change of government will bring to this country. That brings me to a matter that was referred to by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition and by my hon. friend the Prime Minister. I refer to the question of the negotiations that were entered into, or were supposed to be entered into, between the Government and myself and one or two members representing the Progressive party elected in the last campaign. My hon. friend the Prime Minister, I think, was animated by a sincere desire to do what was in the best interests of this country, but when he states that he made it quite clear in any proposals or suggestions he made, that this ministry was only to be a Liberal ministry I must say that I did not so understand it. When these proposals were first made they were discussed or suggested on the basis of policy and on the basis of the personnel of the Government; and that, to my mind, is the essential thing. I am not much concerned with what government is in power in this country so long as the country gets the legislation and the administration it should have. I have had a great many differences of opinion with my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, who was very kind in his references yesterday —or at all events in the inference that might be drawn from his references to his hon. friends who sit on his left; but notwithstanding the strong differences of opinion I have had with my right hon. friend I would be prepared to co-operate with him or with anyone else at the present time to secure for this country the administration and the legislation that it needs. But such co-operation would be upon definite lines of principle, upon definite lines of policy, and upon no other lines. I submitted the suggestions that had been conveyed to me to my supporters, as it was my duty to do. Those suggestions were considered and there were further discussions, but nothing came of those discussions, and we are here to-day sitting in this House as an independent party standing for the principles that we believe in and prepared to further those principles by every honest and legitimate means within our power.

There has been some speculation in the press, and, I dare say, also in the House, as to what attitude the Progressive party would take in this House. Well, Sir, the attitude of the Progressive party is easily and simply stated. We are here, not to oppose for the sake of opposing; we are here prepared to give the Government every assistance in carrying on the government of this country, when it gives the country the policies that we believe it should have. I say that we are prepared to do that, but we are equally prepared to oppose the Government and to criticise it when we think the Government is doing wrong or not adopting the policies that we think this country should have. That, to my mind, frankly and clearly states our position. My own hope, and I am bound to say that the words of my hon. friend the Prime Minister give some ground for that hope, is that the policy pursued by the Government in respect of the great vital questions before the country, to which later I shall make some allusion, will be such as to command our support. If their course is shaped in that direction so that we can support them, we shall do so, but if it is not, our duty then will lie in another direction.

I am among those also who believe that the Government should have a reasonable time to carry out its policies and to frame its programme. I quite realize the difficulties of the present situation, that a government coming into office only a few months before a session is called has not had the opportunity to familiarize itself with all the questions of public administration, and perhaps not the opportunity to make a full inquiry as to the lines of public policy that should be followed, and we are therefore prepared to give the Government every reasonable time to shape its course and decide upon its line of action.

I desire to speak, and I shall not detain the House at any great length, upon the subjects dealt with in the Speech from the Throne. It was a good speech as such speeches go. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition was on rather poor ground yesterday when he criticised the tariff plank in the Speech, because I recall that a year ago we expected from the Speech delivered at that time, that definite tariff proposals would be laid before Parliament. There is one thing that strikes me, Sir, in respect of the recent Speech and it is that there are in it no decided statements of Government policy excepting perhaps on one or two particulars. There is the suggestion that several branches of defence in Canada should be co-ordinated or joined together under one minister. I think that is a step in the right direction, and I would commend to the Prime Minister and to the other members of the Government that that course might very well be followed in respect to other departments of the public service. I sometimes think that this country is over-governed. I know that in the United States, with a population of 108 or 110 millions of people, the cost of the Federal Government is relatively much lighter than it is in the Dominion of Canada; and I trust that when the Minister of Militia brings down his estimates he will carry the good work further and pare those estimates as closely as he can. One of the criticisms I had to offer of the late Government was the fact that it did not practise economy as it should be practised having in view the conditions and the circumstances of the country, and I trust that we shall not be obliged to level the same criticism at the members of the present Government when its estimates are placed before the House.

The Speech refers to the existing world-wide depression. Well, we are all pretty well familiar with that. I think we have all, as a matter of fact, pretty much experienced it in our own pockets.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: I am glad to hear that note of aproval from my hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister because I think perhaps he had a very active experience during his tenure of office of this condition of affairs.

There is also a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne, and to my mind a very important one, dealing with the condition of agriculture in the Dominion. There is no doubt, Sir, that the condition of agriculture throughout Canada to-day is very serious indeed. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) is, I am sure well aware of that fact. After all when we survey this whole Dominion from one end to the other, when we take account of the great manufacturing establishments that we have built up, may we not properly ask upon what does the real prosperity of this Dominion rest? It rests upon our agriculture; and if the farmers of this country are not prosperous, if agriculture is not thriving, then there is only one inevitable consequence—the business of the country languishes and dies. What is the situation to-day? I venture to say that a great majority of the farmers of Western Canada, that portion of the Dominion with which I am more intimately acquainted, conducted their business last year at a loss. I believe it is true of other portions of the Dominion. And what is the result? The result is that our factories are closed, there is unemployment in our cities, and there is lack of business for our railways. At a previous session I gave figures to the House showing the value of our agricultural exports in comparison with the total of our exports from Canada; and without any question of doubt whatever an examination of the facts in all their particulars shows conclusively that agriculture is the greatest industry of this Dominion, and that upon its success more than upon anything else depends the success of all the other industries and business activities of Canada.

I am very glad to note in the Speech from the Throne this statement:

> It is apparent that adequate markets and marketing facilities and reduced transportation and production costs lie at the root of the problem.

There is no doubt that better methods of tillage, better methods of farming, and better live stock will increase prosperity and the profits of the farmer; but it is equally true, in the largest sense, that the very things stated here are the things that vitally affect the prosperity of agriculture in this Dominion. The paragraph I have quoted makes the declaration that adequate markets are a part of the problem. That is unquestionably true. How a country such as Canada, with half of its people engaged in the business of agriculture, can have too many markets, or too broad markets, for its agricultural products passes my comprehension. I am not at all sure that the visit of the Minister of Finance to Washington recently was well timed. He of course is the best judge of that; but I do want to commend the purpose of my hon. friend in his desire to promote better trade relations with the United States in respect to markets for our agricultural products. I am not so sure as to how far the Minister of Finance has the support of all those who sit behind and around him in this proposal; but if any words of mine will have any influence with my hon. friend I hope he will persevere in that good work and, if possible, secure that market for Canada's products. I do not agree with the view of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, who yesterday briefly argued that reciprocity would be of no value to the Canadian farmer. How that argument can be made in the face of patent facts I cannot understand. The year before last we exported, if my memory serves me right, 350,000 head of live stock over one year old to the United States. When our American friends passed their Fordney Emergency Tariff that market was shut off, and what was the result? The result was that the farmers of Canada did not have that market for their live stock, and the value of live stock in the live stock markets of the Dominion went down, and went down steadily. Now is that a good thing for Canada or is it not? Is it a good thing for this Dominion that the farmers of Canada shall get the highest possible prices for their live stock and for their grain? I conceive that it is, because if the farmer has money in his pocket, he buys goods from the merchant and contributes traffic to the railways. As a result of that operation the whole area of business is extended and enlarged so that the whole country benefits from it. That is the inevitable result, and consequently there is no greater need for this country to-day than that of wider markets.

A reference is also made in the Speech to the need of improved market facilities. I presume that the Government have in mind in that respect the marketing of the wheat of this country. I hope their reference has a wider application even than that. One of the great difficulties in Canada to-day, and one of the causes of the high cost of living, is the expensive system of distribution, not only of farm products, but of the supplies that consumers require. I am a great believer in voluntary co-operation among the people to overcome these difficulties. I recognize that the middleman in some cases, perhaps, has his place, but when a great body of consumers and producers have to support a vast army of middlemen, it is not a healthy condition, and I trust the Government have in mind in this respect the encouragement and the opening up of these avenues of co-operation.

I would like to make a reference particularly to the marketing of our wheat. The conditions in the past year have been very bad. As my hon. friends know, there is a widespread feeling in Western Canada, shared not only by producers, but by many business men as well, that the Canada Wheat Board should be re-established in a temporary way to meet this condition, and I noted with interest the statement of my hon. friend the Prime Minister yesterday that the whole question of marketing wheat is to be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture. I would suggest that it be done as quickly as possible, so that the whole matter can be thoroughly inquired into. My right hon. friend who leads the Opposition has advanced a proposal that may have some merit in it, the proposal of a voluntary wheat pool under the control of the Government, but I am not convinced that that proposal as a permanent method of marketing grain, or indeed the method of a Government Wheat Board as a permanent method of marketing grain, is the best and soundest method.

I recently had the opportunity of learning that in the United States great progress has been made in the past few years in the development of co-operative pooling organizations, handling fruits, grain and other commodities used and produced by farmers. In the United States, within the past year, the Federal Government has given substantial assistance in the way of financing these pools in their selling operations. That was done through the revival of the War Finance Corporation, which it will be recalled functioned in the United States during the war. This question of how the Government can aid by assistance of this kind is one that might very well engage the attention of the Government. I can tell them now that they will have the opposition of our banking institutions, but our banking institutions are not freighted with all the financial wisdom that this country contains. This questions is one that should receive the consideration of the Government, and it is a field that can be explored, I feel sure, with great profit to the country.

There is another suggestion in this declaration, namely that production costs should come down. I sincerely hope that that is a forerunner of the wiping out of the duty on agricultural implements. It is absolutely necessary that production costs come down in this country, and where the wisdom comes in, in increasing the cost of the equipment the farmer uses on his farm passes my comprehension. The world is going through a period of great change. It is a well known fact that before the war, Russia, with its population of 160,000,000 or 170,000,000 people, was one of the greatest competitors of North America in supplying Europe with the wheat for the breadstuffs her people consumed. Russia since the war has been out of that market, but there are signs to-day that the restoration of Russia has commenced, indeed, if it is not well on the way, and within a few years that great country, which is now so stricken with famine and pestilence, will be supplying the markets of the world with wheat in competition with us. I say to the Prime Minister and to the members of his Government that there is no more important matter that can engage their attention to-day than the question of how these production costs can be brought down, and when they face that consideration they will recognize that one method in which that can be done is by taking the duties off agricultural implements.

My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) and my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) have a very full and complete knowledge of the needs of the people in Western Canada. There are those who have said that if the United States raises a tariff against our wheat and against our live stock, we should raise our tariff against them by way of retaliation. What an absurd policy. In other words, when you find the farmers of Canada shut off from this market, thus placed in the position where they have to carry on their work under greater disabilities, you propose to help them—how? By raising the duties, or increasing the cost of the equipment they have to use. The sensible thing to do under such circumstances is to endeavour to meet that condition by reducing the cost of the things the farmer needs to carry on his operations.

There is one other thought suggested in this paragraph. It is a reference to transportation costs and I judge from what the Speech states that that matter is engaging the attention of the Government. I trust that it will engage their attention, Mr. Speaker, to good purpose. Without question one of the things that is throttling business and industry in this country more than anything else is the excessive freight rates that the country is labouring under. Those increases have been very considerable. I am not going to debate the question now whether those increases were justified or not. In a large measure they were justified, owing to conditions under which the country was labouring at that time, but when you find a condition of affairs where a farmer, for instance, ships his oats from the province of Alberta to Fort William, and finds that almost half the money he realizes on the oats at Fort William has been taken in freight to pay the transportation costs, then I say this country cannot prosper under those conditions. Consequently, this question of freight rates is one that should engage the attention of the Government. and if the Government are not competent or able to deal with it, the question should engage the attention of this House.

There are some changes forecasted in the customs tariff. I read that paragraph, Mr. Speaker, with a good deal of care, indeed I will confess that I read it a good many times. It is a very carefully worded paragraph. I hope it forecasts a revision of duties downwards. I cannot conceive for a moment that the Government would think of revising the tariff upwards. I hope that will not be done, although when I read the speeches delivered even since the Government was formed by some of its members I have a mental reservation even on that question. I say that because I have in my hand an extract from the Montreal Gazette of February 3, giving a report of a meeting of the Shoe Manufacturers' Association of Canada at which the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) was present. The Minister of Justice delivered a speech upon that occasion, and I shall read from the report in the Gazette. The Gazette is an old established newspaper. It is veering very close to my hon. friends on the Government side at the present time.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Hear, hear.

Mr. CRERAR: I believe that the ex-Minister of Finance has a note of regret in his "Hear, hear." Not only the Montreal Gazette, but the Montreal Star as well, are adopting a very friendly attitude to my hon. friends on the Government side.

Mr. JACOBS: Loaves and fishes.

Mr. CRERAR: I am not at all sure that that will bring much comfort to the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster), but at any rate I want to deal with this report of the speech made by the Minister of Justice. It reads:

> Sir Lomer Gouin pointed out that from 1900 to 1914 the importation of foreign-made shoes had increased 700 per cent and that women—who now had their share of public rights and obligations—were responsible for the importation from the United States last year of over 500,000 pairs of shoes for a value of $1,700,000.

Very serious offence. He added, and I want hon. members to note this:

> For that reason, he added, we can easily understand that our Canadian manufacturers should insist on being granted a reasonable measure of protection to assure the survival of an industry which is as old as the country itself. For it is on home trade alone, or nearly so, that your industry must live and thrive.

And so on. That is as fine protectionist doctrine as I have ever heard preached in this country, and I trust that doctrine will not be the one that will guide the Government when it comes to the consideration of revising the tariff. The tariff should be revised downward and downward very considerably. During the election there were those who said that I stood for absolute free trade, and that if the Progressive party came into power the tariff would be swept away over night. That proposal has never been made anywhere at any time by any member of the Progressive party. I am convinced that the principle of protection is not suited as a fiscal policy for this country, and this country will never develop as it should develop as long as protection is embedded as the guiding principle of our fiscal policy. I recognise that it is and will be necessary for a considerable time to raise revenue by customs duties; but a tariff based upon the principle of revenue and the needs of revenue is an altogether different thing from a tariff based upon the principle of protection, and I earnestly hope the Government, when they come to present to Parliament their concrete proposals in respect to the fiscal policy of this country, will be guided by the former principle. Indeed, as my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) pointed out to the House yesterday, the Government have a very explicit and definite programme as regards the tariff. I had intended pointing that out. It is a definite programme, and I think the country expects—and I hope it will not be disappointed—that the Government will, in a very considerable degree, at this session implement the tariff programme that was part of its platform when it appealed to the Canadian people.

Another question to which I wish to refer is the railways. I am glad to note the declaration in the Speech from the Throne in connection with our National railways. I take it to mean that the intention of the Government is to give public ownership of these roads a full and fair trial in this country. If that end is to be achieved, one or two things are absolutely vital. One is that those roads comprising the Government system—I care not whether you call it co-ordination or amalgamation or anything else—be placed absolutely and without any question of doubt under one central management, and be controlled by that management; otherwise you cannot avoid having duplication. I am a believer in the principle of public ownership of public utilities. I know there are in this House many who do not hold that view; there are many of my hon. friends on the Government side who do not hold that view. I respect their opinion; but I believe, that in these questions of great public utilities, in the end, even with all the defects that public ownership may have, from public ownership the greatest good will come to the greatest number of people, and that is the only basis upon which these things should be considered. But even if it should turn out in the future that we are not pursuing a wise course in respect to public ownership of these roads, I point out to my hon. friends in the Government that, for pure business reasons alone, the only thing to do is to handle this proposition as a business proposition, to do what private capital or management would do under similar circumstances, namely, to co-ordinate those roads absolutely and entirely as regards management. Build your system into one complete whole, and then, no matter what disposition you may desire to make of it in the future, you have an asset that is worth while. Our Government railways, with all that has been said about and against them, are potentially a good asset for this country, and why? What is the cardinal defect of our railway system to-day? It is that this country is overbuilt with railways. I am not going to apportion the blame for that. I would say that the blame rests, perhaps, on governments of the past, and it rests, perhaps equally on the people of this country, because any programme of lavish expenditure of public money always commanded public support, and was a strong temptation to any party in power to embark upon and engage in it. But while that is true, these roads must and should be handled as a business proposition. How has it come about that the public have these roads to-day? We have them for one reason and one reason only: private ownership and operation absolutely broke down. Public ownership of railways in this country was not the deliberate choice of the people; it was forced upon us because of the collapse of private ownership and operation; and I am well within the judgment of the House when I make that statement. There are those who would like to see our National Railway system broken up. I see articles in the newspapers which force upon me the conclusion that there is in progress in this country to-day an active propaganda against the National railways. The solution of the question will never be found in that direction. I submit that these roads must have a fair and full trial, and I am glad to know that it is the intention of the Government to give them that trial; and so far as their efforts go in that direction I can assure them that we in the Progressive section of the House will give the Government our support in their endeavours in this respect. If I may for a moment play the part of a candid friend, I may say to the Prime Minister, whom I wish well in the high office he occupies, that there is perhaps no question to-day upon which there is greater doubt in the public mind than that which respects the probable course of the Government in regard to the railways, and I say to the hon. gentlemen that if his course is fixed, clear, and unequivocal along the lines I have indicated, he will do a great deal to relieve the anxiety that exists in Canada at the present time. An inquiry is referred to. We have no information, either in the Speech from the Throne or from the Prime Minister, as to what is involved in that inquiry, and we shall await the Government's proposals in that respect before offering further criticism thereon.

I desire for a moment to refer to another important matter mentioned in the Speech, and that is the question of immigration. I am very glad to know that the Government are alive to this important subject. I cannot agree with the optimistic view expressed by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) as to the results of the last census. I think that the last census figures are disappointing, and I propose to give to the House very briefly some information on this matter. Our present population, according to the census figures, is slightly over 8,750,000 people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The population is 8,774,000.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, 20,000 more; I I thought it was exactly 8,764,000; however, I stand corrected. Our population at present, then, is 8,774,000. The population in 1911, according to the official census was 7,206,000. Now we have taken into Canada, through the gates of immigration during the last decade, 1,812,000. We have also had a natural increase, in excess of births over deaths, during the same period, of 1,140,000. Our population on this basis of the figures of 1911, supplemented by immigration secured, and natural increase during the period, should be 10,158,000. We shall allow for a very considerable wastage during the war. We know that we had heavy losses during that time, but I think that 158,000 would cover the wastage that occurred in connection with the war. So that on a fair basis, if we had held our people in Canada, we should have to-day a population of at least 10,000,000 souls in this Dominion. But the figures show that we have slightly in excess of 8,750,000; in other words, there are well over one million people who have gone somewhere and whom we should have in Canada. Is that a serious condition of affairs, or is it not? I think it is. What is the use of our spending millions a year in promoting immigration to Canada when we are losing the people almost as fast as we can bring them to our doors? Some of my critics may say that immigration declined during the war, and that that fact accounts for the poor showing that the country has made in its last census. An examination of the official figures, however, discloses the fact that from 1901 to 1911 the total immigrants received into Canada numbered 1,764,000. During that period there was an increase of 34 per cent in the population. In the last decade we had an increase of only 21 per cent in the population. But during the last ten years we have received in immigration 1,812,000, or roughly speaking, 50,000 more in immigration than in the previous ten years. It is obvious, therefore, that this disappointment in our population is not due to a decline in immigration, because the immigration figures for the past ten years are in excess of those of the previous decade. This question is one which, I suggest, might well engage the attention of the Government. Why are people leaving Canada? People usually do not leave a country in which they are prosperous and happy, and I say that this question might very well engage the consideration of my hon. friends from the Maritime Provinces. There is one of those provinces that shows an actual decline in population in the last ten years. It is a rather curious fact that the little province of Prince Edward Island showed a steady increase in population until the national policy was introduced into Canada in 1878, but, in every decade, from 1880 up to the present day, that province has shown a loss in population. I trust that this whole question will receive the serious attention of the Government, and I hope that my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart), who I understand has now charge of the immigration work, will be able, when he submits his estimates to the House, to lay before us concrete suggestions on the part of the Government as to how this difficulty can be overcome and how immigration of desirable settlers, who will go on the land and stay there after they come into Canada, can be best promoted. The relation of population to other problems is quite apparent. I spoke a moment ago about our railways. If we had double the population we have in Canada we should have no railway problem to-day. What our railways lack is business, and business can come only through an increase in population. It is therefore a matter for concern when population does not increase as rapidly as it should. Take, again, the great burden of the debt, in taxation, that rests upon the country. I need not give to the House the amount of the total debt of Canada; but it is obvious, even to a third form school boy, that if your population increases the per capita amount of the debt declines and, consequently, the per capita taxation upon the citizens is lessened. In view of these facts, therefore, the question of how our immigration can be increased and how the country can be settled is one of first rate importance from every point of view. I desire to make my position clear in that respect. We have sufficient people in our towns and cities to-day. What Canada needs is not artisans, or workmen, but a sturdy rural population. We need immigrants to go on the land, people who, as I said a moment ago, will stay there permanently when they do come into the country.

I notice also in the Speech from the Throne a reference to soldiers' re-establishment. We shall await with interest the proposals of the Government in that respect. I trust that the Government will be generous in the treatment of the disabled men; it is an obligation of honour resting upon the Canadian people and upon this Parliament, and it is an obligation which, I am sure, will be fully discharged.

Reference is also made to the the fact that the treaties passed at the Washington Conference will be submitted to the House for approval. We shall await the submission of those treaties. I am glad to note that Canada was represented at the Washington Conference. I would make the suggestion to the Government, though some members of it may not agree with my view in this respect, that they might very well carry out the understanding that was reached a few years ago with the British Government by appointing a Canadian Ambassador to Washington. I have no criticism to offer of the British Embassy, but I do believe that these two great countries lying alongside each other for nearly four thousand miles have more interests in common with each other than they have, perhaps, with any other countries in the world in matters of business and trade. If we had a representative at Washington who could represent the Canadian viewpoint I am quite sure that great good would come to this Dominion.

I note also that Canada is to send a representative to the Genoa Conference, and I have seen reports in the press with regard to the appointments made in that respect. I would express my regret that the Government have appointed as one of the Commissioners to the Genoa Conference, Sir Charles Gordon. I have nothing against Sir Charles Gordon personally, but what is this Conference at Genoa? It is primarily an economic and financial conference; an occasion for the coming together of different countries with a view to seeing how a sick world can be made well; to see how business can be re-established between the nations. Sir Charles Gordon is well known as a high protectionist, and I feel that whatever influence he will have in that conference will be exercised along the line of maintaining those artificial barriers between nations, which, after all, in the long run are one of the greatest causes of international misunderstanding.

I wish to strongly commend the Government for the appointment they have made to the High Commissioner's office in London. I believe that Hon. Mr. Larkin will discharge admirably and well the duties of that position. He is going to a task of considerable magnitude; I hope and trust that he will justify the confidence that his friends have in him.

I do not need to impress upon the Government the necessity for economy; my hon. friend the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) at any rate is fully seized of that need. I want to offer a word of congratulation to the Finance Minister with respect to the sale of Canadian National Railway bonds that he made in New York the other day. He proceeded in the right way so far as that transaction is concerned; I think he himself can do this business just as well as turn it over to our friends the bond brokers and give them a large commission for handling it.

The financial condition of this country is serious. The people are suffering under heavy taxation. The question of how economies may be introduced into the administration of this country's business, are very pressing questions indeed. I may say in passing that I hope the Government will not accede to the request made by the manufacturers, who recently waited upon them, that additional revenue should be raised by an increase in the sales tax. My hon. friends opposite—some of them at any rate—know what an antediluvian theory the sales tax really is, and I trust the Government will not increase it. Indeed, I hope they may be able to reduce the existing one—and why? Because the sales tax bears most heavily upon the persons least able to pay. The workingman in the city with a family of six or eight children and a small income is taxed on practically everything he buys for his family—there are a few exceptions; but in the matter of clothing and a great many of the actual necessaries of life he is taxed through the operation of the sales tax. I do trust that among the proposals which will be submitted by the Finance Minister to the House for the raising of additional revenue, the sales tax will not be included.

There is one other suggestion I would make to the Government; it was one that I made to my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition when he was at the head of the late administration. It is this: that a conference of the leading municipal and provincial authorities and proper officials of the Federal Government be held to inquire into the whole question of taxation. What do we find to-day? We find overlapping of taxes in various provinces and, indeed, in the municipalities as well. For instance, I understand that the citizens of a certain city pay an income tax to the city, an income tax to the province, and an income tax to the federal treasury. Some way might be found of adjusting those differences. If such a conference is called it should be preceded by a thorough study of the question so that when the members of the conference come together the Government will be able to place before them full and accurate information in respect to the whole question of taxation in this Dominion. I have been told—I do not know how true it is, but I think it is well within the mark—that the Canadian people are paying annually in taxes of all kinds, municipal, provincial and federal, close to one thousand million dollars a year. If that is true, I can conceive that a conference such as I suggest might be productive of very good results in delimiting the fields of taxation, in reaching an understanding as to where expenditures should be embarked upon; indeed, in promoting a sane financial policy for the whole country founded on its needs. That practice was followed during the dark days of the war when Sir Thomas White, then Finance Minister, developed to a certain degree a co-ordinated financial policy for the provinces and the Federal Government. I trust that this suggestion, which I offer in the desire to be of some real help, will be given consideration by my hon. friend the Prime Minister and by the members of the Government.

There are a few omissions from the Speech from the Throne. I find in it no reference to the question of redistribution. Redistribution should be dealt with at this session. I know that from the very nature of things, members of the Government have yet to become fully acquainted with their respective departments and they may desire to pass this matter over to another session. It is unlikely that an election will be held before another session, but in any case I think it would be well before this session closes to pass a measure of redistribution, and I am sure that the Government, when they come to a consideration of the question, will desire to have that redistribution fixed upon lines that are fair and just to all. After all, Western Canada has suffered more in this respect than other portions of the Dominion. I would point out to the House that an election followed the census of 1911, before the census figures were available for redistribution purposes, and the same thing has happened in respect of the last census. On a redistribution Western Canada would increase its representation by ten or twelve. Some of my hon. friends opposite and some of my hon. friends to my right may think that my suggestion is not altogether without self-interest: had we had a redistribution before the last election, why, we would have had ten or twelve more sturdy Progressives from Western Canada on this side of the House.

There is also the question of proportional representation. The last election disclosed more clearly, I think, than anything else could have done the need for this reform in our electoral machinery. What does it mean? It is simply a method for securing a more correct and exact registration of the people's will in their representation in Parliament; that is all proportional representation is. What do we find as a result of the last election? We find the party to my right without any representation from six provinces in this Dominion and yet the election figures show that there were a great many people—all misguided, I think—who supported the candidates of the leader of the Opposition. These people should have some means of expressing their will in this House. The same is true in respect to the Progressives and in respect to the party supporting the Government. The Government would not have a great deal of difficulty in counting their supporters from the Prairie Provinces in this House, and yet the support the Government did receive in the Prairie Provinces does not adequately reflect the vote the Government policies received in those provinces. I am quite aware that had the last election been conducted on the system of proportional representation, there probably would not be as many Progressive supporters in this House as there are to-day. But I am not so much concerned about that as I am with this fact, that this House should be as nearly as possible a correct and exact expression of the will and wishes of the people of Canada. There is another argument in favour of proportional representation. My hon. friend the Prime Minister pointed out yesterday that a good many of the supporters who sit behind my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition were elected by minority votes. I think that if my hon. friend the Prime Minister examines the election figures, he will find that quite a considerable number of those who sit on his own side of the House were elected in the same way. I am putting this forward simply as an illustration of the need for this reform, and I trust that the Government will see its way clear to give favourable consideration to enacting a measure of proportional representation. Such a measure should apply in my judgment to the large cities of Canada, all those cities that elect two or more members. I should also like to see the principle of the transferable vote applied to single-member constituencies. With these reforms we shall get as exact a reflection of the will of the people of this country in this Parliament as it is possible to secure, and such a reform is particularly needed in Canada. This country has serious dangers to face. Any one who knows anything of the history of Canada or has had any experience of government in this country knows that Canada is a difficult country to govern; it is difficult to govern because of the different elements in its population, and because of the vastness of its territory. There is always the danger of sectional differences, of racial differences, and even of religious difficulties arising. These dangers would be minimized if we had an electoral system in this country whereby this Parliament would become an exact reflection of the people's will, and I trust that on that ground the Government will see fit to give favourable consideration to the enactment of this reform.

There were one or two other matters that I was going to touch upon, but they will wait; we shall have a further opportunity in this House of discussing many other matters of importance.

I re-echo fully the hope expressed by my hon. friend the Prime Minister yesterday that this country might become united, contented, and happy. I know of no greater ideal to strive for, but if this country is to become united, contented, and happy, its laws must be founded on justice; there must be fairness in administration to all, with special privilege to none; there must be equality for all. If we shape our course along these lines I am confident of Canada's future. We have a great country, great in its possibilities, great in the virility, energy and capacity of its people, and those of us who are labouring in this Parliament to-day have an opportunity to lay the foundations of our laws and their administration in a manner, that will be worthy of our country and promote its welfare and advancement.

Mr. WILLIS KEITH BALDWIN (Stanstead): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House I first wish to congratulate the constituency of North Winnipeg on electing the capable young man they have sent to this House (Mr. McMurray). I am sure that we all enjoyed his lucid and eloquent speech. Those of us who had any forebodings respecting the seconder of the Address, the hon. member for Westmount-St. Henri (Mr. Mercier), must have been entirely reassured by his speech yesterday. We need have no fears for the future of his political life. His speech, too, was most eloquent.

I also wish to join with those who have congratulated the new lady member of this House, the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). I have been looking up her life and I find that she comes from the land like myself. I was born in the backwoods, and I still live there, and I am happy. It is the people who live in the backwoods who have a chance to develop a sound and discriminating judgment. We can feed our minds on the best of literature. I would warn my hon. friend from Southeast Grey not to be over-anxious to get into the world of fashion and fickleness.

I also wish to congratulate the hon. member who has just preceded me (Mr. Crerar). I take very little exception to anything that he said. He mentioned that the Finance Minister had gone to New York in connection with some financial matters. Now, I have always been opposed to procrastination. I can only say that it might not have been necessary for the Finance Minister to go to New York to raise a loan if the income tax had been collected by the late government from the Riordon Company, the Cockshutt Plow Company, the Canada Steel Company, and a multitude of other concerns who gave notes running close up to a hundred million dollars. I cannot speak exactly as to the figures, but these are plain and everyday facts.

The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) in his political decrepitude bewailed his position. I half expected him to shed tears over the position in which he has been placed, but he soon regained his old ardour, and yesterday he attacked the big men of this House, and their cohorts, although that word does not appear in Hansard. He attacked the Prime Minister; he attacked the ex-Premier of the province of Quebec, probably the most outstanding ex-Provincial Premier in Canada. He also attacked the ex-Provincial Treasurer of the province of Quebec, now the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Mitchell) in this House. Why, the present Provincial Treasurer of the province of Quebec is about to call in the whole bonded indebtedness of that province. By the wisdom of these hon. gentlemen, my hon. friend (Sir Lomer Gouin) who led the Liberal party in Quebec for so many years and my hon. friend (Mr. Mitchell) who was such a skilful and successful Provincial Treasurer, that province has attained to its present extremely prosperous and sound financial position. These are the gentlemen, who have won such laurels in the administration of public affairs, at whom the leader of the Opposition sneered. He has told us that the Liberal party had no policy in the late campaign. What kind of a policy did he have? A most beautiful one. He went up and down the country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific shouting for protection. Why did he confine his policy of protection to the tariff when the people of the country were calling for relief from the maladministration that was going on under my right hon. friend? What the country needed was not tariff protection but protection from poverty and despair. The record of the last ten years of administration, when my right hon. friend and his predecessor, Sir Robert Borden, were in power presents a terrible indictment. During the war the country was promised that selective conscription would be carried out but notwithstanding that pledge the Government later on came and took every man of from 19 to 22 years of age off the farm. In Stanstead county during the 1917 campaign the Borden candidate was questioned by the electors as to whether selective conscription would be carried out. He declared that he had the word of Sir Robert Borden to that effect. But what happened? On every farm of forty acres one son was taken, on every eighty acre farm two sons were conscripted, and where there was an acreage of three times forty three sons had to don the uniform. No wonder the indignant farmers of the country stormed the capital by the hundred—it was even said by the thousand—in order to try and bring Sir Robert Borden to time. Was there any need to remind the House of the unsavoury story of the overseas Canadian officer from Ontario who was promised high promotion if he could secure so many thousand soldier votes overseas for the Dominion Government? That officer carried out his task, stole 128,000 votes and was made a Brigadier General and thereupon the nauseating facts were made public.

It is perhaps not quite correct to state that the late Government had no other policy than protection. They had another plank in their platform and that was "Where was Mackenzie King during the war?" I can tell my right hon. friend where that distinguished young Canadian was. The Rockefeller foundation searched the world to obtain the best men to carry out their laudable philanthropic objects, behind which there was a fund of $200,000,000. They made a choice of Hon. Mackenzie King and sent hime to Colorado and elsewhere to settle strikes. The investigations made by Mr. King had brought millions of dollars to Canada for scientific research. The choice of Mr. King by the Rockefeller foundation was probably the greatest compliment that has ever been bestowed upon a young Canadian. But where was Arthur Meighen during the war?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I must ask my hon. friend to refer to the hon. member in the third person.

Mr. BALDWIN: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker, for the oversight. The right hon. leader of the Opposition received his answer when he appealed to the people. Instead of a following of something like 125 members his supporters now number barely 50. During the election the right hon. gentleman's cohorts went to the province of Quebec telling the people that they would have empty dinner pails if they voted against the Meighen Government. In my own county are two or three of the largest industries in the Dominion. Representatives of these industries went about telling the working men that if they did not vote for the Meighen Government those industries would be closed down. The Dominion Textile Company is one of the industries in question, and although I do not think the management of that company meddles in politics, certain emissaries went up and down making all sorts of predictions as to what would happen unless the working classes voted right. The Union Twist Drill Company is another concern with a capitalization of three million dollars. The day before the election notice was posted up on its premises that the factory would close close down if the employees did not vote for the Meighen Government. In Compton County, the night before the election, seventeen of the local returning officers were dismissed and replaced by men from Montreal and other points and as a result of their nefarious work 1,500 ballots were destroyed. These are some of the means by which support was sought for the Meighen Government. The right hon. leader of the Opposition and the late Minister of Marine, Mr. Ballantyne, toured the Eastern Townships but their efforts were not very successful. The Meighen candidate in Stanstead lost his deposit by more than 700 votes and I want to tell my right hon. friend that had he been the candidate he would have suffered a similar defeat. Neither the high protection talk nor the scandal that was sought to be disseminated had any influence against the Liberals in the province of Quebec. Although the leader of the Opposition has sneered at the Premier's following from that province I beg to assure him that in admitting the ex-Premier and the ex-Treasurer of Quebec to the Cabinet he has chosen men of eminence who will be of great assistance to the Government and the country. I want to tell the hon. gentleman, the minister sitting at the right of the Prime Minister, that there is one thing firmly established in this country, and that is the great Liberal party. Liberalism means just what it says. It means charity, a willingness to rely on the people and the people's judgment, to obey the will of the country. It does things with an eye to the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of God. It does business with an eye to the poor and the oppressed. It has a kindly feeling for the poor people. It has an eye to the great agriculturalists of whom the leader of the Agrarians (Mr. Crerar) has spoken. The right hon. leader of the Opposition and his party likened the Agrarians to Bolshevists, and I take umbrage at the accusation. I may say that I have worked fifteen hours a day and thrived on it, and I think any man who endeavours to injure the toiler of the land is making a great mistake. I want to tell the leader of the Opposition that he will never lead the government of Canada again unless he disassociates himself from the autocrats, the plutocrats, the stiff-necked chest-padded militarists of the country, who wish to domineer and dominate everything and to separate themselves from the tillers of the soil. The people trusted the former government too long, and I may tell you that you cannot force people into doing things. The former government, while not characterized as kaiserism, was indeed kaiserism, without any mistake. The leader of the Opposition has come into this House. Having been defeated in his own constituency, he was enabled to come here by a charitable act, a gentleman being persuaded to retire in his favour, and I suppose he gave him a good figure for it. We know that he is getting in his position a good sum of money, and when he comes here he has to assail somebody, but when he assails such men as he did yesterday, he is not winning any votes. He is not intimidating the people who are in the Government now because we are proud of them and the country is proud of them.

I assure him that we have many things to do in this country without fighting each other. We have great potential wealth, and we have a vast country. Let us talk in this House as we would like it to appear in Hansard in future generations. The leader of the Agrarian party was provoked to say in the last days of the last parliament, that the leader of the then government was a vendor of cheap political vaudeville. Likewise the hon. member for Russell and now Postmaster General (Mr. Murphy) characterized him as the sluggoo of the Borden government. This young man no doubt has aspirations and I can see that he has reason. Eight or ten years ago, when people came to Ottawa they returned to their homes and said that the whole brains of the government was in Robert Rogers. I think that was humiliating to a young man who was cultured and able and would make a good critic in this House. He was jealous of the superior brain power that had been attributed to Rogers as compared with that of his fellow members of the Conservative party. We know that Mr. Rogers was the champion of Sir Robert Borden when he went overseas, and came back to put through the Conscription Bill. Mr. Rogers said "We must get something to win the election, and conscription may do it". They were out not to win the war, but to win the election, and it cost the country a vast amount of money to put that machinery into force.

I would not want to talk on the lines of the leader of the Opposition. We have a great country; we want the members of this House to deal with affairs in a businesslike way and we do not want the time of this House wasted on other matters. I would not have spoken except for the accusation of being one of the cohorts and I am sure there are other members in the House in the same position. I am proud to be a follower of the leader of the Government. They are kindly hearted gentlemen who can smile and smile for humanity's sake. They feel for the people and their hearts beat for the poor and the oppressed. They feel for the masses of this country. They do not believe in doing things by might but wish to do things by right.

I will not take up more time in this House but I recommend the leader of the Opposition to take the Decalogue and the Sermon on the Mount as a chart and compass for his future life.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York): Mr. Speaker, I want to be as brief as I possibly can in addressing the House, and to that end I have taken the liberty of taking a seat in the middle of the House so that I can be heard by hon. gentlemen opposite and by hon. gentlemen on either side of me, because I want to follow the example of the hon. leader of the Progressives in the House (Mr. Crerar), and devote myself to at least one of the most important questions now before the people of Canada. So determined am I to devote my time to the discussion of this question that I must forego the example set by the hon. gentlemen who preceded me, leave it to others to pay the compliments which have been paid to yourself and to hon. gentlemen who have spoken and give my time to the question that I propose to bring before you. I have every appreciation of the honour that has been done to you. I have every appreciation of the speeches of the mover and seconder. I am glad to see the lady member in the House. I shall pass other compliments, and come directly to the railway question to which the leader of Progressives devoted most of his time.

I come here, not for the first time, as one who is an absolute believer in public ownership of public utilities. I have been connected with that movement in regard to municipal and provincial affairs, and in regard to the railways and other public utilities of the country. I come from a city which to-day has the finest example of public ownership of a public utility in the street railway system of Toronto, run by the Transportation Commission appointed by the people to run the people's own road for the benefit of the people. It embodies the essential principle of public ownership, namely, that once the people own a utility, they are free to do with it what they like, whenever they like, even if their action sometimes involves, as it did recently, an increase in fares. Toronto to-day has the finest street car service in America—I say that after careful consideration—and while at present we have a seven-cent fare, the street railway is doing so well and is accumulating such reserves that the fare will soon be five cents and later on four cents, and, I think we may yet come back to the "eight tickets for a quarter."

We have something else to show in Ontario in the nature of a public utility owned by the people, and that is the magnificent hydro-electrical development, best exemplified by its most recent instance, that of the Chippewa hydro-electrical development in connection with the Niagara river. Sir Adam Beck has been attacked; but he has made good; he is delivering the power, and the greatest electrical development in the world to-day is owned by the people of Ontario at this new power plant on the Niagara river. Only the first generator has been started; but another will be started tomorrow and each of them will deliver 55,000 h.p. The development of power may reach as much as 600,000 h.p.; it may reach 1,000,000 h.p., and the income from that may be from five to ten million dollars. This development has not had an opportunity yet to show what can be accomplished; but it has been very severely criticised, and Sir Adam Beck has been held up to the people of Canada, even by the United Farmers' Government of Ontario, as one who has been rather loose in his estimates of the cost of establishing this hydro-electric plant. I just want to ask my friend Mr. Drury, Premier of Ontario—and I have a great deal of respect for him—when he speaks about Sir Adam Beck exceeding his estimates, what about his own treasurer and the financial statement which he has brought down to the Legislative Assembly? I want to ask my friends here from the West—and I have a great deal of sympathy with their ideas, as I will show later on—what about the good roads that have been built in Ontario by the Hon. Mr. Biggs? He was to give us the cheapest and best kind of good roads throughout Ontario and to keep well within his estimates. We thought we were going to get roads for at most $2,000, or $3,000, a mile, some for $10,000 and, perhaps, a few at $20,000 a mile, but some of them have cost nearly $100,000 a mile. When criticism is being made in Ontario in regard to Sir Adam Beck's estimates for the construction of the hydro-electric plant, that criticism, if it is to be fair, must be common to all the public men of Ontario. Therefore, I say here to-day that I am proud of Sir Adam Beck and what he has done in the direction of public ownership. He has given to all the world the greatest example of the production of electrical power for the welfare of the people, the sole idea being service and not profit.

The great difference between public ownership and private ownership is that in public ownership—and this applies to railways which is the main question that I am going to discuss to-day—the principal object in view on the part of the men administering the public utility, after paying necessary interest, is service and not profits. Heretofore the great object of the executive administering a public utility has been profits for the owners and the stockholders; but the idea in public ownership, as illustrated by Sir Adam Beck, is service at a low cost. Notwithstanding the criticism that has come from Montreal about Sir Adam Beck's proposition and his public power distribution, we have the cheapest and best service of that kind in Canada. There is nothing to equal it. I see by recent legislation that the consolidation of the power interests in Montreal is to furnish 300,000 h.p., but we in Ontario—and mainly by the leadership of the municipalities by Sir Adam Beck—will soon have over 1,000,000 h.p., and we are going to put that electrical energy into the home of every farmer in Ontario. That is what we have in view; we are working it out, and there is fair support coming from the Legislature in that direction.

Therefore, public ownership of public utilities is nothing new to us in Ontario; we are succeeding in it, and we believe in that public ownership being extended to the railway systems of Canada. We do so for several reasons, one being that we have come into possession of all these so-called bankrupt railways, because of bad administration by the companies that had them and also probably because the country was overbuilt with railways. Now that we are in possession of them, we propose to try public ownership of these publicly-owned railways in the interest of the people and outside of the question of dividends for the shareholders who formerly owned them. We came into possession of these railways, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific, because they were not very well administered by those who had control of them. Why did the Grand Trunk fail? It failed because, while it was owned largely in Great Britain, it was administered in London. You cannot run a Canadian railway from London; it must be administered in this country. The Grand Trunk would have been a success ten, twenty years ago, if it had been administered absolutely in Canada; but it was run from London and run by directors whose main object, so far as I can gather—and I have followed my investigations rather deeply—was to play the London stock market in Grand Trunk securities. That is one reason why the Grand Trunk has failed. The Grand Trunk, to my mind, is one of the greatest railway assets in America—and I speak after careful consideration—and it is the greatest railway asset in Canada. When you look at the strategic positions that the Grand Trunk has in this country, at Montreal, at Ottawa, along the St. Lawrence, at Toronto, London, Detroit, along the Niagara river and throughout the province of Ontario, and when you consider all the branch lines connected with it, it must be admitted it is the greatest railway asset in America.

It is undoubtedly the best road we have in Canada, and all it requires is good management. With a proper Canadian directorate it would prove a wonderful success, and it is just because it is likely to be a great success that we find the Canadian Pacific, with its headquarters in Montreal, endeavouring to head it off. I think I can see the hand of the Canadian Pacific, and that of its close associate, the Bank of Montreal, joined together in an effort to thwart the Grand Trunk, which is a real rival. What is the source of the inspiration of all this talk that we see in the Montreal papers and in some of the papers in the province of Ontario? This agitation does not come from the people or from the men who work on the roads; nor does it originate with the people who use the railways. No, it comes largely from the city of Montreal, whose newspapers seem to talk of nothing else but the Canadian Pacific railway. I have nothing to say against that railway; it is the one Canadian railway that has been a success. But it has one peculiar clause in its charter, whereby the company is bound to maintain a railway service forever. That obligation has never been imposed on any other road, but it has been imposed on the Canadian Pacific railway for a purpose, and that is, that the public shall always be assured of a service of some kind. The Canadian Pacific Railway is the creature of this Parliament and of the people of Canada. We have created it and given it the charter it holds, involving great powers. We gave it some $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 at the start, in addition to some 25,000,000 acres of land, and it has had all kinds of friendly legislation put through this House in its behalf. Altogether it has been well treated not only by Parliament but as well, by the municipalities throughout the country.

This railway, on which is imposed the responsibility of providing the people of Canada with a service for all time, now turns against Parliament, its creator, and against the people of the country, and says: "Don't you dare to start national railways in this country or we will destroy you." That is the attitude of the Canadian Pacific railway and its friends in Montreal. They simply defy the people of Canada who created them, and warn us that we shall embark on public ownership of railways in this country only at our own peril. They tell us that public ownership is bad for the country, and that if we do not abandon the idea we shall suffer. Talking about the Canadian Pacific railway and the question of public ownership, and in connection with the references that have been made to Sir Adam Beck, there is not a radial proposition that Sir Adam Beck has started which has not been denounced by these enemies of his, and yet which would not be taken over to-morrow by President Beatty of the Canadian Pacific railway. That gentleman knows all about them, and he would take over every radial and be glad to go to Sir Adam Beck for his power. And he will soon have to do so, because it will be necessary to have power to run the Canadian Pacific railway, and we shall have enough power in Ontario to operate every railway train from Detroit down to Ottawa. We shall soon have that power to sell outside the country, and I hope that Quebec will have a large share. That aside, however, I want to come back to the subject with which I was dealing a moment ago.

The Canadian Pacific railway, created by the Parliament and the people of Canada, now tells us, in the country and in this House, that we must not embark on public ownership of the railways that we have. If we heed that command, what will ensue? Let me point out to the Prime Minister that if we allow the Canadian Pacific railway to put the Canadian National railway out of business, if we stand by and let Montreal dictate to us in this matter, we shall have created the greatest political tyranny that ever existed in any country, because the Canadian Pacific railway hopes to have every road in Canada, and the Montreal Gazette already informs us that we cannot run the Canadian National railways and therefore urges us to turn them over to the Canadian Pacific. What would happen if the Canadian Pacific railway got the National railway? Could any one of us remain in politics? Would any man have a chance of getting into this House, into any provincial legislature, or into any municipal council, with the Canadian Pacific railway owning all the railroads of the country—the great political boss of the country being in Montreal, with a subordinate boss in every town and village acting as local agent of the Canadian Pacific railway? Why, Sir, political independence would cease in this country if we created such a tyranny. Yet that is the object of this great movement against public ownership of our railways.

And how is the tyranny entrenched, so far as it has gone? It has been entrenched, so far, by a marvellous device known as the "Voting Trust." I do not know whether hon. gentlemen know what a voting trust is, but I have some idea of what it signifies, and as a splendid example I might mention a well-known mine in Ontario, of which sixty to seventy per cent is controlled by certain relatives. This property has been entailed, so that this mine in the future may never be interfered with, no matter what may befall the families that owned it originally. That, perhaps, is fairly within their rights; but when you entail the administration of a railway that has the political ambitions of the Canadian Pacific railway, with its railway monopoly, and an arrangement whereby only two of their board retire each year, there being a concentration of shareholders on the election of these two, I say you are entrenching a tyranny. The object of these men now established in the control of the Canadian Pacific railway is to retain that control, get possession of the other railways, and thereby become the great and only political boss of transportation in the country, and, incidentally, of the people's legislation as well.

Now, I appeal to hon. gentlemen in this House, whether opposite or on either side of me: are we, the people's representatives in Parliament, to assist the Canadian Pacific railway in acquiring all the railways of the country, simply because they warn us that, if we dare to administer our own roads, which have come into our hands as a result of the failures of those who had charge of them, we shall be put out of business? These railways that we have were forced upon us, and enormous sums of the people's money have been put into them. Is it fair that this creature of the Canadian Parliament should take that position, which I am led to believe they have already taken?

I am not antagonistic to the Canadian Pacific railway. I give them credit for what they have done. The road is a well administered one, with a good executive and good equipment, and they have done a good deal for the settlement of the country. But that is their business; let them devote their attention to it. Now that we are going to run these roads as a national proposition we will ask them to co-operate with us in the work of consolidation which I trust the Government intends to embark upon. I do not wish to antagonize the Canadian Pacific. But in connection with this matter of consolidation, it is to be noted that in the city of Toronto, for instance, all the traffic that comes, say, from Chicago has to go up a one per cent grade; and the same applies to the Canadian Pacific with its Wexford grade. Now that we have public ownership it is possible to build a line across Toronto in connection with the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National railways that will reduce that grade of one per cent down to half of one per cent and by that means alone bring about a saving of hundreds of thousands of dollars a year. If the Canadian Pacific want the use of our national railways for some consideration that they will give—and I know they will give something towards it—we can give them something to help in the solution of these transportation problems; for if we have public ownership we shall be willing to work with them. We do not wish to put them out of business, but they wish to put the people of Canada out of business so far as the competition of the national railways is concerned.

I think the Canadian Pacific will be well advised, and the Bank of Montreal will be well advised if they devote their attention to working out the destinies of the Canadian Pacific railway as an entity in this country, competing with the national railways, setting a pace for the national railways, if you like. They are welcome to do that, but they are not to be allowed to achieve their ambition of taking over the Grand Trunk and the Canadian National and the Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Intercolonial. They would take these roads all into their maw, but on what terms? Will the Montreal Gazette tell us on what terms? Will any gentleman in the Government who has given some attention to the claims of the Canadian Pacific tell us on what terms? Do you think they would take them over for nothing? No; they would want also a sum at least equivalent to the deficits that these roads are now sustaining. They may say: Give us what you gave to the losing concerns and perhaps we will run these roads for you. It is true that they may now modify their offer; they want to get these roads because they think they are good business propositions. But we should keep them for ourselves and operate them for the solution of Canada's transportation problems.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): May I put a question to the hon. member? Would he be good enough to tell us whether he thinks the Canadian National railways have been well operated during the last two or three years?

Mr. MACLEAN: They have not had a chance; that is the whole question.

Mr. MACDONALD: Will my hon. friend permit me a further question?

Mr. MACLEAN: Certainly.

Mr. MACDONALD: I asked my hon. friend the simple question whether he thinks the Canadian National railways are well operated to-day. He says they have not had a chance. That is not an answer.

Mr. MACLEAN: Well, they have been fairly well operated. But they have got to have a chance; the Prime Minister himself has asked for a chance to see what he can do. I am going to judge these railways and I am going to judge—

Mr. MACDONALD: You are dodging the question.

Mr. MACLEAN: No, I am not dodging the question, but my hon. friend is trying to dodge it in the interests of his friends in Montreal.

Mr. MACDONALD: I have no friends in Montreal. I want to tell my hon. friend that my friends are in Nova Scotia—those who sent me here.

Mr. MACLEAN: Well, the hon. gentleman seems to have the right to speak, and he is trying to—

Mr. MACDONALD: You are not answering the question: you are evading it.

Mr. MACLEAN: The hon. gentleman has the floor, and he can speak for Nova Scotia. I am speaking, not for Nova Scotia, but for the people of Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD: Toronto.

Mr. MACLEAN: Now then, I am going to ask the Prime Minister and I am going to ask the leader of the Progressive party in this House what they mean by co-ordination. It is a very nice word; but what the leader of the Progressive party was talking about—I notice that he is not in the Chamber at the moment—was consolidation, and that is my word. Co-ordination as affecting railway lines is putting half a dozen companies together, retaining all their separate presidents and officials and separate equipment, and keeping them bucking one against the other. I do not think the leader of the Progressive party means that; in fact a little later in his remarks he said it was consolidation into one system that he was thinking of. When the Prime Minister uses the word co-ordination, does he mean that there will be real consolidation and actual elimination of unnecessary duplications? As we have the national railways now there are several presidents, all kinds of operating chiefs, all kinds of stations everywhere, and there are a whole lot of unnecessary lines. If you want to solve the transportation problem there must be consolidation and it has got to start now. The Prime Minister intimates that as he has just come into office he wants investigation. Well, he has a first-class railway department; he has expert railway men in the service of these different companies who can give him to-morrow any advice he may require with regard to the consolidation that ought to take place. In fact, legislation has already been passed for the consolidation of these roads and can be made effective to-morrow. So that it is real consolidation I wish to see, not co-ordination in the ordinary sense of the word—and I am glad that the leader of the Progressive party does not so construe it.

Public ownership is regarded by its opponents in this country as something very bad, as something which has failed. But the real fact is—and it has been demonstrated by experience throughout the whole of this continent—that company-owned and corporation-owned railways have failed, and that is what I wish to impress upon hon. gentlemen opposite, particularly those who are members of the Government. They cannot give a single instance where corporation ownership of railroads has succeeded in the United States. That it has failed all along the line I shall prove in a few minutes by the statements of the chief enemies of public ownership of the American roads,—because they have been very busy of late. Because of the failure of company-owned railways in the United States the roads were taken over by the Federal authorities for war purposes and were given billions of national money in order that they might be put on their feet for the service of the nation. They took that money and lost it, and now they are preparing a most awful bill of charges for submission to Congress, said to be based upon losses sustained by the roads while under Government administration during the war. So that corporation-owned railways in the United States, which have been referred to by some hon. gentlemen in their arguments against public ownership, have fallen down worse than have the corporation-owned roads in Canada. They have as I shall show, more unnecessary duplication in connection with the American roads than we have in Canada.

To show how badly they have fallen down, I am going to quote briefly one or two things that come from the railways themselves. The American roads have seen for many years what was coming, and they have prepared themselves. They are thoroughly organized; they have got possession of very influential papers in the United States. The most outstanding defender of corporation-owned roads on this continent to-day is the Saturday Evening Post, published in Philadelphia. It is a paper that appeals to all classes of the public, although it is specially devoted now to an appeal to the women and to social ideas. It has a great run of advertising and mixed up with its articles on the railway situation are pictures of handsome young women in short skirts and silk stockings. There are many hosiery advertisements in the paper, but the main purpose of the Saturday Evening Post—and I say it on my full responsibility—a paper that has more influence on public opinion, or thinks it has, probably than any other paper in the United States, is to save the corporation-owned railroads of the United States from the doom that is coming to them. The corporation roads over there have failed. How do I know they have failed? The Saturday Evening Post has assigned to a very competent writer, Mr. Herbert Quick, the writing of a series of articles on "America, An Experiment in Transportation." The first article has a great deal in it, but I am going to read only two or three extracts from it. Mr. Herbert Quick, the best man they have been able to put forward in defence of the corporation-owned roads, admits that the roads have been a failure, and he says they cannot be put on their feet unless two things are done—the hundreds of comparatively small railroads they have in the United States must be consolidated into twelve systems, at the most, for purposes of economy, and it will require, so he says, at least four billions of the money of the people of the United States to be placed immediately at the disposal of these companies that have failed over there. That is rather an astounding thing to come in a discussion of this kind when we are warned as a people to beware of state-owned roads. It shows what a mess the corporation-owned roads in the United States have made of themselves.

Mr. CHURCH: Why did it take so long to co-ordinate the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific with the National Railways? The Drayton-Acworth Report recommended that nearly four years ago.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I could co-ordinate them to-morrow successfully. There are lots of railway men in this country who could do it. The question is how slow the process is to be, whether there is to be acceleration or whether there is to be great delay, and while you are delaying you are giving the Canadian Pacific Railway a chance to lay all its plans for the bedevilment of the thing when it comes on. That is why they want co-ordination instead of consolidation.

Let me read what Mr. Herbert Quick says as to this great corporation-owned systems in the United States that are being held up to the Canadian people as an example for us to follow:

> We as a nation have wagered our very existence on it—

That is, on the success of the railways over there.

> We bet our life on the fact that an agency—

That is, the railways.

> —an agency, not one-tenth as economical as the water transport, which the human race for thousands of years had depended upon as the basis of every complex communal life....could bear the burden of all the tonnage that the multiplying population could create in the heart of a continent in a new era when human wants would grow by what they fed on.

And his finding is that the railways have failed, after having dispossessed the country of the water transportation facilities they had, that they are in an awful mess financially, that the service is bad, and that the rates are high. The whole case of the farmers of the Western United States is the same as the farmers of our West—the exorbitant railway rates of these corporation-owned roads that have failed. Mr. Quick goes on to say:

> We bet our national life on that, and we built our nation in the confident expectation that we should win.

That is by the railways.

> It was the nerviest gamble of all history. It will take a long time to tell whether or not we have won it. He who is sure that we have won is over-optimistic.

That is the opinion of the best spokesman and the most expensive spokesman they have from the newspaper point of view. He says that he is over-optimistic who thinks that the transportation system of the United States has succeeded. The United States has become a great country; they have roads from the Atlantic across the plains to the Pacific, but as this writer points out, they have destroyed inland water transport; they have put several canals out of business and after having done all that, this writer says that he is an over-optimistic man who says that the corporation-owned railways of the United States are solving the transportation problems of that country. There are dozens of other arguments in this article in the Saturday Evening Post of February 25, and in the succeeding article in the issue of March 4, in which this writer admits the whole thing. I ask hon. gentlemen who do not wish to take my word for it to read for themselves these articles by this special writer in this specially friendly newspaper to the corporation-owned railways of the United States, in which it is shown that the corporation-owned roads over there have failed to solve the transportation problems of that country.

Now I want to get away from the weeklies of the United States and to read what is said in a prominent monthly in that country, the Century Magazine. It has had a series of articles on the railway question in the United States, and in its issue for March asks the question: What is the matter with the railroads? That is a problem that has presented itself to this leading magazine. The article from which I am about to quote appears in this month's issue and can be found in the library by any hon. member who wishes to read it. Here is how the writer concludes his article:

The sole alternatives to private ownership and operation are Government ownership and operation. To the majority of Americans the very idea of a further governmental control is extremely distasteful, to put the matter mildly. To them it is a very real menace. Yet the menace cannot be avoided by merely singing a song of hate about it. It can be overcome and finally prevented only by some definite national plan or policy in regard to our roads, a simple thing in which for a number of years we have been sadly lacking. If such a plan means their radical re-organization, we must begin, and the sooner the better.

The railroads have to be reorganized in the United States in the opinion of this writer in the "Century Magazine" and, he says, the sooner they begin the better. Are we encouraged then to continue that system here in Canada, or are we not justified in trying to recover our position and to see what the State can do rather than what the private corporations can do in the way of public transportation? Just to show how serious the situation is and how much the transportation problem is involved in it, let me say that the same magazine has another article by Alleyne Ireland entitled " Democracy and the Human Equation." His article is devoted to the subject: Can we save constitutional government? Let me read a few words from what he says as to what is the case in the United States and is also probably the case in Canada:

Constitutional government is to-day menaced by a serious and world-wide dissatisfaction with the operation of existing political institutions. We are confronted not only by the various forms of protest, adopted by those who wish to destroy existing institutions of Government, but also by a growing sense of helplessness and exasperation among those who wish to preserve them. There is scarcely a country in the world in which public discontent with the inefficiency and with the extravagance of government has not reached the danger point.

The plain fact is that for more than a hundred years the constitutionalists in every country have been issuing and constantly renewing promissory notes for human betterment, and that the further renewal of these notes is becoming increasingly difficult.

Then the writer goes on to point out what a marvellous change has been effected in the general conditions of human life, and how all that was promised in these respects has been delivered. In the case of transportation no relief has been delivered, and the Constitutionalists do not know where to go, and that is one of the questions that concerns this writer. He asserts that the railway question is coming up in United States and it has to be settled. According to Mr. Herbert Quick four billions more of public money, a reduction of the systems to twelve and electrification are required. Mr. Quick is out for electrification, but he wants that electrification to be done by private interests.

Now I might rest my case there, as to the failure of corporation-owned railways in the United States, on the authority of the witnesses I have cited, but you can bring hundreds more of them together to bear out what I say in regard to corporation-owned railways—that they have failed in the United States and cannot be redeemed except by the expenditure of billions of public money. But the corporations over there do not like public ownership. They want the railroads to be given to them and compensation for their administration: "Give us more money and let us run them. We will see you are charged enough freight rates, but let us run them." Now that situation has come to the United States, and I think it has come to the people in Canada. We have the roads now. Shall we try public ownership and shall we give it a fair trial? Shall that trial, in the first instance be "a consolidation" and not this more doubtful proceeding—"a co-ordination of companies." Is that what is meant by co-ordination or does it mean consolidation? I only wish the leader of the Progressive party were here now to tell me. I did not wish to interrupt him when he was speaking but if he were here he could give us a definition of a term he was constantly using, the term "co-ordination." The really important word is "consolidation" as provided by the existing statutes of Canada and I hope developments will be in that direction.

Now I want to go another step in discussing whether corporation-owned railways in the United States have failed, and I would like to cite another witness. President Harding made a deliverance in the United States in regard to transportation in that country. If you ask me what his deliverance was, it was that we must get back to the water-ways. The railroads had not paid and they had overcharged the farmers. He had been waited on by a most important political delegation, the so-called farmers' bloc in Washington, and the President of the United States had to admit that the corporation-owned railroads had failed. They have destroyed water transportation and the improvement of the transportation problem is to get back to the rivers, back to water transportation, better still back to the introduction of sea-going vessels to the great lakes of Canada and of the United States. This involves making seaports on our lakes. Make Toronto a seaport as well as Montreal. Perhaps the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) will not like that, but President Harding says: Have seaports in Lake Ontario; have them at Toronto and at Buffalo. Have them in Lake Erie at Cleveland and at Port Stanley, and our other harbours on the north shore. Have them in Lake Huron. Have them in Lake Michigan, and make Chicago and Milwaukee seaports. It will not cost a great deal of money for we have had the finding of the International Joint Commission on it. President Harding advocates that we make ocean ports in Lake Superior so that the grain of the western States as well as the grain of the Canadian West may be loaded into seagoing vessels on those lakes. Resort to canalization if necessary, and at the same time develop water-power to take the place of coal which is owned by the greatest monopoly in America. Let the water-power be developed for the betterment of railway transportation. Now that is a pretty good witness to call against corporation-owned railways. I am citing now a recent delivery of the President of the United States, to the effect that he is in favour of developing this water power and using it for the electrification of the railways.

But there has turned up in Washington within the last two or three years a new political force, and it is turning up here in Canada now. There are 65 gentlemen in the Parliament of Canada to speak for the farmers of the Canadian West. I am glad to see them, and I hope they will speak out as their leader did to-day. I have nothing against the farmers. They have the cause of Canada in regard to transportation at heart. But what about your fellows in the United States? Do you know that the farmers in the United States, this so-called bloc, control thirty-five of the senators in that country, and any day they are asked to stand up for the farmers' interest they do so. This so-called farmers' bloc in the United States know that the great corporation-owned railways of the United States have failed. They have asked the President for relief, and they are now putting themselves on record as believing that the only relief they can give to the farmers of the United States must come through public ownership, waterways and the generation of electrical energy, to take the place of the coal monopoly in the United States.

[Mr. W. F. Maclean.]

Let me give an outstanding illustration of what transportation by sea-going vessels means compared to railways, and a wonderful illustration has come out recently in the United States. They spent millions of dollars in the development of the fisheries of Alaska, and the herring fisheries in Alaska are the equal of any in the world, but do you know what it cost to take a barrel of herring from Alaska to New York by rail? It cost $5 a barrel to take it to New York for distribution to the farmers of the United States in the eastern section where there is a large consumption of fish. A man went into a store to buy some of these fish, and inquired, "How much are they worth a barrel?" the merchant answered "So much, plus $5 for transportation." The gentleman went into another fish store, and asked the price of a barrel of herring, and was quoted a much lower figure. He said, "How can you get them so much cheaper than another dealer?" He says, "We can get all herring caught in the fisheries of Scotland delivered into New York at 50 cents a barrel." That is 50 cents a barrel as against $5 a barrel for fish sent from Alaska. Has not the President of the United States some reason for finding that corporation-owned railways have failed? Have not the farmers of the United States some reason for coming back to the waterways and government control of railways, rather than that corporation control should continue?

Now the farmers of the United States are demanding relief and our farmers here are demanding relief. I believe that the whole of the farmers, not only of Western Canada, but the farmers of Ontario, are demanding relief. We have our transportation problem. We have high traffic charges and have to meet them. If there can be an improvement by improved canalization, by generation of electrical energy in connection with the canalization and the river powers we have, why not take them over? But the province of Quebec says "Oh, you in Ontario, must not generate public power, and you must not be a party to co-operating with the United States in generating public power. You must cease doing that." But we say we do intend to generate that power as the United States are doing, and we intend to use it for the electrification of railways.

Let me speak about the electrification of railways. We have spent, I do not know how much, in the way of bringing American coal into this country to run our railways. Why not run our railways by the electrical service supplied by water-power on our Canadian rivers? In Ontario we have more than we need. The Niagara and St. Lawrence will move every train from Detroit to away below Quebec. Right here to the south of us, on the Ontario side we have the St. Lawrence river at Cornwall, with a possibility of development there near Cornwall island. About 6 or 8 or 12 years ago a very rich and influential American company called the Aluminum Company came to us in the Railway Committee, and asked us to give them a charter to take over that great water-power on the St. Lawrence near Cornwall. They pretty nearly had it, but we made opposition to it and we have it now. There is enough power in the St. Lawrence in front of us here, in the Niagara river and in the Ottawa river to run every train in Canada from the Atlantic clean up to Port Arthur, and there are wonderful powers west of Port Arthur on the Saskatchewan that can be developed. We have had fine engineers in this country who have advocated the canalization of our country from lake Superior to the foot of the Rocky mountains, and that may be one of your great reliefs in the West. You will get abundance of water-power there to move your traffic. And why do they fear—why does the Canadian Pacific Railway fear—the electrification of railways? A new instrument is put in the hands of the people, when they control the water-power and the electrical energy, and I believe that is what President Harding has in view. That is what we have in view in this country—that if the country controls the water-power that runs the railway, and if a corporation road has to buy it—and I hope the Canadian Pacific Railway will be one of those—we will be able to put the blocks to them, to use a rough term, and we will be able to make them treat the public fairly. Who owns the coal of the United States that we have had to pay such a high price for? It is owned by the railways. They control the coal supply of the United States largely, and they want to control our water-powers. This Aluminum Company, one of the greatest metal trusts in the world, was in Ottawa a few years ago, and tried to grab the water-powers on the St. Lawrence, and the Prime Minister of Quebec says "Oh, I have a great dread of the Americans coming into our country and getting hold of our water-powers. I do not want to see them get them." But I know that if the President and men like the President get some of that electrical energy generated by that water-power, it will be used fairly. I am not afraid of what he will do with these powers. He will use them fairly. But the province of Quebec says "No, we do not want the President of the United States to invade this country. We do not believe in public ownership." Still they have taken over the liquor business, and are going to pay $10,000,000 of their debt by the profits from it. Perhaps they had better try to develop the water-powers of Quebec. That province is rich in water-powers, and they have been developed to some extent there. They have established factories; they have not done much with their electrical power for the farmers, but they have done well, they have an immense store of electrical energy in Quebec, and they can use that for the control of these railway rates. With electrical energy developed from the rivers of Quebec, every railroad running from the Ottawa river down to the Maritime Provinces can be run and, perhaps, at a lower cost than with coal produced in the Maritime Provinces. If you are looking for the cheapest possible transportation and you can get it by water-power, why not have it?

It is rather an unusal thing, after hearing all that we have heard about transportation in the United States, to have someone tell this House that corporation-owned railways in the United States have failed; but they failed and corporation-owned railways in Canada have failed likewise. The railways in the United States are not publicly-owned, whereas, our national railways are, and we are going to keep them. We are going to try them out to see what relief they will give to the people of this country, and we are going to keep Sir Adam Beck where he is generating hydro-electrical power in Ontario for the benefit of the people.

I regret that the organized farmers of Ontario have started out to crucify Sir Adam Beck because he is generating tremendous quantities of electrical power in that province for the service of the people. I do not say that hon. gentlemen here take that view of the matter; but that is largely the direction in which the discussion is going in Ontario to-day, where there is a man who has surpassed the President of the United States in generating an immense quantity of water-power for purposes of transportation. I hope hon. gentlemen from the West, and especially the new western members—we have all free transportation on the railways—will some Saturday or even some Sunday visit Niagara Falls and see the Chippewa electrical development plant that Sir Adam Beck has built on the Niagara river right at the falls. They will see the greatest triumph of Canadian engineering, surpassing anything ever before achieved by any engineers in the world in the way of electrical development. The generators were made in Toronto and the work was done largely by Canadian workmen. We have that electrical development in the province of Ontario, and at the very time of its arriving and its going to make good, there is a sudden and suspicious movement developing in this country, a movement directed mainly by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, threatening us and threatening the people of Canada. If you go into the ownership of railroads for your relief, have a care; we will see after you! That is the menace in this country. Not only has there been failure in the United States and failure in Canada, and great loss of money in railroads, but we are being told in the most defiant way that we must not indulge in public ownership. Hands off! Leave it to us! We will save it! I do not think they will.

I want to take up the question of what we can do to solve the transportation problem that faces us; and if you, Mr. Speaker, will call it six o'clock, and the House will give me half an hour after recess, I will go into that matter then.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACLEAN (York) (resuming): Before the House rose at six o'clock I was about to deal with a question that has come up in this House and in the press in connection with transportation, namely, the farmers' grievance respecting marketing. This matter was referred to by the leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) this afternoon, and I desire to make it clear, if possible, or at least to throw some light on the question. Now, the farmers of Canada as well as the farmers of the United States have a substantial grievance in connection with transportation. They complain, among other things, that when they have pretty well got rid of their grain the price advances, and they want to sell at the higher rather than at the lower price. Some of the farmers here have been led to believe that the railway charges were the main cause of this loss to them. The farmer will certainly get relief from transportation charges, but he will get that relief in the way suggested by my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and that is by adopting the plan that is followed in the United States. There is a very appropriate expression current in the United States in regard to marketing, and that is the phrase "orderly marketing." Now what does that mean? It means, largely, just what we had in this country in connection with the Wheat Board, which was undoubtedly successful in its operation during the war. That board kept prices pretty well up, and all the grain was sold and the money pooled, and when the season was over the proceeds were fairly divided; and flour and milling companies who had filled their elevators when the market was low were not able to take advantage of the condition of the market, nor were the speculators in a position to do so. Some system like that, and in accordance with the plan now in effect in the way of orderly marketing in the United States, should be followed here. That orderly marketing will have to be backed in Canada, as it has been backed in the United States, by the credit of the Government. We require two things; better railway management, or, in other words, national ownership of railways; and government credit behind some system of orderly marketing of grain and live stock products.

I shall now deal with the question which I was considering before dinner, as to what the Government ought to do at the present time. They have told us that they intend to co-ordinate the railways. Now, what do they mean by co-ordination? Do they mean consolidation, and all that that signifies, as mentioned by the leader of the Progressive party? Or does co-ordination, as the Government uses the word, mean that the Canadian National system, comprising the Intercolonial, the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Grand Trunk, the Transcontinental, and other roads, is to be operated as five different systems, with five presidents, five executives, and, as in some places, like Vancouver, for instance, with two sets of stations, entailing a large expense? How does my hon. friend from Marquette construe the word "co-ordination" in this connection? When he used the word, did he mean the separate management I have just suggested, or did he mean amalgamation, with the economies resultant therefrom? This would go a long way in the direction of reducing traffic charges, which is exactly what the people want. Is that what he means?

Mr. CRERAR: Certainly, that is what I mean.

Mr MACLEAN (York): If that is also the Prime Minister's meaning I will accept it. I do not ask him to say whether or not he means that, but that is the issue before the people of Canada to-day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) gives his statement to the House he will make quite clear what is meant in this respect. In the meantime, if it will help to clear my hon. friend's mind, I may say that it is the intention of the Government to have one board of directors that will manage the entire system in a manner that will effect economies and further efficiency very much in accord with what he has in view.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I hope my hon. friend means just what he says. If not, there will be an opportunity later on to move an amendment—we have lots of opportunities to submit amendments; I have been under the impression that we were limited to one amendment in this debate, but that is not so, it is on going into Supply that we are limited to one amendment. Now, notwithstanding what any of us may say as regards the interpretation of the word "co-ordination," we have the statutes of Canada to which we may turn. Here is Chapter 13 of 1919, the Act Incorporating the Canadian National Railway Company. That Act was passed mainly on the strength of our taking over the Canadian Northern and in view of the fact that we had the Intercolonial and other Government roads, and in sections 11 and 12 it clearly sets out what the Government can do. So that it does not require any considerable inquiry to find out what ought to be done in this respect; the man who assumes the responsibility of carrying on the government of this country must be ready to act, even though he cannot obtain counsel outside. It is all very well to make inquiries, and probably the leader of the House is within his rights in making full investigation; and the last Government was quoted in that respect this afternoon in connection with the tariff; but the best way to deal with a question is to deal with it. The Greeks had a very good proverb: to the effect that to play upon the lyre or the harp you must play upon it. So, to deal with this railway question you do not have to make an inquiry so much as you have to consolidate the railways. You might make inquiries that would last until doomsday and not get anywhere. The Prime Minister has taken a responsible position in this country, just as my hon. friend from Marquette has assumed the responsibility of leading a party in this House; and I want to tell that hon. gentleman (Mr. Crerar) without being at all offensive, what I think of his position. He is the leader of a party in this House, the leader of an opposition, and apparently he has contracted himself, in a way, out of the liability of the recognized leader of the Opposition. Here is a new precedent: Parliament has for the first time recognized by statute the position of leader of the Opposition. Heretofore the leader of the Opposition had a recognized status both in British and in Canadian politics, a status defined not by legislation but by convention. At any rate, I do not like the idea of anybody in this House escaping a responsibility, especially if he is a leader of an opposition. The responsibility is on him just as it is on the Prime Minister to find out what ought to be done with regard to such questions as the consolidation of the railways of this country. I have defined my position, and I hope to get a clear statement from the Minister of Railways, when we hear from him, as to what is proposed to be done. We want more light on this thing. I sincerely hope that before this debate concludes there will be a response to our insistence upon knowing what is meant by this promise of co-ordination and what the Government intends to do with regard to the statute passed by Parliament two years ago providing for these very things. The duty of the Government is not to get behind some inquiry which they may propose to make; it is to carry out this statute or amend it so that this necessary consolidation may be effected.

Now, I am going to pass from that to a summary of what I think the Government ought to do. First, of course, they ought to consolidate the railways. The next thing they ought to do—it has never been done in this country, but if it is not done we shall find ourselves where the President of the United States has landed and where the farmers of the United States have landed—is to make the railway services complementary of the water services of the country so that the two will work together. In the United States they have practically murdered water competition; they have bought up all the steamboat lines and all the wharves; they have put the steamship lines out of business. One paper, from which I read this afternoon and which apologizes for the conditions with respect to railways, expresses regret that the boats have gone out of business. At great cost we have built up a system of government ships; the services carried on by these must be made complementary of our railway services and of our other waterway systems. We may have to establish seaports on the lakes as far up as Port Arthur, if necessary, in order to bring about a solution of this transportation problem. Some years ago, after a good deal of agitation in which I myself took some little part, the railways were compelled to reduce their freight rates, but their friends the steamship companies had effected a combine and no sooner were the railways forced to reduce their rates than the steamship lines put on a corresponding increase. To effect consolidation you must make the canals, the railway, the inland water services, and the ocean-going steamship services, complementary one of the other. If you are canalizing the rivers and improving the lakes you must let the steamships get up into lake Superior. Electrification of the railways is absolutely necessary, and must be controlled and maintained by the people as a public service. The proposal is to spend hundreds of millions upon this international waterway scheme; let us, therefore, keep it in the people's hands. We want to back up Sir Adam Beck in what he is doing in Ontario in the development of water-powers.

I want to tell my hon. friend the Prime Minister what I think his Minister of Railways ought to do, right away, toward consolidation. A reference to the time table of the Canadian National Railways will show that the different lines are all mapped therein—Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk Pacific, Transcontinental, Intercolonial and other roads. If you look at the map you will see where the Canadian Northern runs northwesterly from lower Ontario to lake Nipigon. At Long lake, which is thirty miles from the Transcontinental, the line dips down in a southwesterly direction and proceeds to Port Arthur and Fort William. Now, if the Minister really wants to effect this consolidation, this amalgamation, let him come down to the House and tell hon. gentlemen from the West that nobody is going to stop him from building this projected thirty miles and shortening the distance by one hundred miles between Manitoba and points east. Do you know that the Act to which I have referred enables the Minister of Railways of his own motion to have this thirty miles built and to improve the grades? The great feature of the Transcontinental and the Canadian Northern is the improvement effected in the grades; they are away ahead of the old Grand Trunk and of the Canadian Pacific.

I wish just here to make some further reference to a point I mentioned this afternoon with regard to grades. Toronto is a great railway centre. A large part of the traffic of the Grand Trunk originates in Chicago and must pass through Toronto, and it all has to go over a one per cent grade from Scarborough. The same applies to the Canadian Pacific. The Minister of Railways has engineers available who have made surveys; their draughtsmen have plans for the changing of that one per cent grade in Toronto, of the Canadian Pacific as well as of the Grand Trunk, to a half per cent grade. I was speaking the other day to Mr. McGuigan, who is an authority on Grand Trunk affairs, and he said: If we had that reduction of grade, as I told the late Mr. Hays, we would do with one engine and two men what now requires eight engines and sixteen men. Now that can be effected in the city of Toronto. And if the Minister of Railways cannot get the information in his department, and cares to ask me, I think I can show him how effective that one thing would be in helping to solve the transportation difficulties of this country. My proposal would be a temporary one, just for the time being, but it could be put in operation within eight weeks. There are four miles of a double track in a level country, but there is a long wooden trestle to be built, at no great cost, and if this were built it would effect a saving that would mean hundreds of thousands of dollars in the reduction of freight rates on traffic that goes through Toronto alone. There are cases like that all over the country. As the Century Magazine said, you have two stations in Vancouver, and another one for an American road, when half a station would be enough for all the railroad business of that territory. Think of it!—three railway stations and three equipments to do the railway business of Vancouver. This American magazine, after speaking of this Vancouver duplication, says, "Do not think we have not got any duplication in the United States," and then it goes on to speak of duplication in the city of Spokane and all over the United States. We have duplication all over this country that makes you sick when you see it; we have station after station duplicated, at great expense, and line after line that could be cut out or a substitute put in that would give better service for half the money. Economies can be effected all over. Are these economies to be effected by hon. gentlemen opposite? —and I ask that with all respect. They have been the apostles of economy in this country. Let me tell them a story about an election speech down in Glengarry. There was a candidate there, Mr. Rory McLennan—I remember when he sat in this House. A lawyer got up to make a speech for Rory. He said, "We have a fine candidate in Mr. Rory McLennan. We all think a lot of him. There is not one of us would not take off his coat and fight for him." A Highland Scotchman in the audience, hearing that, ran down the aisle and taking off his coat shouted, "Here, Mister, now's your chance." I say to hon. gentlemen opposite, "Now's your chance." If you want to effect economies you can build this cut-off of thirty miles at Long lake, and the little cut-off I have spoken of at Toronto, as a start. I hope we shall hear from the Minister of Railways about these matters when he rises to speak, but in the meantime I say, now is the time to consolidate the railways. And not the railways only, for remember we have gone a long way further than that in the matter of public ownership. We have now not only the national railways, but we have a system of national telegraphs, for which we have paid dearly, but it is a fine system nevertheless; we have also got a national money order system, a national express system, and a national postal system. All these services can be co-ordinated and great improvements made in them right away. Get all these services together, and then go to the people of Canada and say: Boys, we have a national telegraph company; let us see that our people use it; we have a national money order system, and a national system of express, let us see that our people use that. That is what the people want to hear when this railway question is up. That is what the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) and the gentlemen behind him must insist on if they want relief in the matter of freight charges.

There is another thing, and now I wish to appeal especially to the West. Now that you have got national railways, national telegraphs, national express, and a national money order business, and you have them all now in every station in the West as we have in the East, consolidate them in one building and make them the centre of the community. If you want to work out your own salvation, build, at your own expense if you have to, a little community centre large enough for the village or town or city and use that for the service of the public. Put these services in there. Perhaps you could also put a drug service in there too.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I do not mean the kind hon. gentlemen have in mind. The war is over and regeneration must take place in this country the same as everywhere else, and you can begin regeneration with a local centre, and the way to do it is to get all these services together in one building. You can do a lot of things like that in the West. Just put up one little building as the community centre, and invite the Government to put the national express, the national telegraph, the national money order and railway business there, and let the postmaster go after the freight and see that the national railways get it, as well as their share of the telegraph and express business.

There is something else that can be done. You can back up the good roads, and make the good roads in your respective provinces complementary of the national system of transportation. What has thrown the American railroads into consternation more than anything else is the competition of the good roads and the motor truck. The railways of the United States are deploring the fact that the competition of the good roads and the motor truck has almost put them out of business. The motor truck travelling over the good roads has this marvellous advantage over the railways, that for short distances it is a handling of freight and passengers from door to door, with no intervening cartage agent, or street car journey, or anything of that kind. The motor truck goes from door to door and is playing the very dickens with the American system of railways. They do not know how to meet this competition, and they may have to go into a receivership for that reason alone. We must consolidate our railway service with all these other services if we want to get improved transportation, and I hope that we are going to get something of that kind now, but the beginning of it must be action on the part of the Government and our demand in this House for that action.

I have practically closed the argument that I have endeavoured to present to the House this afternoon, namely, that the fundamental problem in the regeneration of our country to-day, after the great war, is the improvement of our transportation to bring relief to our people who are so anxiously seeking it in that direction. And there is a way to do it, now that we own five of the railways, now that we own steamships, and now that we own telegraph and express services. But we have to go after the business; we have got to canvass for business just the same as the privately owned railways do. And that is what the Canadian Pacific Railway Company fears will happen. As I said I have no grievance against the Canadian Pacific railway except this—that it will not solve the transportation problem for us. As a private corporation it cannot do that; and we are not going to allow them to try, notwithstanding the advice of the Montreal Gazette. Within the past week the Montreal Gazette has told the Government to get rid of these national railways—put them on the scrap heap or give them away. Is that the view of the people of Canada or of the members of this House? I do not think so. We are going to try and work out some improvement, and we expect that improvement to come from the new Government following up legislation already on the statute books. We will expect it most of all from the new Minister of Railways; and we will be only too glad to welcome the fact that the Government, now that the opportunity has come to it, is going to consolidate all these railroads and steamships that we now possess in order to secure lower traffic charges in Canada.

Just one word more. Much was said in the speeches of yesterday—and they were good speeches—but I think the leader of the Progressives, in the effort he made this afternoon, endeavoured to bring the situation right home to the people and to the members of the House. It is a fine thing to make an exhibition of swordsmanship such as we had yesterday between the two leaders, a fine thing to make the respective groups of followers cheer, but that is not dealing with public questions. We want these questions taken up and dealt with from the transportation point of view. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) endeavoured to do that this afternoon, and in my humble way I have followed in the same direction, and I am going to try and do a little more later on. As I have already stated, during my election campaign the electors indicated their preference for a discussion of the transportation question and the subject of the consolidation of our railroads. We have these railroads now and it is our duty to make a success of them as far as we can. I want to tell the leader of the Government that there is a newspaper in Toronto called the Globe and it is taking up these questions, while Montreal papers such as the Gazette and the Star are talking in an altogether different way. The people all over Ontario are thinking in terms of public ownership, but a large number of the newspapers of this country are passing away from public ownership, and are supporting corporation ownership of our railways. Such a policy as that will not succeed.

Before resuming my seat I must apologise to hon. members for the time I have occupied, but I have spoken at length in order to ventilate what I deem to be a more important view of the transportation questions of Canada than has hitherto been expressed.

Mr. ROBERT FORKE (Brandon): Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that I fully appreciate the privilege accorded to me of having the opportunity to address the House at this particular time. I highly appreciate the dignity and importance of this, the Parliament of Canada, and I only hope that I may be able, in my small way, to maintain its past traditions and that I may be found worthy of the place which I occupy in this Chamber.

In commencing I desire to compliment you, Mr. Speaker, on your elevation to the commanding position of First Commoner. Your high character and great attainments as a public man are not unknown even in the remotest parts of this great Dominion of ours, and I am sure that you will brilliantly adorn the high position to which you have been promoted. I listened with a great deal of attention yesterday to the excellent speeches of the Mover and Seconder of the Address. I must compliment Mr. McMurray, who belongs to the same province as myself, upon the ability which characterized his speech, and I am sure that he fully maintained the reputation which he enjoys in the west as a public speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FORKE: I am sorry to have transgressed the rules. I should have alluded to my hon. friend as the hon. member for North Winnipeg. Perhaps it would be only right for me to say that I am a new member and therefore unfamiliar with the procedure of this House. For that reason I would ask the indulgence of hon. members, and I can assure them that I will endeavour as quickly as I can to conform to Parliamentary methods and usages.

I was sorry that I was unable to follow the speech of the hon. member who seconded the Address. I have, however, read a short synopsis of that speech translated into English and have therefore familiarized myself to a certain extent with the views which he expressed. From the style of his speech and the sentiments which he uttered I should deem him to be an eloquent and able speaker. It is a matter of deep regret to me that I am unable to understand the French language. Let me say that were I a young man nothing would give me greater pleasure than to begin the study of that tongue and to acquire such a mastery of it as would enable me to follow the speeches of hon. members from Quebec when they use the language of old France.

I listened with a great deal of attention to the speeches that were made yesterday by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The former has certainly lost none of his old-time ability, and he can still drive with rapier-like thrusts at the enemy across the way. I am one of those who admire the ability of the right hon. member. He is a dweller in our province, and although we do not agree with his political opinions we are proud of his ability and glad to see him once more in Parliament.

I read very carefully the Speech from the Throne, and I was glad to observe that a good many of the things for which we have been hoping were promised therein. I trust the promises will come to fruition and that some day we shall reap the harvest that has been sown. For one thing we have been promised wider markets. The leader of the Opposition yesterday in his speech ridiculed the idea of reciprocity with the United States. I am sorry to observe that attitude on his part because in the West it is something unusual to find such a brand of opinion—as will be recognized from what happened there during the recent elections. I can assure the House that one of the great problems that we have to meet in the West to-day is the getting of wider markets for farm products. The question has been asked: Of what advantage would the United States markets be to the western farmer? Let me tell the House that last fall and during the early part of the winter, notwithstanding the emergency tariff, trainload after trainload of cattle left the St. Boniface stock yards, paid the American duty of 30 per cent and were taken to Chicago and St. Paul and there sold at a profit over what those cattle could have realized at Winnipeg. What would have happened had there been no outlet for that trade, with the cattle market in such a depressed condition? Had there been no market in the country to the south to take our surplus at that particular time our cattle would have been unsaleable during those fall months. So that, you see, even with the 30 per cent duty, that American market at the present time has been a great advantage to us in respect to the marketing of our cattle.

Then we have a mention of freight rates in the Speech from the Throne, and with this I shall deal a little later on. We need relief in that respect. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the speech of the hon. member, (Mr. Maclean, York) who preceded me. I should like to tell him that I am in thorough accord with him as far as the consolidation of the National railways is concerned, and I think he will get the support of this portion of the House in that policy. I am a new member of this Chamber, and do not know the position of the different members in the House very well yet, but I could not help wondering to what division the hon. gentleman who has just spoken belongs.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): I am a public rights man, and I hope you are too.

Mr. FORKE: I intend to be, and I say so, with all due respect to the remarks the hon. gentleman has made, and I do not say it in any carping or criticising spirit. Some reference was made in the Speech from the Throne to the tariff. I agree with the leader of the Opposition, the right hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Meighen) in some of the criticisms he made in this respect. The reference to the tariff in the Speech may mean a great deal or it may mean very little. I have an optimistic temperament, and I have no doubt the Government will implement its promises, and that we are to have substantial reductions in the tariff, more especially in the matter of agricultural implements and the materials we need in agriculture. If we do not get relief in this way, there is going to be disappointment in the West, and, more than that, there is going to be disaster unless some remedy is brought forward to meet conditions as they exist at the present time. The prairie provinces are in need of immediate relief; the situation out there is not good, and no one can face the circumstances without realizing that some relief must be afforded. We are aware of the fact that the climatic conditions have been unfavourable for a number of years, but anyone who knows the situation will realize that the overhead expenses of agriculture at the present time are far and away out of all proportion to the value of the crops that are being harvested. Now, that sort of thing cannot continue; it must come to an end; you cannot carry on business year after year if the balance is on the wrong side of the ledger. Something will have to be done to remedy those conditions. The prosperity of these provinces depends entirely upon their natural resources, and the greatest of those natural resources is that three or four inches or more of fertile soil that covers the land from eastern Manitoba to the foot of the Rocky Mountains. This land must be developed, can be developed and will be developed if right conditions prevail and right opportunities are afforded to the cultivators of that soil. I believe the economic conditions can be made, will be made and ought to be made, that will afford to those people who are living out there and developing that country an opportunity to make a living and enjoy more of the comforts and decencies of modern civilization. The constituency of Brandon, which I have the honour to represent, is just about one half urban and one half rural; and yet, after all, we are all in the same box, city, town, and country are dependent upon agriculture. The prosperity of one is the prosperity of the other, and, as I said before, we are all in the same box. Not only that, but I think the people in the House will recognize the fact that if the manufacturing centres, such as Brantford, Toronto, and Hamilton, are going to send their implements out there and are going to get paid for them, they will have to depend to a very large extent upon the prosperity of the western provinces. So that you will see, Mr. Speaker, and hon. members, our interests are one; you cannot divide them. The Prairie provinces come close to the general interests of the Dominion of Canada, and we must have immediate relief.

We have listened to a very interesting address on the railway problem, and there is no doubt that this is one of the great problems we have to meet at the present time—perhaps the most pressing problem of all. We have on the one side excessive freight rates, on the other side large deficits on Canadian national railways year by year. How are we going to overcome the difficulties of the situation? Again, let me repeat here that I am in thorough accord with the consolidation of all the government-owned railways, to be worked as one system. In regard to the deficits on the national railways, I would like to say that I have had the privilege and opportunity of travelling on those lines to some extent during the last year, and I may say that there is a very great difference in the spirit, the movement and the arrangement of those lines from that which prevailed at one time. I noticed a different spirit among the employees and a different spirit in the public, who realize that this is their property, and that they have an interest in its development and prosperity. When speaking to a prominent Canadian Pacific railwayman the other day, he said that last year was the first year that they ever fully realized that they had a great competing system in the Canadian National Railways. Speaking to a mine owner in Drumheller, he made the statement also that the Canadian National Railways were out after business, and were looking after the business of the country in a way that was never done before. I can see daylight ahead. I can see hope in the future. We have a valuable property and we are going to maintain that property, develop it and keep it, and the day will come when we will be proud to have it.

Just a word in connection with freight rates. There is an old railway maxim that the rates should be made all that traffic will bear. I do not think it would be very difficult to prove at the present time that we have overstepped the mark, and that the rates are a great deal higher than the traffic will bear. It seems almost presumptuous that a layman should attempt to criticise railway management, and yet I think it is perfectly evident to anyone who knows the situation that freight is not being carried, business is not being done, because it is not profitable to do it. Of course, the farmers in the West have to ship their wheat, and that, perhaps, is one reason why the rates in that respect can be kept up. But I was told the other day that in British Columbia a great many lumber mills were shut down a year ago because the business did not pay, they could not afford to sell lumber and pay the freight. Not only that, but in those mills that were running they were burning a great deal of stuff that could have been sawn up and used as building material for the farmers on the prairies had the freights been lower. Now it seems to me a reasonable proposition that it would have paid those railways to carry that stuff at a little lower rate, rather than have men thrown idle and wheels not moving at all. We have that situation, a most difficult situation—high freight rates and large deficits in railway operations. But whatever may be done, we cannot have freight rates any longer strangling industry and making agriculture impossible in this Dominion of ours.

I would like to say just a few words regarding taxation and immigration. We know that our taxes are very high at the present time. I am not going to enter into any discussion nor offer any criticism as regards the way in which this high taxation has come about. We are all acquainted with the facts; we know how our Dominion taxation has been increased. We have gone through a long and terrible war and through sorrow, suffering and great financial loss. The country has great indebtedness which will have to be met, which we are bound in honour to pay. As regards the provinces, they have been anxious to develop their territories; they have helped to build good roads, they have given aid for public works. And our municipal corporations and our rural districts also have tried to build roads throughout their territories, thus bringing the farms into closer communication with industrial centres and marketing points. Perhaps, we might criticise a little just how this was done and why it was done at this particular time, but I will not enter into that now. The debts have been incurred. Besides other questions, we have the question of education which is one of vast importance in the Prairie provinces and, I believe, also throughout the rest of this Dominion. For this, we are incurring large expenditures of money, money which we are ready to pay, but which we find a difficulty in getting. These expenditures are going to continue, and as many of the debts which we have incurred are fixed charges, we can look forward to the years to come, knowing that our taxation is not going to become any lighter.

How are we going to meet the difficulty? The different speakers have spoken about immigration. Double your population, they say, and you will have no need of these taxes. Well, not exactly, but you are going to go a long ways towards reducing taxation. Double your immigration and you are going to help to solve your railway difficulty and your taxation difficulty; you will create traffic for the railways and lighten the burden all along the line. But then it might be asked again: Why increase your population when you find dissatisfaction and discontent amongst the people who are living here at the present time? The question is all one of remuneration. The farmers out on the prairies have a good deal of education handed out to them as to how they can improve their position; but let me tell the House that the first thing which will help to stop the flow from the country to the town is higher remuneration for the people who are engaged in agriculture. We are living in a day when education is easily got almost anywhere. We find our young people out on the farms becoming well educated, knowing what conditions are in city, town and country; and, knowing the conditions, they make their choice, and they flock where the better living is to be got and where, perhaps, the conveniences and comforts of life may be more easily obtained. Until opportunities are equalized as between country and city life, we are going to have that flow towards the city of which we complain so much. I believe those conditions can be improved; that we can arrest that flow if we have the right country conditions. I know very well that if any one wishes to make a vast amount of money, he is never going to make it in 9 p.m. agricultural life. We all know that. But there are in life some things that are of greater consequence than money, and when we have found a congenial occupation, when we have found a fair remuneration, when he have found independence of livelihood and conditions to suit us, that is wealth and all the wealth that anyone will want. That state of things can be brought about in rural life, and we are going to get it if we get proper economic conditions. I believe in that way alone we shall solve our rural problem. I know, conditions at the present time are to a certain extent abnormal; that we are suffering in the West, in some sections at least, as I said before, from climatic conditions. But we have also certain economic evils that we believe can be remedied and will be remedied. I believe many of the conditions on the farm life are going to be improved in this way. The large farms on the western prairies are going to disappear, and we are going to have smaller farms. We are going to have more intensive cultivation and closer community centres, and a great many of the disadvantages of rural life are going to disappear.

What does the Government intend to do as regards this question of immigration? We need the people, but we want the right kind of people. There are in the British Islands, on the continent of Europe, more especially in Scandinavia and perhaps in some other countries, people who are suited to the land, who have been born and bred to that calling, and who would make the very best of citizens if we could get them to come out to Canada. I believe that, notwithstanding all our disadvantages, there are people over there with land hunger who would like to come out to Canada and have a piece of land that they could call their own, who would make the very best of settlers if we could get them to come to this country. We have had a large number of immigrants from eastern Europe. I would not be ready to condemn those people offhand, I know many of them who have made good; but I would not like to see a very large inrush from that portion of Europe at the present time. Perhaps most hon. members are aware of the fact that many of these people from eastern Europe are, in the second generation, taking the highest places in our educational institutions, in the West at least, and they are going to make good citizens. Those of us who are of French or Anglo-Saxon extraction will have to look to our laurels or we shall find many of those people enjoying the highest positions in the land, and if they are worthy of them they have a right to them.

What is the Government going to do to stop this trek from the land to the city? I have tried to point out what I believe to be, in part at least, a solution of that problem. We do not, however, want immigrants from the manufacturing towns of Great Britain. Perhaps, this is a hard thing to say; but I have had some experience in immigration work, and if you get artisans from the banks of the Clyde or factory workers from the towns, when they come to Canada they will inevitably drift to the cities. We have plenty of those people in this country now. I have no fault to find with them, but when we want those people, we can soon get them. I have no hope of taking the city born-and-bred man and woman and turning them out to make a livelihood on the land. They are going to have an up-hill fight and, perhaps, they will never achieve any success. As I said before, they are most likely to drift back to the cities and help to build up a city population greater than is necessary.

We are passing through difficult times, and we must use our best endeavours to pass through them successfully. We have a great new country and I have not lost faith in this land of wide horizons. We have our difficulties in the West; but it is a great land, and during the last thirty or forty years, notwithstanding all our difficulties, there have been many happy homes and happy households out on those prairie lands, and we are going to have them in the future. We have not lost faith in our country. Canada is a great land and we do not want a divided country. We do not want any "East" and we do not want any "West"; we want one Canada. We need to get together, forgetting disrupting differences, and finding our own prosperity in the common good and in the development of our country. I shall close with a quotation from Viscount Bryce, who said:

> Canada is well able, by the character of her people, by their intelligence and law-abiding habits, to face whatever problems the future may bring, finding remedies for such defects as may have disclosed themselves in her government, and making material prosperity the basis of an enlightened and pacific civilisation.

Mr. ALFRED SPEAKMAN (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is with a good deal of trepidation that I rise to take part in this debate, because, like the hon. gentleman who preceded me, I am inexperienced in public speaking and lack of knowledge of the forms, the procedure, and the traditions of the House. I therefore request your indulgence, Sir, if I err in any way, as I intend—we all intend, no doubt,—to bring myself in harmony with the rules of the House and in harmony with the spirit and ancient traditions of Parliament, while still holding to my own principles and my own ideas.

We have come here, a great many of us, as new members, in the hope of being able to impart some of the ideas which have been growing in our minds through the past years, and also in the hope that we may be able to assist in bringing about better conditions in this country. We have not come here in any spirit of hostility or of antagonism, but rather with the desire to co-operate as fully as possible in the endeavour to secure needed reforms and such legislation as is necessary for the country as a whole, and, perhaps, for the West in particular, if we are to emerge from the morass in which we are struggling at the present time and to set our feet on dry ground again. I believe that the task will require the intelligent co-operation of every thinking man and woman in Canada, no matter in what part of the country they may live, and irrespective of racial extraction, occupation, or any other consideration. I believe that the task before us will demand their intelligent co-operation if Canada is to be the country we all think it should be. That is the spirit in which we have come here.

I have read with a good deal of interest the Speech from the Throne, and have heard with equal interest the debate which has been held upon it and which has to some extent explained and amplified it; and I find myself very much in accord with the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray), because, in spite of the somewhat gloomy pessimism of the right hon. gentleman who leads the official Opposition (Mr. Meighen), I, like my hon. friend from North Winnipeg, intend to retain my optimism until the Government itself, by any future action, shall destroy it. We come into Parliament believing that the Government intend to carry out legislation along the lines of their old platform and their pre-election promises. We are taking that for granted until the Government itself shall do something to deprive our minds of that confidence in them. We intend to do the Government justice to that extent, and to afford all the assistance possible in the carrying out of their programme.

In looking over the Speech from the Throne I was particularly pleased with one paragraph, referred to by every hon. member who has spoken, and that, the reference to agriculture. There is one respect, in this connection, in which I must congratulate the Government. For a good many years we farmers have suffered from a superfluity of advice from bankers, lawyers, manufacturers, politicians, and a good many other people, as to what we should do and what we should best produce, what class of farming we should follow, whether we should grow wheat or go in for mixed farming, or raise cattle, and so forth. We have had an abundance of that sort of advice, and while we recognize that these things may be important, I am very glad indeed to see that the Government, in the Speech from the Throne, has realized that the foundation of agricultural prosperity lies not so much in them, but in proper marketing and transportation, and in lower production costs. It seems to me that this, to a large extent, covers all the ground; it covers the tariff, the railway situation and marketing; and if these three things are settled, and settled so that farmers may work under them to advantage, I do not think we have any great kick coming; we have, I think, very little left to ask for. I am not going to speak at any length on the question of marketing. That has been dealt with before, and no doubt it will be spoken of by others. I will only mention that we have come to this conclusion, after a great deal of thought and experience—that if we are to succeed in business we must have some method of controlling the marketing of products. By that I mean some method by which the producer controls the marketing and flow of his own products until they arrive at their ultimate destination. We are not particularly desirous of controlling the price. We recognize that it is impossible for the farmers of one nation to control prices, but we believe that by controlling the flow, so that the products arrive at the markets of the world, throughout the year, as those markets can absorb them, we can stabilize the prices and receive the highest average world price throughout the year. As to the form that this control should take, I am not prepared to say; that will have to be settled later on. I believe that the ultimate solution will be some form of co-operative organization by the farmers themselves; but I also believe that, for the present, some form of Government board will have to be adopted. That, however, I will leave to the future; it will be discussed in Committee, and I shall not go further in detail in that respect just now. There is also the other point, of lower costs of production, which links itself most intimately with the tariff, because the one thing that causes our costs of production to be higher than it should be is the increased price of farm machinery and farm equipment due to the protective tariff. I am not going to say much about the protective tariff. Protection has been a political football for so many years that I cannot say anything new on the subject. That is a remarkable thing, too. Election after election, and session after session, this football has been kicked about from one party to another, and yet it remains about the same size, and is about the same colour and texture as it was a good many years ago. I think it is a remarkable instance of endurance. I do want to point out one thing, and that is our attitude on the subject of protection at large; —I am not referring to tariff for revenue; that should properly come under the taxation and not under protection, I am referring to the principle of protection. That principle we believe to be morally wrong and economically unsound. We believe it is morally wrong, because anything is wrong morally which gives to one class of individuals in a community the power to exploit other classes to their own personal advantage. And I am including farmers in that; I do not believe that farmers or any other class should have any form of special privilege which will enable them to exploit other classes. We believe protection is unsound economically because it delays and hampers the development of our natural resources of all kinds—farming, mining, timber and other resources—by increasing the cost of the machinery used in that development. We believe that in the development of the natural resources which God has placed within our country in such plenitude lies the future of this Dominion. There is another point in this connection: adopted as a principle protection becomes futile as a form of taxation, because the more perfect it becomes for the purposes of protection, the more adequate protection is, the smaller your revenue becomes; protection carried to the extreme degree would completely shut out all imports, and then, of course, no revenue could be produced. We say, therefore, that the protective tariff is an illogical form of revenue. We believe, furthermore, that taxation of this kind proceeds altogether in the wrong direction because it is a consumption tax, and in principle the consumption tax is less desirable than any form of direct taxation because it bears most heavily upon those who are least able to bear it. You can easily see that the poorer a man is the larger the proportion of his income that goes for the necessities of life, and if he is taxed on the necessities of life, the larger the proportion of taxation he has to pay. But, leaving that out of the question, we believe that it is an illogical form of taxation in the present condition of the country. Most people in this country—and strange as it may seem, this question becomes linked up with that of immigration as well—most people, no matter what their party affiliation may be, regard the great need of this country as population; they believe we should encourage an increase of population by any means in our power. Logically speaking, a bachelor tax might be all right for the purpose of encouraging population,—and mind you, I am not attempting to embarrass the Government by advocating a tax on bachelors. I simply wish to point out that taxation through protection is a baby tax, and a baby tax, where population is our greatest necessity and where native-born population is the best population, is, I contend, Mr. Speaker, not a logical tax. And what else can you call it? You who have children know that for every additional child in your family you must buy additional shoes and garments of various kinds; and many other things, and you are taxed on every one of those things you buy. It simply means that under a protective tariff, for every child you have in your family, you are subjected to additional taxation; and if that is not a baby tax, what is it?

Now, I am going to leave that subject for better men than I am to tackle later on. But I want to say a word, just in passing, on the subject of immigration as connected with conditions pertaining to agriculture. We wish to bring in a great number of immigrants who shall go on the farms; as I understand it, that is the object of any immigration policy we may adopt—to bring in men and women more or less experienced in farming, who will go upon the land, open up undeveloped areas, particularly in the West and through parts of Ontario, and thus increase production. Mr. Speaker, the foundation of any form of immigration which can possibly be successful in attaining that object must be the prosperity of those already on the land. That, I believe, is the only policy of immigration which is worth the paper it is written on. When you have made the condition of the farmers already here prosperous, tolerable and decent as far as possible, others will come in to share their prosperity. But until you have done that, what is the use of trying to induce others to come here only to share our poverty and distress. Now, that sounds like strong language; yet is it too strong? I say poverty and distress. After I came to Ottawa I was speaking to a gentleman who was fairly well acquainted with city conditions and he remarked that we were very fortunate in Western Canada in that whatever our conditions were, however hard the times might be, no man, woman or child in that part of the country was suffering for want of food; all were farmers and all would have plenty of food in their cupboards. I told that gentleman, as I can tell the House now and as some hon. members must know, that even among farmers whose occupation is the production of food there are hundreds—I believe I am within the mark in saying thousands—who are dependent upon the municipalities and upon the Government for their daily bread at the present time. This statement is not exaggerated; the conditions are such as I have described. While it is true that these conditions are confined to a few areas the fact remains that in a great portion of Western Canada at least—I cannot speak for the farmers of the East—the farmers are simply living on their reserves; they are farming at a loss, holding on, hoping for a better day to come when prices for what they have to sell, prices for what they have to buy, and transportation rates, will come to such a point as will make a living possible. We have been told—and there is a great deal of logic in it—that a decrease of freight rates can only follow an increase in population. I can see the force of that argument, but at the same time I believe that increase of population must be preceded by a decrease in the freight rates; otherwise the population will simply not come in.

There is just one other point to which I wish to refer briefly. It is a point without political significance and with respect to which all members of the House will, I believe, be in accord. It is in connection with the re-establishment of the former members of the Canadian expeditionary forces. I would like to call the attention of this House to the condition that at present prevails among the greater number, I believe, in the West at least, of the returned men who have been placed upon the land through the work of the Soldier Settlement Board. I believe that board has done its duty faithfully and carried out its work sympathetically, so far as I have seen, and I have no desire to criticise it. But it is time, in my opinion, that the policy of that board should be amplified—indeed, that a different policy should be pursued. Most of these men went on the land in good faith, when the price of everything was at its peak. They went there at a time when prices were abnormal, when prices had reached a stage which they may not reach again for many years. The cost of machinery was at the peak; prices of stock and everything else that was needed for their farming activities were at the peak, and they bought at those prices. They bought land when land was selling on the basis of two-dollar wheat and cattle were bringing profitable prices. They bought machinery at the highest prices which have been known. They bought cattle when milch cows were bringing from $100 to $140. And now where are they? They went into debt for these things—for that land and that stock and the equipment purchased at these high prices, and at present their indebtedness to the Government on that stock and equipment exceeds the total value of the property which they possess. This, Mr. Speaker, is a serious condition and one which this House will have to take into account. These men went overseas; they fought and suffered both physically and financially in order that this country and the world might be free. They were put upon the land, in good faith, as a kind of mark of appreciation—as a method of assisting them to regain their places in civil life. The idea was right, and I believe the expectations were well founded. But what has happened? All these men, or a very large proportion of them, at all events, were called upon to pay about ten per cent of the value of the land when they got it. If they leave their farms now they lose not only the government land, not only all the work they have put in upon it, but every cent they possessed before they went on the land as well. Is that fair, is it just? It is absolutely impossible—and I speak from experience because, though inexperienced in this House, I am experienced in farming conditions in that part of the country—for any one of these men to make good under that burden of debt. Even old experienced farmers with their holdings free from debt cannot possibly make interest on their holdings under present conditions. How then can we expect these newcomers to make principal and interest on an over-capitalized farm? It is absolutely impossible. To a large extent they are foredoomed to failure under present conditions, and will leave the land. That sounds like a very gloomy prospect. What suggestions have we to make? My suggestion is simply this, and it is one which has been endorsed pretty generally by the farmers who would have to help to pay the bill, that the land, the stock, and the machinery, bought in that way should be re-valued and brought down to a value comparable to the values prevailing at the present time, and that the difference between the debt which these men assumed and the present value be taken over by the country as an addition to our public debt. I know that sounds unpopular, but that loss is more apparent than real, because every time one of these men goes under, and they are doing it every day, a salvage sale is necessary and the stuff is sold at present prices, or at less than present prices at a forced sale, and the country has to take the loss. Sooner or later,—and I make a very conservative estimate because, although I am Progressive in my principles, I am very conservative in my statements in most ways—I believe at least seventy per cent of these men are doomed to failure and to leave the land, and when they leave the land the country will have to stand the loss of the difference between the value of their stock when they leave the land and the value of their stock when they bought it. But the country will lose far more than that. While these men are on the land they are producing citizens, self-respecting men supporting themselves; they are an asset to their country, because production is necessary; they are working. But if they are forced to leave the land, what happens? They become a liability. Under present conditions they will simply have to join the ranks of the unemployed and in one way or another they and their families will have to be kept by this country. I do not say that every one who leaves his farm will have to join the unemployed, but with tens of thousands of unemployed in this country to-day, every one of these men who has to leave the land will either remain unemployed himself or force someone else into the ranks of the unemployed; the ranks of the unemployed will be swelled in either event, and these men will no longer be an asset but a liability to their country. More than that, in their own character, in their own purposefulness, in their own power to make good citizens, they will have been lost. They will have lost heart, they will have lost courage, they will have lost belief in the righteousness, the fairness and justness of their fellow-men, in the country they live in. While I am not attempting to embarrass the Government in any way at the present time, I hope that this matter will receive the most serious consideration of the department concerned and of the Government as a whole. I can assure the Government that any action along the line I have suggested will receive the hearty co-operation and support of my friends here.

There is another question, and though it is a small one, it is still most important. For the next year or two it will be practically impossible for any one of these men to make payments on his land, and I think it would be good policy—I simply throw that out as a suggestion—to extend the time of payment for two years. Give them two years free of principal and free of interest during which they might be able to get on their feet financially, and in that way help them to make good.

Mr. Speaker, I have spoken long enough for the first time, but before taking my seat I want to make just one brief statement. Being, as I am, quite inexperienced in this House, it will probably take me some time to thoroughly imbibe its atmosphere. We were all treated to a very fine exhibition of oratory yesterday and part of the time to-day, and if that is a sample of the eloquence of the statesmen in Parliament, if the courtesy and the absence of all personalities displayed was a fair sample of what commonly goes on in Parliament, I am afraid it will be a very long time before I and some of my associates can hope to climb to such heights.

In conclusion, I would simply repeat what I have said before and what others have said before me, that we are here to work, not for the good of any one part of Canada, but we are here as Canadians to do all in our power to assist others to work for the common good of our country.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, our Labour group in this House is small and inexperienced, but we feel that we represent a section of the community that is of no small importance, and that in connection with this debate we should try as best we may to represent the thought of that section of the community on the various public questions which have come before this House.

In an early section of the Speech from the Throne reference is made to the world-wide economic disturbance, but passage is quickly made to an easy optimism which foretells a substantial revival in trade. It sounds very much as if prosperity is just around the corner. I think, however, we must concede that we are beginning to understand more clearly than ever that prosperity cannot be had just for whistling, that prosperity may come only as we are in accord with great economic laws, and that at this particular time we cannot hope for prosperity for Canada short of prosperity for all the nations of the world. If there is one thing that this war has taught the world, it is that no nation lives to itself, as no individual lives to himself, and Canada to-day can hardly hope for permanent prosperity short of the stability and prosperity of the whole of Europe.

I take it that our economic future in this country is inextricably bound up with that of the United States. We may maintain our own political identity, but economically we are bound to have the very closest relations with the great country to the south of us. It is many years since Goldwin Smith pointed out that the natural lines on this continent run north and south. Artificial lines have been run east and west, and along these artificial political lines we have built up our trade boundaries. That makes it very difficult to pass freely across those boundaries. We must recognize that although we differ in a very important sense economically from the United States—in that we are a debtor nation while they are a creditor nation—at the same time the ties between us are so intimate that we cannot hope to prosper unless they also prosper. The situation, it seems to me, with regard to the United States and ours was quite clearly put in an article which appeared two weeks ago in the "New Republic." May I be permitted to read an excerpt therefrom:

> A large part of our agricultural products must still be sold upon an international market, and must come into competition with the output of the European farmer. If the inter-dependence of agricultutral crop values and manufacturing output is valid, it must hold for Europe as well as for America. Unless something is done soon about German reparations, German industry will certainly pass through a period of paralysis early next year. Everywhere the political situation is such that business enterprise will be at a low ebb.
> The present economic order is essentially a co-operative one. Its co-operation is effected through exchange, and between all the exchanging groups, there is an intimate degree of interdependence. The American manufacturer and the American farmer must depend upon each other. But the American farmer is tied to the European price level by the fact that he produces for export. The European farmer is in turn dependent upon Europe's manufacturing communities. So we can do little for the American farmer unless we help the European manufacturer and his laborers. Whether we like it or not, the organization of industrial society has made us our brother's keeper.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that in this way we must recognize that the great demand is for markets. But we must also recognize that all other countries are also seeking for markets at this time; not only Great Britain but the various countries in Europe. The United States is also calling for markets; even the Orient is calling for markets. We in Canada cannot very well hope to compete successfully at this time with other countries along the lines of manufacture. Our whole industry in the past has been connected with the Atlantic ocean. Possibly there is a trade that might be opened up across the Pacific, but that would involve a complete diversion of the trade which has been going on for a great many years, and probably we could not look to that in the immediate future as bringing about the required solution.

But, Sir, I believe there is a market closer at hand than Europe or the Orient and that is the home market, the most neglected of all our markets to-day. I think it is admitted by the Minister of Labour that we have something like 200,000 people unemployed in Canada to-day—probably those figures are very conservative. This would likely mean that there are a million people in Canada that are to-day affected by unemployment—that are either directly unemployed or under-employed. Now I imagine that if these million people could buy shoes and clothes, and groceries, and furniture, and other things which are necessary for living, we would have, right at home, a large market which to-day is being neglected. Under our present economic system we cannot start the wheels of production moving unless there is some buyer who stands ready with money or with credit; and to-day we have so managed our affairs that there are hundreds of thousands of people in this country who are not buying simply because they have not the money or the credit with which to buy. I speak particularly of the large numbers on farms in the West and also in our cities and industrial sections from coast to coast.

I sometimes wonder whether we who sit in these comfortable halls quite recognize the actual conditions that prevail in many sections of this Canada of ours. A few years ago I belonged to a labour organization on the Coast that had rather a curious regulation which prohibited any paid official of the union from holding office for more than six months at a time. It was felt that after six months the official tended to acquire the official mind, and ought to go back again to the ranks to find what the real conditions were. Perhaps if that rule were applied in this House, and in some of our Government departments, we might get a little bit nearer to the actual conditions of the people across this country. I am sure that some of my friends from some of the farms, who till our fields, as well as some of the artisans in the cities who build houses and carry forward a good deal of the work of this country will understand what I mean when I say there are a large number of people across this country to-day who, if not actually unemployed and in dire necessity, are passing through a period of very great anxiety. And this, by the way, is not confined merely to those who are commonly called workers but to a large number of our business men who also do not see their way clearly at this time.

I should like to take up the time of the House for a few minutes in reviewing a little of the unemployment situation across the country. A few weeks ago I had the opportunity of visiting the relief camp for single men maintained by the city of Vancouver. Nearly eight hundred men, almost half of them returned soldiers, were gathered together in a large camp at the exhibition grounds at Hastings park—the returned men termed it "the internment camp." One building had been transformed into an immense bunk house; and near by, in what had been the automobile section, there was what the men called "the filling station"—the dining room. Here these men were given three meals a day and a bed at night. All that the community received in return was the few hours work which was frankly a work test. These men—many of whom, most of whom in fact, had been declared by medical health officers to be fit—had skilled trades, a great many of them had served, as I have said, overseas. And yet this is all that we had to offer them at the present time in a country and in a province that had on every side crying needs for development work of almost every kind. The prairie farmers are needing lumber and hundreds of these men were skilled loggers, but we could not get them to work and we could not get the lumber out to the farmers. Coming east I stayed off for a day or two at Drumheller where there are immense coal deposits, as we all know. Many of the miners there had been employed only part of the time for thirteen and a half months One man told me that he had had only sixty-two days work in the year 1921. Drumheller is on a government railway, quite capable of bringing that coal which we so much need on the prairie, but the freight rates were said to be prohibitive. Coming on down to my own city of Winnipeg, there are and have been approximately 5,000 men unemployed there during the past months. According to a memorandum furnished the provincial government a few weeks ago, the cost was averaging about $265,000 per month, part of this on relief work, and part of it on special work, most of it granted to meet the unemployment situation, but for a very considerable part of which, the community received a very small return indeed. In Toronto I was told there were some 16,000 or 18,000 registered unemployed, but those nearest the situation declare that there are 25,000 unemployed. The House of Industry alone assisted this winter some 6,482 families, 1,761 of these families being families of returned men. This is saying nothing of the large number of single men who are being provided for more or less by other agencies. The expense for the month of February alone was between $80,000 and $100,000. I wish we could visualize what this unemployment really means. I wonder if I might be permitted to read a paragraph from a report of the city of Vancouver by a visitor accompanying one of the Victorian Order of Nurses. The paragraph reads:

> I visited a score of homes of the poor and sick and saw privation and dire want with my own eyes. It was pathetic. I had known poverty before when every member of the family had to work incessantly to make both ends meet, but for the adults in these homes there was no work to be had anywhere and the people are almost starving. The men are willing to do anything. They seek steady employment and are eager to do ther best. Their wives would take any work that they could get, but there is none. There is a dreadful calm and weariness about the children of these people, and an unnatural quietness in their childishness due to malnutrition. They have been hungry for so long that they do not realize that they are hungry. Many of them go to school, but it does them no more good than if they stayed at home. "You cannot fill a child's head when his stomach is empty, and what we need along with compusory education is compulsory feeding" was the way one keen observer put it.

And then there follows case upon case of the actual conditions which prevail even in that young city. Then I will read one paragraph from the December Health Bulletin of the city of Toronto:

> In discussing the minimum income the medical health officer said: "In determining this, we must do so, not only in the interest of the family, but also of the state, inasmuch as the essentials for proper nutrition and proper methods of living mean the difference ofttimes between a physical asset and a physical liability to the nation. The minimum standard of living must be such as to make it possible for every child to be well born and have an adequate opportunity for normal development, and the maintaining of physical fitness for every adult. A fitness that will enable men to give 100 per cent efficiency to their employers and the mothers to give 100 per cent efficiency in their homes. A standard should be fixed below which no family can safely come."
> While these are only a few investigations that have been made in connection with children, and only a limited number of the figures and facts available, yet they seem to prove beyond doubt that not only is poverty largely responsible for malnutrition, but they are ofttimes in direct ratio.
> In an investigation made by the Bureau of Child Hygiene and Child Welfare at Washington, they found that the mortality among the lowest-paid ranged from 2 to 3 times greater than among those with the largest incomes.

Now, in the face of such a situation as that, in face of the poverty that prevails in so many of our cities, I can hardly understand the callousness of some of our financiers as they look over the situation that prevails. For instance, in the annual statement of the Bank of Montreal—and I believe there are directors of that institution members of this House—the general manager states that unemployment is a natural corrective. As I think of these cases brought to our notice by the Victorian Order of Nurses and by social workers in all our cities from coast to coast, I can hardly conceive of any man or any group of men really understanding the situation and declaring that unemployment is a natural corrective. I claim that we have come to a period in the history of our country when we must decide once and for all which shall prevail, profits or human welfare. I feel confident that there is a group of men here, new members of the House if you will, who have clearly made up their minds that, in so far as they can decide it, human welfare is to be given the precedence.

I should like to suggest certain points which gradually emerge as the unemployed themselves have discussed this great problem of theirs. First of all, it seems to me that it should be recognized that, under the present system of large-scale industry, unemployment is involuntary. I am quite free to admit that there are among the unemployed a certain percentage who are lazy, drunken and inefficient—and any one who has studied the subject knows that, to a very large extent, their laziness, drunkenness and inefficiency are the result of our haphazard system—but at the same time we must further admit that that percentage is a very small one indeed. A few months ago most of these men who are now unemployed were at work, and if work offered they would be at work again. The difficulty with a good many of us in this country is that we have only recently passed through the pioneer development of our country. Some of us have grown up on the farm. Others of us who have not directly grown up on the farm still have more or less of the farm background and the farm traditions. We think back to the day when if a man could not find work and could not make a success it was his own fault. It was a time when almost every family was largely self-sufficient, and if a man was a hired man one year and did not like to continue the next, he could go to the back concessions, and make a home for himself. We are living still in thought in the time when in this country there were almost unlimited opportunities. But I submit that that time has passed away. The free accessible lands then in Canada have almost gone. If one would to-day have a freehold homestead he must pass almost beyond the reach of the railways. I say this, having full knowledge of the fact, that across our western country there are almost 30,000,000 acres of arable land held out of cultivation. But the free, accessible lands are almost a thing of the past. A hundred years ago settlement on this continent consisted of a few scattered communities along the Atlantic seaboard. It took practically a hundred years and three or four generations of the peoples, in their westward movement, to reach the Pacific. To-day the large part of our natural resources within easy reach have been exploited, and the opportunities, which were present in the early days in this western country of ours with its rapid developments, are not so numerous. We forget that we live in an age of collective production; that we live in an age of "large scale" industry; that we live in an age of more or less monopoly of the necessities of life.

For example, on a large railroad like the Canadian Pacific railway, so many thousand men may be laid off, as they were about Christmas time. Those men become temporarily unemployed, and it is impossible to say that those men ought to find work. Where can they find work? We cannot build a Canadian Pacific railway in a year or in ten years, and is is impossible for those railway men to find work at their own trade. The same thing is very largely true of other fundamental industries. If for any reason logging operations at the Coast close, ten to twenty thousand men are thrown out of employment immediately. Where can they find work? They cannot go and cut trees as some of our forefathers did in the backwoods of Ontario. The timber limits are held to-day by great companies, many of them with headquarters in the United States. The same is true of mining; the same is becoming more and more true of fishing; and even in agriculture, it is becoming extremely difficult, under present circumstances, for a man to get a start. Although the farmer to-day is farming his own bit of land, so soon as he steps off his own quarter section, he comes into contact with, and more or less under the dominance of, the great, big world outside. He is dependent upon the outside for his machinery, for his transportation, for his markets. Therefore, it is not easy to-day for a man without capital to obtain a start. Under these circumstances, unemployment is involuntary, and we ought not to treat the unemployed man as if he were more or less of a criminal. Until we get that clearly into our minds, we are not going to be very much further on in getting this matter on to a firm basis.

Let me state another point and that is this, that under these conditions the state is under obligation to provide work. I am not very much concerned personally, whether by the "state" we mean the municipality, or the province, or the Dominion. I would say, however, that whilst the Speech from the Throne would seek to evade, on the part of the Dominion, the responsibility of this problem of unemployment, in my judgment it is impossible to do so. The body that has to deal with great questions like immigration, the fiscal policy of this country, and our international relations, cannot say that it has no responsibility towards unemployment which is one of the consequences of, or intimately related to, our fiscal policy and our relations with other countries; and this House, before it rises, must deal with this question of unemployment. We should provide work. I am not thinking now merely of the work test which is provided in connection with charitable institutions, I mean suitable work; I mean, further than that, work not done as mere charity and on rates lower than those paid to ordinary workers in the same kind of work, and I am not thinking of such work as has been undertaken very largely by our municipalities—work that is unproductive in character. Surely, in this country, with its small amount of development, there is work, productive in character, which can be undertaken by the state. As a taxpayer, I objected decidedly in my own little municipality to paying out taxes and receiving nothing whatever for those taxes; and, as more or less representing these unemployed workmen, I object to work being furnished as a sort of charity; that work degrades any man who undertakes it. We have in this country, surely, enough opportunities for work that any man who is willing ought to be given a chance.

I want to go to a third point, that until suitable work is provided there ought to be adequate maintenance. This is the very principle underlying all unemployment insurance schemes. We are behind many of the European countries in that we have not so far been able to make provision for unemployment insurance.

The principle of unemployment insurance is not a novel one. We have it in our Workmen's Compensation Acts, where to-day we recognize that an industry ought to carry its own burdens, and that if a man is injured while pursuing his work, the industry itself ought to be charged with, at least, the financial part of his injury. The same thing is true with regard to seasonal unemployment. If it is necessary to have men in this country employed during rush seasons, we ought, at least, to see that they are kept over during the slack season. Hon. members who are here from the farming community will bear me out when I say that they winter over their horses in order that those horses shall be in fit condition to be used in the spring time. Should we treat with any less care or less wisdom the human machines that are necessary to carry on the industries of this country? Industry itself should carry the burden of unemployment.

One last principle which I should like to give in this connection is this. You may ask: How shall unemployment schemes be financed?—how shall we make provision for unemployment on a large scale? I would say that the financing of any such scheme is a first charge on the natural resources and credit of the country. Surely there is no reason why we should insist that railway dividends should come up to a certain mark in order that railway investors should be able to go forward with their work, or why banks should be permitted to retain their interest and dividends, and yet that we should refuse to labour even the minimum, a decent living.

There are three factors, and three only, necessary to production; I think I am on safe ground when I make that statement. We need, first of all, natural resources; we need, in the second place, the equipment necessary to work those natural resources, and we need, in the third place, human labour. I use this term "labour" in no narrow sense, but rather in the broad sense of labour as they put it in the Old Land, labour of hand or of brain. The labouring man is the man who makes a real contribution to society. We need those three factors, and we have in Canada at the present time all those factors necessary to production.

I need not take up the time of the House in speaking about our natural resources. They are here in abundance. At every great public function, at almost every Canadian Club meeting, speakers grow eloquent over the wonderful natural resources of this country. They are here; we do not have to import them from Europe or from the United States. Further than that, we have also in this country the equipment with which to carry on the work of developing these resources. We have been told that we have six or eight thousand miles of railway more than we need. We have factories across the country from coast to coast that are closed down; we have in the West lumber mills that are closed down, We have mines closed down, and last year some of our canneries were not running to their full capacity. We undoubtedly have the facilities in this country for carrying on our industries. Some hon. members may remember that before the war—I am not sure whether it was in 1913 or 1914—Sir George Paish the editor of The Statist, told the people of Canada that they had already the equipment for carrying forward productive work of a volume two or three times greater than that which was at present being done, and at that time he advised the investors of Great Britain to put no more money into constructive enterprises but rather to invest a little bit more in enterprises of a purely productive character. He warned them that, unless they did this, Canada would not be able even to pay interest charges on money already invested in this country. We already have all the equipment in the country. But what is the trouble? The trouble is essentially that we have allowed natural resources to be monopolized by private individuals or corporations, and have allowed the equipment to be handled very largely by these persons and corporations, who are looking to their own profits rather than to the welfare of the people. It is as though we had fenced off these natural resources and all this equipment and labour stood outside the fence unable to get at these things in order to carry forward the processes of production. At the gateway, is the privately-controlled credit system of our banks and financial institutions that determines on what terms we may go in or out; it determines on what conditions the business of the country shall be carried on. It seems to me that the great task of statesmanship in this country in the coming years will be to break down that fence and to bring together these great factors, labour, natural resources and the equipment which we already have in such abundance in Canada.

I should like to speak for a few minutes with regard to the reference which is made in the Speech to the transportation question, which is undoubtedly one of the great questions before the people of Canada to-day. I desire to congratulate the Government on the assertion of its determination to give Government ownership and operation of railways a fair trial. Some of us have learned this with considerable relief, for there had been an impression that public ownership might not be given a fair trial. We were glad to have the assurance of the Prime Minister in this respect, and I think perhaps we can trust the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) to see to it that the Board of Management which controls the Canadian National Railways shall be composed of men who are free from any suspicion whatever of having their own private interests to look after. Representing the Labour group, I should like to see the Government go even further than they have proposed to do in the way of bringing the various systems under control. Most of us have read with interest Lord Shaughnessy's plan for consolidation. I agree with the idea of having one great railway system in this country, which, as Lord Shaughnessy says, is logical and economical; but I cannot agree with his suggestion that this be placed under the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway. I do not think that our Government owned railways will be ultimately successful until we have a unified system of all the railways in the Dominion.

The Speech foreshadows some changes in the customs tariff. We are not told just what those changes will be, but it is, to me at least, a keen disappointment that there is no indication that there are to be any radical changes in the fiscal system as a whole. There is a great war debt which is an intolerable burden on the backs of the people of Canada, a mortgage on the efforts of future generations in this country. A very short time after the war was concluded, a rather interesting computation was made with regard to war debts. A pamphlet, published by the Mechanics and Metals National Bank, estimated the war debts of Europe and the United States at something like $200,000,000,000. I quote:

> The pamphlet is frank as to the meaning of this huge tax burden that the war has placed upon the people of Europe. It says: "France, if we make no allowance for indemnities to be received, apparently will require upwards of 40 per eent of her people's peace time income, as that income was formerly figured, to meet the interest obligations and upkeep expenses of the nation in 1920. Great Britain will require 28 per cent. Russia, when its obligations ultimately are honoured, will apparently require more than 45 per cent of her people's income, as that income was figured prior to the war. Before meeting any indemnity obligations, Austria-Hungary will require 48 per cent and Germany 31 per cent..... It means a great deal to say that, following the conclusion of peace, from one-fourth to nearly one-half the income of the different peoples of Europe will belong to the government. Yet that is plainly the indication."
> It is a gruesome indication. It means that of his working year of 300 days the average European workingman will be expected to devote over 100 days to the service of the war debt. The pamphlet analyzes this in detail. The English workingman, according to the figures, will have to give the income of 84 days, the German workingman 90 days, the French workingman 120 days, the Russian workingman almost half his days, the Austrian more than half.

What about Canada? Hon. members may remember that in the first budget after the war Sir Thomas White made a statement with regard to the heaviness of the burden which we had to carry. He said:

> I do not in the least desire to minimize the gravity of so great a debt as now confronts us on the threshold of the new year. It will constitute a burden upon the people of Canada for generations to come.

But Sir Thomas White found a great deal of consolation in the fact, that from a national standpoint, the public debt when owed to the nation itself is not nearly so serious an obligation as when owed abroad. The interest paid upon the debt is disbursed at home and remains part of the national resources. Now, it may be a considerable consolation to members who hold large blocks of Government bonds to find that a great part of the war debt of Canada is owed to people in Canada, but I submit that it is an altogether different matter when we consider that the rank and file of the people have to bear these interest charges. It means that we and our children after us, if this thing continues, shall be simply hewers of wood and drawers of water for a few privileged individuals who made profits during the war and managed to put them by safely. There is something here that will have to be settled sooner or later by the people of the country. I think of the way in which a great many fortunes were made during the war. I hold in my hand a pamphlet issued by the Central Information Office of the Canadian Liberal Party in 1918. We read in this pamphlet a good deal about war contract scandals, in regard to horses boots, trucks, binoculars, etc. You heard of that from almost every platform in the country. Hon. gentlemen across the way were very keen on pointing out the horrible extravagances of the government during war times; let me suggest that they now have an opportunity of having some voice with regard to the war fortunes that were made in this way. It is no less than a disgrace that while some men were asked to give their all in the time of war, and while many did give their all, as they thought, in the service of their country; while men and women all over the land worked and saved and toiled during those long years, others did not hesitate to coin money. I say it is a disgrace that they have been allowed to retain so long their ill gotten gains. Is there to be no equality of sacrifice? Mr. Speaker, we heard a good deal about conscription during the war. Men were asked to go to the front; lives were taken to be given to the service of the state. I would like to repeat here the stand that some of us took during the war: that if it is right to conscript men it is right to conscript wealth. Surely we have come to the time in our country when there should be a levy on wealth. In the Old Country they are talking about a capital levy for the reduction or abolition of the war debt; I should like to advocate a capital levy in this country for the abolition of the war debt. That would mean at least something like equality of sacrifice.

One more point ought to be brought to the attention of the House from the labour standpoint. The Government proposes to institute a Department of Defence. I have no doubt that from the standpoint of military efficiency that is a move in the right direction, but there are other considerations than those of military efficiency. A study of the budget for the past year reveals the fact that we are paying something like $25 per head in Canada for wars past and for prospective wars. That is, according to our estimate of a family of five, $125 per family for the burden entailed by the wars of the past and the burden of preparation for wars to come. The people of this country were asked to go into this past war on the promise that it would be a war to end war. Is war ended, when now we are proposing to create a Defence Department? I think the time has come to get away from all the high-sounding phrases that we had during the war. Let us get down to business. Let us ask ourselves against whom we propose to defend ourselves. We have a large country toward the south of us—friendly neighbors; we have boasted that along that extensive front we have not had a single fort and that on those Great Lakes we have not had a single battleship. Do we propose to defend ourselves against our American cousins? If this country ever becomes a part of the United States it will not be in my judgment because the United States invades us with a military force. The Americans are buying up the country, and possibly it may come in that way. But I do not think we can say seriously that it is a practical thing for us to propose to defend ourselves against an incursion from the United States. Do we propose to defend ourselves against possible attack from Europe? To-day the enemies of Great Britain lie prostrate. I tell you there is a very real danger that having conquered militarism among certain of the peoples of Europe we should at this time be militarized. Speaking as a Canadian of some three or four generations, I say that my forefathers did not come across to this country in order that we should set up here a new feudalism or a new militarism. Are we proposing to defend ourselves against the peoples of the Orient? I had hoped that Pacific questions had been at least temporarily settled at the time of the Washington Conference. Surely we cannot in cold blood, now that the fever of war has died down, contemplate with equanimity the preparation for another war. I want to read a paragraph from an issue of the Manitoba Free Press published in my own city of Winnipeg on the 15th of October, 1921. It is not very often that the Free Press quotes me; I shall do it the honour of quoting it:

> All the information in those vast collections of war books is of the same character. It tells of loss of life, loss of health, lost of property; of unbridled violence, of premeditated and deliberate destruction of wealth. Go into any public library; go to the "war-section," and the books you pull out will tell you about "crashing shells", about "gross mutilations", about regiments being "annihilated", about cities destroyed by artillery fire, about refugee women, about homeless and starving old people and children, about forced military service, about "industrial dislocation", about financial disturbance, about war taxation, about unemployment, hunger and national destitution. As a comprehensive narration of ruin, misery and disaster, the contents of the war departments of the world's libraries are easily the greatest within human knowledge.
> To talk about the war being a forgotten thing of the past is to talk foolishly. The millions of unemployed on both sides of the Atlantic are one powerful reminder of the war; there are very few people who are not injured somewhere or other in their lives, and the injury comes from the war—either very obviously, as in the loss of relations, or of health, or less obviously in the increased price of commodities, or in lack of employment. Looking at it dispassionately—

And I hope that we are now able to do so.

> Looking at it dispassionately, at the miserable legacies of the war everywhere around us, at the records of the four years of battle preserved in the literature of the war, war on the very face of it is so calamitous, ruinous, and cruel, that it becomes difficult to understand how anyone would be in favour of it, it seems difficult to imagine anyone wanting to have another great war.
> There is no profit in war; the loser loses, the victor loses, the neutral loses, everybody loses. The last war exposed and exploded all the arguments urged on behalf of war—they were all seen to be false. Nobody gained, everybody suffered, vast numbers are suffering still; war was a failure, total and ghastly; it was left without argument or apology, something which is demonstrably a total loss to the human species.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that after the experience of those dread years of war, we should surely be looking forward to some other method of settling our international disputes than by the resort to physical force. Two or three years ago, just after the war was over, we were all buoyed up as it were with the great hope of a new social order that was to dawn in the world. There was much talk of reconstruction, but the years have gone by and there has been a great disillusionment in the minds of many, and the reconstruction has somehow or other settled down to be more or less a reconstruction along the old lines. Yet there are many men, and I think among the younger men in Canada, who are still looking forward to a new type of life here on this North American continent and in the world as a whole. I hope that idealism has not quite gone from our midst, but as we look forward to this new world we see that there are going to be radical changes in our social system. I have sometimes said as I looked at the unemployment and the desperate straits to which thousands of my fellow-citizens were driven, that if this kind of thing went on very much longer there would undoubtedly be an outbreak of bloodshed of some kind. I am making no threat, but the whole of the warnings of history point to the fact that unless men and women and children are cared for, the whole nation inevitably suffers as the result, and my thought at this time, as we enter upon the sessions of a new Parliament is this: that as the war and the policies of the war have been swept aside, we have in this Canada of ours a wonderful chance for the working out of a great new policy. I like the spirit of some of my friends here, the Progressive members, who are determined not to play parish politics and not to play party politics any more, but who are here rather with the idea of the welfare of the country as the dominating motive in their public lives.

Mr. Speaker, we are too small a group to have very much effect in this House, I fear, but I would like to tell you that behind the divisions and, often, the crudities, of the Labour people, who are at the very foundation of the great industries of this country, there is an intense idealism, a looking forward to the period of world brotherhood, and I would not be true to that group did I not stand here at the very beginning of our parliamentary sessions and express the hope that as we work out these detailed policies for our own country, we will not lose sight of that larger hope which is inspiring at least very large numbers of the workers the world over.

Mr. R. J. WOODS (Dufferin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House for the first time, I wish as a member from the back concessions of rural Ontario to make clear the attitude and conditions of the farmers in this province. I shall not detain the House at any great length. It is not my intention to discuss any question pertaining to the provincial government of Ontario, I shall not enter upon a discussion of the Hydro policy of Sir Adam Beck. But for a brief space of time I wish to deal with a few matters that have come under my observation which are of interest to the farmers of this province.

I have listened with delight, as a newcomer to this House, to the debate as it has progressed so far. With some of the questions that have been brought forward I am heartily in sympathy; there are others, however, that do not meet with my approval, but I shall not take up the time of the House to discuss any minor questions that have been brought forward during this debate.

It is gratifying to me, and I believe to a great many people in this Dominion, to know that in the election campaign which terminated on the sixth day of December last the women of this country had an opportunity to cast their ballot. I think we in this country were long in coming to the point where we recognized the worth of the women of our land. I think we were very slow in granting them the franchise and according them their proper place as citizens of this great Dominion. They contributed no less a part than the men in the construction and pioneer life of this country. Many of them came to Canada from the Old Land when this country was a wilderness, and they helped their husbands hew out a home, and raised families which were a credit to this Dominion. They contributed their part in the home life, and also in the social and religious activities of the community. And yet for years and years they were deprived of the franchise. But at last the women have been accorded their proper place as citizens of this country, and I join with previous speakers in expressing gratification that this House is to-day honoured with the presence of a lady member, the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). Personally I feel somewhat honoured by having the privilege of occupying the same desk as our hon. lady member. I do not know whether that honour has been conferred upon me because of my good looks, or whether it is because I am a close neighbour of the hon. member for Southeast Grey. Whatever the reason may be I certainly deem it an honour to be permitted to sit in the front row in this Chamber and at the same desk as my fair colleague.

The recent Great War has brought about changes in the political attitude of many of the citizens of Canada, and I think it is because of that fact that so many farmer members occupy seats in the present Parliament. I well remember, and it will be in the recollection of many members of the House, that but a few short years ago on our side roads and back concession lines political contests were fought out largely on the lines of party politics. At that time both Liberals and Conservatives would raise the cry " Stay with your party," and on many occasions neighbours, even though their interests were identical, would often be divided by party issues almost to the breaking point. I certainly think that the Great War through which we have passed is partly responsible for the change in that respect in the rural sections of our country.

The farmers have now become organized and I do not think any one will complain because of their doing so. They have long been organized, and have long co-operated in the carrying on of commercial enterprises, and therefore it is only logical for them to advance a further step and to organize on political lines. Owing to that organization the farmers of this country have now a representation in Parliament such as they never had in the past. They have not embarked upon this political movement for the purposes of securing class legislation, although during the recent political campaign it was advanced that they had become associated for selfish purposes and to bring about laws favourable to their class. We are willing to admit that possibly there is just as much selfishness among the farmers as among any other class, but we are not willing to agree that they are more largely influenced by selfishness than any other portion of the community. We have entered into this movement in order to lay our views before the country and assist in the legislation of the Dominion. Surely it will be admitted that no persons are better able to understand the conditions of the farming industry than those who themselves are engaged in agriculture. The merchants of the country have a grasp of mercantile conditions, the manufacturers have an intimate knowledge of industrial necessities, and farmers are best fitted to understand and give expression to the conditions of farm life. We have therefore come here to help in legislating on broad and comprehensive lines and to explain as best we can the requirements of the farming community of Canada.

One thing we certainly require, and it is a necessity to which frequent allusion has been made—greater markets for our farm products. We heard a great deal of the depopulation of the rural sections of Canada, and especially of the rural sections of the province of Ontario. Certainly the latter statement is true; the rural sections of Ontario are not nearly as well populated as they formerly were. If this be the case what is the reason for it? There must be some explanation when farmers leave the farm, when farmers' sons will not remain at home but make their way to the great urban centres of the country. To my mind one great cause of that movement is the lack of adequate remuneration received by the farmers for their labour. The farmer's son is not going to remain on the farm when his city cousin receives a great deal more for his labours than he himself does. Therefore, in order to increase our farm population and augment the production on the farms, markets must be provided for our farm products. We are living in a comparatively new country, possessing immense agricultural resources as yet undeveloped. On the great prairies of the West there are thousands of acres still uncultivated which could be made to produce in abundance; and even in rural Ontario—I mean, what is known as Old Ontario—the production could be greatly enhanced. But, as I said a moment ago, men leave the farms. They do not leave the farms because those farms are a gold mine; men will not run away from a gold mine. One thing that we need is larger markets, more extensive markets for the products of our farm. How are we going to get them? We are hedged in to some extent because we have to face the Fordney Bill passed by the great nation to the south of us. Then the embargo on our cattle in the Old Country has not yet been removed. We are hopeful that by and by it will be removed; but it is still a settled fact that that embargo remains against our cattle entering the Old Country, at least they have to be slaughtered at the point of entry, and it is a handicap to the farmers in marketing the cattle because it reduces their value. Then, as far as the United States' market, which is our most natural market, is concerned, we are hedged in by the Fordney

Bill. We are looking to the present Government and hoping that they will be able to negotiate some agreement whereby we will have greater access to the market of the great nation to the south of us. True it is that we had the reciprocity agreement brought before us in 1911. True it is that it was voted down by the people of the Dominion of Canada. True it is that many of us farmers are guilty in that we did not support that reciprocity agreement. But why was it not supported, or why was it turned down? To some degree the great issue was camouflaged, and other matters were brought into that campaign of 1911 to divert the minds of the farmers from the great issue at stake, and to side-track them in some way so that they would not support the reciprocity agreement. There was a cry of "No truck nor trade with the Yankees." There was the cry that if that agreement was brought about it would be a step in the direction of annexation, and matters were introduced into that campaign that should not have been introduced, and the things had a wonderful effect in connection with the vote of many farmers in this country. But we have a different viewpoint in regard to that matter to-day. You know that after the campaign of 1911, the United States Government saw fit to remove the duty on our live stock, and our live stock went to the United States' market free. Every farmer that raised stock and every farmer that was engaged in mixed farming is well aware of the result, which was that we got an increased price for our cattle and greater advantages in marketing our stock. But when the Fordney Bill was passed we were again hedged in, and, as no doubt many honourable members of this House are quite aware, the great Union Stock Yards in the city of Toronto at times were almost overstocked with cattle, and the market price of the cattle was low. Now we are looking to the Government and hoping that they will again undertake this task, as we believe they are contemplating, in order to bring about for the farmers of this country greater advantages and an open market in the country to the south of us.

The farmers have to abide by the law of supply and demand. The greater the production the greater the supply and the lower the price. So that with our surplus products we have to compete with the open markets of the world. Just by way of illustration: About two years ago farmers in our immediate vicinity, and I think generally in the province of Ontario, received very high prices for their potatoes in the spring of the year; some of them obtained $4 and even $5 a bag for them. We often heard people making the remark that the farmers were getting wealthy. What are the facts of the case? The facts are that they did not have the supply, and many of the farmers, even with the high price of potatoes, had to buy their seed to plant that year, and had to pay the high price of $4 or $5 a bag for their seed. What was the result the year following? The year following there was an abundant supply, and the price went away down, so that they were sold at from 15 to 25 cents per bag on the open market. I personally knew farmers who drew their potatoes out and dumped them in the field, because they could not sell them at all. We are face to face with competition, the law of supply and demand, and have to accept what our products will bring on the open market.

The farmers of this country are looking for a relief in taxation. That has been referred to on more than one occasion by hon. members of this House. I refer to indirect taxation through the protective tariff that is in operation in this country. We are not looking for any favours, but we are looking for a policy that will make it easier for the poor man to live, a fiscal policy for this country that will not make the rich man richer and the poor man poorer. We are looking for relief along that line, and as the hon. leader of the Progressive party (Mr. Crerar) stated, we are looking for a revision of the tariff and we are looking for that revision to be downward.

In conclusion, I say that we, as farmers, are not concerned about politics. We are not here to build up any political party as a political party, neither the Liberal party, the Conservative party, nor the Progressive party. We are not here to build up any party as a party; we are here to support the Government or to support any party that will bring forward legislation that, we believe, will be in the interest of the great masses of this country. That is our object and our attitude as farmers, and that is the position which we occupy in this House. We want better conditions for the great masses of the people, and, as I said before, a fiscal policy that will not make the rich man richer and the poor man poorer.

Mr. THOMAS E. ROSS (North Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, at this late hour it would seem almost a mistake that I should rise to speak on this debate. At the same time, there are a few thoughts which I wish to lay before the members of Parliament, and in availing myself of this opportunity of doing so, I shall endeavour to be brief; in fact, I may make the promise in the beginning that I will not detain hon. members any great length of time.

In the first place, I would like to refer to the fact that we have with us in this Parliament the first lady member of the House of Commons of this Dominion of Canada. I am glad to note that the situation is such that we have at the present time an opportunity of having our Canadian womanhood represented in the Parliaments of this country. I am glad to know also that the young lady member for South-east Grey (Miss Macphail) belongs to this large Progressive group of which I myself am proud to be a member. I consider that is as it should be, owing to the fact that the rights of our Canadian womanhood have been won for them by the organized farmers of Canada. The honour for bringing that about is due to the Canadian Council of Agriculture; it was through the pressure that they brought to bear that our Canadian womanhood at last received what I always contended was only their just right of which they had been deprived so long.

Yesterday afternoon, while I was listening to the speech of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray), my attention was attracted by a statement which he made to the effect that the British Empire had been built up on the foundation of personal liberty, and I take it for granted that the hon. member, in speaking of personal liberty in that way, expects us to interpret it in that broad sense of having all due respect and appreciation of the rights of others as well as being careful to see that we receive our own individual rights. To my mind, the true foundation of all national life, as well as private life, rests on practical religion, which includes not only the worship of God, but brotherly treatment of our fellowmen. If we adopt this principle as the basis and the only true foundation of success, whether in private or in national life, it will have the effect of removing from our minds the thought, and from our lives the spirit, of selfishness, and of replacing it with the spirit of service. We shall then be in the proper position to be worthy representatives of the citizens of this great country of ours, who have committed to our hands the trust of guardianship, the responsibility of stewardship, and who are looking to us to see that this Parliament shall secure for the people of Canada a government by the people and in the interests of Canadian citizens as a whole. I hope and trust that we shall have that spirit of brotherly treatment of all men, and that legislation may be based upon the principle of equal rights to all and special privileges to none.

In looking over the Speech from the Throne, I notice that reference has been made to that decline in prices of farm products for the year 1921 as compared with those which obtained in former years. It might not be out of place for me to point out in this connection, that market values of farm products are set on the basis of supply and demand and not on the basis of cost of production plus profits, as is the case of many other lines of production, also that the feature of supply and demand is so greatly affected by weather and climatic conditions, over which we have practically little or no control, that it is quite beyond the score of men who engage in agriculture to regulate the market values for their products. While this may be true as to the world's market values of the products of agriculture, there is still another feature which has much to do with determining the price received by the producer and also that paid by the consumer of these farm products which are essentially classed in the lists of the necessities of life. The price received by the producer and also that paid by the consumer are very largely determined by access to adequate markets and marketing facilities, also to the cost of transportation of the products from the producer to the available markets and of the system of distribution of the same. I might also say that I consider the system used at the present time in regard to the distribution of the natural products of agriculture is far from being satisfactory; that it operates to the direct disadvantage of the producer; that it is the means of greatly increasing the cost of living to the consumer, and that it is of profit, in most cases, only to many who have done little if anything to help along the real work of production. I would like to see the whole system of distribution investigated to the end that the producer and the consumer might be brought closer together, and that a system of co-operation might be evolved which would work to the mutual advantage of all parties concerned. I am glad that, as intimated in the Speech from the Throne, the Government have taken account of those facts; that they are already seeking to get more favourable conditions as to the sale and marketing of the products of the farm, and that they are seeking to make arrangements with the railway authorities with respect to reduction of rates upon our agricultural commodities. I hope that this "seeking" spoken of may be brought before the House in the form of proposed legislation, and I believe it will have the strong support of all parties of the House.

There is another matter which I should like to mention, in fact it was mainly because I wished to press it upon the attention of the House that I rose to speak at this late hour. In connection with the decline in prices of farm products at the present time I desire to point out that this produces a very serious condition of affairs, in its effect upon soldier settlers. Many of our returned soldiers who risked their lives and endured so much for this country to which we belong and for the welfare of humanity as a whole, stand to lose all they had as well as to have a heavy debt hanging over them, because they became settlers under the provisions of the Soldier Settlement Act and under the conditions imposed by the Soldier Settlement Board. My own personal knowledge of and acquaintance with many of these men lead me to believe that they are honestly trying to make good. Some of them, I am free to admit, have not proved to be men who are fitted to become successful farmers, but the great majority of them, I believe, are, and I have found them to be honest in their endeavours, appreciative of the consideration and assistance given to them by members of the board, and not unreasonable in their requests. I have in my possession a number of letters from soldier settlers on the farms, and I may say that they are very reasonable. They are loyal to the board and do not in any way complain of the treatment they have received. However, they feel very bitterly the situation in which they find themselves to-day. We must remember that the farms, as well as the stock and equipment which were purchased for these men who took advantage of the Government loans provided for the purpose, were purchased during the time of the unusually high prices, and that the men are now forced to place the products of their toil and enterprise on the market at greatly reduced market value. They have no alternative, as they are forced to dispose of whatever marketable product they may have in order at least to try to meet obligations in connection with the repayment of loans received from the Government. In my opinion, viewing the situation from the standpoint of one who is, and always has been, in close practical touch with farming conditions, especially as they prevail in the province of Ontario, the annual payment which these men are required to make is too high, in many cases being entirely beyond what they can realize on the produce which they can sell, without running themselves short of feed and of seed for the succeeding crop. I sincerely hope that hon. members will give this matter their most careful and sympathetic consideration, and that some legislation may be brought forth during the present session which will very greatly remedy the serious conditions to which I have referred. I may venture to suggest, in this connection, that at least an extension of time might be made in reference to the repayment of loans for stock and equipment, and that the regulations be so changed as to provide that the repayment of the stock and equipment loan extend over a period of ten or more years instead of over a period of four years, as at present provided. I would also suggest that the time of payment be changed from the first of November to, say, the first of March of the following year. Those of us who are intimately acquainted with agricultural affairs know that the first of November is a very inopportune time at which to be compelled to meet payments. It is not necessary for me to go into details in that connection, because it is generally realized that this is the time when we are least prepared to meet payments, by reason of the pressure of fall work. We have not been able, possibly, to get our crop threshed and have not had an opportunity to feed our stock to fit them for the market. I would therefore ask that the date of payment be changed from the first of November to the first of March. Further, I would ask that an immediate and thorough investigation be made of the administration of the Soldiers' Settlement Act under present conditions. In this connection I shall read, in part, a letter which I received in my mail to-day from one of the soldier settlers:

> Since writing you I have found out that several settlers who made partial payments last November are practically out of feed for their live stock, have no seed grain on hand nor the means to get it..

Thanks to local help I am not in quite that predicament, but I have been talking to several neighbouring farmers, and they told me that as soon as I was assured a reasonable chance of staying on, and that the amount of payments would be so revised that I would have a reasonable chance of meeting them, that I might take some bags and they would give me some seed grain, but they wanted to be sure I was to get the benefit and that it would not be seized to help cover up the deficit from buying when everything was at its height. I feel sure that unless something is done in the next two weeks, or before seeding commences, that several around here are going to notify the S.S.B. that they cannot support their families from the income from the cows and hens after buying the extra feed, and so have decided to quit and work out. The majority seem intent on going to the towns or with building contractors.

They expect to lose all they paid down and that there will still be large deficits. I believe an early announcement that those so situated might sell part of the present live stock to buy feed for the rest and seed grain where necessary, or that seed grain and feed would be supplied at once, would prevent a good deal of loss and trouble, and that the best of them would try a little harder to hang on and weather it out.

I know you have a great deal of very important business to transact, but doubt if any is much more urgent than at least an immediate investigation into this matter. The boys are thoroughly sick of red tape, but have all the old pep when they see a thing worth while.

This is an example of the letters received, and it also reveals the feeling that is prevalent among the soldier settlers. I do hope that something will be done at this session of Parliament with a view to relieving the serious situation in which these men are placed. In the constituency of North Simcoe, which I have the honour to represent, there are a number of soldier settlers. This letter which I have just read was entirely unexpected. It does not come from any soldier settler in my riding, but it brings its own message, and is a statement of the actual condition in which these men are placed.

In reference to the re-establishment, medical treatment, and vocational training for former members of the Canadian forces, I feel that nothing should be omitted which might be done to safeguard the interests and promote the general welfare of our returned men. I would especially urge that immediate provision be made for those classes of ex-service men who have been rendered unemployable through war service, and who are at present without adequate means of support; also that suitable provision be made for their dependents as well as the dependents of those reported missing. This is a matter that closely touches me in my relationship with the riding I represent. We have many in that constituency of the class I have mentioned, and I feel that we cannot do too much for them.

Another matter to which I wish to refer is one which possibly, I think, will not be very popular with hon. members. In that, however, I may be surprised. It affords me great pleasure, in speaking on the subject of economy, to note that the Government has taken into serious consideration the question of retrenchment in the administration of the public affairs of the country, I hope that the bill to be submitted regarding the Department of Militia and Defence, and the co-ordination of the various branches of defence forces under one ministerial head, may become law. We all realize the very urgent need of strict economy in the management of the affairs of our country at this time. In this connection may I be permitted to suggest that a good place to start on the road to practical economy in public life is with our own individual personal interests. It seems to me that we might well give proof of our sincerity in this matter by introducing legislation to reduce our present sessional indemnity from $4,000 to the former amount of $2,500, and I for one am prepared to support the Government on the introduction of such a legislation. I am fully aware that the labourer is worthy of his hire and I realize also that the cheapest man so far as salary is concerned is often the dearest man in the end when ability and efficiency are taken into account. Nevertheless, I am of the opinion that the increase of $1,500 in the sessional indemnity was not justifiable at the time it was made, nor is it justifiable in the face of existing market conditions as we know them to be. As I have said, therefore, I for one am prepared to support any legislation brought forward to reduce the indemnity. I may add that this suggestion is an entirely voluntary one on my part; I am in no way under obligation to my constituency to act in the matter, and they have not at any time asked me to bring it up or even suggested that I should do so. My constituents elected me not because of any pre-election promises, for I never made any, but because they were thoroughly tired of what they had been receiving in the past and were looking forward to obtaining a government by the people, an administration which would bring down measures in the interests of the citizens of Canada as a whole. I am glad that in looking back over the events of our campaign in North Simcoe I can say that so far as the Progressive party was concerned that campaign was confined entirely to leading questions of policy and to the public questions of the day, and that we did not stoop to personalities of any kind.

In concluding, I must confess that I am inclined to be quite optimistic as to the sincerity of the intentions of the Government as set forth in the Speech from the Throne. I hope that this session may prove to be one of true co-operation on the part of all parties in the House to bring forth legislation which shall be for the advancement of our nation as a whole.

I desire to thank the hon. members for their courtesy and the patience with which they have listened to me at this late hour.

On the motion of Mr. Baxter the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11.20 p.m.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. McMurray for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Tuesday, March 14.

Hon. J. B. M. BAXTER (St. John City and St. John and Albert Counties) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, allow me to offer you my congratulations upon your elevation to the Speaker's Chair. You do honour to your race and I therefore join with others who have spoken in congratulating you. I regret not being able congratulate you. I regret not being able to perfectly understand the French language when it is spoken. I have read the speech of the hon. member for Westmount and St. Henri (Mr. Mercier) and I congratulate him on his eloquence.

Mr. Speaker, I have tried, though in an imperfect way to signalize at the first opportunity I have had of addressing this Chamber, that great wealth which I think pertains particularly to the Dominion of Canada in that it is so much richer than the rest of this continent in possessing the, I hope, united efforts of two great races, with two great languages, and, one might almost say, two great philosophies, and two great aspirations. I trust that we may so conduct the business of this Parliament that any shadow of difference that may have existed in the past may be dissipated and that we may go forward with a more happy vision of the future of Canada, our own Canada, which can only be great in proportion as her sons and her daughters know one another and respect each race, each creed, each portion of the country for that which is best in its aspirations and ideals.

I speak, too, from the standpoint of a party which is by no means yet dead in this country, even though its strength in this House does not proportionately represent its strength in the country. I speak as the member of a party that looks back to those great men, Macdonald and Cartier, who in an infinitely more powerful way than I could do, put before the people of Canada the things that I shall humbly try to express to-day. That spirit still lives in the Conservative party, and the country will yet see its strength, because we are a party that holds true to the old aspirations, a party with a definite and a fixed policy, so that the man or woman in this country who is asked to pass judgment upon our professions knows exactly what those professions are. They do not vary with the longitude and the latitude of the place where they are expressed.

I do not wish to detain the House very long; I merely wish to pass briefly in review some of the things that have impressed me in the debate so far as it has gone. I think that there developed during the discussion three principal questions. The main question seemed to be the railways; second, the revenue required to meet our obligations; and third, possibly incidental to one of the others, the reflection upon that general depression of business which unfortunately prevails and the distress which is actually consequent upon it in some localities. I heard my right hon. leader (Mr. Meighen) call attention to those matters in his discussion of the Speech from the Throne and I awaited with interest the reply which would be made by my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King), the leader of the Government. I expected that there would be a fuller disclosure of the purposes of the Government than naturally would be made in the speeches, excellent as they were, made by the mover and the seconder of the Address in reply. I expected an amplification of the Speech from the Throne. But, what did I find? I have tried to summarize honestly and fairly the topics touched upon by the leader of the administration. I do not know whether it would be in answer to the comments of my right hon. leader on this side of the House upon the railways, upon revenue, or upon business conditions, but the leader of the Government made as his first important statement, "Quebec is not the only province you lost." Now, really, I do not see how that can dispose of any important question. The people have spoken and this party must, as it does, accept the verdict of the people, and does, as it shall, build for the future to convince those people that they should give a more favourable verdict upon another occasion; but I fail to see how the mere assertion that the party of which I am a member lost the support of any province in the Dominion helps the people of this country to solve the question of the management of the national railways, or tells them particularly what the future of the revenue will be. It may be very good tactics from the purely party standpoint, but it seems to me that this House would perhaps be quite as ready to welcome a discussion of the vital matters of to-day, matters which those on this side of the House have been sent here to discuss, matters which have caused unrest among the people, and which must be dealt with, and dealt with rightly and successfully, if our country is to have a future such as we desire. If the leader of the Government wished to place the discussion upon the plane of party politics, if he wished to place it upon the plane of—one might almost say, with all respect—stump speaking, he might at least have balanced the account by informing the House how many actual supporters he himself has from the three Western provinces; and it might not be out of place to make an analysis of the reasons why my hon. friend has not a larger following from these provinces. It is true, members supporting this side were not elected there, but has my hon. friend been successful? The leader of the Government did enter into a calculation based upon the election returns, a calculation in which, I think, his arithmetic has betrayed him into a slight error; because if you apply the principle of proportional representation, as was suggested, I think by the hon. member from Marquette (Mr. Crerar), or some other hon. member during the debate, it will be ascertained that the Conservative party is entitled to a very much larger representation in this House than it possesses at present. My hon. friend said that the entrance of a third party gave the Conservative party in many cases the opportunity for victory; but he will find that in many constituencies which his own party carried, their success was very largely due to the same fact—I am told, his own constituency, for example. I do not know whether down by the sea it is only a wraith of political mist, but something drifted to us there in the atmosphere—perhaps it came over from Prince Edward Island—that there would not have been entire sorrow or great heartburning in my hon. friend's party if there had been a minority instead of a majority for him in North York. This appears to be the first point that my hon. friend made in answer to the leader of the Opposition.

The second point he made was when he told the leader of the Opposition: Oh, we should not take campaign literature too seriously. I trust, Sir, that that statement was meant in a jocular sense. If my hon. friend was in earnest it will be well worth the time of this House, and the time of the country, to analyze the statement and to consider what it really means in the political life of Canada. To-day if you go into another chamber in this building you will see upon the walls representations—somewhat crude it is true but still representations—of the power of the printed word; and every member of this House knows that there is nothing more potent in electoral contests than that which appears in the periodical press and in the pamphlets that are issued by the respective political parties. Now, Sir, if it has really come to this, that we should not take these things seriously; if the pamphlets and the newspaper publications issued in behalf of a party are mere trash, and wind, and idle show, then what sincerity can we expect in political life? I will say this, Mr. Speaker—that so far as the literature issued in the last campaign on the part of the official Opposition is concerned, it said exactly the thing that we meant. We put before the people that for which we were standing and what we proposed to do if we were returned to power. It is because of that in a large part of the country we did not get sufficient votes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BAXTER: Under the influences that were at work the people did not want our policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BAXTER: It is so pleasant, Mr. Speaker, to find hon. members on the opposite side in such cordial agreement with me that I will invite them to continue that attitude. I accept that agreement and I trust that my hon. friends in the future will make good use of it. I will say for the Progressive party that they too used no camouflage and no subterfuge in putting their case before the country. Our party and their party did not agree on vital principles of public administration, and the electors that supported the one group of candidates would not support the other group; we were not standing for free trade, we were not standing for the abolition of tariff barriers.

My hon. friends opposite have welcomed the suggestion I made, that the country did not accept our policy. Let us for a moment examine the reason why the country accepted their pamphlets;—I will not say, their policies, because their leader has told us that these things are only idle words, representations, apparently, for the purpose of catching the votes of the people by a means which does not bind anyone to make good the suggestions or promises contained in the printed word. Now, viewing the case in this way why was it that my hon. friends to your right, Mr. Speaker, did not win in many more provinces and did not win many more constituencies? We had throughout the campaign repeated assurances from the present leader of the Government that there was practically no difference in aim between his party and the Progressive party, or between the platform of the Liberal party and that of the Progressive party. We were told the Progressive party went a little further but that it was a more advanced form of Liberalism; and the other day there was some discussion as to whether this was merely a tendency or an attitude. The answer, Mr. Speaker, is absolutely plain. The Progressives did not support my hon. friends opposite because they did not believe those gentlemen would keep the promises they professed to make. If the Progressives had had faith that hon. gentlemen opposite would go so far along the road of the Progressivist doctrine as they claimed naturally they would have supported them, every man; but I fear the Progressives knew they could not trust them.

The leader of the Government gave as a third answer to the leader of the Opposition the claim that the present House is representative of the people. I know that we have gone through all the formalities of the ballot, expressing the will of the people in a constitutional way; but I would rather think that this House, in some respects, is perhaps representative of the will of some people who stepped into the campaign at a rather late date and had a very invigorating effect upon it from that time until the polls closed, and I think this will develop a little later on. Though we have been told that we are to look to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) for a declaration upon the railway question as it affects the country, I think very probably there will be more postponements, and that possibly there may be consultations, and many consultations, with those interests which so greatly affected the result of the elections in the way that I have indicated. I hope the Parliament is representative of the people. I know there are some people who will not fail to have their interests well indicated in Parliament.

My. hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) dealt with the return to the Prairie provinces of their natural resources, an interesting subject, and one which has been before the country for a considerable time. I shall not attempt to emphasize that which has been very well said by my leader, but I would like to deal with this subject for a moment, not from a provincial standpoint, but rather from the attitude taken towards the subject by the people of the provinces. I feel that the subject is one which ought to be approached in a large and capable way. There should be generous appreciation, there should be fair dealing; but, at the same time, unless we are to see an abandonment of the last shred and vestige of Liberalism in this country, we surely will retain that respect for the provinces as autonomous units, which was so much enforced by the Liberal party in Ontario, and by those great men who were sent to this House in times gone by representing the Liberal party. Here is what I find fault with: Whether you call it an arbitration or not, or whether you call it an accounting or not, or whether it is final or whether it is not to be final, the proposition as I analyze it from what the leader of the House has put upon Hansard, is simply this: that he or his Government, or someone for them, shall sit in at an accounting, or an arbitration, or a conference of some kind, with the provinces interested and then submit the result of that to this House for approval. What then becomes of the right to be heard of the old Maritime provinces, by whose sacrifices and contributions the development of the great northwestern portion of our country was made possible. I do not say, from the standpoint of New Brunswick, that anything short of absolute and complete justice should be done to each province or one province—that ought to go in this country without saying; but I do say that, if there is to be a revision of the terms, this Parliament ought not to pass upon what is done for the parent provinces of the Dominion without hearing these provinces. Where, in this proposition, is there any opportunity for an accounting of the burden that has been borne by Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick? Where is there a suggestion of any revision of the terms that they are to receive, or that they have been receiving in the past? I know—and I have said it myself once—that I could get along splendidly with anybody, that all I wanted in this world was just to have my own way, and if I got that I did not want anything else. That is all we want in the Maritime provinces—if you will just give us our own way in the sense of giving us a fair, square deal when you are dealing with other parts of the Dominion, and if you will undertake not to decide matters behind our backs, but realize that we have a right to sit in with any consultation that may be undertaken, I can see my way clear to be in accord with some solution of this problem. But neither the Speech from the Throne nor the explanations given by the hon. Prime Minister of this particular passage throws any light in the direction I have indicated. I throw out the hint to him knowing his good nature, and I think possibly he will be quite willing to act upon it.

Possibly the fifth point that was made by my hon. friend the leader of the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King) was in connection with the dispute with my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) on this side of the House as to what took place at a certain conference in London. I am not going to deal with that. It will be effectively dealt with probably on some other occasion. I only want to say this: that if we have fair play, if we have that appreciation in public life of the real efforts of devoted public servants, this country, and this House—the three sides of this House—will join in paying tribute to my hight hon. leader for the stand that he took when he insisted, with respect to the great international matters, that this country and the United States should come together in consultation, and that no world policy should develop unless there was first laid down the principle of harmonious co-operation with our great neighbour to the south. This country has shown an admirable example. For more than a century it has been untouched internally by the ravages of war, and nothing, I think, in the present heterogeneous condition of the European countries will save this old world from the utter wreck and ruin, and bankruptcy of war, but the great alliance of Great Britain with her dominions, I might say with the galaxy of equal states, and the United States of America joining hand in hand to enforce upon the world the simple law that there shall be no more murder.

Mr. PUTMAN: And no trade reciprocity.

Mr. BAXTER: I think I would even go that for the satisfaction of my hon. friend. His leader referred to the former speeches on the subject of the tariff which he said had not been implemented by action, but at the same time I think it was the boast of the party, a member of which has just touched upon this subject, that now, for the first time in many long years, constitutional government had been restored to Canada. With the realization of constitutional government one would expect, of course, the disappearance of that autocratic mystery in regard to the speeches from the Throne to which my hon. friend so much objects. This was a time for a new beginning. The old autocracy, I will say, has only given place to the new. I will commend that to the judgment of my hon. friend who asked me to refer to this subject. May I ask that hon. friend of mine if he is not really in his innermost heart, or somewhere in the deep recesses of his mind, just a little disappointed with the paucity of the Speech from the Throne, and the remarks of his leader upon this subject. I have not the pleasure of his acquaintance as yet, but I hope to make it. However I have not the slightest doubt he was present at the Ottawa convention, and I have not the slightest doubt that he enthusiastically cheered the platform and that no part of the platform appealed to him with greater force than that bearing on the customs tariff of the country, except possibly the paragraph which bound the party, in the most solemn manner, to put that platform into force at the first opportunity they had of doing so. I have not the slightest doubt that he applauded, either in this House or out of it, the efforts which were made on at least two successive occasions on the then Opposition side to present that platform by resolution in this House and to ask the House to adopt it. This party which has succeeded to power, so suddenly and possibly so unexpectedly, is not like an aggregation of individuals coming together for the first time to shape a policy. They had their policy for more than two years before they got an opportunity of putting it into force. The thing is all ready-made, just as ready-made as one of the nicest suits of political garments in the hand-me-down store of politics. Why did they not bring the article down and lay it on the table of the House at the opening of the session? They did not need any time to stitch it, or alter it, or baste it, or do anything else with it. They had it ready for two years, and if they really meant what they said when they went to the country, then their political literature was not mere camouflage, and they ought to be ready at this very hour to put into force the tariff planks of the Ottawa convention. Another convention is not required to bring that about. We have, however, possibly the first of a long array of excuses that will be offered during this Parliament and several successive Parliaments. We are told that we should not take this class of literature too seriously.

To my hon. friend who asked me about reciprocity, I commend the devious course which the Government that he adorns is beginning to pursue so early in the session. As to reciprocity, I will tell him, as he probably already knows, that the party of which I am a member, does not stand for reciprocity, and we told the people so. There was a celebrated occasion when his party told the people that they were in favour of reciprocity, and at that time the people did not think they were sidestepping; the people thought they were going to bring reciprocity into effect, and they did not give them an opportunity to do so. I do not see why I cannot do business in my shop, and another man have a right to do business in his shop across the street; I do not see why we cannot compete justly and honourably, each man looking after his own business, each man trying to support from that business those who are dependent upon him, without the one man sacrificing his business to the other to make the latter more opulent and the man who makes the sacrifice more dependent. That is my view of what reciprocity with the United States means; but it is not necessary that people who will not make a treaty of reciprocity should ever contemplate the horrors of war as a means of settling their commercial differences. I might tell my hon. friend that I have a bit of this poor, discarded, rejected literature. When this whitey-brownish sheet first came out, probably it was whiter than it is now.

Mr. MARTELL: Is it not headed "Meighen or Whom"? What is the caption of the pamphlet?

Mr. BAXTER: My hon. friend shall have the caption; he shall have the address, and, Heaven help him, he shall have the contents. The caption is "Women and Politics". The address is "National Liberal Committee, 115 Sparks Street, Ottawa." Then there are the names—"Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, M.P., Liberal leader, Andrew Haydon, National Organizer and General Secretary, issued October 1921, publication No. 20". This pamphlet makes an appeal to the women of the country. It first takes a hypothetical price for a pair of shoes, and then it says—I am going to give my hon. friends an opportunity to applaud:

> Mr. King thinks first of the people and secondly of the industry: All the people are greater than a few manufacturers. Mr. King stands for all the people.

And the phrase "all the people" is in capital letters.

> Mr. King is against high protection. In the example of the pair of boots just referred to, Mr. Meighen would stand for the manufacturer getting 50 cents for himself on each pair of boots. That is the tariff should be 50 cents per pair. But Mr. King would say, No.

A great big capital "No.", just as emphatic as anybody would want to make it. I commend this to the attention of the hon. gentleman who was so interested a moment ago. Let him listen to these words that follow:

> Twenty cents a pair is enough.

Do not give the bloated manufacturer fifty cents a pair; give him twenty cents. Take it out of the people just the same! It is a song of degrees. My hon. friends on either side of the House I notice, are not familiar enough with a certain book to appreciate the remark "a song of degrees." The pamphlet continues:

> Let the manufacturer have this amount to aid his industry, but let the other thirty cents per pair be allowed to the woman who buys the boots, making the price to her $5.20 instead of $5.50.

Mr. Speaker, just as one man to another, do you not think, and does the House not think, that looks very much like thirty cents? But we get a little further on a bit of the policy of the great party which has come into power. Before I go on to that, let me read this which is even more interesting:

> The twenty cents per pair as duty collected against foreign goods will still go to the Government in customs duties. This explains the difference between a tariff for protection and a tariff for revenue.

My right hon. leader has never been able to understand the difference between them, the very thing that has been explained in this pamphlet, so I am going to hand it to him, just as it has been put out by the Liberal party. The difference is just thirty cents. The pamphlet states:

> But, someone argues, that on such a reduction of duties the customs revenue will fall and the Government will fail to get money with which to carry on. The answer is reasonable lowering of tariff duties and means a great increase in trading. A great increase in buying by the consumer, because he can get much more for his money and consequently a sure increase in Government revenue.

That is some of the literary pabulum that was distributed amongst the ladies of Nova Scotia as an invitation to vote for the Liberal party, and they did so.

I do not know whether they will be quite so well satisfied when they are told that they should not have taken this too seriously. But they have taken it seriously, because they voted accordingly. Now, let us see what happens. The answer is, lowering of tariff duties means a great increase in trading. A great increase in trading with whom? With somebody beyond our borders; otherwise there could not be any customs duties paid upon these shoes or any other articles that are referred to. Now we have this party, which sought power and obtained it, saying, if they are to be bound by their assertions at all, that it is a desirable thing to have the footwear of Canadian people made outside of Canada by other hands than those of Canadian workmen. If that is their doctrine, and it seems to be, I for one do not subscribe to it; I am a protectionist in order that there may be industries within our cities. Furthermore, respecting agriculture as undoubtedly I do, I do not conceive it to be in the best interests of the country that we should become merely an agricultural people, without as large an industrial development as it is possible for us to create. I believe that the one reacts upon the other; if you give the proper safeguard to manufacturing industry you thereby stimulate your agriculture and increase your home market thus developing the country within its own bounds. My face is therefore set against any current running in the direction of large imports of those things which we can make for ourselves. Before they get through with the task of squaring the circle, the task of doing the impossible, my hon. friends will hear from the great and powerful industrial province of Quebec, that the industries of that province shall not be destroyed merely in order that a pamphlet like this may be vindicated before the folk in the provinces down by the sea. In the light of that I can understand why the leader of the Government begs and prays my right hon. leader not to take campaign literature too seriously.

We were also given, as the seventh and, I think, the last point of answer to my right hon. friend, a definition of Liberalism. It was liberal enough to include, I thought, this world and a great part of the next,—of course, there is a certain part of the next world that I wholly expect to be reserved for those with whom I am associated.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BAXTER: Hon. gentlemen opposite know, of course, that I mean Heaven; I know that there is something else in their minds. Now, we have as an answer to the criticism of my right hon. friend, an extract from a speech made by the leader of the Government at the Liberal convention, a very nice quotation couched in most excellent language and read very mellifluously. But my mind seized, to a certain extent, upon one small paragraph wherein, in accepting the heavy task of leadership, my hon. friend said that he might look for guidance and counsel to the great forces assembled about him. In what I am about to say I do not mean to be in the least offensive, nor do I pretend to draw an exact parallel. However, I could not help thinking, in this connection, of a certain bit of historical language that is to be found in one of the most celebrated of British novels. We have all enjoyed reading of, and have sympathized with, the tribulations of poor little Oliver Twist, and no doubt hon. members will all recall the occasion when Oliver found himself in the house of Fagin on that eventful morning when the old man with the red hair and white eyebrows walked up and down the side of the room imitating a gentleman looking in the shop windows. It will be remembered that the old man had a number of articles of value about his person, among other things a stickpin, of paste diamond, in his necktie. The Artful Dodger and Master Charley Bates were on the scene, and the trick was to see how much they could take away from the old fellow without his feeling their touch. Fagin, calling Oliver's attention to this performance, used this language respecting the great forces that were assembled about Oliver: "Make 'em your models, my dear, make 'em your models. Do everything they bid you, and take their advice in all matters, especially the Dodger's, my dear. He will be a great man himself and will make you one too, if you take pattern by him." Now, I do not know who is the Dodger on the other side; I will leave that for my hon. friends to find out. I do not think the Artful Dodger was present at the Liberal convention, when my hon. friend accepted the duties of leadership, I think he appeared upon the scene shortly before the election. Some of us, no doubt, can see the way in which he appeared, and the very useful influence his presence had on the results. But I again advise my hon. friend to take pattern after the Dodger; it will be very useful for him to do so in the strategic policy which will have to be pursued with regard to some very interesting matters of state during the next few years.

Those sum up, I think not unfairly—I do not mean them to be unfair at all events—the professed answers of my hon. friend to my right hon. leader. But at the outset I said that, as well as I could discover, there were about three principal questions before the House. The first of these is the question of railways. As was said yesterday by an hon. member on this side of the House, the act is there; and the machinery is ready to be put in force, what is the use of talking about co-ordination unless you co-ordinate? The power is there to do it now; it does not need Parliament to do it. "Solvitur ambulando" is the best answer to a good many political questions.

In dealing with the railways I want to deal with something that is of peculiar interest to part of the Maritime provinces. I believe that in what I am about to say I shall have the wholehearted sympathy, and, I trust, the support of my hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Copp) and also of every other member from New Brunswick who sits on your right, Mr. Speaker. During the campaign a very strenuous attack was made upon the then Government party for its alleged actions with regard to the harbour of Portland, Maine. I felt, in fact I knew, that the newspaper allegations were not based upon facts. I want to say to my hon. friends that the problem now is theirs, a problem which otherwise the preceding Government must have faced. From the standpoint of the city of St. John, where millions of the money of the taxpayers of that city had been expended, as well as many other millions of the money of the Dominion of Canada, for the provision of wharves and railway facilities, I say, that the time has come to do our business through Canadian ports; and if we are to have the obligation upon us of a vast railway system, we should at all events get for Canadian ports, and for no other than Canadian ports, every pound of freight and every passenger that that system of railways can carry. When the hon. Minister of Railways does deal with this subject in the House, I trust we shall have an assurance that this Government will practically cut off the connection between Montreal and Portland, Maine, and will divert the traffic to our two great winter ports—ports that are fairly well equipped, but will stand better equipping yet—the ports of Halifax and St. John. I would not like the Government to think that there is any rivalry between our Atlantic seaboard ports in regard to this question. Our true position is to insist here with all the power at the command of every one of us from the Maritime provinces that Canadian trade, as was said by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, shall flow through Canadian channels; and, to ensure this, we must develop not only the ports of Halifax and St. John but, in time, other ports in these provinces, to take care of the immense trade which this country will produce. But when this system of railways is co-ordinated we must not continue to utilize an outlet in the country to the south of us to the detriment of our own ports.

I did not find in what has been said any very definite suggestion as to the raising of revenue, outside of the casual allusion to the customs tariff. I do find in some speeches made by the leader of the Government during the campaign that he estimated the annual expenditure of Canada at about $560,000,000, and he said that it would be advisable to cut it down one-half, or that at least one-
4 p.m. third might be lopped off if one-half were too much. Now, while I want to see a policy of reasonably rigorous economy enforced, I should like at some time a fairly detailed account of the method by which the lopping off of expenses is to be achieved. I fancy that when my hon. friends come down to a minute study of the situation, no matter how vigorous their efforts may be, they will find the difference between the practical necessary expenditure and that which has prevailed in the past is not nearly so great as they were wont to imagine it to be when they were going about the country giving reasons why the people should support them at the polls. If we are to have lower customs duties it will require, as the little Halifax pamphlet indicated, a very vast increase in the quantity of importations in order to raise the bulk of the revenue from the customs, a thing that I shall feel very sorry for, and I think the whole industrial portion of the country will join in my sorrow, because it means that for every dollar raised in customs duties an opportunity will be lost to Canadian workmen to manufacture the needed goods at home. However, I await some announcement as to how the Government is going to curtail expenditure and also increase revenue.

I do not know how it appeals to hon. members, but possibly some have given a little consideration to the state of business in the principal centres of Canada. I do not want to point to any gloomy outlook, I do not want by any word of mine to add to any feeling of insecurity that may be felt in some quarters at present, but as practical, sensible men I think we all know that in the cities throughout the Dominion there are a great many business houses just wavering and supported by the banks in the hope of trade revival than there have been for a great many years. Considering this, coupled with the fact that we realize that in every large centre of population, yes, in every fairly large centre of population, there is considerable unemployment, considerable real distress, I would suggest that possibly we have been spending a little too much on frills, laces, fol-de-rols and show, in this very House, in connection with this very Parliament.

While I take the stand on protection that I do—and I cannot see anything that is likely to change my mind with respect to that as a sound policy for the country—I cannot be oblivious to the fact that all over Canada, outside of the question of the tariff, the plain every day men and women have become dissatisfied with the methods of administration of the past, no matter by what party those methods were pursued, and those people do not want mere glitter and show. We may think them mistaken in some of the views they enunciate, but down at the bottom of all is the desire somehow or other to get for this country a dollar's worth—real worth in the old Scotch sense—for every dollar that is expended, as well as equality of opportunity for every man, woman and child who is happy enough to dwell within our borders. I sympathise with that feeling, I believe that all of us have got to take it into account more and more in the future, and I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the country will be better and happier the nearer we get down to those old bedrock principles—to the homely virtues of ordinary common honesty and decent living.

Mr. HANCE J. LOGAN (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, will you permit me at the commencement of the brief remarks which I intend to make, to offer my congratulations to you, Sir? You and I came into this House many years ago on the same day, and at that time we were, I think, the two youngest members of the House. I regret to say that in this House only three then elected, besides your good self and myself, are with us. Memories have endeared the friendship which existed in a personal way between your Honour and myself, and no one in this House is more pleased than I to see you to-day occupying the position of First Commoner of Canada.

I have listened with close attention to the remarks of my good friend from the city of St. John (Mr. Baxter). He and I have occupied many platforms and addressed many audiences upon subjects dear to our hearts, one of those subjects being the rights of the Maritime provinces, but I regret in the eloquent speech which he has just delivered, my hon. friend did not devote some of his attention to the great interests that lie within those provinces, particularly the operation of the Intercolonial railway.

My hon. friend has regretted very much that a line has been acquired, leading to Portland. He states this Government should get rid of the line between Montreal and Portland in order that Canadian seaports shall not be endangered. My hon. friend will be surprised to know that when, in 1920, the Grand Trunk was being acquired by the late Government, and a resolution was moved by a Liberal member of this House seeking to protect the Maritime ports of Canada, his leader (Mr. Meighen) and every follower behind him helped to vote that resolution down.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: He is young yet.

Mr. LOGAN: Now, when he is out of power, he tells us to get rid of this horrible port of Portland that is going to do so much harm to the Maritime provinces. My hon. friend also told us that the party to which he belongs is not dead. Is there need to proclaim in this House that that party is not actually dead? It was not dead, he said, it was the same old party of Macdonald and Cartier.

If I may be permitted to read in that connection part of an editorial published in a good Tory organ last evening, I think the answer will be found to my hon. friend's statement. It is an editorial from a paper admired very much by the Conservative party in years gone by—the Montreal Daily Star.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Loaves and fishes.

Mr. McKENZIE: You have not got any now.

Mr. LOGAN: The editorial reads in part:

> What brought the Unionist Government to disaster was stupid, inconsistent, un-Conservative leadership. Conservative feeling throughout the country was discouraged, disgusted and dismayed.

I commend that to my hon. friend's attention.

> It saw policies which it had always been taught by its great leaders to regard as economic heresy eagerly adopted and warmly advocated by the presumed "Conservative" leader. It saw State socialism preached as Conservative doctrine—

Now listen.

> —a flagrant reversal of principle which should have made Sir John Macdonald turn over in his grave.

[Mr. Logan.]

Yet my friend has the temerity to say this is the party of Macdonald and Cartier.

Mr. Speaker, I propose to devote my attention to a matter which I think is of vital importance. Our good friend the leader of the Progressives (Mr. Crerar) stated, in the admirable speech which he delivered the other day, that we should get down to business and talk about things which are really vital to the welfare of this country. I desire now to discuss the question of the Intercolonial railway, and I shall confine my remarks to the position of that railway in Canada. I do so for many reasons, one being the gross lack of knowledge that seems to permeate the whole country in reference to the Intercolonial railway. When we in the Maritime provinces speak of what we believe to be our rights, we are immediately assailed by people who say we desire to bring back the old patronage system, bring the road back into politics. There is not a member of this House, at least on this side, Mr. Speaker, who desires to bring the Intercolonial railway back into politics, and there is no man on this side of the House who desires it should be operated as it was many years ago.

As far as the employment of men on the Intercolonial railway is concerned the statements made only show the lack of knowledge of people who discuss this matter, because the facts are that the men on the Intercolonial railway are employed, not at the dictation of a political party or its adherents, not even at the dictation of a minister, but very largely at the dictation of the labour unions of the country. Whoever says that we in the Maritime provinces are anxious that the road should be a political road or that we desire to exercise patronage in connection with it does not know what he is talking about. As far as my experience goes, Mr. Speaker, the difficulties of patronage are never welcome to any member of Parliament supporting the Government.

But there is a vital question for the Maritime provinces, and that is the management and operation of this road. My good friend the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) speaking in this House yesterday and referring to the Canadian National Railway Act of 1919, stated that that Act was passed in view of the fact that we had the Intercolonial railway and others. The hon. gentleman does not know, and there do not seem to be many people in this country who do know, that the Canadian National Railway Act never did absorb the Intercolonial railway, and never could absorb it under the constitution of this country. Does my hon. friend not know that the Intercolonial railway to-day is operated under an Order in Council? There could not be a statute passed to take over the Intercolonial railway and place it under any company, be it known as the Canadian National Railway Company or any other, because, as I shall show, the Intercolonial railway is part of the pact of Confederation and guaranteed under a section of the British North America Act.

What did the late government do? They passed an Order in Council providing that the managers of the Intercolonial railway should be—mark you, not the directors of the Canadian National Railway—but the directors of the Canadian Northern Railway, and even afterwards when they endeavoured to put the name "Canadian National Railway" upon the cars, the signs, the paper, etc., of the Intercolonial Railway—not only "Canadian National Railway" but those old and familiar if not always welcome letters "C.N.R."—they found they required to pass an Order in Council, a copy of which I now hold in my hand, showing that the name was simply for purposes of identification. Let me read a part of the Order in Council to which I refer.

Canadian National Railway

At the Government House at Ottawa, Friday the 20th day of December, 1918

Present:

His Excellency
The Governor-General in Council:

Whereas the Minister of Railways and Canals reports that by the Order-in-Council dated the 20th day of November, 1918 (P.C. 2654) the persons, from time to time comprising the Board of Directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company (Which controls and operates the Canadian Northern Railway System) were appointed a Board of Management of the Canadian Government Railways;

That as a matter of convenience in connection with the operation of both systems under one management, the use of one name as a collective or descriptive title for both systems is highly desirable, and refers to the established use of the term "Canadian Northern Railway System" as a descriptive (but not corporative) title for all lines of railway owned or controlled by the Canadian Northern Railway Company and also to the use of the name Canadian Government Railways, which is also merely one of description;

That the use of such a title is a mere matter of description for convenience of reference and does not create a new legal corporate entity or affect in any manner whatsoever the legal status or the rights or obligations of the individual corporations collectively so denoted.

Therefore His Excellency the Governor-General in Council is pleased to order and direct and doth hereby order and direct the Board of Directors aforementioned to use as a collective or descriptive designation the name "Canadian National Railways," in lieu of the names Canadian Northern Railway System and Canadian Government Railways wherever such last mentioned names are or may be at present used—

And so on. With your kind permission, Mr. Speaker, let me trace the history of the Intercolonial railway because it is highly desirable the facts should be brought to light in the discussion of these matters. Do not, I implore you, be carried away by the idea that we in the Maritime provinces are influenced by selfishness. Before I resume my seat I will show you that we are only demanding our rights and not asking for any charity from this country.

What is the history of the Intercolonial? The road was suggested after the Rebellion of 1837. Lord Durham, in his wonderful report of 1838, recommended that this road should be built for military purposes, and in 1849 an Imperial Commission investigated the proposition. In their report it was declared that while the building of the railway might be justified for political and military reasons, its commercial value was doubtful.

From the standpoint of the Maritime provinces let me tell you what the conditions were previous to 1867. We were a very prosperous people. We were dealing with our natural market the New England States of America. From the little province of Nova Scotia went forth three thousand ships, manned by 19,000 sturdy seamen, carrying our goods to the New England States and bringing goods back from those states to our province. Let me give you a few figures illustrating the condition of trade in the Maritime provinces at that time. In 1864 the trade in New Brunswick, that is the per capita trade, was $66; in Nova Scotia it was $46; in Canada that is Old Canada, it was only $35, showing the prosperous condition of our country, at any rate in comparison to the condition of Old Canada.

We did not desire Confederation; we thought the difficulties involved were too great. Probably one of the greatest optimists, as well as one of the greatest leaders of Canada, was my illustrious predecessor in the representation of the county of Cumberland, the late Sir Charles Tupper. But in a speech made in the House of Assembly in 1864 that distinguished statesman, after moving a resolution in favour of Maritime union, said:

"The difficulties of Confederation with Canada are insuperable." What were those difficulties? They were difficulties of distance, difficulties of transportation. We had a sure market with the New England States; we feared the tariff policies of Canada. We feared that the tariff between this country and the United States might be raised. Our fear never reached the point of thinking the duties would be raised as high as they are to-day, but nevertheless we feared the tariff that might be imposed by the United States against Canada.

Sir Charles Tupper, and the other leaders in the Maritime provinces, called a convention at Charlottetown in 1864 and for what purpose? For the purpose of bringing about Maritime union—that is union of the three Maritime provinces. While the convention was in progress probably the greatest galaxy of statesmen that ever entered a harbour of the Maritime provinces landed in Charlottetown. Who were they? Such men as Sir John A. Macdonald, the great leader of the Conservative party; Hon. George Brown, the illustrious and great leader of the Liberal party; D'Arcy McGee, the incomparable Irish orator and statesman; Sir George Etienne Cartier, the wonderful French leader of Quebec; Sir Etienne P. Taché, the prime minister of Canada at that time; Sir Hector Langevin, and a number of other distinguished public men. They came to our little Maritime Union Convention and said: Come in with us. We asked why? "Because," they said, "we have reached an impassé in Canada between Quebec and Ontario. We have not done any business for three years." I think according to the statement made by Sir Etienne P. Taché, which I will read later on, they had had five changes of government in three years They said: "We desire Maritime ports. We cannot make of Canada a great country without access to the sea throughout the entire year." They held out the railway bait to the delegates of the Maritime provinces, and after some time Sir Charles Tupper, and the other Maritime province leaders, agreed to discuss the matter with them.

Let me, Mr. Speaker, recall some of the remarks which were made at that time and which constituted the bait to secure our entrance into Confederation and our forsaking the surety of the New England market. Hon. D'Arcy McGee, in one of his fascinating orations delivered in 1864, pointed out that Canada would give the Maritime provinces direct connection with the wheat producing regions of the great West all the year round and continuing said:

> In this connection if they do not get through Canada, they must ultimately get through the United States, and one reason why I, in season, and perhaps out of season, have continued an advocate for an Intercolonial Railway has been that first, closest and most lasting connection of these Lower Provinces with the Continental trade system, might be established by and through and in union with Canada.

In Nova Scotia, among other things, we were selling to the New England States large quantities of coal. In the Assembly at Quebec Hon. Mr. McGee described in splendid language the extent of the coal fields of the Maritime provinces, and went on to say:

> These exhaustless coal fields will, under our plan—which is in fact our Reciprocity Treaty with the Lower Provinces—become hereafter the great resource of our towns for fuel.

And further on he stated:

> We consume in this country (Canada) as much fuel per annum as they do in New England, and therefore we offer them a market under the Union equal to that which these theorizers want to persuade their followers they would lose.

Speaking in the Mechanics' Institute in the city of St. John he said:

> I am well aware, Mr. Chairman, that we cannot have a commercial league, without other means of intercourse than we now possess.

Further on he said—

> Although I have usually put forward defensive and commercial reasons for the road, I confess to you frankly, that I place as high, or even higher than either, reasons more purely political.

Hon. George Brown had been an opponent of the building of an Intercolonial railway, but during the Confederation negotiations he stated in a powerful speech delivered in the city of Toronto—

> It would be better for us to build a half a dozen Intercolonials rather than that the union of the provinces should not take place.

And in Parliament speaking of the proposed road he said:

> Have honourable gentlemen forgotten that the United States gladly paid twenty millions in hard cash to have Louisiana incorporated in the Republic? But what was Louisiana then to the Americans in comparison with what the Maritime Provinces are at this moment to Canada?

And further on he said—and let me call attention to this, because this was the inducement they held out to us:

> They in the maritime provinces will bring their fish and their coal and their West Indian produce to our three millions of inhabitants.

Mr. Brown always pointed out that the railway could not be a commercial success, but that it was an absolute Confederation necessity.

Sir George Etienne Cartier, speaking in Montreal in 1866 said—

> The Intercolonial is the price being paid in order to secure the maritime ports in the Union.

Sir John Macdonald repeatedly referred in his public address and in Parliament to the road as being a political necessity but said that it would never be a commercial success. Hon. Mr. Ross, in the Confederation debates, among other things said—

> Upper Canada will do well to build the road on its own account if all the other provinces refuse.

Sir E. P. Taché, Premier of Canada, in the Parliamentary debate February 30th, 1865, referred to the lack of winter ports in Canada and defied anyone to take a map of the world and point to any great nation which had not seaports of its own open at all times of the year, and proceeded as follows:

> Canada did not possess these advantages but was shut up in a prison, as it were, for five months in the year in fields of ice, which all the steam engineering apparatus of human ingenuity could not overcome, and so long as this state of affairs continued we must consent to be a small people who could at any moment be assailed and invaded by a people better situated in that respect than we were. Canada was in fact just like a farmer who might stand upon an elevated spot on his property from which he could look upon fertile fields, meandering streams, wood and all else that was necessary to his domestic wants, but who had no outlet to the highway.

He referred to the attitude of the people of the United States and particularly of the Northern states who believed we were in sympathy with the South. He stated they threatened to abolish the transit system and that reciprocity was to be discontinued. He referred to the passport system, and said the only thing which remained to be done was to shut down the gate altogether and prevent passage through their territory. He continued:

> Will we, a great people, coolly and tranquilly cross our arms and wait for what might come next? For my part the time has now arrived when Canada should establish a union with the great Gulf Provinces.

What for? For the purpose of securing winter ports for Canada. Further on, he said:

> Legislation in Canada for the last two years has come almost to a standstill, and if anyone would refer to the Statutes back since 1862 he would find that the only public measures there inscribed have been passed simply by the permission of the opposition. From May 21st, 1862, to the end of June, 1864, five different governments had been in charge of affairs. The country was bordering on civil strife.

Hon. Mr. Ross, speaking in the Canadian Parliament in 1865, said:

> I believe this work a great and grave undertaking but it is one that cannot be avoided—it is a necessity. It is called for by military reasons and a commercial necessity, and the date of its construction cannot be safely postponed. Why, what have we seen within a recent period? Restrictions have been put on goods sent through the United States by the establishment of Consular Certificates to such an extent that you cannot send a bale of goods through the United States without accompanying it with one of those certificates, the cost of which I am told was nearly $2 perhaps more than the worth of the package.

And further:

> It, the Intercolonial, will be a costly undertaking, but it is one we must make up our minds to pay for, and the sooner we set about its construction the better.

Sir Leonard Tilley, in the city of Quebec, speaking for the Maritime provinces as one of its great leaders, said if the Maritime provinces could not secure the Intercolonial railway they might as well stop talking about Confederation, and every other political leader of all shades of politics in the Maritime provinces stated that the road must be constructed immediately. And for what purpose? To get over the difficulties of distance, to create and carry on trade between the Maritime provinces and Canada as it was known in those days.

As the result of all these addresses and negotiations, among the union resolutions passed at Quebec was one providing that the Intercolonial should be built immediately, and this resolution containing the reasons for the construction of the road was incorporated in the British North America Act, passed by the British Parliament, being section 145. This section 145 is a section of an Imperial statute, providing for a distinct railway to be built for a certain purpose, and, I contend, we cannot change that purpose by any Act of this Parliament. Changes can only be made at Westminster and not at Ottawa. Section 145 is as follows:

> Inasmuch as the provinces of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick have joined in a declaration that the construction of the Intercolonial railway is essential to the consolidation to the union of British North America and to the assent thereto of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and have consequently agreed that provision should be made for its immediate construction by the Government of Canada; therefore, in order to give effect to that agreement, it shall be the duty of the Government and Parliament of Canada to provide for the commencement within six months after the union of a railway conecting the river St. Lawrence with the city of Halifax in Nova Scotia, and for the construction thereof without intermission, and the completion thereof with all practical speed."

Notice the specific terms of that section. It is not often we see the reason for a section embodied in the section itself.

It must follow that the rates charged on this road must be based, not upon commercial consideration, but for the purpose of interprovincial trade, and rates which prevent that trade are a distinct violation of the most sacred promises made to the people of the Maritime provinces in order to secure their consent to the consolidation of the union. If the people of the Maritime provinces had been told before 1867 that this road, after construction, would have been operated on a commercial basis alone there would not have been any British North America Act, nor any confederation with the Maritime provinces. If it is denied that the Intercolonial railway is to be operated for national purposes and for the creation and carrying on of interprovincial trade, then the assent of the people of the Maritime provinces in 1867 was secured under false pretences.

The money for building this road was secured by Imperial guarantee. That guarantee was given with a condition. Surveys had previously been made for the road leading from Nova Scotia across the centre of New Brunswick, known as the Valley route, the shortest and the best route, but before the Imperial Government undertook to give the guarantee they insisted that a survey made by Major Robinson, a military man, should be adopted. This survey was around the north part of the province of New Brunswick, away out of the direct line to Canada. Why? To get away from the United States border. We had had the Trent affair; we had had the war between the North and the South; we had had some feeling between the North and Canada; so the Imperial Government insisted upon this northern route, and in the Lord Elgin despatch, the following words are used:

The Valley route would deprive the Intercolonial railway of those Imperial and Military advantages, which alone would justify the granting of Imperial credit.

The road was built. Incidentally, the people of the Maritime provinces, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, threw into the system railroads already constructed which had cost over three million dollars, and away back in 1867 that was a large sum of money.

Prior to a few years ago the terms of Confederation were maintained. A very valuable trade was developed and carried over this railway. Suddenly the railway was linked up with the Canadian Northern system. It was taken from the direct control of the Department of Railways; its management was transferred to the city of Toronto and placed with the directors of the Canadian Northern railway, and its rates were increased to such an extent as to practically prohibit interprovincial trade, which trade was the very purpose of its creation. Take, for instance, the trade in coal, which is one of the big products of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and from which the Governments of those provinces derive a very large amount of their revenues. Under the old management and the old rates our coal was shipped in large quantities into Quebec, particularly into the Eastern townships and Montreal, and even into Ontario as far west as Brockville. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, the remarks of Hon. D'Arcy McGee which I quoted a few minutes ago about the burning of our coal in Canada. You will bear in mind the statement of the Hon. George Brown, which I have already cited, that we would ship our coal to a market of 3,000,000 people. But within the last five years the rate on coal westward bound has been increased nearly 150 per cent, with the result that interprovincial trade in this most important commodity is absolutely killed, and not a pound of coal from the Maritime provinces is to-day being shipped by rail out of those provinces. What is the use of talking about the alluring promise of the Hon. George Brown—"We hold out a market of 3,000,000 inhabitants for your coal"—when the freight rates are placed so high that you cannot ship the coal? That is the situation as it exists to-day.

We do not desire to make unreasonable requests; we desire, however, to point out that transportation in the Maritime provinces, the wharf of this country jutting out into the broad Atlantic, is a most vital question to the people of those provinces, because they are far away from the big markets of this continent. Our forefathers knew that; the forefathers of Confederation knew it. Sir Charles Tupper knew it when he said that the difficulties of Confederation were insuperable on account of the distance to Canada.

Prior to Confederation, another question was raised by people in this country. If you read the debates, you will find that another understanding was reached, namely, that the canal system of Ontario and Quebec was to be increased and the canals were to be deepened and extended. What are the facts? I am not going to detain this House this afternoon by quoting figures in detail; but permit me to say, according to the report of the Department of Railways and Canals, there has been spent on the canals of Ontario and Quebec $35,000,000 more than has ever been spent upon the Intercolonial railway. A few years ago, however, instead of increasing the rates upon these canals of Ontario and Quebec, they were made as free as the ocean itself, and to-day the people of those provinces boast of their 1,200 miles of free inland navigation. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, if it is fair to punish the people of the Maritime provinces who came into Confederation, not only with a promise, but with a distinct Imperial statute in regard to their rights under Confederation, and to allow the other promise to the people of Ontario and Quebec in respect to their canal systems to be kept? As I said a moment ago, we do not ask for charity; we ask only that the rights given us under the constitution shall remain inviolate. We do not shirk for a moment our obligations in Canada; we are not mendicants at the door of Parliament. In the last twenty-five years a billion of dollars—it is nearer one and one-half billions, but we will call it a billion dollars—has been put into the railways of Canada, either by cash or by guarantees. During these twenty-five years practically all the railways constructed in the Maritime provinces consist of a line between Edmundston and Moncton, N.B., the line in Halifax county running thirty or forty miles east of Dartmouth, and the short line from Halifax to Yarmouth. Yet there has been a billion dollars provided in this country for the purpose of increased transportation facilities, particularly in Western Canada. We agreed to that; we supported it, and when the Grand Trunk Pacific and the National Transcontinental railway projects were put before the people, we sent back to this Parliament a solid eighteen from Nova Scotia in order to provide the middle and west of Canada with better transportation. Unfortunately, owing to conditions, the Intercolonial operation being one of them, our population has not materially increased, and we come back with only sixteen members; but we are solid just the same as we were before.

We come back to demand our rights under the constitution of this country. We realize that, as regards the interest on that billion dollars, the share of the Maritime provinces taxpayer is probably six or seven million dollars per year. We are paying our share as Canadians. We do not desire to break up this Confederation; we are too proud of the name of Canada to want to destroy the union. We are willing to pay our share towards opening up the great unknown lands of this country. We are willing to do what we can to roll back the map of Canada northward. But we insist, and shall insist, that the Confederation pact shall be kept, and we state to you that we resent, and will continue to resent, the treatment as a scrap of paper of the promise made at the time of Confederation to secure our consent to coming into the union, in order that Old Canada should obtain winter ports and be in a position to carry on in a truly national way.

In conclusion, let me say my contention is, the Intercolonial having been built for purposes distinctly constitutional, cannot be linked up with any other road in Canada in its operation. I for one advocate that it should be divorced from the illegitimate marriage contracted with the Canadian Northern Railway and be restored to a position where it can be managed from Moncton, the centre of the Maritime provinces, under the control and direction of the Minister of Railways. It is obvious, if the terms of Confederation are to be honoured, this road cannot be operated in conjunction with any other road of a commercial character.

You could not fix rates to be applied to the whole Canadian National Railway to meet constitutional obligations towards the Maritime provinces.

I say therefore that the road must be operated distinctly by itself under the terms of Confederation. It should be operated in such a manner as properly to carry on interprovincial trade and to restore to the Maritime provinces a measure of that prosperity which they enjoyed up to the time of Confederation, when the people were happy and contented.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON (Moosejaw): Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House on the motion under consideration, I can share quite fully in the feelings that actuated my hon friends yesterday. I speak for the first time, naturally, with considerable diffidence. I should like to associate myself with those who preceded me in expressing congratulations to you, Mr. Speaker, on your appointment to the high office you hold. I desire also to congratulate ourselves, particularly us who come here for the first time, on the assurance we have, and the evidence you have given us so far, that if, notwithstanding our undoubted desire at all times to observe the best traditions of the House, we sometimes err, as inexperienced members are likely to do, your ruling will always be more in the way of guidance than of reproach. I am not unconscious, Sir, of the honour that has been conferred upon me in being sent to represent my constituency in this House. I have worked for some time towards the attainment of an ideal which I trust will be fully attained in our own province, and I have been selected, with other hon. gentlemen from the province of Saskatchewan and the western country, to uphold that ideal, which we have been preaching for some years and which is something new in the political life of Canada. There have been new developments in this country, and it was my intention at the outset to speak to some extent on political movements and activities. After listening to the exchange of courtesies between the other two parties in this House, however, I feel somewhat at a loss just what to say. I must confess that during a number of years I have been saying things which perhaps may have been interpreted as being somewhat unkind to our political opponents; but so far I have never been able to attain to that degree of feeling which I have seen demonstrated by hon. members of this House. I think, therefore, that I had better follow the example of those of the Progressive party, particularly my leader, who have spoken in this debate, and get right down to the subject before us, namely, the economic government of the country, a subject in which we are more vitally interested than we are in the attainment of victory by any political party, even our own.

True, there was a reason for the establishing of that party. I think that the reason is well known for the conception and advocacy of those ideals which we here propound. I am not one of those who believe that parties are necessarily evil. I do not believe that we can have successful government of a country or of a province without the grouping together of those who hold like principles. We must have that combination and co-operation. But while we have constituted ourselves a party in that sense, I hope, nevertheless, that we in this corner of the House, at least, shall always place the ideals which we champion before mere party existence. I have read with a good deal of interest and studied with some care the Speech which was delivered to us the other day, and I want to thank the Government for holding out to us who come from Western Canada, and who believe that we have vast problems to solve and are handicapped in carrying on our chosen occupation, the degree of reform which is promised in the Speech. I cannot agree with those to the right of our group, who have so far spoken, in the statement that there is nothing, or at least, that there is very little, to the Speech from the Throne. We in this group do see a ray of hope. But I must confess that, after a careful study of the Speech, I think it leaves a great deal to the imagination; we are left to guess, in some cases at least, what the specific reforms will be. When they come up in detail to be discussed before the House we shall have something to say about them. I have no doubt that the Government intends to carry out its pledges so far as it is possible for these pledges to be carried out. But just how far that will be possible from their own side of the House remains to be seen. So far as those pledges are in accordance with the declaration of principles which we enunciate in our platform, I want to assure hon. members on the other side that they may count on our wholesouled and hearty co-operation. They may count also, if any section of the Government's side of the House seems to predominate and to exercise any influence that prevents the Government from carrying out these reforms which we advocate, that there shall be just as hearty opposition from this corner of the Chamber.

I desire to deal with a few specific things referred to in this Address. I am glad to note, at the outset, an indication—whether we have all perceived it or not—that the business barometer forecasts a change for the better in business conditions. I believe that is correct. I think it is true that business is improving in Canada and is likely to continue to improve. The experience of those who come from other provinces is that the situation could not be much worse; so that if there is a change it is bound to be in the direction of improvement. There are some things in connection with it, however, that cause me to wonder, and while, I believe, no responsibility can attach to this Parliament, I do notice on behalf of business interests advertisements and propaganda asking for the boosting of business conditions—something, I fear, in the nature of the real estate or business booms which we had in Western Canada some ten years ago, and which were not warranted by the circumstances then existing. When business is improving we want it to be along steady, solid lines so that the improvement will be of a permanent nature.

I come now to that section of the Address which is more particularly of interest to us who are agriculturists. Having been a farmer since going to the West from this province of Ontario some thirty years ago, I think I can claim to know something of agricultural conditions obtaining there. We were not always in our present position. Sometimes in past years we had a large degree of prosperity, but conditions were not as they are now. The great upheaval of the war was responsible in large measure for disrupting business not only in our line but in other lines as well. If we had the advantage of enhanced prices during the war, we also were the first to suffer when prices began to drop after the war. I want to read a few lines from the Speech from the Throne:

> The decline in prices in farm products in 1921, as compared with the prices of previous years, has seriously affected agriculture in many parts of the Dominion.

That is true, Mr. Speaker, but I do not claim that the prices of agricultural products are now too low. The difficulty is that there has not been maintained a reasonable parity of values between the products which we have to sell and those things which we have to purchase and which enter into the production of our crops. I well remember, and I know that the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) well remembers, the time, twenty-five years ago, when in the Prairie provinces we were able to sell better wheat than we have ever been able to produce since at as low as 50 cents a bushel and make more money than we are making at the present time. To-day the price of wheat is almost double 50 cents, but the prices of commodities which enter into the production of that wheat and other grains and cattle are more than double what they were at that time.

I notice reference in this paragraph to restricted markets being responsible for some of the conditions which prevail. It is very true that restricted markets have been detrimental to western agriculture. There is reason for that, especially in connection with our meat products—our cattle and hogs. The market for those products has been very seriously affected by tariff measures enacted in the United States. We had nothing to do with that, it is not our responsibility that our friends to the south of the international boundary line have placed those restrictions against imports from this Dominion. Those tariff restrictions have not affected our grain to the same extent because our market is mostly on the other side of the ocean. I do say we were not responsible for that action on the part of the United States. And yet I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if that is wholly true. I believe that had the Canadian people in 1911 seen fit to adopt that 5 p.m. measure of fiscal reform which was then offered to them, we to-day in Western Canada would not be suffering from those tariff restrictions. This is a serious handicap. I think it is false economy that this Dominion, or any other country, so far as it is possible to prevent it, should allow restrictions of that nature to be placed against the marketing of its natural products.

I notice further in this same paragraph from which I have quoted reference to the fact that improved methods of agriculture with better grading and storage of farm crops would help materially the agriculturists of Canada. I think it would, Mr. Speaker. I believe that a great work has been carried on by our experimental farms and expert agriculturists throughout the Dominion. But that is not our whole trouble. I agree with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) when he said yesterday that we are " experted " to death in some of these things. We have received too much free advice. I do not know whether hon. members will agree with me in the statement I am about to make, but I think the most severe blow that western agriculture, particularly in its field crops, ever received was the Greater Production Campaign of 1918. On a wave of patriotism—and we responded to the best of our ability—we were asked to produce to the limit of our capacity. We wanted to do it. But those who are familiar with agricultural methods, particularly in Western Canada, know that nature does not respond to the methods that we were then urged to adopt. They know that just to that degree of efficiency with which we cultivate our farms will nature repay us, and if you attempt to drive her one litle bit you will not only not get the immediate results which were hoped for at that time—we did not get them—but you will be handicapped for many years after.

As to the grading, storage and general physical handling of our products, I have little to say. Some improvement is desirable perhaps in our system of grading and also in our system of marketing, but the system for the physical handling of the product of the western plains has probably no superior in the world. We are not complaining of the methods, which have been carefully built up for the physical handling of our grain. Our elevator system, even our transportation system, both are doing a great work in that respect. We have nothing to complain of in respect to our our terminal elevators. But we are seriously handicapped in the facilities for the marketing of our grain after we get it to the terminal elevators at the head of the Lakes. For many years my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture had a part in, and will remember, the fight which was put up some years ago by the agriculturists of Western Canada to establish better marketing conditions for the product of the western farms. Some betterment was obtained it is true, but still our product was exploited, it paid too much tribute, and it has continued to pay too much tribute from that day to this to those who come between us and the ultimate consumer. The war was responsible for introducing a new system of marketing grain; I refer to the system which was in operation in 1919. It had developed through various phases up to that time, which I need not now enumerate, but in 1919 the government of the day took the matter in hand and appointed a board which should be responsible for the marketing of the entire wheat crop of Canada. Quite a little objection was taken to it at the time it was established, but I think I voice the opinion of everyone around me, at least in this part of the House, when I say that after the experience which we had in 1919 practically all opposition has been swept away. I do not think that it is the most perfect system that can be devised. I agree with my leader in the remarks he made the other day, and which were confirmed by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman) yesterday, that perhaps a co-operative system owned, operated, and controlled by the producers themselves would be the most ideal. But we are still living in abnormal times so far as the marketing of our grain in Western Canada is concerned, and we cannot wait until we get back to normal times for the building up of that ideal co-operative system which we shall strive to attain in the near future. That means that if the farmers of Western Canada are to prosper—I regret to confess that they are not prospering to-day; I believe that on the Prairie provinces this last year ninety per cent of our farmers produced their crops at an actual loss; I do not believe that is too high an estimate; I myself have seen during the month of November farmers in different sections of the province of Saskatchewan drawing their wheat to market from thirty to fifty miles to the nearest town, with three or four horses to a wagon, and taking from two to four days to make the trip, only to get when they got to town less than eighty cents a bushel for their wheat, which cost them a very great deal more than that to produce. It is very difficult to say what it cost to produce that wheat; the cost would vary, of course, in different localities, and it varies as between new farms and those who are better established, but I have made a calculation which I think would apply to the average farm. I do not believe the wheat of the Prairie provinces this year could be produced and pay a profit at less than $1.10 at the nearest point of delivery. To that you have to add freight and other charges, these amounting to about 25 cents per bushel from about the centre of the Prairie provinces, although the last reduction in freight rates did reduce that a little. That means that the crop of Western Canada to be produced at a profit must bring at the head of the Lakes not less than $1.35 per bushel. At the opening of the season of 1921 the market opened I think around $1.64 for delivery at the head of the Lakes—I speak subject to correction, but I believe that is correct. That should give us a profit. But immediately the wheat began to move, the price dropped until it touched the minimum of $1.07 at the head of the Lakes. To-day it stands somewhere around $1.40, so that it is probably paying a little to produce wheat at the present time.

But what have been the conditions? During the period of depressed markets, when prices were falling, our farmers in literally hundreds were forced to sell wheat under the circumstances which I have outlined, and to take less than eighty cents a bushel for their wheat. Something must be done in this matter, and I was pleased to note in the Speech from the Throne and in the remarks of the Prime Minister that something is promised, though it is not so definite as I would wish. I should like something more definite from the Government at this time as to what they really intend to give us. We were told that an inquiry was to be made, that the matter would be turned over to the Agricultural Committee of this House for discussion. Now, I quite approve of this inquiry being turned over to the Agricultural Committee for consideration and decision as to the best means of providing marketing facilities, but I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the decision whether or not the Wheat Board which the farmers of Western Canada are asking for should be established in the immediate future, should be delayed no longer. The country cannot afford to wait. There is plenty of evidence available at this time that under the present circumstances it is a desirable method of marketing the wheat crop of 1922. From Winnipeg to the Rocky Mountains the farmers of Western Canada have, almost unitedly, repeatedly demanded the re-establishment of the Wheat Board. We had the Wheat Board in 1919, and it was an unqualified success. We do not expect that we shall get anything like the price that was obtained by the Wheat Board of 1919; all we are asking is the world's price to our farmers.

There is something more, and I want to draw the attention of the Government to this, if it is expert testimony they require beyond the demand of the farmers who produce the wheat, and the experience of 1919. During the 1920 session, I think it was, of the Saskatchewan legislature the government of that province appointed a committee to go thoroughly into this marketing situation. Eight specific questions were laid before them to which they were invited to give an answer. I shall not weary the House by reading these questions, but the whole thing is summed up in one short paragraph at the end of that report, which was brought in by two gentlemen who are recognized by all in the Canadian grain trade as being better qualified, probably, to deal with the subject and to bring good, sound business judgment to bear upon it than any other two men in Canada, and possibly on the North American continent. This is what they say:

> In the first place we believe that the most perfect form of a centralized wheat marketing agency at the present time can be created only under the control of a national organization.

That, Mr. Speaker, is what the farmers of Western Canada are asking for 1922. I wonder if I am putting it too strongly when I say it is what they are demanding. It is undoubtedly what they demanded before they would elect a single representative from the province of Saskatchewan. I know that we fifteen Progressives in this House from that province stand solidly behind that demand, and I know further that it is in the campaign literature of the Minister of Agriculture in this Government (Mr. Motherwell), and that his supporters in the constituency of Regina made it their chief plea, that the hon. member if elected to the House would secure the re-establishment of the Canada Wheat Board. While it is all very well to make an inquiry, and I believe in getting the very fullest possible information, I say that we have this information before us now.

There is another statement which I wish to make, and I know it will go unchallenged by those who come from the Prairie provinces. If the country does not get almost immediately the promise of the re-establishment of the Wheat Board to handle, as a national selling agency, the wheat crop of 1922, production for this year will be seriously curtailed. Reports coming from Western Canada in the last few days indicate that they are going to have an abnormally early seeding. In sections of the West the snow has gone already and probably by the first of April men will be on the land. All the wheat should be sown in the West during the month of April. If the wheat is to be sown during the month of April the farmers of the three provinces must have this assurance or they will not sow nearly the acreage which they otherwise would have done. I have little more to add. This is the thing which is of most vital importance to us of Saskatchewan, and I am sure to the other two provinces of Alberta and Manitoba.

I would like to make a passing reference to other things contained in the Speech from the Throne. The next paragraph that I note refers to the tariff. I do not propose to deal with it at any length; I am not an expert in tariff matters, I am an ordinary farmer claiming ordinary horse sense; and as an ordinary farmer claiming ordinary horse sense I have never yet been able to see any merit in a protective tariff, although I have honestly tried to find it. The word "protection" is, to my mind, a misnomer; I think the word which should be used is "restriction"; it would more nearly define the operation of a protective tariff as we know it in this Dominion. I think it is false national economy when any section of the community may be allowed by law to exploit the balance of the community for their special benefit. True national economy to my mind attains the highest degree of perfection when the greatest number of the people of the country are engaged in productive enterprises neither hampered by artificial restrictions nor pampered by special privileges.

I was very much interested in the remarks of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) with reference to the return of their natural resources to the three western provinces. I could scarcely agree with all he said in reference to that subject. When two men are engaged in a business transaction it is beyond my comprehension, Mr. Speaker, why some one else, who in remote times of the past had something to do with it, should wish to butt in on the proposition now. This question, I believe, is one which must be dealt with by the Government and by the individual provinces concerned in the return of these natural resources.

Enough has been said for the present, I think, on the public ownership of railways. I want, however, to endorse what was said yesterday by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) in his advocacy of the consolidation of the Government-owned railways into one system, one gigantic Canadian system, of which we shall be proud and to which by means of consolidation we can look for reasonably efficient and economic management.

I have allotted myself half an hour and I observe that my time has nearly expired. I am now going to pass on to the last paragraph of the Speech from the Throne wherein the Government is advocating economy not only in administration but in the appropriations which are to be voted and the undertakings which are to be carried out. With such a policy I am entirely in accord; and I think that sentiment will be approved by every member of the Progressive group. We have been too lavish in our national expenditure in the years gone by, and the time has come when we must economize, when we must retrench. But, Mr. Speaker, I think the Government will be ill-advised if it does not take into careful consideration the exact nature of those economies which it contemplates. Certain investments have been made by the people of Canada in the national railways or other publicly-owned utilities. These investments have been made on the strength of promises given by our Governments in the past and they must be safely guarded.

I wish to assure the Government again of what I said at the beginning of my remarks—that so far as they can see their way clear to live up to their platform, to their own declared platform which in so large a measure is identical with that which we have advocated, so far as they will live up to the promises which they have made in almost every plank of their platform, they will get the hearty support, I am sure, of the members in this corner of the Chamber. If the Government do not carry out those reforms which they have promised they will have to reckon with us. I believe the present administration has the biggest opportunity that has ever been within the reach of any Canadian government. We have lived in recent years through strenuous times; to-day we are living in a new world. Civilization has been re-born; people are looking at things in a different way from what they did a few years ago. We are proud of our heritage, proud of the country we have developed; and the responsibility rests upon the Government of the day of seeing that that greatness shall not only be maintained but that it shall be made even greater yet.

Mr. THOMAS LANGTON CHURCH (North Toronto): Mr. Speaker, as one of the new representatives from the Toronto district I wish to take this opportunity of congratulating you, Sir, on your elevation to the office of First Commoner of Canada. Sir, you are well and favorably known in the province of Ontario, as you are in other parts of Canada and of the Empire, and I congratulate you upon all you have been privileged to do for your country.

Permit me to say at the outset that I am glad to observe the moderate tone of this debate, more particularly as the membership of the House comprises approximately 134 new members. I think it is only fair to say that hon. gentlemen on both sides deserve great praise for the keen attention they have so far given to the discussion.

Sir, in Canada we have in the past been taking our politics too seriously. There has been too much party politics in this country. Ever since Confederation we have been too apt to consider what was for the good of the party first and what was for the good of the country afterwards. That is one reason why a new party—a new body of men and women—has come into existence.

Let me say explicitly that I am not a farmer; I do not know, and I do not pretend to know, anything about farming. But all political parties in Canada have vied with one another in the past in seeking the support of the farmers. All wealth, after all, is derived from the soil; and the backbone of the community is very largely composed of farmers. I have been associated for a quarter of a century with farmers as president of several of the Hydro Electric organizations, which embrace 376 municipalities in my native province. I have been president of the Union of Canadian Municipalities and am the 1922 president of the Ontario Municipal Union, whose membership is representative of the cities, towns, incorporated villages, county councils, and so on, of Ontario. I have generally found the farmer to be a pretty hard headed man and that when casting his vote at election time he does not need very much assistance from outside parties. We are all here to do the best we can for the people of Canada.

I have known the hon. leader of the Government for many years past, since I was a boy. His father was a professor in the old law school at Osgoode Hall and an old teacher of mine, and I had a great deal of respect for him. I congratulate the hon. leader of the House to-day on his having attained the position he holds. As a sportsman I offer him my congratulations on winning. A winner is admired, but it is a different thing to bear adversity in defeat, and so I want to congratulate the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) because he was a bonnie fighter and a good loser and took defeat like a true sportsman. It was not his fault that his party lost.

If I had had my way there would not have been any Union Government in this country. The Conservative party would have been better off without it and my friends on the opposite side of the House, the Liberals, might have remained in opposition for a quarter of a century. As for the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, everywhere that he went in the late campaign, closing on 6th December, he preached the same gospel, whether in Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario or the West.

I also desire to congratulate my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar). He is an old friend of mine and a man of his word. I admire his candour on the stump in the recent election, because he said what he meant as to the tariff, and I believe in the House he will stand by his principles. I do not believe that the U.F.O. members in the Ontario Legislature stood by their principles. Of course, if the Progressives do not stand by their principles, so much the worse for the movement in the House and the country. But I believe the Progressives in this House are men of a different stamp to the U.F.O. official party in Ontario, and will carry out the principles for which they were elected to this House. I was more than pleased yesterday to hear the leader of the Progressives say that he did not wish to enter any Liberal administration, but that what had been proposed to him was to enter a form of Union Government. Well, I am a Conservative and was elected from a Conservative city. It has always been a Conservative city and always will be. But my constituents also desire me to exercise independence of thought and action, and if the Government will bring forward any measures for the general welfare and good of the country they will have my support and they will receive, I am sure, the support of the party to which I belong. But I will oppose anything that is not in the interests of the people of Canada. I may say that I have supported farmers in many constituencies on the stump for twenty-five years. I did not support them because they were farmers, but because they were the best men. I do not believe in the group system of government. Of course I must admit that the party system has its defects, a great many of them, because the party system leads men sometimes to go to extremes of word and thought and action, as I shall show in a moment. It is sometimes said that in Ontario and in Quebec and in other parts of the Dominion there are race jealousies and religious differences which cause a great deal of discord and bitter feeling. This country is too big to have any more of what we have heard in this House and outside on many occasions. There are some of these people in Quebec and a few in Ontario, who have these feelings of jealousy, but I hope the day has gone by when these felings of jealousy will occur, in view of what Canada has done in the war. The time has gone by for religious bickerings and strife in this country. We are all Canadians, and must look at the matters which come before us from that point of view. As I stated, the party system has its defects and sometimes leads men to go too far in thought, word and action. But when you criticize the party system on account of its defects don't forget its virtues; don't forget that under the party system the Mother Country prospered, and they have their free institutions and a great form of government. We have our Liberal party and our Conservative party, and all the good is not in one party. They say that the Liberal party and the Conservative party have both done a great deal to build up this country. I was born a Conservative and a Conservative I will die. That is my politics, and that is good enough for me. We need not be ashamed of the party of Macdonald and Cartier, the party that built the Canadian Pacific railway and opened up the West, the party that created the national policy and did a great deal to help win the war. I will not say they won the war, because I am not boastful sufficiently for that, although people on the other side of the line say they won the war. The Conservative party was sound in regard to the war and made a good war record, and proposed what they did for the war in the best interests of Canada. I do not believe there is any reason why we should have a group system of government. I agree with what the Right Hon. Austin Chamberlain, the great leader in the British House of Commons, said; if the two old parties would carry out the reforms they should have carried out long ago, many of the questions which my hon. friends have spoken about yesterday and to-day would have been settled. We might have had lower freights, and we might have made this country a better country for the working people as well as for others, for those in the rural portions as well as for those in the urban centres. As the Right Hon. Austin Chamberlain says he does not believe in the group system of government, and, speaking at the Carleton Club banquet in his honour, he said he hoped that system of government would never prevail in Great Britain. I am free to admit that the party system sometimes has its defects.

There is too much party in this country, and we are sometimes too bitter, and sometimes forget that those on the other side of the House have a heart. We should always remember that those on the other side of the House have a heart, and my friends, the Progressives, are good-hearted people too. Therefore, as a young member of this House, coming from the city of Toronto, a city in which there is no bigotry—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHURCH: Hon. gentlemen may laugh and smile. I think many of you have known me a great many years. I have not a particle of bigotry in my make-up, and what I say of myself is true of the city which I have the honour to represent. As mayor of the city for seven years, and as representative in the council for seventeen years, I may say I have never seen any bigotry in that chamber, and I defy any one to say it. The late Attorney General of the province of Ontario, Hon. Mr. Foy, a Roman Catholic, represented an Orange constituency in the legislature and became attorney general of the province. Hon. A. Claude Macdonell, a member of this House for twelve years, represented South Toronto, an Orange constituency, and he was one of the best members we ever had in this House. I say with reference to the people of the city of Toronto, the Catholics and Protestants —and I speak of Toronto and also of the province of Ontario—that I do not think there is any bigotry there. The people of Ontario are too busy endeavouring to make a living to sit up all night long wondering or bothering what Quebec is doing. I was very much surprised; and if I had known as much as I do now, I would not have wanted to be a member of this House if I thought for one moment that such a state of affairs existed in this country, because, after all is said and done, we are all Canadians, trying to do the best we can for Canada. The leader of the House (Mr. Mackenzie King) lived in Toronto while he was leader of the Opposition; he knows something about the city of Toronto, his father and mother lived there for years; and I do not think he would state, from his seat in this House, that there was any bigotry in that city. I was very much surprised to read an address delivered the other day before the ladies of the liberal club of the city of Ottawa by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr Lapointe), who, I hope, will visit us in Toronto soon because, I think, when he comes there, he will change his mind. I understand the hon. member for Quebec East was invited to visit Toronto and address the Liberals of that city. When he does so, I hope he will make the same speech to the Liberals of Toronto and of Ontario as he did to the ladies of Ottawa and the same as he did at the banquet in his honour in the city of Quebec. I should like to read from the Globe the report of a speech delivered by the hon. genetleman for Quebec East at a banquet. There were ladies present and I dare say the gallant young man was doing his best to entertain them. This is the report of the able speech which he made on that occasion, reported in the Globe of Monday, March 13:

The Hon. Mr. Lapointe spoke briefly, but to the point.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CHURCH: Well it is in the Globe, the Bible of my hon. friends opposite. The leader of the House was formerly one of the reporters on the Varsity when he was a student at Varsity, and he gave a very good report. I used to read the Varsity at that time, when I think he was one of the sporting editors. I do not know whether there is any vanity in the report of a sporting editor, because he has to write things as he sees them. The Globe goes on to say:

Hon. Mr. Lapointe spoke briefly, but to the point. He contrasted the positions of Liberalism and of Conservatism. He declared that the Conservative party was marked by duplicity and hypocrisy; that its life depended upon the accentuation of race and religious differences. Liberalism thrived upon conciliation. It respected all respectable parties.

That is the first time I have ever heard that I do not belong to a "respectable" party. We try to be a respectable party in this country. The report continues:

It cherished high ideals and sought manfully to realise them.

I might say to the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) that I am very much surprised, as a young citizen of this country, to read in the Globe, the paper of George Brown, Baldwin, Lafontaine, and men of that description, a report of such sentiments as were expressed that day by one coming from a sister province. I hope the hon. member will visit Ontario and Toronto; and if he does so, he will obtain a different idea of the Liberal-Conservative party. The hon. member should agree with me that there is some good in all parties. The party which I am speaking of to-day was the party that gave the province of Ontario the hydro-electric development; that gave the province the best government, by Sir James Whitney and Sir Adam Beck, that any province has had, a party by the people and for the people, and that did a great deal for the people of that province. At that banquet also, I was very much surprised to learn, the head of the Government said that he must put his foot down "to keep down Toryism." If he would do something to keep down freight rates, he would be doing something worth while, and if he would do something to try, as the captain of the team on the other side of the House, to keep down racial and religious jealousy in this country, he would be doing something better than trying to keep down Toryism. As long as I am in this House, whether that period be long or short, this is the last occasion that I shall have anything to say on this particular subject of Ontario's bigotry, because as a humble citizen of this country, I do not like to hear that kind of talk. I thought one of the lessons we would have learned from the war would have been to realize in all the provinces that we should be for Canada first, last and all the time; that those who had the honour of being elected to this House would do the best they could for the people of Canada, instead of drawing red herrings across the track by bringing up subjects that had nothing to do with the government of the country.

I wish to refer to two or three matters while the leader of the Government is in the Chamber. In the city of Quebec, there is the Battlefields Commission, and I remember a speech delivered by you, Mr. Speaker, on that particular subject. After all is said and done, the people of Canada are not mindful enough of those who have served them upon the battlefields. In Quebec, the Batlefields Commission has done a great deal to preserve the great ruins of the early days of this country and the memory of Wolfe and Montcalm, and I would suggest to the Prime Minister that in Ontario and the West a Battlefields Commission should be constituted to preserve the historic ruins there. If you go to the Niagara district to-day, as you enter the mouth of the Niagara river, on the right, there is Fort Mississauga, a mass of ruins. Further up the river is Fort George—where Brock had his breakfast the day he was killed. Further up the river at Queenston are the ruins of a house where was published the first newspaper in Upper Canada. The roof and the mortar have all gone to ruin. Further up the river is the Village of Chippewa where the battle of that name was fought. I asked someone there to point out the spot where the heroine Laura Secord lived, but no one seemed to know. Going further on to Fort Erie you will find the fort there with the roof shot out, but a progressive American manufacturer has pasted all over the walls chewing gum, and tobacco advertisements. I would suggest that the work of the Battlefields Commission be extended to embrace not only the great province of Quebec, but Ontario and, in the West, Fort Winnipeg, Cut Knife, Battleford and other places and sites of the 1885 Northwest rebellion. We have to take a leaf out of the book of the American people when we see how they preserve the memorials of those who have gone before. As Macaulay has said of the heroes in the Seven Years' war:

> The various tombs of the captains have been sought and repaired and embellished. It is impossible not to respect the sentiment which manifests itself in these tokens. It is a sentiment which appeals to the higher and purer part of human nature and adds not a little to the strength of States. A people which takes no pride in the noble achievements of their noble ancestors will never achieve anything worthy to be remembered.

The Canadian people are far behind the Americans in this respect, at Chattanooga, in the valley of the Cumberland river, where there are over thirty miles of battlefields, there are 50 to 60 monuments, one or more erected by each State, in memory of those who served the North and South in those great battles. I have written the Government of Canada a letter about this particular matter, and I hope something will be done on the subject.

I should like to see a conference between the Dominion, the provinces and the municipalities on the subject of taxation alone. As the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) said yesterday, one province has Dominion, provincial and municipal income taxes. Taxation should be co-ordinated and consolidated and an effort should be made by all governments, Dominion, provincial and municipal, to reduce the taxes. I have looked into the British North America Act, and I may say that there is a complaint throughout Canada in regard to this question. The Parliament of Canada, by the British North America Act, granted the provinces a cash subsidy along certain lines for definite purposes and to defray the expenses along certain lines of civil government but the provinces are not spending the money for these purposes. They are using it for roads, education and other matters which are not contemplated in the act. To raise money for civil government they assess the municipalities, the cities, the towns, the townships and the villages, in many ways that I hold to be illegal. For example, in Ontario there was imposed by the legislature a war tax of one mill on the assessment of each municipality which had to be paid in every municipality, although, the British North America Act, the question of "Militia and Defence" are matters by sec. 91, which comes exclusively within the purview of the Dominion. There are various forms of assessment in the provinces and different innovations and devices for levying taxation. I trust that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) will give this matter his consideration, because, as things stand at present, taxes are being raised in a way that is not legal nor proper. I have had an account prepared as between the city of Toronto—I mention Toronto merely by way of illustration and not for any specific purpose—and the Dominion Government, and another account between the city and the province, and I find that in Ontario there is a large subsidy for certain works within the province; but the money is taken and spent on other objects. Throughout the West, in the city of Winnipeg, for example, and in Montreal, court houses are built by the provinces. Then there are registry offices and land titles offices, which in Ontario are paid for by the municipalities, the cities, the towns and the county councils. In the West, it is different, according to the returns I have from the city clerks of many places. For good roads, gaols, gaol farms, teachers' salaries and hospitals the provinces are continually assessing the municipalities, though these are purely provincial undertakings towards the upkeep of which the federal government grants the provinces a subsidy. This is a very interesting brief, and a careful perusal of it would be of considerable profit; but I cannot go further into it at the present time. I will give a copy of it to the Minister of Finance, because I think that something should be done to prevent the provinces from usurping the taxes of the municipalities.

In looking over the statutes I was very much surprised to discover that police court fines, under the Criminal Code, belong to the provincial governments, instead of to the municipalities. This is something that should be remedied, and General Mewburn, representing the municipalities, waited, I understand, upon the Prime Minister. When you consider that the municipalities have to maintain police forces for public safety, you can realize how unfair it is that the fines from police courts should go to the government of the province. Take the city I have the honour to represent. Our city spends some two million dollars in maintaining a police force, and police court, and yet the fines go to the province. We have built a court house, a gaol and a gaol farm, and maintain judicial offices, registry offices and land title offices, but we do not get the police court fines, they go to the province.

Fees that belong to the municipalities have been given to the province. We have to supply a police force to guard the Parliament Buildings in Queen's Park, build a morgue, erect police stations, and other judicial public buildings, yet the city does not get the police fines. I contend that the police court fines should belong to the municipalities, and I trust that the Government will so amend the Criminal Code as to make this possible.

I confess I was surprised to see the meagre bill of fare given in the Speech from the Throne. Of course, I appreciate the fact that the Government has been in office only a few weeks, but I hope it will introduce some constructive programme. So far, I fail to see anything constructive revealed in the Speech. For instance, no mention is made of the St. Lawrence canal, which I consider the most important question that has come before the people of Canada since Confederation. I regret, too, the absence of any reference to the housing problem. In Montreal, Winnipeg, Toronto and many other centres of population the housing situation is extremely acute, and in the city I represent some 16,000 houses short are badly needed. In Montreal conditions are just as bad. Now, this is anything but creditable to the country. I do not attribute the blame to any one, but I do urge the great necessity for action in this matter. In Toronto last year there was doled out $750,000 here and there to the unemployed to buy food and help pay rents. Toronto contributed $400,000 of that sum and the Government of Canada was kind enough to come to its help as well as to the help of other municipalities including Montreal, contributing about $250,000, the province giving a like sum. Before all the bills are in, well on to a million dollars will have been spent. With so many soldiers out of work, I do not know what the unemployed would have done but for the help from the city and the Dominion and the Provincial Governments. But this million dollars was doled out to people who did not want charity, but work. Many of them were soldiers who had fought for their country overseas. I would suggest a housing policy for the Dominion, such as exists in Australia and in England; I believe there is also one in the United States. Some years ago about twenty million dollars was devoted to roads, and legislation was passed through this Parliament. Now, if you capitalized twenty million dollars on a housing proposition, building houses in the larger centres, that would be an act of religion besides being excellent legislation, and I would commend this proposal to the wisdom and good judgment of the Government. The houses might not be up to the standard of those required by the building by-laws, but there should be some houses constructed at any rate. The money might be loaned to the provinces and the larger municipalities or the latter's bonds could be guaranteed. This would largely solve the housing problem that confronts the larger cities and towns to-day, and would automatically solve the unemployment difficulty, which is so serious at the present time.

Talk about the high cost of living! I do not see the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) in his seat, to know what he proposes to do, but I may say that nobody knows better than I do what the working classes in our larger centres of population are suffering to-day. To see the misery in the congested districts is heartrending. I hope the Government will still consider the advisability of introducing a housing bill, for undoubtedly it would do a great deal not only to relieve the misery and discomfort of the slums in our large centres of population but would also help solve the unemployment question. Dr. Hastings, the very capable medical officer of health of the city of Toronto, says that if we had a proper housing policy as suggested, it would do away with half the ill-health now so prevalent in our larger cities. I hope that this very serious problem will be taken up by the Government in the interests of good health and good living, so that we may have a rising generation that is sound in both mind and body.

I was glad to hear yesterday the speeches of some hon. gentlemen of the Progressives regarding economy, because this is a time for the exercise of economy by all governments not only by the Dominion but by the provinces and by the municipalities. I might describe the Parliament as the housekeeper of this young nation. Well, she is a poor housekeeper who will not exercise economy, and when the Estimates are brought down I hope they will show that the Government is following the policy of retrenchment and economy along business lines. The definition of economy, it seems to me, is the art of spending wisely, not frittering away our means. We all know that a Government can spend a large amount of money with little to show for it; and it can also spend a considerable amount of money without being at all extravagant, because the money is expended wisely.

I regret very much not to see any declaration of policy in regard to good roads. Away back in 1911 the Government of the day brought down a bill dealing with this subject. I desire to quote a paragraph from the preamble of that bill, but as it is now six o'clock I will, if the hon. leader of the Government has no objection, move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 16, 1922.

The House met at three o'clock.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. McMurray for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Wednesday, March 15.

Mr. CHURCH (resuming):

Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned last evening I was referring to the Good Roads question. In the session of 1913 legislation was introduced in the Dominion Parliament providing for an appropriation of $20,000,000 for good roads. Canada has been away behind the times in the matter of a Good Roads policy, although in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario rapid strides have been made in dealing with this important matter. In the interest of the solution of the transportation question, and many other problems which vitally concern the country, the Good Roads question is one of tremendous importance and one which especially concerns a country of vast distances such as Canada. The subject is one in which there should be co-ordination and co-operation between the federal government and the several provincial and municipal authorities. I was somewhat impressed with the legislation in the Senate and Congress at Washington some years ago making provision for good roads, under which the federal authorities were empowered to loan money by a guarantee of bonds to the state governments for this purpose. This plan in the carrying out of which there has been cordial co-operation between the federal, state and municipal authorities has been productive of the happiest results. The Good Roads question is still but in its infancy in Canada, but I hope that the present Government will, sooner or later, take it up and deal with it in a broad and comprehensive manner.

I wish for a few minutes to deal with the transportation question which was referred to the other day by my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean). In my opinion there is room in Canada for the activities of both private ownership and public ownership. There is no use in those who support public ownership being unfair or unjust to private ownership. Private ownership has done a great deal for Canada; let us not forget that fact when we are discussing this question. The pioneers in electrical development in Toronto were a privately-owned company, and they bore the heat and burden of the day for many years, and gave a good service as beginners. But another era came, a new day dawned. The era of public ownership set in; and now for years in the province of Ontario many of the municipalities have been operating their own water-powers and light, heat, power and gas plants and telephone systems. Public ownership has for a long time been in operation in other countries but Canada was a slow beginner and was away behind the times in this respect. When we refer to Switzerland, and many other countries in Europe we find evidences of the fact that this country has been somewhat lacking. I repeat that I do not wish to be unfair to private ownership; I should be the last one to say anything unjust with respect to its activities. We owe to private ownership a great debt of gratitude for the way in which it has developed the country in many respects. In my own city of Toronto, when the question of electric light installation was before us, we had a pretty capable city corporation counsel who was a great assistance to us in many ways. That gentleman was afterwards appointed to the Board of Railway Commissioners and made the best chairman that board ever had; I refer to the hon. member for West York (Sir Henry Drayton). This capable gentleman was acting for the city of Toronto when we took this matter up and tried to avoid the evils of duplication. The Toronto Electric Light Company, the pioneer company in that city, had done a great deal of good in the early stages of its operation. We tried to buy the concern out in order to avoid duplication. We offered the company 125 for their common stock, but they could not see their way clear to accept. We were advised by our experts in Montreal and other cities that the stock was only worth 105, but the city of Toronto was willing to pay them 125 to buy them out. While the city was anxious to avoid duplication we did not want to interfere with the company's bonds or other securities; we wanted to be absolutely fair to private ownership. However the Board of Directors did not see fit to accept the city's offer with the result that we immediately began the construction of the Hydro Electric—the people's own system—and there was duplication.

For the installation of that system at heavy cost the taxpayers of Toronto deserve the credit. I may say that duplication after all did not prove a bad thing, because we have got a better service. Both companies had to keep faith with the public. There was a race to see who would give the best service, with the result that the public got the benefit of cut rates for commercial and domestic lighting. I have the report here of the commissioners for this year and it shows that $22,000,000 has been saved in commercial and domestic lighting to the consumers in the city of Toronto. Toronto's venture in public ownership power plant has already cost $12,000,000. We have to-day taken over the street railways, but an arbitration is pending as a result of which we will probably have to pay several millions. Since the first of September we have spent $12,000,000 on betterments. The roadbed of the street railway has been rebuilt, the road has had many other improvements and we had built 200 new cars. Other right of way improvements of various kinds have been carried out. Having been in existence for so many years the system was badly run down, but as soon as we are able to carry out our plans Toronto will be given a better service and cheaper fares than ever it enjoyed under private ownership. I mention these facts to show that the city from which I come has not been unfair to private ownership.

In my opinion Canada has the most insane railway policy of any country in the civilized world. Where a railway company like the Canadian Pacific proves a success it immediately adds to its services ocean, oil land, land, and lake services and hotels, with the result that it achieves greater success than ever, but it is retained by private ownership. We are all proud of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and its success. I would be the last man in the world to say anything unfair about the men who compose that company and who have done so much for Canada and for the Empire. While I may have something to offer by way of criticism, nevertheless I wish to pay a tribute to them for what they have done for this country, and for the Empire as well, in the operation of their most efficient railway and ocean services, especially during the war. Where a road is a success in Canada it is retained by private ownership; where a road has been a failure and its managers cannot even raise sufficient revenue to meet the fixed charges the enterprise is handed back to the people of Canada. I wish to be absolutely fair to the pioneers of the Canadian Northern Railway also. Both Sir William Mackenzie and Sir Donald Mann are good men, and had it not been for the war they would probably have succeeded to a far greater degree in their railway enterprises. I do not wish to say anything unfair against the Grand Trunk Company either. Some of the English shareholders in the three companies I have named are also shareholders in loan companies in Western Canada. How do they deal with their debtors? If a man is behind in the payment of his instalment do they renew his mortgage and give him time to make good the arrears? I think not, even if he is a returned soldier they foreclose and force him from his farm. But Canada does not measure out this treatment to railways that are bankrupt, but gives them more money and longer time to pay. I give the Conservative party the credit for the introduction of public ownership in the province of Ontario. It was the late Sir James Whitney and Sir Adam Beck who started the Hydro Electric Light and Power movement in that province which has saved $22,000,000 to the people of Toronto since 1911. There has been no politics in the Hydro-Electric movement. They have good Conservatives and good Liberals in that enterprise, but it was the Conservative party that deserved the credit for creating that great people's enterprise of cheap light and power. The Conservative party, whom the member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) characterizes as not a respectable party, deserves the credit for the nationalization of railways in Canada. I want to say, in reference to the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) that future generations will owe a debt of gratitude to that brilliant statesman for all he has done for public ownership of railways and all he has done to redeem Canada from the deplorable state of railway affairs which has existed in this country.

But we must not worry about the past, as far as the transportation question goes. There is no use crying over spilt milk. They have spent eight or nine hundred million dollars on direct and indirect aid to railways, and the country does not own anything except a lot of bankrupt railways. I think if you went out on the streets of Ottawa, or Winnipeg, or any western city, and put your hands on the first five men you met and said: "Come to Ottawa and we will make you director of the old privately-owned Canadian Northern, Grand Trunk and Grand Trunk Pacific," any of those five men you might select could not have made a worse mess of things than the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern made in the administration of those privately-owned roads. I say that with all due respect to the old directors of those systems. If it had been public-ownership that had fallen down in the transportation sense in the way the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific roads have, which were fed on all kinds of hand-outs, we would have heard severe criticism of them. Not satisfied with federal grants they come also to the doors of the provinces and ask for provincial aid and grants and bonuses. The people's own hydro-radials have never asked for a subsidy or hand-out from any government, but the publicly-owned roads lived on it. If these bankrupt roads had been owned and operated by public ownership instead of by private corporations, oh, my, what a row they would have raised about the evils and the failure of public ownership in this country! I may say that in the session of 1917 matters had reached such an acute state that in Ontario the Hydro-Electric organization composed of over 300 municipalities, came to Ottawa, headed by Sir Adam Beck, the head of the delegation, that great statesman and patriot who has done so much for the people of Ontario.

I venture to say that Sir John Macdonald was the greatest constructive statesman this country ever had. He did wonders in the negotiations for Confederation, in the building of the Canadian Pacific railway, and the farming of the national policy. He was a Conservative, and I may say that constructive work of his has lasted, and will last for all time. The next greatest constructive statesman, I think, is Sir Adam Beck. Some of my friends opposite will also say that Sir Wilfrid Laurier did a great deal for Canada, but I wish to remind hon. members that all the good is not in one party. Sir Adam Beck was sufficiently in advance of public opinion not only in regard to public ownership, but in regard to cheap light, power and transportation, as to have been the standard-bearer on these questions and has accomplished a great deal. The United States will run out of coal a hundred years from now. That fact is shown by the report made to Congress by the Conservation Commission of the United States. The result will be that that country, as well as Canada, will have to depend on cheap water-powers more than in the past. Just consider what Sir Adam Beck has done in the Niagara district and what he proposes to do in the St. Lawrence. Future generations will bear tribute to him as one of Canada's greatest statesmen, and he will rank with Sir John Macdonald in the years that are to come as a constructive statesman. He is working for the building up of the Dominion. A deputation from 375 cities, towns and incorporated villages came down from the province of Ontario to oppose any further land grants or subsidies to the bankrupt railways, the Canadian Northern, the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific. That deputation was received by Sir Robert Borden and his cabinet, who announced that they proposed to deal in the House with that question later on in the session. And they did deal with it by appointing a royal commission to make a survey of all the railway systems of this country. There was a great deal of difficulty in getting men to serve on the commission, but they chose three very excellent men. The then chairman of the Railway Commission, Sir Henry Drayton, now the member for West York, was one of the commission. Mr. A. H. Smith, President of the New York Central, which is one of the largest, best-equipped and most modern roads in the world to-day, with large affiliations, was the second commissioner. Then they chose a British expert, who did not act, and subsequently they selected Mr. Acworth, an engineer of the Old Country. These gentlemen set to work. The war was on and the country was spending money and the commission started to make an inquiry along certain lines. A survey was made from a public standpoint and the report, which I have before me, is one of the most valuable reports we have ever received in Canada. It is quoted constantly before the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States. I have the records and proceedings of that commission at home. I was reading the reports of the meetings of the Federal Commission appointed by the United States' Government investigating all the electric railways of the United States. They were bankrupt and wanted a different arrangement. I was struck in reading the reports of that commission to see some references to this Drayton-Acworth report. This report recommended the various things defined in the Speech from the Throne, which the Globe says is the most advanced programme of legislation we have had in this country for many years passed. What do I find in the summing up? The report says:

> To summarize our conclusion, we find in Canada 40,000 miles of single track in a country with a population of seven and a half million the year before last. We have as much railway mileage as Germany with a population of 67,000,000 or as much as France with a population of 46,000,000 the United Kingdom with a population of 47,000,000 people.

Canada with a population of seven and a half million people has 40,000 miles of single track, with useless duplication and waste, three transcontinental railways running across Canada where one with a double track would have done for many years with lateral branch lines built off the main line.

Between Toronto and Belleville we have the Grand Trunk double track main line. Then they come along and build the Canadian Pacific, another high-priced track. Then the Canadian Northern is built. So we have the Grand Trunk station at Cobourg, a Canadian Pacific Station, and a Canadian Northern station, all at that and other towns, when there was not more than enough business for one road—useless duplication, useless waste of public funds and capital. This government report found a similar duplication of waste in the Western provinces, and I do not wonder at the movement which has been started amongst the farmers of the West owing to such a railway policy. I am not a supporter of the official U.F.O. Drury-Raney administration. I do not believe they are representative of the farmers of the province of Ontario. They have had two years to make good but have not made good. I see a lot of young men from the West in this House and I hope they will not make the mistakes of the U.F.O. in Ontario, as we all want to endeavour to do something to make this a better country to live in for the farmer and for the toiler in the city. And to this end I think the farmer, the farm labourer and the city toiler should work hand in hand. As they have a common interest in this country let them work to make it a better country, a more contented and happier country to live in. Now what does this official government report recommend about the co-ordination and consolidation of these publicly owned railways?

For one thing, they say:

> 11. We recommend that the control both of the Grand Trunk and of the Grand Trunk Pacific be assumed by the people of Canada on terms hereafter set out.

They also say:

> 25. We have discussed and rejected the following suggestions:—Transfer of all three railways to the Canadian Pacific. Transfer of the Canadian Northern or a portion of it to the Canadian Pacific.

I asked the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) the other day why it took so long for Parliament to consolidate the roads as recommended by this report. He said he could consolidate them in a day. This is what the report says:

> 30. We recommend that the whole of the Dominion Railways be operated by the trustees as one united system on a commercial basis, under their own politically undisturbed management, on account of, and for the benefit of, the people of Canada.

That is the recommendation of this commission which brought the most eminent railway engineers the world over to investigate this matter. They came from England; they came from all over the United States and New York. Mr. A. H. Smith, President of the New York Central Lines, brought all his traffic experts, commercial experts, tariff experts, right-of-way experts, car accountants, engineers, and all that kind of prominent experts to Canada to give recommendations to the commission. Why have those recommendations not been carried out? This Government have not been in power very long and I do not wish to hurry them on this question; I believe in being fair to the Government, and I think the Government will find that I shall be fair to them. I have known the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) practically all my life—he is an old Toronto boy and moved to Windsor, where he did very well. I congratulate him on being sworn in as Minister of Railways. I would give him all the time he likes, to see what he can do with Canada's railway problem. The recommendations, however, which the minister requires, are to be found right in the aforesaid government report; he does not need to travel throughout Canada to find out what should be done. The train on which the commission used to travel throughout this country was like a caravan or a circus, but the moneys spent by the commission were well spent. The then chairman of the Railway Board (Sir Henry Drayton) loaded down as he was by problems created by the war, gave up his time without stint, and he worked practically twenty-four hours a day for nearly eighteen months on this survey to assist in reaching a solution of the problem. The Minister of Railways—I do not wish to criticise him—has been travelling throughout Canada over our railway system, and he came into the Union Station at Toronto. I think Sir Joseph Flavelle had a private car attached to that train too, representing the Grand Trunk Railway. I do not know how many private cars there were; but the more the better, if the railway problem is solved as a result of these trips. If, however, the Minister of Railways will sit down in this House and study this report and the report of the experts, he will have all the advice and knowledge he requires to enable him to decide what to do with the state railway system so as to effect a remedy for the disease into which the railway business has fallen in this country.

[Mr. Church.]

In looking over the transportation question, I find that Mr. Beatty, president of the Canadian Pacific railway, agrees with this report. One night after his appointment as president of the Canadian Pacific railway, a banquet was held in the town of Thorold in which he was born, in his honour by the Board of Trade of that place. I was invited to attend, and I spoke at that banquet. People of both political parties were present; there were private ownership men and public ownership men there. This is what Mr. Beatty says about this question. He is in favour of co-ordinating and consolidating; he welcomes and favours competition; he says that competition is going to be a good thing for the Canadian Pacific railway. He claims that the time has gone by in business in the history of the world when two men quarrel as competitors. Two men, each running a retail store or a hotel, need not quarrel because, as a result of competition, there will be business for both of them. I will read, without any comment, his very words on the railway situation; and it is amazing to me to see the different position taken by the president of the Canadian Pacific railway now from that taken formerly by him and also the remarkable stand taken by the former president, Lord Shaughnessy. The Drayton-Acworth report was a Conservative Government report; it was made before the Union Government was formed. I was never a believer in the Union Government; I am a Tory of the old school and I intend to continue to be one even though the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Lapointe) says that it may not be a respectable party. The Conservative party was in office at that time. As the hon. member for South York pointed out the other day, the railways have always been in politics. True it is that the president of the Canadian Pacific railway in the late election said that the Canadian Pacific was not in politics; but the Canadian Pacific has been in politics as long as it has been a road, since away back in the early seventies. The greatest politicians that this country has ever produced have never sat in the legislatures at all; they have been general managers and presidents of railways, and they have been managing legislatures and things pretty well for themselves. As some one has said, Ottawa never knows what the rest of the country is thinking, but these railway presidents manage things pretty well as they want to. My understanding is that the Canadian Pacific have always changed their politics with the party in power; they are friendly to every administration. If the Farmers' party came into power, they would now support the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). Had it not been for the unpopularity of the Drury Government, they did not carry out their pledges to the Progressives; if they had done what their U.F.O. officers said they would do for the hon. member for Marquette, he would to-day be occupying the Treasury benches. That should be a lesson to the Progressive party from the West to stand by their principles and not join the Government here. Had the hon. member for Marquette succeeded in forming a government, the Canadian Pacific would have wished themselves on him whether he liked it or not. When a man becomes a railway man, he knows no politics; the railway business is his politics. Some of the railway magnates in the past have been very successful in managing various legislatures of the country; they have been most successful in their management of the United Farmers government at Queen's Park. Mr. Beatty goes on to say, speaking at the Thorold banquet:

> On the occasion of our last banquet, the railway sitaution was somewhat different than it is to-day. It has now advanced another step in what some regard as being the logical consequence of the first step, and we are met with the rather unique situation of the existence of two strong railway systems in Canada, both backed by adequate credit and both desirous of fulfilling to the best of their ability their share in supplying the transportation requirements of the country.
> Some people have regarded the railway situation as highly controversial, and it was to the extent that the adherents of the two systems of administration, privately and publicly owned, have been insistent on the correctness of their respective views, and expressly apprehensive of the results of any other system than that which they advocated. To my mind, to regard it as controversial is now unnecessary and unwise, and the chief consideration of all of us is as to what will be the result to the country as a whole in the matter of railway service, and to ourselves in particular as one of those engaged in supplying a large part of that service.
>
> The Canadian Pacific has been built up over a long period of years into an organization of which we may all be conceivably and properly proud, and an organization, the usefulness of which in public service is probably now more important than at any other period of its history. It is a company which can only continue to succeed by being administered with strict integrity and in accordance with the highest business ethics. Upon its success in service depends its rewards.
>
> There has always been competition and there always will be competition and the character of business competition does not alter in any of its essential details as the years pass on. Our competitor is and will be a very extensive system, which will probably increase in magnitude. We all hope it will be a success, and we do not need to be altruists in order to harbor that hope. I think I can say to you with perfect candor that no man in Canada has more reason to hope for its success than I have, for two reasons, first, because its success as a railway undertaking means a gradual release of the burden on the taxpayer, and the Canadian Pacific is a fairly heavy taxpayer, and secondly because the factors which contribute to its success will ensure the further and continued success of the Canadian Pacific. If the traffic development of the country is such as to support the National system, it will undoubtedly be sufficient to add to the support of the Canadian Pacific. You will, therefore, appreciate that on national and selfish grounds the success of the National railways is something that every Canadian Pacific official should desire.
>
> It involves competition of course—keen competition. Competition which is both keen and honest cannot help but redound to the advantage of the competitors, to the improvement in the character of the service they render, and to the resultant advantage of the people and communities served. Personally I would have no fear of the competition adversely affecting this company or its interests, and the reason why I think I have a right to that confidence is to be found in the organization itself and the character of the officers and men who comprise it—officers and men who, I think, can be relied on to play the game of transportation competition as it was meant to be played—adroitly, persistently, aggressively and fairly.
>
> Depreciation of Roads
> In years gone by it was considered an act of proper aggressiveness for one competitor to decry the methods and wares of his rival. This is not the case to-day. It is foolish to depreciate your competitors outwardly or otherwise—foolish for two reasons: first, because they probably do not deserve your depreciation of them, and secondly, because it is bad business.

Now that is what Mr. Beatty says in regard to the question of duplication and competition and in support of his theory of a public-owned system. The officials of the Canadian Pacific railway are very fond of talking about what that railway has done in the interests of the country. What, on the other hand, has Canada done for the Canadian Pacific Railway? I think they should consider that question on the other side of the account. Lord Shaughnessy declares for co-ordination too, and government ownership with Canadian Pacific railway operation and I think he has expressed the belief that his policy is approved by some gentlemen in the House. He says that co-ordination is both logical and economical. Well, of course, it is—for the Canadian Pacific railway. If Lord Shaugnessy could have his way he would have everything in Canada, and the heavens above, and the earth beneath and the waters under the earth, all placed under the control of the Canadian Pacific railway, and would lord it over all the inhabitants of the earth. His predecessor, Abraham Lincoln, said with regard to public-ownership, "This country and all that is within it belongs to the people who inhabit it." Lord Shaughnessy would go him one better and declare that this country and all who inhabit it belong to the Canadian Pacific Railway. Others have expressed themselves on public ownership. Let me quote what some have said:

> Every measure must be tested by this question only: Is it just? Is it for the benefit of the average man, without influence or privilege? Does it embody the highest conception of social justice, without respect to person or class or particular interest?—Woodrow Wilson.
>
> Real public ownership is the essence of democracy. Instead of dividing men into masters and mastered, it brings men together in a union of interest, and affords the conditions necessary for the highest traits of conscience and character.—Prof. Frank Parsons of the Boston Law School in "The City for the People."
> In its search for truth the commission had to overcome many obstacles, such as the burning of books, letters, and documents and the obstinacy of witnesses who declined to testify until criminal proceedings were begun for their refusal to answer questions. The New Haven Railroad system has more than 300 subsidiary corporations in a web of entangling alliances with each other, many of which are seemingly planned, created, and manipulated by lawyers expressly retained for the purpose of concealment of deception.—From the Inquiry of the Interstate Commerce Commission, July 11, 1914, into the New Haven and other Railroads.

If public ownership had been in such a condition as was revealed by the Interstate Commerce Commission as aforesaid, I wonder what private ownership advocates would have had to say? What would Lord Shaughnessy and Mr. Beatty say? I asked the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) the other day why it should take so much time to co-ordinate and consolidate these roads, in view of the recommendation made by the commission appointed by this Parliament four years ago. Take the New York Central lines in the United States as an example of the expedition with which consolidation can be achieved when an effort is made toward this end. That system co-ordinated many branch lines in Ohio, the Lake Shore passing through Geneva, Cleveland and other centres down to Toledo. How long do you imagine it took the New York Central to co-ordinate that system? About forty-eight hours. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) the other day referred to the subject of arbitration of the Grand Trunk. It is true that a delay was experienced in connection with that arbitration, but it was entirely unavoidable. The right hon. gentleman was compelled to visit the Old Country on an important mission, in regard to which, as we all know, he acquitted himself so admirably, reflecting the greatest credit on this country. When he returned last fall he announced an election, and as head of the government of that time he felt he could not deal with the important question of co-ordination of the publicly owned roads until the country had expressed its opinion on his policy of linking up the Grand Trunk and the Grand Trunk Pacific. The election came, and nothing has been done since. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) has been taking a trip, and now that he is back in the House I trust it will not be long before he can make up his mind as to what it is best to do. What they have done in the United States in connection with their railways should spur the Government of this country to activity. Mr. McAdoo, the Director-General of Railways, under Mr. Woodrow Wilson, soon after he was appointed to the position, took over, on the 28th of December, 1917, all the railways in the United States in twenty-four hours and co-ordinated and consolidated them. True, it was not strictly government ownership but government operation. This taking over of the railways was a war measure that had to be carried out. Many of the roads were bankrupt and could not carry on; they could not, in the state in which they were without certain betterments and improvements which had to be made by the director-general, carry munitions and troops to the seaboard. The Director-General of Railways, however, was able in twenty-four hours to co-ordinate something like, I think, 200 or 300 companies. These roads were taken over for the duration of the war and a period of eighten months thereafter, when, it was agreed, the government would hand them back to private ownership. During the time that they were under the control of the government they were put into a state of repair. The government had undertaken to pay to private ownership 5½ per cent. or the average dividends secured each year for the 5 years prior to 1917—during government operation. That, of course, I do not call public ownership. There are several ways of operating a railway. There is, for instance, private ownership practically without any government regulation, such as we see in the case of the Canadian Pacific Railway. There is also private ownership with some degree of government regulation. Then there is private ownership and management with strict government regulation, and private ownership with exclusive government operation. There is also government ownership with private operation, such as Lord Shaughnessy wants. And there is what I want—government ownership and government operation. I mean such proper and adequate government ownership and operation as will make the publicly owned roads a success. A few days ago the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) referred to the deplorable condition of the steam roads in the United States, due to over capitalization and lack of rolling stock and equipment, which, coupled with a long period of depression in business and post-war stagnation, had reduced most of the railway companies to financial trouble. A shortage of rolling stock and equipment has rendered it impossible for the railways to efficiently handle even the limited amount of freight that has been tendered to them, and as a result the automobile manufacturers in the Central States have been forced to drive over 80,000 of their cars to New York city under their own power rather than trust to the very unsatisfactory transportation services of the railways. To illustrate the condition of affairs I will quote some of the evidence given before the Inter-State Commerce Commission regarding the difficulties which confronted the Railroad Administrator of the United States in the winter 1917-18, when he assumed control of the American railway systems.

It was the worst winter in the history of railroading.

I happened to be in the Southern States at the time and had personal experience of the severe winter weather then prevailing.

They were up against:—

War demands—army of millions of men to be transported to the cantonments, seaboard, and back.

Plague of influenza, playing havoc with workmen, 18,000 employees sick at one time in New England alone.

Greatest burden of both freight and passenger traffic in railroad history.

Alarming coal shortage (248 mines idle because of lack of cars).

Terrible freight congestion (180,000 loaded freight cars on the eastern lines alone; many freight embargoes).

Putting in and training inexperienced men.

Drafting of thousands of employees.

Chaos in railroad management, poor handling of cars, locomotives etc.

Great amount of overtime pay necessary to get repair work done. Had also but six months of increased rates to meet 12 months of increased pay.

Inability to get new cars and locomotives because of need of them for war purposes and our shortage of men owing to the draft.

No serviceable locomotives in reserve (at beginning of this winter, however, 1,000 in reserve.)

More or less opposition on the part of railway executives to successful government control for fear it would become permanent.

Necessity of handling freight and making repairs at any cost.

No complete valuation of the railroads on which to compute freight rate, and make a budget.

As the hon. member for South York pointed out, if you look over the history of the privately owned railroads of the United States, you must admit that private ownership has not been a success. I shall not labour that point to-day.

The press has devoted considerable attention to our railway affairs, and I wish to direct your attention to an article which recently apeared in one of our leading Ontario papers, written by its Ottawa representative. It reads:

While no sound comes from the hermetically sealed room in which the Gouin Government holds secret counsel as to its railway policy, the stock ticker—the same prophet that for a whole year foretold the coming of the Great War—keeps chattering. "Something doing in C.P.R.: something doing in C.P.R."

Something doing in Canadian Pacific! We have the declaration of the hon. leader of the Government that he intends to give public ownership a chance, and we have the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) and the hon. leader of the Progressives (Mr. Crerar) declaring themselves in favor of public ownership and operation of our railways. But the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has been most active regarding the transportation situation, and when you see the stock ticker chattering you know there is going to be something doing in respect to our railway problem. Continuing the article says:

Last week C.P.R. stock advanced in price about eight points. In the same time U.P. stock, which pays the same 10 per cent dividend, advanced only three points. And everybody started looking for the reason. Some Yankee financial papers hinted at "Government ownership," and there is something more than a possibility that they have scored a bull's-eye.

That the railroads were the issue in the recent elections is now common knowledge; that the railroad interests won that election is beyond a peradventure. That the latter are about to take action of some kind is evidenced by the stock market. But what is the action to be taken? That is the question for which politicians and financiers alike are trying to find the answer.

Again, the article proceeds:

On more than one occasion the C.P.R. made proposals to the late government. They were always along the same line. They always provided for government-ownership of all railroads, with the exception of the old G.T.R., which was to be handed back to its shareholders, but included the C.P.R. And they always provided that the C.P.R. should have the management of the whole government system.

But, naturally, every care was to be taken of the C.P.R. shareholders. They are paid, as said before, 10 per cent on this stock.

And again the article says:

Sacred Cause is Safe

One hundred per cent of the Liberals are for private-ownership. Ninety-five per cent of the Conservatives are in the same frame of mind. Eighty per cent of the Ontario U.F.O. members are as pro-C.P.R. as the Drury Government, and the western Progressives would be, too, if they were not afraid of their constituents.

This gives the sacred cause of vested rights an overwhelming majority in the House. It gives the Gouin ring their long-looked for opportunity to put over any kind of a deal that is even slightly camouflaged.

To put it briefly, the stage is all set for the final division of those accumulated C.P.R. profits. The right kind of Parliament is there. The Cabinet has been especially selected for the purpose. The C.P.R. has prepared its deal.. And the stock-ticker fairly shrieks that it is on the way.

The Conservative party has been a believer in public ownership and favourable to the hydro-electric and hydro-radial movements in the province of Ontario, and the Conservative party gave the province the benefits of public ownership of our hydro-electric development. Eighty per cent of the Progressive party in Ontario, or of the U.F.O. are said to be as pro-Canadian Pacific Railway as the Drury Government. It is said that the western Progressives would be pro-Canadian Pacific too if they were not afraid of their constituents. I should think that some of my Progressive friends are too young in their parliamentary experience to be afraid of their constituents so early in their public career.

The hon. Prime Minister said in the course of his speech on Monday, " Give the railways a chance." I hope he will give them a chance, but what does he mean by that word? The Drayton-Acworth Commission recommended that a free hand be given to a board of directors to consolidate all the government-owned roads. When we appointed a transportation commission to take over the Toronto Street railway, on which they spent $11,000,000 on betterments in the last four months of 1921, and will spend another $11,000,000 in betterments this year, the citizens carried by a large majority the proposal to take over the light, power and transportation systems within the city, with a commission to administer them. When we were considering the powers and scope of the transportation commission, I took a very strong stand to give the commission an absolutely free hand and full control over the entire system and also rates and fares, and insisted that the commission should be free of any and all interference from the city council and should have full power to fix rates and operate the street railway system to the best of their ability, and make it pay and administer it solely from the commercial aspect.

That principle was adopted by the city council and the legislature and was embodied in our act. It would prove a success in its application to our publicly-owned federal railway systems. That is the only kind of management that can be successfully applied to our national railway system; without it we might as well have no public ownership at all. What has been the secret of the success of the Hydro-Electric in Ontario? First, the absence of politics in its administration; second, efficient management and operation,—and without these things public ownership cannot succeed. I hope that if the railways are handed over to a commission, there will be a stop to the passing of legislation as to receipts and expenditures and the financing of the road, or affecting hours and conditions of labour; matters of that kind should be left to the commission. Labour has everything to hope for from public ownership; it has very little to expect from private ownership. Public ownership will always deal justly and fairly with the workingman so far as working conditions and hours of labour are concerned. Under public ownership the same rates of wages and hours of labour apply as in the case of private ownership because they are established on a similar basis or on a higher and better plane than under private ownership.

I hope that the state-owned railways will be given a proper chance, but when the Minister of Railways addresses the House with regard to this matter I would like him to tell us what he means when he says that state-owned roads will be given a "chance." The Drayton-Acworth report indicates how they can be made a success. Let the Government carry out the recommendations of that report and thus follow the basic principle which has brought such splendid success to the Hydro-Electric movement in Ontario. If Progressive members from the western part of Ontario—and I know eight or ten of them from that district—want to see at first hand an exemplification of the success of public ownership as applied to railways in our province, let them go over Adam Beck's railway, the London and Port Stanley, owned by the city of London, which was formerly owned by the Pere Marquette and subsequently the Grand Trunk, and finally taken over by the city of London and electrified. Passenger rates have been reduced enormously; freight rates have been brought down to a minimum, and improved facilities afforded in the way of lake services—London and St. Thomas have been placed thus on lake Erie—with lake services to Cleveland, Erie, Pa., and other points on lake Erie. I repeat that that road has been made a splendid success, because it has been administered by Sir Adam Beck on the basis of no politics and entirely from the business point of view. Operate a road in that way; secure an efficient operation equipment and management, and you will have what the Drayton-Acworth report recommends. But if you are to have the doctors of the Canadian Pacific giving advice, then good-bye to public ownership of railways in this country. If that condition is to prevail it would be far better if the railways had not been taken over.

I was somewhat surprised yesterday upon hearing the remarks of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan)—and I am glad to see him back in the House, because he is a good friend of mine. He made a very good speech so far as the Maritime provinces are concerned; he knows a great deal about the transportation question. But he did not tell the House all he knows. I say I was surprised, Mr. Speaker, at the stand he took; I do not think his attitude is altogether just and fair in some respects. British Columbia has an equal right to take that stand, and so have the other western provinces. I do not know whether or not it is correct, but some years ago I saw a return which stated that Ontario had contributed about 52 per cent of all taxes of Canada since Confederation. At any rate, Ontario is a very heavily taxed province, and 58 or 60 per cent of all taxes in Ontario are paid by Toronto and the district of Toronto. I saw a return the other day in this connection, relating to the British North America Act and the bringing of British Columbia, the Western provinces and the Maritime provinces into Confederation. Having regard to the British North America Act there may be something in what the member for Cumberland says, but when the Maritime provinces set up the contention which he makes, it should be remembered that the West, British Columbia in particular, can reasonably do the same. But I hope that they will never make that contention; I hope they will not ask the old provinces of Canada, Ontario and Quebec, to pay for what they are asking in regard to reduced freight and passenger rates, because the old provinces have borne the heat of the day for quite a long time and are already loaded up with a heavy burden of freight rates.

You cannot have faithful and efficient administration of the railways of this country unless solely administered from the commercial aspect, along the line of the Hydro-Electric movement and the Drayton-Acworth report. The railways must be run for the benefit of the whole of Canada; they must be operated on a purely business basis or not at all. The sentiment of the East and of the West, or of the East as against the West, cannot be considered. And in this connection, Mr. Speaker, I think that some of the Western provinces have a good deal to complain of from the standpoint of government regulation. Government regulation in this country is not what it should be. It is not here what it is in the United States. I am free to say that good work was done by the Railway Commission through Mr. Blair and Mr. Justice Mabee and Sir Henry Drayton. They were strong administrators of the railways so far as their jurisdiction went and they had the confidence of the people of Canada. But in later days the Railway Commission has not been fulfilling the functions for which it was appointed. There have been four increases in rates—freight, passenger, telephone and express. The municipality of Toronto had to fight practically alone against these increases. We spent nearly $30,000 in the services of experts to fight the freight increase and the passenger increase; we spent $30,000 on two fights over telephone and express rate increases. The Railway Commission heard these corporations, and notwithstanding the fact that the war had long been over, and prices were beginning to recede, in the summer of 1920 they allowed these companies an increase of 40 per cent in freight and passenger rates. I have figured that the total of these increases —I speak subject to correction; I have seen the figures as given by the head of the Hydro-Electric Radial Asociation, Mr. J. W. Lyon, of Guelph, who is an expert in these matters—the total freight increases granted by Hon. Mr. Carvell and his colleagues in the Railway Board have amounted to $300,000,000 a year in the last few years. Fancy all these taxes put on the farmers and working classes without the consent of Parliament! A railway commission which does not represent the people is appointed to impose taxes amounting to a million dollars a day for every working day in the year, without the consent of the people's representatives in Parliament. I say it is not fair; it is not just; legislation of that kind is not equitable; it is not responsible government. I hope I shall have the support of the Progressives in seeing that something is done to amend such legislation —I know I shall have the support of the Opposition — to bring about a change in this state of affairs. There is something in the Speech from the Throne about freight rates, and I think the hon. Prime Minister says that if there is dissatisfaction with what the commission does, he is willing to let Parliament take some stand in the matter. But if I had my way I would go back to the old method of doing things; I would not have any of these rate handouts by the Railway Commission without the authority of Parliament. It was a particularly retrogressive step for Canada when we placed the telephone and express rates under the control of the Railway Commission, and it is fortunate indeed that Parliament did not place under their jurisdiction also the matter of tolls and rates for water-borne traffic and the control of lake rates. These increases to which I have referred were granted without proper or adequate inquiry, research or investigation; the chairman of the board took the figures submitted by the experts of the Canadian Pacific as to receipts re the freight and passenger increase, etc. The result was he granted a forty per cent increase, notwithstanding the fact that the Canadian Pacific had a surplus of nearly $492,000,000, I think it was, as active and inactive assets.

Then the people of Canada taught the railways and the Railway Commission a lesson, because with a forty per cent increase in the passenger rates they would not travel on the railways; accordingly the companies had to go back to some of the old rates. The people taught the railway people a lesson with respect to freight rates also. In the district from which I come the largest retail stores, when dealing with customers located on the Toronto and Hamilton highway, transported their goods in motor cars. So the Canadian Pacific and the Grand Trunk railways lost heavily in some localities by reason of that increase in rates.

Then the Telephone Company came along. It wanted an increase and nothing would do but they should come to Ottawa and ask the Board of Railway Commissioners for an increase. They preferred their request and they got the desired increase. And this, although the Bell Telephone Company is a rich corporation, with a large surplus, and it was so hard up that it paid eight per cent in dividends for thirty-two years. That company came down to Ottawa, applied to the Railway Commissioners and got a raise in their rates for the asking. This telephone rate increase took a million dollars out of the taxpayers of Toronto and was unjust, unfair, inequitable and not according to the provisions of the Company or the Railway Act. I am satisfied that the latest increase asked for by the Bell Company would have been granted had an election not been pending. Some of the commissioners probably thought they had better look out for their positions on the board, and not grant the increase, for if a new government came in they might be relieved of their judicial duties. So the board divided itself 3 to 2 on this second telephone application and it was refused. I hope the present Government will bring in legislation in the interest of the public, and not allow any further increase without the consent of Parliament, and so take some of the taxes from the shoulders of the working classes as well as of the farmers in this country. Perhaps it would be a good thing for this country if provision were made also for a reorganization, root and branch, of the whole board and let us have a living regulation of these powerful public service corporations.

I will tell you what the increase of freight rates has done for the farmers. It has added $5 to the price of every ton of coal which the farmers in the county of York buy. I was one of the directors of the Consumers' Gas Company in Toronto representing the city on the board, and that company pays out a million and a half in freight rates alone. It took all the money coming in over the counter to meet the added charges of freight rates, labour, exchange, and increased cost of coal. The price of gas in the city of Toronto was very low at the time, but you can see what was involved when the price of coal went up from $3.20 to $10, $12, $13, $14 a ton. The exchange rate represented an additional charge of $250,000, and the freight rates a million and a half dollars. The price of gas had to be twice raised and it was hard on the working classes.

I would like to consider how these freight rates affect the farmer in another way. I have here a statement issued by a bank that loans the federal Government of Canada, as well as the provincial governments and municipalities, a lot of money —I refer to the National City Bank of New York. It is one of the largest financial corporations not only in America but in the world. This corporation isues a sketch every month describing the economic conditions in Canada and in the United States. In the statement referred to they discuss the high prices of building materials and how the excessive freight rates are keeping building operations back. Reference is made to the iron industry, and it is stated that the difficulty of getting steel for building purposes is very largely due to the present high freight rates and high prices of coal. The coal question, as any coal dealer can tell you, is very largely a transportation question; solve the transportation question and you can overcome the high price of coal. Many of the mines in the coal mining regions closed down during the war and after it because of the scarcity of cars and the difficulty of getting coal transported to the consuming centres. Now, this is what this bank statement has to say as to how the freight rates affect the building trades and the farmers:

> As the liquidation process throughout the industry was extended, the wholly disproportionate margin of cost assumed by the freight factor under prevailing rates was thrown in bolder relief. A typical study has shown that whereas on January 1, 1913, the assembling cost for a ton of basic pig iron in the Mahoning Valley was approximately 27 per cent of the selling price, it is now approximately 58 per cent. The estimated assembling charges in the two periods are $4.80 and $10.55 and the prices $16.45 and $18.25 respectively. With labour costs cut down 40 to 50 per cent from the peak, operating efficiency largely restored and other economics forced, the factor of freight cost obviously occupies a commanding position in its bearing upon future prices.

The statement goes on to say:

> Nothing will save the farming industry but a deep cut in freight rates. We are all merely producing tonnage for the railroads, who merely collect from the unorganized workers and turn it over to the organized workers. The latter punish when the politicians fail to do their bidding; we farmers don't.

The farmers did, in Canada. The hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) referred to what has been done in the United States in the matter of electrifying railways. In this connection the New York Central railway has effected great economies in the saving of coal; also the London and Port Stanley railway in Ontario and the Milwaukee, Chicago and St. Paul operating in the Western states. I do not agree with my hon. friend from York that in Ontario we have a million horse power at present available. The power available from the development of the Chippewa has been contracted for, but with half our industries closed down and the other half only running part time difficulty has been experienced already in getting sufficient power.

If the St. Lawrence power scheme were carried out sufficient energy would be available to electrify our railways from Quebec to Fort William. President Harding of the United States has come out very strongly in favour of the St. Lawrence waterway and the electrification of railways in the United States. Addressing the national agricultural conference at Washington on February 20 last, he spoke as follows:

> To this time railroad construction, financing and operation have been unscientific and devoid of proper consideration for the wider concerns of the community. To say this is simply to admit a fact which applies to practically every railroad system in the world. It is as true regarding the railroads of Canada and Great Britain as it is in reference to those of the United States.
>
> In America we have too long neglected our waterways. We need a practical development of water resources for both transportation and power. A large share of railway tonnage is coal for railroad fuel. The experience of railway electrification demonstrates the possibilty of reducing this waste and increasing efficiency.
>
> We may well begin very soon to consider plans to electrify our railroads. If such a suggestion seems to involve inordinate demands upon our financial and industrial power, it may be replied that three generations ago the suggestion of building 260,000 miles of railways in this country would have been scouted as a financial and industrial impossibility."
> The waterway improvement represents not only the possibility of expanding our transportation system, but also of producing hydro-electric power for its operation and for the activities of widely diffused industry.

I have spoken of the advantage which Europe enjoys because of its easy access to the sea, the cheapest and surest transportation facilities. In our own country is presented one of the world's most attractive opportunities for extension of the seaways many hundred miles inland. The heart of the continent with its vast resources in both agriculture and industry would be brought in communication with all the ocean routes by the execution of the St. Lawrence waterway project. The feasibility of the project is unquestioned and its cost, compared with some other great engineering works, would be small.

There you have the declaration of the President of the United States regarding the electrification of railways and the need of stimulating and developing water-borne traffic, on inland rivers and waterways of United States and Canada, in order to properly, adequately, efficiently and economically solve the transportation problems of his and our country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South York (Mr. MacLean) referred to motor trucks as a factor in transportation. I cannot go as far as the hon. member in that connection, because, taking the other side of the case, I have the finding of the electrical commission in the United States, who investigated all the electric systems in that country and they found that the motor truck would not be a factor in transportation for two or three reasons: first, on account of the high price of gasoline, second, on account of the high price of tires, and third owing to difficulties of loading and unloading and trans-shipment. As I see it they will only be a factor to act as a feeder to the electric railways, and the electric railways and radials will be feeders for the steam roads. That was proven in the railway administration of the United States, and that is what happened on the New York and Pennsylvania lines and the Michigan Central lines. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman from South York when he said they would be a factor, although at the time of the 40 per cent increase in rates they were a factor, but between inter-urban municipalities I do not believe they will ever be a factor in Canada, especially on account of the climate that we have here for five months in the year. But there is another matter which enters into it. I believe the greatest factor in transportation in Canada in the future is the electrification of railways and hydro-radials and radials as a whole. I regret to see the stand taken by the Drury U.F.O. government in the Ontario Legislature in this regard. I think the radials in Ontario are not a luxury, they are a social, economic and commercial necessity.

I desire to pay tribute to the pioneer work done by Sir Adam Beck in Ontario. It is a revelation to visitors from all over the world.

I refer to the development in the Niagara river, and to-morrow it will be in the St. Lawrence, and in the West also. Sooner or later we will have a network of electrical lines between rural municipalities and urban centres. We have to look to United States to see what a factor electrical railways and radials and interurban lines of communication are. Take the state of Michigan. A few years ago the city of Detroit only had a population of 425,000. To-day, owing to the network of radials in that great city, the population of Detroit is over a million people. The Ford industry also helped in that development. I was at the Deep Waterways convention at Detroit at which sixteen states were represented and nine state governors were present to discuss the St. Lawrence canal. These states were linked up together as far as they could be on the waterways problem, and one of the main things discussed at that convention was the effect the radials had in the solution of the transportation problem in that great land, and especially the Western states. Look at what radials have done for Ohio—they solved there the unemployment and transportation question—and were feeders to the steam roads. They have radials from Cleveland all the way to Buffalo. Every mile and a half or so, all the way down you see spread out little villages, built up by interurban lines of communications between the cities and towns of that great state and the lake Erie ports. This is the state of Ohio, whence came the present President as well as the defeated candidate for president—Governor Cox. The population of Ohio is as large as that of Canada, namely, 9,000,000. I pay tribute to what President Harding has said as to the electrification of railways and the development of waterways and interurban traffic. That is borne out in Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, Indiana, and in that state of Woodrow Wilson's, New Jersey. In Ontario 200 municipalities have carried Hydro Radial by-laws. It was not Sir Adam Beck nor the commission that first asked for a survey for these lines of railways, but the 200 municipalities themselves—the Hydro Radial policy is not to duplicate the steam roads. The policy is to take over some of the unused sections of the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk and electrify them. I believe the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) in this House, will be a faithful friend of Sir Adam Beck and of the Hydro municipalities, and will do what he can for the Hydro Radials.

I believe he will bring down a policy in this connection to give the Hydro an option on what federal sections of our publicly-owned railways the Hydro wants—unlike the Canadian Northern Railway the Hydro Radials ask no subsidies. When they are operating through the country they will give a service to the farmers, so that the farmer of Ontario will have a fair chance to market his crop to his home market at cost. Sir Adam Beck's report when presented recommended a radial system for Ontario. The farmers are very strong for it, and the reason is this; that the steam roads have absolutely fallen down in the province of Ontario. In the Hamilton district, the Toronto district and the London district we have no steam suburban service. Montreal has a steam suburban service; on the national lines they have about six trains a day out and back. The Canadian Pacific has, I think, about 12 trains running out and back the same day; from the Island of Montreal the Grand Trunk has far more than that. In all they have some 30 or 40 suburban trains a day out of Montreal—the Toronto district has not a single suburban train on the steam road, except one to Oakville on the Canadian Pacific. There is an absence of any semblance of any steam suburban service.

In the territory back of Toronto, for a distance of thirty miles, there is a population of 800,000, over a third of the population of the entire province. That great district is without a steam suburban service. What is the result to the farmer? He cannot get his crops to market. If you go to the Niagara district in August or September, you will find they have a difficulty in getting out the fruit crop. If you go to Hamilton you will see the same. Go to Mr. Drury's own constituency of Halton and see the same and you will also see that the farmers in Halton are very much dissatisfied on account of the stand the government has taken on the hydro radials. They are a unit in Halton in that respect. The absence of this service is the cause of the high cost of living in the cities and towns and of underproduction. The municipalities were forced to ask the Hydro Electric Power Commission to investigate the radials because—of the way the steam roads fell down—these radials have done so much for the farmers and the towns and cities across the border. Sir Adam's report, was prepared and then the municipalities voted on and carried the various Hydro Radial by-laws.

It is not an Ontario government radial scheme, it is the municipalities' own scheme. The government of Ontario never lost a dollar in it or on the Hydro Light and Power scheme. Every municipality has a surplus from Hydro, except one or two not yet beyond construction. I may say that is the reason the radials were brought into existence. Now, because of the lack of transportation in Ontario we have rural depopulation in this province. In the period from 1904 to 1914, 500,000 people left the farms of Ontario and went to cities and towns in the West and to cities and towns in Ontario and the United States. Why? Some of my hon. friends opposite and some hon. members on the Progressive side of the House claim that that was due to the trade policy of the country. I say: No, it is not due to any question of protection or free trade. Some of it may be due to free trade in other countries, because rural depopulation is a world wide problem; but rural depopulation in Ontario was not due to protection, it is not a local, but a world problem; it has been brought about largely by the war. What is the reason and cause of this rural depopulation in Ontario from 1904 to 1914 of, I think, half a million people? It is because of lack of transportation facilities on the farms, because of lack of the very joy of living on the farms, without conveniences such as good roads, hydro-telephones, hydro-telegraphs and hydro-radials. Prior to a few years ago, there was no rural mail delivery, no goods delivery and only a flag station railway service from the steam roads throughout the province. I believe, however, that the hydro-radials will bring about a remedy of those conditions.

Before I conclude, I desire to say a few words about the St. Lawrence waterway. The people of Ontario and, I believe, also the people of the Western provinces are vitally interested in this waterway. In the first place, there is no coal in Ontario; we have to depend on the Maritime provinces or the United States for our coal supply. In about a hundred years the United States' coal supply will be exhausted; we are thus at the mercy of a foreign country. The province contains an abundant supply of water-power, in all

6,000,000 h.p., of which approximately over 800,000 h.p. has been developed. I have in my hand some notes of the evidence which I gave before the International Waterways Commission in October, 1920. As I am placing on the Order Paper a resolution in regard to the St. Lawrence river, I will not go into this matter at any length to-day except to say that the Western provinces especially, Ontario, and indeed, Canada as a whole, should be vitally interested in this proposition.

Nature provided the St. Lawrence for two reasons: (1) For a great waterway to the sea; (2) for a great power plant to develop trade, commerce and agriculture. The development of this river will bring untold relief to Canadians and Americans. Power will be developed; industry and agriculture made more secure; freight rates cheapened; several million tons of coal will be saved annually. Fourteen western states have come out in favour of this project, and I think all Canada, with the exception of some conscientious objectors in the city of Montreal, are in favour of it.

I was speaking to a member of the Montreal Harbour Commission yesterday and they are not opposing this proposition. In the United States they are having a little family spat between the cautious conservative big interests in the East and the more progressive interests in the West over this project; but the West is going to win. The younger generation in Canada will live to see the day when ocean-going ships will come from the Old Country, go up the St. Lawrence and up the Upper lakes with their cargo. The fact that this scheme is feasible from a commercial and business standpoint is strengthened by what happened in 1911 when the big interests were willing to canalize the St. Lawrence in return for the power privileges. They made a sharp fight before the Rivers and Harbours Committee at Washington. They said they would build a canal if they were given the power to build it. Every year 4,000,000 h.p. of electrical energy, the equivalent of $800,000,000 worth of coal, is going to waste in the St. Lawrence, and the finest system of inland waterways in the world has been lying idle all these years because of lack of development, as deep draught vessels cannot sail up the St. Lawrence 46 miles on their way to the Upper lakes. The St. Lawrence ranks with the Suez and Panama canals in its magnitude and importance. The cost of this project may reach $250,000,000 or more, no one yet knows the cost, but there will be no great difficulty in financing the work. Private capital stands ready to develop the deep waterway in exchange for the power privileges. The great bulk of the developed power will belong to Canada. Some say that Canada wants to take it all, but that is not so; they can dispose of the power in other ways and sell some abroad. A large part of the power will belong to the province of Quebec. Abundant evidence will be found in the report of the International Joint Commission that this project will be a success. Sir Adam Beck, of the Hydro-Electric Commission, who investigated this project on behalf of the Ontario Government, has made his report.

1. The report sets out clearly the position of the province in relation to the improvements. It pointed out that in all discussion and consideration of the work the important facts of navigation and power could not be separated; that in all consideration and in all determination as to the future of the river, the fact that navigation and power were so intimately connected that one could not be sacrificed to the advantage of the other.

2. This report stated that there could be developed at conservative estimate power equivalent to 20,000,000 tons of coal per year —more than the total importation of Canada now. It advocated the construction of the proposed improvements to the St. Lawrence, which it said was the most important economic question before the people of Canada.

3. The final aim of the policy of the Hydro-Electric Commission is, first the complete development of the available power at Niagara, and following that the joint development with the aid of the federal governments of Canada and the United States of the great international water powers on the St. Lawrence River.

The Hydro served 344 municipalities, every one of whom had a big surplus. If the St. Lawrence scheme materializes, as it must, large industries will inevitably move into Canada and the United States to take advantage of the cheap and abundant power thus made available, and no more ideal location for the exploitation of these enormous industrial activities can be imagined than that portion of Ontario and New York lying adjacent to the shores of the St. Lawrence River. With nearly two million horse power available and with deep draft navigation to tide water the industrial future of this territory would be assured. The canalization of the St. Lawrence is the most important matter to come before the people of Canada since Confederation and the building of the Canadian Pacific railway. I propose to discuss this further when my motion comes up on the Order Paper.

The Hydro from the Niagara district exported from Canada 90,000 horse power. Each horse power represents from six to twenty tons of coal according to the character of the industrial plant which is supplied. I have attended as a Toronto Harbour Commissioner the convention of the Port Authorities and heard the arguments for the St. Lawrence scheme. Those against it were all founded on a fallacy. To sum up in a few words the advantages of the St. Lawrence route:

1. It is one of the great natural waterways of the world.

2. The cost of improvement is less than that of other routes. Moreover, it would be divided between the two nations sharing its benefits.

3. It is a high-speed highway avoiding long passages by canals.

4. It would accommodate the large vessels of commerce, opening the Great Lakes to ocean freighters and avoiding the cost of rehandling goods.

5. The improvement would develop vast water power, more than any other project—develop it where wanted.

6. It would be jointly owned and used by Canada and the United States, and such joint ownership and use would cement the friendship of these two great peoples.

7. If, failing to join with the States, we insist on an all-Canadian route, then we may expect an American route as well; we should then have two costly waterways paralleling the way to the sea, where one less costly and more efficient than either would suffice. It is a practical and sensible plan.

We believe there is a distinct advantage in joining hands with our sister nation to the south, the United States.

Millions of horse power are available, that, while incidental would more than repay the entire cost of the improvement.

This development would represent a saving of coal running into tens of millions of tons annually. Coal miners may strike, but the St. Lawrence never goes on strike. Yet this great development is but a by-product incidental to the greater object to be achieved.

Nature has done so much to afford the Great Lakes a flowing road to the sea that it seems to me utter folly that we should neglect to improve the short stretches that bar the modern freighter from the Canadian lake ports.

Without a deeper St. Lawrence our whole harbour expenditure rebuilding the Port of Toronto of over twenty-six millions will be in jeopardy and founded on a wrong foundation.

The St. Lawrence is Nature's highway to the sea. Give us a great water highway, a flowing road down which the products of the west may float from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic.

In seeking a better water route to the Atlantic, we must have the best highway that can be obtained.

It is a national duty—a Canadian duty—an International duty—to develop water power wherever possible. Give us this mighty co-laborer with coal in keeping the wheels of industry revolving and you will put the country beyond the power of any man or group of men to cripple and imperil as the country is crippled and imperiled to-day.—Pamphlet T. L. Church on St. Lawrence.

We have engineering and commercial assurance of these three facts:

1. It can be done; it's practical.

2. The cost will be less than other routes proposed.

3. There would be developed water power running into millions of tons of coal per annum and millions of horse power available for trade and commerce and industrial development.

The people of Ontario believe that one joint route for Canada and the United States is better than two rival routes. We believe that such a route can be accomplished more cheaply, that it provides a more direct way to the markets of Europe, that it is more practicable, more serviceable, better than any other plan yet offered.

We believe that this improved St. Lawrence will bring great commercial development to our own country and corresponding benefit to the peoples of the world with whom we shall trade.

The St. Lawrence route has long appealed to my interest. I am hopeful that we are going to get a report which will give us in concrete form the cost and the possibilities that will grow out of this great international waterway.

The water has been running to waste through all the ages, and at a time when this country is suffering for want of fuel for producing and short of power for our industries and our railways.—T. L. Church Pamphlet.

Water-borne traffic is going to be a very important factor in solving the transportation question in Canada, and I hope the Minister of Railways will bring down some scheme in that connection, especially as we have the findings of President Harding of the United States and the findings of the International Joint Comission. I understand some interests in Montreal are opposed to this scheme. The Premier of Quebec, Hon. Mr. Taschereau, is opposed to the St. Lawrence canal for some reasons; but I think his objections can be met by agreement with the United States, for his arguments are based principally on anti-American prejudice. He claims that the navigation feature of the project is but a cloak for an attempt by our neighbours to grab the power; that the Americans expect to get international control of about 2,700,000 h.p. of energy. But there will be the same amount or a little more belonging to Canada, and Quebec will have its share. He goes on to refer to the position of the high-level dam which, he says, will be located in the United States. That location has not yet been fixed; it is a matter for agreement with the United States Government. The broad fact for Mr. Taschereau to answer is that 4,000,000 h.p. of electrical energy is going to waste every year, and he has no suggestion to give for making it available. This is the equivalent of 48,000,000 tons of coal having a value of $240,000,000, and it is allowed to slip away every year without being used.

I wish to say a few words regarding trade with Germany. In many centres of our population there are complaints that certain localities are being flooded with German goods. I have had many complaints in this connection from constituents of mine and from other people in the Toronto district. They point out to me that as a result of the war, many industries had been started up by Canadians to supply minor goods which Germany had formerly supplied to Canada. In this way, plants had been established for making such things as toys and small-wares of all kinds. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb), no doubt has not yet had time to look into this problem, but I hope he will do so, and that he will be able to lay down a policy for the House and the country. So far as I am concerned I am in favour of protection to these small local manufacturers. I do not believe we should have any trade relations with Germany at all.

Something has been said about Senate reform. In 1896, the Liberal party's platform declared strongly for Senate reform, but, as has been well said, platforms are generally made to get in on and not to stand on, and it was so in this case. Workingmen can sit in the British Parliament, but no workingman can sit in the United States or the Canadian Senate. So far as I can see when the Liberal party attempted to implement their platform of 1896 and reform the Senate, they simply made the Senate "ten times more reform" by appointing Liberals. I would suggest that the British North America Act be amended, after a vote of the people at the next election, on a Senate reform referendum, with a view to abolishing the Senate altogether, because I feel that its usefulness has gone. I do not know how the Progressive party feel on this subject, but in their platform they advocate strict economy and the saving of taxes, and this would an excellent way of economizing, besides ensuring better legislation and to some extent abolishing privilege in this country. The moment a man is appointed to the Senate he thinks that he is absolutely independent. It is all very well when men are trying to get into the Senate: they are then in favour of the policy of the existing government. But in a recent debate in the other House an hon. gentleman in that Chamber assumed an attitude of independence and disregard of the government of the day. They say some of them: We are judicial officers as senators and can oppose bills as we please.

Mention has also been made of Civil Service reform. I am in favour of the patronage system. I believe that you can get better results under the patronage system than under the Civil Service Commission. I am a Conservative, but let me say that I have been sent to Parliament to express a liberty of speech on what is good for the people and to exercise an independence of thought and action for the people; and while I am glad to call myself a Conservative, at the same time I am an independent Conservative. I noticed that the Liberal newspapers at one time condemned the hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) for suggesting that all vacant judgeships, at the time he spoke, "should be filled with good Tories." Well, it is a credit to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that he did not so commit himself. But he has raised no objection to this principle applied the other way, for I see that he has been himself doing the same thing, as can be seen in the appointment of such good Grit lawyers as Judge Fisher, of London, and Mr. Duncan Ross, the ex-member for West Middlesex as judge for Elgin, Judge Mulligan of Carleton, Senators Pardee and Boyer, and others. The Civil Service Act, it seems to me, applies only to the spade and shovel men and not to those higher up on the civil pay rolls, like senators, judges, lieutenant-governors and others of that class for whom there is no sort of examination, a la Civil Service Commission.

With regard to Canada's wonderful banking system, I have been looking over the Bank Act from cover to cover, and I may have something to say in this connection later on.

The Prime Minister the other day, referring to the Conservative party, seemed to rejoice in the fact that it had been wiped off the map in six provinces. Well, I can sympathize with him, for he also was wiped off the map in about three provinces —in Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba —in which he obtained two seats out of forty-one. So he is in the same boat as those on this side in three provinces as to being wiped out. It is true he carried Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Quebec, but in some other provinces he did not do so well, and I think he knows what it is to be wiped off the map. He ran second to the Tories in Ontario and British Columbia, and we divided fifty-fifty with him in New Brunswick.

I do not see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) in the House, but during the campaign in the Toronto district he evinced a keen interest in the cost of living, the question of trusts and combines, and other allied subjects. This question of combines has been made a football of by the Government of Canada and those of the provinces for many years, and I trust we shall hear the end of it and that the Government of Canada will take a leaf out of the book of the Attorney General of the United States, who prosecuted 285 combines in one year and broke them up. As a start the Government might take action against the tobacco trust. I have had several letters from soldiers and others, strongly urging that something should be done to break up this combine. The prices of a good many of the tobacco commodities of life are on the down grade and it seems an outrage that the working classes should be obliged to pay 15 cents for a plug of tobacco, while tobacco is lying in the fields not cut. Steps should be taken at once to regulate all trusts of this nature.

Before I conclude I want to protest against any action or any speech calculated to loosen the ties that bind this country to the Motherland. I think that this declaration is timely, because there is an agitation on foot in certain localities—and among certain classes that would tend to loosen that connection. I do not think that anyone did more than our King during the war to forward our interests, or was more concerned in the welfare of the Empire. Our Governor General, too, a brilliant soldier, was an inspiration to all fighting Canadians, and, I say, long may that office continue. Another office that is of use in the affairs of the country is that of Lieutenant-Governor. I do not agree with those who advocate the abolition of appeals to the Privy Council; this, I think, would be one way of loosening the ties that bind the Mother Country and Canada together. In regard to the question of Canada's representation abroad, it is my opinion that there is no necessity for an ambassador at Washington; nor do I believe that we need a High Commissioner in London. If we can do without an ambassador in Washington, why cannot we dispense, without great inconvenience, with a representative in London? I wish it distinctly understood, of course, that I have absolutely nothing to say against the appointment that has been recently made by the Government to fill this office. The appointee is a good business man, a gentleman who is admirable in more senses than one. I sat with him on the Toronto General Hospital Board in Toronto for a number of years, and from my knowledge of and association with him I have formed a high estimate of his ability and his character. Nevertheless, I do not think that the office to which he has been appointed is very necessary. I may say, in passing, that as a friend of Mr. Larkin, I wish him good luck. I think he should answer those papers that criticise his income tax payments. In Toronto some time ago he paid taxes on an income of $50,000. But the next year—1921—when he was assessed on a similar income, he appealed to the Court of Revision and made a declaration to the effect that his income was only $25,000. The Court of Revision, without taking any evidence on the subject, reduced the assessment to that amount. Sir John Willison, the Canadian representative of the London Times, wrote an article which appeared in the London papers stating that Mr. Larkin's income was $500,000, and some of the London papers are commenting on it and on his assessments. Now, while undoubtedly Mr. Larkin will make an excellent High Commissioner, I think it would have been better, both for him and the country, had he followed in the footsteps of the First Commoner, yourself, Mr. Speaker, when you announced in such modest terms that from the moment of your election to your high office you ceased to be a party man. It would be better for all concerned if Mr. Larkin refrained from attending party dinners. I say it would be in his own interests, and I am speaking as a friend of his; for, I repeat, I found him an honourable business man, having sat with him on the Board in the building of the Toronto General Hospital, a $5,000,000 hospital. I can say that he has done a wonderful service as a citizen. As his friend, I say that he should make it clear just what his income is on which he has to pay local and federal taxes and answer his critics. I have every confidence in his integrity.

In conclusion, I desire to thank you, Sir, and the members of this House, for the way they have listened to me, and on my own behalf I thank you for your patience.

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I had no intention of taking part in this debate, and I would not now rise to address the House were it not that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), in the course of his speech, thought it proper to refer in the manner in which he did to my attitude during the last electoral campaign. I crave the attention of hon. members for a short time, and I also crave their indulgence, for though I may count myself as one of the veterans in our public life, yet as a newcomer to this House I must confess in all candour and sincerity that I feel exactly as does the young member who rises for the first time to address his fellow members.

Listening to the oft repeated references of the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) to the declarations that I made during the last general election, and also to the declarations which he says I may have made, I could not help thinking that my right hon. friend should be exceedingly grateful to me for having sought and won the confidence of the electors of Laurier-Outremont. Had I not been elected for that constituency much of the best effect of his great speech would have been lost.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I do not intend to detain the House for any length of time, by attempting to answer all the statements which have been made about myself by my right hon. friend.

For many years I sat in another legislature and I have always avoided what might be construed as an attempt to impose my personal views on my colleagues in respect to any subject; I have never made a long speech to defend myself against personal attacks, and I do not intend to depart from that rule on this occasion.

I gladly accept this opportunity, Mr. Speaker, to add my most sincere congratulations to those which have already been so happily and so justly extended to you by those hon. members who have preceded me. I am glad also on this occasion to most heartily congratulate the hon. proposer and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne on their remarkably eloquent addresses.

My right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition has endeavoured to put me in a contradictory position by quoting a paragraph from the Speech from the Throne in which it is stated:

> Our Dominion has not escaped the world-wide economic disturbance and industrial depression, but has suffered less from it than other countries. Keen observers of the business barometer feel that the worst is about over and that at an early date we may look for a substantial revival of activity.

My right hon. friend has contrasted with that paragraph certain opinions which I expressed during the late general election to the effect that our country was passing through a most serious crisis. The picture I then drew of her economic, commercial and industrial condition, was no darker than that drawn by the right hon. gentleman himself at that time. Indeed, were I to trespass on the time of hon. gentlemen by quoting newspaper clippings to the extent that he did, I could very easily convince the House that on this point I hardly exceeded any of the statements of the right hon. leader of the Opposition himself.

With regard to the statement quoted by him, that I told the electors of Montreal, or Three Rivers—I do not remember which exactly—that the population of Canada was declining, he should at least, it seems to me, have given me credit for sufficient knowledge to believe that I could never make such a declaration, I did say more than once that our customs revenues were decreasing, and that is borne out by the official returns. I stated also, and rightly, that our foreign trade was falling off and I do not suppose that any hon. member will pretend that I misled the people of my province when I stated that our national debt was increasing to an alarming extent. No, Mr. Speaker, none of my declarations during that campaign were exaggerated; all and each of them were strictly in accord with our economic condition and the state of mind of the people at that time. In a word, there is no contradiction between any of my modest speeches and this Speech from the Throne. I would remind the right hon. leader of the Opposition that circumstances have changed in this country since the dissolution of the last Parliament. Great and important changes have happened in the interim, and I make bold to say that this feeling of security which already is so noticeable in our people, as well as the general revival in business, are due to a large extent to the confidence which the citizens of Canada repose in the new Government which they chose last December.

My right hon friend has referred to my standing on the tariff question, and if I understood him aright he even insinuated that that stand was inspired by certain interests which he holds responsible for his defeat and for the triumph of the Liberal party. My views on the tariff question have never changed during the last twenty-five years. For fifteen years I have followed, approved and endorsed, the Laurier-Fielding tariff policy. During the last election I advocated that policy; I told the electors of Laurier-Outremont and I told the electors of the province of Quebec that if the Liberal party secured their confidence and was returned to power it would remain true to that policy and would carry it into effect through a revision of the tariff to meet the necessities which have arisen since the last revision, taking into account the interests of the consumer, of the farmer—whose industry we have always regarded as the basic industry of this country—and of the manufacturers in general. That policy I advocated before the general election, Mr. Speaker, at a dinner given in the city of Quebec, and at which the right hon. leader of the Opposition himself was a speaker. On that occasion, Sir, he applauded my declaration and made no such insinuations as those he made the other day.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), in his speech, quoted from the Montreal Gazette certain remarks that I made at a dinner held in connection with a convention of the shoe manufacturers of Canada. The hon. member seems to have found in my remarks a declaration tending toward an increase of duties on shoes imported into Canada. I am surprised that he made such a discovery, and if he has the patience to read that speech,—or re-read it, if he has not already done so—he will find that all I said may be summed up in the affirmation that it was the revision of the tariff of 1907 which brought to the shoe manufacturers of Canada that era of prosperity which they enjoyed until the recent crisis occurred which has affected their industries as it has affected all others in Canada. I reminded the Shoe Manufacturers' Association—and here I may say that these gentlemen have invested in their industry a capital of over $32,000,000 and that they afford subsistence to some 70,000 of our people—I reminded them that what they had of prosperity they owed to the Laurier-Fielding tariff policy.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition, speaking of the railway question, endeavoured to convey the impression that some mysterious power had inspired those hon. members who expressed themselves as not believing in state ownership or state operation of railways. My right hon. friend has come out categorically in favour of the nationalization of our railways. He is sincere in his views, I know; but why should he cast suspicion on those hon. members who are not of the same opinion in the matter? As the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) declared in his speech, there are on this side of the House, as there are on the other side, members who do not look upon state ownership or state operation of railways as practicable and profitable for the country. But we now own our railways and the Government has decided to give the system a fair trial under the best possible conditions. I cannot understand why my right hon. friend should doubt the good faith of the Government or of any of its members in that matter. The question is not one which concerns Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver or any city in particular; it is a question which concerns Canada as a whole, and the solution which we seek is a solution which shall be satisfactory to the interests of our country generally.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition has stated—and he has repeated the assertion several times—that his government was defeated by the big interests of Montreal. The interests that defeated my right hon. friend's government are the Liberals, Mr. Speaker, who voted to a man against the late administration and its followers, joined, as they were, by the majority of the Conservative electors of this country who by their vote and through their newspapers declared that they did not believe in the National Liberal-Conservative government. The power which defeated the late administration was the will of the Canadian people.

Referring to the remarks of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray), who declared that the time had come when we should have responsible government in Canada and should cease administering the public affairs by Order in Council, the right hon. leader of the Opposition said: Every one of the Orders in Council that we passed was necessary for the good government of this country. He went on to say: You have a new Administration; you have already passed an Order in Council by which you deprive the Canadian Parliament of certain of its rights. Mr. Speaker, there were many Orders in Council passed by the government presided over by my right hon. friend and by the government which preceded it and of which he was a member. But although he declared that all these Orders in Council were necessary for the proper administration of our public affairs, in every case where such Orders in Council were submitted to the courts they were declared illegal and ultra vires, and as a result the government was condemned.

It is not an Order in Council of that kind that the Government of Canada has passed with regard to the administration of fisheries in the province of Quebec. We have passed that Order in Council, Mr. Speaker, only to conform with a judgment of the Privy Council; and I wish to state here that in passing such an Order in Council the Federal Government has not abandoned an inch of its territory or renounced the shadow of a right in favour of the province of Quebec. My right hon. friend allows himself to be blinded—to be blinded by his bitterness against the city of Montreal and against the province of Quebec; and he is wrong in leading other provinces of the Confederation to believe, that by that Order in Council the Government has granted a favour to the province of Quebec, because that province never asked for, and never received any favour, from this Government.

My right hon. friend ended his speech by asking my colleagues what had been the verdict of the last general election. I will be very frank and I will tell him that I could not altogether analyze the vote which was cast at that election. It would be very, very difficult to find the determining factor; but there is one thing certain and that is that the people of Canada, by an immense majority, voted against the continuance in office of the Meighen Government, who suffered in that election such a defeat as no other government has experienced since Confederation. As to my right hon. friend who leads the Opposition, I wish to be allowed to say that I admire his high attainments. He is a very eloquent speaker; he is a good fighter; but I regret to have to say that he is not a good loser. But he is now in the right place to learn. In his present seat he will have an opportunity to learn, and I hope that some day we will be in a position to say that he is as good a loser as he is a fighter.

Another word, Mr. Speaker, before I resume my seat. My right hon. friend has taken pleasure—particular pleasure—in designating me as "The Master of the Administration." This is an old game which has been played before in this House by some of my right hon. friend's predecessors. Still there is one thing I regret: it is that it is resorted to to-day not so much to annoy me as to accentuate the unfortunate differences which have existed far too long between certain provinces of our Confederation and the province of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party has one chief and one chief only: that chief is the Prime Minister of Canada, the leader of this House. He has, and he can depend upon, the loyal support of all his colleagues, of everyone of the Liberal members of this House, and of every Liberal in Canada. As for myself, Mr. Speaker, I am nothing but a man of good will. I hope that I will be long enough in this House to convince all my fellow members, Conservatives and Progressives as well as Liberals, that I have only one ambition in coming here: It is simply to be permitted to serve my country in my own modest way and to try and help bring about that spirit towards which I have directed all the efforts of my life for twenty-five years in another field, the spirit of unity, Mr. Speaker, which is so necessary for the prosperity of our country and for the happiness of our citizens.

Mr. D. M. KENNEDY (West Edmonton): Mr. Speaker, in rising for the first time to address this House I hope that I shall not find myself out of order too often. Public speaking has not been my business; I have been engaged in the far Northwest for the last number of years trying to subdue this earth or a part of it. The life of a farmer is not the kind of life that tends to make one a finished public speaker. It is a life that serves to give one a practical view of things; and I hope that if my remarks are not quite so polished in form as those of some other hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, the House will nevertheless hear me with patience.

I represent in this Chamber the constituency of West Edmonton—the largest, possibly, in Canada. It reaches from the Saskatchewan river to the northern boundary of the province of Alberta; a distance of 450 miles north and south, and about 250 miles east and west. It has a population of something like 70,000 people, an increase of 99 per cent since 1911. I consider, as an ordinary citizen of this Dominion, that it is a great honour that I should be chosen to represent this constituency, and I also realize that I should do my best to live up to the great responsibility that has been imposed upon me. West Edmonton has a population that is composed of farmers, miners, lumbermen, fishermen, and town and city dwellers.

During the late campaign the people were told throughout that constituency that we Progressives were out for class legislation, class domination; but whether one is nominated and supported by a Liberal party or a Conservative party, or a Farmers group, after he is elected I consider that he is not doing his duty unless he is willing to try and represent and be fair to all the people regardless of their attitude during the election. Whether the majority or minority be small or large, we have no right to seek for anything less than absolute justice for minorities whether in a particular constituency or in the country at large.

For some time after the election there was an effort made in the province of Alberta, with some of the Progressives, to provide a seat for a minister of the Crown. I was not able, though I had been invited through the press, to accept the invitation to resign. I think a gallant spirit has been shown in the province of Quebec, especially in the county of Argenteuil, where they have selected as their representative in this Parliament a worthy citizen of northern Alberta, thus providing northern Alberta with a representative in the Cabinet. They have shown that they were willing to try and undo the injustice that was inflicted on Alberta on account of the Redistribution Bill not having been passed by the late administration.

I wish to speak on the Speech from the Throne, and to take issue with some of the statements made by the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin). I do not believe that anything we can do at this time, or anything we are likely to do, will bring in the millennium, and anything I can or will advocate is simply done as a means of helping to alleviate the conditions, especially, existing in Western Canada to-day. I do not believe the average member of this House—and I refer especially to the members from the East—has any idea of the conditions existing in Western Canada, particularly in the pioneer districts of the country. It may be that in this part of the country, and particularly in the cities, there is a feeling of confidence. It may be that those engaged in industries that are built up through special legislation enacted by Parliament, and are able to pay dividends of 10 per cent and sometimes more, are beginning to feel that there is reason again for optimism and confidence. But the people of the West, the people on the farms of this country, and the working people who have been contributing out of their earnings to this 10 per cent dividend, and sometimes larger dividends on watered stock, have not the same feeling of confidence or the same assurance with regard to the future.

In common with some of those who have preceded me, I am a little disappointed with the paragraph in the Speech dealing with the tariff. It has been stated by the hon. Minister of Justice that we are going to have a tariff along the lines of the Laurier-Fielding tariff. I will be satisfied—that is if the information that I have received from this book is reliable with regard to what that means. If I may quote from this volume entitled "Sixty years of Protection in Canada" I would like to show what has been stated by some hon. gentlemen in days gone by, worthy men in their day, with regard to the Laurier-Fielding tariff. Sir Wilfrid Laurier has declared—

> I leave it to the working men in the cities if protection is anything less than slavery The moment the government takes one cent from your pocket, and that cent does not go into the treasury of the country, that is robbery to your prejudice. * * * We stand for freedom. I denounce the policy of protection as bondage,—yea bondage—and I refer to bondage in the same manner in which American slavery was bondage.

The late Sir Richard Cartwright, who was also an eminent authority in his day, has stated that if you add together the sum which has been put into the treasury and the larger sum which has been extracted from the pockets of the people for the benefit of a few privileged and favoured individuals, you will find the total for the last fourteen years is hardly less than a thousand million dollars.

I have been doing a little studying with regard to this tariff question during the last few years, even though my duties on the farm have been such that I have had to work twelve and fourteen hours a day, and perhaps my study has not been just as thorough as the study of some other gentleman, but I fail to find that after 1896 there was any substantial reduction in the tariff from that which existed previous to that time. I fail to see that there is anything to justify any one to-day in stating that that policy, followed during the fifteen years of Liberal administration in this country, was anything different from that which had been in existence previous to that time, and I hope that when we are face to face with the actual proposals with regard to the tariff, they will show something more substantial in the way of reductions on farm machinery and the necessities of life than we have ever seen before in the history of this country. We have been told that we ought to contribute in this way to the manufacturing interests through the tariff, to the railway interests through guaranteed rates, and to other interests through large grants of money, to give them protection, in order that we may build up a well united and well developed Dominion. We have large reserves in farm lands that are very rich, and we have been told, as a people, that by simply giving protection to certain manufacturers and certain other interests we would build up a self-contained Dominion, and would have prosperity under any and all circumstances.

We have been dealing with this problem, as near as I can see, for about forty years, and after forty years of that policy I believe we have harder times, in the West at least, than we have ever known before. I believe that we have more unemployment, even throughout Eastern Canada, than we have had at almost any other time. I would like to ask those who have been telling us that this tariff was going to give us security and prosperity, how much longer we will have to follow along this line before we arrive at the place where we are going to have steady general prosperity for all the people? I maintain that the whole tendency with regard to this protective tariff —and that is what we have had—is to segregate the wealth of this country in the hands of a few individuals. We pile up wealth on one hand, and we have a corresponding poverty on the other hand. The result is that we have wealth in one case, but without any corresponding need, and on the other hand we have need, where there is not the purchasing power to supply that need.

Unless at last we can find some method, some system of administration that will give to our citizens something like an equal chance and an equal share of the good things of this country, we can never have a good, sound, reliable, happy country. If we take the past forty years, in the fourteen years prior to 1896, something like $500,000,000 was taken out of the pockets of the people and put into the pockets of the manufacturers of this country, and we have been following the same policy for the last twenty-six years. I understand there is a little dispute going on between the two parties as to which of them reduced the tariff most during the time that they were in power. But studying the matter as an observer from the outside, I would say that the two parties are very much alike, and if we take into account the increase in Canada's population, I think we would be justified in saying that the same policy has been continued from 1896 onward, and that at least $1,000,000,000 have been taken out of the pockets of the people and put into the pockets of the manufacturers of this country. If even one-half of that sum were spread around in a general way amongst the people of this country, that would do far more to bring prosperity, and it would solve our unemployment problem; it would give us a general all-round prosperity in this Dominion of Canada. We have on the one hand great wealth—the mountains—and we have on the other the valleys of poverty; there is only one way by which to fill up the valleys, and that is to take down the mountains.

We have, of course, been told that the manufacturers cannot compete; that we ought to protect those great industries because they are vital to the country. I believe our Canadian manufacturers can compete with the manufacturers of other countries, just as our farmers compete with farmers in all parts of the world. We have been speaking about our soldiers, how they crossed the Atlantic and went up against the trained armies of Europe, with practically no training as compared with the training those European armies had, and we are proud that, with this unequal opportunity, so to speak, they were able to more than hold their own. Are we to conclude that there is in our country a class that is not ready to face the world and the conditions and difficulties that all the rest of us must face? Are we to conclude that we must ask the large producing class in this country, working men and farmers, to carry an extra burden on their backs, in order that we may pass on some special privilege to another class? I believe, in advocating this Laurier-Fielding tariff by which not one cent will be taken out of the pockets of the people that does not go into the treasury, we are advocating not class legislation, but the doing away with class legislation; for a protective tariff is one of the best examples of class legislation that we have and have had in the Dominion of Canada.

With the handicap that we have carried of increased prices of the tools of production, increased prices of farm machinery and, indeed, of practically all the materials that one needs to develop our farms, we have been able to compete with the world, and to build up, as farmers, the greatest industry in this Dominion. The farming industry is by far the greatest of any of the industries. Our people have had to test out the climate, to test out the soil in new districts; they have been up against the difficulties of long freight hauls, of climate, hail, drought and sometimes too much moisture; but in spite of all these difficulties and with the handicap of increased cost of the tools of production, they have been able to compete successfully with the well established farmers to the south and with the well established farmers of other parts of the world. Nevertheless, they have been asked to share the results of their labours with speculators and others who are not contributing in any specific way to the general wealth of the country.

I wish to pass on to deal with the question of immigration. I should like to have seen, with regard to the reduction of the tariff, something as definite in the Speech from the Throne as we had with regard to immigration. During the war the stream of immigration was much interrupted and restricted. Now that the business of peace is with us, the renewal of efforts to bring in new settlers must apparently be made. It requires some courage to make a statement of this kind during the present condition of unemployment. Are we to conclude that our Government is going to be very considerate of financial interests and manufacturing concerns, with its guarded expression with regard to the reduction of the tariff; but that as regards the people who are unemployed and the general common people of the country, the Government is ready to launch out with an immigration policy. It seems that there is just a little tendency to assume an attitude of caution with regard to doing anything at all that would imperil in any way the returns of capital; but as regards the interests of the common people, it would seem that the Government is ready to launch out with an immigration policy, and take chances. While we are not quite able to provide employment for a large number of people in this country, we are ready to bring in others.

Of course, a reasonable endeavour is going to be made to attract to our country people of the most desirable class. I think I know something of conditions in Western Canada, and I suppose that most of the immigrants would go to our western country to settle on the land. I know something of the people that we desire to get, but the people who can make good on the western lands to-day are not the kind of people who are easy to move. People who, under present conditions, can make good on farms in Western Canada, are people who can make good in almost any country in the world. They are not the kind of people who can be swayed by pamphlets; they demand facts; they cannot be easily influenced to move by pamphlets with a picture of a tar-paper shack on the front page and a picture of a splendid farm on the second page, with the caption, "After a few years." They are people who are making good generally where they are.

If a campaign is launched to get new settlers we shall get some who, in spite of our best efforts, will prove unfit for the land, and who will therefore tend to drift to the ranks of the unemployed. It seems to me that it would be better to try to improve conditions by a reduction of the tariff, so that the people who are already on the land may be able to make good. They certainly will not do so under present circumstances, no matter how industrious and thrifty they may be. When we can reduce the tariff and can have prosperous and industrious people in Canada we shall have the best and the cheapest immigration policy that this country could possibly have. The only way we can get the class of settlers we need to develop Western Canada is through the efforts of their friends, who are satisfied with their lot here. Those who really know conditions in the West will bear me out when I say that it would require, on the part of any of those living under general conditions in the West to-day, a great faith in the heroism of their friends to advise them to come here, if they are at all satisfied where they are at present. We should all like to see the country filled up and the population increased three or four times, but we desire to see the population increase under such conditions as will assure general prosperity. I do not think that the creation of millionaires and the piling up of huge fortunes is in the interests of any country in the world. What is good for the ordinary individual, for the artisan, and for the ordinary farmer, will give us general prosperity, which we can never have under existing circumstances.

Some hon. members who have spoken from this section of the House have mentioned the Wheat Board, and I want to emphasize the fact that Western Canada does need that Wheat Board and is demanding the old board under the old conditions. We want to see it in operation for the 1922 crop. It is the general wish in the West to see the Wheat Board ready to take over that crop, and we want to see it established as soon as possible.

Another matter that appeals to the people of the West is the question of freight rates. In the Speech from the Throne we have a reference to the fact that conferences have been arranged between the railway authorities respecting the revision of rates upon basic commodities. So far as the West is concerned, we understand that certain legislation with respect to the Crow's Nest Pass agreement will expire this year, and I have been wondering whether these conferences contemplate dealing in any way with the possibility of reducing the rates in the West below the standard set by the Crow's Nest Pass agreement. With the permission of the House I shall read part of an article appearing in a Western paper known as The U. F. A., with reference to this matter:

> In order to understand the situation which wil arise at the coming session of our Dominion Parliament it is necessary to make a brief reference to the Crow's Nest Pass Agreement and the present Railway Act. The Crow's Nest Pass Agreement was entered into between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Dominion Government and was confirmed by the Dominion Parliament. Under terms of this Agreement the Canadian Pacific Railway undertook, in return for certain subsidies and concessions, to build certain lines and also agreed to a schedule of maximum rates from Western points. The Railway Act in Sec. 3, Sub-Sec. B, provided that the Board of Railway Commissioners should not have power to authorize rates in excess of those provided for in any special agreement between the Dominion Parliament and the railway company. This means that the Railway Commission could not authorize rates in excess of those provided for under the Crow's Nest Pass Agreement. At the session of the Dominion Parliament in the summer of 1919 the Railway Act was amended in Sec. 325, Sub-Sec. 5, so as to remove the above mentioned limitation on the power of the Railway Commissioners over freight rates, the result being to give them power to approve any increases in freight rates, irrespective of any agreements existing between the railway companies and the Dominion Parliament. This amendment passed in 1919, however, had a saving clause providing that it was only to be in effect for three years, and the situation now is that it will expire during the coming summer, and unless legislation is passed at the coming session of the House at Ottawa, this amendment will expire by limitation and rates will automatically revert to the 1917 basis.

Now I hope it is the intention of the Government not to renew this special legislation setting aside the Crow's Nest Pass agreement, for the present rates are strangling business in Western Canada. To-day they are 50 to 70 per cent higher than in 1917. I quote further from the article in question:

> The comparative rates on grain from representative points in the West as they existed in 1917, in September 1920, the highest point which rates reached, and as they exist now after two reductions have been made, are shown in the following table:

	Comparative rates in cents per 100 lbs.
	1917	Sept. 1920	Now
Winnipeg	10	19	17
Calgary.	24	40½	36

I hope the Government is ready to take some more vigorous action than merely inviting the railway authorities to hold conferences to agree among themselves as to what reductions in rates there should be. I represent a pioneer constituency, a constituency of almost 100,000 square miles, and the people, who are engaged in agriculture, feel extremely the long freight haul from Edmonton and northwest of Edmonton to the ports. I believe that if you go to the northern extremity of the railway development in that constituency and take the freight rates from that point to Fort William, you will find, taking the average price for the year of all grain raised in that locality, that after paying the threshing bill and the freight bill there is nothing left. On some of the higher grades of wheat the farmers are able to realize something, but practically nothing on the lower grades. I left Spirit River on the 10th of January, and I found the farmers hauling grain a distance of twenty-seven miles to that point and selling it for 40 cents, their threshing bill being 14 cents. Oats at that time were worth about a cent less than nothing on the farms.

Yet in view of the fact that they have been producing at a loss for the past two years, it is rather strange to understand the attitude taken by some of our railway authorities with regard to freight rates. Some of them take the stand that the great Canadian Pacific Railway—which we are told has done so much for this country, and which, as the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) has suggested, the country has done so much for—is under any and all circumstances entitled to 10 per cent and something over. Can you wonder that some bitter expressions have come from western farmers, in view of the fact that the value of their land has been cut 65 per cent during the last two years, that farms that a few years ago were worth $3,000 are on the market to-day at $800, and that practically nothing produced on the farm is yielding a profit? Some people tell us that we are not patriotic because we complain of these conditions. But I think the work that we have done in the West during the last two years in carrying on at a loss in order to facilitate the readjustment of business conditions is an example in loyalty to national needs that has not been surpassed by any other business or industry in this Dominion. Needless to say, agriculture cannot be continued in the West under these conditions—conditions which I am not exaggerating in the least. Last year a number of our farmers in the Grand Prairie district and in the Peace River district of my constituency shipped oats to Fort William at a loss. I think the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) yesterday said something about freight rates taking, in certain cases, half the price of the grain; we have numerous instances in that country where after our farmers have hauled their grain for twenty to twenty-five miles to the railway, loaded it, and shipped it to Fort William for sale, they have had a bill come back for part of the freight. Such instances have happened not only in the northern but in the southern part of my constituency as well.

I think we have been too long taking the position that certain interests must be protected and guaranteed profits while others must be allowed to take the losses. The sooner we get to the position where all the various interests of the country are willing to take profits and losses in something like their equal and just share, the sooner we will get back to prosperity and to happy conditions.

I do not wish hon. members to think that we are antagonistic to these favoured interests; but that does not imply that we are not antagonistic to those things that we believe are inflicting an unnecessary hardship on our people. We have very large settlements of returned soldiers in my constituency. What is their condition? They bought stock a few years ago, which to-day is worth about a third of what they paid for it; the grain they produce will hardly pay freight expenses; and they have been appealing to the provincial Government of Alberta for assistance. We have come to a strange pass when the men who went overseas to fight for us have now to endure those conditions and pay tribute to large financial interests through the operation of tariffs, guaranteed railway rates and so on. Of course, it may be argued that our national railways have been losing money and require those increased freight rates. But after all, I do not know that rates would need to be so high if we had only to provide interest on the money that actually went into the building of our railways. It is hardly fair that we should be asked to pay freight rates to provide interest on money that was never invested in those railways but which, I fear, was looted during their construction.

Our soldier settlers in the Northwest are pretty much in the same, or in a worse, condition than the soldier settlers that you heard about the other day from my hon. friend the member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), and I sincerely hope that the Government is prepared to do something substantial to enable those men to make good, because unless they are helped they are doomed to failure. Of course, if their goods are revalued it will mean that they have received a gift from the Government. In days gone by some returned soldiers refused to accept loans from the Soldiers' Settlement Board, and those men to-day are better off than their fellows who accepted loans. Possibly they will think they have some claim too if you make a gift through revaluation to some of those who did accept loans, but I believe, in view of the fact that they were wise in not accepting soldiers' settlement loans at the time, we ought to treat them the same as those who accepted loans.

I said a little while ago that we in my constituency were not antagonistic to the railways. I think my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, will bear me out when I say that we are very anxious to have railways, and more railways, in that constituency. But the people demand an outlet to the Pacific coast, to the ports of Prince Rupert and Vancouver, and I hope we will be able to get that outlet and thus, reduce the present long rail haul eastward of two or three thousand miles to a short haul of only six or seven hundred miles to the Pacific coast.

I am glad to see a reference in the Speech from the Throne to the matter of the return to the three Western provinces of their natural resources. I do not think that this question should be mixed up in any way with any claims that other provinces have upon the Dominion. I do not think the Western provinces ought to be asked to assume the status of colonies toward the other provinces. A study of this question will show that it is a mistaken idea that the Hudson's Bay Company ever owned as large an area of that great Northwest as they have claimed. In fact, I think there is substantial evidence to show that when the Hudson's Bay Company received their charter in 1670 from King Charles II, most of this Northwest belonged to the King of France. In view of that condition; having regard to the fact that all the other provinces have control of their natural resources and that in all other cases the various sections of the countries making up the British Empire exercise a similar control, it is only fair and just that the Government hand over to those Western provinces their natural resources as soon as possible.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. KENNEDY (Edmonton) (resuming): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was talking on the question of the return of their natural resources to the Western provinces. I said that this question ought to be dealt with on its merits, and that it should not be entangled with the question of the rights of any other province. I believe there is evidence to show that the Hudson's Bay Company, when it ceded its charter, upon receiving payment of millions of acres of fertile lands in Western Canada in consideration of the surrender of that charter, received the first real title that it ever had to any part of what we know to-day as Western Canada.

I now wish to occupy the attention of the House for a short time in order to draw attention to another matter. This question is one that concerns a certain number of people in northern Alberta and probably in other parts of the country—I refer to the question of half-breed scrip. I think it is a matter in respect to which the late government is deserving of criticism. With the permission of the House I shall read a letter addressed to "All Canadians who believe that our national honour, our national integrity and our national good name should at all times be kept sweet and clean to all the world and to ourselves," and which is worded as follows:

On May 27th, 1921, the Honourable Sir James Lougheed introduced in the Senate of Canada Bill No. 138, being a Bill for the amendment of the Criminal Code. It had its first reading on that date as appears by Hansard reports No. 50, page 676. The second reading was had on May 30th. See Hansard reports No. 51, page 699. On June 1st, according to the Hansard reports of the Senate Debates, No. 53, first page, on motion of Sir James Lougheed the Senate went into Committee on Bill No. 138:

"The Honourable the Chairman:

It is moved that the following be inserted after Section 24 as 24a, paragraph 'a' of Section 1140 of the Act is amended by adding thereto the following sub-paragraph:

"(iv) any offence relating to or arising out of the location of land which was paid for in whole or in part by scrip, or was granted upon certificates issued to half-breeds in connection with the extinguishment of Indian titles.

Hon. Mr. LYNCH-STAUNTON: What does all that mean?

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: The intention is that if a prosecution for an offence is not brought within three years of the date of its commission, then it is proscribed. There is no provision for that in the Code at present.

Hon. Mr. BOSTOCK: From the reading of the clause I did not grasp what the offence really is.

Hon. Sir JAMES LOUGHEED: This brings it into Section 1140 in the Code, which deals with the limitation of actions. There have been one or two cases brought, going back twenty years, claiming that fraud was committed. Of course, the evidence in connection with them would have disappeared long ago.

Section 24a was agreed to.

The enclosed correspondence will show that I first wrote to the Hon. Arthur Meighen, Prime Minister of Canada, on August 2, 1921. The Premier apparently was in ignorance of the amendment and the latter was forwarded to Sir James Lougheed. On August 22nd, I again wrote the Premier enclosing a copy of my former letter. In answer to a telegram from me of September 13th the Premier writes that he cannot do more than refer the matter to the Department of Justice, the Minister of which handled the legislation.

The fact of the matter is that while the Minister of Justice, the Hon. Mr. Doherty, did handle the Bill in the House of Commons, it originated in the Senate and was fathered by Sir James Lougheed. Notwithstanding this we find the Prime Minister letting out Mr. Doherty and making Sir James Lougheed Minister of the Interior and appointed as Minister of Justice Sir James Lougheed's law partner, Mr. R. B. Bennett. The Prime Minister being, as he says, ignorant of the Bill in its effect, must have been deceived by his present Minister of the Interior.

The enactment of this particular piece of iniquitous legislation has the effect of protecting a number of reputed millionaires, the foundation of whose present wealth was built upon scandalous frauds committed against the half-breeds to whom land scrip had been issued by a Government whose duty it was to guard and protect them.

As one particular Edmonton millionaire had already been committed for trial on a charge of uttering a forged document in procuring title to land under half-breed scrip, and as the amendment prohibits the proceeding with the trial to ascertain his guilt or innocence upon a charge which has a maximum penalty of life imprisonment, one need not seek far for the motive behind the amendment.

A Government has deliberately stepped in and stayed the hand of justice for the protection of wealthy friends of that Government, who, if they be innocent, would have nothing to fear from our judges whose sense of personal and public honour is apparently infinitely higher than that of the Government which appoints them.

I believe it is the duty of the Government to bring in legislation wiping out this amendment and the effects of it while it remains on the statute books of this country.

Mr. ARTHUR JOHN LEWIS (Swift Current): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity of associating myself with former speakers who have congratulated you upon your elevation to the highest place in the House of Commons. I wish also to extend to you, Sir, my sincere sympathy in the difficult task that you have been called upon to discharge in this Parliament. Your administration has so far been marked with patience, kindness and firmness, and I trust that you will not during this session suffer in the discharge of your onerous duties.

It is unnecessary for me, Sir, to compliment preceding speakers, more particularly those who moved or seconded the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. They have already been complimented upon the excellent speeches they have made and I think they thoroughly deserved the encomiums bestowed upon them. Let me say that at this time I feel it a very great honour to be a member of the House of Commons; it is one of the highest gifts the Canadian people can bestow upon any man or any woman. But with election to the House of Commons comes a great responsibility; and although it is a pleasure for me to sit in this Chamber, listen to the excellent debates and watch the legislation as it passes through, I can scarcely say that it is an equal pleasure for me to rise to my feet and address this assembly. But it is in the discharge of this great responsibility that I rise to continue the debate in regard to the Speech from the Throne. Reference, Sir, has already been made to the electioneering campaign which took place prior to December 6th. Insinuations have been made that certain people did not conduct the campaign along lines that were fair. I wish to state, in regard to myself, that I did not attempt any mud-slinging. I endeavoured to place the principles of the Progressives before the electors, and I endeavoured to show, Sir, with all the power at my command, that the Progressive platform was not only superior to the Conservative platform, but also superior to the platform of the Liberal party. Although I was able to persuade my electors in that respect, judging from the number who voted for me and considered I was right, I may have just a little more difficulty in convincing the members of the Government and our friends to the right. At the same time I am firmly convinced, after hearing the different speeches that have been made, and what has been said in regard to both parties, that what the Canadian people require at this time is that elections shall be fought on certain principles, and not on personalities. I believe that the time has come when the Canadian people, the most highly educated people of our time, shall declare that only the best men and the men of principle shall stand in these halls to legislate for the masses. I believe there are good men on both sides. We are not all professional politicians, but I believe, Sir, that all parties have the country's welfare at heart and that they will legislate as they think proper. In regard to the Liberal party, I believe that if they stand on their platform, and legislate in accordance with what the people expect, they will not go very far wrong. For that reason I am willing, individually, to support them in all sound legislation that will be for the well-being of our people. In a country as large as Canada, geographically speaking, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and almost from the North Pole to the border of the United States, you will readily understand that there are problems that are peculiar to each province, and that members coming from one province cannot expect that those coming from other provinces will see eye to eye with them. If we waited until that time the millenium would be at hand. I believe it is possible, Sir, that men and women who are wise and sane can stand upon a common platform where they can unite and legislate for the good of the whole of Canada and for its unity.

Certain things were said this afternoon in the speech of the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir. Lomer Gouin) that I did not altogether agree with, but there was one statement with which I was heartily in accord. I think the end of his speech was ideal. It reached a high plane. He said that, as far as he was concerned, he was going to support the Liberal party in the interests of, not one province, but the whole of Canada. I believe that is the plane we ought to endeavour to reach, in order to solve the great problems that confront us. I share with the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr.McMurray) the splendid optimism that he manifested in his speech. He expressed the belief that the Liberal party was going to put into effect the policy which they have proclaimed. I believe and I intend to believe it until I find it otherwise.

Before dealing with the Speech from the Throne, I wish to say a few words in regard to my own constituency and the western part of Canada. I have noticed that hon. gentlemen from the Maritime provinces have spoken of justice and what is demanded by those provinces. We have heard similar statements in regard to Ontario, its wonderful powers, its electrical forces, and its ability to pay such a large amount in federal taxes. I want to say a few words in regard to Saskatchewan, although I know that what I am about to say will not meet with the approval of all the people in that province. I heard of a certain person who spoke in Ontario some time ago, and some of the western papers said that her statements make excellent anti-immigration literature. Be that as it may, I believe that the truth will make you free, and for that reason if I can impress upon these eastern people the real conditions of the West, I feel that my speech will not be in vain. It was stated by the hon. gentleman from North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) that to-day farming is not a paying occupation. The same sentiment has been expressed by a great many members in this House. I can only corroborate what has already been made. As far as my personal experience is concerned, I am intimately associated with at least 500 families of farmers, and I want to say without any exaggeration, that not 5 per cent of those people during the last two years have been running their farms on a paying basis. Just before I came to Ottawa a gentleman got on the train with me, and we were talking about conditions. He said to me "I actually paid out last year, or the year before, $11,000 more than I received. This year I have done almost the same thing, having paid out nearly $10,000." Then when you take into consideration the fact that he has an equipment valued in the neighbourhood of $140,000, on which no interest has been paid, and that he did not receive a cent in wages for managing that great business, you can begin to realize the appalling conditions that exist in Western Canada. With regard to a great majority of those 500 families, almost without exception the half-section farmers have each lost in the neighbourhood of $800 to $2,000. I am not going to say, Sir, that these men are failures. We have the finest people that can be found in the country. They are intellectual, industrious and persevering. Their patriotism has been manifested without any reserve, and for that reason we cannot say anything against them. As regards the land there, I believe it will make good; but it will make good only when conditions surrounding agriculture and those elements that enter into the production of agricultural commodities are made satisfactory to the western people. I might go on along those lines and point out some of the appalling conditions. I do not wish to dwell very long on this matter; but, in my experience, I have been in homes where there are families of five and seven living in two rooms eking out a bare existence, having merely a little flour and a little coal to keep body and soul together. I can say honestly, without fear of contradiction, that within a radius of eight miles of my home, at least twelve to twenty families would have absolutely perished had it not been for the charitable associations around them. That is not good literature to induce immigrants to come to this country, and it is up to us, as a Parliament, to legislate as far as possible to remove those conditions and to make the basic industry of Canada profitable to the masses. That is all we are asking at the present time.

I notice further, Sir, in the Speech from the Throne, that it was mentioned that we had not escaped suffering as a result of the Great War. We did not expect to escape that suffering. We know our Canadian people were willing to bear the burden and to enter into that Great War, and they have sacrificed manfully with the end in view of bringing victory to the world. At the same time, it is also said that the keen observers of this land have spoken with optimism and that, in the near future, we may expect to have a return to prosperity, I wonder whether the Government has placed its hand upon the pulse of the nation, and whether, in diagnosing the case, it is going to legislate for the return of this vitality and prosperity that is so desirable. That is a question, of course, that we have to consider; but prosperity, happiness, contentment, is not some will-o-the-wisp that can be caught in times of enthusiasm; it is due to sound fudamental economic laws, and when those economic laws are put into force, prosperity will return to us in exactly the same measure as when you put two and two together and it makes four, and not otherwise. I was wondering whether the Government, when they were preparing this paragraph, had taken into consideration, not only the great industries and great manufacturing centres in the East, but the farming interests of Canada as a whole.

I wish to continue the debate, Sir, in regard also to the unemployed. The unemployed question is a very serious one, and I did not altogether agree with the paragraph upon that subject in the Speech from the Throne. I believe the federal government is equally responsible with the provincial governments and also with the municipalities in which those unemployed are found, and I have reason to believe that, because I find that the immigration policy of this Dominion is a Dominion one and does not rest alone on the provinces. We, as a nation, as a whole, are responsible for bringing these people into our midst; and although I would not for one moment say that these men who are unemployed to-day are all to be found in the ranks of the immigrants to this country, at the same time, a large percentage of immigrants is to be found amongst the unemployed, and the responsibility rests with the Canadian people. I hope that some measure will be forthcoming that will not savour too much of charity, but that we shall be able to evolve a measure that will enable the individual to retain his dignity and citizenship.

I pass now to another paragraph, that which deals with agriculture. It is the largest paragraph in the Speech from the Throne, and believing it to be the most important one, I am going to deal a little more fully with this question. It is said that certain conditions are maintained to-day and that, as a result of those conditions, agriculture is not on a proper basis. People have spoken of various things; they have told us that we must have wider markets. I believe this is a desirable thing; it will encourage greater productivity on the part of the people, but the difficulty to-day is to get these larger markets. All the great nations of the world are endeavouring to do the same thing; and the only solution that I can see to this larger market problem is that the time must come when the people can continue to produce things that are natural to the country in which they live, and must cease to produce things which are artificial. For that reason, if it can be found that we in Western Canada are able to produce grain of all kinds, cattle, hogs and other agricultural commodities, we have a right to take these to the markets of the world and, in return, to receive from them the things that are manufactured in other countries, things which are not artificial but natural to the countries from which they come.

Boundary lines must not present artificial barriers to restrain free trade amongst the peoples of the world.

Something has been said about the cost of production. I am one of those who believe when economic conditions are righted, the cost of production will automatically right itself. We can readily see that, if there are lower freight rates, if there is a lowering of the cost of tariff, if other things are equal, the cost of production will naturally at once come down, and that is our only salvation. It has been said that the question of marketing the wheat has been designedly left out of the Speech. This, to us, is one of the most important matters. It has already been spoken of by the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Johnson), and I want to say just a few words in regard to it. As regards the need, we have already been told that seven-tenths of the wheat grown in Canada by the western farmer immediately finds its way to the market. As a result, the market is flooded, and then the European buyer, taking advantage of the situation, will immediately buy the grain at the lowest ebb. The reason why the Canadian farmer is forced to sell seven-tenths of his grain during three months of the year is because of his financial position. He is rightly called upon to pay the store bills, to pay the wages of the hired men, to pay the threshing expenses and so on, and I do not think the Canadian farmer would be justified in speculating with that wheat while he owed money to other people. So in an honest effort to pay his debts, he places his wheat on the market, and the buyers of the world take advantage of the situation.

We believe, Sir, that a voluntary pool is not sufficient to overcome these conditions, and it is a very strong man who would attempt to attack the old conditions as they have existed during the past three or four hundred years. But when these conditions, under the stress and strain following a great war, have broken down, then it is time for us to come forward with a scheme that has proved itself satisfactory to the men who grow grain; I have reference to the re-constitution of the Canada Wheat Board. I can only emphasize this fact, that so far as the western farmer is concerned he desires it. The western farmers are almost unanimous upon that question. We believe that the board is a vital necessity and that the Government, doubting nothing and without any procrastination, should act immediately, because the prosperity of the Dominion depends upon the farmers as a whole. We need to inspire the farmer with confidence and give him fresh courage to go forward once again into that great country, to delve in the soil and bring out the wealth that lies there so that he may get for himself that return that will enable him to live in the state of life which he desires.

Do you know, Sir, that in Western Canada to-day, as a result of the drop in the prices of the commodities which the farmer produces, we are expecting in a great many sections to close the schools?—a thing that would be a national calamity. When we have to economize in such a way that even the children, owing to the lack of money, are not able to secure an education, things have certainly come to a pitiable pass. And yet we pride ourselves in being a democracy, although education is the salvation of democracy to-day. If the eastern people are wise, if the great manufacturing interests are wise, they will realize that it is to their advantage and to the advantage of the whole of Canada that the Wheat Board be immediately reinstated, prior to the farmer putting any seed into the ground, so that he may feel that he has the support of the Canadian people in his demand to get what is coming to him. In the past the Canadian farmer has been the butt of profiteers and other people who have made money, not from the soil but because they have—shall I say?—taxed the farmer, or taken his commodities and speculated with them on the world's markets. Any one who has observed the conditions of the market during the last four or five months will see that the demand for the Canada Wheat Board is based upon an economic fact. There was no reason in the wide world why the farmer should get $1.64 at Fort William as soon as the grain was threshed, and then, immediately following Christmas, $1.06. To-day, the price has gone up to $1.40. We do not believe that the Wheat Board is a panacea for all the ills that afflict the Canadian farmer, but we are convinced that it is a step in the right direction towards restoring prosperity to that western land.

I desire, of course, to deal with the tariff. This is a subject upon which I could speak for a long time to-night, but I do not wish to tire the House with my address. I remember hearing the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) giving expression to feelings which almost depressed the hon. gentlemen in this assembly, when he said that my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) was too optimistic, and that before this session was over he would possibly share the feelings of the right hon. gentleman himself. My right hon. friend then went on to accuse the Liberal party of enunciating almost the same doctrine as he had propounded himself. If that were true, then, instead of being depressed, he should have rejoiced, because that was the very thing he advocated as the harbinger of prosperity in Canada. But I was wondering in my own mind whether he believed that the Liberal party were going to enact legislation founded upon the manifesto in their platform of 1919, and show to the world that by lowering the tariff they would once more usher in prosperity and demonstrate the fallacy of the right hon. gentleman's arguments regarding protection.

I do not wish to go very deeply into the question of protection to-night, but I heard one hon. member—I think my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Baxter)—twitting the Government in a certain respect. He read an extract from the Prime Minister's speech and went on in a humorous vein. He said that if there were a tariff for revenue, shoes that cost $5.50 would be reduced to $5.20, and he treated this reduction as a light matter, declaring that it was only a difference of 30 cents. Well, it may seem a light matter when you buy only one pair of shoes, but if you have a family like mine and have to buy shoes for a family of nine, 30 cents of a difference on each pair of shoes does not strike me as being a matter that can be easily dismissed. And when you have to reckon on four pairs of shoes per person per year it becomes quite a serious problem in the domestic budget. And, then, in the matter of underclothing and other articles of apparel, when you have to pay an aggregate of $300 as a result of protection, I do not think that a difference of 30 cents on a pair of shoes is one that can be pooh-poohed. It is a consideration for every family-loving man in Canada.

It has been stated that we must have protection to safeguard our infant industries. Now, I can readily understand that protection was justifiable in the time of Sir John A. Macdonald, in the seventies, if ever it could be justified in the history of Canada. The industrial arts of the United States were in an advanced state, and there was a danger of flooding from Europe. It was, therefore, possibly necessary in that early period of our existence to protect these manufacturers. But as the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Motherwell) said in a speech in Swift Current, and as I also said, these infants have now become fathers with whiskers and they are amongst the dominant powers in Canadian life. I therefore do not believe that the argument in favour of protecting infant industries holds good to-day. Even in Great Britain, where they have had free trade, some of the greatest industries have been built up, yea, even in competition with the whole world.

Another argument that has been advanced by our friends in support of protection is the necessity for a home market. Of course, the home market is a splendid thing. We have no fault to find with Eastern Canada and the men that work in the factories; nor have we anything to say against the manufacturers. We do believe, however, that the home market is only a drop in the bucket so far as the great agricultural interests are concerned, especially in regard to wheat. For the next fifty years the Canadian farmer will have to grow wheat and other grains of all kinds, and raise cattle for the markets of the world. For that reason, therefore, the home market does not enter into the price that we are receiving at the present time.

We as Canadian farmers can grow wheat at 80 cents a bushel and place it on the world's market in competition with the farmers of all other countries. But in return, Sir, we claim the privilege in regard to the commodities that enter into the production of our wheat, that we shall have the same opportunities of buying them in the world's market.

Of course, the argument is still being advanced: Where are you going to get revenue to run this great country? We need revenue and it is very difficult to get. The only question I should like to ask hon. members is: Who pays that revenue? Why, we are told by the greatest economic authorities in the world that 90 per cent at least of this tariff revenue is paid by the domestic consumers. So, Sir, we pay the revenue any way; but not only do we pay the revenue—we also make handsome gifts to those manufacturers who are protected as a result of that revenue being collected. Now, in regard to the economic factors that enter into world production, taking into consideration the demoralized exchange of most of the countries of Europe, and bearing in mind our domestic conditions, I can readily understand that it would not be advisable to have free trade at the present time; but I believe that it would be sound policy to have an all round reduction of the tariff for the good of our people generally.

I should like to deal for a moment or two with the tariff platform of the Liberal party. I believe that the Liberal party is more nearly in accord with us than is any other party—and yet I have my doubts. I have debated before this subject of tariff for revenue purposes only, and after carefully looking into the matter I find it very difficult to have such a tariff as will not in some measure protect the Canadian manufacturers. Yet we do not wish to revolutionize our trade practices, we do not wish to put our manufacturers out of business, as some people tell us is our intention. I do not believe that that is either possible or feasible. I believe that our manufacturers have just as much business acumen and ability as any of their competitors in Europe or the United States. Indeed it has been proved that the same men that enjoy this protection here can compete in the markets of the world. Therefore it seems to me fallacious to argue that it is absolutely essential to the prosperity of this country that we have high protection, and I hope that the historic Liberal party will live up to its ideals—ideals that have been manifested in the life of men of the stamp of Gladstone and Laurier, and that that party will give to our people legislation for the good of the people of Canada as a whole rather than for the advantage of the few.

That is where we stand as Progressives to-day—equal rights to every man, special privileges to none.

The question of returning their natural resources to our Prairie provinces is of vital importance to those provinces. We heard yesterday something about the justice that should be accorded the Maritime provinces in dealing with those natural resources, and we also heard the views of hon. members on this side. I want to say, Sir, that in regard to the return of our natural resources, we of the Prairie provinces only ask for our rights. We believe that those natural resources belong to us, and that the Dominion in 1870 did a great wrong to the province of Manitoba in retaining its resources. We further believe that this wrong was accentuated when the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were created. A study of the constitutional practice of the British Empire will disclose that in every instance where the people have developed to the extent of being able to rule themselves and receive a measure of self-government the control of their natural resources has accompanied autonomy. The four provinces that entered into Confederation in 1867 had strenuously demanded from the British Government the right to control their natural resources. While replying to the right hon. leader of the Opposition, the hon. leader of the Government stated that Canada had equal rights with the other members of the great British Commonwealth and he did not believe in taking second place or asking for privileges from the British Government. I concur in his judgment that we are one of the great self-governing nations of the British Commonwealth. But, Sir, what he advocates in respect to the Dominion, I claim, applies in equal measure to the three Prairie provinces. We are members of Confederation, we have been granted autonomy, but we are the one glaring exception throughout the British Commonwealth to-day in that we are denied control of our natural resources. In 1871, when British Columbia entered Confederation, her lands were immediately given to her. But some of those lands had already been exploited by the Canadian government as one of the conditions of building the Canadian Pacific railway. What was the result? The Canadian government immediately compensated the government of British Columbia for all lands which were retained specifically for Dominion purposes. When, however, Manitoba came into Confederation her natural resources were denied her. But in 1873, before Prince Edward Island became a member of Confederation, her natural resources had already been dissipated, and as an inducement she was invited to enter into Confederation on the same basis of equality as Ontario, Quebec, and the other provinces, and was immediately granted a sum of money in lieu of her natural resources.

Therefore, Sir, I see no reason why we need enter into a long discussion on this matter. It is our right to control our natural resources. The subject has been a political football for both parties in the past, and it is time that the Government of the day, with the aid of the Progressives, take that political football and kick it into the net so that we may get our rights and be members of Confederation on the same basis as our sister provinces. An hon. member this afternoon said that we were in the position of a colony. I do not think he over-stated the fact, but it is time that we enjoyed equality with all the other provinces. Of course, the argument is raised that Canada as a whole paid for these natural resources. But how? The £300,000 so paid was borrowed in Great Britain, and the Canadian people as a whole became responsible for the loan. But, Sir, we find on examination that the rights granted to the Hudson's Bay Company were granted by the British Crown, and when this £300,000 was paid over the Hudson's Bay Company surrendered those rights to the British Crown and in turn they were transferred to Canada. When the Northwest became settled and the Prairie provinces were created, those provinces were to enjoy the same privileges as if they had entered into Confederation in 1867. But they amended the British North America Act and I think, Sir, that if it went to the highest court of the land that amendment would be found to be ultra vires. Be that as it may, we in Saskatchewan, Alberta, Manitoba believe that we have a right to these lands; that we should be enabled to enjoy the privileges accorded to others under similar conditions. When Ontario's boundary was extended, no great cry went up among the Canadian people that we had an interest in these lands. When the boundary of Quebec was extended to James Bay, no great cry went over the Dominion that we had an interest in those lands. Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, as a result of their isolated position and inability to acquire additional lands, may need to come to this Parliament for a new financial arrangement, but we claim, Sir, that that is a question which should not enter into the matter of the return to the Western provinces of their natural resources. The question is a constitutional one; we claim that we have a constitutional right to enjoy these things. The matter of a larger subsidy to New Brunswick or Nova Scotia is an entirely different question. I wish to say also, on behalf of Saskatchewan at least, that we shall not be satisfied merely with the return of these natural resources; we want something more than that. Millions and millions of our acres have been exploited and put into the hands of speculators; we demand, therefore, that there shall be an acounting of these lands that have been used purely for Dominion purposes, and that, after deducting administration charges, the 9 p.m. money received shall be handed over to its rightful owners. That is where we stand in the matter.

In conclusion, Sir, I wish to say just a few words with regard to the railways. I believe that the national railways should be owned and controlled by the Canadian people and should be kept entirely out of politics. I see no reason in the world why they should not pay a large revenue to the federal exchequer if they are put under an efficient and businesslike administration. There is one thing I want to say about the railways which some may look upon as a little radical, and it is this: the railways were bought at an inflated price, and you cannot, on the basis of that abnormally large capital investment, expect them to pay a profit. I think the time has come when, as a wise business principle, these railways should be revalued on a business basis. If necessary, we should take the money which has been paid over and above the reasonable market value and charge it to our national debt. Do not burden the railways with it; do not put it on the western farmer, with his long hauls and high freight rates. Revalue these great national railways; consolidate them; put them under one business head and do not allow any urban centre like Montreal—or Toronto, for that matter—to enter into the negotiation at all. Look upon it from a purely business standpoint and let it be administered in the interests of the whole Canadian people. The time will come when, under a fair and wise administration, freight rates may be lowered, the road with its rolling stock and equipment kept in proper condition; then we shall receive handsome interest upon the investment made.

I shall take advantage of a later opportunity to enter more fully into a discussion of matters affecting the Tariff, the Wheat Board, and other things. In the meantime I thank you, Sir, and hon. members of the House, for giving me this opportunity to express my views.

Mr. ARCHIBALD M. CARMICHAEL (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I, too, crave your indulgence for a short time as well as the indulgence of hon. members of this House. I am aware that you have heard a good many speeches from this corner of the Chamber, but I assure you Sir, that you have not heard all we have to say; we have much more back here yet. We are just putting forth a small sample of what we have.

I rise with a certain amount of fear and trembling because, like some previous speakers, this is my first appearance in this assembly. But I am satisfied that a certain amount of generosity will be extended to me by the Speaker, because he assured hon. members that for a quarter of a century he himself honoured the rules of the House more in the breach than in the observance, and I am quite sure that when we who are new members transgress the rules we shall have his indulgence.

Being a new member in this Chamber there are some things that I particularly notice. One is that we have with us, in addition to English, a language to which I have not been accustomed. It does not, however, strike me harshly—not quite as harshly, at any rate, as it did some few years ago when I was compelled, under a very strict teacher, to learn its rules and idioms. They struck me then as being very peculiar and very hard to master. I am quite convinced, Mr. Speaker, that this great race which we have represented here, and which has produced a Cartier, a Champlain, a Frontenac, a Joliet, a Marquette, —yea, a Laurier and a Marshal Foch,—I am quite convinced that this great race has still representatives worthy of seats in the councils of this nation. While I do not fully understand the language, I may add that I am somewhat acquainted with the peculiarities of the race, because my life companion claims descent from those who bore the fleur de lis. I am quite convinced of her capabilities, and if ever called upon to choose another companion I believe I would choose one whose characteristics in that direction were even more pronounced. I am particularly pleased to be in this corner of the Chamber—this Progessive corner. We are the second largest group in the House. It is true that we have, so to speak, sat back and let the smallest group sit nearer to you, Mr. Speaker,—we have done that for their mutual encouragement. They were pretty badly dilapidated on December 6th last, and if their opponents in other constituencies had done as much to bring them to a state of dilapidation as I did in mine, there would be none of them here to tell the tale. The electors of my constituency gave me over 82 per cent of the votes cast. My opponent was a Conservative; he got the rest of the votes.

I am particularly pleased, too, that we, the Progressive group, have the first lady commoner sitting amongst us. I am well aware that some of the hon. members on the opposite side of the House have not fully learned that it is not well that man should live alone, and I think that the Progressives will have to pay particular heed to the hon. member of the gentler sex and see that she is not induced to cross the floor to form a stronger Liberal Government.

As you are possibly aware, Mr. Speaker, I am from the West, that country with the reputation of being wild and woolly; but I assure you that the wildness has fairly well all vanished and the woolliness as well. Even the wild buffalo that used to roam the prairies are now behind fences, and the former wild Indians are pretty well pacified and living on the reserves. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we who are here representing the West are fair specimens of that country, and just as tame and as docile as the average human being. Of course in the recent election we were classified as Bolshevists, Seditionists, Annexationists and several other kinds of "ists." Well, we do not merit all these designations, but I must say that I am an annexationist myself, a very strong annexationist—I believe that we should annex the United States right away.

I was pleased to hear our Premier remark in his speech that he wished to hear the western opinion—wished to have it expressed in the councils of the nation. I think you will agree with me, Mr. Speaker, that it is being expressed in no uncertain tones and I think it is right that it should be.

There is one part of the Speech from the Throne that appeals to me, and I wish to consider it, perhaps, from an angle of vision somewhat different from what has been emphasized before. A paragraph in the Speech states that it has been decided to hold in Genoa a conference with the object of securing a concerted effort to repair the grave dislocations in the economic and financial field that have everywhere followed the war. That is the point, Mr. Speaker, I wish to stress in the few remarks that I shall make to-night. As the hon. member (Mr. Lewis) who preceded me intimated, it perhaps is not good policy for a westerner to say anything derogatory about the province in which he resides. I felt somewhat loath to do so, but picking up a copy of Saturday Night, published in the city of Toronto, dated March 11, 1922, I found in the first column on the first page an editorial the reading of which caused me to throw aside my reluctance to speak about conditions in the province of Saskatchewan. Here is what the editorial says:

> A situation has arisen in Saskatchewan that will bear close watching. As is well known, quite a number of western towns have, owing to the absurd land boom of years ago, been obliged to default on their bond interest. Among these places are Swift Current, Prince Albert, Sutherland, Watrous, Battleford, Scott, Canora, Melville and Humbolt.

That looks pretty bad, Mr. Speaker, for Saskatchewan. I think if I bring to your attention, and to the attention of the House, some of the conditions as they actually are in that province I shall not be publishing much more than has already been given out to the public. I also have before me a letter from the secretary-treasurer of a rural municipality in the constituency which I represent. As you are aware the rural municipality is our small, local sub-division out there for governmental purposes. In part here is what the official referred to says:

> Last Fall those who were indebted to the banks for advances—which was practically everybody—were induced to repay wherever possible their notes before the end of the year and assurance was given verbally that those who did so would be financed during 1922. Now the banks are closing down on credits altogether. The municipality is in the same boat as the individuals.

Mr. Speaker, that gives us an idea of the conditions that the municipality I refer to is up against. Here is another extract from a letter written by the reeve of another municipality in the constituency I represent:

I wonder do those men at Ottawa fully realize what we are struggling against in here? Is it possible for you to make it plain to them that horses and cattle are dying in here by the dozens, simply starving, and we have nothing to put in the crop with.

Those are very dark conditions to have to lay before you. Here is a further suggestion, a rather novel one; I wish you would pay attention to what it says:

We are completely out of funds and require money for actual necessities and to alleviate our temporary pecuniary embarrassment.

We would ask you to take up the matter on the floor of the House if necessary.

Our request is, that we be given a cash grant sufficient to give each signer from fifty to one hundred dollars apiece.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any department in connection with the Dominion Government that would be very willing to carry out the suggestion made by this indivdual, and even if there should be there would be plenty of hon. members here ready to overrun that department without very much delay. I have simply read these extracts from letters to give you an idea of financial conditions in the part of the province that I have the honour to represent, and knowing these conditions I will make a few deductions therefrom. One is the need for absolute economy. I was pleased to hear that note struck by several hon. members in this House—the need for absolute economy. Some hon. members have made suggestions as to how we should economize, and possibly there is some virtue in them. We have a tremendous public debt, running as it does to some two billion three hundred and forty odd million dollars. That is a tremendous debt to rest upon Canada, and it is necessary that it should be met and that the money should come from somewhere to meet our obligations when they fall due.

Now some doubtless will think, especially hon. members sitting to my right who compose what is called the official Opposition, that is very good and sufficient reason why we should continue to have a tariff in Canada. Very well; let us look at that point for a moment. If we have a tariff in the country for raising money and that money is raised in a good and economical way all well and good; if not, it is not so well nor so good. I would like to give an illustration to show that the method of raising money for paying off our public debt by a customs tariff is not an economical method. If hon. members are good at arithmetic let them please follow these figures. I used to follow the school teaching profession and I only wish I had a blackboard here and a piece of chalk to more effectively demonstrate my point. We will suppose that a suit is bought from Great Britain costing over there the sum of $10. The tariff duty on fabrics entering Canada is 30 per cent, which means that when that suit enters Canada its cost is $13. It goes into the wholesaler's hands and he adds one-fourth to the cost of $13 to him, which is an addition of $3.25 to the $13, making the charge to him for selling $16.25. That suit goes into the retailer's hands. He adds 50 per cent to the cost price to him, which is $8.15 added to $16.25 making $24.40. Now if a person went into the store and bought this suit of clothes he would have to pay $24.40 at the present time.

Let us suppose there was no tariff. The original cost would be $10. It would go into the wholesaler's hands, and he would add one-quarter, $2.50, making $12.50. It would then go to the retailer, and he would add 50 percent or $6.25, bringing the cost up to $18.75. Notice the difference. In the one case, it is $24.40 and in the other case $18.75. That means that the consumer pays out $5.65 for a tariff of $3. But does that $3 tariff all go into the Dominion coffer? I think not. It is estimated, on very good authority, that to keep up all the expenses in connection with the collection of the customs tariff, it takes fully one-half, so that out of the $3 not more than $1.50 in cash actually goes into the Dominion coffers for the payment of the public indebtedness. That means, Mr. Speaker, that it takes $5.65 to put $1.50 into the Dominion treasury. It costs almost $4 to collect $1. Is that economy? I think not. Several hon. members have dealt with the tariff, and much can be said in regard to it. I do not know as it would be advisable to prolong the discussion. As intimated before, we have plenty of arguments to put forth, to show that the old, antiquated method of collecting revenue by tariff is too costly for this country at the present time to tolerate.

Besides the need for absolute economy there is the need for remedial farm legislation. This applies particuluarly to our western country. It is absolutely necessary, owing to the difficult conditions of the western country, that we should have this remedial legislation to enable the farmer to continue. Of course we know that the great need out there is rain, and it is beyond the pale of this honourable body to produce rain. Some of our western citizens last year endeavoured to have rain manufactured, or drawn down in some mysterious manner, but I believe it was more or less a failure; at any rate the gentleman who was responsible for bringing the rain has not been re-engaged this year, as I understand.

There are several other problems that have been touched on that are necessary for the prosperity of Western Canada, such as lowering of freight rates, the decrease in, or the complete elimination of, the tariff on farm implements, as well as the elimination of the speculation in grain, which is perhaps the most vital question with the western farmer to-day. I am well acquainted with a gentleman in our western country, who was a citizen until recently of the town in which I live, but who took a liking for southern California. He was immensely rich, and has gone to southern California to live at ease, having made large profits out of speculation in buying Canadian wheat. I was advised some few years ago that he had cleaned up $70,000 in one transaction, and that he had several such transactions. The western farmer looks for remedial legislation to overcome that speculative tendency in regard to Canadian wheat, and not only to overcome that speculation, but to extend the period of our wheat entering the world's market from a two months' period to a twelve months' period. This we believe can best be attained by the re-establishment of the Canadian Wheat Board. I am quite convinced that the Wheat Board will not solve all the ills of Western Canada, but it will solve a great many of them, and we who represent western farming communities are decided in our opinion that it will go a long way towards remedying the evils in that western country.

In addition to this, there is, the question of the financial condition of the country with particular reference to banking. We have in Canada 18 chartered banks, with approximately 5,000 branches. Now, I am venturing on a subject upon which possibly there is no unanimity of opinion, but I have read to this House a statement of some of the financial conditions as they are actually encountered in Western Canada. We find that rural municipalities, with assets of between three and four million dollars, are unable to borrow money to carry on current expenditures. There are individuals out there who keep good faith with the bank and pay what they owe them, and yet are refused credit to finance their operations during 1922. The Government of Saskatchewan, some couple of years ago, started a system of taking in money from people who had a surplus, paying them, I believe 5½ per cent, and reloaning that money to farmers who need it at 6½ per cent. Some few million dollars have been borrowed and loaned in this way. We find that quite recently the Ontario Government started a system of taking in money from those who had a surplus, paying them 4 per cent, and reloaning the money at 6 per cent. A resolution was passed recently by the United Farmers of Alberta, calling upon the Dominion Government to enter into some system of extended credit to assist those who needed money. A few months ago there was a bank scandal in Eastern Canada. The Merchants Bank on December 17th, 1921, was absorbed by the Bank of Montreal. Previous to the absorption that bank loaned money recklessly, and the outcome was that some $8,000,000 of the people's money was squandered. Under these conditions, I am not prepared to venture an opinion as to what the remedy should be, but I wish to bring these facts to the attention of the Committee on Banking and Commerce and ask that they inquire very carefully into our present banking system, and especially into the Merchants Bank scandal. In addition to that the committee might take up the matter of the nationalization of the banks and report as to the merits and demerits of our present system, and a system of bank nationalization. I am not expressing any opinion on the matter but would like to have a report from our banking committee on the subject.

I am grateful to you, Sir, for your indulgence in permitting me to say a few words on this, my first appearance on the floor of this House. I assure you that I share the feelings that have already been expressed by my fellow-members from the West. We are not here particularly in the interests of party. I fear that we have already seen too much of the spirit of trying to put party before country, and even since the opening of this Parliament, we have listened to many wordy arguments, many denunciations and declarations, but we have not listened to as much discussion of the real, vital matters before the country as we should. I think you will agree with me, Sir, that the attitude of the Progressive party is not so much to advance party or to try to gain the ascendency over some other party, as it is to tackle the real problems that are confronting Canada at the present time. I am with the other members of this Progressive group in going up against the real problems, tackling them like men—and women, by the way—and endeavouring to bring about the solution of our real problems.

Mr. JOHN A. MacKELVIE (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I would have intruded in this debate, had it not been that I rather consider it of importance that a representative of a large agricultural section of the West—of the westernmost province of the Dominion, indeed—should lay before this House his views of the fiscal policy of the country, more especially as related to the tariff question, in order that our Progressive friends to my left may have some indication that all the agriculturists of Canada do not hold the same opinions regarding the tariff as those which have been so freely expressed since the opening of this House.

Before I proceed with my remarks along those lines, I desire, very heartily and sincerely, to unite myself with those who have expressed congratulations to you, Sir, on your elevation to your most important position. Those of us who have been privileged to sit with you in this House before, need no assurance that you will bring to that high position both grace and dignity, and that you will always conduct affairs under your control with absolute impartiality.

I should like also to add my measure of congratulation to the mover and the seconder of the Address, and, in this instance, perhaps, I can speak with more feeling than the ordinary member, as only a year or so ago it fell to my lot to second the Address and to make my maiden speech in this House. I can well recall the feeling of trepidation and diffidence with which I approached that task. I only wish that I could flatter myself that I succeeded in accomplishing the duty laid upon me on that occasion half so well as the hon. gentlemen who undertook the same performance a few days ago.

I also, perhaps, may be permitted to express very hearty congratulations to the new Prime Minister of this country upon having attained, at such an early period of his life, to the highest position in the gift of the Canadian people. I may, however, frankly add that I do not suppose that I, or some of my associates in this section of the House, would be in danger of collapsing from heart trouble or dying of grief, did the exigencies of the occasion require that, at a sooner or later period—and we all here trust it may be sooner—he might be required to cross the floor again and take up a position, Sir, at your left.

Along with other members who have very heartily and, I know, very sincerely, congratulated this House upon the addition to it of a lady member, I desire to add my voice in giving expression to the very great pleasure it affords me to see the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) occupying a seat in this Chamber. I would not say that any individual member around me would be so self-sacrificing as to wish that, in the next approaching contest, his seat might be filled by a lady representative; but I think I might venture to say that many of us would probably not be very sorry if our near neighbours should suffer from a fate such as that.

I am aware that a speaker in this debate on the Address is afforded a good deal of latitude and can, if it so suits him, discuss a great variety of subjects without being held too closely to the Speech from the Throne; but I suppose, in order to maintain some semblance of debate, it would be wise, at least, and advisable that a little attention be given to the remarks of those who have immediately preceded me to-day. I have been impressed—and I think the impression has been conveyed very strongly to other members of this House—that among our new associates to our left, is numbered a very considerable proportion of speakers who would grace any large assembly in the land. I have listened with marked satisfaction to some speeches which have come from that quarter of this assembly and which, for clearness, gracefulness of diction and comprehensive grasp, from their point of view, of the subjects to which they have given consideration, have reached a very high level.

I cannot, however, with an equal degree of sincerity, congratulate them upon some of the principles which they have set so vigorously before this House. I am tempted to draw attention to an illustration used by the hon. and very eloquent member for Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) who dwelt rather humourously on a remark made by the hon. member for St. John and Albert (Mr. Baxter) yesterday regarding a pamphlet issued as campaign literature by the party on the other side of the House, in which pamphlet attention was drawn to a promise that, if they came into power, a reduction would be effected in the duty on boots and shoes. I was rather surprised, I must confess, to find that the hon. member for Swift Current, who had such a large family, was able to supply their wants so lavishly. I think, indeed, that his income tax must have formed a very considerable accretion to the funds of this country last year, if he carried into effect the scheme of provision he there outlined, for I find that reduction in the cost of boots and shoes contemplated in that pamphlet and mentioned by the hon. member for St. John and Albert amounted to about 5 per cent. The hon. member for Swift Current informed the House that the saving which would be effected in buying for his household under those conditions would amount to something in the neighbourhood of $300 per annum. That would mean that he was buying, for the use of his family, imported goods in the way of clothing alone to the extent of about $6,000 per annum, which, I imagine, from a country where, according to his own dictum, conditions financially and otherwise are so stringent, does not very forcibly bear out his argument.

I wish also to make a very brief reference to the remarks which fell this afternoon from the lips of the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin). I wish to say, at the outset, that I am approaching the consideration of this debate absolutely devoid of any feeling of resentment on account of the overturn which has taken place as a result of the election that was held on December 6. I am absolutely devoid of any feeling of bitterness in the criticism which I shall be compelled, I think, to make regarding some of the hon. gentleman's statements. I do not believe that it would be of any possible utility for me to attempt to re-thresh old straw. The country has spoken in a very decisive way and given expression to a verdict which we cannot gainsay, and which we on this side of the House are prepared to accept, I think, with very good grace indeed. But I do say that in the remarks of the Minister of Justice this afternoon there was an indication that he was not endeavouring to approch the subject, which he had under discussion, in an entirely disingenuous manner, and I am putting it as mildly as I feel it is possible for me to do.

He made a complaint that my leader (Mr. Meighen), in his opening remarks, had endeavoured to force upon the attention of this House certain theories of his own regarding, in the first place, the manner in which the Government of the day might be expected to handle the revision of the tariff, and, in the second place, the manner in which they might be expected to approach the very great task of handling the railway situation in this Dominion. Now, what the right hon. the leader of the Opposition said in both of these connections is a matter of record and is fresh in the memory of every person who heard him only two or three nights ago, and I desire to call to your memory, Sir, this fact, that any assertion he made regarding the statements in Montreal or elsewhere of the Minister of Justice was repeated word for word from the printed page. There was no conjecture on his part; he was not seeking to make any insinuation or innuendo. If that statement had not been correct, if the press had been guilty of misreporting the Minister of Justice on that occasion, we should certainly have heard of it before now.

But in another and, I think, even more reprehensible manner, the hon. gentleman, in the first speech which he has delivered in this Parliament, took occasion to twist a statement given by the leader of the Opposition in such a manner as to give him ground, as he thought, to enter the accusation against him that he had been guilty of utterances calculated to inflame the passions of the people of Quebec against other sections of this country, and to widen the breach, if any such existed, between the two great races of Canada. Now, I venture this assertion, from a perfect knowledge of the sentiments, the convictions, and the utterances of my leader, that no man in this House, or elsewhere in this country, is more thoroughly convinced that it is a duty of the public men of the country to give as much sympathetic consideration to the people of the province of Quebec as, so far from antagonizing them in any way, will draw the two races, if possible, into closer harmony; and I do not know upon what ground the allegation of the Minister of Justice could rest. I do not know that there could be traced to any public utterance of the right hon. leader of the Opposition any single sentence that would indicate that in his mind there rankled any suspicion of a sentiment of that kind. I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that certain public journals of the country have so distorted and twisted the utterances of my leader that they have spread abroad that impression, and I speak of this matter with a certain degree of feeling and of shame. For over thirty years I have been engaged in newspaper work in this country, and I have the honour of the craft very deeply at heart; and if any vestige of reason has been given to the hon. Minister for the attack he made upon the leader of the Opposition this afternoon it must rest solely with such distorted utterances as have gone forth from a section of the press of this country.

The hon. gentleman also gave expression to the opinion—and I assure him that it is an opinion not very deeply shared in either by hon. members surrounding me here or by the people of the country as a whole—that while the right hon. the leader of the Opposition might rightly be termed a good fighter he was a bad loser. Now, I should like to appeal to the members of the House, more particularly those who are new, whether they found anything in the utterance of the right hon. gentleman the other day to substantiate the assertion that he was a bad loser. Did they notice anything in the nature of a whine that fell from his lips as he detailed—and he had a perfect right to detail—some of the difficulties which met him during his recent campaign? Surely he was justified, and amply justified, in placing before the House and the country, on the first opportunity that arose, some of those difficulties and some of the tortuous paths which the then Opposition on certain occasions pursued in their endeavour to discredit him in the eyes of a certain class of people. In his speech there was nothing in the nature of a whine; it was a manly, straightforward statement of facts, and did not in any sense indicate that he was a bad loser. I will tell the hon. minister one thing that my right hon. friend has not lost, and is not in danger of losing: he has not lost one particle of the respect, and admiration, and enthusiastic devotion, and I think I am right in saying, the affection of the members who stand behind him in this part of the Chamber.

Mr. VIEN: They are only a few at that,—the remnant.

Mr. MacKELVIE: Well, there have been some saving remnants. There has been such a thing as the little leaven that leavened the whole; and in time, I predict,—and in my opinion that time is not very far distant—that remnant will have grown to such proportions that those who are inclined to jeer and taunt us regarding our size at the present time may be very fortunate indeed if they can escape the same fate. The hon. gentleman who leads the House (Mr. Mackenzie King), in his remarks the other night, was good enough to refer to our party. He congratulated us, if I remember rightly, upon the slight change that has been recently effected in our designation. He commented, at any rate, upon the fact that the Opposition in this end of the Chamber was now to be known as the Liberal-Conservative party. He went a little further, if I recall the circumstances correctly, and said that we were, in fact, Tories. Well, I for one did not feel any cold shiver running down my back at being so designated.

I know of course that the name "Tory", if applied in the sense in which it was at one time applied in Great Britain and in this country, is now nothing more than a joke. The crusted old Tory, the upholder, rightly or wrongly, of class privilege, is to-day as extinct as the dodo. But there has been a good deal of loose talking, loose thinking and loose press comment during the last few months since the election regarding that historic name Liberal-Conservative, which I for one shall never, I suppose, be able to express how proud I am to bear. It has been said that the name originated in 1867 when the unification of the various provinces was brought about and a government composed of Liberals and Conservatives, headed by Sir John A. Macdonald, consummated Confederation. That is only true in a measure. Considerably further back than that is to be found the genesis of the name. I think it was in 1854 that in this section of Canada, when the forces of the Liberals and Conservatives, known as the Baldwin-Lafontaine party were united in a government headed by MacNab, the name Liberal-Conservative was first used. Since that day I need not draw the attention of even the newest member of this House to the fact that a great deal of Canadian history has been made by that party.

Now, I said a moment ago that the honoured leader of our party had not lost the affection, esteem and respect of those who follow him here or of those who were ranged under his banner in the country, and the principal reason in my opinion why that devotion to him as a leader still exists is the fact that nobody ever has been in doubt, more particularly during the recent campaign, as to his being entirely worthy to bear the name Liberal-Conservative, for he has upheld through thick and thin in every section of this great country where he appeared before the public the outstanding principles which have characterized that party from the time of its birth, namely, adequate protection of our industries.

After what I said in introduction I suppose it is not necessary for me to inform my Progressive friends that I am a protectionist. It indeed is the fundamental principle of my political belief. If I were asked to define that fundamental principal, I would say that first and foremost I believe in a measure of adequate protection to the industrial interests of this country; to the farming interests; and, following out that system of adequate protection to those two great industries, I believe the labouring classes of this country have their conditions infinitely bettered and are afforded far greater opportunities of obtaining remunerative pay for their toil than they would be under any other system that could be introduced. If that means to be a Liberal-Conservative, if that even means to be a Tory, I confess that so far from being ashamed of the designation I feel rather proud that it should be applied to myself or to any other member in this section of the House.

I do not propose to take up in detail consideration of all the clauses of this somewhat remarkable speech which has been put into the mouth of His Excellency. The only thing that I can really congratulate those responsible for its introduction upon is that it is couched in remarkably graceful, if at the same time remarkably ambiguous, language. The practiced hand of its originator is apparent in every line, and with finely rounded periods and very graceful sentences indeed he endeavours to lay before the country a pronouncement of policy which is entirely innocuous, which leaves scarcely anything tangible to grasp in the way of criticism, and which after all means precious little. I join here in the view expressed by my leader on Monday night. I feel quite certain that before this session closes my friends of the Progressive party, who are so thoroughly and absolutely wedded to the principle of free trade in foodstuffs—of reciprocity in natural products—will not take home with them any very great consolation when the final meaning of this paragraph relative to the revision of the tariff is disclosed to their view by such legislation as may be brought down during the course of this session. I, of course, am not complaining about that. The more my friends on the other side of the House refrain from tinkering with the tariff the more pleased I shall be, but I am quite well aware that it will bring disappointment of a very bitter kind indeed to many an hon. member, more especially to hon. members from the Prairie provinces, who had anchored their faith upon the fact that at a representative convention assembled in Ottawa only two years ago a great party had given to the public a pronouncement of policy which led to the belief that a very considerable revision in the tariff would be effected when that party attained power—that many articles would be placed on the free list, and that a very determined effort would be made to bring about reciprocity in natural products with the United States. I venture to predict that very, very little indeed along those lines will be accomplished this session.

I promised my Progressive friends to give them some reasons for my political belief that protection afforded the best possible system under which a large section of our farmers could pursue their avocations. I suppose that had I been brought up under other circumstances, say, in an industrial centre, where the benefits of protection as related to industries are very apparent, I might have become a firm believer in protection from that point of view. But for the last thirty years my life has been spent in one of the agricultural sections of British Columbia where we have no manufactures, and the same conclusion has been indelibly impressed upon my mind as would be the case if my associations had been entirely with a manufacturing centre. I have not on this occasion to discuss the subject in any academic manner. I am in a position to place before you a concrete example where demonstration is made up to the hilt of the benefits of protection to a great agricultural section of British Columbia. I represent the county of Yale in that province. That is one of the largest constituencies in Canada; its area is about as extensive as that comprised in the provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island combined. Certain sections of that constituency are devoted almost exclusively to fruit growing—a large section surrounding Okanagan lake, a body of water 75 miles in extent, the shores of which are dotted with orchards; Grand Forks and Similkameen, provincial ridings are also orchard sections. In British Columbia there is now invested upwards of $40,000,000 in the orchard business. The Minister of Justice, who spoke this afternoon, referred to the fact that in his province the amount invested in the boot and shoe business was no less a sum than $32,000,000, and that protection was necessary to keep that business alive. I want to impress upon you members of the Progressive party that in his address this afternoon, which was delivered in a very impressive manner indeed, the Minister of Justice, while he did not mention the word "protection," so far as I can recall it, from start to finish, did say frankly and freely that for twenty-five years or more he had been firmly convinced that the tariff policy pursued by Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government, with the present Minister of Finance in charge of the exchequer, was the correct one for Canada to hold to to-day. None of you who have given any consideration to this subject can fail to be aware of the fact that the customs tariff from 1896 to 1911 was absolutely a protective tariff; just such a protective tariff—for it was almost unchanged during that period—as that which prevailed while the predecessors of the Laurier government were in office. It is true that at the very end of that period they made an appeal to the country on a policy of reciprocity in natural products with the United States, and the verdict of the people was so overwhelmingly against the proposal that they went down to almost complete collapse. In no part of Canada was reciprocity a more vital issue than it was in the constituency that I represent. In no part of Canada was the danger so freely seen to the great industries, which, indeed, are our basic industries there, and the result was that the then Conservative candidate, Hon. Martin Burrell, was returned by one of the largest majorities ever received by a candidate in the West. The people of that constituency, whose bread and butter were at stake on that occasion, were fully seized of the gravity of the situation as it affected them.

Now, let us look for a few moments at this fruit-growing industry. We have heard to-day a very distressful tale indeed from several speakers in the group to my left, and I am only too fully aware that what they said was true. The conditions which have confronted the farmer of the western plains during the last two or three years are all quite as depicted by my hon. friends. But I venture to suggest that some of those difficulties and distresses were due to conditions relating to climate and soil; not all of them, surely, were directly or indirectly traceable to the tariff policy of the country. However that may be, here is the condition of affairs in my constituency.

We have, as I say, invested in the orchard business about $40,000,000, and our natural market is the prairie country of the West. In 1912, 1913, 1914 and 1915, when the orchard business was just beginning to get upon its feet, we were met by this condition of affairs: we were trying to ship apples across the mountains for sale to you people on the plains. Our cost of production in those days was between ninety cents and one dollar per box; to-day it has risen to $1.50 per box. We found that the great apple-producing sections of the two states lying to our south—Washington and Oregon, and, to some extent Idaho and Montana—were producing one hundred boxes of apples to our one; had established trade in a large chain of populous cities stretching at least to the Mississippi river and in a great many instances further east, where they could sell their "Fancy" and "Extra Fancy" brands of fruit at a profitable figure. They were anxious to dispose of what they call their "C" variety at almost any price they could get for it; accordingly they began sending this fruit into the Prairie provinces in such quantities and at such prices that stark ruin—no other word can properly designate it—stark ruin stared the orchardists of Okanagan and other sections of Yale in the face. Apples were sent on consignment from Washington and Oregon to the prairie markets and sold at forty cents a box when the cost of production in those states was about ninety cents. Was there any possibility under those circumstances for our orchardists to compete? Could they, indeed, continue in existence in the face of that condition? Well, we speedily saw that we had either to give up the business or get some measure of protection that would save us from disaster and ruin. Mind you, the orchard business is not like any other. When a man starts an orchard he has to buy expensive land in the first place; he has to make a large annual outlay for water to irrigate it, and he has to wait anywhere from five to eight years for the trees to attain maturity before he can look for any return. And if he has an unprofitable season he cannot go into some other line of agriculture; he cannot change his crop; he has to depend upon the product of his apple or plum or peach or cherry trees.

We found, as I said, that in those years we were facing absolute ruin, and the only thing that could save us was relief from this Parliament. We came here with deputations; we presented the case to the government then in office, of which Sir Robert Borden was the head, and we backed up our plea by statistics of so convincing a nature that the Governemnt, in spite of a good deal of determined opposition from the other side of the House, gave us the relief that we sought in the form of an increase in the duty on apples to 30 cents a box. A box contains about forty pounds; there are about three boxes to a barrel. From that moment the industry began to flourish; people took new heart, and from British Columbia there will be exported this year some 6,000 cars of apples valued at between $8,000,000 and $9,000,000. Is that not an industry that is worth conserving? You gentlemen from the prairies are very enthusiastic supporters of the principle of co-operation, and rightly so. Now, we have built up in the Okanagan and other apple-producing valleys of British Columbia a splendid system of co-operation in the handling and marketing of our fruit. If you want to deliver it a deadly blow; if you want to bring co-operation in that country to its knees—indeed, to extinction—you cannot do it more effectively than by taking off this protection from our fruit.

Mr. VIEN: Will the hon. member permit me a question? What is the duty on Canadian apples entering the United States?

Mr. MacKELVIE: It is just about the same, since the Fordney Bill came into effect, as our own duty.

Mr. VIEN: But what was the duty prior to that?

Mr. MacKELVIE: Prior to that apples were free.

Mr. VIEN: Well then in so far as the argument of my hon. friend goes, what was to prevent him or the apple growers from shipping apples to the United States and competing with the American fruit growers.

Mr. MacKELVIE: The reason that prevented us from taking advantage of a situation of that kind—which by the way never existed—was just the same reason that prevents our manufacturers of goods in Canada from competing against highly specialized firms in the United States they can turn out their products in such vast quantities that their overhead expenses are very low compared to ours; they can afford to sell their products—I know your point—I will come to it in a minute—very much cheaper than we can. But the real reason was this: they produce a hundred times more apples in those two states to the south of us than we produce in British Columbia, and their market is crowded with their home products, for that reason they seek to dump their surplus product in our natural markets on the prairies.

Mr. VIEN: But their market was just as open to you.

Mr. MacKELVIE: Providing there was a market there; but there was no market; they were overstocked; they themselves had overproduced.

Mr. VIEN: Will my hon. friend allow me a further question?

Mr. MacKELVIE: Yes.

Mr. VIEN: I would ask him why the British Columbia fruit growers went into such an unprofitable business?

Mr. MacKELVIE: Oh. Well, I think I can possibly explain that too.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacKELVIE: At the time we entered largely upon the commercial production of apples in British Columbia the prospect did seem to be a pretty alluring one. We had not then perhaps, taken into consideration the fact that there were very much larger areas of land suitable for the cultivation of orchards in the states to the south of us. We had not, perhaps, been fully seized of the fact that already the existing orchards there far outnumbered our own, but the principal reason was this: at that time there was pouring into the plains, into the three provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta, and Manitoba, immigrants from the United States at the rate of at least a couple of hundred thousand a year and it looked to us who were planting orchards there that by the time our orchards came into full production, by the time they came to maturity, the natural increase of the population of the Prairie provinces would be such—and we hoped too their prosperity would grow in the same measure as their immigration—that we would have provided for us just over the mountains that lie to our east a vast market that would absorb all that we could offer it.

Mr. VIEN: Providing it was protected by a high tariff wall.

Mr. MacKELVIE: No. We thought then that the American product would not seek entrance in the manner in which it did. We did not understand the situation; I am free to confess none of us are so well acquainted with facts before they happen as when we are able to look back upon them in retrospect.

Now, as to the measure of protection that is afforded us, we not only have a specific duty on apples but we had inserted in our Customs Act last year what is known as the dumping clause. We have had the dumping clause in connection with our Customs Act in Canada for many years, in fact, I think it goes back to probably 1903 or 1904. But that dumping clause of the Customs Act we found was lacking in teeth; it did not grip the situation; it did not give the relief to us that we thought we were entitled to because of this fact: It was based upon the selling price of the article at the point of production, and that selling price might be manipulated, might be rigged, might fluctuate so much in places a few miles apart that it was a matter of impossibility ever to determine it with any degree of exactitude, and it was a very easy clause to avoid. So, last year, finding that other countries who were alert and alive to the situation, were introducing clauses into their customs acts based upon another principle, namely, that the cost of production—not the selling price or the market price—but the cost of production at the point where the article originated—should be the basis of that clause, we had our act changed, or we had it amended, and now we have in the Customs Act a dumping clause which does give us protection in that respect. If an American firm, for instance, ships into Calgary, as they attempted to do last year, pears which they offered on the market there for a dollar a box we could invoke—as indeed we did invoke last year—this dumping clause in the Customs law. We can prove that it cost them so much to produce that box of pears in the Yakima valley, the Wenatchee valley, Hood River district, or wherever they originated; that the transportation charges from that point to the point where they were offered for sale was so much; and then the Minister of Customs is authorized to increase the duty above the normal duty to such a figure as will bring about a fair market value for those articles in the market where they are presented; and by that means, invoking that clause, I dare say the orchardists of the Okanagan valley were last year saved many thousand dollars.

Mr. SALES: Will not that dumping clause increase the tariff?

Mr. MacKELVIE: I will tell the House this fact—it may not be easy to believe it but it is nevertheless a fact—that in spite of the protection afforded us by the Customs tariff and by the dumping clause, the market price of apples—no, not the retail marketing price of apples for that may be anything according to different localities or according to how much the retailer will get—but the market price of apples as disposed of by the producer and put on the prairie market by the wholesaler, was no larger in Manitoba, Saskatchewan or in Alberta than it was on the other side of the line a corresponding distance from the Washington orchard. For instance the price in Dakota last year and the year before was practically the same for American apples produced in Washington as it was in Manitoba for apples produced in the Okanagan valley. Now under a system such as that we have some chance of maintaining the British Columbia industries in a very prosperous condition, although I want to tell you that it is by no means as rosy in the fruit growing country as some people seem to think they have reason to believe. This year our orchardists, despite the existing protection, are almost in as bad a position as some of you graingrowers from the prairies. When I left the Okanagan valley at the end of last month the fruit growers there, selling through the co-operative institutions, had not received the money for their crop, and further, a lot of that crop was not sold. You know how conditions were on the prairies this year; you know what proportion of the crop they were capable of absorbing.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is very conversant with the rules of the House. I would ask him to address hon. members in the third person instead of addressing them directly.

Mr. MacKELVIE: Thank you very much for your correction, Mr. Speaker. I will endeavour to adhere to the rule.

Mr. SPEAKER: Not a correction but a direction.

Mr. MacKELVIE: I was about to remark, Mr. Speaker, that so far from being entirely prosperous this year the condition was not altogether rosy as regards fruit growing in my district. We were able this year, though for the first time in our history, to break into the American market; and this will probably answer the question in some degree of my hon. friend who made a query a few minutes ago. We were able this year for the first time, owing to a set of circumstances which perhaps may never occur again, to dispose of some portion of our crop in the state of New York. The reasons for that were these: In the first place New York, which the previous year had produced more than double the amount of apples that was grown in the combined states of Washington and Oregon, this last season found itself, comparatively speaking, without a crop at all. The second reason was that while Washington and Oregon had large crops they were unable, owing to lack of transportation facilities, to place their apples on the market at the proper season; and the third reason was the difference in exchange which was sufficient to offset the duty levied upon our apples when exported to the United States. But despite that fact, although we were able to dispose of some of our apples just as soon as the car shortage was overcome in Washington and Oregon, the United States market was flooded with apples from those states, and when I left I think there were two or three hundred cars of apples stored in New York, waiting for sale and the returns came in very slowly indeed. Under those circumstances, I think I am justified in directing the attention of my Progressive friends to a section of the country where the people cannot, by any stretch of imagination, give countenance to the desire which seems to animate our friends for a sweeping revision of the tariff downward. In regard to the reciprocity agreement with the United States of America, admitting foodstuffs from that country free, or in regard to the removal of the dumping clause, which gives us another measure of protection, we have rather an example of the irony of fate.

Of course during my election campaign I naturally made as strong a point as I was able, speaking to the fruit-growing section, of the advantages which they received under this protective tariff and under the provisions of the dumping clause. I endeavoured to point out how fatal it would be to their interests if any party who would sweep away these measures of protection were to come into power. My opponent, a person whom I held in high esteem, pooh-poohed such an idea, and said it was a bug-bear. He said "If our party come into office, we never will remove the dumping clause or reduce the tariff on fruit." Here is where the irony of fate comes in. As soon as the Liberal party was returned to power, and the danger became apparent to my opponent and his friends that this tariff would be reduced or the dumping clause removed, my Liberal opponent and his chief executive, the president of the association in Yale, came down to Ottawa and used all their power to keep in effect and in force the very policy introduced and maintained by the present leader of the Opposition when he was Prime Minister of this country. I do not intend to pursue the discussion of this portion of the tariff at any length at present. We will, no doubt, have a full-dress discussion on it later on in the session when the Budget is presented.

I desire to make reference to another section of the Speech from the Throne, and in this connection I prophesy, the members surrounding me here will find themselves very much in accord with the views expressed by my friends to my left. That is in connection with the railway situation in this country. I was particularly impressed, in fact I was rather delighted, with the very frank manner in which that question was dealt with by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) who presented the resolution for the adoption of the Address. He designated the railway situation in these terms: "It is an emaciated foundling left on the doorstep of the Government which preceded this one." And I thought that characterization was a true one. Time has developed certain changes, but not very many, with regard to the railway situation since that foundling was laid on the doorstep of the Government. It has, perhaps, not developed into a very sturdy stripling so far, but it gives signs of growth, and healthy growth. Its future development, of course, is now in other hands, and the orphan has passed under new guardianship. Its future development will depend, of course, very largely upon the treatment which it receives from this guardian during its term of adolescence. If it be given a reasonable measure of assistance and subsistence, such as it requires, I, for one, have not any great doubt or apprehension that in time it will develop into a very healthy and flourishing offspring of this country. If, on the other hand, it is denied subsistence, if it is given ill-treatment, as some members on this side of this House and some of the Progressive members say will be its fate, it will not be very long until the undertaker is called in, and should that contingency occur, there are those who apparently believe that there are influences across the House which would rather cheerfully, and with a great deal of alacrity, furnish the hearse and the plumes.

Be that as it may, with that railway situation, as has frequently been said during this debate, is tied up another very great and important question. That is the question of immigration. As has been very truthfully said, we must have immigration; we have to fill up the vacant land and obtain people to give business to the road before there is much hope of placing it on a paying basis. I am free to confess that we are rather up against a very perplexing proposition. We are almost, I think, forced upon the horns of a dilemma. If, in order to get immigration to give business to our railways, we take down the barriers which have restricted immigration into this country, if we permit an influx of people from all portions of the globe, who are only too anxious to flood into this country of opportunity, if we permit, for instance, such countries as the Balkans, Southern Europe and other sections of that distressed land, devastated by war, to pour their population into Canada, our second condition will be worse than our first.

We have in my own constituency an example of what has occured through loose systems of immigration in the past. I am not going to attach any particular blame to any party for the immigration policy which prevailed in the early years of this century, but I know there are hundreds and thousands of people in my own constituency who wish very ardently that, at least, the colony of Doukhobors had never been allowed to come into Canada, for, without doubt, they cannot be termed anything less than a pest and a nuisance. They will not conform to the laws of the land, nor to our provincial regulations. They will not register their births nor their deaths, or send their children to school, and when any attempt is made to enforce this law, a number of them of the extreme sect, resent it to this extent: both sexes will divest themselves of all clothing, and make a parade, dressed in the suits which Adam and Eve wore before the fig leaves were introduced in the garden of Eden.

We have also in British Columbia another immigration problem which is even more serious, indeed, vastly more serious than that, and to which I would refer. I have not time to develop its consideration to any length tonight, but I will simply say that I think a great deal of education will be necessary before the people in the eastern section of the Dominion will have anything like an adequate conception of what Oriental immigration into British Columbia has meant for our province. One out of every ten or twelve adult males in British Columbia to-day is an oriental. The whole of the industries are under their control. Down the lower Fraser river there is a town called Steveston, a fishing development, where the fishing and canning of salmon is the great industry. That community is now a community almost exclusively of Japanese. I have no dislike for the Japanese nation; I am an admirer, as everybody who has considered their growth and history during the last half century must be, of the many admirable qualities which they possess; but the hon. member for North Winnipeg, in moving the Address, employed in some connection this line from Kipling: "There is no East, no West, border nor breed nor birth". There is a couplet better known which applies more closely in this connection to our land, and that is:

> For East is East and West is West,
> And never the twain shall meet.

And they cannot meet as regards the assimilation of an oriental population amongst the people of British Columbia. Our schools are to-day crowded with oriental children, and the natural increase of the Japanese already settled in that province, is such as to warrant us in the belief that, even if the bars were put up so rigidly that not a single one of their race could enter Canada for the next decade, their natural increase would be such as to give us more by far in that province than we could ever begin to absorb profitably. There is the situation connected with immigration, and I hope those of us who come from that Pacific province will have the sympathetic assistance of some of the other members who come from further East, in guarding our western portals against any further influx of a class of people who cannot be considered as anything but detrimental and dangerous to our national life. In this connection, at the outset of my remarks I gave some reasons why, behind our leader, stood a united party, holding him in such a high measure of respect, esteem, and loyal devotion. If there was one reason more than another that served to endear that man to the people of British Columbia, and that, I think and believe, should have endeared him to the people of this whole country if they had understood the situation as we understood it, it was the spirited, energetic, courageous and patriotic course which he assumed at the conference of Prime Ministers in London last year, when, to use the vernacular, he threw a monkey-wrench into the machinery and prevented the renewal of the Anglo-Japanese treaty. I am one of those who believe that the assertion frequently made at that time or very shortly afterwards, that it was largely due to the action of Canada's representative there that the Disarmament Conference at Washington was called, was an absolutely true statement of fact. As a result of that conference, we know that the Anglo-Japanese Treaty is now a thing of the past, and we have in its stead a Four Nations' Treaty, which we are, I think, all thoroughly convinced will, for a long time to come, ensure safety on our Pacific coast.

I find that I have several other points noted on which I had intended to make some remarks, but I think I shall pass them up. We have been treated to-day to some rather lengthy orations, and I do not want to add mine to that number. I had noted something about revision of terms in connection with the Prairie provinces, but I do not think I shall dwell upon that subject. I have tried to understand as fully as possible, from the remarks which have fallen from the lips of the members of the Progressive party who have spoken, their objection to the position taken by the hon. member for St. John and Albert (Mr. Baxter) yesterday, and I have yet failed to grasp why they should have any objection to permitting a province, which feels it has a grievance, to enter upon a discussion of any matter precedent to any change in the terms in connection with the three western provinces. In British Columbia, we all expect to interject ourselves into that conference or board of arbitration or whatever it may be, if it is held, and to have our views presented there, and, I hope, very forcibly presented. We, in British Columbia, have never believed that we have received exactly just and fair treatment in the distribution of subsidies. We have physical disabilities there which make, for instance, road-building such a tremendous expense as compared with the same sort of construction in the other provinces, and we have other cases which lead us to believe that, if any reconstruction of terms is effected, we should be entitled to present our case and to make a claim for better terms before that deal is consummated.

I also had noted something regarding Soldiers' re-establishment, and I had intended to enlarge in some slight extent upon that. But I shall pass it by, contenting myself with saying only this, that, as time goes by, as one year succeeds another, we find that even the generous intention of the past Government and what was thought to be very ample provision for the needs and necessities of our returned men and their dependents gradually worked itself out in a way which shows that ever continuing and increasing assistance must be given if this country shall, in any way at all, begin to liquidate the tremendous debt which, of course, will never by any material means be liquidated, which we owe to the men who went overseas and fought on our behalf for the preservation of civilization. I hope such generous provision will be made from time to time for men and women of that class that, sooner or later, the last vestige of just complaint may vanish from amongst our returned men or their dependents in this country.

Just one word in conclusion regarding a subject which was introduced on more than one occasion during this debate, and which I have always held very close to my heart. In the early part of my remarks I had occasion to refer to it from one angle, when I had reason, I think, to criticise the language used by the Minister of Justice in an altogether unjustifiable attempt to swing the members of this House and more particularly of his own province behind the idea that, in some unexplained way, they had an enemy in the leader of the Opposition sitting on this side. I, with as strong language as I could bring to bear on the subject, expressed my opinion then. I wish now to view the matter in another way. I was born on one ocean seaboard and I have spent most of my life on another. I was brought up as a child in a county of New Brunswick which contained a large proportion of French-Canadian people, and some of the dearest friends of my boyhood days and some of my closely associated school mates were boys of that race. I grew to hold them in very high esteem, and I have always entertained the same feelings towards them as were engendered during those youthful days. I conceive it to be the prime duty of any man, to whom the people of this country have entrusted their representation in this House, to endeavour at all times so to conduct and comport himself, so to speak on occasions of public importance which affect these two races, as to assist, if possible, in healing any hard feeling that exists and, if possible to bring about a greater measure of unity and harmony between the two races, so that the time will not be very far distant when, in Canada, speaking two languages, holding possibly largely two creeds, we shall have one united Canadianism, having, as its first and foremost purpose, the common betterment of our common country.

Mr. ALAN WEBSTER NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, we have had various expressions of compliment paid to yourself, to the leaders of the three parties in the House, to the mover and seconder of the Address, and to the lady member; and for the sake of brevity I will simply say that they have each and all my hearty concurrence. As regards the lady member, while I am heartily in sympathy with the remarks that have been made I think that, as time goes on, we shall be led to adopt a somewhat different attitude towards her. It is natural, perhaps, that coming into the House for the first time she should receive a peculiar welcome as the first member of her sex to be elected to this Parliament. As time goes on, however, the attitude which we shall assume in regard to her, and the attitude she herself will desire that we should bear towards her, will, I think, be to treat her as the member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). We shall come to respect her ability, her keenness, her common sense, her energy and the persistence with which she will no doubt work to further the ambitions and the ideals which she entertains. That we shall do rather than pay deference merely to her femininity.

In looking over the House I have been struck by the peculiar, although natural, fact that the age and the appearance of the three parties are reflected in the individual members who respectively constitute them. Here on my right we have the men of substance, both as regards mentality and physique, of the Conservative party, men of gray hairs, the grave and reverend signors, whom we may regard for the moment at least as the statesmen of the past. Opposite, directly behind the leader of the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King), we find identically the same type of men in that party they may be regarded as the statesmen of to-day. But when we come to the third party, the gentlemen who sit on my left, we find that it is composed of, and very largely dominated by, young men. That party is a new one; it is young in the political life of the country, and perhaps it is natural to find that the men who constitute it are also young. To finish the simile, I may refer to them as the statesmen of the future. I do not suggest that it is a demerit in a man or a woman to be young. I was young once myself and wish I were again in my youth. We older men must remember that if we do not give way, at least we should make room for the younger generation. The youth of to-day constitute the driving force and the energy of to-morrow; they are the history makers of the future. I do not say for a moment that we should depreciate the respect we ought to show to hon. gentlemen whose hair is gray or, as in the case of some of us, whose hair is not only gray, but getting scant. We must realize, however, that the coming generation is forging ahead into our places, and we must make way for them or they will make way for themselves. I have great faith in youth,—youth in politics, youth in business and youth in everything. This is the day of the young man. The young men have faults; they are headstrong, impetuous, hasty, perhaps, in action, and impulsive; but they have that energy and driving power that make for progress and action, and it is progress and action we need more than anything else to-day in Canada.

I therefore look with confidence upon the party to the left of me. I would rather see the ship of state manned by young men, inexperienced though they may be, starting out boldly on the sea of life. The weather may be rough, and storms may arise, but they will make headway and get somewhere. At any rate, better that by far than trust our destinies to the ship of state lying in the stagnant waters of the harbour and moldering away with the dry rot of policies of hesitation, vacillation and over-timid caution. For my part, give me men of action who will go into the middle of the stream and try to get somewhere. At all events, they will gain experience in time. I have noted with pleasure the ability shown by these young men on my left as speakers. Without considering the fact that they are here for the first time, we can congratulate them upon the way in which they have acquitted themselves, and in days to come we shall be able slightly to parody the words of Samson and say that out of the producers hath come forth meat and out of the strong hath come forth sweetness. Perhaps the lady member will furnish the sweetness.

Now, it better becomes me to make complimentary remarks about this party, because I am not attached to it. I do not attend its caucus, but I have received kindness from its whip in the matter of arranging my seat in the House. I desire therefore to thank the Progressive party and express my appreciation of the courtesy it has shown me, a political stranger in a political strange land. But while I am not attached to the party, I find myself heartily in accord with a great part of its policies, except, unfortunately, in regard to the tariff. It is perhaps a matter of regret that the leader of the Progressive party was not able to visit British Columbia during the election. Had he done so it is more than probable he would have received greater support than he did. When speaking on the tariff the other day he was at some pains to modify somewhat the impression we had in British Columbia, during the election, that he was an absolutely out and out devotee of free trade. He was at some pains, I say, to modify that view; but I could not help observing, as I listened to the speeches of his lieutenants, more particularly the able one made by the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Johnson) and that of the member for Red Deer (Mr. Speakman), that they, on the other hand, were not at all equivocal in expressing themselves as advocates of free trade first, last and all the time. While that is a natural attitude for them to take, as coming from the prairies—if I were a representative of the prairies I would also be a free trader—but coming as I do from British Columbia, I cannot, I am afraid, follow them in that regard.

British Columbia wants protection. That remark, I notice, gets some little applause from the members from Vancouver. Well, I am glad to establish a point of contact with my Conservative fellow members from British Columbia, but in this case it will be only temporary, because the kind of protection which is wanted in the district from which I come is not the kind of protection my hon. friends want, which is that of the policy advocated and worked for by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. In that regard, if I may be allowed to digress for a moment, I might mention an incident that is typical and indicative of much. Shortly after I was nominated I received a letter from Vancouver, I may mention that Vancouver is not in the district I represent, being probably 150 miles away from it, except for one small portion of the district that runs a little in that direction. I got a letter from a gentleman who represents the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and was resident in Vancouver. The first paragraph of the letter warmly congratulated me upon my nomination. I thought that was all right, and said to myself: "Here is a man, at least, after my own heart." I very soon found, however, that it was not my heart he was after. The second paragraph expressed the hope that I would not misunderstand him when he said that he trusted I should not get in. That was somewhat of a shock. It was rather like Isaac of old, but Isaac, when he blessed Jacob, did not in the next breath revoke the blessing. But I was compelled to acept the dictum—the Lord hath given and the Lord hath taken away, and I managed to swallow that. But when I went on to his next paragraph I got a further shock. He said he felt sure that I would have no trouble in signing a couple of pledges which he enclosed for me—"put your name on the dotted line" sort of business. I am sorry I have not that letter with me, but I have left it at home. I intend to have it framed, Mr. Speaker, as a concrete presentment of the sublimity of human assurance. That is expressing myself in a somewhat classic form. In the West we use more rugged language than you gentlemen in the East, and there we would describe it in two words, each of four letters, with a preposition in between. We would say, It was a something of a something. But as we must try to conform to the culture of the East, I will repeat that I regard it as a concrete presentment of the sublimity of human assurance. I think hon. members will agree with me in that description when I tell them what was in the letter. The first pledge required me entirely and absolutely to vote for high protection for the benefit of the eastern manufacturers. That was not the exact way in which it was worded, for, as you know, these things are put more discreetly. I do not know whether the word "high" was used; probably it was the word "adequate" or something of that kind, but if the English language means anything at all it meant that I was to pledge myself —why I do not know—to vote for high protection for the benefit of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. That was bad enough and I swallowed that more or less with a choke, but when I came to the next pledge it was more exacting still. I was asked to pledge myself absolutely and entirely, then, now and forever, to have no part or lot, in thought, word, deed, or action, with a man whom they designated, and whom I have since ascertained is the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). Had I signed that pledge of so absolutely comprehensive a character, I do not think it would have become me as an honourable man to be buried in the same cemetery with the hon. member, and certainly not in proximity to him. Being of a trusting disposition I naturally believed what the writer said about the hon. member for Marquette. You may have remarked the other day that he himself said—and he should know better than anyone else—that after his experience of his opponents during the campaign he came to the conclusion that he was a very bad man. Is it then any subject for remark that I, not knowing him as well as he knows himself, should have been under the conviction that he was not a man at all, but more or less what our Methodist friends would call "of the devil" —that his human form was merely camouflage and that when I came down here I would find horns growing out of his forehead! When I came down here and my desk-mate told me who the hon. member for Marqette was, I was disappointed to see no horns. I say disappointed advisedly, because when you have made up your mind to the worst it is a disappointment to find your predictions do not come true. But later I noticed two things—that he kept his hat on except on certain occasions, and that he wore his hair very long. I know that he comes from a farming community, and having been a farmer myself I know the custom of farmers to anoint the budding horns of their calves with caustic soda, the result being that a small callous is formed where the horns would otherwise grow. Consequently, the next time the hon. member for Marquette goes to the barber shop I shall keep a keen eye on him to see that there is no development on his head along that line.

Now, Sir, it is not the protection I have alluded to that we want in British Columbia; it is protection for fruit. I agree with a great deal of what the last speaker (Mr. MacKelvie) said with regard to protection of the fruit industry, and I could go further than he went in some of his remarks. We want protection for our coal industry, we want protection for our lumber industry, we want protection for our farm products, and, Sir, the greatest protection of all we want is protection against Asiatic encroachments. I can endorse every word that the hon. member for Yale said in that regard; in fact, I could go a great deal further. I will be conservative in words, if not in party, and say that half our white population have their backs against the wall to-day industrially. The Asiatics in British Columbia have got a throttle hold upon our fishing industry, they are encroaching on the lumber industry, and large sections of the country devoted to fruits and market garden produce are entirely in their grip. The situation is getting so intense that something will have to be done or there will be a development that will astonish the people in the east. Those Asiatics are also going into the store business as well as encroaching on the hotel business. I know the spirit of the East is all right on any subject upon which the people are properly informed, and I am sure they do not understand the seriousness of the Asiatic proposition in the west. Perhaps that is the fault of representatives from British Columbia in the past, and we thirteen members from that province will be sadly lacking in our duty to our constituents, if we do not keep the East, in season and out of season, fully informed on this subject.

It is not my custom to boost,—without being paid for it at any rate,—the wares of somebody else, but I have a book here that I would commend to the attention of this House. I have asked the Librarian to stock half a dozen copies for the use of hon. members. This is my own copy that I have in my hand and I intend to send it over to the leader of the Government with a request that he read it, or at least that he begin to read it, because when he once begins I know he will not stop until he finishes its perusal. I will not send it over to him until I have finished speaking because I know he would be so engrossed in it that I would not continue to have his attention. It is in fictional form, but it is a book of truth dealing with the Asiatic question, particularly with the Japanese phase of it, on our coast to-day. So true is it that the authoress thought fit, on the advice of her lawyers, to insert a clause that the characters in the book are not drawn to life. It is called "The Handwriting on the Wall", and any one can see a very close resemblance to a lot of matters prominent in public affairs in British Columbia in the last few years. It depicts conditions in British Columbia ten years ago, it depicts conditions as they are to-day, and it depicts conditions as they will be ten years hence provided, she says, a government can be found in British Columbia venal and corrupt enough to give the Japanese the vote. That may seem like a scare line, but, Sir, I tell you Japanese voted in the last general election in British Columbia, and we do not know how soon some party seeking for campaign funds will not grant them the franchise. I earnestly commend to the leader of the Government and to the leader of the Opposition and to every other member of this House, especially the western ones, a perusal of this book.

If you will bear with me for a moment I will speak a word on my own position in the House, I trust for the first and last time. In some respects I hold a rather unique position inasmuch as I believe I am the only Independent elected to this House. Other Independents are either Progressive Independents or Liberal Independents, and they have more or less, I think, dropped into their respective parties. I do not blame them for doing so, that is their natural course, but I happened to be elected by an entirely independent convention of those opposed to the late Meighen Government. At that convention were represented Liberals, Socialists, soldiers, farmers, labour men, and, I blush not to say, Conservatives,—they were all represented at that convention and they all supported me. Therefore, while I owe no obedience to any party, yet I am much indebted to the representatives of every party individually for my election, and that puts me in a somewhat different position to that occupied by other hon. members. I think Scott, speaking of the French courtiers of his day, used the lines:

> Who walk ambition's diamond ridge,
> Where stoutest hearts have failed;

indicating that the ridge was so fine, so diamond-pointed, that they had to be exceedingly careful lest they fell to one side or the other. And that is the trouble that confronts me: lest I be led astray,—being, as I have said, of a simple and confiding disposition—into supporting one party as a party rather than as a principle. The only way I can get out of that difficulty is to confront it when any question comes up and to ask myself: Is this measure in the interests of the constituency I represent or the province I come from? If the answer is in the affirmative, then I think I can say it will also be for the benefit of Canada and that I can safely vote for it.

From my seat here I occupy a rather strategic position. I have my friends the Conservatives on one side of me and the Progressives on the other; with one ear I can listen to the counsels and obtain the benefit of the wisdom and experience of these Conservative statesmen, and with the other I can draw inspiration from the youth and virility of the Progressive party. But I must confess that I am slightly deaf in one of my ears, and it happens to be the ear next to my Conservative friends. The deafness, however, is only slight, Sir. As for my Liberal friends opposite, I shall judge them not by their speeches and not by their programme but simply and entirely by their actions. The right hon. leader of the Opposition, (Mr. Meighen) in his speech the other day, to which I listened with a great deal of pleasure, because it was to me an intellectual treat—the caustic humour and keen analysis which characterize his remarks interested me quite a little—spent a good deal of his time in trying to prove that hon. members on the other side, especially those in the ministry, were acting or were likely to act in a manner inconsistent with their utterances of some months or years ago. That may or may not be so, but I am prepared at this stage to let the dead past bury its dead and act upon the scriptural maxim: "By their fruits ye shall know them." It is upon what the Liberals do, not upon what they say, that I shall judge them.

Now the convention that nominated me gave me a free hand. I was to be opposed to the Meighen Government, and I knew that that first pledge would be easily fulfilled. After the Meighen Government was disposed of, I was to be given a free hand to support any government or any coalition, —it appearing to us at that time that there might be a coalition. But there is always a string, you know; I did have a string tied to me, in the shape of a platform drawn up by the convention, to which I am committed to give my support. When I came down here and began to compare notes with my fellow-members I found I was not in such a position of political isolation as I had expected: I found that the planks of the platform I was pledged to were very much in common with those of members on the Liberal as well as on the Progressive side. I believe also that I am in absolute sympathy with every Conservative member for British Columbia as well on one point at least. Now, if you will excuse me, Sir, I will quote the platform: to do so will not be an onerous business, and not many hon. gentlemen have had the courage to produce their platforms in the House. I am so simple-minded that I carry this platform about with me and in leisure moments I take it out and gauge how much progress I have made toward its achievement. I always get hope and encouragement when I notice that the first clause is: "Opposition to the Meighen Government." The success on that point gives me courage to go on to the other planks: "Abolition of purse seine and trap licenses." This applies to the fishing industry, a very vital question in British Columbia. The next is: "Licenses"—that is, fishing licenses—"to be granted only to white British subjects." Then the platform proceeds:

3. Immigration. Absolute exclusion of Asiatics.

4. Dominion enactment of the British Columbia eight hour law.

5. The passing of an old age pension Act.

6. (a) Extension of time on payments due under the Dominion Soldier Settlement Act.

(b) More considerate treatment of disabled soldiers, their widows and dependents.

7. The elimination of overlapping of areas covered by federal and provincial police.

That last means that we want the Royal Canadian Mounted Police removed from British Columbia in order to save expense; they are no longer needed. The last plank is: "A federal inheritance tax on large estates." I commend that suggestion to the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding); it cannot now be said that no one has suggested a method by which we can get increased revenue.

Now this is a simple platform and not unreasonable, I think, in many respects. The important planks are those with reference to the restriction of Japanese control of the fishing industry, the immigration of Asiatics, the eight hour law, old age pensions. The others are more or less minor matters. If the Government can see their way clear to bring down legislation of this kind—if the Government will do it, I should say, for I know they can,—they will have my support. And when I suggest that the Government take action in these matters, I mean exactly that—the putting of legislation on the statute books. We do not want to have somebody standing up here and proposing an academic resolution or flourishing a flag and saying: We stand for a white British Columbia. Mr. Speaker, we in British Columbia are sick to death of seeing and hearing people who "stand for a white British Columbia." The time for that has passed; we want them to stop standing, pick up their feet, move ahead, make some progress toward bringing about a white British Columbia. Therefore I stress the point that if the Government will put legislation covering these points into concrete form and pass it, they can count on my hearty support; and they will get not only my vote and what small influence I possess, but the influence and the goodwill and the support in the future of eighty per cent of the people of British Columbia. There can be no question about that; the matters I have touched upon are of vital importance to the people of our province. It is eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and I am willing to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER: I understand that there is an agreement between the whips that the House shall adjourn at eleven o'clock whenever possible. If the hon. member intends to make more extensive remarks, he may wish to adjourn the debate, but it is a matter entirely for him.

On the motion of Mr. Neill the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 11 p.m.

The House met at three o'clock.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. McMurray for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Thursday, March 16.

Mr. NEILL (resuming): When the House rose last evening I was about to take some points in the Speech from the Throne. The first point to which I wish to draw attention is that section of the Speech which deals with unemployment. I consider the unemployment question has two phases as dealt with in this speech. The first is in reference to the obligation to relieve the distress caused by unemployment, and the other is the necessity to take steps to prevent unemployment. The Government claim that the matter of the relief of those absolutely destitute is fundamentally a municipal and provincial responsibility. I am not in a position to dispute that statement, and, as it has not been dealt with by the leader of the Opposition, I assume the statement is correct; but I hold the Government entirely responsible for taking steps to do away with unemployment, though they do not deal with the question of relief. In that regard I wish to quote just a few words from a debate in the British House of Commons. One of the members of the cabinet said, speaking about unemployment—

> He thought the speech of the Prime Minister had denoted the fact that Parliament had concurred in the view and accepted the task of governing the people of this country by providing the masses with two conditions, employment and contentment.

Another member of the government, G. M. Barnes, said, speaking on the same subject—

> The classes who have the running of this country would be judged in proportion as they could find organized employment for the great mass of the people.

I think that is a very well-founded theory of the unemployment situation to-day, and I consider that if the Government could take such steps as would lead, so to speak, to the abolition of unemployment, it would be not only good statesmanship but good political expediency;—after all, the practical politician always keeps one eye on the ballot box. We all know that a contented voter is a Government voter. If times are good and work plentiful, the average voter will not desire a change of Government, but our experience is that when a voter becomes discontented he is ready at once to take a chance on a change of Government. Unemployment is so universal now that it has gone beyond a national question, and has become an international question. Each nation has endeavoured to solve the question for itself, generally by building up high tariff walls to keep their people employed, within the boundaries of each nation. I believe wider action will have to be taken, before world-wide unemployment will disappear. It may be that I have a fantastic idea as to the remedy, but I hold that the only way to handle the unemployment situation is for all nations, without exception, to cancel their war debts. I read a treatise the other day by an American professor in one of the economic colleges. It is called "America and the Balance Sheets of Europe". It goes very fully into this question, taking each nation in turn, and shows that these nations are heading, not slowly but rapidly, towards bankruptcy. He shows that in many states the income is as low as 28 per cent of expenditure, and he asks where this is going to end. He states that one of two things have to be done by these nations, either they will have to add to their debt, which will make a worse budget for them, or issue more paper money, which is equally disastrous. He points out, after a very well-studied exposition of the subject, that the only solution is for the nations of the world to cancel their debts universally, and, though an American professor, he suggests that the first step should be taken by America, because she has most to gain. He points to the anomalous and almost absurd position, that every nation in the world is demanding that Germany, and every nation, should pay what they owe in money, and they refuse to accept payment in the only manner in which Germany could possibly pay, and that is in goods. Germany says: "We have not a gold reserve to pay you, and we will pay you in goods"—The other nations say: "We do not want your goods". France has to a very small extent accepted some goods as reparation in connection with the damage to the devastated area, but it is a very small and restricted amount. The other nations absolutely refuse to take the goods. Germany says: "We are willing to work long hours at low wages; our currency has depreciated; we can land our goods in your market at a very low price, if you will allow us to sell you those goods in payment for our debt." But the nations will not accept these goods, and build up tariff walls against them. If the nations were content to cancel the war debts, there would be such a demand for manufactured articles that it would go far to do away with unemployment. That is a theory it perhaps does not become me to enunciate in this House at the present time.

The next item in the Speech from the Throne is the statement that the Government has taken steps to obtain better and wider markets, and this refers particularly to trade with Australia. I am particularly interested in that branch of the subject and I hope the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he makes the treaty with Australia, will not forget to take into consideration the pulp and paper industry. Australia has a preferential tariff with the Mother Country on paper. If that tariff were extended to Canada it would be of the very greatest benefit to the paper and pulp industry, especially on the Pacific coast. I think there are some six large paper mills in British Columbia, four of them are in my district, and they employ a large body of men. There are two towns associated with those mills, and there are also logging camps, in which a large number of men are employed directly and indirectly by the industry. Two of the four mills are shut down, and the other two are running at half capacity. If this arrangement with Australia be carried out, of our getting the same preferential rate on paper as is given to the Old Country, it would give a tremendous stimulus to the paper mills of British Columbia and would to a large extent help the unemployment situation there.

We come now to the question of railway rates. There is a suggestion that some measure of relief may be obtained, or will shortly be obtained, in connection with railway rates. If this is anything more than a mere vague reference to the subject, if there is any established knowledge behind that, or any certain belief that this can be accomplished, if I had been drawing up the Speech, instead of putting this in an obscure corner of a paragraph, I would have displayed it in great, big letters two inches long, right across the Speech. Reduction of freight rates is one of the most important and immediately pressing matters that can be carried out in this House at the present time.

I should like to mention an incident; it is only an incident; but it can be duplicated, no doubt, in a thousand cases. This ocurred in my own riding. In the valley of Alberni, in which I live, there is a saw mill located at Port Alberni. It is not a very big mill as we in British Columbia regard saw mills; but it has a capacity that allowed it to send, not three cars, but three great trains a week of lumber into the prairies. This lumber was all consigned to the prairies, going out regularly three trains a week, with occasionally an extra train. In the fall of 1920, increased freight rates suddenly went into effect. Inside of three weeks that mill was shut down—that was about October—and it was not opened again until the following June. When it did begin to ship again, not one stick of lumber went over that railroad en route to the prairies; it is all going by water route to the Orient. That condition of affairs can be duplicated in, not one mill, but hundreds of mills in British Columbia. That gives an illustration of what high freight rates do as regards promoting or preventing trade. It contains a moral also for the railway company. That railway company are still running freight trains into that district, two trains a week; but for the most part they bring in empty cars and for the most part they take empty cars out. There is a little local freight, a few carloads of fish and so on; but for the most part those railway trains are running nearly as regularly as before, and they are carrying practically nothing. Would it not be far better to carry the lumber that was available for carrying, even at reduced freight rates? It is a matter of fact that any business or any railway can always secure a certain quantity of what might be called the irreducible minimum of traffic. If the corner grocery sells a loaf of bread at double the price at which it can be obtained at another grocer's store six blocks down town, it will always catch a certain trade, those who are in a hurry or in certain circumstances. That is the irreducible minimum. The railway that holds up its rates to a high extent will always catch that measure of trade that it is absolutely imperative must go over the road, and any railway will get that; but no industry or no railway ever paid its way on the irreducible minimum of trade or traffic; it is only the extra business, after the overhead is paid, that makes it profitable either to a business or a railway. When they cut down their freight rates and get the extra business, they get beyond the irreducible minimum and down to a profitable basis.

Some hon. members may be familiar with the London and Brighton railway which is a fairly large railway in the Old Country. In its report of last year it says that, owing to the high fares, nine million fewer passengers were carried. That is, not that nine million passengers were carried, but that nine million fewer were carried owing to the high passenger fares, and that is on a little railway running between London and Brighton. That is a specimen of what business one is likely to lose by increasing freight or passenger rates above what the traffic will stand.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Is there not an agreement now in existence in conection with the Crow's Nest Pass that expires in a short time, and that is responsible for the increase given a short time ago causing those high rates of which my hon. friend complains? When does that agreement expire?

Mr. NEILL: So far as my memory goes, I think it expires some time this year—in June or July; and I earnestly hope the Government will take such steps as not to perpetuate it.

We now come to that much vexed and wearisome subject of the tariff. I will, however, promise hon. members that I will try to attack it from a somewhat different angle. I have in my hand, I think, a whole compendium of a great deal of wisdom on the tariff, comprised in two short sentences, which, I think, ought to be printed and hung up in every hall, committee room and office in this building. This is not my own composition:

1. That free trade and protection offer an interminable case for counsel on both sides.

That is one postulate.

2. That it is perfectly easy for anyone who takes the trouble to study both sides to make out a good case for either.

If hon. members appreciated those two axiomatic propositions, what a lot of trouble and discussion would be saved! I heartily agree with the first proposition, and for that reason I do not, for one moment, propose to endeavour to convert any hon. member to my way of thinking on the tariff question. When hon. members from the prairies say that they are in favour of free trade, I am perfectly willing to accept their word; I do not need to be convinced about the matter. I am willing to believe they know their business best and what would be best for that section. The tariff question is not a political one, but a geographical one, and you cannot change a man's belief, supposing you talked to him from now to Doomsday. The only way to change his belief would be to change his environment. If you take an Ontario manufacturer and transplant him into the district which these hon. gentlemen represent, you will see how soon he too will become a free trader. The converse holds good; put a man from the prairies into British Columbia or Quebec, and he will very soon have a change of tariff belief. But until that is done it is useless to try to convert hon. members, because they are most familiar with conditions in their part of the country, and surely they know best. Even if we could find some weakling who allowed his opinion to be changed by any poor argument that might be advanced, that would not amount to much, because every hon. member is, I am sure, pledged to his constituents in some measure on the tariff, and he would be bound to vote in accordance with the wishes of those who elected him. I will not, therefore, give my own opinion on this question: I will only state what we in British Columbia, or at least, the section which I represent, want and as to that I will quote, if you will permit me, a very few words from a manifesto which I issued at the time of my election. It comprises my sentiments in a very few words:

The Tariff will not be settled on political but on geographical lines as each section of the country wants a different tariff. The result will be a compromise.

Will it not be that? It always has been; indeed, it always will be. The result will be a compromise and therefore:

I will join heartily with the other British Columbia members in endeavouring to get as good terms as possible for British Columbia, that is a somewhat lower tariff on the manufactured goods we buy and such a duty on live materials we sell as will enable us to live and maintain B.C. as a White Man's country.

I was speaking then to the electors of the Comox-Alberni district, and of course I had their interests at heart. We want a tariff, as the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie) said yesterday, on fruit. I will leave him to deal with that. We want not so much a tariff as protection—I would almost call it common honesty—on eggs. I would like to explain that. There is a small tariff on eggs, and the farmers do not ask that that tariff be increased. They are making a simple, modest request that imported eggs be subject to the same laws as our eggs are subjected to. Is that an extravagant demand—free trade or protection? Surely it is protection of the right kind. Hon. gentlemen who do not understand the situation will hardly believe that the situation is this. In Canada, there is a strict Egg Inspection Act. If I ship a carload of eggs from British Columbia to Montreal, they are not allowed to leave my station until they are inspected by an inspector of the Dominion Government and passed according to a strict standard. I know a case where a carload of eggs was being shipped to Montreal. It did not come up to the Government grade and was therefore rejected. The sale fell through and the man at the other end, in Montreal, bought American eggs, ungraded and un-standardized, and at a lower price, with which he filled the order. All that the egg producers, those of the West at least, are asking, is that imported eggs shall be standardized the same as our eggs are. Surely that is not unreasonable. There was a meeting of egg producers and wholesale men the other day, at which, I thought, the wholesale men took a most selfish attitude. It was going to cause them some little trouble to change their system of handling eggs, and one of the arguments brought forward was the old time-honoured one that the Americans would not ship any eggs to this country if we put such horrible restrictions upon them,—horrible restrictions to which we ourselves have been subject for years. Well, we need not worry about that. Inside of four days after notice goes to the American importer here that he is to have his eggs standardized in accordance with the Canadian grade system, the regulations will be put into effect, and the eggs that enter this country will be standardized according to Canadian regulation. I do not think that this is at all unreasonable; we have a right to ask that the imported eggs should be subject to the same conditions as are imposed upon the local product.

Then we come to another brand of imported eggs, namely, Chinese eggs, from fowls fed on garbage under conditions such as I could not even mention in this House, although the records are there to be ascertained. The eggs are shipped here and consumed in this country. Some five thousand cases were imported into Montreal the other day, and it is satisfactory to me to know—seeing that we in British Columbia are suffering from the inroads of the Asiatics—that some of these eggs were consumed in Ottawa and were bought at prices paid for the best local eggs. That is a proven fact. In connection with Chinese eggs, we are not asking, as we might very well, with justification, demand, that these be prohibited as a menace to the health of the people of Canada. We simply ask that when Mrs. Housewife chooses to buy eggs, if she wants to get Chinese eggs she shall have an opportunity of seeing just what she is getting. We can then leave it to the good sense, and, perhaps, the patriotism, of the Canadian woman to make her choice between the best fresh eggs and Chinese eggs. To come back to the question of standardization of American eggs, is it not, as one man expressed it, a matter of protection in reverse gear? We are protecting the importer at the expense of the local man.

Now I come to the question of butter. I do not know whether there is a tariff on butter; perhaps the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) can tell me whether there is or not. If there is, it is a comparatively small one, and the farmer is not asking for any increase on that. What he is asking for is protection against oleomargarine. Oleomargarine was for many years prohibited in Canada because it was felt to be unfit for invalids and children. During the stressful times of the war, however, when butter was scarce and it was necessary to export as much as possible to France, the importation of oleomargarine was allowed. But it was never suggested that it was to be permitted to be used as a substitute for butter, for it is not such, it is only an imitation, and as that it was allowed to come in for consumption during that time. It is made from vegetable oils grown under tropical or semi-tropical conditions by cheap negro labour. When the war was over, the farmer in Canada naturally expected to be relieved of that competition. I saw a notice in the paper the other day that some one had said that oleomargarine ought to be allowed to be sold for the benefit of the poor; and by way of proof—a most inadequate proof I thought—it was contended that it was not hurting the butter industry in view of the fact that since 1919 more butter was being shipped to Europe than before. That only goes to prove, if it proves anything at all, that the producers of butter in Canada are being forced to seek outside markets by reason of the unfair competition from oleomargarine in the home market. But apart altogether from the question of protecting home industries, I say that, on purely humanitarian grounds, for the safeguarding of the health of the people, the use of oleomargarine should be prohibited. And I may say, Sir, that it is a well known fact that it is not the poor people at large who use oleomargarine; they have too little money to spend on such stuff as that, they have to buy butter simply because it is the most economical. No; it is the profiteers who use it,—they feed it to their servants and dependents. In the city of Rochester—a city which, I understand, is rather prominent in the promotion of sanitary and allied questions—there is an orphan home where, during the war, they were driven, like ourselves, to use oleomargarine. It is the custom there to weigh the children regularly, and I have the record of one experiment. This is not an experiment that was made by the cow keepers in British Columbia or anywhere else in Canada; it was made by the city of Rochester, in the state of New York, where the people do not care two pins about our problems. They took seven children as a trial batch for experimental purposes. In the first six months these children were fed butter and they gained twenty-three pounds—I leave out the decimal points. During the next six months they were still fed on butter and the gain had increased to forty-four pounds. For the next six months they were fed on oleomargarine, the diet being otherwise the same. The result was a loss of nine pounds. In the next period butter was again used and the children made a gain of fifty-eight pounds. Now, that is an official report from the city of Rochester, and in view of it I say it would be only fair if we prohibited the use of oleomargarine. We believe it is detrimental to the health of young children. But apart from that important ground, I contend that, from the standpoint of the unfair competition it involves, the Minister of Agriculture should put his foot down on this manufacture and stop it. It may be said that Canadian dairymen ought to be able to compete in the markets of the world. Well, we are willing to compete in those markets, and we are prepared to pit our Canadian cow against her cousin in the United States or in New Zealand; but we do not think it is fair to compel the Canadian cow—I had almost said the Christian Canadian cow—to compete against a heathen nigger in the Central American republics or Southern states.

Now we come to another subject in connection with the tariff, and that is our coal mines. There are on Vancouver Island some five thousand men engaged in the coal mining industry, and with their dependents we must multiply this number by at least five to ascertain the total number dependent on this industry. Two of the mines are in the district represented by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Dickie) and he will no doubt deal with those. The mines in which I am interested are situated in Cumberland, where there is a population of 3,000 to 4,000. All last winter and most of last summer they were working only three days a week, and with the reduced pay now given to coal miners, and in view of the high cost of living, these men need not worry about the price of gilt-edged securities for the investment of any surplus funds. Their situation indeed closely approximates want. If there is any extra call upon their purse for sickness or anything of that kind it means that they must go into debt. It is important therefore to know why they are working only three days a week. The reason is very obvious and cannot be denied; it is because of the competition from fuel oil. That oil is imported al most entirely from the United States Some people think that fuel oil and crude oil are synonymous terms, but they are not. Crude oil is the natural product as it comes out of the well; fuel oil is the crude oil after certain valuable elements, such as gasoline, benzine and distillate, have been extracted. There is some fuel oil made at the Ioco refinery, but it is a comparatively small amount and is readily absorbed in the neighbourhood. The great bulk of commercial fuel oil used in British Columbia is directly imported as such from the States, and if a sufficient duty were imposed to make it more costly to use that oil, it would give a tremendous stimulus to the coal mines of British Columbia and Vancouver Island generally. We ask that a duty of two cents a gallon be imposed on fuel oil. It is not a very heavy duty, surely, and would be amply sufficient to meet the situation. It would mean six days' work a week to these thousands of coal miners, it would mean prosperity for those depending on the mines and for the industries associated with them, and it would constitute a great measure of relief from the unemployment under which the province of British Columbia is now suffering.

Mr. CARROLL: Is this fuel oil used in British Columbia for domestic or for manufacturing purposes?

Mr. NEILL: It is used, as far as I know, almost entirely for heating apartment houses and running locomotives. A great deal is also consumed, I regret to say, on our steamboats. Very little of this oil is used for domestic purposes. The imposition of this duty would not hurt any other industry, and it would not raise the price of gasoline or distillate, the volume of fuel oil manufactured in British Columbia being comparatively trivial.

In that connection I should like to remind the House that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), the late Minister of Trade and Commerce, toured my riding during the recent campaign in the interests of Mr. Clements, the then Government candidate, and naturally in the course of his tour he showered jewels of promise wherever he went. He was the most promising man I ever saw in that connection, promises fell from him like water from a watering cart in our streets on a dusty day—and, I might add, the effects were about as ephemeral. Perhaps it is more appropriate that I should say promises fell around like manna from Heaven, and in the course of his tour through the district this bountiful Santa Claus I have been told—I would not guarantee the accuracy of my information—promised at one place an aeroplane postal service. Does the hon. member recollect making that promise?

Mr. STEVENS: No, indeed, I do not.

Mr. NEILL: I thought that was what the hon. gentleman would say. I am reminded by this incident how often we find in our course through life that the problems of human life can best be solved by resorting to the wisdom of the prophets of old. I think it was Solomon who said that in the multitude of counsellors there is wisdom. And in the multiplicity of promises is there forgetfulness! I leave it to you, Sir, and to the House to judge what a profligacy of promises he must have pledged himself to when he has forgotten such an extravagant promise as this. But, Sir, I must be frank—and I am always frank, especially when I cannot be otherwise—I will admit that the hon. member for Vancouver Centre did make a hit in one part of my constituency. In the city of Cumberland Mr. Clements, the government candidate, secured a majority of 181 out of a total vote of some 700 or 800, and for that result he was largely indebted to the actions of my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre. I may mention incidentally that outside of places with votes of not more than 50 that was the only place in the whole vast riding in which Mr. Clements did secure a majority. In places where there were only a few votes, composed mostly of government henchmen, he did get a majority, more particularly in some of the northern parts of the riding where I was not able to go because my campaign was very short; in those places where his cannery friends were located he invariably secured a majority. In this connection I should like to tell the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) that those same cannery men who worked so hard and gave their time, influence and money in support of the then government candidates throughout British Columbia, are the self-same gentlemen who are besieging his office to-day asking for favours that they are not entitled to, favours which their then government friends on this side, to their credit be it stated, continually refused them. The voice may be a little different, it may be the voice of Esau, but the soul is the soul of Jacob. If you wish any concrete evidence of the way in which the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries is being persecuted by this vicious lobby, you have only to look at his shrunken, wasted appearance to realize that the importunity he is subjected to hardly permits him to get his meals.

Coming back to the Cumberland vote, I should like to offer an analysis of the nature of that vote, because the hon. leader of the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King) might call Cumberland a Tory stronghold—a term which I would not use—and account for the result in that way; but the facts are very different. As a matter of fact, Cumberland is the last place, to my mind, for a Tory to expect favors from because it is composed of very intelligent electors. The class of men there, are miners and, as I said before, mostly Scotch miners. A great many of them are Socialists, and I may say that a large number of those that formed my committee in Cumberland were Socialists. I have the very greatest respect for the Socialism those men talk. Their brand of Socialism is nothing to be laughed at; on the contrary, it is a well thought out theory of economic laws which we perhaps sooner or later will have to consider. At any rate, I want to emphasize that they are a fine type of intelligent men. Why did such intelligent men vote for my opponent? There must have been a reason. Was it because the hon. member for Vancouver Centre assured them on his knightly honour that the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) was going to be returned to power? I do not think so, because they did not believe it. Well then, was it because he assured them in the most positive terms that he had been here and found that the main support of the Conservative government would be withdrawn if Mr. Clements were not returned from the district of Comox-Alberni? I do not know whether that was the reason, or whether it was because he pledged his assurance that he had positive information that Mr. Clements would be elected on the 6th day of December—he was very nearly elected, had he got only 1,300 votes more he would have been returned. I do not think it was any of those reasons. I think it was primarily and directly because the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, speaking as a Cabinet Minister, pledged himself and the government that if they were returned to power they would put an increased duty on fuel oil. That was the inducement that caused those intelligent men to vote the way they did, and I for one am not inclined to blame them. Hon. gentlemen, after what I have said of these intelligent voters of Cumberland, will recognize the kind of economic pressure that must have been put on them before they would have voted contrary to their inclinations, and I believe that it was in order to get this necessary boon of an increased duty on fuel oil. I might say that Mr. Clements was persona non grata with them; it certainly was not a question of voting for the man but of voting for the promise made by a prominent member of the Government. I earnestly hope that he will from his place in the House uphold the stand he took in that riding and see that the increase is granted. So well do I know him to be a man of his word that I feel—indeed, I almost fear—that if the Finance Minister does not grant that increase of duty the hon. member will deem it his duty to resign his seat as a protest against the policy of the Government—the only protest he can make because of the failure of the Government to carry out the pledges which he made on behalf of the government to be.

By the way, they gave me a banquet in Cumberland after the election, which was attended by many of my friends as well as by some of those who were against me. Among other things I asked a man who was there why they did not take my word for it rather than the word of the hon. gentleman, because I, too, promised that if elected I would press for an increased duty, and they might just as well have put their money on me as on my hon. friend. The explanation I got was something like this—I do not guarantee it, because it was only one man's opinion: "Well, we were in a hole economically; we were up against it; we had to help ourselves, and I am afraid the boys thought they would play a sort of safe game. We felt that if the Conservatives got into power, and we had supported them in Cumberland, for shame's sake they would give us what they had promised; but we feared that if they got into power and we had thrown them down, they have such a crude conception of statesmanship they would not deliver the goods; on the other hand, we felt that if you were elected personally and the Liberals got into power you would be decent enough to assist us and that the Liberal Government, having a wider conception of true statesmanship, would give us justice." So that after that striking tribute to the belief of these men in the traditions of the Liberal party I feel that I cannot do better than leave the case in the hands of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, with the assumption that they will give us justice—that is, if justice means an increase of two cents a gallon in the duty.

Now, Sir, we come to the question of railways. I note that the Government are going to make an honest trial of government ownership. Well, I do not deny them that right; I suppose under the circumstances it is the best thing they can do, the only line of policy they can follow. But for myself, Sir, I must confess to having no very hopeful anticipation as to what the result will be. The government is a body designed primarily for the administration of the country's affairs, not for the conducting of a business. The governmental body is unwieldy in itself and is poorly equipped for carrying on these business enterprises. Moreover, there is a constant change of personnel which makes a continuous policy very difficult to carry out. Members of government are too prone to respond to waves of popular feeling, and there is the ever present danger involved in political interest. Does any hon. member within the sound of my voice think that if there was an election to-morrow and the fate or even the prestige of the Government hung in the balance, and it was thought necessary in order to carry the election to promise a railway into some particular district, or a few additional stations, or a lower rate on wheat or potatoes—does any hon. gentleman think that these promises would not be made? If there is anybody in this House who thinks that such promises would not be promptly made under those conditions, he has my sympathy, and I think his friends should consult an alienist.

Just as a little instance of how these things work out, I may say that those hon. members who have come here for the first time must all be struck by the manner in which the government offices are scattered around this town. You go down to see a Cabinet minister, and after much prayer and fasting you are admitted; then you find that the matter in which you are interested necessitates a visit to one of his deputies. You go to see the deputy, who is anywhere from half a mile to a mile and a half away, and the chances are that the other one is just as far off in another direction. One cannot help reflecting upon the impossibility of a corporation like the Canadian Pacific or a large steel trust conducting their business with their offices so distributed. It is not the fault of the present government, I know, or probably of the last. We heard a great deal from the right hon. leader of the Opposition the other day about the word "co-ordination." He wanted to know what it meant and how it could be carried out. There seems to be a good deal of doubt in the minds of hon. members as to just what co-ordination means. It is true that the Government themselves have not been in the co-ordinating business very long, but before they try their prentice hand at the co-ordination of the railways I suggest that it would be a good experiment to co-ordinate the government buildings in this city.

The word "co-ordination" has a fine sound; it reminds me of the experiences of my boyhood days in connection with the Shorter Catechism. Some of the phrases I still have in mind; "justification by faith; sanctification by grace; justification by works," and so on. All these sonorous phrases come back to us in times like these. As regards government ownership of railways, it may be that their state operation is justified by faith, but I very much doubt whether they will ever be justified by works.

There is another circumstance which makes me prone to doubt the advisability of plunging into a scheme of government ownership. As a young man I spent a number of years in New Zealand. There they had an even bigger white elephant than we have here, because their railways were not only government-owned—but,—Lord help them—politically constructed. A more disastrous condition it would be hard for the human mind to conceive. Well, they borrowed millions of pounds from the Old Country, and then, human nature being the same south of the equator as north of it, every member had to grab for his district as much of that loan as he could get. It did not matter whether his district already had a railway and did not need any more funds; he had to "make good with the boys." The consequence was that railways were scattered all over the country to a far greater extent than they are here. Not only were they put where they were not wanted, but they were laid out in a most peculiar manner. Suppose, for instance, that a railway was to be constructed from my seat to that of the hon. leader of the Government, and it had suddenly been discovered that the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) had some political pull with the Government—indeed, perhaps that is true to-day. Well, the railway would start off with the honest intention of going direct from my seat toward that of the hon. leader of the House, but when it got a certain distance within influence of the magnetic attraction of the hon. member for Marquette it would proceed to his residence or estate, and then come back. It was no uncommon occurrence in that country for a man to lose the train at one station and drive on a few miles further and pick it up somewhere else. These are actual conditions, Sir; I myself have seen them. As was the case in Canada, rates were jumped when the squeal of the politicians was heard, and the farmers were actually hauling their wool in wagons—ox wagons in many cases—distances of thirty, forty or fifty miles, at the same cost as that of transporting it over the railway, as a protest against the methods employed. In fact, conditions got so bad that the people of New Zealand actually contemplated—it was advocated in the press and on the platform—the repudiation of the whole railway indebtedness. As a matter of making a fresh start they sent to the Old Country for an expert railway man and gave him full control—a ten or twenty-years' job. They said: "Go to it"—and he did go to it. He closed off the inefficient and unnecessary lines, dismissed one-third of the government officials, cut down the expense of operating, and ran it like a business man's railway; and eventually it did pay a small interest on the money invested. To my mind, only by doing something of that kind with our railways in Canada can we really accomplish anything. Go to the States and get an expert railway man. I am not decrying our railway men when I suggest that we should go to the States for an expert; I only say that because I believe it would eliminate the suspicion that would otherwise attach to any Canadian railway man, of representing a political party or association or group, who should endeavour to carry out this work. Get an expert railway man from the United States, put him in such a position that he would only be removable by the joint vote of Parliament, and give him a free hand to see if he can possibly make it pay. I shall be only too pleased if the Government can make this thing pay. Miracles happened eighteen hundred years ago and there is nothing in theological dogmas to forbid them happening again, but I rather fear it will be like the answer given by the Scotchman who, when asked if prohibition was likely to carry in Scotland, said, "Well it might, but it's no likely."

One hon. gentleman drew a comparison between the profits to be derived from the railways and the profits made by selling liquor. I am afraid the two do not coordinate very well together. It is true that if you take enough of the one you will feel competent to run the other, but I do not think the comparison is otherwise a good one. As you know, the railway is a necessity, and the other thing is more or less of a luxury to most people, and a very expensive one. We all know that it is a peculiar trait of human nature that we kick to the last cent about the cost of our necessaries, but never kick about the cost of our luxuries. It is for that reason we make a fuss about the price of coal and the amount our wives burn, but very little about the consumption or the cost of the cigars we burn. It is a peculiar psychological fact in human nature that we do not mind any price for our luxuries, but are very stringent in the matter of necessaries. Now the railway is a necessity, and the other thing is a luxury.

My hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean), speaking the other day, said—and this fact comes home to some of us in the West—that they had had trouble in Ontario where boat and rail service met. He said that as the Railway Commission reduced the rates on the railway, the boat service put up its rates. We have somewhat similar conditions in the West. Not long ago when the people of Alberni kicked about their railway and boat service to Vancouver—it is partly by boat and partly by rail, both services being under the one company—they were told unblushingly, first of all by the railway, that they could not control the boat rates, and then they were told by the Railway Commissioners that the Commission had no control over the boat service. The way to remedy that is that advocated by the hon. member for South York—bring our coastal boat service under the control of the Railway Commission, and it would then be able to handle a situation of that kind where a joint service is being run in an inadequate way. In order that I may be able to obtain some support from the British Columbia members in advocating such a step, I might say that if this step were taken the railway pass given us by the Government would be good on the Canadian Pacific boats, which they are not at present—but that, of course, is only incidental.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Is it not a fact now that the traffic charges of all these boat services run in connection with railways are subject to revision and control by the Railway Board?

Mr. NEILL: I think they are so subject on the Great Lakes, but not in British Columbia, where they run a coastal service; I am sure as to British Columbia, where we have this coastal service.

I now come to the question of immigration. I must confess at once I am not much in favor of increased immigration at this time. It seems to me it is a good deal like the man who thought he would benefit by following the advice that is given by some newspapers as to what shares to buy—there are people like that. He was advised to buy a thousand shares of a certain oil company at one dollar per share. He bought in the expectation of a rise, but in a few weeks he wrote to the editor that the shares had gone down until they were worth only a cent apiece and he wanted advice. The editor wrote back and said, "Buy one hundred thousand shares at a cent, and then the average price of your shares will be reduced accordingly." The case is somewhat the same with immigration. We have two hundred thousand men idle in Canada now, and are seeking to relieve the situation by bringing in a whole lot more. There is one thing I would ask the Government to do, and that is to keep away from the idea of having settlers from different countries establish a colony by themselves in Canada. That has always proved a mistake in the past. If you bring in a body of men from England or Scotland or elsewhere in Europe, and dump them on the prairies by themselves, they will become not a piece of Canada, but a piece of England or Bohemia or Austria. That is not a desirable way to build up Canada. Mix them up amongst our own people, and then they will become assimilated. I take this position: that the Government will spend a lot of money in bringing these men out, possibly money will be paid by the Old Country, and another large sum, no doubt, for putting these settlers on the land; a further sum will have to be forthcoming to provide them with implements and stock until they are on their feet. All I ask is that the Government take this land scheme and offer it to our unemployed. I am sure they would be surprised to find how many would take advantage of it. I know it is popular to say that the unemployed are all idle bums, and so on. I know that a great many of them would not care to go on the land, but a great many people in work to-day would be glad to go on the land, and if they had the opportunity, they would make way for some of the unemployed to take their positions in the city. Times are changing, and have changed, in that regard. I know the case of a man who has been on the land for three years. He was a carpenter working at $7 a day, but he foresaw the depression that was coming, and that he would be out of work, so he took up a piece of land, and to-day he is doing well; he is not making a fortune, but he is keeping his family and himself, and he makes one less in the ranks of the unemployed. If the Government will not postpone their immigration policy for a year, at least let them make the same offer of assistance to our own unemployed. Surely the men who have come here at their own expense are entitled to the same advantages as the men living in Galicia or somewhere in that neighbourhood. Let me remind the Government that a contented settler is the finest advertising agency you can have. Though his contentment may only be expressed in a badly written letter with a dirty thumb mark, it will have more drawing power in his little home village than all the flamboyant advertisements got up by the agents of the Government. That has proved to be true time and again. By the way, if any of them are coming to British Columbia, I hope that they at least will be told the truth. Tell them that they will have to compete with Asiatics; that if they are going in for fruit farming, Asiatics have a hold on that; if they are going in for strawberries, whole sections are absolutely in the hands of the Japs, who will take steps to see that no White Man intrudes upon them; if they are going in for small fruits, they will find the same situation there; if they go in for market gardening around any of our big cities, they will find the same situation there. There is what is known as a ring in connection with market gardening, at least around the city of Vancouver. A friend of mine was out at a farm and admired the potatoes on the table, and his farmer friend gave him a few pounds to take home with him. As you know, the great majority of domestic servants in Vancouver are Asiatics, and next day when this gentleman tried these potatoes his Chinese servant had cooked, he found them very poor, wet, watery, very unsatisfactory things. He thought there had been some accident with them until the same thing happened again the next day, so he asked his Chinese servant about it, and the Chinaman said, "Those potatoes are bad; they are no good. Let me get you potatoes that will be all right." There is a ring among these Chinese servants, and they will never buy produce from white market gardens. If their employer insists upon it, they will find the stuff unsuitable or it will be made to appear so, and eventually he will have to buy from the Chinese. That is an absolute fact that anybody in Vancouver can verify for himself. Let these people who are to come in be told that this is the competition they will be up against in British Columbia. Tell them also—and I wonder what British people will think of this—that their children will have to go to the same school as Asiatics. One of these the other day lost his temper at school, and instead of hitting his playmate on the nose he drew a knife and stabbed him in the back. Tell them that if conditions get bad their daughters will have to work in Chinese restaurants under conditions which I will leave to your imagination rather than describe. Tell them these things, and say that they must live according to the same standard as the others, which means that everyone down to a six-year-old child must be ready in fruit picking time to work sixteen hours a day. That is the only way to compete successfully with the Chinese and Japanese in British Columbia. But I hope we see the dawn of better days with this Government, and that we will be able to tell these people that the Government have taken steps to permit the white people to grow up under a white standard.

With regard to the provision as to the soldiers' stock and land, I will only endorse the way it was put by one of the members who spoke the other day. He advocated the revaluing of the land and stock and an extension of time to pay for it. I am heartily in sympathy with that idea, because it is good business. We are going to lose the money and the settlers as well if we do not do that. Better keep the soldier settlers, and give them an extension. It is coming to them, and it is not their fault that they have not succeeded. We induced them to go on the land under big prices created by the war. They did enough for us during the war and let us shoulder the responsibility. I read an item in my platform last night asking for more considered treatment for the wounded soldier. That question crops up in the West. There are a lot of wounded men in the West, and we think they were not well treated. Their pensions were cut down to a minimum, and they have been at considerable expense. It has been suggested that these men are malingerers. These men who have served at the front and been wounded cannot be accused of malingering, and they ought to receive consideration.

The answer of the Government is that it means increased expenditure. Well there are ways of effecting economy without making the destitute soldiers suffer. I suggest that we cut off some of the ceremonial connected with this House. This is a democratic nation, and we might well forego, for a time at least, all these ceremonies. We have a beautiful restaurant upstairs, and it is a pleasure to take our friends up there, but it is run at a tremendous loss. I am willing, and I think other members are, to pay for our meals in future and save that expense. There are many ways in which economy could be effected without loss of efficiency.

Referring to the inheritance tax. Is the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) aware that in New Zealand and in Great Britain they have an inheritance tax, or death duties which we do not have in Canada at all? We have a provincial inheritance tax, but no Dominion tax, and if we had such a duty in Canada as they have in New Zealand and Britain, the revenue would receive something like $30,000,000 a year, and it would come out of the pockets of the people best able to afford it, people who have built up large fortunes during the war and could well afford to contribute to the state after they have gone;—it might be better for them in the place where they have gone if they gave the country back some of their wealth.

I would also suggest that they might remove the Northwest Mounted Police from British Columbia. They were put there in a crisis in special emergency. They are no longer needed. We have an efficient provincial police force, and by removing this force we would save expense.

I mentioned last night that the eight-hour law was a part of the platform on which I was elected. I see no mention of it in the Speech from the Throne. The Trades and Labour council took it up with the Government, and I hope to see the Government, in the course of the session at least, make some pronouncement as to their attitude in the matter. If they are not prepared to assume the responsibility for enacting it, then they ought to call the provinces together, if it is decided that it is a provincial matter. It is a duty we owe, under the Treaty of Versailles, to carry this out as speedily as we can, in accordance with our pledges in that treaty. The same might be said of the old-age pension. In November, 1921, the British Columbia House passed a resolution unanimously calling attention to the fact that this government had assumed responsibility for the old-age pension and suggesting that it was time for them to take action. I do not expect the Government to take action on that matter this session, but I commend it for their consideration in a future session.

I wish to call attention to a further point and I am surprised that no other hon. member has taken it up. I am heartily in accord with the member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) when he expressed the opinion that the Dominion Elections' Act should be removed from the statutes. I go further and state it should be removed as speedily as possible, that we may remove the stigma from our public life, that we have had an act on the statute which lends itself to almost every form of corruption. If we must retain the act let us change the name of it. It is now known as the Dominion Elections' Act, let it be known as the Dominion Elections' Corruption Possibilities Act. It may be said that I am using too strong words when I say that it encourages every form of political corruption. I think the statement is well-advised, because those of us who are lawyers know that if a man carelessly leaves his money lying around his premises he is as much to blame as the poor boy or girl who picks it up. You have often heard the judge in court say "You are encouraging theft by leaving your money around," and an act which is passed for the avowed purpose of preserving purity of elections should not permit or allow the gross abuses which are possible under that act. I speak from somewhat bitter experience in my own case. I have the data all here, but have not time to go into it. I will only mention a few of the instances where this act, to put it mildly, lends itself to abuses. I am talking about the rural ridings where, I believe, a different system prevails from that in the cities. It lends itself to a great deal of illegal voting on election day. A man who is bad enough to vote illegally is not going to worry about signing his name to an oath, and he will come to the poll on election day from nowhere, take the oath and vote illegally. Further than that the act allows if it does not encourage, the disfranchisement of large numbers of people. I do not refer to two or three votes in some remote place, but I am talking about absolutely blotting out the votes of fifty or sixty electors. And why? Because it was known they were going to vote what is known as "wrong." I could point to half a dozen instances in the riding I represent where that was deliberately arranged, places that had voting booths for years and years, with perhaps a hundred votes. They voted "wrong" last time, and this year were not allowed a polling place. In other cases, they had to undergo considerable hardship to get to the booth, by travelling in an open boat. Do hon. members expect that women are going to do that for the sake of a vote? One old lady told me frankly that she would have to travel in an open boat, exposed to the weather for ten miles, and she did not think any one of the three candidates was worth the trouble, and I agreed with her. However she said her prayers were with us, and I think that helped. I was speaking to a man at eleven o'clock at night a few days before polling, and he told me, "You need not worry about the election, you are going to be elected." I said, "I am glad to hear that, now how do you know?" He replied, "I got it on the ouija board." There is another feature which perhaps is one of the worst features, and that is the fact that the legally nominated candidate cannot find out within four or five days of the election where the polls are to be. The thing was deliberately suppressed. I did not know, until five days before the election, where the various polls in the vast, scattered region up in the north end of my riding were to be. How could I, with the means of travel that prevailed there secure scrutineers for those various polling stations unless I employed an aeroplane? I wonder what the people of Ottawa would think if, four days before an election, they did not know where the polling booths were to be, and if they then found they would have to vote in a hamlet ten miles away. Yet that is what happened in Comox-Alberni, where we cannot get around easily to secure scrutineers. Perhaps the Government candidate's vote would not have been as large as it was had I been able to get scrutineers at those polling stations.

Another feature of that beautiful act was that it lent itself to registrars, some of whom were not too scrupulous, padding the lists. I know of one case where one of these gentlemen put 215 names on the list, almost the entire number of whom did not live in the riding at all, and some of whom had been dead for at least three years. Something should be done about that. I think three years is too long; when a man has been dead for two years, I think he should not be compelled to come back to this wretched sphere to vote. I firmly believe, if a man has been dead for two years, he would have too much sense to come back and vote Conservative, anyway. In that particular instance where 215 names were put on the list,—after the registrar had been arrested,—out of those 215 names, only 8 voted. This is an indication of what was going on. Another feature of the act allows the Government, on the advice of the candidate, to appoint his—the candidate's—own business partner as returning officer. Moreover, this returning officer did not have the decency to go out and take up an office elsewhere. This allowed the election to be held, to all intents and purposes, in the private office of the Government candidate, because the returning officer was not even a resident of the riding, he lived a hundred miles away practically, and he paid only one brief visit to the riding and that on nomination day. The rest of the election was conducted in the private inside office of the Government candidate. Do you wonder, Sir, when I say that 1,300 ballots were either taken out or given out of the returning officer's office illegally? These are some only of the practices which this act allows, if it does not encourage them. But like most of these things, it will come back like a boomerang upon itself. Some of these things I found out too late, only after the election; others I was aware of beforehand. I told the electors that we had got beyond any personal ambition of mine; that the world would still turn around; that Canada would still be in the North American continent, if I were defeated at the polls; that it was a question of their rights and priviliges, more important far than my personal election or non-election. You remember the Apostle Paul, when he was brought before the Jewish Judge and he claimed that he was a Roman citizen and demanded to be taken to Rome. The Jewish Judge said "With a great sum obtained I this freedom." But Paul answered, "But I was free born." We were free born; but our forebears were not, and many of them for generations fought and struggled and shed their blood, and died, to get this simple common every-day right of the ballot. I told the people that in the election, and I think they appreciated the situation and responded on election day.

I surely can be absolved of any charge of endeavouring to make a stump speech or of theatrical action when I state, simply and quietly, that surely, if it is not the fundamental right, it is a fundamental right of the Constitution under which we live to-day that a qualified voter shall have a free and untrammelled opportunity to exercise his franchise on election day, without such an unreasonable objection as having to lose his job or to lose the day's work being involved, and that the election should be held in such a way that every body of men, no matter whom they intended to vote for, should be allowed fully and freely to exercise that right. I do not think I am going beyond reason and—modesty, I was going to say—when I say that is a fundamental right. If that fact is conceded, then the Liberal party who are in power here, if they are conscious or even pretend to be conscious of their responsibility to maintain those rights for us, must surely realize that it is their bounden duty to strike this act off the statute books as soon as possible.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I desire to extend to you my congratulations upon your election to the high office in which this House has placed you; but in doing so, as an old friend and associate in political life, I want to express the regret that all your colleagues, and, I am sure, all hon. gentlemen in this House who had the opportunity and pleasure of sitting with you in other Parliaments, feel, on account of the fact that your eloquent voice will no longer be heard in advocacy of those principles for which you stood during your long political career. I hope, in other days, and, perhaps, under different conditions, it may be that you, Sir, will be able to give to your country and your party that same splendid assistance which you have given in times past.

I desire to express my appreciation—and I am sure I can voice the feelings of most hon. members—at the very interesting contribution to this debate just given by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). His coming into this House of Commons means a distinct addition to this Parliament, and we shall look forward with interest in the future to the ease and grace with which he approaches the consideration of public matters and expresses his views with reference to them. As one who has had the honour of sitting in three previous Parliaments, I may be permitted to say that I am sure that in none of those previous sessions have we ever been favoured by the addition of so many new members who have been able to present their views to the House and the country with the confidence, ease and ability that hon. gentlemen who have spoken in this debate for the first time have displayed. That remark applies to all portions of the House. This is an important time in the history of this country, and the ability, which unquestionably has been added to Parliament as a result of the last contest, has not been exceeded in our experience since Confederation. The problems that face this Government and this Parliament are the gravest that any public men have had to deal with since 1867, problems and conditions created very largely as a result of the destruction of political ideals by the Union Government which was formed in 1917, created by the opportunist policy which characterized the administration in the four years in which they interfered with public life and public business of this country. The result on December 6 was a notification to the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) that this country was sick and tired of Toryism masquerading under the title of the National Liberal and Conservative party. The very use of a name of that kind by my right hon. friend or those associated with him indicates their rank insincerity, because those of us who had the pleasure of sitting in previous Parliaments with my right hon. friend knew that if ever a hide-bound Tory came into Parliament, it was my right hon. friend; and I was amused at his attempt, by assuming a sort of dulcet tone, to lead hon. gentlemen who sit on his left, who have come into this House for the first time, into the belief that, after all, he was not a Tory, that he was a Progressive of some kind, and that this criticism of him was all ill-conceived. He does not seem to accept the new situation with that grace which a man so long in public life might well be expected to display, He is still smarting under defeat. From 1908, when he entered Parliament under the patronage of Hon. Robert Rogers, until 1921, my right hon. friend had a wonderful period of political success. He made the mistake, however, when Sir Robert Borden retired from the premiership, of proceeding to usurp the control of public affairs. Everyone who recalls the events of 1917 knows very well that when the men who composed the Union Government went to the country they did so on the claim that they were to be absolutely non-partisan. They asked for a mandate for the period of the war only, and a combination of gentlemen associated with both political parties formed that government. They each and all declared, in various parts of the country, that the moment the war's necessities should cease they would return to the allegiance which they had paid their respective parties. No one ever thought, when voting in 1917 for Sir Robert Borden and his Union Government, that he was voting for the present leader of the Opposition to proceed to form a government of his own without a mandate from the people. Yet the right hon. gentleman proceeded to do so, and created the conditions which confront us to-day with reference to the railways, purchasing and appropriating railways at a cost of hundreds of millions of dollars, and creating difficult situations without any authority whatever from the people. Speaking in Toronto some weeks ago, my right hon. friend attributed his defeat to what he termed a mental rebellion on the part of the people. Well, I think he used a very happy phrase, because, from all parts of the country, in every province, there came from the people evidence that there existed a determination, as an hon. gentleman expressed it last night, that whatever men they might return to Ottawa they would see to it that they should "vote against Meighen." My right hon. friend intimated that the action of the province of Quebec, in its display of this mental rebellion, was the acme of infamy.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I made no such statement, but I am not surprised that the hon. gentleman attributes it to me.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I am quoting from the report of an address delivered by the right hon. gentleman before the Conservative ladies of Toronto, in which he said, speaking of Quebec:

> In it had taken the form of Nationalism, a blight which masquerading under the banner of Liberalism had cried wildly for revenge because that part of the Dominion had been asked to submit to the same laws that bound the rest of Canada. That particular form of the expression of the spirit of revolt, the speaker felt, should be characterized as "the acme of infamy."

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not make the statement as quoted by the hon. gentleman. What I said was that the conduct of the campaign in that province had reached, in its depths, the acme of infamy.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Well, perhaps my right hon. friend has not recalled that one of those ministers whom he brought into being for a few short weeks was perfectly willing to deal with the situation down there which he condemned by the use of this phrase, and was perfectly willing to adopt as a candidate a gentleman who declared that the chief plank of his platform would be never to support England in any war in which she might be engaged. Let me remind him that when first he came into this House, in 1911, the government he supported owed its existence to the fact that there had been elected in the province of Quebec twenty-six or twenty-seven men called Nationalists, men who were returned on the principle that Canada should not embark in any of England's wars or participate in her affairs. He enjoyed his position as a member of that government, from 1911 to 1917, as a result of support from that quarter. Let me tell him, if he chooses to characterize in the same way the men and women of any province, in regard to the expression of their opinion upon him or his government in the last contest, that speaking for the province of Nova Scotia, I declare that we shall share the epithet he has applied to Quebec in this case. We will take these words as describing our own unanimity. My right hon. friend paid a visit to our province, and, in association with his Minister of Public Works, he made a tour, the progress of which might be compared to the famous march of Don Quixote and Sancho Panza. Our province has had a distinctive position in regard to the Conservative party. It has given to Canada three Prime Ministers who led that party: I refer to Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Robert Borden and Sir John Thompson. Now, the people of Nova Scotia heard my right hon.

friend; they listened to his weary wail on the tariff and his persistent declaration that there was no other issue before the Canadian electorate. He did not want to discuss railway problems, or unemployment, or anything except this theory that a tariff should be maintained—he ran away from everything else. The good people of Nova Scotia, including those who had supported these three Conservative Prime Ministers, having heard the right hon. gentlemen and his colleagues, decided that they did not wish him to be entrusted further with the control of affairs in Canada, and the majorities of the hon. gentlemen who sit in this House to-day representing Nova Scotia were materially increased as a result of the visit of the leader of the Opposition. I say, therefore, that if my right hon. friend regards the position of the province of Quebec as being the acme of infamy, we in Nova Scotia are not at all concerned about that term; we share with Quebec the blame it implies.

My right hon. friend does not seem to appreciate his position as fully as he should. Beneath the surface there is an indication of a desire on his part to resuscitate the old sectional feeling, as evidenced by his attack on the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) and the member for St. Antoine (Mr. Mitchell) because they pointed out that the condition of affairs in this country was so serious. They said nothing more than what has been said all over the country in hundreds of constituencies. My right hon. friend, however, singled these gentlemen out as special objects of attack, suggesting that they were allied with some special interest. The leader of the Opposition received his answer very well from the Minister of Justice yesterday, but it does seem to me that in the opening of a new Parliament, with the great problems that face us, he might well have applied himself in his address to a consideration of the difficult task that lies before us and have dealt with some of the questions which have been raised in so many quarters of the House by hon. gentlemen.

Now, as I said before, the task before the Government is a very heavy one, but already there has come from all parts of Canada evidence of an optimism and a belief that responsible government has once more been restored, and that the days of War-time Elections Acts and the putting through of Canadian Northern Railway deals under closure have passed. The people look with optimism and confidence to the administration which has been formed by the hon. gentleman who leads the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the galaxy of able men surrounding him who represent all parts of the Dominion. The choice of the Liberal party in 1919, when the present leader of the House was selected to lead that party, has been more than justified by the people of the country. The splendid political tour which he made during the course of the election contest, the high standard on which he appealed to the people on all the questions that were before them, won the confidence not only of the members of the Liberal party but of a very large number of electors throughout the country who in the past had not given allegiance to that party.

Associated with him is the man who guided Canada from 1896 to 1911 through many financial difficulties, and to hon. Mr. Fielding—if I may use his name, Mr. Speaker—I think that this House and the country look with confidence to deal with the pressing financial questions which now confront us in the same successful manner in which he handled our national finances during his former term of office.

We also feel very proud, on this side of the House, of the hon. gentleman who for fifteen years so wisely guided the destinies of the province of Quebec with the result that her position to-day is admired and envied by all her sister provinces. We are very glad indeed that the hon. member representing the historic constituency of Laurier-Outremont (Sir Lomer Gouin) has become a member of the Government.

I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to deal with all the subject matters of the Speech from the Throne. Rather I desire to confine myself to what I conceive to be for the moment the most important question therein referred to—our national railways. We have heard a good many speeches from hon. gentlemen upon this subject and many arguments in favour of public ownership. To my mind public ownership need not be argued at all. The country owns these railways, and I propose to show that, having regard to their financial position to-day, there could not be found anywhere in the world a corporation or body of men who would undertake to buy and operate the railways. The country owns the Canadian Northern railway, as it was formerly called; it owns the Grand Trunk railway; owns the Transcontinental railway; and it owns the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Intercolonial railways. Those railways could not be sold to-morrow for the debts that are against them. Therefore, public ownership is here for the time being and must be given a fair trial, as the Government has decided. For the moment public ownership is not in issue.

In this connection I would submit that the Government should let the country know exactly the present financial position of all the roads composing the National system, because it is not at present very well known either to the country or to this House. We should understand exactly what their present financial position is, because if the Government's policy of giving these railways a fair trial under public ownership is to be carried into effect, as I am sure it will be, in order to determine whether or not Government direction and control is to bring to these railways the advantages and benefits which we would like to see accrue to them, we must know beforehand the exact position in which these railways stand financially. Operating accounts for the last three years in the fullest detail should be laid before Parliament. I am aware the position was taken last year that these operating accounts should not be made public, and I gather that the House was told at that time that such accounts should not be laid on the table for fear the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should find something in connection with those accounts which would enable its management to take advantage of our National system. That seemed to me to be a very flimsy reason. The time has not arrived in this or any other country enjoying British parliamentary institutions when you can lay down the doctrine that hundreds of millions of dollars of public funds are to be spent without the people or their representatives having the right to know the disposition of every single dollar. If we are going to give a fair trial to public ownership, then a most essential element is to have these financial statements laid down upon the table of the House. Only in this way can you know where you are going to begin under public ownership.

Let me say, I do not regard the operation of the Canadian Northern Railway, or the so-called Canadian National Railway, since 1918 as being operation under public ownership. What is the use of talking about public ownership of these railways when you have Mackenzie and Mann's officials operating them? What is the good of talking about the failure of private ownership rendering public ownership necessary if you take the gentlemen who could not operate these railways successfully under private ownership and put them in charge under government ownership? You have got to start square with this thing. We upon this side of the House do not want to be responsible for the peculiar policies that characterized our railway administration under the direction of the right hon. leader of the Opposition and his friends. We want to start fair.

Allow me to digress for a moment, Mr. Speaker. My right hon. friend and his associates have been very fond of asserting that they were not responsible for this railway problem at all. That has been reiterated time and again in that form of propaganda which my right hon. friend and his colleagues so well know how to use, and which he is so afraid somebody else might use, though nobody has any intention of following his lead in that direction. By his propaganda he has declared continually during the last two years that the Liberal party was responsible for the railway situation. Let us examine the facts. As I have already said, I had the pleasure of sitting in this House in three Parliaments, and I was here in 1911 when the right hon. gentleman and his friends took charge. What was the railway situation then? The government owned the Intercolonial, as it had owned it for forty-five years. It owned the Transcontinental, stretching from Moncton to Winnipeg. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company had title to the Grand Trunk Pacific railway from Winnipeg westward. That was the position. Those were all the railways that the government of Canada had anything to do with when my right hon. friend and his associates took charge in 1911. The Transcontinental was under lease to the Grand Trunk Railway Company with respect to operation on terms which would have freed this country from any responsibility financially. But what did my right hon. friend and his associates do immediately after 1911? They appointed a commission with a view to discrediting the construction of that railway and of playing into the hands of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, who wanted to get rid of the contract. Eventually, after a couple of years, having laid the ground-work, they proceeded to let the Grand Trunk Railway Company escape responsibility, and the government took the Transcontinental over. Were we responsible for their action? Then, in 1913, Mackenzie and Mann came to this House and asked the government of the day to loan them $15,000,000. My right hon. friend supported that request and the money was handed over. At that time Mackenzie and Mann, or the Canadian Northern Railway Company, assured the House that with this money all their obligations would be attended to and they would not come back for any further loans. But they came back next year for $45,000,000, and my right hon. friend was the gentleman who piloted the Bill for that loan through Parliament. On our side of the House at that time we moved the six months' hoist to that proposal and took direct issue with him and his associates. We have no responsibility whatever for the giving of that money. Let me remind the House, Mr. Speaker, that it was upon that occasion that the gentleman whom my right hon. friend took into his Cabinet as Minister of Justice just before the election—I refer to Hon. R. B. Bennett—told the House of Commons that the right hon. gentleman was nothing but the "megaphone of Mackenzie and Man." That was in 1914. Mark you, assurance was given to the House at that time that security for the loan had been given; that a mortgage would be taken; and that upon default, foreclosure would not be necessary, as it would in any other case—the whole property would revert to the people of Canada.

But that is not the whole of the story. My right hon. friend came to the House of Commons in 1917 and introduced legislation to take over the Canadian Northern Railway, which he put through under closure. A certain hon. gentleman who went to the Senate this session and who came here from the West to join the Union Government, save the country and win the war, might give us some of the reasons which contributed to that legislation. I know this: certain provinces of this Dominion were relieved of $110,000,000 of obligations which they had incurred for local railways, including the province of British Columbia, and that amount was made part of the debt of the country and charged against the Canadian Northern Railway. My right hon. friend went further and provided that there should be a reference to arbitration for the purpose of ascertaining how much Mackenzie and Mann were entitled to for the equity of redemption. The award was $10,000,000, and I will show you, as having a bearing on the present financial position of the country, that that was simply $10,000,000 thrown away.

Now, what is the situation to-day? A reference to the railway blue book which has been laid on the Table of the House shows that the mortgage and bonded indebtedness of the Canadian Northern Railway is $626,000,000, in round figures, and that the estimated value of the road-bed, tracks and terminals is only $632,000,000, a margin simply of $6,000,000. That is a pure question of bookkeeping. In order to get at the real position in regard to the matter, an actual valuation would be necessary, made by proper valuators, and that valuation would disclose whether or not the Canadian Northern is mortgaged for more than it is actually worth.

This, then, is what my right hon. friend did. And he has the audacity to come to this House and say that these conditions were created by his opponents, although all along he was the chief actor in the drama. Now, what did he do further? He was not content with taking over the railways mentioned, but in 1919 he asked the House to authorize his Government to make an agreement for the acquisition of the Grand Trunk. That agreement was made and the road was taken over. Then there were arbitrations as to values, all the dealings with complicated stock, and so on. He it was who took over the Grand Trunk. These are the railways which belong to the Canadian people and which this Government has to deal with. Would it, then, not be a most desirable thing, before we embark upon any enterprise of Government operation involving the expenditure of large sums of money, to inquire fully into the matter as suggested in the Speech from the Throne? The member for South York (Mr. Maclean) has been talking public ownership in this House for a great many years, but able as he is I would not say that he is an expert on railway transportation. Nor would I say that the former mayor of Toronto, who represents North Toronto (Mr. Church) and who spoke yesterday very lengthily and very glibly about "co-operation" and "co-ordination," is an expert on transportation, even though he did say that he could effect this co-ordination in twenty-four hours. The transportation question involves the most important considerations in the life of a country; men are trained from boyhood in its technicalities, in its details, in matters connected with administration. Would it not therefore, be prudent to seek the advice of those who give their lives to the perfecting of their knowledge in regard to railway matters? Surely, ordinary common prudence should prompt us to say that the Government would have been right in suggesting that there should be an inquiry. Do you not think that instead of dealing in generalities we ought to have a statement before the House—and the Government, no doubt, will have it before them—as to just what the financial position of the Grand Trunk is? I am told that the deficit on the Grand Trunk last year was $15,000,000, Last year the deficit on the Canadian Northern was $70,000,000, of which amount $33,000,000 went to pay interest upon mortgage and bonds. It has been said that this deficit is due to the increased wages of employes, but the blue book shows that the increase in wages amounted to only $12,000,000, so that the deficit cannot be due to that alone; there must be other important reasons for it. I submit, therefore, that this House should know the exact financial position of all these railways before we embark upon any new policy or lay down any new lines.

We have to deal with most serious problems in regard to this matter. As I have mentioned, the hon. member for North Toronto would co-ordinate this system in twenty-four hours, but I would direct the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the Grand Trunk railway, which is proposed to be the subject of co-ordination, does not operate only in Canada; sixteen hundred miles of it are in United States territory. Forty-one per cent of the total tonnage carried by the Grand Trunk comes from the United States; seventy per cent of its freight traffic receipts is obtained in that country. The proposal is that this Government become a competitor in the United States, a foreign country, with American railways operating there. Grave international difficulties surround this question. There is no precedent in the world's history for one government operating a public utility within the territory of another without first making with that country a proper agreement or arriving at an understanding in regard to the matter. Take the case of the Suez canal; when the contract for that work was arranged, France and England had to obtain from the Khedive of Egypt his permission to proceed, although at the time the Khedive had very little authority. Take the case of the Panama Canal; when the United States undertook to construct that work they obtained from the newly-created Republic of Panama the concession which was necessary before actual operations were commenced. We are in this position with regard to the United States, that this Government, owning the Grand Trunk railway in that territory, would be dependent on the federal United States Government for all the laws they might pass with regard to the road, including liability for any taxation they might impose, and liable also to taxation and legislative interference by the six or seven states through which the railway runs. What would we think in this country of such a proposition as the American Government purchasing the stock of the Canadian Pacific railway? It is not inconceivable that that might not occur. All that they would need to do would be to purchase the stock as it was offered on the exchanges. What would we in Canada say if the American Government owned all the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway and wanted to operate that road in this country?

Mr. MACLEAN (York): Did not Sir Wilfrid Laurier know when he made this deal that the Grand Trunk owned this railway in the United States?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend has not caught my point. Sir Wilfrid Laurier made no agreement with the Grand Trunk to operate any railway in the United States.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): The Grand Trunk was operating both sections.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Not as the property of this Government. I am calling the attention of the House to the fact that a decision on this proposal that the Canadian Government should own and operate this 1,600 miles of railway in the United States is no twenty-four hour affair, it demands inquiry and careful consideration; and as an illustration of the necessity for that deliberation I am suggesting the situation that might arise at any time if the American Government purchased all the stock of the Canadian Pacific railway and wanted to operate that railway in Canada. We would certainly think carefully over such a proposition as that. And I submit from my short study of this question that our problem is a very serious one. It is not brought into Canadian public life as a result of anything done by the Liberal party, but is another of the many problems that my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition has laid at the door of this Government. Let me give another illustration.

Mr. HANSON: Is there anything in the comity of nations to prevent such a thing happening? Does the hon. gentleman know of any precedent against it?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I can find no precedent in history nor any international law whereby one country attempted to operate a railway in the territory of another country. I pointed out that in the case of the Suez canal and the Panama canal, concessions were obtained from the countries through which they ran.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Has my hon. friend forgotten that the United States has operated railways in Canada?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): The United States Government?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): In war time, perhaps; but my hon. friends know very well that that is no answer to the contention I am making. Many things were done in war time, as my hon. friend knows, by agreement and consent. Will my hon. friend, who wrote a report on the railway question, tell me if he knows of any case in the history of the world where in peace time one country operated a road in the territory of another without having the consent of that other country? No, my hon. friend cannot do it; it is impossible for him to do it. I am only submitting these as reasons why we should give due thought to this matter. The problem is not one that can be solved overnight.

My hon. friend from Cumberland (Mr. Logan) has called the attention of the House to the situation with re-
5 p.m. gard to the railway that runs through the Maritime provinces, and he proved conclusively, I submit, that that was a railroad which was built, not under any legislation of this Parliament, but under legislation passed by the Imperial Parliament, providing for the construction of that railroad and providing also, as a matter of law, I submit, for its operation. Anyway, both political parties have for forty years proceeded to operate that railway in the light of what is claimed to be the intent of the British North America Act. From 1878 down to 1918 that railway was operated on the lines which, we say, the Imperial Act demanded. My right hon. friend's (Mr. Meighen) propensity for Orders in Council is very well known, and when Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann were given charge of the railways in the western part of Canada he passed an Order in Council on the 20th of November, 1918, providing in part as follows:

> His Excellency the Governor General in Council is further pleased to order and declare that the persons from time to time comprising the Board of Directors of the Canadian Northern Railway Company, shall be and they are hereby appointed a Board of Management of the Canadian Government Railways and are hereby given the powers vested in the General Manager under the general regulations of the Canadian Government Railways adopted by Order in Council of the 22nd January, 1914.

That meant that Mr. Hanna and his co-directors of the Canadian Northern Railway were given the powers which are declared and set out in the general Railway Act of the Dominion Government, which are no more than the powers which were exercised by Mr. Gutelius when he was General Manager, and by Mr. Pottinger who was also General Manager for many years. But, notwithstanding that their powers were limited, these gentlemen, the directors of the Canadian Northern Railway, proceeded to treat the road as if it were part and parcel of the Canadian Northern Railway. They proceeded to remove all responsibility and authority for matters connected with the road from the Maritime provinces, where it had always been, to the city of Toronto; and the result of that change, for which the right hon. leader of the Opposition was responsible, was that a situation was created which became absolutely intolerable in a business way and every other way—a situation which those of us representing constituencies along the line of the Intercolonial railway have been sent here to tell this House and the Government must be remedied. My right hon. friend is well aware of the feeling that existed in regard to this matter. My opponent in the county of Pictou in the last election was one of the directors that my right hon. friend appointed for the Canadian National Railway, and realizing the feeling that existed in the constituency he issued a statement. Referring to the proposal that the management of the railway should be removed from Toronto back to the Maritime provinces, he said:

> This proposal was some considerable time ago placed before the Minister of Railways and the Premier and approved. I have assurance of the Premier that just as soon as the necessary departmental changes are made, and this policy can be arranged, transfer of departmental work will be made from Montreal to Moncton; and the people of the Maritime Provinces may expect this within a very short time; I expect before the end of the year to see arrangements above referred to in full actual effect.

My hon. friend who represents Royal in the province of New Brunswick went on record as follows:

I am in favour of restoration of Maritime rights in connection with C.N.R. In fact, it is in my platform which I have put before this constituency.

And the present Solicitor General (Mr. McKenzie) also put the case very well in the public press just before the election. He said:

In reply to your telegram asking my opinion on Maritime management of C.N.R. let me state that section 145 B.N.A. contemplates Maritime control of operation and freight rates on Intercolonial under control of competent men in sympathy and touch with local conditions.

I could read statements from other supporters of my right hon. friend pledging themselves to do—what? To have an Order in Council passed—and this is what we ask Mr. Speaker, cancelling this Order in Council which appointed Mr Hanna and his co-directors, the general managers of the Intercolonial Railway, and providing for the appointment of men who will be in sympathy with our local conditions, and who will attempt to understand the operation of the road.

Mr. CRERAR: Would the hon. member allow me to ask a question?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): All right, my lord.

Mr. CRERAR: I desire to thank my hon. friend for the compliment he has paid me. As a matter of information, will my hon. friend state what advantage would accrue in the operation of a system under his proposals which do not exist at the present time?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I could begin by telling my hon. friend what disadvantages would be done away with. Probably that is the best way to answer. All that we are asking for is simply what we have had for forty years. Our condition is not the same as that of British Columbia. We are asking simply for the restoration of conditions which existed for forty years under both political parties, who interpreted the Imperial Act along certain lines. Situated as we are at one end of the Dominion, and to a certain extent out of the beaten track of operation of the trunk line railways in Central Canada, more particularly in the summertime, when the whole volume of trade runs to and from the St. Lawrence, I contend that we should have intelligence and sympathetic management. The conditions of operation to which I refer have been enjoyed by us for forty years. British Columbia never had any such condition as that. There never was any operation along the lines we are asking for. Let me give an illustration. We hear about freight rates. My hon. friend told us that it cost his constituents out west 50 per cent of the value of their oats to carry them down to Port Arthur.

Mr. CRERAR: Not my constituents—further west, from Alberta.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): Let me tell him that to-day, under the existing management, they charge our coal companies in Nova Scotia 60 per cent of the value of the coal to carry it to Montreal. They charge us more to carry coal to Montreal than they charge to carry coal from Lovett, Alberta down to Prince Rupert, although it is a longer distance, and they have to go over the Rockies. That is an illustration.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend proposes that the control of rates should be taken out of the hands of the Railway Commission.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): It has never been in the hands of the Board of Railway Commissioners. That is the situation. I might explain the matter to my hon. friend. The followers of the administration of my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) led the people of the Maritime provinces to believe that this railway was under the Railway Commission, and when there was complaint about railways his friends down there always said "This is fixed by the Board of Railway Commissioners, and there is no use kicking. This man Carvell, and his associates are bad men, and they are fixing the rates." That is entirely incorrect. It never was under that board at all. The Minister of Railways under my right hon. friend's administration approved the tariff fixed by Mr. Hanna. That is the way the rates were fixed, and it was in order to clear up the question that we attended the meeting of the board when freight rates were being investigated in the Maritime provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the hon. gentleman not know that all those schedules are first approved by the Railway Commission?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): I do not know that, but I will tell my hon. friend that I personally appeared before the Railway Commission in the province of Nova Scotia and asked them to declare where they stood on this question, and whether they had any right to fix rates or any responsibility in regard to rates, and they said, "No."

Mr. MEIGHEN: But they had final authority.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend is probably not aware of it, but they had a letter from my hon. friend the late Minister of Railways, Hon. Dr. Reid, telling them that whatever rates were fixed for the Canadian Pacific Railway from St. John would be adopted on the other road. Mr. Hanna, the general manager of the road, under the Minister of Railways and the railway department, fixed the rates, and they are responsible for the rates. It is not merely a question of rates. Nothing can be bought along the railway for any purpose whatever, unless it is purchased in Toronto or up in Ontario. Take the question of coal. Here we are in Nova Scotia, the only coal producing province in the Dominion east of the Rockies. These men in charge of the railways purchased over a million tons of coal in the United States, brought it in last year, and hauled it within a measurable distance of the city of Quebec. We could have supplied that coal from our mines, and our miners were out of work at that time. That is an indication of the utter lack of sympathy that has characterized the management of this railway, and I want to say that every man that lived along the line of that railway, whether he sits on this side of the House or on the other side, was pledged in this respect at the last election.

I wanted to put before this House these two situations, which warrant the statement that the Government was going to inquire into this matter, and that there should be due consideration given to the question of co-ordination, having regard to the situation of the Intercolonial and the Grand Trunk. I have no hesitation in saying that if by legislation this Parliament undertook to take away any rights or privileges we have under the British North America Act, it would be the duty of the local legislatures of our provinces to appeal to the Imperial Government to disallow any such legislation. There are two important things in regard to this matter that are well worthy of the attention of the House and the Government. So far as we are concerned in the Maritime provinces, we ask no exceptional favours. The freight rate problems are general throughout the whole country, and we are perfectly willing to pay our proper share in regard to that, but we do not propose to have the management from Toronto sending down to us Canadian Northern engines and cars, and taking our locomotives away and running them on other railways. We do not propose to sit quietly down and permit that to be done. We do not propose to have these men who do not know anything about our business down there trying to dominate us and our personal interests in our province. That is true of all the Maritime provinces, and I venture to say there is not a man from New Brunswick on the other side of the House who will not support the position I am taking in regard to this matter.

We have given a great deal of care and thought to this question, and the result of all these things I have mentioned shows that the people who have been directing the government-owned railways for the last three years have not been able to produce results that have been satisfactory to the country. I think every hon. gentleman will agree with that. My hon. colleague from Nova Scotia (Mr. Fielding) has a very heavy and grave task before him in dealing with the problem, to obtain the finances necessary to meet the deficit. I do think the solution of this problem is of the greatest possible importance to the whole country. It is a most serious matter for these gentlemen who live in the West, and it interferes with us in the East as well. How to find a way out in the best interests of Canada is the problem, and I sympathize with my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) on account of the very heavy responsibility that has been placed upon him in dealing with the heritage that comes to him from the maladministration of the right hon. gentleman on the other side of the House. I do not think we can have in this Parliament any pretence from him or from any of his followers that this railway situation was occasioned by any act of the Liberal party. It is here purely and solely on account of the partisanship, the living-from-day-to-day policy, that characterized him and his followers in dealing with all the questions which they dealt with in the past.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou): My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance laughs at that. Perhaps he will tell us the way to solve these problems, because we would be much interested to hear what he has to say on the subject. This is not a laughing matter. I have spoken very strongly on this question of the responsibility for the conditions that confront us, and this problem is not going to be got rid of by my hon. friend laughing. The right hon. gentleman (Mr. Meighen) is responsible for taking over the Canadian Northern Railway, for the loans and advances made to it, and for taking over the Grand Trunk, without any consideration of the problem which faces this Government to-day, as to where they stand in regard to international complications with the United States when they approach the question of co-ordination. The problem is before us now. The situation is such that every man of independent mind in this House, no matter on which side he sits, will join in giving the Government every possible consideration and assistance when they come to deal with this question and attempt to find a solution for the transportation problem which will not only lighten the burden imposed upon trade and industry but relieve the pressure upon the overstrained financial resources of the country. To that end, I hope there will be no dissention or division between those of different positions in this country. There should be no antagonism between agriculture, commerce and industry. All should work hand in hand in order to bring about a solution of these problems. They should not be adversaries, but rather mates and partners anxious to forget anything on which they might divide, glad only to join with every possible ardor for the interest of our common country in the solution of those questions that confront us to-day.

Hon. Sir HENRY L. DRAYTON (West York): Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to commence my remarks in rather a different atmosphere from that created by the last speaker. I had hoped to commence with a discussion rather of things as they are to-day, than of the things of yesterday to which he referred. I wonder if my hon. friend realises that there has been an election. From the amount of spleen that he has displayed, from the attack that he has made, I rather think the hon. gentleman believes he is still languishing in the shades of opposition. He talks about large issues in the country. What was the big issue that he made in his opening remarks? Why, the great task to which he set himself was the discrediting of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen). If it is true that there is this task and it is the most important task which his party is confronted with, we feel that we have a first rate leader, and the more sticks and stones that are thrown, the more we shall be confirmed in that opinion. I do not know whether my hon. friend desires to assume the role of the fault-finder on the Government benches. He seems to be exceedingly qualified for the post. I do not know exactly where his fault-finding is going to end; but if he will not take my advice—and I am quite sure he will not; I would not expect him to do so—I wonder if he will take the advice of the Toronto Globe in its reference to this very question which, after all, is really the one underlying the hon. gentleman's remarks, the belittlement of Ontario and all that Ontario stands for, on the one hand, not, of course, for purposes of injuring Ontario, but for the purpose of creating favourable prejudice elsewhere or the other. I shall read an editorial from the Globe of March 11, 1922, and it has to say this on the subject of my hon. friend. The article is headed:

> Useless Faultfinding. Addressing women at the Montreal Reform Club, Mr. E. M. Macdonald, M.P. for Pictou, N.S., accused Ontario of narrowness of outlook.
> He said: For Ontario, Canada, is bounded by the river Ottawa on one side and by Sault Ste. Marie on the other. Everything outside that territory does not count in the estimation of that province. It is an indication of a narrowness of mind unworthy of anyone living in Canada.

That is a quotation of the hon. gentleman's speech as given by the Globe. The Globe goes on:

> Mr. Macdonald does not know Ontario at first hand. He is building a wide accusation on a narrow basis, the sayings of a few narrow-minded men and narrow-minded newspapers. We have broad and narrow people here, as they have in Nova Scotia. In any case, nothing is to be gained by Nova Scotia making such accusations against Ontario, or Ontario against Nova Scotia. Mr. Macdonald should go up against the Philistines at home.

Again, I say that if the hon. member for Pictou is not willing to take my advice—and I do not expect him to do so—let him at least regard the voice of the chief organ in Ontario of his party; and if again he will have no conception of what that newspaper says, and thinks nothing of it, let him, at least, think of Canada and ask himself whether it would be worth while to continue, at a time like this, to attempt to set up provincial prejudice, the one province against the other, or whether, after all, the problems of the day are not sufficiently great and serious to invite the best efforts of a united Canada.

For a moment, I make no further reference to the lamentations of my hon. friend. I shall have, I am afraid, to deal with them in a little more detail later on; but I should like to commence now just where I would have wished to commence, had it not been for what has taken place. Mr. Speaker, here we are with a brand new Government and a brand new Speaker, and I want, in the first instance, to congratulate my hon. friends very heartily on the first-rate victory they have achieved. I cannot agree with some of the methods employed by them in the winning of that victory, but they are happy and contented and I rejoice personally in their happiness and contentment. If the Prime Minister were here I would address a few remarks of personal thanks to him. It is a great pleasure to me, for example, to be able to congratulate him on the appointment which he has made in filling the office of Speaker. The present incumbent of that office I have known for many years as a friend, and I rejoice to see the Chair of this honourable Chamber so ably filled. I should also like to congratulate the Prime Minister upon his selection of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). I am quite sure that out of the many followers of whom the Prime Minister boasts none is better fitted to fill that important position than the hon. gentleman whom he has called upon to assume the office. I am sincere in what I say in that regard.

Something, however, has happened this afternoon that compels me to qualify somewhat these remarks. The Minister of Finance deserves our sympathy as well as our congratulations, but I fear he has exhibited in the past two little failings which at this session of the House may become very important in their significance. He has too little faith in Canada and too little faith in the possibilities of the British Empire when dealing with the question of reciprocity; on the other hand, he has a great deal too much faith in railways and in the statements of railway contractors and promoters. And in view of the remarks made this afternoon I am afraid I shall have to give to the House a few brief quotations to show the misplaced greatness of his faith in the representations of railway contractors and promoters. I regret that it should be necessary to refer to ancient history, but it is impossible for me to refrain from doing so on this occasion. Hansard reports my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, in dealing with the Grand Trunk Pacific matter, as follows, on May 26, 1904:

> Last year my right hon. friend the Leader of the Government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) made the statement that we could provide for the obligations entailed by this scheme out of one year's surplus. The statement which my hon. friend made in that off-hand way was absolutely and literally correct. I showed that by setting aside some $13,000,000 or $14,000,000, which was somewhat less than our surplus, we could provide for the payment of the seven years' interest which we are under obligation to give to the company. By our agreement we gave them seven years' free rental on the eastern division and seven years' free interest on the mountain sction of the western. I pointed out, upon the authority of an actuary, that by laying aside $13,000,000 or $14,000,000 we could provide for the complete payment of that obligation and that, therefore, was the measure of what we would have to pay.

Again, in the same debate, referring to the Grand Trunk Pacific project, he said:

> —When the project was brought down to Parliament, it was found that the scheme was so bold and comprehensive, so carefully thought out and guarded in the public interest, and entailed so small a charge, comparatively speaking, upon the public treasury, that these hon. gentlemen were amazed that the Government should have been able to negotiate such a scheme.

My hon. friend, I say, has too much faith in the figures of railway promoters. He mentions the sum of $13,000,000 or $14,000,000. Why, Sir, that line already has cost the country hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. MACLEAN (York): And is still costing the country money.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well, I do not know what may happen in the future, but it is costing a great deal now. I think it costs now more per annum than the whole of that estimate; at any rate it is costing a very enormous sum of money. There is another question to which I wish to refer, and it gives me much pleasure to do so. I had expected that the task would fall to me of saying something about Canada's position, and establishing the fact, as it can easily be established, that of all countries that have taken part in this war, from its commencement, as Canada did, of all countries whose effort at all compares with Canada's in any one of her activities, having regard to her income and population, not one is in a better position than Canada. This is a claim I have made before, a claim that has also been very generously and freely made by the financial papers and financial authorities of foreign countries in the best position to speak on this subject. I have said before that we were in at least as good a position as any other country outside of the great United States, which, of course, entered the war a good deal later than we did; but the duty of re-asserting this fact has been removed from my shoulders by the frank admission that appears in the Speech from the Throne. My hon. friends, who a short time ago saw nothing but darkness and ruin ahead of us, and talked of annexation with the United States as a result of the country's position, just in a few brief hours discovered that not only was my claim correct, but that they could go further and say that the position of Canada is better than that of any other country. Now that they are in office they make a wider and stronger claim than I have ever done. May I congratulate my friends upon their newly found faith in their country. These conversions are splendid. It does one good to see doubting Thomases who are quivering and quaking, afraid of annexation and all kinds of bogies of this kind, turn round, when they attain the ministerial benches, and from gloomy doubters become valiant upholders of their country's position. Again I congratulate them. I admit that I was amazed, although I ought not to have been, because there were apostles and emissaries going out telling them how awfully mistaken they were in what they had been saying, and that after all the financial newspapers knew more about the question than they did and were perhaps worth heeding. And so the gospel of optimism was commenced. I should not be surprised, because I notice that on December 22, my hon. friend the then member-elect for St. Antoine (Mr. Mitchell)—and he is a financial authority, Mr. Speaker—was talking on this very question, and I find that he is reported in the Gazette of December 23, as having said:—

> The time had come for turning away from the dark side of things, that it was well to look away from the sombre tints shown during the campaign and with the aid of a strong immigration policy, work together for the development of Canada as a unity, and not as a country made up of easternism and westernism, was the message which Mr. Walter Mitchell, M.P.—elect for St. Antoine, and late provincial treasurer, gave to the Commercial Travellers at the annual meeting of the Dominion Commercial Travellers' Association, held at the Windsor Hotel last night.
> "Do not believe in the dark pictures we painted for you during the election," he said amidst laughter. "I would have painted them still darker had I not been afraid that my majority would be too big."

So it is, Mr. Speaker, and I ought not to have been surprised that my hon. friend, financial critic and authority as he is, had started this great work of conversion of the Liberal party from pessimism as far back as December 22. I congratulate him upon his success.

In the course of his speech my hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) ventured into a calculation as to the popular support given this party, whose defeat he was so cheerfully gloating over, and upon whose defeat—now that he is in his seat—I freely and sincerely congratulate him. Why, he said, if the majority of the votes only were considered we—the official Opposition—would be given merely 22 seats. Well, I would have thought that in the case of what I believe to be the first Canadian Premier holding office with a substantial minority vote, the hon. gentleman would have found it just as convenient to say nothing about that matter. But perhaps he is rather proud of that position. It is quite true we were not dealt with very kindly. Personally, I think we got not only the worst of the fight, but I believe we got worse treatment than we merited. But let us see how this works out.

Of a total of 3,121,844 votes cast in the general election—I cannot vouch for these figures, but I believe they are correct—1,296,723 were cast in favour of the Liberals, representing 41.53 per cent of the votes polled. My hon. friend talks about the minority candidates returned. Why, this is entirely a minority Government, and if his principles are correct, he should resign from office. It would be a dreadful thing, of course, to borrow some of the language used by him on a previous occasion when he talked about usurpation by a minority of the rights of the majority, but his language seems to be applicable to the present situation. The Conservative vote was 971,502, or 31.52 per cent of the total, while the Progressives with 769,387 votes polled 24.64 per cent of the whole. I should like to give my hon. friend the member from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) credit for drawing my attention to this question. I was chaffing him for not undertaking what seemed to me to be his absolute duty in this House as official leader of the Opposition by reason of the fact that his party had a considerably larger representation than we had. He said to me: I cannot follow you in that reasoning, because after all you got over 200,000 more votes than we did. Well, analysing these figures I find he was right.

The unit of representation per member for the Government supporters averages therefore 10,989; the Conservatives, 19,430 per member, and the Progressives 11,836. We have 118 members supporting the Government, 50 Liberal-Conservative members, 65 Progressives, and 2 Independents. If we were to take the basis of the vote of the Liberal-Conservatives as the basis of representation, the Government would have only 66 seats as against our 50, and the Progressives would have 39. If we take the Government unit, the Conservatives would have 88 seats as against their present 50, and the Progressives 70 seats. I think the fortunes of war have dealt pretty kindly with my hon. friend the leader of the Government, and that on reflection he will think that after all he should not perhaps gibe us too much on forming a party which can only properly count 22 members.

If there is one thing that this House ought to do during the present session it is to pass a redistribution bill. The Speech from the Throne does not indicate any very extensive legislative programme. My. hon. friend is the head of a minority government. I do not know what the future holds in store for him or for his party; nobody knows; he himself does not know,. In order, therefore, to ensure something like fair and proper representation of the people in the next Parliament, the necessary steps to effect redistribution should be taken at once.

We have heard a good deal about campaign literature. Definite pledges, platforms and statements have been referred to by my leader and brought to the attention of the Prime Minister. Am I unfair in saying that the Prime Minister's reception of this recapitulation of campaign promises was, to say the least, cynical? The Prime Minister tells us not to take seriously this campaign literature; not to take seriously the pledges given to the people during the election campaign by the different parties. The hon. gentleman reminded my leader of a certain poster which contained the statement that Canada needed a certain very eminent gentleman, and went on to remark that the country did not think so. But if the cartoonist was wrong; if that idea was for the moment mistaken, is that any reason why the plighted word and solemn pledges of gentlemen returned to office should not be observed?

What is the use of an election if those who have voted for the victorious party find that the pledges on the strength of which they voted never existed? Does my hon. friend intend during the present session to bring down a bill to amend the Criminal Code? In that code there are laws dealing with misrepresentation,—and I may point out to my hon. friend that the crime of misrepresentation is only complete when the offender charged gets the goods. My hon. friend has the goods here; he is in office. Anyone who by false pretences, or misrepresentation, obtains property, even of infinitesimal value, is guilty of a crime and liable to a long term of imprisonment. Does my hon. friend think it is a small thing to say that faith with the people may be broken, that representations made for the purpose of obtaining office may cynically be disallowed? I am disappointed, more than disappointed, in the attitude of my hon. friend. I have had a high opinion of his character, and I am sure that upon reflection he will admit that such a serious matter cannot be disposed of by an easy gibe.

I am disappointed in my hon. friend for another reason. You know, Mr. Speaker, something happened during the last election—the Liberals discovered something during the campaign. Why, they discovered Toronto, and they proclaimed their discovery in their pre-election literature. Here is another of those things to which the Prime Minister thinks we should not pay attention. I was in hopes that what I am about to read was a distinct conversion of the great Liberal party to the just claims of Toronto. What do they say? Here is a campaign advertisement graced by my hon. friend's picture. I use the word "graced" advisedly; it is a very good portrait.

Mr. CHISHOLM: We cannot hear a word of what my hon. friend is saying.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am very sorry. Among other things I was observing that this campaign document is graced by a fair picture of the Prime Minister.

Mr. McMASTER: That is good so far.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: First rate; it is all good, but apparently it is not to be "taken seriously." It reads:

> Is Toronto, which produces over twenty-three per cent of the total revenue of the Dominion, entitled to adequate custom house facilities, and a post office worthy of a city of the size and importance of Toronto?

Was it not the duty of the representatives of this city to secure, long ago, the construction of the viaduct, the custom house and post office? These great public works that Toronto needs and is entitled to should be commenced immediately, in order to relieve the present unemployment in this city.

I was sure, Mr. Speaker, until my hon. friend made the answer that he did to my leader, that in the Estimates there would be provision for these much-needed works.

I am glad to see the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) in his seat; I congratulate him upon his most recent successes. I am particularly glad to see him here, because I wish to draw his attention to these words in the advertisement which I have just read: "in order to relieve the present unemployment in this city." I wish to point out to him further that for the period ending January 31, 1921, the percentage of employment in the trades reporting, was 90·1, and the percentage of unemployment, therefore, 9·9. For the period ending January 15, 1922, the figure was 80·6, unemployment, 19.4. For the last week that I have been able to get information, January 31 of this year—my hon. friend will have more recent information—the figure was 78.9, with an unemployment ratio of 21.1. I would like to point out to my hon. friend the Minister of Labour that compared with the same week of last year, at a time when he was disturbed by the spectre of unemployment, we have to-day nearly three times the amount of unemployment, and I would ask him whether, in view of that unemployment, which he professed himself concerned about, and sincerely I believe, he does not think these public works should be proceeded with immediately, as the candidate's advertisement says.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON (resuming): When the House took recess at six o'clock, I was discussing the advertisement published in the city of Toronto, in the interests, among others, of my hon. friend the Minister of Labour, and dealing with the unemployment situation. I still hope that that is not to be included in the list of discarded pledges by my hon. friend the Prime Minister. I would be very loath to think that the underlying motive of that advertisement was to signalize the direct return to what is vulgarly known as pork-barrel politics in Canada. That the only idea was that it should be a bait and a bribe to Toronto to elect the Minister of Labour, and that, as a penalty for his non-election—that the admitted measure of justice should not be extended to that municipality. It was either one thing or the other. I sincerely hope it was not the latter proposition, but I am afraid we may expect disappointment. Mr. Speaker, I do not see the hon. senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) in his seat, but it is within the memory of all of us how insistently he fought for Civil Service reform, how he piloted through this House the Civil Service Act, how the very name of patronage was something most distasteful to him, but I notice little kites up in the air already, and some newspapers, very close to the administration are drawing attention to and making attacks on the Civil Service Commission, and most startling of all, I see one of these kites now being flown by the senior member for Halifax. I read from a Halifax paper, I think the Chronicle, this note, which appeared in the issue of February 9:

Name Patronage Board

At a meeting of the Liberals in Halifax yesterday, the following were named on what is said to be a patronage committee; Alderman Findlay, Harry Murphy, B. W. Russell, Ralph Hendry, Mayor J. S. Parker, and C. H. Bennett. These men were selected by the Hon. A. K. Maclean and Dr. Edward Blackadder.

I could not commence to in any way vie with the hon. gentleman in the tremendous claims that he made for the total abolition of patronage. It was his long suit. We find that that long suit was played when he was in the Union Government, to make sure that no patronage could be indulged in by the Union administration, the Liberal-Conservative administration, but patronage of the oldest and worst type can be indulged in just as soon as the Liberal administration takes office. We all know what the idea of the kite is, how these things are thrown out for the purpose of seeing just how they are going to be received. The hon. gentleman still has time to say that he does not intend to stultify himself, that he meant what he said, that he believed, and still continues to believe, in reform—and I may tell him that there was more reform granted to the people of this country in the last five years than in the preceding twenty-five years—and that now, simply because his political friends occupy the treasury benches, he is not going to throw into the discard the principles which he affected to hold most dearly. I do not know what advice the hon. gentleman is getting as the result of the publicity given to this proposed change. I hope that he will take advantage of the present situation to deny that he has any intention of proceeding further and by disbanding that committee.

We have had lots of misrepresentation, and I think many of the misrepresentations —and I want to be fair about it—were made in the heat of conflict, as they are often made, without proper information as to the facts. But I would like to impress upon the gentlemen who now form part of the administration that misrepresentations can no longer be indulged in, that we are entitled to facts and that the business of the country should be conducted on a basis of facts. Let me illustrate what I mean by this, and I am going to address myself again to the Minister of Labour. I do not know whether many of the gentlemen in the House have had the privilege of hearing the Minister of Labour talk. He is a most eloquent and convincing talker. I think sometimes he gets carried away by his own eloquence, and says a great many things which he never intended to say. I may be wrong, but at any rate I would like to approach the discussion of one or two matters to which I am going to call the attention of the House, in that spirit.

Oh, Mr. Speaker, you should have heard the eloquence of my friend in the last campaign. You should have heard his denunciation of trusts and combines. He left nothing to be desired. These denunciations were delivered with the greatest force and eloquence and there were some peculiarly bad combines which he directed special attention to. He did me the honour of coming to my constituency and delivering a tremendous address denouncing anything and everything in his endeavour to make a hit. I have notes of his address taken at the time. He picked out for a very special part of his attack these iniquitous trusts and combines. He fastened all this upon the back of the late government. They were the protectors of the trusts; they created them; they fathered them; they aided them; the trusts were their children. He quoted Biblical phrases in connection with them; he found new decalogues in connection with them, and he was going to do tremendous things with them. Why, you should have heard him speak of Sir Charles Gordon of that iniquitous concern, the Dominion Textile Company, the concern that he had been waiting for two long years for an opportunity to hale before a proper investigating committee and to exhibit in all its nakedness and frightfulness to the Canadian people!

There was another concern that he said a great deal about, the Canada Cement Company. He disposed of the Dominion Textile Company and the Canada Cement Company to his complete satisfaction, but he never told the people that both those companies were incorporated under the Liberal regime. His charge was that they were Conservative creations. The fact is that the merger of the Canada Cement Company took place in 1909, and the merger of the Dominion Textile Company took place on January 4, 1905. I am making no charges against those companies. The charges were made by the Minister of Labour. He has been in power for some time; he has had an opportunity of considering the case of that awful man, Sir Charles Gordon. He has passed upon his case; he has sentenced him for his crimes and iniquities by sending him over to Genoa for the purpose of representing this country at that great conference. The minister (Mr. Murdock) laughs. Oh, the election is over! He charged us with having the support of these companies; and if he did not know, he ought to have known that, at the very time those charges were made the name of Sir Charles Gordon was to be found upon the nomination papers of the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin). That was the sort of thing that we took uncomplainingly.

The hon. member had a bigger complaint than that. Sir, the most monstrous, the most dreadful octopus, the worst of all the companies in the world, the one that surpassed all others in frightfulness, according to his way of putting it, was that dreadful organization known as the British Empire Steel Company. Why, my hon. friend waxed eloquent even for him; he rose to a height of superlative eloquence when he was denouncing that concern, and he went on to tell the people how he had investigated it and had found that, in the capitalization of the company there was no less than $230,000,000 represented by water or by good will. He went on to draw such a harrowing picture that it would bring tears to the eyes of the most hardened, as to the tremendous, awful burden that was cast upon the unfortunate people of Canada who would have to pay for all time dividends on watered stock, dividends on values that did not exist, simply because the wicked government that was, countenanced such things. And he stopped there, for if he had told the truth his purpose would not have been served. If he had told the truth, it would have been known that the minister and his friends were responsible for that incorporation. If he had told the truth to the people of Ontario, he would have said: "This is the investigation that I made. I found this tremendous amount of water. These incorporators came to Ottawa with their petition for incorporation. They went away without it and they took practically the first train to my political friends, the Liberal government of Nova Scotia and they got their incorporation." If he had gone further, he could have said; "Why, Mr. Macdonald, K.C."—he was not then member for Pictou; he has since been elected—"Mr. Macdonald, one of my political friends is general counsel for, or at least very high up in the councils of that company, representing them, working for them. Ah, yes, here I am also, walking the goose-step with Ned Macdonald in our nondescript army." But he did not tell us anything of that kind. Oh, no, there was nothing that was said about the facts. After all, it is all ancient history now; I hope it has gone not to return; I hope that, with office, my hon. friend will stick to facts. I wish him every success in his department. The country needs success in the administration of the Department of Labour; and as regards those who sit around me, my hon. friend can take no proper step to help labour, no proper step to help unemployment, but his hands will be upheld by those sitting on this side of the House.

Are we very much better off to-day? I am hoping we are, but are we? Look at the discrepancy that we have between the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Marquette. It is not a discrepancy as to a mere matter of form; it is a discrepancy that is vital. It goes to the question of establishing fairness and loyalty to his friends on the part of the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) or else a willingness to desert them and to scrap his party. He has taken his position and the leader of the House has taken his. They are diametrically opposed, the one to the other, and I am afraid we cannot do anything to help solve this question except to point out that, in view of all the circumstances, in view of the fact that a meeting was held of the members of this House supporting the leader of the Progressives, and that these matters were favourably considered, the great probability is that the leader of that party was correct in what he said. But, as I say, we cannot do much one way or the other to solve the question. It is a pity that we have so early in the session, such a sharp divergence on a matter of fact involving a question of veracity as we have between these two hon. gentlemen.

Well, we are attacked rather severely in connection with our railway policy. All the troubles of the railways, according to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) are attributable to the one man of whom, for some particular reason, he seems to try to make a Machiavelli. The Prime Minister dealt with the same question and did me the honour of referring to a report which I made to this House some years ago. I wonder whether he will put the rest of the report into effect, or whether he is going to confine his endorsation to just a few lines of it, because those lines serve, for the moment, a useful purpose. I wonder whether he believes what that report shows as to the woeful waste, the reckless extravagance, and the manifest impropriety of the whole Grand Trunk Pacific and Transcontinental venture; or is his endorsation applicable merely to these few lines? Well, it is quite true that the figures quoted by my hon. friend are correct. It is equally true that at that time the mileage of railways in operation was nothing like what it is to-day. It is perfectly true, for example, that in 1911, although the lines had been very largely completed, neither the Grand Trunk Pacific nor the Transcontinental was reported as an operating railway in Canada. But to adopt the argument based on the figures of the mileage of railways in operation would lead to the result of charging the Liberal-Conservative party with the responsibility of it all, the party that did its very best and fought its hardest to stop that iniquitous scheme. Why, hon. gentlemen know that railways are not operated immediately on their completion. Those gentlemen who come from the West know that long after construction has been completed much time elapses before any application is made to the Railway Board to open the lines for operation, and there have been brought to the board, time and again, cases which could not be dealt with simply because the lines concerned, although completed, had not been declared by the company to be ready for operation and the operation was carried on by the contractor. Furthermore, I think the House knows very well that, in connection with the right to charge operating expenses to capital account, there was a very special reason for a great delay on the part of the officials of the Grand Trunk Pacific in making the necessary application to the Railway Board, although the lines had been completed. To such an extent was this the case that the question was considered as to whether or not Parliament should take to itself power to declare the lines open and ready for operation although the companies themselves had not done so.

Now, I desire, in the plainest possible terms, to take issue both with the Prime Minister and with the member for Pictou as to who is responsible for the overbuilding of railways in this country, and who is responsible for this mess. Did any gentleman in this House, Mr. Speaker, ever hear the suggestion, until made by the Prime Minister in this debate, that it was open to this country to cancel all the charters that had been given and to set aside all the bond issues that had been made? Not only were these bond issues made, but the moneys had been provided and were in the hands of the trustees of the issues; and these moneys could be applied only to the one purpose. The fact is, as is very well known, that the great part of these undertakings had been completed at that time, that the right of way had been bought throughout, that a large proportion of the steel had been laid, and that the companies and the Government that had endorsed their bonds were absolutely committed to the undertakings and had to go on with them. I say that every charter, which is responsible for the overbuilding of lines in Canada, where that overbuilding to-day is burdensome upon the public, was authorized by the Liberal Government. Why, during the whole long term of the Liberal administration, during fifteen years, there were only two years in which there was not some Canadian Northern legislation giving charters or guarantee charters, guarantees, and the like. My hon. friends will find a great number of them, and they will further find only two years when none was granted. I do not want to weary the House by giving a list of all these, but I should like to specify some of the main charters,—charters which have resulted in unnecessary mileage, and consequent financial embarrassment.

Hon. gentlemen know that the invasion of Ontario by the Canadian Northern has proved very, very expensive, and is now demonstrated to have been for the most part entirely unnecessary. The charter for the line from Montreal to French River was granted on July 20th, 1905, but if you count the railway as in operation you will find that in 1911, according to the Prime Minister, we became liable for it. For the line from the township of Chisholm to Capreol, their divisional point in Ontario, the charter was granted on the 19th May, 1909. For the line from North Bay to Port Arthur, linking up the system with the West, and committing the country absolutely to the project, the charter was granted on the 15th May, 1902. When you get out farther west you will find that the charters for the lines from Dauphin to Battleford and thence to Edmonton were granted on the 29th June, 1897, and the 15th May, 1902, respectively. There is no doubt of one thing, Sir, and that is that, generally speaking the prairie lines of the Canadian Northern are good lines. If the Canadian Northern had been left where the Laurier administration found it, on the prairies, and allowed to expand there, and had devoted the hundreds of millions of dollars which were sunk in the building of unnecessary lines in the East towards giving absolutely necessary lines to the western farmers, its prairie system would indeed have been a great asset to this country. I repeat, those lines were good and necessary lines.

But the Canadian Northern system was not to stop there; that bold administration was determined to continue extension to the Coast, and it granted a charter for the line from Edmonton to Vancouver on the 11th August, 1899.

Mr. GRAHAM: Might I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Is it not a fact that the line from the Rockies to Vancouver, known as the Canadian Northern railway, was built under a provincial charter granted by the Government of Sir Richard McBride?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will deal with that in a moment.

Mr. GRAHAM: Why not now?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: We will get to it in proper order. Why this anxiety?

Mr. GRAHAM: There was never a line built under that charter.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am pointing out that so far as the corporate administration was concerned, these rights were given. The whole of that expensive Ontario-Quebec system was constructed under legislation of the former Liberal Government. It is absolutely true that, having got their charter from the Laurier administration, the promoters of the Canadian Northern system went to the British Columbia government and, for the purpose, as I think, of evading Dominion regulation, constructed that remaining link through that province under legislation granted by the provincial government. There is no question about that.

Mr. GRAHAM: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is also no question about the bond guarantees and the construction grants which these sections of the system got.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not in British Columbia.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Oh, they were appalling. I do not know whether my hon. friend is responsible for them.

Mr. GRAHAM: I say not in British Columbia.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I believe they got that chiefly from the local government.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not chiefly, but wholly until the Conservative Government came into power.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: My hon. friend is entitled to that bit of encouragement.

Mr. GRAHAM: That is a very important distinction.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Let him have it. But what does he say about the Government that with this line arranged for, with the charters standing, chooses deliberately to build a third line, paralleling the two existing lines, at its own cost in part and entirely on its own authority. Why, Mr. Speaker, there may be some room for argument that this country could support, and would support, two transcontinental lines; but when the Laurier administration embarked upon the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific they embarked upon a project which committed this country to three transcontinental lines, and I cannot find appropriate parliamentary language to properly describe such an act.

Let us see if that is an over-statement. The charter for the line from Edmonton to Vancouver was granted four years prior to the Grand Trunk Pacific project. It is true it was built under another charter; but the right to build was there. From Dauphin, Manitoba, to Edmonton, the charter was granted one year prior to the Grand Trunk Pacific project. From North Bay to Port Arthur the charter was also granted one year prior to the Grand Trunk Pacific project. There is another very extraordinary circumstance which shows that the administration of that time had a belief in the idea that three transcontinental railways could be supported by this country, because the charter for the line from Montreal to French river was given by that administration after the Grand Trunk Pacific project had been launched.

Well, construction goes on, guarantees are given, and millions of dollars of public money are placed at the disposal of the promoters of these railways. Then 1911 comes along, and with construction largely carried out, governments everywhere committed, the moneys in the hands of trustees—all this done, it is now suggested that we ought to have stopped. If ever there was something which goes beyond eleventh-hour repentance, something which occurs just before the end of everything, you have it in that suggestion.

I wonder if some of the eminent legal gentlemen on the other side will later give us the benefit of their views. If they do, we shall perhaps be told in what manner the Dominion could legally have interfered with a matter directly involving property and civil rights; involving the issue of bonds, the placing of money in the hands of trustees, the liabilities of provinces and even of the Dominion itself. But the suggestion could not have been intended to be taken seriously. The hon. member for Pictou says that because we did these things we are responsible for everything. But what would he have had us do? Did he want the settlers who had been induced to come to this country left without the transportation service which they were assured they would have, left without any way of getting out their crops or getting in their food supplies? What would he do with regard to the many villages and communities which would be without railway communication? What would he do with the commitments here and there and everywhere? What would he do with the large government guarantees, Dominion and provincial? He knows very well that there was just one thing to do: to carry on as best we could; to make the best of the exceedingly bad situation that had been created for us.

The hon. member says that we were responsible for the loan to the Canadian Northern. Every cent of the loan of 1911 went into the property, and the same is true of the loan of 1914. We did not want to take the baby; the government did everything it could to get rid of it. Not until everybody in Canada was sick and tired of putting up funds for private companies were the lines taken over. Is it not better, if we have to spend money in connection with foolish and improper undertakings, that we should at least know where every cent is going? Is it not better that if they are a success the country should get the benefit of it? Is it not better that the Canadian taxpayer should, to use a commonplace expression, get a "run for his money"?

Well, we are to blame for another thing, the hon. member says; we are to blame because the government consented to arbitration. I will tell the House very frankly that my own view as expressed in the report to which reference has been made was that there was no equity in the Canadian Northern. I took that view, and I still hold it. But the government were in this position: they were entering into possession of a property, and the usual thing when governments in civilized countries enter into possession of somebody else's phoperty is to have a free and independent arbitration for the purpose of finding out what that property is worth. The usual course, therefore, was followed in this case: three independent arbitrators were appointed. I have not heard any attack made by hon. gentlemen opposite upon the character, the standing, or the ability of any one of these arbitrators; nevertheless we are blamed because we carried out an award made by a board composed of men of the highest standing.

Then, we are frightfully to blame, the hon. member suggests, because we did not know that the Grand Trunk had an American mileage. Is it not a tremendous discovery which the hon. gentleman has just made—that the Grand Trunk has an American mileage? Well, my hon. friends will have no difficulty in carrying out the project if they approach it along the lines of the report which has been made. That does not call for government operation as talked about by the hon. member for Pictou. It does not mean that this Government will report to or take orders from the Washington government. It simply means that company operation will be carried on in respect of the lines in American territory and reports made to the Washington authorities with regard thereto by that company. The only difference is that company would be owned not by private, English shareholders but by the people of Canada generally. I do not see anything sinister in this. I am sure that so far all the trouble in this regard has been manufactured by my hon. friends. If they stick to it long enough; if they talk about it loud enough, I dare say they may find a sympathetic reception on the part of some across the border, but if there is trouble, the country will know how and whence it came. Is there any trouble in connection with the ownership of the Soo line by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company? Why, the Soo line gets along just as well to-day, owned by Canadians, as it did when owned by Americans. It is the same old company; reports are made in the ordinary course, and there is no trouble. The Michigan Central running through Ontario has no trouble in Canada, nor have I heard of any difficulities arising in connection with Mr. Hill's lines in the West. I have never heard any civilized country say that simply because the whole of a people of a very friendly neighbouring country are interested in an enterprise operating partly in their territory, the people of that neighbouring country shall do no business with them. But in the minds of these gentlemen who approach the subject with so much sympathy, this circumstance is a terrible bugaboo. I only hope that what I have heard is true: that a fair chance will be given national ownership.

But I wonder who is reading the situation most correctly? The Montreal Star has had an editorial upon the subject,—and the Montreal Star and Montreal Gazette are two papers referred to by my hon. friend from Marquette as being strangely sympathetic with the new administration. As to these papers we have the suggestion coming from governmental benches—yes, from an old member of standing—the suggestion of loaves and fishes. It is certainly a suggestion I would not make. Yet one hon. gentleman made it. I wonder why. I wonder what kind of a loaf and what kind of a fish that is. I wonder what kind of a monogram it would have upon it. I do not think any hon. gentleman on this side of the House at any rate, yes, or on the other, would have much difficulty in guessing what cabalistic lettering would appear upon them. Well, the idea of the Montreal Star, in its editorials, was plainly that the opportunity was an opportunity to prove the absolute impossibility of governmental ownership in this country, and if my friends are sincere in what they are about to undertake I would counsel them not to have very many gentlemen speak along the lines followed by the hon. member for Pictou, unless they want to be put in the position that they are absolutely and entirely sure that trouble will be made in the United States, so that they will have some excuse for getting out of the obligation which they owe to the people of this country.

There was another thing said by my hon. friend, the Prime Minister. He blamed us on this side of the House for our unsympathetic handling of the Grand Trunk Pacific. I wonder what on earth he meant by "unsympathetic" handling of the Grand Trunk Pacific. Good heavens, Mr. Speaker, this country was being bled white to look after that baby! Did he want millions more thrown away to keep it going? How much more ought we to have given it? Mr. Speaker, there are some projects so far removed from reason that the most reckless expenditure would be insufficient to save them. Some day perhaps we may have an asset in the Grand Trunk Pacific; but we have not to-day. Yet we are charged with being unsympathetic. We here are only interested, and I think I can speak in this connection for every member on this side of the House, in seeing that the property of the people of Canada gets a fair chance. We know that it is so easy to stifle and kill the project that frankly we are afraid a good deal will be made of the remarks of the hon. member for Pictou. In answer to his remarks to-day I read calculations given to the House by the Minister of Finance at the inception of the Grand Trunk Pacific project Now our vote last year on that account, if I remember rightly, was $26,000,000. Yet the whole cost of the undertaking, according to the figures given by the Minister of Finance at its inception—I am sure they were not his own figures but were supplied him by the railway—was to be $13,000,000, just half the necessary vote taken in the 9 p.m. House last year. It is wonderful what railway people can do with figures. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, if you have read the award in the present Grand Trunk arbitration. If you have read it you will have some idea of what railway officials can do with figures. As to the question of figures used by the Grand Trunk, some very harsh things have been said, but I prefer to take what their own arbitrator—not the arbitrator appointed by the Government or the third arbitrator—but what their own arbitrator says. On page 58 of the Award—I will cut the reading down as much as possible—he says:

> In 1913 the operating revenues were improperly increased apparently in order to justify the declaration of a dividend on the three series of preferred stocks, a full dividend on the first and second, and half on the third. Then came a period in which the London management was anxious to induce the Canadian Government to take the burden of the Grand Trunck Pacific off its back, on the ground that obligation to run and finance the Pacific Road might lead to the bankruptcy of the Grand Trunk. That led the London management to understate their operating revenues and charge the Audit Office Fund during the years 1915, 1916 and 1917 with an aggregate of nearly eight million dollars that should have appeared as additional revenue.
> In 1919 and 1920, when the sale of the road to the Government was being faced as the best course, manipulation of the accounts was directed to making the financial condition of the road seem better than it was.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, wonderful things can be done by people who juggle figures and who do not seem to care very much as to the accuracy of the reports they sign.

Mr. GRAHAM: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." I take it that he agrees entirely with my remarks.

Mr. GRAHAM: Oh, certainly.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I take it that he has not in view, perhaps has never heard of, the statement that was made use of in the campaign in West York in connection with the Grand Trunk employees, a statement that was used well in the interests of my hon. friend's party. It was to the effect that a promise had been given Mr. Kelley, either that he would be left in control of the Grand Trunk system, that the Grand Trunk system would not be taken over, or else that he would be put in charge of the National roads. I wonder if that is what my hon. friend was thinking of when he said "Hear, hear,"—if he meant that so far as he was concerned he was going to see that no gentlemen that had anything to do with the deception worked on the people of this country by these reports shall have anything to do with the management of the people's roads. I take it that that is what his "Hear, hear" meant. We still hope, Mr. Speaker that the chance given will be, not a chance to make certain failure of the roads, but a chance which will enable the country's properties to be successfully administered by trustees on the country's behalf.

I was very much pleased that I had the honour of being present at the impressive debut by the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) the other day. I heartily congratulate him on his wonderful success. It is a grand thing to have heard him, the big man from Quebec, in his first deliverance. Hon. gentlemen who heard him cheered him to the echo and I agreed with them.

Mr. GRAHAM: He may be right nevertheless.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: He made a great speech. My hon. friend says he may be right, but I am not going to tell my hon. friend what I was thinking of at that particular moment. But I really think, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman although great in admitted ability, did not cover the questions in this debate at all. Take for example, his statement that my right hon. friend insinuated improper motives to the hon. gentleman in the last election, saying that he was influenced by the great interests of Montreal. It is quite true that he was in the same canoe with these great interests. It was quite true he was the most dexterous steersman of that canoe, and handled it beautifully, but none of us on this side of the House would, for one minute, insinuate that the hon. minister was merely a tool of any big interest. He is too big a man. He is a big interest himself. Who is there bigger in Montreal than the hon. Sir Lomer Gouin? Who is there more connected with interests in Montreal than that hon. gentleman—and nothing can be said against him on that account, on the other hand, it is very much in his favour. I think those on the other side have been very wise in having associated with them a man of the hon. minister's brilliancy, but no one on this side of the House insinuates that anyone was pulling him by the nose. We think the operation was rather reversed. However, the hon. minister was wrong in some things. He was wrong when he said that my right hon. friend's reference to him as master of the situation was simply for the malign purpose of injuring Quebec and keeping alive feelings in that province which ought to have disappeared long ago. If the hon. minister would only give my right hon. friend credit for ordinary intelligence he would see that the suggestion was ridiculous. What in the name of common sense has he to gain by keeping alive in Quebec the present feeling against him? Would anyone but a lunatic adopt such a course? I have heard him called all sorts of names by gentlemen on the other side, but never heard him described as a lunatic. The hon. gentleman is simply wrong. Does he say that these great newspapers, the Montreal Gazette and the Montreal Star, are enemies of Quebec? Take the newspaper that worked up that roorbach about so many Montreal people losing their jobs and work being sent to Toronto—does he think that paper is inimical to Montreal? I would hardly think so. Let him look at any of those papers and say what they think as to who is the master mind. Let us see what the Gazette, which is so friendly to the Government says about it. I read from the publication of December 26, where I find the following:—

> When Mr. King jilted Quebec, and sought a union with the West there was joy in Toronto, but the rejoicing was premature as J. J. Morrison and Henry Wise Wood forbade the acceptance of the Liberal Leader's general proposal, and now he must turn for consolation and support to Quebec, the province he discarded. Mr. Crerar is here but will not enter the cabinet. He is willing but cannot deliver any substantial support Mr. Hudson has also returned to the Independent Liberal class, and he may follow Mr. Crerar's example. Political chaos reigns here, and with the failure of Mr. King's attempt to displace Quebec by western support there threatens to be instability in federal affairs until the people have an opportunity to revise their judgment of December 6th., Mr. King cannot lead, he must be led.

This is the extract from the paper friendly to Montreal and to Quebec.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Does the hon. gentleman think that Tom Blacklock, who writes these articles, is a friend of the Government?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not know who writes it, but I know it is printed in the Gazette, and I do know above all things that the Gazette is loyal to Quebec.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It is the paper of the Tory party.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Well let us see about that. This article continued—

> Mr. King was prepared to betray his party and to discard his policy to secure the Progressives, while Mr. Crerar was prepared to eliminate his party; but neither party would submit to betrayal. Sir Lomer Gouin and Senator Dandurand arrived here Friday night and "spanked" Mr. King.

I do not believe that the Minister of Justice did spank the hon. Premier, but I will just draw attention to this one thing, and I am only doing it for one purpose.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Hear, hear.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: And that is that it is quite idle for hon. gentlemen to think that because any hon. gentleman happens to come from Quebec nothing can be said against him without the charge coming from that side of the House that we are endeavouring to create disunion between the provinces. The situation is an intolerable one. Was the Gazette article writen to injure Quebec? My right hon. leader in his speech on the Address merely referred to the editorial in Le Soleil and read it without comment, and, because he read an editorial of a leading French paper without comment, the Prime Minister assumed one of his severe oratorical expressions—he can be severe—and warned my hon. friend that he had better be careful how he proceeded with this kind of thing. Does it come to this, that a French newspaper cannot, loyally to Canada, be read west of the Ottawa river? I would not have thought so.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Who says so?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I will ask my hon. friend a question. What was said by my right hon. leader on this most deplorable question beyond reading that reference? That is all he did. If the mere reading of it caused that outbreak from the Prime Minister, is there any need for my hon. friend to ask that question? There ought not to be, and he knows there is none. I point to this merely for the purpose of showing that my leader can have no reason for following the course that, without the slightest possible foundation of fact, has been ascribed to him. You know, Mr. Speaker, it all started in an imaginary speech referred to in the Globe, and supposed to have been delivered by the leader of the Opposition. That was copied in all parts of Canada; and the very moment that it came to the attention of the leader of the Opposition, he denounced categorically ever having made the speech, and he asked the Globe to give the reference. He has asked for it many times; but although that information was asked for a year and a half ago, the information has never been given. The speech was never made. There is a controversy going on in Ontario at the present time between the Globe and the Farmers' Sun. The issue seems to be as to who is the worse liar, and I do not think they have yet settled it to their satisfaction. It may be that they both win; but I am quite sure that the Globe will make the Farmers' Sun work hard. This party has not that enmity to Quebec which is suggested. Was the campaign run upon that line? Everybody knows that it was not. But, with some people, any old thing will do, and the great problem of the Government at the present time, as disclosed by the speech made by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), is to kill politically the leader of the Opposition. I would like to tell my hon. friends opposite that they cannot do it.

The Minister of Justice confuses what was said by the leader of the Opposition in his references to him. He seems to object to references to himself. Why, that was mentioned in the speech of the member for Pictou as evidence of ill-feeling, bad blood, on the part of the leader of the Opposition. The leader of the Opposition picks out for reference the most prominent men connected with the campaign. He has referred often enough to the Prime Minister, but simply because he happened to refer to the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Mitchell) and to the Minister of Justice, why, of course, it was insult to Quebec that he meant. My hon. friend knows that is ridiculous; everybody knows it is ridiculous; but I suppose it will continue. The hon. member, however, mistook the object of my right hon. friend's remarks. My right hon. friend was not attacking the Minister of Justice; he believes in the statement made by the Minister of Justice; he believes that the stand taken by the Minister of Justice is correct. He still believes, what he has always preached and preached just the same everywhere, that this country requires protection. Was that an attack made upon Quebec by the hon. member for Marquette, when he dealt with the same question and at greater length than my right hon. friend did? He was attacking a policy of the Minister of Justice. My leader is not attacking the fiscal policy of the minister. I think it may well be said that while my leader went down to defeat, the principles for which he fought were principles which were, in the large, endorsed by the majority of the people of this country. Why, what is said by the Minister of Justice might just as well appear in our platform. He believes in proper protection for the boot and shoe industry, and I think he is right in that belief. He believes in proper protection for the Quebec worker. We know that the Quebec worker requires protection, and we think the minister is right in that regard. In his final declaration, he says that he still believes in the Laurier-Fielding tariff. So do we, except that it is a little higher than ours, and except that certain changes have been made in the commerce and business of this country which to-day render certain items unnecessary. I say that it was higher than ours, and I will give my hon. friend the figures. The first complete year of the Laurier administration, 1897-98, the average ad valorem rate of duty on dutiable imports was 29.7 per cent, and on all imports, dutiable and free, 17.5 per cent. In 1909-10—that was after the second revision—the duties amounted to 26.8 per cent on dutiable imports, and to 16.5 per cent on total imports. The duties collected in the years 1920-21 on dutiable imports amounted to 21.2 per cent, and on total imports to 14.5 per cent.

The truth is that the present tariff is considerably lower than the tariff to which the Minister of Justice proclaims his allegiance. Let me take items which my hon. friends to the left would be more particularly interested in. In 1910, the year before the Laurier administration went out of power, the average duty on agricultural implements was 20.2 per cent. Under the reciprocity pact if passed, that duty would have been cut to 17.3 per cent. The present average duty on agricultural implements is 14.6 per cent. So, again, my hon. friend is entirely mistaken when he thinks that there is any attack made on him because of his fiscal policy. As a matter of fact, it is entirely, in principle, consonant with our own. We think the duties are too high; some of them, we believe, could come down. On the other hand some of them are too low. We believe that at the present time, with the tremendous amount of unemployment we have, it is little short of a crime for this country to be importing over $200,000,000 worth of goods that can just as well be produced at home.

Something is said about reciprocity. I wonder if it would not be possible some day to sit down and approach this question purely from a business standpoint. The suggestion in regard to reciprocity is that we can buy more from the United States and that they would take more from us. Well, I do not know any way in which we can compel them to take any more from us at present. I think there was a great deal in what the hon. member for Marquette said, that, while he was pleased to see the Minister of Finance go to Washington, at the same time the visit was ill-timed. Of course it was ill-timed, but was it made for the purpose of securing reciprocity? Or was it made for the purpose of influencing gentlemen to my left? Are we not buying enough from the United States?

There is one argument made by my hon. friends to my left, an argument which I have heard more than once and which has something to recommend it if the circumstances will justify it. They say that if you do not buy you cannot sell; you can only do business if you are ready to create a credit, so that the outsiders with whom you want to do business may be in a position to trade with you. There is a good deal in that, if you have not already established credits. But you can establish credits in many ways. For example, you can establish credits by importing coupons which represent your interest payments, just as much as you can establish credits by importing American automobiles. It is just the same. I wonder if hon. gentlemen realize that this country to-day is importing coupons in the neighbourhood of two hundred millions a year. Commitments outside, moneys that have gone to build the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Canadian Northern, and the like, the moneys borrowed by our municipalities, here, there and everywhere and by governments, and the moneys borrowed by industrial companies outside the country, amount to something like $200,000,000 a year. It used to be calculated at $180,000,000; but it is now said to be nearer the figure I have given. Have you considered what that means, what a tremendous amount of buying credit that represents, that is taken out of the country every year to pay commitments in interest, profits, etc.? You must begin your calculations with that in mind.

There is another thing for my hon. friends on my left to consider. They have more than once pointed out, in referring to the great success of the United States, that they have no duty on shoes and on several other things. The United States had very large duties on everything that they sought to manufacture, until they captured the whole of that manufacturing market, and when there was no necessity for having a duty on anything it was taken off. It will be agreed that the United States has done pretty well. It is a great country with a marvellous outside trade. For the fiscal year 1869-70 the United States imported, per capita, $11.77; in the year 1879-80 she imported per capita $12.57; in the year 1889-90 $12.28, in the year 1900-1 she imported per capita $10.23. Then, during the war, every one got extravagant; every nation was spending lavishly, and the great United States, in the year 1920, as against $10.23 imported in 1901, imported at the rate of $47.22 per capita. At the sight of this that great financial colossus becomes alarmed and you have the Fordney Bill.

Mr. CRERAR: Is not that due to the fact that the prices of goods have doubled, and in some cases trebled?

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: The importation has increased four times; but if my hon. friend waits, I think he will agree that the prices have not had so much to do with it.

Mr. CRERAR: They certainly have.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I do not care if the prices have increased. I am saying that the financial giant of the world became alarmed at an importation per capita of $47.22, and immediately introduced the Fordney tariff. Yet the people of Canada, in the year 1920-21, bought at the rate of $145.90 per capita. Mr. Speaker, are we not buying enough? Surely any one who knows the facts will admit that we are. What is the effect of the Fordney tariff upon us? My hon. friend refers to prices. Well, that is of importance, although prices had begun to drop. I have not these figures brought down to date because I have been out of the Finance Department for some time, but for the first four months of this fiscal year as compared with the same four months of last year, or on the one hand with the Fordney tariff in operation and on the other hand before it went into operation, we have the following figures on farm products, such as butter and its substitutes, cheese and its substitutes, meats (fresh or frozen), meats (prepared), potatoes, cattle, sheep, wheat flour and semolina, wool and milk (preserved or condensed), for the four months without the Fordney tariff our exports to the United States amounted to $33,546,000; with the Fordney tariff in operation they dropped to $10,070,000.

What about their exports to us? Always it has seemed to me most absurd that we have such large importations of agricultural commodities into an agricultural country. My figures there I have had put into quantities because you cannot get a comparison as well with prices. In butter, cheese, mutton and lamb, pork (fresh), bacon and ham, canned meats, potatoes, tomatoes, grapes, pears, peaches, eggs and honey, our importations in 1920, before the Fordney tariff was adopted, amounted in quantities to 27,499,000; with the Fordney tariff in operation our importations amounted to 45,124,000 in the like quantity of units. At a time when our sales to the United States dropped from $33,500,000 to $10,000,000, an enormous drop, we increased our purchases of these American agricultural commodities by 63 per cent. And yet some gentlemen think the tariff ought to be left just as it is!

And on this question of agricultural imports the burden thrown on the United States was not very great after all. I read from their Agricultural Staples Report on the tariff, Series No. 20:

> During the four months July to October, 1920, inclusive, imports of wheat amounted to 12,109,217 bushels, valued at $28,146,296; and of flour to 222,002 barrels, valued at $2,535,182. Substantially all of these shipments came from Canada, and were shipped during the latter part of September and in October.

To show what a comparatively small part that plays in the American market, let me complete the quotation:

> During the same four months the exports of wheat from the United States amounted to 117,981,296 bushels, or $339,278,520, and of flour to 6,055,829 barrels, valued at $70,144,803.

In other words, they exported $70,000,000 worth of flour in that period while they imported from us $2,500,000—a negligible proportion of their export business; and in wheat they exported $339,000,000 worth while we sent them $28,000,000—less than a tenth, and yet we have all this fuss and trouble about it.

One or two opinions I ought to refer to, Mr. Speaker, expressing the American standpoint on the tariff. On October 20th, Congressman John W. Summers announced that he was framing a bill for a tariff on imported wheat, with particular reference to Canada, which he expected to introduce in Congress at the opening day of the next session in December. He did not specify the tariff decided upon, but said it would be a "good stiff duty."

The New York Evening Journal of November 3rd had the following to say on the subject:

> During the first two weeks of October, Canadians sent five million bushels of wheat into the United States, competing directly, of course, with American farmers. Rather a nice situation for Canada, able to use this country and the farmers of this country as a dumping ground whenever it is convenient, and able in war to get for Canada and "the dear Old Mother Country" wheat raised by American farmers at a price limited by the American government. No wonder many emigrate from the United States into Canada.

It is hoped that Harding, during his administration, will do something to make the buying power of the United States profitable to Americans first, Canadians and other outsiders afterward.

Then let me quote from the American Economist, one of the foremost American papers supporting the Republicans:

It may be set down as final that the Canadian tariff revision will be purely with reference to Canadian interest and not that of the American exporter. That is the way Tariff revision ought to be undertaken. If the Canadian Government were to give first heed to the desires of the American exporter, it would be time for the Canadian people to put the Government on the scrap heap and to select one that could write across the papers of its legislation "Canada First."

I might state for the information of the House that that opinion was written before December 6. And yet we hear it suggested to-day that with our industrial and agricultural markets as they are, Parliament, instead of legislating for the benefit of Canada, should turn around and reduce the tariff, thus further disrupting our industrial situation and ruining the home market of the farmer. An hon. gentleman to my left said the other day that the home market was not much good, and would not be for another fifty years. What market, I wonder, does he think he is going to get under reciprocity? Why, with reciprocity —and you have had reciprocity with the Americans—they handle your goods just as long as it pays them to do so, that is, so long as there is a ready sale for them and it merely adds to their exporting surplus and so puts them in a better position to control world trade. It is only when you have a staggered, bleeding and exhausted Europe, unable to buy goods that the United States will refuse your business. What difference has the Fordney tariff made to the price of wheat to anybody? How much higher is the price of wheat to-day in the United States? Why, the fact is that reciprocity has nothing to do with the price. You all know now that the price of wheat is governed by the Liverpool market. Under reciprocity you give them the business to carry over for you and let them make the profits on mill feed and everything else to the detriment of your dairy herds, or you do it yourself at a time when both you and the Americans can sell. But at a time when both have a difficulty in selling, reciprocity or no reciprocity, you will be left just where you were. There are some commodities which can only be marketed at home; practically the whole of the dairy market is domestic. One of the difficulties encountered by agriculture to-day is the collapse of the home market as the result of the lack of buying power and lack of employment; yet some gentlemen think that if you make that condition worse, if you further impoverish the country, you will gain something. Reciprocity with a country which is the ultimate consumer of your products is a splendid thing; reciprocity with a competitor in business very much bigger than yourself is a very dangerous thing.

Reciprocity is not a new thing. We had a reciprocity treaty from 1854 to 1866. My impression is that it was designed to run a specific time, but whether or not that is the fact is not of importance. Our total exports grew during that period from $7,000,000 to $49,000,000. The results were fully felt in the national trade of the year 1868, when our total exports fell to $27,000,000. The reciprocity proposed in more recent years was something which could be abrogated at any time; there was no obligation to maintain it. In view of the one thing which made reciprocity desirable to the American people—the profits in the handling of our goods—and in view of the subsequent collapse of the buying markets of the world, no one can honestly think that reciprocity would have stood up for two minutes against the farmers' bloc in the United States, who are now getting what they want in the way of concessions.

I am honestly and genuinely interested, Mr. Speaker, in such an arrangement of the tariff of this country as will help the people of Canada rather than the American exporter. We have a tremendous amount of unemployment and the solution of that problem ought to be the chief concern of our public men. Many of our artisans, good workmen, men entitled to a job, are out of work, and we are still importing in excessive quantities things that these men could make and ought to have the opportunity to make. It is true that as the result of a campaign carried on last year, the carnival of outside buying has diminished. What are we to say to the workers of this country when the fact is that during the past five years our purchases from the United States have been $1,700,000,000 in excess of our sales to them? Are we to say to them that it is our intention so to arrange our financial affairs that that enormous amount shall be still further increased? If any word of mine can have the slightest influence on behalf of the Canadian workingman or can benefit in the least degree the Canadian home, I have no apologies to offer, Mr. Speaker, for the length of my address.

On the motion of Mr. Irvine the debate was adjourned.

PRINTING, LIBRARY, AND RESTAURANT OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. Speaker informed the House that a message had been received from the Senate communicating to the House the names of the senators appointed to act on behalf of the Senate on the Joint Committees of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament, the Library and the restaurant.

On the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the House adjourned at 9.48 p.m.

Monday, March 20, 1922.

The House met at three o'clock.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. McMurray for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his Speech at the opening of the Session, resumed from Friday, March 17.

Mr. WILLIAM IRVINE (East Calgary): Mr. Speaker, it is with deepest sympathy that I refer to the absence of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) from the House, especially when we consider the cause, the regrettable death of his brother. I am sure that the deepest sympathy of this whole assembly will be with him in his bereavement.

I have, along with other hon. members, I am sure, concurred in the congratulations that have been extended to yourself, Mr. Speaker, and therefore, it is not necessary to reiterate them. But I wish to congratulate the Government on being the Government. It might have been the Opposition. I wish to congratulate the Opposition on being the Opposition, because it might have been the Government. And, then, I wish to congratulate the Progressive group for the extraordinary position which they hold in this assembly. I think we may say that we have here, in tableau, that famous philosophic formula of Hegel. He attributes all progress to three factors, and we have them here. On the right of Mr. Speaker, we have the "thesis." On the immediate left of the Speaker, we have the "antithesis," and then along this side we are hoping we shall have a "synthesis." Of course, there can be no real progress until we reach an equilibrium between the two contending forces, and then we are in hopes that the Progressives will make the synthesis which will make the progress.

I do not think I would be justified in contributing to the prolonging of this debate if, by any chance, hon. members who preceded me had dealt with the two points which I am now going to take up before the House. This opportunity of expression comes to all of us as a traditional inheritance through our parliamentary system of government and it affords, in some instances, an exultant hour for doing so. Already two parties, striving for power, have had an opportunity to show their prowess. Already we have seen the war-scarred leaders of the past campaign flash their gleaming sabres of repartee across the old historic battleground, and nobody killed, so far as I have been aware; but, at least, each has done his best to establish the traditions of the party to which he belongs. Others of us, those who happen to be celebrating our political birthday, the first one by the way, and also those who are venerable in the service in this House, have received this opportunity as a means of giving our old hustings speech a much-needed airing. But perhaps the greatest pleasure which is afforded by this means of expression which comes to us on the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, is the opportunity to give expression to ideas which, under a different parliamentary system, might possibly be our contribution towards the legislation of this country.

The Speech from the Throne must, of necessity, deal more or less with generalizations, and one is never too sure about agreeing whole-heartedly with generalizations, especially when we recognize that these deal very largely with matters of administration, and are really not legislative matters at all. For instance, in the Speech, we have talk of the good time that is coming bye and bye. I have no fault to find with the good time; I hope it is coming and that it is not so far off; but I have my doubts about that. We are told that foreign markets are being negotiated for. That is another matter that is in the hands of the administration itself. We are told that the responsibility for unemployment will not be assumed by the Government. We are told also that a postal conference has been arranged between the United States and Canada—another matter that has already been dealt with. We are told that the delegates have been chosen for the conference at Genoa—another matter that has been already dealt with. Then, we have two co-ordinations, one of the Government railway system—another matter which is largely administrative, as was pointed out by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen)—and one of the Defence Department, another mater of administration. We are to have some change in the tariff. We are not told whether that change is upwards, or downwards, or sideways; but it is to be some kind of a change. Then, perhaps, something is to be done with freight rates. That is a summary of what is contained in the Speech from the Throne. In so far as there are legislative matters in this, and giving to it the most generous interpretation, I find myself in agreement with a good deal; but I also find myself in disagreement with some parts which I will mention before I have finished my remarks. I am, however, more particularly concerned with some things that are not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, so upon these things I will, more or less, concentrate my effort.

Of course, we all have matters of paramount importance; their paramount importance and their urgency depend, of course, upon who is talking about them; but with me there are two matters of paramount interest which, so far, have not been brought before the House. The first is the necessity for the readjustment of this govermental institution in keeping with the changes that are reflecting themselves in the various groups which we have in this House; and the second is to find food, clothing and shelter for people who, we are assured by the Government's statistician, have actually produced about twice as much of these things as they are permitted to use. The first is a political question, and I feel constrained to deal with it because the difference betweeen this House to-day and any previous parliament rests in the fact that we have some new political alignments and political expressions that are represented here directly as a result of what we may call a political revolt against the party system of government. If that political revolt was necessary on the hustings, and if it has already taken place in many constituencies throughout Canada, it is just as necessary that it should take place in this House. So that it is well that some emphasis should be placed on the importance of this question.

The other question concerns a pressing industrial problem which we can scarcely afford to pass by without serious consideration. I believe that we are to-day face to face with a new social order, and I think fundamental economic and political reconstruction of society is imminent. The evidence of this is found in what is commonly termed "unrest," and surely there is sufficient unrest, not only in Canada but throughout civilization, to make us pause and inquire into the meaning of it. On consideration we find that we are doing to-day in Canada and in other parts of the civilized world, precisely what the world has done many times previously in its history: society is seeking to accommodate itself to the new developments in life, industrially, socially, politically, and otherwise. This unrest of which we hear so much is, therefore, nothing new, although people seem to fear it; it is only a repetition of what has occurred at other periods of the world's history. We might go back in imagination to the time when society was in its plasmic form, when the individual first passed into the tribal state. There must have been unrest at that time, though, manifestly, not to the same extent as there is to-day, because the conditions of society were so much more plastic. When that tribal society passed into the state, involving slavery there was another period of unrest; and when slavery gave way to feudalism the same disturbance was repeated. And the same is true in regard to the replacing of feudalism by capitalism or individualism. Now, if we were to conclude that society, as it exists at present, had reached the ultimate stage of its evolution, that we were to stop here and go no further, then I should be at a loss to explain the meaning of this unrest. If, however, we come to the conclusion that society is still upon the march and that we are at the present moment at the intermediate stage between individualism and some other type of society, then we must ask the question: Shall not this Government seek to mould this political institution of Parliament which I presume does represent to a very large extent the industrial development of the country to the inevitable changes that we are witnessing, in such a manner as to make it work as smoothly and with as much justice to all parties as possible? To speak of making any modification in our parliamentary system may, to some minds, smack of irreverence or lack of appreciation of our British constitutional system. But let me hasten to say that it is really out of the profoundest respect for the best spirit of our British system of government that I am going to put forward my proposal.

The greatness of the British constitution, it may be said, lies in the fact that it is not fixed; that is, it possesses the elasticity of life. It has that most necessary quality, adaptation; and it has always in the past been able to accommodate itself to the changes that have taken place in industrial life. It is not, of course, like the American constitution, which is more or less fixed. That constitution is very much in the nature of a political yardstick. It is brought out from time to time, and the people are virtually told: you must not cut off more, or less, political cloth than you were told to do by Washington. The British constitution as it has been well described by someone, is a constant progress "from precedent to precedent." We shall not therefore find ourselves violating the great principle of the British constitution in seeking to secure modifications of our present parliamentary system to accommodate changes in our own political life. Someone—I believe it was one of our lady politicians in Canada, not, by the way, the lady member of this House (Miss Macphail)—has asked the question, what has made Great Britain great? In answer to her own question she said pratically this: In every great crisis of the nation's history, Great Britain has always possessed men of sufficient vision and sufficient courage to see coming changes and to make them before revolt forced the issue; and in that, she said, is to be found Britain's greatness. Now, every system, whether of government or of economics, has sprung from some fundamental human need; but we know also that systems which at one time possessed qualities of great value and which have served well in the past, through generations have become an actual hindrance to progress. Sometimes institutions have got so much out of touch with actual life that they stand in the way. If therefore systems and institutions spring from fundamental human needs, we must recognize that such needs are the paramount things to be considered, and that no system at any time must take precedence to human interest. Systems have been made by men for men, and this boasted system of ours was also made by men to meet human needs; and there is no good reason why we should not make it better if we can, or modify it so as to suit our own purposes and serve our own time better than it is capable of doing as at present constituted. Systems that have continued after having ceased to be of the greatest usefulness have the tendency to mould men after their cast-iron fashion rather than to recognize the principle that men should modify systems. And that, by the way, seems to me to be just about what this Government wants to do. The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said on the floor of the House that he had made an offer to the Progressives that they should have an opportunity, if they desired it, of securing representation in the Government; but he added the proviso that this must be upon the condition that they should cease to be Progressives, and become Liberals, whatever that might mean. That is exactly what I am complaining about: it is a system seeking to modify the representatives of the House to its regulations, rather than recognizing the right of representatives to modify the system to suit themselves.

There is the difference; the Government like any other institution, must be a developing organism, inasmuch as we happen to be a developing people—humanity itself is a developing organism, if we may consider it as a unit. Therefore, this Government must keep pace with the people which it seeks to serve, and it must be prepared to meet with the ever-increasing complications of our industrial system. Look for a moment at the principle of development. That principle has been stated for us most admirably by Herbert Spencer in his "First Principles." You remember how he traces for us the trail of that principle as it goes through, first of all, the material universe. He takes us through that universe from the time when it was a whirling orb of fire in space to the time when it began to sustain living organisms, and on to the highest achievements of man in art and in social institutions. And the principle which goes through all those processes and systems is this—a movement from the simpler to the complex and from the indefinite to the definite.

In that connection, Mr. Speaker, to show that we are in harmony with the very principle of development itself, I would draw the attention of hon. members to the complicated political situation which we have here. In the first place, I want to speak of the group sitting to your right, which represents the Government; and it is sitting there because it happens to be the largest group. It happens to be so for a number of reasons, chief of which is that we have a system of voting which makes it very difficult for us to receive the proper expression of the will of the people at the ballot box, and if the figures given by the late Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) be correct, the Government represents about 41 per cent of the popular vote. But I am not quarrelling with that at all. They are the Government because they happen to have the largest group in this House, and they represent in my opinion—the statement of the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) notwithstanding—the financial interests of this country primarily, but having, naturally, the desire that all the rest of us have to do the very best they can by the rank and file of the people as well. Of course, they have vociferated loudly against that charge, and some of them have actually risen to the point of oratory and punctuated their sentences with that much abused word, democracy, and told us that they seek to represent everybody. Well, democracy, no matter whether the term be used by hon. gentlemen on your right, Sir, or by those on your left, in popular parlance simply means an attenuated diaphanous nothing. As a matter of fact, the Government must take to itself the stigma which the hon. leader of the Opposition has placed upon them of being the representatives of the big interests. Then we look to the group which forms the so-called official Opposition, and I think we may say that they also when in power represent the big interests. They are what we might call to-day the politically unemployed, and are waiting their opportunity to serve the same interests, primarily that the present Government will serve. The third group is composed of representatives of the organized farmers. The fourth group—well, I must not forget the Independents, because I believe an hon. member stated that he was an Independent, that there were some others whom he described as half-Independents, and still others who were near-Independents. So, presumably, we have there also the nucleus of a group.

But that brings me to the consideration of the group for which I have the honour to speak this afternoon—the Labour group. We are very small, and for several reasons.

[Mr. Irvine.]

We are small because the great body of Labour has not yet been swung into political action; we are small also because the system of voting by means of which the present government holds power with 41 per cent of the total votes polled has prevented us through its gerrymandering from receiving the Labour vote that has been cast; then, again, we are small because of the way we are accustomed to measure things by so many tons avoirdupois, so much displacement, or by so many heads. If we are to measure that way we shall not make much of an impression on this House. However, I wish to state that the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth) is the leader of the Labour group—and I am the group. But even if we are small, I should like to say, without any presumption whatsoever, that a small living seed, however small it may be, is greater than a dead trunk, however bulky it may be.

But the point to be made in this analysis is that each group represents a definite economic interest, and it is really futile to vociferate to the contrary. Each group has the right to be here and to make a contribution to the government of this country, and I am speaking in favour of the idea of so modifying our parliamentary system as to permit each group to make that contribution in a manner that will be satisfactory to itself and serviceable to Canada. The complex nature of this House is, as I have just intimated, evidence of the political betterment which corresponds to the nature of the economic structure of the state. Moreover, it is merely a replica of that which we find throughout the provinces. We find four or five groups in every provincial legislature; we observe the same tendency in Great Britain; we find some six groups in the parliament of South Africa; we find numerous groups in the parliaments throughout the various countries of Europe, each one reflecting that industrial development which has taken place during the last century.

These new factors mean a progressive readjustment of our political institutions in harmony with the economic life of the state. They must also be in harmony with the law of life generally; and that law, as stated by another authority, is that the internal must change to correspond with external changes. If that correspondence be not met, then there cannot be the fullest life. Therefore if this Parliament is to function in the highest interests of our people, it must find some way of modifying itself to correspond with the changes which I have referred to as having taken place in the constituencies outside. Our parliamentary system prohibits us from taking, as groups, any real active part in the government. We have a parliamentary system which presupposes only two parties. In other words, our system puts us in the position of a farmer who has equipment for a two-horse team; by and by he gets another team and he has four horses, just as we have four groups; but not having the equipment for those extra horses they just stand in their stalls and eat oats —they do not do anything. That is the position in this House to-day. We have four groups, but we are working under a two-party system, with the result that the other two groups have little opportunity of making that contribution to the government of the country of which they are capable.

I would like to draw attention to this also: strangely enough, the 117 members who sit at the right of Mr. Speaker have generously undertaken to assume all the responsibility for the government of all the people of Canada, permitting the 117 who sit to the left of Mr. Speaker to go scot free, without any responsibility, without any regard to policy, and to become carping critics. Indeed, in some instances the 117 to the left of Mr. Speaker will do their best to hinder the other 117 from doing their work. That is the situation as I see it.

With regard to the selection of the Cabinet; with regard to the administration of the civil service and all appointments pertaining thereto; with regard to legislation itself, the Government has picked the pack and left the House to play with the rags. We may not enjoy playing with the rags, but it is all we have to play with at the moment. The procedure, then, would seem to drive representatives of Labour or members of the Progressive party either into the camp of the Opposition or into the camp of the Government. In other words, there is a refusal to recognize that there should be a place for such a person as a Progressive or such a person as a Labour man. As has been stated by the hon. leader of the Progressives (Mr. Crerar) and also by the leader of the Labour group (Mr. Woodsworth), we are here to co-operate; that is the principle upon which we wish to work. But co-operation is not a give-away game; there must be some reasonable basis for co-operation, and it is in the hope that some such reasonable basis will be laid that I am dealing with this subject. For instance, an issue develops here; something is advocated by the Government which Progressives or Labour men cannot support, and we have to choose between the defeat of the administration and the principle involved in the issue. Now, I as a Labour representative, have no interest in bringing about the defeat of the Government. I do not want to see this Government defeated; on the contrary, I want to see it hold on and do good work for the people of Canada. I have at least some confidence in it; I believe it is sincere and that it is going to try to do some good work. But when an issue develops in respect of which we differ from the Government in principle, we shall be forced to follow the principle involved in the issue; and then, as I understand the ordinary parliamentary practice, if the measure involving the Government policy is defeated by a vote of this House, the Government is bound to resign. To my mind, that is not a sound practice as things are to-day, and it should not be continued. I would like to see not only the Labour and the Progressive representatives but also hon. members on the Government side quite free to vote upon any issue according to its merits and without any thought of saving the Government.

So far as the hon. Prime Minister has taken cognizance of the political developments to which I have referred, he has used it as a basis to re-establish the party system on psychological grounds. In his able article which appeared in Maclean's Magazine just before the beginning of the campaign he sets forth the philosophy of partyism on psychological grounds. Summarizing his theory with regard to the matter, I would say it is this: that we are born Grits or Tories, it is a matter of fixedness of mind, and these peculiar manifestations which take the form of Progressive, Labour and Independent are the result only of conditions brought about through the psychology of the war. These, he says, will pass away and we shall settle back to the two types of mind,—Grit and Tory. Well, if that is true, then we have removed the political struggle of the centuries from the field of economics, from the field of politics, even from the field of psychology, and have brought it into the field where it is nothing more than a contest in fecundity. That is, if you are ever going to defeat the Liberal Government, more little Tories will have to be developed. That is the argument he has put forward. But as a matter of fact, the party system does not rest upon psychological grounds, although psychology is always involved. If you go back to the history of the parties you will find that their origin rested upon a very definite economic basis. If you go back about two hundred years you will come to the beginning of this "grand old party" system of which we hear so much boasting and of whose glorious traditions we are frequently reminded. And what were those beginnings? At the beginning of the industrial period a few old feudal lords who were able to survive the catastrophe of the passing away of feudalism, wishing to retain at least some of the power which they had enjoyed, organized a party called the Tory party. The word "Tory" meant in those days "bog-trotter". Then, at the dawn of the industrial period, certain others challenged the right of these Tories to have all the political power, and their party was called "Whig"—a Scotch word, which by the way, means "soor dook"— sour milk, if you please. Both these parties did excellent work; through many centuries they struggled with a great deal of sincerity. They made a splendid contribution to democratic government; they have been largely responsible for arousing in the people of this age a deeper desire for that greater democracy which is reflected in the principles of the Progressive and Labour groups in this House. But we must not stop there. There were only two parties at that time because there were only two conscious economic classes. But if there had been six economic classes two hundred years ago, would our ancient forefathers have had a two-party system of Government? I hardly think so; I think they would have established a six-party system of government. So to-day we have this complicated political system reflecting industrial development, and we are called upon to do for the twentieth century what our forefathers did for the centuries that have preceded us,—to modify the system of government in such a way as to make it practicable for Labour groups and Farmer groups to co-operate with any other kind of group in the best interests of this country. That is the plea I am trying to make; and in that connection I suggest—for it can only be a suggestion, of course,—that the Government move in that direction by not considering the defeat of a Government issue the defeat of the Government. That is not asking for very much,—and by the way, it might come in very handy sometimes for the Government, because it is not very strongly established as party governments go. We have just had, in the resignation of the Manitoba government, an instance of the operation of this objectionable principle. There, a Liberal government was in power, although it was in the minority. If such an arrangement as I suggest had been effected there, they might not have been voted out of office; but situated as they were they could not adopt any courageous policy; they had to move along very cautiously, and, as a matter of fact, did not do very much of anything. Remove that condition of defeat when a government measure is voted down, and hon. members will be free to deal with the various issues coming before them according to their merits. It might also help to do away to some extent with what is called the "official" Opposition. The "official" Opposition is rather a strange thing to those of us who have been witnessing it in operation for the first time. Of course there is a psychological justification for opposition. It is admitted that what we call "opposition" is a factor in progress. But such opposition, if real, is always based upon a fundamental difference in principle. Viewed in this light, opposition is inevitable as long as the human mind is limited and has to deal with infinite problems. But I know of no place either in the world of matter or in the biological world where opposition exists for its own sake, except in parliament, and there we do find it established seemingly for its own sake. We do not need to cultivate that opposition which is justified by progress. That is a spontaneous thing; it springs from the very nature of the issue itself. Moreover it is constructive, because its ultimate aim is the discovery of the truth. But the opposition as we know it to-day is more or less of a crude burlesque of that psychological opposition which we find inseparable from a consideration by finite minds of infinite problems, and the Oppositions of parliament have one by one degenerated into a cantankerous negation more intent on casting slurs on the administration than upon cultivating a positive body of opinion. They are more anxious usually to gain power by sophistry, innuendoes and destructive criticism than by demonstrating their ability to have power by their wisdom. They seek power more through the weakness of the government than through their own strength. And, remember, I am not referring to the present Opposition in that regard. The present leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) was Prime Minister of this country not so very long ago, and the present Government was then the Opposition, and it must be said that the leader of the Opposition had, when Prime Minister, perhaps the heaviest task that has ever fallen upon the shoulders of a Canadian statesman. What did we find at the time? The artificial political alignment that supported him collapsed, industry stopped to breathe after its great war effort. Thousands of returned men were coming home to civil life, themselves a problem, and constituting another problem by intensifying the struggle in the industrial field. The state had been bled white financially, and, worst of all, the enthusiasm of the people was dead; but notwithstanding all these difficult conditions he had to face, the Prime Minister of that day had to contend with a carping, critical Opposition that passed no opportunity whatsoever to use any idea that could be used either by innuendo or otherwise for political purposes. I am not criticising that Opposition for being in opposition; that is the nature of this thing we call opposition; both they and the Government were doing excellently well what they were supposed to do. But I am speaking against the thing itself. I am not referring to any personal action. Personality has little to do with the governmental structure other than as it governs the responsibility of individuals to conditions which they cannot control unless the source from which they spring is altered.

We have had some very brilliant passages-at-arms in this debate between the leader of the Opposition and the leader of the Government, but as I have already indicated, that amounts to little. The people of this country are not interested in that kind of thing. We are not interested as to whether the leader of the Opposition has discovered that the Prime Minister is saying something in this House different from what he said during the campaign;—if he is, that is a matter for congratulation. Nor, on the other hand, are we at all worried if the Prime Minister has discovered that the leader of the Opposition has changed his mind since the Speech from the Throne several years ago; for that, too, would be a matter for great congratulation. So what seem to them matters of serious crime are matters of great congratulation for the people generally. Moreover, I have noticed that the Government insists upon rubbing it in that the leader of the Opposition is a bad loser. Well, there is another virtue, and that is not to talk too loudly about a little victory you may have secured, and I think that might fit the Government about as well as the charge which they make against the leader of the Opposition. But, after all, these things do not really matter. I think it was Bentham who wrote in the eigtheenth century, "A man of talents should use them for his country in every way in which he can be serviceable." I therefore would suggest that the undoubted talent which the leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister of this country possess should be used by them in a patriotic sense, that is, on the great questions that are confronting the Canadian people at this time. I would like to see their keen intellectual powers of analysis centered upon such questions as the national debt, our paralyzed industrial life, unemployment, and the co-operative social order that is dawning.

Before passing from this subject, I want to say that I believe that any Opposition as we have it to-day is a very dangerous thing, because it seeks to undermine the confidence of the people in all forms of government whatsoever. We have had some manifestations of that desire in the past few years both in Canada and Great Britain. There have been people who said "We do not believe in any kind of government". Why did they say that? Surely, if all that is said by oppositions of governments, and all the charges made by governments against oppositions are to be believed, it is no wonder that the rank and file of the common people should have a very low concept of government. So, I want to say that in my opinion the opposition tactics in our party system are doing more to undermine the respect and confidence of the people in any kind of government than any other institution in the Dominion of Canada.

Belloc in his "House of Commons and Monarch" tells us that the House of Commons is an aristocratic institution, but that aristocracy has ceased to be aristocratic and the people have lost their awe and worship of the aristocracy, which really constitutes the basis of the system. This Parliament might be described as in some sense an oligarchy with a democratic visiting card which it presents once in every four years, but even if we dignify it by the name of a democracy, we might take a good hint from Belloc and realize that if we continue to use this kind of tactics we shall disgust the people even with democracy, and they will not want to continue an institution of this kind. Moreover, we find that the spirit which is generated by the antagonism of party-ism is not the best kind of spirit. The Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), towards the close of his address the other day, made a plea for co-operation or unity. While I noticed that the hon. gentleman took shelter behind the old feud between the provinces in answering the charges of the Opposition, nevertheless, I think the plea which he made was very timely.

I want to make a plea for co-operation. Let us get over this cantankerous negation of oppositions, and let us make it possible for every one to make a contribution and assume some responsibility for the deliberations of this Parliament. I believe that co-operation can be worked in parliament just as it is working in the great industrial system. I believe in co-operation in government, because it is already working unconsciously in the industrial field. I believe in co-operation in government because the fact of interdependence between the industrial life of the nation and international life is one of the most significant facts of modern history. We have been forced to co-operate through the industrial process of our time, and we are also being forced to co-operate in government by the political necessities of our time.

I want to speak now of the next question, which is that of the food, clothing and shelter of our people. We have already produced twice as much as we are permitted to consume. You will remember the problem as it was stated so admirably and so graphically by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth). He gave us something of the extent as well as of the intensity of this problem of unemployment, and he advanced, among other things, the consideration that organized labour throughout Canada has endorsed, some scheme of unemployment insurance chargeable to the industries of the country. We emphasize that because it is a necessity at this time. We do not recognize that it embodies an ultimate solution of the problem. But inasmuch as the governments—Dominion and provincial, as well as municipal—are to-day handing out for no service, doles which corrupt those who give and corrupt those who receive, it might be as well if some insurance scheme were developed which would place upon the shoulders of the Government the responsibility of finding work for those people who to-day are receiving doles for doing no work. I will not, however, traverse the ground which my hon. friend covered; I will take up this problem from a slightly different angle. I would like to say that I was very much disappointed with the statement in the Speech from the Throne that this Government considers it to be the duty of the municipal and provincial governments to look after the unemployed. I want to say in that connection that a mere statement in the Speech from the Throne is not sufficient to throw off the shoulders of the federal government the responsibility for unemployment which grows out of the industrial system of this country. The unemployment situation is but the fruit of a tree, the roots of which reach to the very subsoil of our national economic system. Unemployment is a permanent thing as long as the present system exists. In this connection I wish to quote very briefly from one who ought to know what he is talking about in this regard; I am going to quote an excerpt from the report of a commission of the Ontario Government of which Sir John Willison happened to be the chairman:

> The result of their enquiries has impressed on your Commissioners most forcibly the fact that the depression, which occurred in 1914 and 1915, was but a phase of the movement alternating between inflation and depression, which is a characteristic feature of modern industry. A false sense of security should not blind the business world, in times of thriving trade, to the fact that wide-spread unemployment is likely to recur in future.

Seemingly, this is a recurring defect in our system, and we have to find out where that defect resides. What is the situation to-day? Let us confine our inquiry for the moment to Canada. There is somewhere a chronic defect in the industrial machinery. We find on the one hand that great industrial enterprises are on the very borders of collapse; we find that industrial strife is rampant; we find that unemployment is extensive and exists throughout the Dominion. Employer and employee, producer and consumer, alike are dependent on the industrial machine provided for the individuals of the nation by producing goods as, when and where required. This is, of course, the accepted purpose of industries, namely, to produce goods that will meet the needs of humanity. But production for money has in some ways superseded the production for the supplying of human need. In this substitution of a secondary aim, we find the cause of our industrial chaos.

Now, let us look more definitely at this problem. Will anyone say, will any hon.

member of this House say, that our factories are idle in Canada to-day because there is no demand for our goods? Will anyone say that our factories are idle because we have not sufficient raw material or sufficient plant to produce goods? Will anyone say that our factories are idle because we have not got the men to put in them to produce goods? In so far as demand goes—and I think you will agree with me that demand is one of the first necessities to any industrial enterprise—I question whether it was ever greater in the history of Canada than it is at the present time. The population as a whole would seem to be desirous not only of maintaining its present standard of living, but of raising it wherever possible. For the desires of Labour men have long since passed the mere asking for a greater wage; they are asking to-day for a fuller life, for the means of education, for the development of every potentiality which they possess. Not only so, but it is safe to say that there is an actual demand, through under-consumption in our home market to-day, for about twice as much as we are now consuming. The housing condition is a case in point. It has been estimated by a joint conference of the building and construction industries of Canada which was held, I think, in Ottawa, in May, 1921, that we need 158,000 new houses. Now, that was some time ago. Just take into consideration the increased need through marriages and immigration, and I do not think it is overstating the facts to say that to-day we need at least 200,000 new houses in Canada. With a need such as that, with the necessity for 200,000 new houses, we have 200,000 men walking the streets of our cities without work. On the other hand we have unlimited supplies of natural resources and sufficient plant to convert these natural resources into commodities necessary for the building of these houses. Yet the factories are idle, men are idle, and we have not got the houses. Clearly, then, the paralysis of industry in Canada is not due to lack of demand; it is not due to a lack of natural resources; it is not due to a lack of plant; it is not due to a lack of people to operate these plants; but it seems to be due to a lack of finance, to a lack of financial credit if you wish. If that is not what it lacks I would like the members of this House, and particularly the Government, to take this question up and tell us what is lacking. Surely it is time that somebody discovered what is lacking. At the very least, we cannot afford to pass the problem by without studying it. It is here for us to solve, it is pressing, it is important; and so if what I have stated is not what is lacking it might be well if someone would come and tell us what is lacking.

The former Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) spoke to us several hours but failed to touch on this question. I was in hopes that he would give us his views upon such a thing as the gold standard and the futility of trying to restore it; I am still in hopes that the present Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) will give us that information, that we may know whether it is worth while chasing that ancient rainbow, trying to catch up with the credit system which seems to recede from us two steps for every one we are able to move towards it; and that we may try to find out whether there is anything wrong with the system of credit. In this connection I would like to quote to you very briefly from the statements of some men who presumably would know something about the unemployment phase of industrialism in its relation to the credit system. The Premier of Great Britain has declared that "Credit is the oxygen of trade." Professor Gustav Cassels, the eminent Swedish political economist, has denounced the deflation system, the withholding of credit facilities from trade and industry, and says:

> This policy is responsible in great measure for unemployment and world trade stagnation.

Sir Peter Rylands, President of the Federation of British Industries, declares:

> Another direction in which some relief might be found would be provided by an increase in the purchasing power of the community.

Sir William Beveridge, Director of the London School of Economics has asserted that > —the ultimate cause of unemployment lay in the credit system.

Sir Auckland Geddes, speaking before the Canadian Bar Association told a story of a Scottish friend of his who had ventured into this field of inquiry, and who, after very extensive study, came to a conclusion, which he gives in the following words:

> I believe we'd be rid o' a' this trouble if people would only realise that money is a metaphee-sical obstruction, and not a reality.

But if, as these men of great standing say, credit is the breath of life to industry, if it has the power to bring world organizations and industry to stagnation, if it has the power to throw hundreds of thousands out of employment, then even though it be a metaphysical obstruction, or even though it be a mere accounting system upon the books of the world, it is a question of sufficient importance to engage the attention of this House, and to call forth, for the information, not only of this House, but of the people of Canada, all that financial experts in our midst may have; first-hand information, given to us in such a way that it may be understood.

The present industrial plight, as we have seen, is not caused by a lack of demand; it is not caused by lack of raw materials, or plant, or equipment, or people to work. What then is the cause? I assert that it is the credit system. The present credit system has failed, seemingly, in its proper function, which is to link together, in some way, the needs of the people with the productive powers of the people, and the credit system lies, too, at the very base of our industrial pyramid. But there is some element of profundity that surrounds the study of credit. We are shoo-ed away from any attempt to find out anything about the banking system, and it is assumed that the ordinary layman should never dare to attempt to sound the unfathomable depths of this wonderful system of finance. As a matter of fact that may be very true, but we find that people, nevertheless, are beginning to challenge it. There is, of course, great difficulty in finding the proper information. Credit, being of a basic character, its nature is not easy to discover. Moreover, it involves a great deal of technical study which the common citizen wishes to dodge if he possibly can. Nevertheless, the credit system has received a challenge. Organizations throughout Canada are studying it now to the best of their ability. I have in my hand a resolution which I desire to read to the House, merely for the purpose of sustaining this point, that credit has received this challenge, that great organizations today are making it a subject of study, and that, in spite of the quietness and oblivion into which it has been thrown, they are going to find out about this thing. This is a resolution passed at the annual convention of the United Farmers of Alberta, and although it is, perhaps, a little more lengthy than the other quotations which I have given, I will read it simply to show hon. members that these people are thinking about this system. I am not saying that they have the right idea in this resolution; I simply say that they are on the trail of the idea, and that some day they will find it:

Resolved that the United Farmers of Alberta request their elected representatives at Ottawa to present a bill to the House of Commons for enactment having for its object the establishment of a loan department along the following lines:

1. That the Treasury Board shall issue on the terms and for the purpose herein mentioned, full legal tender notes from time to time to meet the business requirements of the country;

2. That all such notes shall be legal tender for all and payable for all debts, public and private, and shall be a first lien upon all the assets and services of the people of the Dominion for their redemption, and all Dominion currency now issued shall be made full legal tender;

You see, it is technical.

3. That this money be loaned direct to the people at cost, on the following securities: Federal Bonds, Provincial Bonds, Urban and Rural Municipal Bonds, on improved, inhabited and used farms, the amount so loaned not to exceed a fixed margin of safety. The range of securities upon which loans are made to be gradually extended from time to time by statutory amendment as experience and development of the system shall warrant:

4. That upon the payment to the department of any loan, the amount of money so received shall be held in the department and either cancelled or used in making new loans to meet the requirements of the country. Preference in these loans to be given to those parts where interest rates are the highest.

5. That the earnings from the Loan Department from all sources after paying the conservative and legitimate expenses of the department and its branches, if such exist, shall be applied to the payment of the general expenses of the Government, thus reducing taxation upon the people.

You see, the question is up; it is the coming question; people everywhere are studying it, and we have demands for things such as national banks. Some people seek to repudiate the gold standard and to substitute for it hours of labour. We have again such means of exchange suggested as "time energy." There are a number of other suggestions, and I am going, just for a few minutes, to introduce into the House the principles of another system. I am not declaring this system is any better than the others; I am going to present its principles, simply in order that I may be permitted to make a certain request to this House with regard to proposals which I shall hereafter set forth.

Money has at least two functions,—although those of us who are expert financiers may find other functions for it. It is a medium of exchange and it has also a power to represent demand. This second power seems to be the greater or more important of the two; and though there should be a definite relation between money and ability of production to fulfil demand, we find that no such relationship exists. We have criticisms levelled against it, not only because of the cost to the people, not only because of the manner of its issue, but because of the way in which it is controlled. The whole price of an article must cover wages, salaries and other dividends. Therefore, it cannot be expected that the wages of an individual can buy back what he produces, inasmuch as the price of the thing that he produces, includes his own wages, overhead expenses, cost of raw materials, and the dividends and profits of the operators. If your wages happen to be fifty per cent of the price of the article, you can obviously buy only fifty per cent of what you produce. Incidentally, that is exactly what we are doing in Canada. According to the figures of the Dominion Statistician, we are producing twice as much as we are permitted to consume. The demand is still great; but with the wages paid to us, we cannot buy back enough of what we have produced to meet our needs. The present system of credit is not, according to some people, the best thing for industry. The home market is, of course, determined by the amount of goods that the wages that are paid to the people at home can buy. If we can buy only fifty per cent of what we produce, our market is limited by fifty per cent. Consequently, we find our Government looking out for foreign markets, and this was stated in the Speech from the Throne. Where are we going to find them? Foreign markets do not come to us like driftwood, and are not picked up on the seaboard, foreign markets can be created only when we are able to increase the purchasing power of the people who live where those foreign markets are; because it is only by increasing the purchasing power of the people that you can enable them to buy from you. How does the Government propose to increase the purchasing power of the people of South Africa, of Europe, of China or of South America? I think it is more reasonable for us to hope that we might increase the purchasing power of the people of Canada. If we could enable the people of Canada to buy twice as much as they are now buying, we should have a very extensive home market. The leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) was right, when during the recent campaign, he emphasized the necessity for developing home markets. Of course, I part company with him immediately when he says that we are to develop the home market by increasing the tariff. He will develop the home market by increasing the tariff, while, on the other hand, strangely enough, the Government will develop it by the opposite method of decreasing the tariff. Well, we can leave the two parties to fight that question out between themselves. Personally, I do not think it will make any difference to our markets whether we increase or decrease the tariff, because that is not really a fundamental economic question at all. It is, rather a most excellent political football, which has been kicked across the field of public opinion for forty years, with no effect in increasing foreign markets. Neither the Government that advocated an increase of the tariff, nor the Government that urged its decrease, has advanced the markets in this country very materially. So that we may be justified in looking in other directions for a market for the produce of Canadian workmen.

The greatest charge I have to make against the present Government is as regards the issue of credit money. It is not necessary to say that the banks to-day have a monopoly of the issuing of financial credits; and the credit is usually issued in the interests of the shareholders and not for the benefit of the country. It is also issued with an adherence to the gold standard and not on a proper economic basis. The volume of credit is created and issued by the banks irrespective of demand or ability to produce. Thus we in Canada to-day are really at the mercy of Wall Street, whether we realize it or not. We are manipulated by them, from booms to slumps, at their convenience. To remedy this I believe that some new system must be found; or perhaps there should be some reorganization of the old system,—that is for the Government to consider. I believe, that first of all, there must be a regulation of prices upon an economic basis. This would mean that prices would be determined by a correct ratio between total national production and total national consumption. At present, prices include cost of plant and overhead, materials, dividends, wages, etc. These expenses are charged and are paid always by the consumer,—there is no one else to pay them. Prices therefore could be reduced by the amount of capital expended in production, which expenditure could be made good to the capitalist by an issue of Government treasury notes. Such notes would represent the difference between the total cost incurred and the total price received. In this way prices would be reduced automatically without a loss to any private enterprise. The recognition of real credit as created by and belonging to the community must underlie any such proposition, and we therefore, of course, look upon credit in this respect as being a correct estimate of the ability to produce and deliver goods as, when, and where required. You will recognize in that statement the famous Douglas definition of credit, a system of credit which is being advocated by some very great authorities in the financial world at the present time. I am not, of course, setting it forth here, as the one inevitable way, but I mention it more in detail than I mention the others because it seems to me to be the most practicable; and I shall possibly look at the question further before I conclude.

There are two factors employed in real credit, namely, needs to be satisfied and ability to produce; and both producers and consumers are necessary in the creation of such credit. On this basis treasury notes could be issued periodically to represent real credit as it expands or contracts. There could not be any inflation such as was experienced during the war that would be checked by the regulation of prices. Such a system might be arranged on the principle of decentralized control. It would not operate properly in a bureaucratic system such as would likely be developed by government ownership. Government ownership is a very difficult thing. It is yet to be tested, and I have not very much faith in it whether in regard to railroads, or banks, or any other institutions. It may be a very good midway between individualistic control and any other form which might be in process of development. Government ownership might not do any more than transfer control from an efficient autocratic corporation to a less efficient and possibly bureaucratic state organization. But, by a proper decentralized system of controlling credit on the basis that credit is created by the community, belongs to the community, and should be operated by the community, it might be possible for organizations such as Boards of Trade, the Manufacturers' Association, the United Farmers, the organized Labour movement, the Great War Veterans' Association and similar bodies, to handle their own credit. But first we must realize what credit actually means and proceed to establish a system on that basis.

[Mr. Irvine.]

We should also require to have a national clearing house. In other words, a proper democratic system of credit should be organized, a system which would provide the greatest amount of local responsibility and control consistent with that measure of unity necessary to secure efficiency; in other words, a method which would combine the excellencies of individualism and of communism without involving the errors and weaknesses of either.

Let me put this system before the House by means of analogy. We hear much talk to-day of commonwealth; we have substituted the word "commonwealth" for the old term "empire." We are now known as a "commonwealth of free nations." As a matter of fact, however, we have no commonwealths to-day, but if we had a commonwealth there would be, I presume, an annual dividend of surplus national wealth to be divided amongst its citizens. That, of course, would be very Utopian, so Utopian that we can scarcely even mention it. But the Douglas system, to which I have referred, and which I would commend the House to study, would make it practicable to receive our dividend in the commonwealth in the form of reduced prices. One credit system is based on the idea that real credit is created by the community through its producing power and belongs to the community, by whom it should be operated. The other credit system assumes that credit should be created for and by a small group of financiers to be handled on the gold basis of value with a view to the shareholders' profits, and not in the interests of industry. The latter is our present system, and its central error is that it is not concerned with the production of goods but with the production of money. If you make credit facilities more available there follows an immediate inflation, which reduces purchasing power, as happened during the war. Under the system I mention, however, this would be impossible by reason of the regulation of prices on the basis of a correct ratio between the consuming power of the people and their producing power. The fixing of prices which we had during the war was not, of course, of the type which I referred to. That was more or less mechanical, and it left too much power—dangerous power—in the hands of a small commission. It was an annoyance both to manufacturers and retailers, and did not contribute a sufficient quota of good to recompense them for all their trouble. But there would be no danger in any such system if we could find a measure of local control such as I have suggested.

With regard to foreign markets in connection with our credit, inasmuch as we cannot create foreign markets, unless we can increase the purchasing power of the people of the countries with which we wish to trade, we had better turn our attention to our own markets. If we had control of our own financial credit it would be possible for us to do something to exploit these vast natural resources of which we have heard so much on the floor of the House already this Session. Take, for instance, our water powers. If we could develop those powers through a proper credit system and in a social way, it would be of very great benefit to our manufacturing interests. We are told that we must get more manufactories in this country. Very well, the only way, we have been told so far, is to try to reduce the wages of the labouring people in order that there may be cheaper production and a greater ability to compete in the foreign market. But it would be a far better way if we developed our water powers so that our manufacturers could produce so cheaply as to be able to sell their goods in all parts of the world; and the very fact of such cheap production here would attract other manufacturers to this country. That, in my view, is a much better way than that which we are pursuing at the present time.

We must recognize that the competition for trade among the nations of the world arises out of a false credit system which has no regard for the needs of the people or their producing power, but seeks to build up merely a money system, and promotes competition for world trade, which competition is really at the basis of every war, that thing the world is trying to get away from. In this connection I want to quote the words of President Wilson. In a speech at St. Louis in September, 1919, he said:

> Peace? Why, my fellow citizens, is there any man here or any woman—let me say, is there any child—who does not know that the seed of war in the modern world is industrial and commercial rivalry? The war was a commercial and industrial war. It was not a political war. The real reason that the war we have just finished took place was that Germany was afraid her commercial rivals were going to get the better of her, and the reason why some nations went into the war against Germany was that they thought that Germany would get the commercial advantage of them. The seed of the jealousy, the seed of the deep-seated hatred, was hot, successful commercial and industrial rivalry.

Sir Auckland Geddes, addressing the Canadian Bar Association in this city last year, said:

> I believe rather that the war was a product of existing world unrest than that it is a cause, an effective cause, of the unrest which exists just now; for the war, if you cast back your memories, will appear as the climax of a period in which the relations between the nations were growing more difficult, and you will find also associated with that period of international unrest a period of unrest within the countries.

Inasmuch, then, as we have here not only the cause of unemployment, the cause of the disruption and paralysis of industry in our country, and the cause of international industrial strife leading to the great wars which we all deplore, I should like to suggest to the Government that a representative committee be appointed, composed of members from the Manufacturers' Association, the Retail Merchants' Association, the Organized Farmers' Association, the Labour forces of this country, and similar organizations, to investigate the present credit system, how it functions, its relation to modern industrialism, and if it is a contributing factor to unemployment. I would further suggest that that committee should also make the closest possible inquiry into all the systems, particularly the Douglas system, proposed in support of a credit system that would be economical, serviceable to democracy, and in the best interests of our industrial life. I believe the Bank Act comes up for revision next session. It would be a very excellent thing for the committee I have suggested to report very fully at that time, for surely whatever is done in amending that act must be done in the light of the fullest and best knowledge, and perhaps on this subject we as individuals are not so fully informed as we ought to be. I should like to see the best experts obtainable engaged to deal with the problems incident to our credit system, so that before the Bank Act is amended we may have the fullest possible information in our possession,—information which will enable us to solve the problem itself and so meet the pressing needs of the people. The Douglas system has been endorsed by such a recognized authority as Arthur Kitson, who was challenged by a committee of business men in Great Britain to produce some solution for the industrial problem in that country. That system has also been included in the Sydney University course in economics. Therefore, it is a system that cannot be laughed out of court until we have had some chance of disclosing any weak fundamental points in regard to it, if that be possible.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a new Parliament, this is a new country, and this is a new age. I have advocated that we must first of all remodel our parliamentary institutions to the extent that there may be possible a basis of co-operation for all these new political factors which are a reflection of the industrial development of our time. That, surely, is not asking too much. Such a remodelling would be a good thing not only for this Government but for all governments. It would infuse some real meaning into our debates and enable us to treat fully on its own merits every issue that may come under discussion. I have also suggested that a committee be appointed to investigate what seems to lie at the very basis of our industrial troubles, namely, the credit system.

I am sure that we may place the most generous interpretation on the promise of the Government that it is going to do its very best to give us good government during its tenure of office. I am looking to it for a type of statesmanship which will be worthy of the new age in which we are living, but I am bound to say that in the Speech from the Throne there is no indication of that breadth of vision or of that courage which the people are looking for at this time. Vision to see the new path leading to a co-operative state, and courage to abandon the old path, are the two indispensable qualities of modern statesmanship. In his book, "Industry and Humanity," which I had the pleasure of reading some years ago, the Prime Minister has dealt to some extent with the problem that I have referred to, namely, the industrial problem, and in that title alone he has got the true relationship of the problem of industry, its relation to humanity. In this new government I hope there will be a decided movement towards the bringing of our industrial life into harmony with the great aim suggested in that book, and that our industry shall be run for humanity, and not for money as is the case to-day.

Might I conclude with a short quotation from the manifesto of the British Labor party, that great Magna Charta of modern times? It reads:

> We must insure that what is presently to be built up is a new social order, based not on fighting but on fraternity—not on the competitive struggle for the means of bare life, but on a deliberately planned co-operation in production and distribution for the benefit of all who participate by hand or brain—not on the utmost possible inequality of riches, but on a systematic approach toward a healthy equality of material circumstances for every person born into the world—not on an enforced dominion over subject nations, subject races, subject colonies, subject classes, or a subject sex, but in industry, as well as in government on that equal freedom, that general consciousness of consent, and that widest possible participation in power both economic and political, which is characteristic of Democracy.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (King's, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the hon. member (Mr. Irvine) in extending my personal sympathy, and, so far as I may, the sympathy of this House, to the hon. leader of the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the bereavement that has come to him in the death of his brother.

The debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, particularly in a new parliament, is or ought to be a fair reflection of opinion throughout the country on the public questions of the day, and should, therefore, be helpful to the Government as regards both legislation and administration. I have given some attention to the discussion that has taken place so far, especially to the speeches which have been made by members of the group known as the Progressive party. In my judgment, the discussion has been creditable to these representatives: they seem to me to be sane, intelligent, practical men. No country has much to fear from men whose interests and investments are rooted in the soil. No country has much fear from men who own their own farms and till them. Hon. members of the Progressive party naturally look upon things from a western viewpoint, and we in the East perhaps, look upon things from an eastern viewpoint. But when we come together to discuss these matters freely and frankly, we shall, no doubt, arrive at satisfactory solutions of the problems which confront us.

Members of the Progressive party are sometimes accused of wishing to bring class legislation into operation. There may be something in that, but is class legislation an unknown thing in Canada? In my judgment, Sir, we have had class legislation in this country for forty years, and it has been advocated by very intelligent men. We had an exemplification some years ago of class domination. when the great trade arrangement of 1911 was made between this country and the United States. Undoubtedly the reciprocity agreement was in the interests of the farmers, the fishermen, the lumbermen, of this country; particularly was it in the interests of the farmers. It was a trade arrangement which both political parties had expressed themselves in favour of and which nearly every public man—and private man, too—had endorsed. It was a better trade arrangement than we ever thought we could obtain. Yet certain class interests—largely in Ontario, though in some of the other provinces as well—selfishly, I think, and unfortunately, turned down that trade arrangement. If it had not been for the action of these classes at that time, possibly we would not have a Farmer's party in Canada to-day.

We have heard a good deal of discussion with regard to that paragraph in the Speech from the Throne relating to immigration. Several of the hon. members who have taken part in this discussion seem to approve of the idea that immigration of the right kind would be a great advantage. Prominent men outside of the House have also given expression to that view, notably the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. The idea seems to be that it would be a very desirable thing for Canada if we could get men from Europe or from the United States to come here, take up land and increase our farming population. That would be immigration of the right kind, it is argued; and immigration of the wrong kind would be the incoming of mechanics, men accustomed to industrial pursuits, who would locate in our cities; and it would be the wrong kind of immigration because there is unemployment; there is not enough work for the men that we have. But is there no unemployment on the farms? Are farmers making money? Are they even making ends meet, either in the East or in the West? I think not. I know the conditions in the province from which I come; its people are almost entirely engaged in farming and fishing, and I endorse the statement that was made by an hon. gentleman on the other side a few evenings ago: that the farmers of this country are living on their capital and hoping that times will improve. Under these conditions, therefore, would it be desirable to bring into this country immigrants of the farmer class? I do not know, but it is a question that is open for consideration. If the output of our farms were increased by one-third or one-half, where would we find a market for our products? We might, perhaps, market more wheat than we are producing, but I do know that in respect of some agricultural products we cannot find a market now at any price. I speak particularly for the province from which I come. The climate and soil of Prince Edward Island are admirably adapted to the growing of potatoes. Last year we had no market whatever for our potatoes, we could not get five cents a bushel for them; the farmers had to haul them out and dump them in the fields. This year conditions are nearly as bad. I understand that in Western Canada some of the farmers did not thresh their oats last season because the price obtainable would not pay for the threshing and hauling to the railway station. Therefore is there room under present conditions for more farmers in Canada? Would it not be better if we tried to improve the conditions so that those already on the land would remain there and not flock to the cities as they are doing at the present time? The province from which I come is losing its population steadily, year by year, and decade by decade, and what the end will be is hard to say.

I heard the hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie), who is an apple grower, state in the House a few evenings ago that he was a strong protectionist, because the protection that he and his fellow-orchardists got on their apples enabled them to charge the men on the plains more than they could otherwise obtain. That is good sound protectionist doctrine; but is it fair to the other fellows? We in Prince Edward Island do not want any privileges in the sale of our potatoes. Indeed, we are anxious to meet the competition of the world, and if we had the privilege of sending our potatoes into the New England states free of duty we would consider ourselves a happy people. Our soil and climate are admirably adapted to the growing of potatoes, and we think we are just as capable, granted a fair field and no favour of raising what our climate and soil are adapted to as any other people in the world. We fear no competition. Now, why did my hon. friend from Yale and his fellow-orchardists need protection? Why were they not able to grow apples in competition with the states to the south? As I understand it, the soil of British Columbia is fertile, and the climate favourable for the growing of apples. The land is much cheaper than it is in the states immediately to the south, in Washington and Oregon, for instance, and I suppose my hon. friend would not deny that the people of British Columbia are the equal in intelligence and industry of their neighbours to the south. Then, why cannot they produce apples just as cheaply? There must be something wrong with Canadians if they cannot meet fair and reasonable competition.

There is a reference in the Speech from the Throne to the extension of markets. I shall have to be a little local in some of my remarks on that subject in order to be practical. I want to bring to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) the fact that the markets we had a few years ago in the province of Prince Edward Island have been almost ruined under the late administration, partly through the legislation that was passed, but more particularly through the administration of the regulations enforced under that legislation. We had a trade in dressed meat with the islands of St. Pierre and Miquelon. We had also a trade in live cattle with these islands, and also with Newfoundland, until a regulation was put in force by one of the departments, under legislation, I suppose, preventing us from shipping outside of Canada any dressed meat of any kind unless it had been inspected by government inspectors. For a year or two after those regulations were put in force the Government had inspectors in some places, but lately that was done away with, and now we cannot get any inspection at all and the trade is being killed. It was quite customary for the people living in Newfoundland, where they do not raise agricultural products sufficient for their own use, to send their vessels to Prince Edward Island in the autumn and spring of the year, but particularly the autumn, to bring back agricultural products such as potatoes, turnips, oats and hay. They would also take back a few carcasses of dressed pork, a few of dressed beef, and perhaps a few of mutton. That was a trade that we carried on for years to the mutual advantage of both peoples. Nobody was injured by it; nobody was poisoned when we had no inspection. But when these regulations were put in force we could not carry on that trade. These vessels would come to the outlying ports and when there was no inspection the animals could be killed on the day the vessel sailed, or the day before, and with a fair wind the vessels would be back in their home ports in two or three days and the meat would arrive in good condition. But when the regulations were put in force the animals had to be inspected at Charlottetown, which was distant some fifty or sixty or seventy miles in some cases. That meant that the animals had to be killed several days before the vessel was ready to sail. There was also the additional expense of the freight to Charlottetown and back and the cost of inspection. You did not know what day the vessel was going to sail, as they would wait for a fair wind, and that increased the difficulties of carrying on this trade to such an extent that we are not carrying it on now.

Another business that we had which was very profitable to us was the canning of poultry. We have canning establishments on the island, and we raised large quantities of poultry and eggs, and disposed of a large quantity every year. Formerly, we could can the poultry and ship it to the United States, Newfoundland and other countries, but that trade has been stopped because everything has now to be inspected. We have now to send our poultry to the United States, to Boston, in carload lots, pay the duty, and get what we can for it, and they are carrying on there the canning business that we should be doing. We are a bureaucrat-ridden people. There are apparently men in the offices in Ottawa who think they know more about trade conditions than the men who are actually engaged in the business, and they put all kinds of foolish regulations into effect without considering the local conditions. I suppose that something may be said for these regulations in large centres such as Montreal, Toronto, and Hamilton, where inspection of the larger slaughter houses can be easily carried on, but the trouble is that the men in the departments at Ottawa do not appear to take local conditions into account at all, and apply the regulations in a cast-iron way. I bring these things to the attention of the Government in the hope that better regulations will be devised.

These are the things that make life on the farm hard. There are other grievances. The manner in which the Income Tax Act is at present administered, as respects the farmers in some of the provinces, is almost intolerable. It is foolish; I think it is worse in our province than in any other part of Canada. Circular letters are sent out to the farmers from the Taxation office asking them to make a return respecting everything that is raised on the farm; they have to make a report on the quantity of butter, eggs, milk, cheese—everything they consume in their own families. Now farmers do not weigh their products or keep such accounts as will enable them to furnish the desired information. With our retail merchants trade is largely a matter of barter; and yet each merchant is required to keep an account of the name of every farmer, or every person, from whom he buys agricultural products, such as butter, cheese, eggs, pork, hay, oats, potatoes; and he must also furnish the post office address of the seller, state whether married or single, and give the price paid—details such as no ordinary retail merchant keeps. Yet he is threatened with all kinds of pains and penalties if he does not comply with the regulations and send in a report containing the desired information. What is the result? The country merchants, through a dread of being fined, make out bogus reports—they cannot do otherwise. It is alleged that these reports are desired for the purpose of checking up the transactions of the farmers, to see if they are making proper returns and whether or not they are liable for income tax. Some merchants have refused to make such reports and in consequence have been threatened with dire penalties. A number of farmers have also refused to do as requested; the reports demanded are so complex in character that it would really require a fairly proficient accountant to draw them up in such a way as to satisfy the taxation officer. I am convinced, Sir, that fifty per cent. of the additional taxes raised in this way would not be sufficient to pay the salaries of the men and women engaged in this inquisitorial work. It is, in my opinion, the most expensive method of raising revenue that could be devised.

Seeing that I have condemned the present method, it is only fair that I should be asked to suggest a better plan than now exists. I will do so willingly; I suggest to the Finance Minister that he increase the Sales Tax.

Some Hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HUGHES: I say, yes. The people of Canada have to raise a large revenue, and there is no question but that the simplest and most inexpensive way of doing so is through the medium of the Sales Tax. Considerable revenue is now derived from that form of taxation and it could be doubled without adding one dollar to the cost of collection. It is an easy matter for wholesale men to keep account of their turnover; they are doing it now and making returns to the Government of their sales, on which the tax is levied. It is a very easy matter to extend that system, because there would not be any book-keeping difficulties or any additional expense to the country involved. In any event, such a plan would be infinitely better than the present inquisitorial method of trying to get the farmers to make a return as to everything they produce and consume.

The other day an hon. member referred to the question of daylight saving, and I notice that there is a query on the order paper with respect to it. It seems to me that a daylight saving law is a very unwise thing. There is nothing to prevent persons in any part of the country from retiring and getting up an hour earlier, but why change the hands of the clock, why pretend that it is seven 5 p.m. o'clock in the morning when we know it is only six, or that it is six o'clock in the evening when we know it is only five? Such a procedure seems quite childish. In the country districts the day's work is not much more than half done at five o'clock; there is still a great deal of labour to be performed after that hour. Young men and young women in the country read or hear about the hours followed in the cities; they hear of men going fishing or shooting, going away to enjoy themselves in some way early in the afternoon when the sun is still high in the heavens, while they have to work hard. It makes them very much dissatisfied with their lot in life. They make up their minds to leave the farms, just as soon as they can get away from them. It is not a big question, but it is one of the things that make the young men and women in this country dissatisfied with farm life. It seems to be a foolish thing. In the province from which I come, conditions are such that I believe 25 per cent of the male population wish to leave the farms and to go to work for the Government, particularly to get into the railway service where eight hours constitute a day's work, and where, if you work for five or ten minutes after that, you get paid for an hour and a half, the wages being at the rate of time and a half for overtime. Young stationmasters along the line of railways in the country places leave their offices at three or four o'clock in the afternoon; their day's work is done, and they go away in their automobiles for a ride through the country. Every farm boy sees them, and he decides that, at some time or another, he is going to be a station master; he is going to get into the railway service; he is going to get time and a half when he works for a few minutes after hours. Those are the conditions that are making life on the farm difficult and distasteful at the present time, and until the occupation of farming is as profitable and conditions are just as agreeable on the farm as they are in other occupations, young men and women will leave the farms and flock to the cities, and immigration will not cure the evil.

I have listened to some speeches which have been delivered by hon. members representing Labour in this House, and anybody who has given any consideration at all to the subject, will admit that unions and brotherhoods have done a good deal for the manual labourers of this country and, indeed, of all countries. But is there not a possibility of carrying these things too far? Is there not a danger to democracy when men largely cease to think and act as individuals and think, act and vote in groups? I am afraid there is, and I am afraid we are travelling pretty far along that road at the present time. Unless men take into consideration all classes in the community, farmers, fishermen, miners, lumbermen, men engaged in the industries, and are willing to give to all hands fair-play, a fair deal and a square deal, democratic government is in some danger. I would commend these ideas to labour and railway unions and brotherhoods, in Canada.

Mr. CARROLL: Does the hon. member think the ordinary labour man, who is identified with a union, has lost his identity any more than a man who has $800 worth of stock in the Canadian Pacific or any other great commercial organization in this country?

Mr. HUGHES: I am not just prepared to answer that question. We are all selfish; unfortunately, man is a selfish animal; but, in my judgment, so long as we can think and act largely as individuals, in the moral order we are responsible and accountable for our individual actions; the same would apply largely to the political order, and in getting away from that, or, at least, far away from it, we are travelling a dangerous road.

A good deal has been said about the railway question, and I am going to say a very little upon the subject because we have not much information regarding it, and are promised more before the session closes. Both of the old historical political parties in this country, that is, the Conservatives and the Liberals, are blaming each other for there being too many railways in Canada. In my opinion, both parties are to blame. In this northern hemisphere, we have very serious geographical disadvantages. Somebody has said that Canada is nine provinces long and one province wide, and that description fits very well. In our railway building we have tried and, perhaps, honestly tried to overcome those geographical disadvantages; we have tried to trade east and west, and, perhaps, in trying to give depth to our country by building railways, we were doing what we believed to be a patriotic duty. We may have overdone it; but if we were trying to do a good thing; we are not so much to blame. We have to meet the situation as we find it. Anybody who gives the matter intelligent consideration, knows that our natural lines of trade are north and south; everybody who wants to see that, can see it just as well as Goldwin Smith saw it. But many of us have not the courage to say it, because we fear we shall be misrepresented if we do. If we cannot establish lines of trade north and south; we are tremendously handicapped in Canada just for that reason, and the effort made to build a railway to Hudson bay and to establish a line of trade through that sea with Europe is, in my judgment, impossible, but, nevertheless, it was a patriotic effort to give depth to our country. I do not think it can be made a paying commercial proposition, and whether or not we shall ever be able to overcome these natural disadvantages is a question.

In the province of Prince Edward Island, from which I come, we cannot trade except with the Maritime provinces. Confederation has been an injury to us. We cannot send our products to the cities of Montreal, Toronto, Hamilton, Ottawa and other places, because the farmers immediately surrounding those cities are able to supply their needs. We have to sell our products wherever we can find a market, in Europe or in the United States, and the tariff compels us to buy, at an enhanced price, in the manufacturing centres of the country, the things we need. Protection and Confederation may have been and, perperhaps are, good things for Ontario and parts of Quebec, perhaps all of Quebec, and other portions of the Dominion. We have to make the best of it, I suppose. But that is the condition of affairs, and when we hear our friends from the middle of the country complaining that we in the East and the people in the West are in favour of trade arrangements with the United States and are opposed to the principle of high protection, or of protection at all, I think they would view things just as we view them if they were in our place.

Now, I want to say a word to my hon. friends from the West in regard to public lands and resources. This was discussed by some hon. gentlemen in this debate; and I heard one hon. member, I think my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar), make the statement that when Nova Scotia and New Brunswick entered Confederation they insisted on retaining possession of their natural resources and their public lands. Ontario and Quebec, of course, did the same, but they did not get a subsidy in lieu thereof. They did not get a cash subsidy as well; they were satisfied with the possession of their natural resources. Now if I understand rightly, when the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta—particularly these two provinces—were formed, they were given their choice whether they would have their lands or a cash subsidy instead.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HUGHES: They were not given that choice?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HUGHES: Well, they took the cash subsidy, anyhow. I am informed that they preferred the cash subsidy; but now, if my information is correct, they want both natural resources and cash subsidy. I put it to the hon. gentlemen themselves, would that be fair to the other provinces? I would refer to Prince Edward Island particularly, because that province has an especial claim. When Prince Edward Island entered Confederation we had no lands. We never had any lands, because they were given away by the King to some favourites in England many long years ago, which gave rise to a great agitation against the absentee landlords, who were finally bought out. We were given a cash subsidy in lieu of public lands, because we were in an inferior position as compared with the other provinces of Confederation at that time. We were allowed a lump sum of $45,000, or about 50 cents per head of population. Manitoba came in a year after, I think, and in lieu of public lands was given the exact amount we were receiving, namely $45,000. Since then Manitoba's revenue has been increased two or three times, and the subsidy in lieu of lands has advanced proportionately. Our subsidy for the same purpose, on the other hand has never been touched. When Saskatchewan and Alberta come in some years later they were given a large subsidy in lieu of public lands, I believe about $1.50 per head of population, besides other payments as well for the erection of public buildings and for other purposes. Prince Edward Island, however, was left in the position she had held in this regard since Confederation. I may mention that the arrangement with Saskatchewan and Alberta was that the subsidy would increase as the population of the provinces increased; but our subsidy was fixed, so that we never had an increase. Have we not therefore a particular claim? I think so. I think it has only to be mentioned to be admitted by every member of the House and by every citizen in Canada. Manitoba's subsidy was afterwards increased to bring it to the level of that received by Saskatchewan and Alberta. But we stand where we have always been. We have an especial claim, I say, and I want to put it to the fairminded men from the West whether that claim does not deserve every consideration. I have only to state the case, I believe, and its fairness will be conceded. We want to be heard when these adjustments are made, whether in this House or in some other place.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Did not the Dominion Government assume a large indebtedness in connection with the Prince Edward Island railway?

Mr. HUGHES: I am glad indeed that my hon. friend has asked that question, because I was forgetting it. When we entered Confederation we were charged with every cent that the railway cost. We built our own railway. It has since been added to by the Dominion Government, but at the time we entered Confederation we had a large mileage that was charged to us in the debt against the province. I am very glad that the hon. member has asked this question. Now, with regard to the western provinces, I understand that they, and particularly British Columbia, became liable for immense sums of money to the Canadian Northern Railway for lines of railway through those provinces—liabilities that were enough to put those provinces into financial difficulties. The federal government relieved them of all that burden, took over all the railway indebtedness and relieved them of all bonds, guarantees and provincial obligations in that regard, and it is a part of the public debt of Canada upon which the people, including those of Prince Edward Island, are paying interest. That fact, I think, strengthens tenfold the case of the Maritime provinces, and particularly of Prince Edward Island.

My remarks, I fear, have been somewhat disconnected, but I trust I have put before the House views that may be helpful in solving the question with which the Government has to deal. The questions that I have dealt with, at any rate, are live questions in the province from which I come, and I think I have stated the case from the point of view of that province fairly and reasonably. The views I have expressed appear to me, at all events, to be reasonable, and I hope that the Government may find them helpful in the administration especially of the taxation of the country, from which we hope to get some relief. I may say that I have discussed this matter with the taxation office here and they have promised some modification; but I should like to see the whole thing wiped out and the farmers relieved from the inquisitorial investigations that are going on, because they are doing no good so far as our province is concerned. Unfortunately, we are not sufficiently wealthy individually to be able to contribute anything worth speaking of to the revenues of the country by that method of taxation.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I beg to thank you and the hon. gentlemen of this House for the attention that has been so graciously accorded me.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver Centre): Mr. Speaker, as the first person on this side of the House to speak to-day since the House has been made aware of the sad bereavement which has come to the family of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), may I take this opportunity, through you, Sir, of expressing to him and his family our sincere sympathy? It is on occasions of this kind, when the angel of death lays its hand upon members of our families, that we find we are indeed all akin, and whatever other matters may be in our minds they are immediately dismissed and we feel nothing but personal sympathy and sorrow for the grief stricken ones. I speak with the utmost sincerity, and I know I voice the sentiments of those around me, in extending to the Prime Minister our profound sympathy.

This institution, known as the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, is cherished I think by all who are students of and acquainted with our parliamentary procedure. You, Sir, with your lengthy and intimate acquaintance with this procedure and your profound knowledge of the history of the development of Parliament, will, I am sure, agree with me when I say that this institution should be carefully guarded so that when occasion arises we will have available for the representatives of the people the freest opportunity for the expression of their opinions. Criticism is sometimes directed —and I have noticed some in the press during the last few days—at what is sometimes termed the needless waste of time in this debate. Occasionally, I am ready to admit, it seems somewhat difficult to understand why individuals will occupy so much time with utterances that apparently contribute very little to our advancement, but I think it will be generally conceded that this debate in the main not only measures up well with former debates, but in my estimation it surpasses any that I have listened to in the past thirteen sessions. So while I admit there is occasionally perhaps a little recklessness in the use of the time of Parliament, on the whole I think we and the country receive benefit from the preservation of this institution. A very frank and vigorous expression of opinion by hon. members on problems of which they have more or less intimate knowledge must inevitably result in some good to the country, and I am convinced, Sir, that that is practically the best and the only way by which we are going to approach a solution of many of the difficult problems which now confront us. I am equally convinced that intolerance, prejudice and parochialism in the discussion of subjects, whether religious, racial or economic, will enable us to arrive at no useful decision. So, Sir, I am particularly jealous, and I know that you and others in this House share the same view, that the general tone of our parliamentary debates shall be maintained in that spirit of tolerance and good fellowship which exists between members on both sides, for while having differences of opinion we can at least accord to one another the credit of being sincere and honest in the expression of those opinions.

In the Speech from the Throne there are several subjects for discussion, and many of them have already been discussed with more or less freedom during the course of this debate. I desire to touch upon a few of those subjects, and I shall endeavour to keep my remarks within a reasonably brief space of time. Some have claimed, more particularly representatives of the Progressive party, that agriculture is the outstanding basic industry of Canada. I would say to them with the utmost frankness that I agree with that statement. I would, however, take this opportunity of adding that while admitting that statement with frankness, cheerfulness and pride, I should like them to bear in mind that there are other forms of industry which, while perhaps not of the same magnitude, or not bearing exactly the same relation to the life of the country as a whole, yet do hold a very important place in our economic life. Those other industries cannot be recklessly or lightly dealt with any more than we can deal with the industry of agriculture in a reckless or careless spirit. As individuals and collectively we must constantly keep that fact in mind, otherwise we are in danger of taking a narrow or prejudiced view of this very important subject. Before, however, addressing myself to a brief discussion of our agricultural situation, I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) particularly to this point: A number of years ago the late Parliament under the guidance of the then government, brought in a measure granting $10,000,000 to the aid of agriculture. This money was distributed amongst the provinces and spent by them for the development of agriculture particularly along educational lines. It was divided between them. That measure will expire, I believe, this year, and I regret that in the Speech from the Throne there is no reference to its continuance. I should very much like to have seen expressed the intention of the Government to continue this co-operative effort on the part of the federal authorities with the provincial, because in that way the late Government saved a great deal of duplication that undoubtedly will occur again unless the same or a similar principle is applied. Therefore I submit this suggestion to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance for his consideration, and I trust to hear during the course of the session a declaration from the Government favouring it.

Let me turn for a moment to this question of agriculture which must command the attention of Parliament. It seems to me that you take a very distinct step towards the solution of a problem if you admit the problem. The difficulty very often is that we do not admit the problem; we debate whether or not the problem exists. But let us come to the point where we admit the problem exists, and we have taken the first and most important step towards its solution. I admit that others not directly identified with the agricultural industry—I should like to say to my hon. friend that I have all my life been directly connected with it and take a very deep interest in my farm, although it might be considered small compared with some of the immense prairie farms—but as I say, some not directly connected with agriculture may decline to admit that the problem is as acute as is represented. I do admit frankly that it is acute, and from that position I start with my consideration of the problem.

One of the great difficulties to-day is that there has been a reduction of the prices of nearly all farm products to their pre-war basis, while on the other hand the prices of some, though not all, of the commodities which enter into their cost of production have not been reduced in proportion. That is, briefly stated, one of the economic problems with which my hon. friends immediately to my left are faced.

In this connection another question is raised: that of marketing and transportation. Now, I am not going to enter upon a discursive discussion of the various methods of marketing through co-operative organizations, and so on; we will leave that to these organizations to work out. But, Sir, in regard to one or two of the main products of the farm the question of marketing is important and has, indeed, in years gone by engaged the attention of this House. I refer particularly to wheat and cattle. So far as cattle are concerned I shall not go into the matter at length. We have a statement by one hon. gentleman—and here, Sir, I pause to compliment many of the new-comers in the House upon the clear and lucid manner in which they have presented their claims and their arguments—one hon. gentleman stated that it was necessary, when shipping cattle from distant points in Alberta to Winnipeg, to prepay the freight because it was doubtful whether they would bring at the end of the journey sufficient to pay the freight. I believe that is a statement of fact; it cannot but impress us with the seriousness of the problem.

But let me turn for a moment to the question of the marketing of wheat, which, after all, is the biggest item in connection with our farm products. Here an important problem presents itself. Simply stated, it is this: That between the amount received by the grower at the point of production or shipment, and the amount paid in the ultimate market, there is an undue and unreasonable spread. I am not for the moment going to specify what that spread is, but those interested are convinced—and I agree with them—that the spread is too great. The duty of Parliament is to consider whether this matter is one of sufficient importance to engage its attention, and if it is, to give to that problem due consideration. Permit me briefly to make several suggestions; having done that, I shall come to one of the main points to be considered.

There is, Sir, the question of freight rates; that I shall discuss later in a separate argument. There is the question of leakage in the transmission of the grain from the point of shipment to, we will say, the head of the Lakes. There is shrinkage; there are dockages. I believe there are very unfair dockages; those who were in the last Parliament know my views on that point. I still contend that the shrinkage from the point of shipment to the head of the Lakes is unreasonably great. That, indeed, should engage the attention of the House and particularly, Sir, of the Government.

Now, some suggestions have been made in regard to the marketing of the wheat crop of our prairies. My hon. friends to my left, so far as I have been able to learn from their speeches and from conversation with some of them, stand frankly and freely for a renewal of the old Wheat Board. They say they have studied the problem, and that is their view. One or two with whom I have had conversation—and I believe they voice the opinion of others—tell me they are asking for the Wheat Board not as a permanent institution, but as a temporary measure because of the peculiar crisis with which they are now faced. The policy of those who sit immediately around me and who supported the late Government is also very clear: we felt, as announced by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) before the last election, that a voluntary pool under the control and direction of the Government would be the best method. Be that as it may, Sir, the point I am coming to is this: it is an imminent question; it is a vital question; we are convinced, those of us sitting here, of the soundness of the contention of our hon. friends of the Progressive party that this question must receive immediate consideration. We think that if some decision is not arrived at within the next month,—that will appear to some hon. gentlemen as a large order, but no one knows better than the hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) that what I am saying is true—unless there is a decision within a month, the agricultural interests of the prairies may be very seriously affected.

Let us for a moment examine this aspect of the question. I admit frankly that at first I thought the attitude of the western farmers was in the nature of a threat or boycott, but after looking into the matter carefully I was convinced that there were sound economic reasons why farmers situated a considerable distance from, we will say, the Winnipeg market—perhaps at points remote from transportation facilities—should hesitate to put in as large a seeding of wheat as they might do if they had some assurance of assistance in marketing. I see their point; the matter is a very serious one to them. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture was elected to this House and to the portfolio of Agriculture on the distinct pledge, most seriously given to his people, not only in Regina but in practically every riding throughout his district, because he is a representative man and has been for years—he was elected on the definite pledge that the Wheat Board would be brought in so far as his influence and power could bring that about. My hon. friend nods his head to indicate acquiescence in my statement. I do not want to embarrass him, but I put this very plainly to him and to the Government: Speaking for those with whom I am more directly connected, and with the consent of my leader, I say that we are prepared to-morrow to go before the suggested committee of this House and present our views on the subject. We are prepared to go before that committee and listen to and consult with my hon. friends to my left, who have another view to present; and we are prepared to go with a great deal of curiosity and anxiety to hear my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture speak for the Government on that committee. But there should not be one hour's delay. Indeed, Sir, I am prepared and others are prepared to adjourn this debate if necessary so that this committee may be appointed and the work begun. This I am certain of, that not one hour's delay should be incurred. There should be no trifling with this question; it should be discussed and, if possible, a decision arrived at during the next few weeks.

I am not enlarging unduly on the importance of the matter. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe) seems to take a great deal of amusement out of it.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I was laughing at something else.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend may not be aware of the importance of this question. His friend the Minister of Agriculture should, I suggest, take him to one side and—

Mr. LAPOINTE: Something else was amusing me; I beg my hon. friend's pardon.

Mr. STEVENS: I suggest, anyway, that the Minister of Agriculture take him to one side and give him a thorough education on this question.

I say, Sir, that I am not unduly exaggerating the importance of the matter. I repeat with all earnestness that the Government should hasten to appoint the committee that they have in mind so that an early decision may be arrived at as to the method which will be followed.

Let me just supplement these observations with a suggestion as to the facilities we are possessed of as a country. My hon. friends to my left are aware of this without my repeating it, but I will tell the House for the benefit of those who may have overlooked the fact—that the Government of Canada is in control or directly possessed of elevators as follows: At the head of the Lakes we have a Government elevator with a capacity of 3,500,000 bushels; the Grand Trunk Pacific elevator, 7,500,000 bushels; the Canadian Northern elevator, 9,000,000 bushels; or terminal elevators at the head of the Lakes with an aggregate capacity of 20,000,000 bushels. Then we have an elevator at Moosejaw with a capacity of 3,500,000 bushels; Calgary, 2,000,000 bushels; Saskatoon, 3,500,000 bushels; Vancouver, 1,250,000 bushels; Montreal, 5,000,000 bushels; Port Colborne, 4,000,000 bushels. This constitutes a magnificent system of elevator facilities surpassing, I think, that of any other institution handling grain in this country, and one which is well fitted to take up immediately the question of the handling of grain. We believe—and I am going to state it here again briefly—that a voluntary pool coupled up with this system of elevators is the best way in which this question can be dealt with at this time. However, we make this reservation, that we shall be delighted to consult with other hon. gentlemen as to the advisability of inaugurating once again perhaps the Wheat Board which hon. gentlemen to my left have so persistently advocated.

Let me turn now to a very brief consideration of the question of transportation rates. This again is a vital question, not only to my friends on my left in regard to the marketing of their wheat, and in that regard it is vital, but it is vital also, I believe, to every branch of industry in Canada. I have had the privilege during the last few weeks of consulting with a very wide range of public opinion in Canada, and to my surprise many who have given little attention to the question of freight rates in months gone by, are to-day agreeing with those of us in the West who have been insisting for a considerable time that freight rates must come down. Let me state the problem in a very brief and simple manner. We are hauling to-day trains of about 350 tons with a motive power capable of hauling 900 tons or thereabouts. Is it not, Sir, a simple question in economics that if you haul a full train of 900 tons your cost of transportation per ton-mile will be reduced by the difference in the ratio of the amount you are now hauling and 900 tons? That is the problem. The railways say the rates are as low as they can make them. Now I do not wish to interfere with the authority and the jurisdiction of the Railway Board. I and those in this particular section of the House believe that we should always proceed by constitutional methods. I do not agree, for instance, with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) who on the occasion of a complimentary banquet given to him in Regina, I believe, gave utterance to the declaration, somewhat belligerent, I must say, that he was going to have the chairman of the Railway Board fired. My hon. friend is in the Government and it would be very interesting to know just what interchange of opinion there was between him and the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) on the process of firing the chairman of the Railway Board. To talk about firing the chairman of the Railway Board is an utterance wholly unworthy of an hon. member occupying a ministerial position. You know that yourself, Mr. Speaker; it needs no enlargement on my part. There is a way to proceed, and my hon. friend, if he is convinced that the chairman of the Railway Board is utterly derelict in his duty as chairman, might impeach him in the House, but I doubt if any such thought entered his mind within fifteen minutes after he had made that declaration for the purpose of getting considerable applause from those who heard him. There is a constitutional way of proceeding.

The Government, I notice, has referred back to the Railway Commission the appeal that was made to them regarding dairy products and express rates. I agree that that was a wise course to pursue, but it occurs to me, Mr. Speaker, that while we should not interfere with a court of equity or a court of law, while we should not seek to influence unduly one way or the other a judge on the Bench—and that is virtually what the Railway Commision amounts to when they are trying a case—yet as representatives of the people in this Parliament I think we might very properly consider the question of freight rates, or transportation, when that question is so acute that it affects the economic and industrial life of the country seriously. Undoubtedly it is affecting the economic and industrial life of this country very seriously at this time, and so, without interfering with the jurisdiction and the duties of the chairman of the Railway Board, or suggesting, as the Minister of Agriculture has done, that he should be fired, I think that after due consideration by this House it will be quite competent for us to make suggestions to the board.

For instance, we could suggest that the Railway Board should consider the advisability of reducing the commodity rates. I am not much concerned what the rates are on a bolt of silk valued at about one dollar per ounce, or about the rates on drugs which may be worth one, two or three dollars an ounce, because these things do not enter very much into the economic life of the country, but I am deeply concerned about the tonnage rate on coal, on cement, lumber, grain, coarse grains and wheat, and such things as that. These are commodities that touch the life of every person in the community. These are the commodities which, if the rate is right, the production and the movement of them may be encouraged and developed, whereas, on the other hand, if the rate is increased beyond a certain point, it will stop their production. An instance was cited by my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) where when the freight rate was raised last year on lumber, a mill had to shut down because they could not market their lumber on account of the rate. That I know to be true; I know case after case where this was so. We find that when we ship lumber to prairie points like Regina, Saskatoon, Moosejaw, the freight rate is far greater than the total cost of the lumber at point of shipment. This simply illustrates the danger of a policy being adopted, by the Railway Board, if you will, whereby the economic life of the country may be stifled, where it is so interfered with that it does not move with that freedom which is necessary for prosperity, and so I suggest this in connection with the freight rate problem: While not desiring to interfere in any unconstitutional manner with the duties of the Railway Board, I think Parliament might very well deliberate on this problem and give its expressions, through Council or otherwise, to the Board of Railway Commissioners. Then if it is found that that process results in no satisfactory results, we may, and it is within our power to do so, carefully scrutinize the Railway Act of Canada, one of the most important statutes we have. It is possible, Sir, that we would find some way by amendment to the Railway Act of dealing with this question; but the point I am coming at, what I have been dealing with all through my argument regarding freight rates, is, that it is clear to the lay mind of Canada that the freight rates at this time are too high on ordinary commodities.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. STEVENS (resuming): Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I had virtually completed the few remarks that I desired to make in connection with the question of transportation. I do not see the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) in his seat; but I am reminded that the Prime Minister, in his address in this debate, referring to a query as to the intention of the Government and dealing with this problem in a broader way than I have been discussing it, stated that the House would be called upon to wait until the Minister of Railways made a statement. We shall await, with a great deal of interest, and, I might say, anxiety, for this statement of the Minister of Railways. Aside from the bearing that transportation has, at the present time, upon other problems to which I have already referred, the transportation question or the question of the national railways is, in itself, of very grave importance. We did, however, get a glimpse, I think, into the mind of the Government by the speech of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). I noted an utterance of his which seemed, to me at least, to conform with the general tendency on the part of the ministry in dealing with this question, where he referred in his argument to the impossibility of incorporating the Grand Trunk in the national railway system. Whether we are justified, in the absence of any statement on the part of the Government, in assuming that they have arrived at the conclusion that it is impossible to co-ordinate the Grand Trunk system with the rest of the national railway system or not, let me say to the Government that we on this side of the House await with interest a definite statement from them on the subject. Before leaving this subject, as I shall do in a moment to pass on to another, I think I would not be fair to my constituents if I did not point out to the House that, in the consideration of this question of railway rates, we, perhaps, suffer more than any other part of the country; that is, we are paying about double the rates of any other part of Canada, on both the Canadian Pacific and the national railway systems. This, in turn, has had a very serious and detrimental effect upon the transportation of grain from the prairies to the Pacific seaboard. Let me add to that this fact that, in spite of the repeated declarations of officials of the Canadian Pacific railway that wheat would never move west, we have handled, through the port of Vancouver this present winter, somewhere in the neighbourhood of ten million bushels of wheat from the Prairie provinces with, I think, distinct benefit to them. Therefore, the present situation being that we are paying approximately double the freight rate that is being paid in other parts of the country, if that is reduced to the rates obtaining in other sections, this trade will, I believe, be stimulated; and the great oriental field which, to-day, is consuming a very large quantity of this grain, will be open to the products of my hon. friends from the prairies. I shall leave that question. We shall have an opportunity to discuss it at length when the problem is presented to us, as we have been promised it will be, by the Minister of Railways.

In the consideration of the difficulties attending the development of agriculture and other problems, I should like to bring to the attention of this House and of the Government a policy which was, shall I say, partially, at least, adopted by the previous government, and which was under consideration by this House at the last session. Indeed, if I remember correctly, the House passed a measure giving effect to what I am about to refer to, namely the establishment of a bureau of standards and the promotion of industrial scientific research. No reference has been made to this in the Speech from the Throne; no information has been given to us by the Government. If the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) purposes contributing to this debate, it would be very interesting if he would give us some intimation of the policy of the Government along this line. What I desire to say, however, in connection with the matter is this. My hon. friends to my left and some other hon. gentlemen persist in pointing out that Canadian industrial establishments should be able successfully to compete with industrial establishments of other nations of the world. Usually the reference is made to those of the United States and Europe. I should like to point out to them and to the House generally that, in the United States, Germany, Great Britain, and, indeed, other countries, industrial scientific research has been carried to such a degree of perfection that it contributes very materially to the success of the great industrial concerns of those countries in competition with other countries in their particular industries. So, I say to the House that, if we hope so to develop the industries of Canada that we can successfully compete outside of Canada, we must certainly take into consideration this question of establishing a bureau of standards and the promotion of industrial scientific research. I might give a homely illustration of the nature of our competition. For instance, we might say that there is before a given group of individuals the task of removing a very large obstacle on a railway or in any other place. In one place you set to work a man with a pick and shovel. In another you set to work a man or a group of men with a steam shovel. They may both succeed in removing the obstruction, but the group with the steam shovel and up-to-date appliances will certainly remove it with greater facility and more cheaply than the man who is using the primitive instrument. So it is in a more complicated manner in the industrial world. If a woollen industry, steel industry, chemical industry or any other branch of industry has the advantage and co-operation of a highly organized and efficient bureau of standards, and of an industrial scientific research bureau, it certainly will be better equipped to meet the competition of the world than the industry which has not those advantages.

I desire to give a little attention to another subject which was referred to in the Speech from the Throne, and which is of very great interest at this time. I refer to the question of immigration. I ask the House to note the wording of the Speech from the Throne which gives to us some idea of the mind of the Government. In the Speech from the Throne, immigration is referred to in these words:

> A renewal of efforts for bringing new settlers must be made.

From that I take it that the Government is embarking upon some definite action towards bringing in new settlers, if the words mean anything at all. Then they say they will use every reasonable endeavour to attract to the country people of the most desirable class, with particular regard to the settlement of our undeveloped lands. My mind goes back some fifteen or twenty years to a time when a similar effort was made to bring settlers into Canada. By the effort that was made at that time settlers were brought from Central and Eastern Europe, and they settled, or rather hived in colonies, particularly in the western parts of the Dominion. I learn from the press of the past few days that there is a trek of some of these people to Mexico. They are going away from Canada. In other words, the efforts on the part of the government between 1900 and 1911 in regard to the immigration of settlers for our undeveloped lands resulted, to some extent at least, in failure, and the creation, in some sections, of a menace to the community. I therefore say to the Government that if they have in contemplation a policy of bringing in settlers and hiving them in districts according to racial or religious prejudices, they will confer no favour on the country. We want settlers, but settlers who will come to Canada on their individual initiative, settlers who will go into various communities and settle upon new lands, contributing something to the upbuilding of the national life of Canada, and not creating within our bounds a little Russia or a little Poland or a Galicia, or some other distinctive nationality. I have read some despatches, and have heard some rumours in Ottawa, to the effect that there had actually approached the Government some gentlemen who proposed settlements similar to the old Doukhobour and other racial groups of former days. If that is the case, I take this opportunity of warning the Government against embarking upon any such policy.

I would point out in regard to the question of immigration that the United States have restricted immigration from any nation to a certain percentage of the number of that nationality now in the country. In other words, this constitutes almost an exclusion. In their law, however, they recognize a year's residence in Canada as a qualification for admission to the United States. Now, what does that indicate? It indicates that throughout disturbed and stricken Europe and Asia, where the eyes of these people are turned towards the United States, and they find that they cannot enter directly through the portals of that country, they will endeavour to come here and reside in Canada for the year if necessary to qualify them to gain admission to the United States. We want no such movement as that. We do not want Canada to be made a mere stepping stone for immigration to the United States; nor do we desire—this is my opinion, and, I think, the opinion of a large section of the country as well—nor do we desire to have coming into Canada, as suggested in a speech made in Toronto by a gentleman the other day, large numbers of immigrants from industrial centres of Europe. The industrial centres of Canada to-day have, I think, a very satisfactory supply, indeed an over supply, of competent labour. There is no call for cheap labour from the industrial centres of Europe. The class of settler that we do want to have, as I have said, is the uncontrolled individual who will stay on land. Before leaving this question let me bring to the attention of the Government and of the House a resolution passed by the Union of Municipalities at a convention recently held. I shall read only a portion of it:

> The Union regards with serious apprehension the efforts of transportation interests to encourage immigration into Canada of persons of alien birth, more particularly in view of unemployment problems, etc.

The resolution then goes on to ask that the Immigration Act be amended and that further immigration be prohibited of aliens for urban occupations. This important resolution, I think, warrants the attention and consideration of Parliament.

Let me turn to another subject, a subject that has not been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I refer to the Bank Act.

I understand that next year is really the time for the amendment of that act. I was of the opinion that it should have been amended this year to conform with the practice of the past, but in that perhaps I am mistaken. Whether that be the case or not, however, I think that the Banking and Commerce Committee might very properly make a careful examination this year into the workings of the Bank Act, that is to say, into some of its evident weaknesses. I am not one of those who subscribe to the statement that our banking system has not proven workable, or that it is an unsuccessful system which is not in the best interests of the people. I am not ready to endorse the remarks of the hon. member for East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) made this afternoon,—statements which seemed to me with great facility and despatch to dispose of this great problem with a complacency that one might well envy, if, indeed, the remarks of the hon. gentleman could bring about a solution of the problem. I believe that our banking system is, in the main, a sound one; it is one of the best systems in the world. Nevertheless, we have to consider the incident of the Merchants Bank during the past few months to realize that there are weaknesses, or, shall I say, loopholes in the Bank Act, and that it is necessary, if not to reconstruct, at least to amend it, so as to render impossible a recurrence of the failure of the Merchants Bank. Perhaps that word is too strong; at all events, let me say the incident of the Merchants Bank. For instance, the Merchants Bank directorate or management must have made false returns to the Department of Finance for several months before the crash came. I do not see how the returns that they did make could approach accuracy in view of the sudden collapse, or partial collapse that confronted us. If it is true, as I surmise,—and I think the evidence strongly supports the assumption—that the Bank made false returns, then this Parliament ought to know it, and I believe that the Banking and Commerce Committee should summon before it the management, the president and any other officials of the Merchants Bank who might throw light on the matter, in order that Parliament might be fully seized of all the steps which led up to this very regrettable incident in the banking life of this country. Furthermore, the Banking Committee could very well make this examination for the purpose of preparing amendments to the Bank Act, when it comes up for general revision next year.

Let me direct the attention of the House to a suggestion or two as to what might properly be done. It seems to me that under our banking system power is too much concentrated in the head office; no bank manager in our towns and cities away from the head office is allowed to make any large loans—for anything above $2,500 he has to report to head office and obtain its sanction. So there is concentrated at the head office an authority and control which is absolute. As I understand the Bank Act, there is at present no audit of the books of a bank. I do not suggest that we should have an inspection of all the bank branches, such as is carried out under the United States system, I do not know that that is necessary, but I am certainly convinced that there should be a periodical audit by officers of the Government of the head office books of our great banks; that is something which we could very properly take into consideration through the Banking and Commerce Committee during this session.

Another problem that I should like to deal with for few moments, is that of unemployment. We have already had considerable discussion of this problem. My hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Murdock) is not in his seat; if he were I would remind him of a declaration he made in Toronto, that this problem had been very seriously neglected by the previous government and would receive his immediate attention with a view to finding a solution for it. That declaration was made a few months ago. Time has elapsed, and we are now met with this statement—which, by the way, the right hon. leader of the Opposition and those who are supporting him may take with a certain degree of satisfaction—that recognizing the continuance of unemployment the Government is going to continue the policy which was laid down by its predecessors in office, which policy the Minister of Labour so roundly condemned in Toronto and other centres. Unquestionably it is a perplexing problem, and challenges the most careful study and attention of this Parliament, and indeed of one and all who are interested in the welfare of our country. It is an economic problem, and it will be neither sufficient nor satisfactory for us to attempt to dispose of it by merely saying, there is world-wide unemployment and therefore we can trust to a future adjustment of world conditions to solve it. I should like to be comforted, if I might use the term, by the facility with which my hon. friend from East Calgary (Mr. Irvine) dealt with this problem, if I could persuade myself—as he apparently does—that the application of certain theories would bring a satisfactory solution. If this were so it would indeed be a great comfort. But I recognize, as the hon. gentleman himself must recognize, that it is an intensely practical problem. I think we might consider the chief cause of the unemployment which prevails to-day, as it has been the chief cause of past periods of unemployment which have occurred in cycles of ten or fifteen years, due to modern mass production, resulting in periodical over supply or surplus of goods.

Now, Sir, that is the real economic problem. But I realize that merely to state that problem is not sufficient; it is not offering a solution. The problem is exceedingly complex. On previous occasions in discussing this problem out of the House I have suggested, and I feel the suggestion is worthy of consideration, that a very careful study ought to be made of the underlying causes. I know that such a study does not bring immediate relief—it does not put a man to work, it does not clothe his children; but this periodical unemployment will occur again just as it has so frequently occurred in the past, and with this growing tendency on the part of industry to intensified mass production, it seems to me the path of wisdom for this Parliament to at least provide for a study of the problem, even if we cannot at the present time go further in the direction of solving it.

I want to dissociate myself absolutely from those who, because of this recurring difficulty, would disrupt the whole economic system by revolutionary means. I have no sympathy whatever with such men. I think it is the duty of every true citizen to challenge that suggestion wherever it is made, either directly or indirectly. In my estimation nothing of a permanent and worthy character has ever been contributed to civilization through the process of disruption and revolution. On the other hand, I do recognize that through the process of evolution, and by a careful study of this problem, step by step doing what we can in the light of our knowledge to-day, we can contribute to the ordered progress of civilization and the happiness and welfare of mankind.

In regard to this subject the suggestion has been repeatedly made, in fact it was made only to-day in this House, that it is the duty of government to supply employment for its citizens. I challenge that statement. I claim, Sir, that it is not the function of government to find employment for individuals. If it is the function of government—and I am not referring to this Government, but to government as an institution—if it is the function of government to supply employment for individuals, then it is the duty of every individual so supplied to go and to do as he may be instructed by such government. You cannot dissociate the two positions. If you lay upon any government the function or duty of finding employment for an individual citizen, then that citizen must put himself docilely under the direction of that government, go where he is directed to go, do what he is told to do, and accept what is given to him. But that is the exact reversal of what humanity has been struggling against from the dawn of history to the present time. And I think it is due to ourselves and to the country that we give very careful study to this problem, for throughout the Dominion from one end to the other demagogues who are living by their wits, gather together a group of people on a Sunday afternoon, stir up their grievances, excite their passions, and then take up a collection upon which they live, proceeding afterwards to another centre to stir up further disorder and discontent. These demagogues, who neither work for their livelihood nor contribute to the upbuilding of the community, but, on the contrary, sow discord and dissatisfaction wherever they get the ear of the people, are going up and down the land preaching this and other doctrines equally subversive of the prosperity and contentment of our citizens, and I think it is about time that those of us who are convinced that such doctrines will not lead us out of our economic difficulties should bluntly and emphatically challenge those who advocate them. So while this is indeed an important problem, we must not allow ourselves to be stampeded into any experiments regarding government assuming full responsibility for unemployment.

I do not wish to give the impression that I am not aware of how serious a matter unemployment is to the individual, and there are occasions—we had them during the war; crises in the history of the country—when governmental action may be necessary. If it is possible for the Government or for Parliament to find some temporary method of ameliorating the conditions of to-day, by all means let it be employed. But I warn Parliament and I warn the Government against assuming responsibility for finding employment for all who happen to be unemployed.

An exceedingly popular subject of discussion in this House, and one which touches upon the matter to which I have just been referring, is that of the tariff. It is not my intention now to dwell at length upon the tariff question; I believe the proper time to do that is when the Budget is before the House. I do wish, however, to make a few brief references to the subject.

The hon. member for King's, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes) this afternoon censured the late Government because last season the people of his province were unable to sell their potatoes, and he sought to give the impression that the tariff was the cause of this condition. I do not see just how the tariff could have affected the sale of Prince Edward Island potatoes. As a matter of fact, the late Government by legislative and administrative acts secured the market of the United States to the potato producers of the whole of Canada, particularly of the eastern provinces. But the United States, after experiencing one season of the competition of Canadian-grown potatoes, put a duty of twenty-five cents a bushel, I think it was, on potatoes, thus shutting our product out. Indeed, Sir, the late Government adopted a reciprocal arrangement with the United States respecting wheat, but the United States now impose a duty of thirty-five cents a bushel on wheat. Is that because Canada has a tariff? Is that because those of us who supported the late Government were responsible for maintaining a certain policy in regard to the tariff? Let us be reasonable. Any tariff restrictions imposed by the United States against our potatoes are the result not of any act of the preceding Government, but of the fiscal policy of the United States.

Now, our position on this question is well known; we do not camouflage it in the least. We believe in a tariff for Canada which involves adequate and reasonable protection for Canadian industries from one end of the country to the other,—sufficient to maintain them in a healthy condition. Hon. gentlemen opposite suggest that they are in favour of a revenue tariff. What is a revenue tariff? If they are sincere in this statement, then with every impost of duty on goods imported into this country they will impose concurrent excise taxes upon similar goods produced in Canada. I wonder why my hon. friends opposite persist in deceiving the people in regard to this tariff question. The Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) has frequently given voice to sentiments regarding protection much stronger than anything we have ever affirmed adherence to in recent years: he is in favour of a protective tariff. The Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) who is now in his seat, is in favour of a protective tariff. The Minister of Militia (Mr. Graham) and the Minister of Marine (Mr. Lapointe) and many other hon. gentlemen sitting opposite to me—not one of them will deny that he is in favour of a protective tariff for Canada. Why, I could mention a few commodities: tobacco, boots and shoes, automobiles, farm implements, wagons, cottons, —I wonder what we can expect from my hon. friend the Minister of Finance in the matter of any serious reduction of the duty on cottons. The member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) is not in his seat, but in view of the appointment of Sir Charles Gordon to the important office of Canada's representative at the Genoa Conference, I am sure that the hon. member for Marquette will take the first opportunity afforded him publicly to retract what he said during the campaign: that the Dominion Textiles and Canada Cottons were sitting astride the neck of the leader of the Opposition. That was his cry up and down the country. Sir Charles Gordon was one of those who gave generous and loyal support to my hon. friends opposite, and he has received his reward in the appointment to the Genoa Conference. Further let me say, I wonder if we will get any serious reduction in the duty on tea and a few other things, in which some hon. members of the Cabinet may have more or less interest.

The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael), I think it was, made a statement which might be accepted by those who had not the data, but which I cannot allow to go unchallenged. He said that the collection of the customs tax cost fully fifty per cent of the amount received. Nothing can be gained by making statements that are wholly untrue. I do not suggest that the hon. gentleman deliberately made a statement that was untrue; that would be unparliamentary. But there is such a thing as making a statement in such a manner as to convey to the mind of the public the impression that it is based upon official figures.

An Hon. MEMBER: He said he gave it on good authority.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, I remember that that was included in his remarks: that he gave it on good authority. Statements of that kind may be accepted by the people because of the responsibility of the person who makes them. I say to my hon. friend, and to those who cheered him so loudly, that the records are there and open to examination, and they show that during the last four or five years the average cost of collection of the customs duties of Canada has been less than three per cent. Of course, the incident does not involve one's belief in protection or free trade; I am not disputing that at all, but let us at least, Sir, have something approaching accuracy in the statements which are made in this House; let hon. gentlemen have some respect for the responsibility of the position which they hold.

I hold in my hand a statement which I wish to read to the House, for the purpose of justifying the attitude taken by the right hon. leader of the Opposition when he questioned the sincerity of the Government in their suggestion that they were going to bring down tariff amendments. He does not question their intention to make any changes in the tariff, but he does question, and with very good reason, their even approximating the tariff proposals they made to the country in their official programme. This is the report of a speech delivered by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Marler) in November last, just before the election. The despatch reads:

> Someone in the audience asked Mr. Marler if he would stand by the Hon. Mackenzie King on the Liberal tariff platform as laid down in 1919.

Let me pause for a moment. Many of my hon. friends to my left, have said in this debate that they trusted the Government to carry out this platform which they pledged themselves to implement by law.

> Mr. Marler replied that he had expected such a question.

The report continues:

> "That platform, referred to by Mr. Meighen as tending towards free trade was laid down in 1919," said Mr. Marler, "but at that time there were joined to the regular Liberals the Farmers who have since left the party. That platform was never made by Liberals, but by the Farmers, who put it through, but the Liberals did not approve of that particular plank. I will say that if that plank means free trade, or injury of any legitimate industry I am against it."

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. MARLER: Would my hon. friend say what paper he is quoting from?

Mr. STEVENS: I am quoting from a paper which has the unbounded confidence of the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) and many other hon. gentlemen opposite, a paper that has been quoted by them against us for many months past—the Montreal Gazette, in its issue of November 2, 1921. Perhaps my hon friend desired in interrupting me to deny the statement. If he did, I will give way to him.

Mr. MARLER: I shall speak in a few moments.

Mr. STEVENS: I am quoting from the Montreal Gazette, and I say this is quite in harmony with the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite on this question.

Perhaps I might be permitted—and I do this with no desire to take advantage of the absence of the leader of the Government; indeed, I hesitate to say anything that might be considered of a controversial nature under the circumstances—to read a statement made by him in a speech delivered on October 28th last in his own constituency. He is reported as follows:

> He wanted it known that should the Liberals get into power, there will be absolutely nothing done to disturb the equilibrium of those industrial concerns which are now getting along with modest profits.

My hon. friend, the Minister of Justice, told the shoe manufacturers of Canada, and I think he was right, that they were not getting sufficient profit. That was the purport of his remarks, that they needed even more protection. Yet boots and shoes, wearing apparel, and foodstuffs of all kinds, indeed the necessaries of life, which is a mighty sweeping statement, were all included in this general reduction, if not the absolute elimination of customs duties contained in the tariff platform of my hon. friends opposite. Then he went on to say:

> As to the Farmer policy of free trade, the Liberal leader contended there is a wide gap between that platform and the policy of the Liberals.

My hon. friends will remember that a day or two ago the leader of the Government told us there was no difference practically between the platform of the Progressive wing—I do not know just what he meant by that—and themselves. He said he could scarcely understand why they should separate themselves from him. Well, here is a reason given in his own speech, delivered in protectionist Ontario, of course, that there was a wide gap between the Farmers' platform and the policy of the Liberals.

So there was no use—

And I want my hon. friends to the left to get this.

—there was no use putting much faith in the cries of the Agrarians, for while cries might be good vote-getters from one class of citizens alone, they could hardly be productive of many definite results.

I say to my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Stewart) and to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) both of whom have for years and years been leaders of my hon. friends immediately to my left in the West, and who have proclaimed in election contest after contest, before boards of trade, Canadian clubs, and every other class of institution, the doctrines of the three Prairie provinces on the tariff, and declared them widely—I say to them that this is the doctrine which they have to absorb now they are sitting here, this is the doctrine which they have to give expression to, this is the doctrine to which they must now subscribe or leave the ministry, one or the other. But as they have held their seats up to the present time with a degree of tenacity that is admirable, at least, we may assume that they have abandoned their western doctrines, now that they are a couple of thousand miles away from home and have adopted instead the doctrines to which I have just referred.

May I be permitted before I resume my seat to indulge in a pleasant and friendly survey of the immobile faces that I see opposite me on the treasury benches. There is my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Graham). I wonder why it is that my hon. friend was not given charge of the Railway Department. I recall that it was he who presided over that department prior to 1911, and we were told the other night with considerable emphasis that the Liberal party had led the country through a period of prosperity and were guiltless of any responsibility in railway matters. If my hon. friend came through that period with such eminent success, why was it that he was not given the job of completing and making a success of the national railways? I wonder if back in the mind and the consciousness of the Prime Minister and his chief adviser, the Minister of Justice, there was not a conviction that my hon. friend the Minister of Militia had not after all made such a splendid job of the Railway Department prior to 1911, and that there was some danger in entrusting him with its administration again.

My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, who is not in his seat as far as I can see, comes to this Parliament with a splendid reputation. I must say that I watched his career in Alberta as Premier of that province with interest, and I was frequently impressed with what I felt to be his unselfish efforts to administer the affairs of that province in the interests of the people at large. But he failed to get a seat there, and a great deal of credit has been taken by my hon. friends from the province of Quebec for finding him a seat. Well, so far as they feel that they performed an act of grace, we will give them credit, but I wonder how the Minister of the Interior, brought up for many, many years in an atmosphere of exceedingly low tariff will harmonize his love for his western home with the sentiments of his adopted constituency? When he consults with the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Marine (Mr. Lapointe) and the Minister of Health (Mr. Béland) regarding the wishes of the constituency he represents in Quebec, I wonder how he will reconcile their views and the sentiment that dominates the Cabinet? I think, so far as the tariff is concerned, with the proven convictions he brings with him from the plains, if he has been honest in the past in the expression of his views, it will be interesting to see how my hon. friend works it out. I think there is a saying in Scripture somewhere—

An hon. MEMBER: Be careful.

Mr. STEVENS: —and here I am always very careful, Mr. Speaker, because I have the Solicitor General (Mr. McKenzie) in front of me, an authority on Scripture, and he is liable to trip me up, but outside of him I fear nobody in the House on that subject—but there is something said anyway about a man being unable to serve two masters; he will either love one and hate the other, or hold to the one and despise the other. Now I rather imagine the Minister of Interior is going to twist that scriptural phrase and though he may have loved Alberta and Alberta's tariff policy, as a result of the predicament he is forced into he will probably hold to the tariff policy of his eastern connections and very likely despise his oft-repeated utterances in the past regarding the western point of view on that subject. He at least is in an unenviable position from which he will find it very hard to extricate himself now.

Then it will be interesting to watch both my hon. friends—the Minister of Interior and the Minister of Agriculture—for instance, harmonizing the new position they find themselves in upon this freight rates question. I do not know—I would be pleased to be corrected if I am wrong—but I do not think there is an hon. gentleman in this House representing a constituency west of the Great Lakes who does not feel that there is due a definite, clear-cut reduction in freight rates—I do not think there is one of them. I do not think that any member could be elected to this House, much less the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of the Interior, from a western constituency if he did not so believe. Indeed I reminded the Minister of Agriculture this afternoon of his pledge in that regard—so determined, so fixed was he, in that doctrine that he was going to fire the chairman of the Railway Board in order to attain his ends. It will be interesting to watch these hon. gentlemen harmonize their new position, their connection with the interests, and the influences with which they are surrounded, with their profound convictions of the best interests of the districts, from which they come, and their oft-repeated pledges to these districts that when they entered the Cabinet and when they entered Parliament they would discharge their obligations to them.

Sir, those of us who had the privilege of sitting in this House in parliaments gone by recall the influence, the grace, and the personality of the great Liberal chieftain who is with us no more. I was very much struck the other afternoon when the Minister of Justice rose in his place and delivered his speech, which for parliamentary style, elegance and thoughtfulness has seldom been equalled, I think, in the House. I felt, Sir, that at last there had entered Parliament one upon whom the mantle of Laurier might justly fall. In referring to this I am serious in extending to my hon. friend (Sir Lomer Gouin) my congratulations on his speech, and on his presence and his influence in the House. He was a little peeved—I think it was the only fly in the ointment—because my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) suggested that he was the "master mind". Mr. Speaker, if my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition failed to make that point clear it was amply justified by the utterances of the Minister of Justice, in his reply to the speech which my right hon. friend delivered, and he demonstrated that indeed he was the master mind. This is not a matter of reproach, it is nothing to be ashamed of; it is nothing, Sir, but a subject for congratulation, and I congratulate him upon it. I cannot fail, however, to refer to one point and it is this: the Minister of Justice protested with, I think, tears in his voice that the one object he had in taking a place in this House was to serve his country. Well, I think we can all claim, to a reasonable extent, the same motive. I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that he stands alone in that regard; we all, I think, have a reasonable right to claim that motive. But the reason for the little evidence of petulance—it was scarcely visible but it was there I think—was because the suggestion had been made that my hon. friend was associated with what is known as "the big interests". Sir, is it a crime to be associated with big interests? The leader of the Opposition has been bombarded with abuse from one end of this country to the other as being the creature of the big interests.

Where did the big interests stand during the last election, which after all is the testing point? Where did they stand? What are the big interests of this country? The biggest interest in this country is the Canadian Pacific Railway company. Were they behind the leader of the Opposition, or were they wholly and unreservedly behind the Minister of Justice and his immediate associates? There is nothing wrong in it; I am not rebuking my hon. friend for it; but I do wish to say this: I resent the opprobrium that has been heaped upon my leader, falsely, as being the creature of the big interests, and I intend to associate my hon. friend with those with whom he has associated himself. What is another big interest, big financially?—the Bank of Montreal. Was the Bank of Montreal—the Bankers' Bank of Canada, the greatest financial institution in the Dominion, the one that encompasses within itself nearly every other financial institution—was it behind the leader of the Opposition? The Minister of Justice is a director of the Bank of Montreal and he knows better than that; he knows where their influence was thrown. He knows perfectly well that their influence was thrown during the last two weeks of the campaign against the leader of the Opposition and to his injury politically. Then my hon. friend is also a director of the Cockshutt Plough Company. Why I remember, Sir, in two previous Parliaments we had associated with us Mr. Cockshutt, a member of the Cockshutt family, and how hon. gentlemen opposite—then sitting on this side of the House—used to bait the former member for Brantford. A few of those hon. gentlemen who then sat on this side used to twit Mr. Cockshutt with representing the agricultural implement companies in this House. The Minister of Justice is a director of the Cockshutt Plough Company. It would be interesting to learn of the conferences between him and his colleague immediately behind him for the reduction of the tariff on agricultural implements—most interesting indeed. I do not rebuke my hon. friend at all but we might just as well know where we stand in this House. My hon. friend is a director of the Montreal City and District Savings Bank, of the Royal Trust Company, of the Mount Royal Assurance Company, of the Mutual Life Assurance Company, and last, but not least, a director of La Presse Publishing Company, although I may be wrong in the last statement.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I am not a director of La Presse.

Mr. STEVENS: The statement was made to me that my hon. friend was. However, I accept his denial.

Sir LOMER GOUIN: And I am not a director of the Cockshutt company.

Mr. STEVENS: Will my hon. friend be good enough to tell me when he retired?

Sir LOMER GOUIN: I retired during the first days of January.

Mr. STEVENS: All right, perfectly proper. My hon. friend will admit that I have not misstated the case at all. I am not reproving my hon. friend or any other hon. member for holding positions in these companies; but I want to say to hon. members opposite that their chief financial critic, the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) made a frightful onslaught upon the leader of the Opposition and some associated with him because they were. My right hon. leader held no position in this or any similar concern. He was a free lance; he was a people's man, if ever there was a people's man. Yet not only do my hon. friends opposite hold important positions in the largest institutions and retain those positions, while sitting in this House, but during the last election they received the generous and undivided support of them. That may be perfectly all right; but yet it ill behooves them to endeavour to drive my right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, out of public life by using suggestions of that kind, namely, that he is a creature of the big interests. Therefore, I conclude my remarks by saying that it will be interesting to watch how these diverse interests in the Cabinet, hon. ministers coming to this House, pledged to carry out diverse platforms, will perform that operation on the stage of this Parliament. We are looking forward to declarations, statements, utterances, which have been promised. We are awaiting patiently for the appointment of the committee promised by the Government, which will take up some of these important problems. What I wish to say in conclusion, is that we on this side of the House, although this may be strange to my hon. friends opposite, are standing by the policy, promises and pledges that we made prior to the election. That may not be understandable by my hon. friends opposite in view of a declaration made by their leader, the other day, that statements, pledges, utterances and campaign literature, made or issued prior to an election, should not be taken too seriously.

Mr. HERBERT MARLER (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, had not the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) made a reference to me in his address of last Monday, I question very much if I, as a new member, would have had the temerity this evening to address this House. Before proceeding to any of the questions brought up in the Speech from the Throne, will you allow me, Sir, to offer you my most sincere felicitations upon your having been elevated to the very high position of First Commoner in the land. I venture to add that there are, perhaps, few in the House who view your selection for that high office with greater gratification than I—gratification, because you belong to an old and distinguished family, gratification because you are known for your courtesy and learning, but gratification, most of all, because you have served your country for many years and during all those years of service, you have always kept before you, the highest ideals of British statesmanship.

I am very well aware that, in the course of these debates, you will be called upon to correct me for infractions of the rules of this House which I, through inexperience, may make from time to time. I am reminded, in that connection, of a question which a younger member of the British House of Commons asked an older member of the same House. He asked the older member how he could learn the rules of the House, and the answer came back in a somewhat laconic manner—"By breaking them." I trust, therefore, if I do break the rules of the House in debate, you will realize that I am attempting to learn them. Whatever corrections may come from your hands, I will deem them, not as corrections or reprimands, but more as coming from the seat of learning to which I have made allusion.

I most willingly join with the other members who have spoken before me, in offering my most sincere congratulations to the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) on the excellent address which he has given to the House. I also join in the same manner in offering my felicitations to the hon. member for Westmount-St. Henri (Mr. Mercier), and I beg to say to him that hearing the French language spoken, always emphasizes to me, coming as I do from the province of Quebec, how fortunate we are to have the beauties of that language and the sterling qualities of that race as a part of the Canadian nation.

I would also like to thank the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) for the very kindly and courteous words of welcome which he addressed to new members of this House. I do not think I can claim for myself this state of youthfulness ascribed by the right hon. gentleman to the newcomers; nor do I think my right hon. friend is very glad to see me here; but, notwithstanding all that, I hope he will allow me to include myself in his words of welcome.

I also wish to congratulate the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) on her election, and I hope she will live long and have a prosperous political career.

Mr. Speaker, it has seemed to me for some time that we are at a crisis in many of our national affairs. We are passing through a period of unparalleled unrest, and to surmount that crisis and that period of unrest, and thence to attain to more normal conditions, will, without a doubt, call for the united efforts of all those who, in this House, are entrusted with the administration of public affairs. That, Sir, seemed to me to be the issue on the eve of the election, and that seems to me, in great part, to be the issue still. It follows from that as a natural sequence, that what we all require to do at the present time is to surmount our difficulties, to maintain in this country stable government, and to bring about and to keep the solvency of the country by means of re-establishing it financially upon sound, economic lines and thus to lay the foundation for our future progress and prosperity. That seems to be the main issue before the country to-day, and I venture to say that that is the broad issue which the Speech from the Throne has placed before the House.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), in his remarks regarding the Speech from the Throne, emphasized that every shade of opinion would be taken into consideration in the shaping of the policy of the Government, so as to make this nation a united and happy one. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), in his closing remarks, also stated clearly that the laws of the land should be made in favour of no one particular interest or group, but with equal justice to everybody, so that the country would become united and happy, and, in this, I am totally in accord with the hon. member for Marquette. But, Sir, how is this unity of purpose to be brought about? The Prime Minister clearly showed that he desires that unity of purpose. The hon. member for Marquette equally showed that he desires that unity of purpose. Can we say the same thing of the leader of the Opposition? I do not think we can. Perhaps, it was a vain hope; but I had hoped that once the people had pronounced on the issues at the last election, he, qualified as he is and with many years of public service to his credit, could likewise join with all in this House in attempting to weld this nation together as a happy and united people.

I am disappointed in this, because I find my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition apparently cannot get the idea, that unity of purpose is essential to the welfare of the Canadian people. Perhaps he says that I am wrong in my opinion of him. I do not think I am. I do not see how I can be when he emphasizes the statement, in regard to the elections in the province of Quebec—and he has done so not only outside of the House but in the House as well—that what was done in that province reached the depths of infamy. He has been saying that the election in that province, from which I come, went against him and his party on account of the anti-conscription issue, and he has also said that the government at the time had a mandate to put that act into effect. Need I remind my right hon. friend what act it was that gave the government the mandate he speaks of? The issue to which I have reference need not have been mentioned in this House. It served no good purpose and did not promote concord throughout the land, and I would not have mentioned it had not my right hon. friend said that many of us on this side had gained our seats by means of appealing to it. I know for an absolute fact that in my constituency, and in many other constituencies of which I have knowledge, that issue was not even hinted at. I would prefer not to have raised this issue, but when my right hon. friend throws down, from his high altar of Toryism, allegations—I cannot call them facts because they are not facts—regarding the province of Quebec, allegations which I can, will, and must honestly deny, he will find me ready to take up his gauge of battle in defence of that province, not once or twice, but as many times as he desires.

My right hon. friend seems to have been very much worried as to why he did lose the election in the province of Quebec. I dare say my opinion is of little value to him. No doubt what I can tell him as regards the election in that province has already been amply reported to him by his various lieutenants there. But if it is of any interest to him at all for me to give him my opinion for what it is worth, as to why that province in the last election returned sixty-five members to sit on this side of the House, and why it also returned Liberals in two divisions which had never returned Liberals before, perhaps he may allow me to enlighten him. If my right hon. friend will cast his mind back to his speech delivered in London, Ontario, on the 1st of September last, and the speech he made in Portage la Prairie on the 27th of the same month, I think he will recall that on both of those occasions he told the country that the tariff was the only issue before the people. He used these words at Portage la Prairie:

> What we have to decide is this: Are we going to continue this protective system in this country or are we not? That is the question, and that is the whole question.

Strange as it may seem, the people of Quebec did not think that the tariff was the whole question. There were other issues which they desired to have explained. Those issues, in brief, were: Why were the railways being operated with continually growing deficits? Why did we build sixty-three ships for the Canadian Merchant Marine at a cost to the country of $72,000,000, plus interest during construction and plus extras? Why was the public debt increasing at an enormous rate from causes not attributable to the war, thereby necessitating much heavier taxation? What was the government policy as regards immigration?

It is quite true, I admit, that these issues were attempted to be explained by many to the province of Quebec, but they were never explained satisfactorily, and because of the unsatisfactory reasons that were given in regard to them the people of that province voted unanimously against the late government. These were the issues which really came up in that province, and the issue raised by my right hon. friend was not by any means the sole one for the people to decide upon. But I do not desire to boast of the unanimity of the province of Quebec. I do not think the time is opportune for boasting. This House has work to do. But Quebec is unanimous in very many ways. In that province we have not what is commonly known as a minority interest. We all work as one; we are all ready to evolve policies which will be for the benefit, not of Quebec alone, but of the country at large. I think that we in Quebec are imbued with the idea that Parliament should really be a deliberative assembly of one nation, an assembly with one idea, that of the whole people, and not a place where local issues or prejudices ought to prevail. It should be the channel for the expression of the general opinion, resulting in the general benefit of the whole country. That is my opinion of what Parliament should be. That is the idea of Parliament which I have acquired from living in the province of Quebec, and I believe that every member on this side of the House has precisely the same views on the subject. If that is the case—and I believe it is—why the necessity for all these innuendoes in regard to members from the province of Quebec, and from Montreal in particular? Why all this bitter hatred that seems to be bandied from one side of the House to the other? Is that the kind of politics that we are to have? I venture to say that the country is tired of politics of that description. What it requires and will have is a business administration which will have one idea and one idea alone, and that is the general benefit of the country as a whole.

It is very natural in a country like this that there must be diversified interests. In a body the size of this House there must be various opinions; and it is quite true that the province of Quebec has certain ideas and traditions,—ideas and traditions some of which perhaps might be found applicable to the whole of Canada. But although we from the province of Quebec advocate certain ideas and revere certain traditions, we never say that we desire to impose our will on any other part of Canada. We have been trained in tolerance and we know what constitutional government should be, and being so trained we say that we are ready and willing to consider, with all others throughout Canada, any policy which will be good for the nation as a whole. That is the attitude we take. I would make that point abundantly clear.

My hon. friends who sit to the right of the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) did not always approach the hon. member and his followers with the same honeyed words that certain members among them used during the past few days. The dulcet tones of the gentlemen sitting to the right of the member for Marquette are strangely different this year from what they were last year, if what I have read in the debates is correct, as no doubt it is. I believe I read in those debates that the gentlemen who now sit behind the member for Marquette, were termed servile minions and were called the annex, and a dilapidated annex at that. These were the words that were addressed to those gentlemen only one short year ago. Fortunately the position of the annex is changed. The annex is nearer to your left. But I was rather amused this afternoon to hear similar dulcet tones from the member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). These tones were not used last year towards my hon. friend from Marquette. If that hon. gentleman will look up what my hon. friend from Vancouver said on the 19th of May, 1921, when he was discussing the Grain Growers' movement, he will find no dulcet tones in that address, but tones of quite another nature.

Sir, I do not approach my hon. friends who sit around the member for Marquette in that spirit at all. I do not approach them for reasons of political strategy or of political expediency. I am bound to say, and I say it quite openly in this House, that I am very much impressed with their sincerity. I know now a great deal more than I knew before; I know now with what they are contending in the West. Nevertheless I must also be frank with the member for Marquette and those around him, and I will tell him that I disagree to some extent with what he says. Notwithstanding all this, however, I say in a spirit of sincerity and with my heart open to the good of the Canadian nation at large, that no government in any country, least of all in this country, can be carried on acording to hard and inflexible rules. There needs to be co-operation, and with that co-operation I am quite sure we shall get out of our difficulties very quickly.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, if I am not taking up too much time, I should like to discuss briefly the matters which were brought down in the Speech from the Throne. I shall take up only the principal matters, which seem to be the railways, the tariff, immigration, and one or two other questions. No doubt some of you will be sorry to hear the word tariff—and I am among those in that category—but I must deal with the subject because my right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, has honored me with his attention, and again this afternoon I find I have become quite famous by the quotation from a Montreal newspaper given to you by my hon. friend for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens). Both of these hon. gentlemen I shall reply to, and I hope my reply will be completely to their dissatisfaction. What I am about to say will be sufficient, I trust, to convince my right hon. friend that I do not say one thing on the hustings and another in the House, or, as he put it very neatly the other day, that the professions and promises I made during the election are, when I am once elected, thrown into the discard and forgotten. I wish to try and convince him that the professions I did make during the campaign are not forgotten but are still adhered to. I had, it is true, a vain hope—for it was a very vain hope, I admit—that I might be able to convince the right hon. leader of the Opposition that my ideas and policies in regard to these various matters were clothed with a sufficient amount of reason to prove that my election in the division I have the honour to represent was not stolen, as I am credibly informed was reported to him. But, assuming that report was sent to him, then my right hon. friend will at least give me credit for saying that, in view of the majority which I secured, if I did steal the election I did not commit petty larceny.

Mr. MEIGHEN: At a great price came the hon. gentleman by that seat.

Mr. MARLER: I do not think we had better talk about things like that in the House. As regards the railway situation, I do not intend to say very much, least of all do I intend to discuss the question as to who was or was not responsible for it. One thing is certain to-day, we have the railways; there is absolutely no mistake about that. The question is: How are we going to prevent a continuance of this enormous expenditure which is sapping the life blood of the country every year? The only way is to put an end to the extravagant and improper manner in which those railways have been operated in the past; that is the first thing to be done. I may be hard to convince on certain subjects, but I cannot be convinced that there ever has been any proper management of the railways in question when we consider that the deficits on fixed charges and operating costs alone were $48,000,000 in 1919, $70,000,000 in 1920, and are estimated for this fiscal year to be $61,000,000, without including replacements and renewals. I have some comparative figures here of operating charges, but they are set down from memory and consequently I do not want to quote them. Our railways, Sir, are like any other run-down business. A run-down business must be built up, proper accounting methods must be introduced, and various departments properly administered, but, most important of all, there must be a competent executive put in charge so that the whole system in all its departments may be co-ordinated. That is what has to be done, and that, I understand, is what the Government propose to do. As I see it, it is all that can be done under the present circumstances.

My hon. friend the Prime Minister and my hon. friend from Marquette very candidly stated a few days since that they knew of certain hon. members on this side of the House who were not in favour of public ownership of railways. I will speak about that with equal candor. I myself am not in favour of public ownership of railways. I made that profession at the time of my election; I still make it. Public ownership has always meant to me inefficiency, irregularity of service, greater cost, greater taxes, mounting up of the public debt. I have never been able to find one instance of the successful operation of a railway under public ownership. I make this declaration, Sir, merely to show my right hon. friend that I do not say one thing on the hustings and another on the floor of the House. But I do pledge myself to assist the Government by every means in my power to make the railways a success in accordance with the policies which they have laid down. But I am apprehensive of success.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will the hon. gentleman permit me a question? He stated in writing in one of his published manifestoes that he favoured getting rid of the Government railways at the earliest possible moment. Does he adhere to that position?

Mr. MARLER: Yes, I may tell my right hon. friend that I do adhere to that position. But you cannot get rid of the railway at the present time. They are run down; they are not railways at all now; no one would take them. If the railways are built up and whatever government is in power wants to get rid of them, they can get rid of them. I am quite frank with my right hon. friend as to what my views are regarding the railways.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman, then, believes in building them up so that they can be sold.

Mr. MARLER: Not necessarily. The great majority of the people to-day apparently desire public ownership of railways. I am in the minority, but I am entitled to my opinion, just as my right hon. friend is entitled to his. He has always told us that he is in favour of public ownership of railways, public ownership of ships, public ownership of various other things. I am not in favour of it; the majority of the people are. Have I answered the question fairly?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Much better than usual from that side of the House.

Mr. MARLER: I was very much disappointed, Mr. Speaker, not to see in the Speech from the Throne any mention of our merchant marine. The Canadian Government Merchant Marine is a favorite policy of mine; it is a favorite policy of the constituency which I represent. The late representative of the constituency also made it a favorite policy of his. These sixty-three ships, Mr. Speaker, carrying the products of the mine, the forest, the field; flying the Canadian beaver at their topmasts; bearing the name "Canadian" before their various other names, and ploughing the seven seas—that was the description given of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. But another description that might now be given is with regard to the present location of many of these ships. We might add to the phrase "ploughing the seven seas", words to indicate that certain of them are now frozen in the Great Lakes. Is my right hon. friend still convinced that the Canadian Government Merchant Marine was a war measure? Is he still convinced that they expand Canadian trade? Is he still convinced that they are a safe and advantageous investment?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the hon. gentleman wants me to answer, I will. I do not presume he does so. I do not wish to interrupt him unless he does.

Mr. MARLER: The Canadian Government Merchant Marine was a policy barren, bereft and destitute of all reason, a policy which should never have been undertaken by any country at such a time, a policy which last year involved a loss to the country of $8,000,000. We have the ships; what are we going to do with them?

My right hon. friend in his address last Monday quoted a paragraph from the manifesto which I issued to my electors with regard to the tariff. The paragraph, or the part which my right hon. friend read, was correctly quoted, and I find no fault with his quoting it. What does my right hon. friend expect me to do concerning the statement that I made at that time as regards the tariff? Does he expect me to denounce it? If so, I am sorry I have to disappoint him; I have not the slightest intention of denouncing it, in whole or in part. The declaration which I made at the time of the election still stands; why should I denounce it? My right hon. friend says that it contains the principle and practice of protection. Well, if he wants to call his tariff a protective tariff it is no concern of mine. If some other person wants to call his tariff a uniform tariff, it is no concern of mine. If someone else wants to call his tariff a tariff for revenue—well, that sounds a great deal better to me, but the name itself does not captivate me. What kind of tariff, then, do I approve of? Mr. Speaker, a tariff is not a name only; it is not a dogma which cannot be changed. It is a policy which must be based on the requirements of the country; a policy which will as nearly as possible serve the needs of all; a policy which will build up, not one which will destroy. But before all it must be designed for the development of the nation and the needs of the people generally. That is my definition of a tariff which I believe could be put in effect. It is quite immaterial to me what name is given the tariff, because a name means nothing at all. It may be argued that it is impossible to please everybody. I agree to the extent that it is impossible fully to please everybody; but surely it is quite possible to try to please everybody. On the other hand, hon. gentlemen sitting angularly opposite have always gone on the principle that they should try to please only a few as regards the tariff, and that is what I object to in their policy.

When was the last revision of the tariff made, Mr. Speaker? In June, 1919, Sir Thomas White, then Finance Minister, declared that a revision of the tariff was long overdue. On May 18, 1920, the then Finance Minister was of the opinion that there should be a revision. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition also declared in Montreal last year that a revision of the tariff should be made. Revision is perfectly correct. Revision is required in the interests of revenue. It is required in the interests of the consumer; it is required in the interests of the country, because the country does not stand still; conditions alter, and those conditions must be met. To say otherwise would be absurd. In the Speech from the Throne last year there was the following paragraph:

> My advisers are convinced of the necessity for revision of the Customs tariff. In order to secure the most complete information a committee has conducted an extensive and thorough inquiry, and has secured the views of all parties and interests in every province.

But was any revision made? Was anything done with the marvellous report which contained information sought in every province? Was the report itself ever brought down to the House? I never heard of its being brought down; I never heard of any revision being made. I did hear, however, of some additional taxes being imposed. And what happened when the administration was asked to bring down this report?, Sir George Foster, Minister of Trade and Commerce, on February 16, 1921, said, in answer to a request that the report be brought down:

> I am going to ask him if he ever knew of a case where information gathered by ministers of the Crown for their personal information or to serve as a basis for their calculations respecting the schedules of the tariff was presented to the House in the form of a report.

That was the answer which was given in the House last year with regard to this report. If the report was of any value, Sir, I do not see why it was not brought down. I fail to see the necessity for secrecy as regards any legislation or any attempted legislation in this House. It seems to me that we here in this House are nothing more than a committee of the nation gathered together for the purpose of solving the difficulties of the nation. It we are here for any other purpose, my whole idea of parliament certainly falls to the ground. I do not intend to take up at any greater length the question of the tariff except to refer to one other point.

Those immediately to your left, Mr. Speaker, have been most persistent in attributing to the Prime Minister inconsistency in his tariff views. I might say that the lieutenants of the late government during the last election were most insidious in their statements as to the views of the Prime Minister on the tariff. In Montreal they told the people just enough to make them believe that the Prime Minister had different views in different parts of the country, but not enough, fortunately, to make them vote for hon. gentlemen opposite. I have never doubted the consistency of the Prime Minister in his views on the tariff. He has always distinctly said, and he has said it time and again—he said it in this House only last Monday—that he would take the advice of the outstanding men in the Liberal party, and I am quite certain that he intends to follow that course. We have outstanding men in the Liberal party. We have the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) who himself made the Laurier-Fielding tariff, and I am certain that that tariff, subject to the revision which will be made by the present Government, will be satisfactory to many members on the other side of the House and the country generally.

My hon. friend from Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) questioned my views on the tariff, and quoted from the Montreal Gazette. The Montreal Gazette quoted certain of my speeches very well indeed, but let us say for the satisfaction of my hon. friend that the speech from which he quoted was reported quite correctly. It therefore behooves me to try and explain a little more fully to my friends immediately opposite what my further views on the making of the tariff may be. It seems to me that my hon. friends immediately opposite realize how we in Eastern Canada every day anxiously look at the papers to see how the western crops are coming on. We await news of the crop almost with bated breath. Why? Because we know that if the western crop is good, business will be better, and that if it is bad, business will be worse. Any thinking man in this country cannot but recognize that agriculture is our basic industry, and that if agriculture is killed the other industries will also suffer; that it is no more to the advantage of these other industries to kill agriculture than it is to the advantage of agriculture to kill industries. On the other hand, my hon. friends of the Progressive party must realize that from the East and the industries of the East comes a considerable amount of capital and purchasing power. Does it not therefore follow that the interests of the East and of the West are bound up together, the one with the other, and that some common ground must be found which will in a measure suit both. Let us look at the situation frankly. Perhaps some ground will be found which, while not completely suiting both, will be fair and just and equitable enough to satisfy everybody. That is the ground we must strive to reach, and if we attain it, we shall bring lasting benefit to both the East and the West. I admit quite frankly that I am against unfair profits. I am against legislation which will make the few rich at the expense of the many, but at the same time I am in favour of building up this country by fair and open legislation.

I should like to say a word or two on immigration, because I look upon it as one of the most important questions before the country to-day. I believe that unless we procure greater population we cannot get over all our difficulties. While saying that I am well aware that the finances of the country call for the utmost economy, but I hope that in the matter of immigration the Finance Minister and the Government will be generous in their expenditure, and realize, as I do, that any amount spent will be returned tenfold. I do not want to be unduly critical as regards the immigration policy in the past, but when we realize the figures placed before this House a few days ago by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), who stated that we should have a million more people in this country than we have to-day, it is perfectly clear that something must be wrong.

There is another point in regard to immigration which I trust the minister in charge of that department will consider. The regulations in force at the present time treat immigrants coming to this country as so much merchandise, instead of as human beings, thereby entailing a great deal of suffering on the weak; such rules, for instance, as that relating to the non-continuous journey, and the passport regulations. If the present regulations are continued or new regulations are put into effect, they should be made very clear and be made known to the immigrant at the port of embarkation, instead of at the port of debarkation, so that the immigrant before he comes to this country will know exactly what to expect, instead of learning it after he has landed and having to be deported, as has happened in a great many cases. I have listened with considerable interest to the remarks of the hon. member for Marquette to the effect that we do not want city dwellers, and I agree with him to a great extent. Our cities at the present time are pretty full, but at the same time I think exception should be made in favour of the deserving immigrant.

I have only one word more to say on the question of economy which, very properly, was referred to in the Speech from the Throne. I believe that with very few exceptions we should only expend what we can actually pay for. There are certain works which are for the good of the country, not for special localities. These will require to be undertaken, and the immigration policy of the Government should also be considered in a generous manner.

I apologize for taking up so much time but it seems to me that if we as Canadians would only realize what we have in this country and with sincerity would try and forward the interests of the Dominion we would have co-operation on all sides. With co-operation will certainly come unity of purpose, and with unity of purpose will come happiness and prosperity. Mr. Speaker, it has always seemed to me that we as Canadians have two great debts to pay in this country. The first debt we have to pay is to the Canadian nation as a whole, and that debt we can readily pay and discharge if we are only true to our own better judgment. The second debt we have to pay is to those men who went overseas and fought for us in the Great War. This we can pay also if we stand true to British traditions and perhaps make this Canadian nation the greatest in the British Commonwealth.

Mr. JOHN PRITCHARD (North Wellington): Mr. Speaker, in rising for the first time to address this assembly I feel that following the precedents established by former speakers, I ought to compliment you on the high position to which you have been called. This repetition may seem a little monotonous, but because we mean what we say we can scarcely allow the opportunity to pass without paying you this tribute. Judging, Sir, from your career during the last few years in Parliament and your conduct during your occupancy of the Chair for the past few days, hon. members, and especially those of us who are here for the first time may safely accept your instruction and guidance because we feel confident that your interpretation and application of the rules of the House will always be fair and impartial.

I am sure, Sir, as you look over this House the membership must appear to you somewhat unique in two or three different aspects. For the first time a Canadian House of Commons has a lady representative. The frequent references to our fair colleague may be wearisome, but because she comes from our particular part of Ontario and belongs to the Progressive group we feel that a certain amount of honour is reflected upon us in having the first lady representative from Southeast Grey in this Parliament.

Another fact, Sir, that may appeal to you as somewhat unique in view of your past parliamentary experience is that there are several different groups occupying seats in this Chamber, and that there is a larger number than usual of new men, perhaps the great majority of members being men who have not previously served in Parliament. The people may naturally ask whether the change is in the interest of good government. Certainly there is a reason for it. For a long time past the electors of Canada have been watching the proceedings of Parliament with deep interest and especially during the last five or six years. In all likelihood the keenest interest in that regard has been shown in the "dilapidated annex," so called but the leader of the Progressive group (Mr. Crerar) has won the sympathy of the Canadian electorate to a greater degree that any other individual in Parliament. During the controversies in this House, and outside of it in the last few years, the people have been looking on and have wished to see that leader vindicated, and I believe that vindication has come.

While the recent campaign was in progress our opponents declared that we were conducting a campaign for class legislation. Such a charge we entirely resent; we advocate not only what will improve the farming industry, but will be for the betterment of the Dominion as a whole. We have felt for some time past that the farmers of this country did not have that representation to which they were entitled in order that their case might be justly presented to Parliament. Now that we Progressives are here in greater strength we intend to present our case in our own way, feeble though it may be, but in a manner which we hope will appeal to Parliament. The government who were lately in office have claimed that their policy was in the best interests of Canada. They told us that if we encouraged the manufacturing industries, employment would be found for our labouring men, markets would be created for our products, and prosperity would be brought to the country. What are the actual facts? We find that a country capable of supporting fifty million people has a population of only eight and three quarter millions, that many workers are out of employment, and that no inconsiderable number are almost in destitute circumstances. There is a reason for this and we as farmers have observed it for a number of years past. We have presented our case, but we have not hitherto been listened to. Many men have been willing to tell us about our own industry; but we concluded that we knew as much about our own affairs as anybody else and that the time had come to put that knowledge to some practical use. We believed that if we had efficiently managed the farms of this country, the time had come for us to go one step further, and take a more direct part in legislating upon public affairs, other classes in the community having shown their incapacity to formulate policies in the interest of the country at large.

At the present time we find that the manufacturers, to use a homely expression, cannot stand on their feet without help from the Government or somebody else. We find that the managers of the National railway system are unable to make their railroads go; that they are creating a deficit every year. We find that in order to maintain teachers and persons in certain other professions, we have to give them a fixed rate of pay. The only class of people who are not getting help from the Government are asking for it now. Where are we going to get it from? Everybody is wanting help, but where is it to come from? The situation is something like that of the man who tried to lift himself by the lugs of his boots. It is impossible for everybody to get help and to get it from somebody else, and that is the position in which we are to-day. What is the solution of this problem? We claim, Sir, that we want fair consideration; we are not asking for any special privileges; we are asking for a square deal; we are asking for better markets both to buy and to sell in, and that is all we care about. Even last summer when our butchers were digging holes in the ground and actually burying hides, hides were being shipped into this country, and the same was true in regard to wool. When it was hardly worth while to take the wool off a sheep's back, wool was being imported into this country. On the other hand, what are we paying for the products of leather and the products of wool?

We believe that agriculture should be allowed access to the markets that we want, both to buy and to sell in. We do not want to handicap the manufacturers of our country; we do not wish them to be throttled so that they cannot do business. But, why should any manufacturer receive a guarantee of 10 per cent, allowing him to employ inefficient men, if I might say so, and to give his men wages higher than farmers can afford to pay, and then why should we guarantee him a profit on his business, while the farmer cannot pay as much to his hired help and cannot get as much from the capital invested as if he put his money into Victory bonds, and while he and his family are not making the wages of unskilled labour? There you have the situation.

We talk about bringing immigrants to this country, and the Speech from the Throne dealt with immigration. What in the world are we going to do with the immigrants? At the present time we have not work for all the people who are in this country. You cannot keep immigrants on the land. Can you take from any other country in the world, any man who has commonsense, put him on the land and induce him to stay there? He will not remain. What we have to do is to make conditions such that the fertile fields of this country will produce. We have land enough and this country is capable of producing sufficient to pay off the national debt in a short time.

We have had a good deal of discussion about our railway deficits, but there is a way to overcome them. We must give our railways something to do; and in order to do that, we must get our fertile fields tilled by making agriculture profitable, just as we have endeavoured to make manufacturing industries profitable. In that way, we shall have no trouble in getting men upon the land and in keeping our own sons, the men who have been reared in this country, on the land.

Our friends will not forget to tell us what they have done for agriculture in the way of education. I have been a kind of a farmer for forty-five or fifty years, and I have not been a failure altogether; but we have listened to a certain kind of advice until we are tired. I have said to the leading agriculturists at the Ontario Agricultural College at Guelph: "Why do you not put men on the land to show us how to do the work?" Have they done that? Why does this Government not put men on the land to show us how to do the work? The other day, when the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Church), and the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) were speaking, I could not help wishing this Government would give them a million acres of good land somewhere in Canada; I do not care whether it be in Ontario or the Northwest; make them a present of it and make them take these unemployed men out of Toronto and put them on the land to make a living, and see how they will get on. I am convinced that even if you gave them the land for nothing, they could not make a living on it. Yet, we are expected to go on the land and make a living, and they want to put more people on the land to produce and to make this country prosperous.

We have also the problem of the returned man whom we are trying to settle on the land. It is lamentable that these men, who have done so much for our country and who have now returned, are being placed on land where it is impossible for them to make ends meet. Something should be done by this Parliament at this session for these men. It seems too bad that these men, who have gone to the front and who, during all those years of prosperity in this country, have worked for a mere pittance, are, now that they have come back, being placed on the land. What for? To assume the responsibility of paying off the debt which this country has had to shoulder by reason of the war. They saved our country in the one case, and now you ask them to go to work and save it again. On the other hand, a number of men have invested money in Victory bonds that are nontaxable, and they are secure in the receipt of a fair rate of interest.

I feel that we have a big problem in Canada to overcome. I am not a pessimist; I feel that, even during this session of Parliament, something is going to be done to give the farmers of this Dominion a little encouragement. We are capable of overcoming great obstacles. We Canadian people have come of a stock which knows no defeat. The pioneers of this country were of that calibre; the men who went to France were of that calibre, and in this House we have men also of that calibre. We will overcome the difficulties and we will pay the debt of this country. We are not wreckers, as has been charged; nor are we out to obtain everything that we feel we ought to have for ourselves with nothing for the other fellow; we are not local in our demands; we are not selfish in our requests; but what we ask, we ask, not only for ourselves, but for the interest and benefit of the whole people of the Dominion of Canada. If you make the agricultural section of this country prosperous, you will have no difficulty about the national debt; you will have no trouble about ensuring the prosperity of the country; but something must be done to benefit the agricultural industry.

I was asked to allow my name to be placed on the list of speakers who would take part in this debate. My name was shoved back and back, until now my address has been nearly all given by other speakers, and I do not feel it is wise to rehash what has already been said. I am not going to do that, and I am not going to occupy many more minutes of the time of the House. If we take hold of the problems that lie before us, whether it be the railways, the immigration problem, the national debt, or the tariff, I believe we are going to arrive at some conclusion that will be in the best interests of the country as a whole.

I am very glad that we have a representative number of farmers in this assembly to-day who are able to present our case as it ought to be presented. As others have said, we are not out for class legislation, as has been charged, but for something that will benefit the whole country. There was something I did not like about the addresses of certain hon. gentlemen from Toronto as well as British Columbia. They advocated something for their own localities. I like to hear a man speak, as one hon. member on the other side has spoken, advocating what will be in the interests of the people as a whole. That is what we want; we do not ask for anything which we consider not to be in the interest of all the people.

Mr. W. G. RAYMOND (Brantford): As one of the new members, Mr. Speaker, I feel it requires some resolution to deliver an address to such an assembly as this; but I have always heard, and I believe it is the reputation of this House, that hon. members are generally tolerant of, and in fact indulgent to, new members, and this perhaps gives one a degree of confidence. The greatest orator, perhaps, who ever spoke our language, or at any rate one of the greatest, John Bright, said that the basis of eloquence was not rhetoric but sincerity, and being sincere in what little I have to say, if my speech is not as ornamental as has been the case with some of more oratorical experience, I hope I shall at least be heard because of the sincerity of the cause I advocate.

I have listened with much attention to many speeches. Some of them unfortunately, I could not hear throughout, but I heard a good many things that were very interesting and eloquent. I was particularly interested in the addresses made by the members of the Progressive party. They come from a part of Canada that I have never seen, and I am sure that the frame of mind which they have displayed in the House is very complimentary to that part of the great Dominion which they represent. I have no doubt that the people who sent them to the House have every reason to be proud of them, not merely from the way in which they express themselves—clear, straightforward, frank and easily understood—but from the intelligence, the learning and the research that is evident in some of their speeches. There was one hon. gentleman from the West, if I mistake not, who told us that he and his leader were of the Labour party. That gentleman gave us a very learned and interesting address on various forms of government, an address that showed erudition and research. I must say, however, that I was a little disappointed at one thing that he said. He alluded to the gentlemen who sit on this side of the House as being supporters of the great interests. Now, I do not read anything in history that substantiates that statement. He referred to that book which was written by the hon. the Prime Minister of this country (Mr. Mackenzie King), namely "Industry and Humanity," but if he had studied it at all carefully he would never have supposed that its author would lead a party that would be at the beck and call of the great interests. I venture to say that if the Prime Minister of this country had never done anything else to make himself famous than to have written that book his name would be emblazoned on the scroll of fame, because it is considered to be the greatest contribution, on the much vexed question of capital and industry, that has come from the pen of any writer. Hence I was somewhat disappointed to hear my hon. friend express the opinion that the author of such a work, a man so intensely sincere as the Prime Minister, could be the leader of a party such as he described, a party at the beck and call of the great interests. I have another difference with him, and I shall state it most respectfully. As he reads history—and he evidently has read a great deal of it—and as I read it, our philosophy leads us to rather different conclusions, because as I have studied the history of this country, and as I have read that of Great Britain, the Liberal party of Canada, now led by the Prime Minister, has never been the party of special privileges and great interests here; nor has the Liberal party of Great Britain ever befriended privilege and big interests. On the other hand, it has always been the party to fight special privilege; and the manifold freedom that we have to-day and which is the boast of our race, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of Parliament and, in fact, our whole political system, has grown from the success and progress of Liberal principles either in this country or in the old land. It can therefore never be said with truth that the Liberal party is the party of special interests. I do not think I could find a better general definition of the underlying principles of the Liberal party than is to be found in the closing words of the eloquent speech of the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar). You will remember how he concluded his speech. He said that he reechoed the sentiment of the Prime Minister in the hope that we might, in this country, enjoy unity, prosperity and so forth; and he added that in order to enjoy these we must have laws founded upon justice and equality, laws that would ensure equal rights to all and special privileges to none. That statement is, to me, a definition of the general principles that underlie Liberalism. I think we all look to have laws that give special privileges to none and equal justice to all. The same sentiment has been repeated tonight and at other times by hon. members, and I think we may take it for granted that that is the only true foundation on which to base the prosperity, happiness and unity of this country; and the hon. member for Marquette is to be complimented upon having enunciated such a sound principle, but, as I said before, I think it is the underlying principle of the Liberal party.

While I should like, Sir, to again pay those compliments that have been already paid you, it is quite unnecessary I think to repeat them. Hon. members are supposed to have intelligence, they are supposed to have some power of expressing themselves, they are supposed to have love of country at heart, and they are supposed to have a conscientious sense of justice. Therefore, we can compliment ourselves instead of you, Sir, that one who is supreme in those qualities should have been elevated to the position of Speaker, because your record for the last twenty-five years is a part of the history of Canada.

Now, Sir, every member is going to represent the interest of his constituency to the best of his ability. It is his bounden duty to do so. But in doing so, no one, I take it, should at any time forget that there is above that local interest the greater interest of our common country, to which at times the interest of his own constituency or even of his own province must give way a little, and that, I believe, is what influences every hon. member.

But, as I say, each hon. member naturally wishes to make the interest of his constituents felt in this House, and I quite admired the member for North Toronto (Mr. Church) for the way in which he referred at such generous length to the affairs of his constituents. He told us a great deal about Toronto that was very interesting indeed, much about its street car service and other utilities, and really when he expatiated upon their benefits I could not help but think that there might some day come a disappointment which I should regret, and which I am afraid possibly he might regret, too, that when he left this vale of tears and ascended to that Eternal City, whose bulwarks we are told glow with jasper, and entered the New Jerusalem he would be apt to look out of the car that took him there and say, "Alas! this is not Toronto." I have always admired the patriotism of Toronto people, only I think it is well that they should bear in mind that Toronto is not the whole Dominion, nor is Toronto even all of the province of Ontario, although taking the remarks of hon. members from that part of the country one perhaps may have been led to believe that they at least thought so.

I should not have taken up the time of the House in this debate except that the right hon. member for Grenville, the leader of the Opposition, did me the honour to refer to me personally in his opening remarks, and I have such a respect for him that I should not like him to think that through indifference I did not make such explanation to him as I was able; indeed, it would seem on my part ungracious were I not to acknowledge his mention of me. But it is not so much on my own part personally as because his reference involved my constituency that I think it well to explain, and also because it involved the hon. Prime Minister, the leader of the party to which I pin my political faith and allegiance, and shall do so until I see reason to change. I believe the statement made by the right hon. member for Grenville had been previously made by a paper known in Toronto as the Mail and Empire, but known to those who do not swallow all that it tells them, because they have learned to distrust it, as the Malignant Vampire. In that paper it was said two or three times that the member for Brantford was elected because he advocated an increased duty on agricultural implements. It was rather a foolish statement to make and one that reflected not so much upon me, if that was my judgment, as upon the judgment of a constituency that is composed of agriculturists as well as manufacturers. I should not like hon. members who belong to the Progressive party and come from the West, I should not like men whose business is farming, whatever part of Canada they come from, to think that that was the attitude of the manufacturers of agricultural implements in Brantford. Brantford is known all over this country as the home of such implements. I think wherever lumber is used the Brantford sawmills are known, that Brantford windmills, Brantford gasoline engines, Brantford ploughs and all the other kinds of kindred machinery are known and used on the farm. But why was the statement made in the Mail and Empire and reiterated by the right hon. member for Grenville? It was made with a motive, and a great detective has said that the surest way to discover the perpetrator of a crime is to look for the motive. Now, the motive, it appears to me, is in the first place to create a certain amount of distrust and suspicion in the minds of the members of the Progressive party against the member for Brantford, so that his word would have no weight with them, and in the second place to create a certain amount of distrust and suspicion against the hon. Prime Minister, because he was represented as having made statements in the West which his support of me in Brantford would make him appear as occupying a double position.

Now, I am not afraid of anything I said during that election contest, for nothing whatever was said that could not be repeated. In fact, I think what was read by the right hon. member for Grenville was part of an election address that was printed and of course is in existence somewhere. But I would ask you to follow me carefully for a moment while I explain to you exactly what was said and what he found fault with. I do not say this through any ingratitude to the right hon. gentleman, because had he not come there perhaps I would not have been in this House to-night. But he came to my constituency, and he did not come with that urbanity of manner and that suavity of voice which is so much in evidence with him in this House; he came there with a brow contracted and in tones of thunder, like Saul of old, was breathing out threatenings and persecutions. He was met at the station by a band and a guard of honour and escorted to the armouries, where he set to work to demolish things. In the first place he demolished the leader of the Progressive party and his policy absolutely.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. RAYMOND: In the second place, he attacked the hon. leader of the Liberal party and endeavoured to demolish him and his party. Then he was kind enough to devote his attention to me. All he said with reference to the government of the country was that he was in favour of a protective policy, and that that was the only issue before the country. As you are aware, it was said throughout the length and breadth of this country—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rise to a point of order. What the hon. gentleman states has been so often repeated that I think I owe it to the House to make a statement regarding it. I did not make that statement in Brantford or anywhere else. I accepted all the issues raised by my foes on each and every platform on which I spoke. What I said in Brantford regarding the hon. gentleman, and said here, I quoted from the manifesto issued by himself; I did not quote from the Mail and Empire or any other newspaper whatsoever.

Mr. RAYMOND: That is not exactly the point I raised, Mr. Speaker. It was rather this, that when the right hon. member for Grenville came to Brantford he found fault with the attitude I took, and I should like to explain it to him now. Possibly he never really understood that attitude, I should like to explain to him just what it was. He came to Brantford, as I say, and told the people of that city that the great issue before the country was protection; that if they wanted to avoid unemployment; if they wanted to avoid soup kitchens and all that kind of thing, they would have to support the policy of protection. That was the argument all over the country; I do not think the right hon. gentleman will deny it. At all events, it was his argument in Brantford. Well, we hapened to have some three thousand men or so out of work at that time, there being no employment for them in the agricultural implement factories. I remember on that occasion the right hon. gentleman was asked: How about tractors? What protection have we upon them? I do not remember the answer he gave; I do know, however, that it was not satisfactory to those who were interested in seeing the tractor industry go on, because some $20,000,000 worth of tractors had been imported into Canada which otherwise would have been made here. Now, when the duty was taken off tractors it may have been a wise measure; I am not saying it was not. But I do say that when the right hon. gentleman came to Brantford and claimed that protection was the only issue before the country at that time—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I rise to a point of order. I have already corrected the hon. gentleman, and I ask him not to repeat this statement as having been made by me. I have said that I did not make it.

Mr. FIELDING: My right hon. friend has not raised any point of order. He may only interrupt by consent of the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I submit that when the hon. gentleman attributes to me a statement which I did not make and which I have already denied, I have the right, on a point of order. to correct him.

Mr. FIELDING: That is not a point of order; it does not as such come within the rules of the House. The right hon. gentlemna may ask permission to correct the hon. member who has the floor, but he can only do so with his consent.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I differ wholly from the hon. gentleman.

Mr. RAYMOND: Let me approach the matter from another point of view. I had read the manifesto published by the right hon. member for Grenville. I read it in several newspapers of October 5, I think it was, but it was published throughout the length and breadth of this country. It was a rather lengthy document and had evidently been prepared with a great deal of care. It was published more than a month after he had made that speech in London on the first of September, when he said than an election was pending. There was just one paragraph in that manifesto to which I would like to draw his attention and the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker. It was this—I cannot repeat it word for word, but I am sure I have the sense of it: That system cannot be defended, nor can it continue, which strips from some industries the benefit of protection and leaves other industries enjoying the benefit of it. I rather agree with that. That statement from the right hon. gentleman seemed to be in accord with the idea of having laws that are fair and equal and give special privileges to none. But the constituency that I represent happens to have been subjected very often to the effects of the tariff reduction that was practised by the late administration. When the duty was reduced from 20 per cent to an average of 14 per cent it was the industries in Brantford principally that were affected. Consequently, when I saw it stated in the manifesto that such a policy could not be defended nor could it continue, I agree that it could not be defended in the name of justice, and I believe that there was too great a sense of justice in that constituency to let it continue.

The assertion that the attitude taken by the present Prime Minister in Brantford was inconsistent with his attitude in the West is not fair and cannot be supported by good grounds. Nowadays when a man rises to speak from a public platform his words are taken down and eagerly scanned by critics of both parties. If any duplicity or double dealing or fencing or camouflage could have been shown in the case of the present Prime Minister's Brantford speech, there were plenty of men on the side of the right hon. leader of the Opposition at that time to point out the discrepancies. But none were pointed out. The Prime Minister when he came to the city of Brantford made a statement that was clear, honest, frank, straightforward, and the people believed him; they had every confidence in him. My memory takes me back over forty years and brings back to me the speeches of great leaders of thought and opinion in this country. I remember the effect of speeches of leaders like Sir John Macdonald, Sir Charles Tupper, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and also, of course, the utterances of the right hon. member for Grenville, then Prime Minister, when he visited Brantford. But never in the course of my recollection, which, as I say is quite clear over a period of forty years, do I recall an instance when a whole city was so completely converted as the people of Brantford were by the speech of the then leader of the Opposition, the present Prime Minister. It was generally admitted that he made a clear statement of his case; that it was constructive statesmanship; that it was not destructive criticism of the Progressive party or anybody else. He said what he would do if he were returned to power, and those who know him and who know the gentlemen whom he has called upon to assist him in the administration, have confidence that we have at the helm a man who will lead this country through the terrible crisis which has come upon it.

Now, that was how the election went through in our part of the country. As I say, I had little hope when I was nominated, but when the right hon. member for Grenville came to the constituency it seemed as if my friends were a little more hopeful. When the present Prime Minister came, the current of success seemed fairly to have set upon our side.

I do not think I should let go unchallenged in this House the statement that the manufacturers of Brantford would have endorsed the man who supported an increased tariff on agricultural implements; if I did I should do an injustice to the people I represent, and that is the last thing I want to do. I want to do my duty by my constituents. I know them well, and they know me; I know them to be honest, and they know me to be sincere. It is not right to say that the manufacturers of agricultural implements of various kinds in my constituency are seeking an increased duty or seeking to acquire a monopoly of the business that they have carried on for so many years. On the contrary they were desirous that dissension should not be sown as between them and their customers—who are, as I say, scattered from one end of Canada to the other. We who are familiar with business conditions know that the bond of business often becomes the bond of friendship,—indeed, it is second only to the bond of friendship. Whatever enjoyment they have had by way of tariff protection in the past they naturally do not want to lose. I can tell you that no manufacturer of the city of Brantford ever approached me and asked me to seek an increased duty on anything that is made in that city. But that they should at least enjoy what they have can fairly be argued, that that system cannot be defended which strips protection from some industries and leaves others in the enjoyment of it. We have had the tractor industry stripped of protection, the binder twine industry, the cream separator industry, all of which goods are made in our city. Then the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Hocken) and my right hon. friend from Grenville (Mr. Meighen) and others claim that we had a general reduction on agricultural implements from twenty per cent down to fourteen and a fraction per cent. Brantford had therefore been made the goat, as I say. They had been made to suffer; they had been made to lose this advantage of protection while others had been allowed to enjoy it.

Mr. SALES: Is there not more binder twine made in Brantford now that the industry has been stripped of protection than ever before?

Mr. RAYMOND: The hon. gentleman asks me a very fair and reasonable question, and I think I can give him a very fair and reasonable answer. There was a small duty on binder twine at one time, and before that duty was taken off there were several binder twine factories in this country, but when the duty was taken off they gradually went out of business, and I believe the only one left in this country today is the one at Brantford, and perhaps one in Welland. I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend exact figures as to the output of the factory in Brantford, but the fact remains that these other factories all went out of business in this country. The combine which controls twine manufacture on the other side of the line did not see fit to drive the Brantford factory out of business, and so it has remained. They could drive that factory out if they thought it advisable to do so, and in that case, with no factory in Brantford, our farmers from one end of Canada to the other would have to submit to the price dictated by the combine in the United States.

Mr. SALES: Is it not a fact that the Brantford factory has doubled its production and increased its plant in the past few years? My point is that more binder twine is made in Brantford now than ever before.

Mr. RAYMOND: That is quite correct, because the others have gone out of business. The Brantford concern has increased its output and its plant. To go back, in Brantford we had that disadvantage, and in my election address I pointed it out, and it is that clause in my election address which has been alluded to by the leader of the Opposition. He told me I should not be in Brantford, but out West fighting the free traders.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. RAYMOND: He now says "Hear, hear." He also seemed to think it was an act of presumption on my part to venture to contest the riding at all against his friend who had formerly represented it. I was at a loss to quite understand the position he took in that matter. He made a statement at a public meeting at which about three thousand people were present that for me to run on the platform I did as a supporter of the Prime Minister was a deed of the blackest political infamy.

Mr. McKENZIE: Surely not.

Mr. RAYMOND: He used those words, "a deed of the blackest political infamy." Now it is not in the hands of anybody, even if he is the Prime Minister or the whole Government of this country, to say whom a constituency shall send to Parliament. I say that that would be absolutely reversing the whole of our democratic institutions. Any man, whether he be the Prime Minister of this country or anybody else, who will come and tell the free people of any electoral district in this country whom they should send to Parliament, or whom they should not send, is arrogating to himself something that belongs to no man in this country, because under our constitution it is for the people themselves to select their representative.

It has been tried time and again in the Old Country, and invariably the will of the people in the selection of their candidates is what regulates their parliamentary representation. Those words were so terrible to me—I have never had worse applied to me in my short existence on this terrestial sphere—that I began to think a little. I began to ask myself what I would consider a deed of the blackest political infamy. Well, I suppose we all have different ideas of politics and the science of government, and I am sure those ideas have been enunciated from all points of view in this House, but what made me take my first active interest in politics I think was this: I believed that at the very root and foundation of our liberty was the freedom of our parliamentary representation, that a man's vote should be free, and if you follow through the various successes of the Liberal party you will see that it was to obtain that liberty and preserve that right, to give to each constituency the absolute right to send whom it pleased to parliament, that our battles were fought. We look upon that as our greatest liberty; it is the foundation of our whole parliamentary system; it is the foundation of our freedom; it is the foundation upon which the power of the British Empire has been carried through the world; it is a right that has been bought for us by the blood of our ancestors, and therefore as a work of man I revere it as something sacred, this liberty of the people with regard to the franchise and the selection of their representation in parliament. Then if that be so, if you agree with me, can you think of any deed of blacker political infamy than an act that would take away from the men of this country, men who were out fighting in the field and shedding their blood in our defence, fighting our battles abroad for the freedom we prize so much—can you think of a deed of blacker political infamy or anything more malignant than that their franchise should be taken away from them and cast to the winds? Can you think of anything blacker or more iniquitous on the statute book of any free country than the War Time Elections Act of a few years ago? That, Sir, was my idea of a deed of the blackest political infamy, and I believe it would be the opinion of the people of this country. At all events, I say it with pride, it was the opinion of the electors of the constituency of Brantford. They resented that act, and that is why I am here.

[Mr. Raymond.]

With regard to the attitude of the manufacturers of Brantford I would just like to say this: If the sentiment expressed by the hon. member for Marquette, that our laws should be on the basis of equal justice to all with special privileges to none, is endorsed by his followers or by the majority of them, I can freely and frankly and fairly appeal to them to agree with my position upon the tariff. In brief it is this—I do not intend to take more time in stating it than is necessary—I think we must admit that the tariff is a tax. We on this side claim it is a tax, but placed for the purpose of giving revenue; it is so put that it gives such incidental protection as is possible to our manufacturers. However, regard it how you will, any tariff is a tax. Well then, granting that it is a tax, should it be possible that one section of the community should escape the tax while other sections of the community have to bear their taxation? In other words in the case of implements, tools, etc., used by the farmers, would it be fair to ask that they should come in free to this country while the tools that are used by mechanics—moulders, carpenters, masons and others—in other industries come in taxed?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RAYMOND: It seems to me that if a tariff is a tax, and I take it that it is, it would hardly be fair that one section of the community should ask to be freed from that tax. I think that is a reasonable conclusion; I do not see why they should. I do not think they can point to any direction in which they pay more taxes than anyone else. I remember in the opening address, during the same election to which I have already alluded, the right hon. member for Grenville made a statement as to the amount paid by farmers in direct taxation for, if my memory serves me right, the months of April, May, June and July. The statement was that out of $67,000,000 paid into the Treasury of Canada less than two-thirds per cent was paid by the farmers of the country. Now that being so, it shows that they are not unduly taxed in that direction; that being so, is it fair that they should escape the tariff tax? I do not think it is.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RAYMOND. Some hon. members may laugh because perhaps it suits their purpose; but looking at it freely and fairly —taking their leader's word for it that there should be equal justice for all and special privileges for none—are they not seeking special privileges, are they not trying to escape taxation by asking for free implements and so forth for the farmers?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. RAYMOND: Well, it seems to me that it is a very reasonable contention at all events. There is another ground on which I would ask you to view our manufacturers of agricultural implements—I do it because they are the principal industry of the city in which I live, and the city which I represent, and that is this: It has truly been said that agriculture is the basic industry of Canada, that it employs more men and more capital than any other industry, and we will all agree with that proposition. But granting that it is the most important industry—and I hope every member of the Progressive party will agree with me that it is—is it not most important that the tools or implements for that industry should be manufactured close by and in this country? If they were made in a foreign country—as they would be to a large extent if we had no duty in this country—we would not be entirely independent. In the case of war we would be absolutely dependent upon our neighbours to the south; my hon. friends would be absolutely dependent upon them for their agricultural implements that are so necessary for their industry—. I think that is a fair proposition. And if you read the history of manufacturing in England during the war you will find that the steels, dye stuffs and chemicals for certain industries had to be made in Germany to such an extent, that in England now they have called those industries key industries and have put a duty on them of 33⅓ per cent because they say they cannot be a compact, rounded out, self contained nation while they are dependent on foreign nations for anything that is so essential to their national existence. I think that is a fair proposition. It seems to me it is worth while considering and that it is in the interest of the farmers of this country—from Prince Edward Island to Vancouver—that Canadian implements—because Canadian implements are as good, I think, as any that are made in the world—should not be treated in a way that would drive the industry out of this country. The manufacturers do not seek for higher protection; they have now the lowest protection, I think, of anything under the tariff; but it is only a fair request they make when they ask that that protection should not be taken from them; and, as I say, it is very important indeed to the farming industry itself that the tools required shall be made close at hand.

There is rather a simple legend—too simple perhaps for some of the members of this House but not, I hope, for those of a plain and practical turn of mind such as myself. It has reference to the building of the Temple in Jerusalem, and Solomon was giving a prize to the one who had contributed most to the success of the structure. The workers in gold set forth their claim to receive the prize; the stone masons and the carvers and sculptors of stone set forth their claim; likewise the joiners and carpenters; but a man, with horny hands and brawny chest, and wearing a leather apron, stood up and claimed the prize. They asked him on what ground he did so and he said he was a blacksmith. He claimed the prize because he made the tools for all the rest, without his help they would not have been able to do what they did and would have been helpless. Now I ask my honest and fair-minded friends opposite if they do not consider that the manufacturers of implements stand towards their great industry in the very same position? I think they do. But the hour is late and I will not detain the House by any further remarks to-night.

On the motion of Mr. Raymond the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Mr. Fielding the House adjourned at eleven p.m.

Tuesday, March 21, 1922

The House met at three o'clock.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. McMurray for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Monday, March 20.

Mr. W. G. RAYMOND (Brantford) (resuming): When the House rose last night I was endeavouring to make clear my position and that of the Liberal manufacturers with regard to the tariff. I tried to prove that the tariff, being really a tax, should be administered with equal justice to all and with special privileges to none. I also pointed out that while it is justly claimed that the basic industries of Canada are agriculture, fishing, lumbering and mining, nevertheless they are dependent for their very existence and operation upon certain other industries that provide the tools and implements that enable them to carry on business, and that we must in consequence regard the industries producing these tools and implements as key industries. Now, the importance of key industries to a country was manifested during the late war in the case of Great Britain. It was found, as I said last night, that their system was defective in some respects, in regard to articles that were absolutely necessary to the independent carrying on of the business of the country and the prosecution of the war, such as dyestuffs, chemicals, steel, etc. While we all hope that it is an eventuality that we shall never witness, yet it is within the bounds of possibility, that this country might some day be at war, and, unthinkable though it seems, at war even with our neighbours to the south of us. I trust with all my heart that this will never be the case, but, as I say, it is possible. And in that event, it seems to me, it would be right for those who believe in the development of a Canadian nationality to see to it that it shall be a nationality absolutely self-contained and independent. To the argument that agriculture, fishing, lumbering and mining are basic industries, it is a natural corollary that those who provide the tools and machinery to carry on these businesses are engaged in key industries, and these key industries, in the general interests of the country, should be maintained, not slaughtered. I think that that is the attitude of the Liberal manufacturers, at all events, in this country. They only ask for a fair field and no favour. If we are to have all tariff restrictions stripped away they will have to stand upon the same basis as any one else; but, Sir, it seems a reasonable contention that until the day comes when this can justly be done, these industries should not be deprived of the benefits of tariff protection while other industries enjoy those benefits. We have been told that such a system is indefensible and could not continue; we have that statement from the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), and it is one in which I concur. Now, the trade question has been discussed for so many years that I do not intend to deal with it at any length to-day. Briefly stated, however, we have two extremely opposite policies before us. One is the policy of high protection, which is not the policy of the Liberal party, who believe in the middle course of a revenue tariff. The other is a policy— only, I believe, a theoretical policy— of free trade. I do not think that free trade is in the field of practical politics. So far as theory goes, it may be absolutely demonstrable, and I would not be prepared to enter into any argument as to whether entire free trade would or would not be better for Canada. I do contend, though, that if we are to have free trade it should be absolutely general and universal. But, as I say, I think it is rather a theory and is not within the realm of practical politics. It is not well, in theories, to get too far from earth; we have to come down to the fact that a great revenue has to be raised at the present time, and we must realize that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) is faced with the greatest task that any Minister of Finance of Canada, in the whole history of the country, has ever had to cope with. He will have to use every avenue of taxation, and I take it for granted that the tariff will be one upon which he will place some dependence. Free trade, therefore, is not in my opinion a practicable policy. There is an old story which is perhaps rather stale, but even so I may be pardoned for repeating it, because it is apropos. Hon. members may remember that Senator Everett asked the question of President Wilson: "How long, Mr. President, do you think a man's legs ought to be?" "Well," replied Mr. Wilson, "Really that is a question, Mr. Senator, to which I have never given much attention; but I presume that they ought to be long enough to reach the ground." I would commend the wisdom of that story to those who argue theoretically upon free trade. We have to come down to the ground; we must face the question of raising the revenues of the country, and that is not possible to-day by means of free trade, whatever may be done in the future. Another opportunity will come, I take it, for further discussion upon this subject, if such discussion be necessary, and I shall be able to state the views of my constituents. Representing, as I do, a manufacturing city, I placed before the people my policy with regard to the tariff, and I am proud to say that not only by the manufacturers, but by the rural population of the constituency as well, it was received with approval. That policy, briefly, was this: That to build up this country what we want is a tariff policy that will protect raw material and foster production; that when labour is applied to that raw material, through each process, a certain amount of protection should be guaranteed that labour; and so on until we have the finished article, with a reasonable amount of protection incidentally afforded, thus giving at the same time a slight protection to the manufacturer and an assured revenue to the country.

Now, the tariff question is indissolubly connected with another question which is agitating the public mind from one end of Canada to the other, and that is the question of transportation. In my opinion the two are closely linked together. If we wish to find the right solution of the question of transportation and of lowered freight rates and the general success of our railway system, we must not lose sight of the tariff in connection therewith. Transportation has had a great deal to do with the success of every country, and as we look back we find that those countries that neglected transportation have made no progress, while those that gave attention to this important problem have made a name in history and have tended to a great state of development.

From the earliest days as soon as the land was settled on the far eastern border the first anxiety of the settlers was for transportation. They spent immense sums of money and a vast amount of labour on road building, afterwards on railway building—the story is known to us all. They even laid railroads with wooden rails of pine faced with hardwood that they might last longer. And so in spite of great hardships and in spite of the necessity—which was a hard one in those days—of making a living, they devoted a great deal of time, energy and money to the construction, first of roads, then of railroads, and finally of canals. It was not until 1837 that we had the first locomotive in this country. Time does not permit me to trace the history of our transportation from that day to this, because it is patent to the minds of us all what took place,—how Canadian energy, ingenuity and perseverance was devoted to the building of railroads and canals. As a result we produced the greatest civil engineers in the world, and accomplished some of the greatest engineering feats that have ever been carried through successfully. I need only quote one that in its early days was considered one of the wonders of the world, though we think nothing of it to-day—the old Welland canal that locked ships up some three hundred and twenty feet. Then came the railroad era and the building of the great Canadian Pacific railway and other roads. I will not take the time of the House in recounting that phase of construction in detail, but we know the undertakings were tremendous, and that it was only by having men of great courage and skill that they were carried through to success. We have those railway systems in the hands of the Government to-day, with the exception of the Canadian Pacific railway. Some ask: Shall we carry these national railways on, or shall we drop them? It seems to me that there can be but one thought upon that question. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. Pritchard) uttered my sentiments when he said that he thought the Canadian people had courage, energy and intelligence enough to undertake the enterprise of running their own railroads. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that they should do so.

We are met with the problem of the proper management of this national railway system, of, if you like, its consolidation or co-ordination, to make it pay and be a practical asset to the country. We have got the roads, we have got the rolling stock. Are we deficient in business management? Is it not possible in this great country to find men who can manage these roads, and manage them successfully? I think if we look back over the accomplishments of Canadians you will agree with me that it is a task that at all events we ought not to flinch from handling until, in the words of the Prime Minister, we have given public ownership a fair trial. A man has been appointed as administrator of our railroads, a man who has the confidence of the country and is known for his shrewd business ability, his firmness, and his personal rectitude, and we have every confidence that he and the other members of the Government will tackle this problem in such a way that they will ultimately make our national railway system the success that we all hope it will be. If we look at what has been accomplished by our banking and financial institutions we can have nothing but a feeling of pride in the ability of our countrymen, and if that same ability be applied to the running of our national railroads, I do not see why they should not be made equally successful. That is my feeling now, that we should not flinch from the undertaking of trying to manage these railroads to the best advantage of the country

In their management the old question comes up that has been referred to in this debate—whether our traffic should run east and west, or north and south. The late Professor Goldwin Smith was quoted as having said that he thought it should run north and south. Now, if he were quoted upon a question of history, of Greek philosophy, or any other scholastic subject, I would listen with the greatest respect to his opinion. But this is a matter of practical politics. I do not know of anything in Professor Goldwin Smith's life that should make us pay regard to his opinion on the subject of transportation. When we remember that the first settlement commenced on the banks of the St. Lawrence and flowed east and west, and that afterwards when the railroads were built they were built along the same lines, until to-day we have them running from the Atlantic to the Pacific, there is not much use in talking of our railroad traffic running north and south.

But I take it, in this connection—and this is where I think the tariff and the railroad question interlock and should be considered together—that there are many cases where with a reasonable tariff imposed upon certain goods that would otherwise be imported from the United States, the carriage of those goods would bring traffic to our railroads, and the tariff in that sense would help our national railroads, and of course the more freight traffic they carry the cheaper the basis upon which they will be able to make their rates. We all know that if it were possible to-day to reduce freight rates to a minimum, many of the difficulties of the farmers in the West would be entirely removed. I for one have confidence that the Government will undertake the solution of our railway problem with that good old-fashioned courage for which Canadians are noted. I do not think we have a government of flinchers; I think they are going to undertake this problem in such a way as we have seen Canadians undertake other problems. Surely, we will never forget some of the difficulties that our soldiers overcame. When they had to take a position that was considered impregnable, that was manned by a foe who was considered, and had counted himself, invincible, and when the capture of that position had been once attempted and the attempt had failed, and the task was finally given to our soldiers, they made no rash rush to capture their objective within the first few days, but for weeks and months they studied the situation and planned and perfected every detail of the attack, rehearsed every operation behind the lines, and when the time came—I think it was the 9th of April —they advanced and took that Vimy Ridge whose name is now emblazoned upon the escutcheon of our country. We want the same kind of co-ordination of effort that achieved that success, and I believe we shall get it from the Government. We have not had any intimation of what they are going to do, and that is all the better. There was no intimation of what General Byng was going to do, but when the attack came it was absolutely successful. I look forward in the confident hope that when the Government lays its railroad policy before the country it will sweep forward to success with the certainty with which our gallant boys swept forward when they took Vimy Ridge.

I listened with delight and attention to the very eloquent address delivered by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens). It was refreshing and interesting, and with many of the points that he made I felt that I could agree. I did not like, however, his reference to the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin). He said that that gentleman was a director of the Bank of Montreal and of the Royal Trust Company, and had been a director of the Cockshutt Plough Company and others too numerous to mention. Now, if that had been stated in the obituary of a prominent Canadian it would have been counted to his credit and looked upon as indicating that he had the confidence of his fellow citizens to that degree. Why, then, should it be to a man's discredit that these things should be mentioned while he is still alive? The reference to this party as the party of the big interests is, as I endeavoured to show last evening, a mistaken one. But it would equally be a mistake to assume that there is no room within the Liberal party for all the interests of Canada—the banking interests, the manufacturing interests, the farming interests, the labour interests. What the Liberals object to is the use by the government of powers granted to them by the people in such a way as to confer unfair privilege or bring unfair profit to any interest, big or little. When that happens, then we feel that both the government and the interest concerned are at fault. But I say there is nothing in the principles of the Liberal party to prevent its having the allegiance of any part of the people of Canada. Let me make my position clear in this respect: I am now referring to occasions where the government uses its power to favour certain interests. For instance, it may occur if a government issues hundreds of millions of Victory Bonds exempt from taxation for the benefit of plutocrats, or if the government accept from certain wealthy companies promissory notes for taxes—these are matters which could be explained in detail by the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). Clearly, such acts would be bending to the great interests. But any man who occupies a high and responsible commercial position can see that the true interest of his business is with the Liberal party, because that party has not picked out men because of their race or because of their creed. It makes no difference what town or city or province a man comes from. If he is a true Canadian; if he loves his country and has its interests at heart; if he endorses the principle so well laid down by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and ably seconded by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) —equal justice to all and unfair privileges to none—I say that man can be a Liberal. But in the end, Mr. Speaker, the basis upon which any of us will be judged will not be race or blood or creed; it will be the principles that we hold in our hearts and which make up our personality, the personality of our political party and of the country of which we are citizens.

Hon. R. J. MANION (Fort William and Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I should first like to join those other speakers who have congratulated you upon your elevation to the position of first commoner of the land. Knowing you as I do; knowing your broad culture, your wide parliamentary experience, your knowledge of history and of the traditions of this Parliament, and your general desire for fair play, I feel quite sure that you will fill that position with credit to yourself, to your party, and to the House of Commons.

Then, Sir, I should like also, in a word, —for I am the first returned man who has spoken in this debate, so far as I know—to welcome to this country, the new Governor General. I had the honour of first knowing Lord Byng in France, and my last remembrance of him was at a review of my battalion some time in August, 1917, behind the lines. I can only express the hope—and I am sure it will be fulfilled— that he will as Governor General of Canada live up to the high standard which he attained as the leader of the troops in France, and that he will gain the affection of the whole of the Canadian people to the same extent as he gained the affection of the Canadian troops overseas.

I listened, Mr. Speaker, with a good deal of interest to previous speakers, particularly, for an hour and a half last evening and to-day, to the address of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond). So far as the charge that was made against him was concerned, that he had taken a stand for higher protection in Brantford, Talleyrand's expression that "Language is given us to conceal our thoughts" might well be used. He went round and round that charge and over and under it; he went through it in various directions, but he did not deny it. Perhaps it is only right and honest on his part that he should not deny it, because I hold in my hand some of the statements which he made during the election. They are too long to read in full, but if I quote a couple of paragraphs it may bring back to the minds of hon. gentlemen to my left the almost passionate appeals he made to them to believe that he was nearly a free trader. One of the statements signed by him and made to the electors of Brantford was as follows:

> The thousands of unemployed workmen in Brantford at the present time must realize that their unhappy condition is owing to the action of the Government, which reduced the duty on agricultural implements, and maintained free trade in binder-twine, cream separators and tractors.

That is signed "W. G. Raymond,"—the hon. member who has just taken his seat. But here is another statement which he made a little later in the election, I presume, published in a newspaper, with his picture, and addressed to the electors of the riding of Brantford. I shall read just two paragraphs of it. The heading is "Brantford's Interests Sacrificed," and it reads:

The fact is, this average reduction from 26 per cent to 21 per cent, claimed as such an advantage by Mr. Meighen, has been made at the expense of Brantford's industries. For instance, the duty on agricultural implements, binders, etc., etc., was reduced by the present Government from 17½ to 12½ per cent. Was this done in the interests of Brantford workingmen? Tractors were made free; cream separators and binder twine also kept on the free list. Millions of dollars were sent to the United States for the purchase of these articles, every dollar of which that was paid for labour might otherwise have been spent in Brantford, and every dollar that was spent in the United States for these articles helped to swell the balance of trade against us.

A little further on he says:

A revenue tariff—

By the way, that expression "revenue tariff" is rather amusing. There is only one kind of revenue tariff I know of, that is, a tariff which is put upon goods that are non-competing in a country—and I think my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) will agree with me—or put upon goods that are competing, but with corresponding excise duties upon similar goods made in that country.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not wish my hon. friend to be under any delusion. I do not agree with him in that respect.

Mr. MANION: I should be very glad to give my hon. friend a chance to explain what he does mean by "revenue tariff." Evidently he does not wish to do so. My hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) does not agree with that. Now suppose you put a tax, say a tax of five per cent, on goods coming into this country and competing with goods made here, and you do not put on a corresponding tax on the goods made within this country, is not that a protective tariff? I should be glad to have my hon. friend from Marquette answer that question. Certainly it is a protective tariff, to the extent of five per cent; and if the tax were ten per cent it would be a protective tariff to the extent of ten per cent. So I think we should have terms that really mean what they say. I think most economic authorities agree that a revenue tariff is a tariff that is not protective to any degree. Let me now give the quotation from the member for Brantford:

A revenue tariff judiciously applied would have been the means of keeping trade in Canada and bringing work to our Brantford factories. Mr. Meighen wanted to give a sop to the Agrarian free traders of the West so he sacrificed Brantford's interests.

Then he goes on:

Brantford was made the goat and has to suffer in order that Premier Meighen may boast as he did in the armories on the night of October 24, that he has reduced the Fielding Tariff from an average of 26 per cent to an average of 21 per cent. Surely this is protection that does not protect.

I think that anybody who listens to these words—and they are signed by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Raymond)—must realize that that hon. gentleman is rather a peculiar type of free trader. I remember well, and most of my hon. friends on the other side will remember likewise, that the gentleman who preceded him in this House, Mr. Cockshutt, used to be termed—I remember using the term once myself—the high priest of protection, and the only reason my hon. friend got elected in the place of Mr. Cockshutt was that he out-high priested the high priest. As a matter of fact, the hon. member for Brantford—I have no quarrel with his attitude; in fact, we would welcome him over here only that he is too high a protectionist for this party—is only an instance of the many different tariff policies which are held on that side of the House. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), who unfortunately is not in his seat, is at least a moderate protectionist, if not a high protectionist. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who also is not in his seat, is a moderate protectionist, as I am a moderate protectionist. My hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster), who I also regret is not in his seat, is a free trader, as is also my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon). I warn my hon. friends to my left that if they search through the whole party sitting opposite they cannot discover there any other free traders than the hon. member for Brome and the hon. member for Gloucester.

Mr. CRERAR: The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell).

Mr. MANION: There may be some exceptions, but they must be new members of the House. They were not here in the last parliament. The Minister of Justice stated the other day—and I have no quarrel with him either on this question—that he had stood for the last twenty-five years on the Laurier-Fielding tariff policy. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is where I stand, and that is where my leader stood in the last election. The Laurier-Fielding tariff, so far as I am aware, and I have given some study to the question, is exactly the same tariff policy that Sir John A. Macdonald introduced in 1878, except for slight modifications in detail. It is exactly the same tariff policy that we carried on, with slight differences in detail—differences that made a change to the extent of about five per cent in lowering the tariff. The only way the Minister of Justice can get back to the Laurier-Fielding tariff is to raise the present tariff, revise it upwards, as my hon. friend from Marquette suggested might be in their minds, to the extent of five per cent. That is the only way he can get back to the Laurier-Fielding tariff, and particularly as the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) has just suggested to me, in the matter of farm implements.

One hon. gentleman on this side of the House last night asked the hon. member for Brantford regarding the history of the binder twine industry. I happen to have the history of that industry, and as my hon. friend from Brantford did not give it, I am going to give it to the House now. Previous to 1898 we had twenty-five plants in this country manufacturing binder twine, and there was a tariff of from ten to twelve-and-a-half per cent on binder twine imported into this country. In 1898 binder twine was put upon the free list, and what happened to those twenty-five industries? Twelve of them went into liquidation, seven quit business, three were burnt down and were not rebuilt, and three remained, of which one is the plant in the town of Brantford. The binder twine industry was used during the last election as a proof of the fact that we may have free trade in this country or anywhere else without injuring the industrial life of the country. Well, if you wipe out only twenty-two out of twenty-five plants, I venture to say you are doing some slight injury to that industry at any rate.

I do not intend to spend very much time on post mortems of either speeches or elections, but I do think that sometimes it is wise to remind our opponents particularly of the sins they have committed in order to prevent them falling into the ways of sin on some future occasion. During the last election not only were different tariff stands taken by different members of the party opposite, from the hon. member for Brantford to the hon. member for Brome, but various stands were also taken by the leaders of the party opposite. I shall not deal with that because I think the people know it very well.

Then there were charges such as this. In the city of Port Arthur in a speech made by the present Prime Minister—and may I at this stage in my first reference to him express my very sincere sympathy in the sad affliction which takes him from the House at this time—he said that the leader of the Opposition was committing the horrible crime of appointing friends to the Senate. Well, since the election of the Prime Minister, I have not noticed that he has appointed any member of this party, or even of the Agrarian group to the Senate.

Then there was the charge of usurpation. I am only touching on these charges; I am not going to deal with them at any length. But there is this to remember: There may be room for dispute as to whether we should have gone to the country sooner than we did, but I hold under my hand the manifesto of Sir Robert Borden in 1917. In that manifesto there are twelve planks, and not one of them mentioned in any way that the Government would be only for the war or that there would be an election immediately afterwards. Only two of those planks deal with the war at all.

An hon. MEMBER: It was promised on the hustings.

Mr. MANION: It may have been promised on the hustings. My hon. friend the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) has stated that he promised it on the hustings but it was not stated in my constituency, and I venture to say it was not stated in ninety-five per cent of the constituencies of this country. But laying that aside, the charge of usurpation is based upon the fact that when Sir Robert Borden stepped out, my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) was elected by his followers to the premiership. Now, there sits opposite to me to the left of the Prime Minister the Minister of Justice. That hon. gentleman was the Premier of the province of Quebec for many years, and a good premier, I admit. When he retired from the premiership of that province his followers met and appointed Mr. Taschereau to take his place, just as we met and appointed the present leader of the Opposition to take the place of Sir Robert Borden. Again, in the province of Ontario, Mr. Drury was not even elected in the general elections. He was pulled in afterwards. A seat was found for him, and he was chosen by his followers to be the leader of the Farmer group in that province. Would you mind telling me, Mr. Speaker, when it became a virtue for the Liberals of the province of Quebec and the Farmers of Ontario to perform an act, and a crime for this party to perform the same act?

Then there is the old charge of loss of representative government. The only reason I touch upon these charges at all is not that I believe they are worth mentioning, but because they have been brought up and reiterated by a number of hon. gentlemen opposite. In this country we have never had, so far as I know, anything else but representative government. Representative government simply means that the representatives of the people meet in Parliament and carry on the government of the people. That being so, we have never had anything but responsible government in this country, so far as I know, since Confederation; because if the Government had not been backed by the Parliament of Canada it could not have carried on. The Government of Canada was responsible to the Parliament of Canada and the Parliament to the people. In other words we have never had anything else but representative and responsible Government in this country.

May I touch on one other point in the speech of the hon. gentleman who leads the Government at the present time. In that speech he belittled my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) for what he did at the Prime Ministers' Conference in London. I am going to read to the House one small paragraph from the Manchester Guardian, the most outstanding Liberal organ in the British Empire—certainly in the British Isles—as to the stand of my right hon. friend in London. This is what that great newspaper said of my right hon. friend:

> Premier Meighen has made to the important but insular counsels of Britain at the crucial moment a detached, dispassionate contribution that the history of the world will note as helpful to peace and understanding. He has gone back to face a domestic situation which takes no account of the way he has spoken for his country in the momentous world questions dealt with by the Imperial Conference.
> This is a familiar experience to all statesmen, but it is a fate which statesmen a hundred years hence, even across the Atlantic, will not suffer for.

I can only hope sincerely that when the present leader of the Government goes, if he does go, to represent this Government and the people of Canada in England, the Liberal Manchester Guardian will speak in as high terms of him as it spoke of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition.

After all the abuse that was heaped upon the late government during the elections—in such speeches, for example, as my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) delivered the other day—what has the new Government done to show that the old government was in the wrong, or was carrying on wrongly? I do not know, Sir, of anything found to be wrong. I do not know of one change of policy made by this Government. Take for example the subjects of labour and unemployment. I notice by the press that the present Minister of Labour is most generous and free in giving advice to the labour people all over Canada. I hardly take up a paper nowadays that I do not find from it that he has sent some telegram giving quite strong advice to the Labour Unions as to how they should act; but I do not find that he has changed the policy of Senator Robertson, the late Minister of Labour, so far as unemployment is concerned, and it is worth pointing out a fact of that kind. In fact the policy that has been carried on by the present Government, so far as unemployment is concerned, is exactly the policy which was initiated by Senator Robertson and the government which preceded the present Administration.

Now, Sir, I wish to say just this—that I am not ashamed, so far as I am concerned of the stand which I took in the recent election in support of the leader of the Opposition. It has been stated—sometimes in the House, sometimes out of it—that we were ashamed of the record of the late government. Sir, I have nothing to be ashamed of in having supported that government from 1917 to 1921. I shall barely name without discussing them, a few things which I consider are to the credit of the government applicable to the period between 1917 and 1921.

In the first place, there was the carrying on of the war, so far as the Government of Canada could carry on war. I do not need to discuss it; the result of the war, so far as Canada is concerned, proves that the Government of the Dominion did their part as the people of Canada and the boys from Canada did theirs.

Then, in regard to the re-establishment of the soldiers after the war; the fact that $458,000,000 was spent upon the re-establishment of our soldiers before the recent election, and that that figure is one and one-half times the amount of the whole national debt of Canada before the war—the expenditure of that vast amount of money for the purpose proves, and investigation proves it also, that the Government and the people of Canada treated the returned soldiers of this country and their dependents better than any other country in the world treated their returned soldiers and their dependents in this war or in any other war.

I do not wish to be misunderstood as saying that everything has been done that should have been done. I do not wish to be misunderstood as saying there is nothing more to do; there is much to do. Some mistakes have happened, some things have been left undone; but I repeat, Sir, that the treatment of our returned soldiers and their dependents by the Government of Canada between 1917 and 1921 was unsurpassed in the history of the world.

Then there was the wiping out of patronage. I remember that on our own side of the House that did not always meet with approval; and I understand the question of patronage is meeting with a great deal of discussion on the other side of the House at the present time.

Then there was the giving of the vote to women. And finally there was the financial position of the country after the war was over. The financial position of Canada at the end of the war was better than the financial position of any country in the world, with the possible exception of the United States to the south of us that went into the war three years after we did. I made it my business this morning to look up the national debt of the United States and I found it was twenty-five billions of dollars, with ours at a little over two billions of dollars. You will find therefore that the national debt per capita of the United States is about $225 and our national debt per capita is $250. Then, if you recall that the United States went into the contest three years later than we did, you will realize that the financial position of Canada was a very good one compared with that of the United States.

Then, Sir, during those four years no charge of graft was ever made against any Minister of the Government that held office between 1917 and 1921, although hundreds of millions of dollars of money were handled by those ministers.

These are only a few of the outstanding things that I mention from a large number that might be enumerated, but I do not wish to take up the time of Parliament. I wish to say this to the House: Because a party has been defeated, and badly defeated as we have been—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MANION: I am glad I am saying something which meets with the approval of hon. gentlemen opposite. Because a party meets with defeat, that does not prove that the Government which represented it was a bad government; it proves that the people wanted a change and they got it. They will probably realize that a little later on. But, Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote just one sentence to prove that argument. In the life of that great statesman Sir Wilfrid Laurier by Professor Skelton, which I had the very great pleasure of reading the other day—because we on this side of the House have probably as much admiration for Sir Wilfrid Laurier as my hon. friends opposite—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MANION: Some of us have at any rate. In his Life of Sir Wilfrid Laurier Professor Skelton speaks of the defeat of the Liberal party in 1878, when Alexander Mackenzie had been Prime Minister for the Liberals, and he quotes that statesman as saying:

> The recent verdict has shaken my confidence in the general soundness of public opinion, and has given cause to fear that an upright administration of public affairs will not be appreciated by the masses of the people.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the leader of the Opposition might very well use the same words at the present time. I should also like to point out this: That the party of the hon. gentleman who leads the Government should hesitate to be too boastful about the victory they have won, because, while I admit we received a very severe defeat, I submit that the Liberal party won one of the most anæmic victories that party has ever won. For, if you look down the two sides of this House at the present time you will find that there are practically as many members in the two parties now occupying this side of the House as there are in the Liberal party. So I think my hon. friends opposite should go rather softly when they speak of their success in the last election.

My hon. friend (Mr. Crerar) made a speech the other day which I listened to with a great deal of pleasure. He delivered a very constructive speech and I think a very fine one. Of course there are some conclusions he reaches with which we in this corner of the House do not agree, and with which my hon. friends opposite apparently do not agree, either. One or two of them I wish to refer to later, but there is one that I shall take up now. My hon. friend in that speech made some references to immigration. He pointed out that the solving of the problems of this country required a very good immigration policy and said that we required the right type of immigrants, people who would settle on the land. With this sentiment I absolutely agree. But my hon. friend attributed the fact that during the last ten years there has been such an exodus from this country to the United States to the protective policy which prevailed in this country. In blaming the protective policy for that exodus I do not agree with him. I am quite sure that many hon. gentlemen opposite will not agree with him, and I am going, in order to show the difference of opinion which prevails, to quote a gentleman who stood very high in the ranks of the Liberal party for many years as an authority on immigration, Sir Clifford Sifton. While we may disagree with Sir Clifford Sifton in many things—some of us; all of us, perhaps—at the same time I do not think that anybody would dispute that he is an authority on the question of immigration to Canada. I am now going to quote from a report in the Toronto Globe of March 2nd, of a speech made by him. The Globe comments thus:

> Sir Clifford is the best posted man in Canada to-day on the question of immigration.

Now as to what Sir Clifford himself says:

> Reviewing what had been done in the past, Sir Clifford stated that there had been much publicity given to the statement that Canada had lost 1,800,000 immigrants during the past ten years. For this loss various causes were ascribed. Some people had blamed Mr. Meighen, some had blamed the Conservative Government, and others placed the onus on the working of the tariff. Despite all these alleged reasons, the speaker declared, it was his firm conviction these people would have been lost to Canada whatever Government had been in power, and tariff or no tariff. The cause of the exodus from Canada was an inevitable drift to the south of that class of immigrant who could not "make good" in Canada, and who sought a "sunnier clime and a warmer sky", and of old people who could not stand the rigors of a Canadian winter. Of the great majority of this 1,800,000 whom the Dominion had lost during the last decade, Canada, Sir Clifford believed, was well rid of them. It was not by the method of shovelling millions of people into Canada, irrespective of their fitness for settlement on the land, that the question of immigration would be solved.

Then, Sir, the matter of climate is also, I think, very important in regard to the fact that immigrants leave this country, and also in regard to the fact that many people who leave their native lands to go to new countries do not come to Canada. There is another reason besides climate which has always struck me—for, like other men in this House, I have given the question some thought at different times and have wondered why it is that the United States has been built up so much more rapidly than Canada. That other reason is this: Most of the people who come to this country come from monarchical countries. They come from countries where not only is there monarchical rule—a rule more or less autocratic—but from countries where the militaristic system is very highly developed; and when they leave those countries they make up their minds to go to some country where there is no monarchical rule and where the militaristic system is not in existence. Immigrants being as a rule uneducated people—because well-to-do and educated people do not leave their native land—they have decided that Canada, being part of the monarchy of Great Britain is probably autocratic in government and militaristic. Of course it is not so, but they do not know that; and to my mind a great many people who go to the United States go there because they feel they are going to a Republican country, going to a country which believes that all men are born free and equal, and therefore they think they will have a better chance of succeeding. As a matter of fact it has been admitted, I think, by all students of the question that the democracy in our country is at least as high, if not higher, than the democracy in the United States, but the people in Europe do not know that.

Now, Sir, I am going to touch upon a few of the problems which confront us. I do not know that the Speech from the Throne mentioned the debt of this country, but it is a fact that one of the problems of Canada at the present time is the large national debt which we have. The debt is so immense that it is weighing heavily upon the people. True, the debt in England is three times as large per capita as is ours, but at the same time we have a very heavy debt in Canada. Then there is the railway problem, I link these two up for a purpose. The railway problem is due to the fact that in this country railways have been overbuilt. There has been a great deal of discussion on all sides as to which political party was the cause of the over building. Well, Sir, if you will look back at the history of the railways you will discover a few facts that stand prominently out. For example, in 1903 we had but one transcontinental railway in this country, and that was the Canadian Pacific.

4 p.m. But Charles M. Hays proposed to Sir Wilfrid Laurier that we should have a second one, at least that we should have the Grand Trunk Pacific—and, after politics probably had intervened to a certain extent, that proposition was changed to a National Transcontinental and a Grand Trunk Pacific. If the proposition had stopped there, and we had had two transcontinental railways, the National Transcontinental and the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Canadian Pacific, then probably we would not have had a problem such as we have to-day. But that proposition was gone on with, with the consent of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his party, and with the consent of Charles M. Hays. Unfortunately, however, in 1911, before the Laurier party went out of power, they passed legislation in this House guaranteeing $35,000,000 to Mackenzie and Mann to extend their lines from Port Arthur to Montreal. That made a third transcontinental. The Conservative party, no doubt, have made some mistakes in handling railway problems, as some others in this country have made mistakes, but I think my hon. friends on the other side of the House, in view of those two historical facts which cannot be denied, should hesitate to attribute to the Conservative party the large part of the blame for the railway growth which we have in this country. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), referring to this question, said that there were no railway experts on this side of the House. He forgot to mention there were none on the other side either, but did not forget to tell us there were none on our side. I would like to point out to him that the one man who was largely responsible for the railway muddle in this country was Charles M. Hays, at that time, I think, the chairman of the board of directors of the Grand Trunk Railway, who was looked upon as a real authority in railway matters of this country. He was one of the experts called in and he permitted the muddle to take place. This shows that experts do not always cure diseases, or prevent diseases from occurring.

There is only one cure, to my mind, for these two problems, the financial problem of this country and the railway problem, and that cure is the immigration of people into this country, the immigration of the proper type of settler and the building up of population on the right basis. If you can bring in the right kind of settler, men who will settle on the land and will thus develop the natural resources of the country, it will help to solve this problem. It might be worth remembering that in 1914, before the war began, up to March 31st, 402,000 immigrants came into this country. During the war immigration went down to 48,000 for one year. But, at any rate, the immigration to this country is again picking up. Last year, 148,000 people came in, so that it is again on the up-grade, and if we can improve the immigration and increase the population of this country, we will have adopted the only means of solving the immense problem of finance and the railway muddle in which this country finds itself at the present time.

There is another question which was not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne, and that is the question of the further development of the natural resources of this country. On different occasions in this House I have taken up time speaking on that question, pointing out the great natural resources of Canada in a more or less undeveloped state, in coal, iron, fisheries, pulpwood, timber and water powers, and have shown the possibilities of a greater development than has taken place in the past. I remember that last year, after I had spoken, my hon. friend, the leader of the present Government, said that he considered that was one of the most important questions to be dealt with by any Government in this country. To my mind he will get the applause and the gratitude of the people if he and his party can work out some scheme whereby a greater development of the natural resources will take place.

There was another question which was not referred to in the Speech from the Throne, but was mentioned by some of the speakers who have addressed the House. That was the question of the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes canal system. I know it will not be dealt with at this session, at least I do not expect that it will be dealt with, but it is an important question. Julius Barnes, of the United States Wheat Board, who is considered the best authority on the wheat question in the United States, and one of the best authorities in the world, said the building of that canal would save the farmers of the Western States and Western Canada anywhere from five to ten cents on every bushel of grain produced in the Northwest of Canada, and in the western part of United States. If that were true, if it saved five cents even, on the 300,000,000 bushel crop in the country, it would mean a saving to the farmers of Western Canada of $15,000,000 per annum. Sir, by the building of that canal, if it is decided after a thorough investigation that it is wise to go on with it—and I think it will be so decided—we will make our Great Lakes the Mediterranean of this country, because it is worth remembering that through the Soo canal four times as much freight passes as goes through the Suez canal. Then there is the immense amount of electrical energy which may be developed, amounting to some four million horse power, which would be developed if the canal were constructed. I shall not go into the question further than to mention it and commend it to the Government for proper consideration and study.

Then, Sir, comes a question which is usually dodged in Parliament but which, unfortunately, is not so often sidetracked on the hustings, and that is the problem presented by the differences of race and creed in this country. It is looked upon by some people as a problem that causes a great deal of trouble in Canada. It does, and, until there is a spirit of tolerance, it will continue to do so. There are in this country perhaps 40 per cent of the population who are Catholics, while the rest are Protestants, and there are some two and a half or three million people who speak the French language. These facts are seized upon by some people who desire to make capital out of them to serve their own purposes. If you look across the ocean to the little country of Switzerland you will find that there they speak three languages and subscribe to two religions. In the south they speak Italian, in the north German, and in the west French, and yet with three official languages and two religions that country was described by the late lamented Viscount Bryce, in that wonderful work, written by him shortly before his death, "Modern Democracies," as the highest form of democracy in the world today. So that the fact that there are spoken three languages and practised two religions in Switzerland does not occasion them any particular trouble; and if we look at the matter in the right light there is no reason on earth why there should be any difficulty because of our differences of religion and language in Canada. We have two official languages and Switzerland has three, all equally official; and if there is no trouble in that country there ought to be none here. Unfortunately, however, there are extremists in Canada. I am glad to say that from the Lakes west, extremists are rare, but unhappily in some of the provinces there are such people on both sides of this question, men who make it their business to set in antagonism the French-speaking and the English-speaking people. Unfortunately, also, I regret to say that an attempt has been made by some hon. members on the other side—very few, I am glad to add,—to label my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) as a hater and enemy of the province of Quebec. I regret to say it in his absence, but I fear that in the speech of even the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) the other day, there was some suggestion of this very idea. I had hoped that the hon. gentleman would be in the House, because I fully intended making the statement I now make and I had hoped that he would refute it and declare that he had not wished to have his language so construed. Sir, bigotry is one of the meanest qualities which any man can possess. Oliver Wendell Holmes once truly said that the mind of the bigot is like the pupil of the eye: the more light you throw upon it the more it contracts. Well, bigotry is at the bottom of some of the attempts that are made to label my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) as a hater and an antagonist of the province of Quebec; but politics is at the bottom of a good deal more of it. No word has been traced to the right hon. gentleman by which he has shown himself an enemy of that province, and I consider the unjust attempt to sully his reputation in this regard as a despicable type of political warfare. Mr. Speaker, no one in the House who knows me will accuse me of being in any way an enemy of the province of Quebec and its people. I know their many good qualities and I admire them, and I trust I may be forgiven a personal reference to myself for a moment in view of this fact. I am a Roman Catholic of Irish extraction; my wife is a Roman Catholic of French extraction; and my three little boys all speak the beautiful language of Corneille and Racine with as much facility and ease as they speak English, and I am proud of the fact,—a fact that is due to their mother. Notwithstanding these personal facts, however, I may say that I represent in this House a constituency which is seventy-five to eighty per cent Protestant, among whom are a very great many Orangemen. There are in that constituency twenty or twenty-five per cent of Catholic people as against the percentage of Protestants I have mentioned. If it had not been for the broad-minded tolerance on the part of the people whom I represent I could not be returned to this Parliament, and I think that this splendid example of tolerance and broad-mindedness should be a lesson to the whole country. I sincerely hope, therefore, without going further into the question, that in future no hon. gentlemen, either in this House or out of it, unless they can substantiate the charge—and I know they cannot—will accuse my hon. leader of enmity to the province of Quebec. If my right hon. friend were an enemy to that province—for that matter, if he were an enemy to any great section of the country,—I would not follow him for fifteen minutes, because I do not think that any man who harbours an aversion for any great section of the people could be worthy of being the leader of a great party in this country.

Now, Sir, I am going to touch upon another question before concluding my remarks, a question that was referred to in the Speech from the Throne; I refer to the matter of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. Some remarks were made in a general way in the Speech, and I have no criticism to make of them; it was stated that the plans would be carried on as they had been in the past and would be amplified wherever possible. That, at any rate, was the effect of the statement. Well, I believe that there are a few things in connection with this matter that can be improved upon by this Parliament. For example, there are questions in relation to pensions which can be improved upon in favour of the returned soldier and his dependents. I have in my office at the present moment a letter from a widow in England who used to live in Port Arthur. She knew my name and wrote me in regard to this matter. She was receiving a pension on account of the death of her only son at the front, but it was discovered that she owned two or three little cottages from which she received rent, and because of this fact her pension was cut off. She claims that the cottages a great part of the time have not been rented. I have had the question investigated by the Pensions Commission—and I may say that I am not criticising them, because they are acting in accordance with the regulations laid down for them. They report that they cannot see that she is entitled to the pension. I presume they are right, according to the rules, but I suggest that a case like this, and many others akin to it, should be dealt with rather in a spirit of sympathy and charity than acording to the strict letter of the law; and if the rules are such as to bear with unreasonable severity on people they should be changed by the House. The object should be to do justice by every mother who gave her son in the cause of liberty. Then there is another class of people who think that they have not been receiving justice. Fortunately they are only a few, but I know of one case particularly: Suppose a man wished to get out of the army, suppose he was exceedingly anxious to get out, and signed a declaration that he was a hundred per cent. fit. And now, perhaps two or three years afterwards, he comes forward and says that he had some disease while in the army, tuberculosis, perhaps, or asthma, or some other ailment which might have been chronic. But his signed declaration that at the time of his leaving the army he was one hundred per cent fit now bars him from a pension except under very exceptional circumstances. I think that this is another rule that might be modified so as to afford a little more leeway to the Pension Commissioners in order that they may give a chance to such a man. Then there is the matter of housing for returned soldiers. The committee on returned soldiers last year put in a report on this question, in which there appeared this paragraph:

> After many and lengthy discussions, your Committee agrees that the Government would be well advised to consider favourably an extension of its original project for the purpose of erecting houses for ex-service men.

I know very well many cases to-day where if that plan could be worked out without too great a cost it would be a substantial blessing to the returned man. Because, Sir, I submit that no man went to the front and served there for any length of time—and I make no exception to this statement—who has not suffered financially and probably physically by his service in the ranks. Practically every man who went over there made financial sacrifices; most of them made physical sacrifices as I know from my own medical and personal experience. No man came back from the front after having served in the lines under all the horrors of war without being lessened in his physical capacity. There is too much inclination—and I say this without meaning to cause any ill-feeling—on the part of many who did not serve overseas to forget the services of these boys to whom we promised everything we owned in the world if they would fight for our freedom at the front. Therefore I think if by some legislation we can stretch the statute enacted a year or two ago to give returned men an opportunity to build houses for themselves we will be doing only justice to them.

I was struck by the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer, (Mr. Speakman) who succeeded that brilliant orator, Dr. Michael Clark, who was an ornament to this House. The hon. member pointed out that owing to the deflation in the values of land and farm products returned soldiers who took up land have to-day lost much of the possibility of success; and, if I remember rightly, he proposed that one-third be taken off the original value of the land secured by them through the Soldiers Settlement Board.

Mr. SPEAKMAN: I made no proposal of any specific figure, but I did support the definite principle of re-valuation to bring land values in line with present values.

Mr. MANION: That is what I referred to, and I think I quoted my hon. friend correctly. I think the suggestion is very reasonable if the facts are as stated by him, and I have no doubt that he has examined them. I know that in my own section of the country, where many men went overseas, a number of them who later took up land are in dire straits. That is a matter, I think, which will have to be dealt with by this Parliament, and probably during this session.

Now, Sir, I am going to deal briefly with the tariff question before I conclude my remarks. I do not intend to deal at any great length with some of the statements made by hon. members because, after all, the debate on the Budget is the proper time to deal with the tariff exhaustively. Unfortunately, in tariff matters as in matters of race and creed, there are extremists. There are those who believe in a high customs tariff, like my hon. friend from Brantford (Mr. Raymond) for example, and there are those from the prairies who take the other extreme view of absolutely no tariff for protection. My hon. friend the leader of the Progressive party has stated that he does not consider the protectionist principle suitable for this country. He used much stronger language than that during the election, because I remember one of his statements, which I quoted freely during the campaign:

> The principle of protection is condemned at the bar of decent public opinion on moral grounds alone.

I consider that probably we may bring into this discussion all the arguments of economics and of fact without importing the moral argument, although I remember well reading an argument between Gladstone and some one else in which he introduced the moral argument. As a matter of fact I do not think there are any moral arguments to be brought against the protectionist principle, as all countries have at times been protectionist. But I should like to point out to my hon. friends, particularly to those in this section of the House, a fact that might be worthy of consideration. The hon. member who leads the Progressive party took the stand, and quite rightly, that the Fordney tariff had injured the great agricultural interests in this country. I agree with him. In my own constituency there are a number of cattle-raisers—I have a large farming population in my riding, and I must confess that they made their presence felt at the polls. Those cattle-raisers were very much injured by the Fordney tariff, as were also all others engaged in agriculture in this country. As a remedy the hon. leader of the Progressive party suggested that we endeavour to come to an arrangement with the United States whereby they will lower that tariff and give an opportunity to our agriculturalists to sell more of their products in the United States than they sold during the past year. I have no quarrel with him in regard to that suggestion, but I wish to point out to him that the only way you can negotiate or bargain with another country is under a protective tariff system. If you adopt a free trade system you cannot so negotiate or bargain; you have thrown away your only weapon. Germany before the war, as everybody knows, was rapidly gaining upon Great Britain in the markets of the world, and in many of the markets near both of them had surpassed her rival; in fact before the war Germany had ousted the British traders to the extent that the Germans surpassed them in the amount of goods sold in many markets. In Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Belgium and Holland on the west of Germany, and in Russia, Roumania, Austria-Hungary and Bulgaria on the east,—ten important countries—Germany, before the war, had surpassed British trade. How had she done it? By that very method of bargaining and negotiating with these other countries through a protective tariff. Germany negotiated in 1903 or 1904 a treaty with Russia, and under that treaty she rapidly ousted Britain from the Russian markets.

So I think it is worth the time of my hon. friends from the West to remember that we can only negotiate with the United States to modify the Fordney tariff under a protective system. It is also worth remembering that although Britain adopted free trade in 1846 none of the other great countries of the world have considered it wise to follow her example—a fact which would make every reasonable man hesitate to condemn those who do not agree with them in regard to tariff policy, because, as I think the late Joseph Chamberlain once said, he did not consider that all the brains of the world were confined to the British Isles; he thought that some other countries of the world had views upon this question, views worthy of consideration.

I think I am right in saying that the excessive railway rates at present in force are of more importance to the farmers of the West than is the tariff. I do not know whether that meets with the approval of my hon. friends, the Progressives, or not, but I believe that is the fact. At any rate the excessive railway rates are a very great burden and should direct the attention of these hon. members to the thought that there are other things which need revision besides the tariff. It is well to remember that this country is really divided into five main sections; First, we have the Maritime provinces with interests, aspirations, and desires different from those entertained in other sections; west of the Maritime provinces you find Quebec and Ontario, and with all their quibbling about race and creed—although perhaps there is not so much bickering as we sometimes think—they have absolutely the same interest in industrial, agriculture and trade matters; then going to the western part of Ontario we reach the section which I have the honour to represent, more or less undeveloped, the section from North Bay to the Manitoba border or, say, to Winnipeg, with vast natural resources of iron and other minerals, and the people having their ideas, aspirations and desires as have the other sections; then you come to the Prairie provinces, where wheat growing is the main occupation and all the aspirations of the people centre around the tariff as affecting their principal product; Lastly we cross the Rocky Mountains and get into British Columbia whose views have been so well expressed by hon. members from that province who have preceded me, but views differing from the views of the people in the Prairie provinces. There you have five distinct sections. I will admit that agriculture is the most important industry in this country, but manufacturing is also an important industry. Many of us cannot be farmers; many of us do not wish to grow wheat or live on farms. Many of us in the eastern sections of Canada—Ontario and Quebec—desire a different kind of life from that of the man on the prairies. Taking into consideration, then, the different ideas and interests of the different sections of this country, it would be well for my hon. friends from the Prairie provinces to remember that this question cannot be settled if only one section is taken into account. It is a question which must be settled by having regard to the best interests of the whole country—the greatest good to the greatest number. Indeed, some sections may have to make sacrifices. My hon. friends to my left, for example, may say that they are expected to make all the sacrifices; on the other hand, the hon. member for Brantford contends that Brantford has been making all the sacrifices. Some industrial men think that they are making all the sacrifices. Now, I am not a high protectionist. In fact, I am a doctor of medicine; I am not interested directly either in farming or in manufacturing, but I am trying to look at this question from the broad, national point of view, and I submit that it cannot be settled by proceeding in the interests of only one portion of the country. The manufacturer of the East must make sacrifices, and so far as I am concerned I would go a long way towards seeing that he does. The farmer of the West cannot have it all his own way. After all, as somebody said a few minutes ago, Toronto is not the whole of Canada, but neither are the Prairie provinces. No one of these sections is the whole of Canada.

In conclusion, I wish to say that as regards the tariff question, as in the case of race, creed, and other differences—largely due to the immense area of our country and its relatively small population—we must have less selfish class interest, less sectionalism, and more unity, a greater national desire to build up our country. If we do not have that, we shall not attain the object which we must all have in mind, that of building up on the northern half of this continent a great Canadian nation.

Mr. ONESIPHORE TURGEON (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, although quite a number of hon. members have since the beginning of this debate showered upon you their congratulations in language much better than I have at my command, nevertheless, I cannot refrain from expressing, with that sincerity which is, perhaps my only virtue, my appreciation of your elevation to the post of Canada's First Commoner. The high offices which you have occupied on different occasions when many years younger than you are to-day, the duties of which you discharged with such credit to the party to which you belong and to the country generally, have only served to increase your qualifications for the position which you now adorn. We shall regret the absence of your eloquence in many of the debates, but we hope that the time will come when you will again assist us, as you have so ably done in the past, in the discussions which take place on the floor of Parliament.

I wish to extend my congratulations to the mover of the Address (Mr. McMurray). On his first coming into the House he has certainly indicated his possession of breadth of intellect, and has expressed his ideals and ambitions in language characteristic of the firmness and vitality of the western mind. The seconder of the Address also (Mr. Mercier) expressed elevated ideals in a manner designed to uphold the honour of the Mercier family.

It is my pleasant duty also, Mr. Speaker, to extend most sincerely and respectfully my congratulations to the only lady member of the House, the hon. member for Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail). She may be sure that she will command the respect of the House and of the country as the first lady commoner in Canada. I trust that her example will be followed by many of her sex in the next Parliament and that, gifted with equally admirable qualities and noble virtues, they may adorn this, the sanctuary of the Canadian nation, and exert their influence to permeate the precincts of Parliament with the beneficent influence of mutual Christian feeling.

I cannot refrain from extending through you, Mr. Speaker, my heartiest congratulations to the new Governor General of Canada, Lord Byng of Vimy. He has won the sympathy of every subject of the British Empire and of the world at large; he was with the Canadian army in the most trying days of the great war. Let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, that among the many Canadian soldiers who went on to victory under his guidance and direction there were a number of Acadians from my own constituency as well as from other parts of the Maritime provinces. I wish that His Excellency may know that every one of those Acadian soldiers—and I know that the same applies to all others who served from different parts of the Empire—regard him as their idol.

My chief object in rising to-day, Mr. Speaker, is to support the statement of ideals placed before the House and the country by hon. members from Nova Scotia —the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) and the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). In passing, I may say that all the old members of the House are pleased to see these hon. gentlemen again in Parliament; we are sure that their presence will result in benefit to the country at large. It was with a great deal of pleasure that I heard the hon. member for Cumberland place before the House the problems of the Maritime provinces. Without the construction of the Intercolonial railway there would have been no Confederation; the Maritime provinces would still be trading and bargaining with other countries—though, perhaps, to their greater economic and financial advantage. It was the will of Providence that gave us our open harbours on the Atlantic, for without them and the Intercolonial there could have been no real progress in commerce and industry for this country, and it would have remained for Ontario and Quebec to be at the whim, to use the words of Sir George Etienne Cartier, of the officials of the customs department of the United States. Perhaps also there would not have been those pleasant relations that now exist with our neighbours to the south. But with these open ports on the Atlantic placed there, to use the language of Joseph Howe, by the will of Providence, not merely the Maritime provinces but the whole of Canada benefits, and will continue to progress and increase in population and in wealth until we become one of the greatest countries in the world in trade and in human effort. The Intercolonial railway must, however, be operated in the interests of the Maritime provinces. It has been said by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate that the Intercolonial railway was built with a view to protecting the whole British Empire against the possible annexation of this country to the United States. The road was built not so much for the purpose of establishing the shortest trade route, but in order to give Canada a through railway from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We in the Maritime provinces wish the Intercolonial railway to remain an entity. The chief idea of the people of the Maritime provinces when coming into Confederation and the chief ambition of the people of the West when the Maritime provinces were brought into Confederation, was that the people of the East might have the advantage of being able to send their products to Canadian points instead of sending them, as they had formerly done, to the United States. It was to be of mutual benefit to the East and the West. But it is only by keeping this road under the direct administration of the Dominion of Canada that we can expect it to fulfill the mission for which it was built, and to give the people of the Maritime provinces that prosperity which they have a right to expect from trade with the Canadian West.

The administration of the Intercolonial was transferred by the previous Government to a Board of Directors acting independently of the Minister of Railways. That was done by Order in Council. Now, the construction of the Intercolonial as I have said, is a part of the pact of Confederation, and you cannot change that pact by Orders in Council; you cannot change it even by act of this Parliament; you can only change it by the unanimous will and consent of every province of Canada, and so far as the Maritime provinces are concerned, we are against any possible change in the constitution in that respect, even by request of a majority of this Parliament. The Intercolonial railway must remain there as long as the Constitution of this country remains; it must remain there for the happiness and prosperity of the Maritime provinces. This does not mean that we in our section of the country entertain any narrow feelings. In no other part of the country, perhaps, will you find so deep-rooted a desire for the happiness of every section of Canada. Joseph Howe one day said that Canada may yet become the centre of the British Empire and the seat of government be located in the centre of Canada, perhaps at Regina. That was only an illustration of the great desire the people of the Maritime provinces have for the progress of this great garden of ours —for our country extending for thousands of miles from the Atlantic to the Pacific is a garden from one end to the other; you cannot put your foot on any part of the territory of Canada without trampling on some resource, either in the forests or on the prairies that will be developed and bring prosperity to future generations. We have all these considerations in mind, and it is because we wish the whole of Canada to be happy and prosperous and to attain to a greater future that we wish to keep perhaps this only privilege which may bring happiness to every man and woman in the Maritime provinces.

Mr. Speaker, you know what the consequences have been of the transfer by Order in Council by the late Government of the administration of the Intercolonial railway to a Board of Directors sitting in Toronto. The Intercolonial railway has been placed in the same position as the other roads that have been brought under the control of that board; the result has been the excessive freight rates of which we have heard so much of late. Even two years ago when the Government placed the Intercolonial under the administration of this board, composed in the main of representatives of the Mackenzie and Mann system, I rose in this House and warned the Minister of Railways, the Prime Minister, and the Government of the day, against an increase in the freight rates on the railways. At the time I explained in as clear and forceful a manner as I could the result which would ensue to the industries of the country if, under the conditions which prevailed, the freight rates were to be increased merely to make good the deficiencies of a corporation which had not been able to show the same measure of success as other private corporations operating a similar mileage of railroad in Canada. I warned the Minister of Railways of that day that the existing freight rates were sufficient for the proper and successful operation of our railroads; and I pointed out that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, operating a similar mileage, had during the year 1920 been able to show a surplus of $32,000,000 after meeting all charges, while the government-owned railways, covering a similar mileage and operated from Toronto, had experienced a deficit of $47,000,000. I declared at the time that this deficit was due to defective administration; and I uttered the warning that if an increase of rates were granted by the Railway Commission disastrous results to trade throughout the country would follow. I am now in a position to say that had my warning been heeded by the government of the day, Canada would have been spared great disasters which have had the effect of stifling industry from one end of the country to the other.

On another occasion I implored the administration to put an end to the heavy rates which were crippling industry equally in the West and in the East. So great was the resulting paralysis of trade due to increased rates that the export of lumber from the Maritime provinces to the United States ports was blocked. On the Pacific coast the lumber industry suffered to an equal extent; and even the luscious apple of British Columbia was debarred from access to the Prairie provinces by these onerous freight rates. In the mines of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick operations were greatly impeded, and other Canadian products were prevented from reaching their natural markets. In the matter, for example, of iron ore it is easy to realize how expensive the frequent handling becomes and how greatly the ultimate cost is enhanced. Then the ore goes into the hands of the manufacturer, and is converted into agricultural implements, and, of course, you have to pay something for that operation; then it goes to the farmers of the West. All these operations increase the cost of production, until it is hardly worth while for the farmer to purchase the implement. The country at large has been suffering for some eighteen months from unemployment, caused by the maladministration of our railways, the direct cause being the increase of rates which has stopped the trade on the railways. The railway companies have had to dismiss their men, when business fell off. They had the equipment and employees ready for a big trade when the rates were increased. They had heavy trains, sufficient to carry thousands of tons of material at the same price as it had been carried previously. Subsequently they had to cut down the trains and haul about half the number of cars, at practically the same expense as would have been incurred if they had a big trade. This is the result of this increase of rates.

They have given as an excuse for the increase of rates the fact that they had to increase the wages of the working men on the railway, because the United States had raised it also under some international agreement. I make bold to say, even with all the admiration I have for the manner in which the Canadian Pacific have always conducted their business, that the managers of the road were not equal to the occasion. When they raised the wages they looked for a greater traffic, and a more extensive trade, but they should have known that they could not obtain it, and that imposing high freight rates would have the reverse effect, and the result would be a paralysis of trade. They have suffered also. They have come back, not with a surplus of $32,000,000, but of $18,000,000. The Canadian Pacific have lost more than the amount of additional wages they had to pay.

I regret that our hon. leader (Mr. Mackenzie King) is absent to-day, owing to the visit of Providence upon his brother, whose death has certainly caused him great sorrow, and I sympathize with him. If he were here to-day I would say to him: Give every possible consideration to the request made by the Maritime provinces, so that their future prosperity may not be hampered by want of railway connections with other parts of Canada. I have confidence that he and his associates in the Government of Canada will certainly see that those freight rates are reduced. I have heard my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Baxter) also complaining of the excessive rates. I heard my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) protesting against the freight rates. The thing I greatly regret is that my hon. friend from Vancouver did not protest two or three years ago. These rates were imposed at the request of the Government of the day, whom the railway were supporting at the time. The supporters of that Government will say, however, that those rates were imposed by the Railway Commission. It is true they were imposed by the Railway Commission, but the Government was not bound to accept the award of the Railway Commission. They could have suspended it until the next session of Parliament, and could then have brought the matter before Parliament, which, after all, is a final tribunal. It is well known that the Railway Commission has no jurisdiction over the rates of the Intercolonial from Halifax or Sydney to Montreal. I believe I express faithfully the opinion of the chairman of the Railway Commission who stated that as far as the Intercolonial railway was concerned, he had no authority over these rates. The government of the day accepted the order for an increase to please Mr. Hanna and his associates in the Board of Administration of the National Railways in Toronto.

This is not the first time that I have advocated in this House that the administration of the Intercolonial railway should be under a separate head. Canada is provided with an immense mileage of national railways. We must do the best we can to operate these lines to the best advantage of the people. I do not say that these railways should be given back to private corporations. I am one of the few, perhaps, who have been not only desirous of having under the control of the State, not only the Intercolonial but the whole Transcontinental in order that it might be operated to the best advantage of the people. Administration by corporations means profit for the corporation at the expense of the public. Administration by the government is not designed for profit; after paying expenses, the people receive a profit in the way of low rates. Many members on both sides of the House, have boasted of their aspirations for national roads. We had only begun to look seriously into the question of operation by government when the government had to take over the railroads, which had gone into bankruptcy on account of the railway policy of Canada. I am in favour of operation of a certain portion of our roads by the State and I have contended at different times in this House that we should have not only the Intercolonial railway in the Maritime provinces, but also two or three more units, portions or divisions, of the National railway, where the local traffic would be more under the supervision of local men, where it could be operated with more promptitude and to better advantage in the way of freight rates. Freight rates should be arranged with a view to the greatest possible development of our natural resources, and the cheapest possible transmission of manufactured products through the country. This proposition should more particularly appeal

5 p.m. to a country like Canada, with a territory of four or five thousand miles in length. We cannot expect to have a prosperous condition in Canada, if we are to have rates by mileage from one end of the country to the other, and that has been practically the effect of the last increase in rates. In France or Great Britain, where a large percentage of the production could be transported from one end of the country to the other in a few hours, the proposition is a different one. At the most rapid rate possible, it will take a freight train eight or ten days to travel across Canada. The product which has left Halifax must be carried to its destination in the West. Lumber shipped from British Columbia must go right through until it reaches the prairies to find a market. It is only by the establishment of divisions that you can possibly reach a degree of perfection of operation, which one single central administration is not able to do in a country like Canada. I suggest again that we should have another division in Montreal or Toronto, in order to provide for transportation further west up to the head of the Great Lakes. We might have divisions in Winnipeg and Vancouver on the Pacific coast, so that all the products of the different portions of Canada may reach the different parts of the country where they are needed. It is the only possible way to make a profit on the railway and create an expansion of trade. And the divisions of which I have spoken should have their centre in Ottawa, not Toronto.

Our friends on the other side of the House are clamouring for national operation of railways. I am with them to a certain extent. We have to administer the railways, in a manner acceptable to the masses of the people. If we fail today in government operation, it will certainly be a great detriment to the people. We cannot continue to repeat the deficits of seventy millions or a hundred millions of dollars which have occurred during the last two or three years. It is only by the best possible method of operation that we can wipe out these deficits, which threaten to ruin the people of Canada. In the United States of America during the war the railways were placed under the administration of the government. Those who were at the head of the administration were anxious to make the operation a success. If the railways of the United States had remained under the control of the government, divisions would have been established, to the great benefit of the whole country at large.

The railways should be given a fair trial under government ownership, and if they proved a success and contributed to the prosperity of the country then they could remain permanently the property of the Canadian people. At all events I have complete confidence in the new Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy), and, with his experience and success in business, government ownership of railways in Canada ought to be successful, if it can be successful anywhere.

It is my belief that no statesman has more enjoyed the confidence of the people than our present admirable leader (Mr. Mackenzie King), who is proving from day to day, as occasion offers, that he will be a worthy successor to that greatest of all Canadian statesmen whom we still lament, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. With the present Prime Minister at the head of affairs, and with his two eminently qualified lieutenants, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding)—a man, I might say, of world fame—and the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), who, as an administrator, has won an enviable reputation for himself, we have three men who, I think, are equal in mentality and patriotic vision to any triumvirate of the Roman Empire. With such statesmen directing the affairs of the country the people may well be optimistic. The confidence the people have in these three leaders and their able colleagues was shown in the result of the election on December 6. I was sorry the other day to hear the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) echoing the remarks of other hon. gentlemen who have charged the Liberal party with responsibility for the present unfortunate state of affairs in connection with our railways. Some one, I believe, has said that the present deficit was the child of the Liberal party, which that party left at the door of the Conservative Government in 1911. Well, Sir, whatever political offspring the Liberal party handed over to the care of the Conservative government were in healthy condition, and if they are now unhealthy it is due to the carelessness and neglect of the late Conservative governments that held power from 1911. The Liberal Government has been found fault with for the construction of the Transcontinental. I have always contended, and I still contend, that the Transcontinental from Winnipeg to Moncton is one of the greatest public utilities that we have ever had in this country. It was built in order to bring what I may call the granary of the British Empire closer in touch with the ports leading to the markets of Europe. It was solidly constructed, and I am confident that it has entirely justified its construction. In view of the geographical conditions of the country I think it will be admitted that the Transcontinental Railway from Winnipeg to Moncton was absolutely necessary. Ever since its construction the farmers of the Prairie provinces have been able to ship their products a great deal more cheaply than they could have done without that railway. But the Conservative government was content to complacently allow that immense volume of traffic to flow to American ports instead of to our own ports. I have on many occasions called the attention of the House to this discrimination in favour of American ports, and I am sorry to see my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) assuming the sins of the Conservative party which he was not responsible for committing. I would have thought that he would not care to be responsible for the blunders of others. I hope that the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) will do all in his power to consolidate the railroads of the Maritime provinces into that complete and well co-ordinated unit which I and my colleagues for those provinces are anxious to see, and that he will also realize the advantage of establishing other units in the best interests of the administration of our national railway system.

The hon. member who preceded me (Mr. Manion) referred to my views on the tariff question—a question which I had not intended to touch upon to-day. I need only say that I am still a free trader in principle, both in theory and in practice, as far as it is possible to apply free trade to our national conditions. I rejoice that that principle was recognized in 1910-11 when the Liberal administration proposed a measure of reciprocity with the United States. It was the largest measure of free trade—concession for concession—which Canada could ever hope to get from the country to the south of us, and had our people approved the proposal they would have derived the greatest possible benefit from its operation. Unfortunately they decided otherwise, due mainly to the campaign tactics adopted by the Conservative party, with the result that we have to-day the Progressive movement, so bitterly bewailed by our Conservative friends. But they should remember that that movement in the Western provinces owed its origin to the resentment of the prairie farmers at the loss of that prosperity which they would have enjoyed under reciprocity with the United States. To-day we have in this House the Progressive party, and with its help the Liberal party defeated the late Conservative government at the last election and retired them to Opposition for many years to come. It is a pleasure to see the father of that reciprocity measure again directing the financial affairs of the nation, and undoubtedly his name will go down in our history as a statesman who had the greatest economic vision of any of his contemporaries.

Speaking last year to my right hon. friend the present leader of the Opposition, I advised him at the time of his appointment to the leadership of his party to go to the country, otherwise he would lose ground and, if he delayed too long, would certainly fail to return to power, and would find himself in this House with only a small band of supporters. I proved a true prophet on that occasion. However, he will now be able to exercise his natural talent in fault-finding, and I wish him many years of health and strength that he may contribute as leader of the Opposition to giving the country good government through placing us on this side of the House upon our guard against a repetition of the errors which characterized his conduct of affairs.

One of the most vital questions now engaging our attention is that of the restoration of their natural resources to the Western provinces. I may not be in agreement with some of my colleagues from the Maritime provinces, and what I am going to say will be upon my personal responsibility, not as a member of the party. My view is that it is only by contributing to the happiness of the people in every province that we may become a united, happy, and prosperous nation. The happiness of the people of British Columbia and the Prairie provinces is as important to me as the happiness of my people in the Maritime provinces. Of what advantage would it be for us to have a few million dollars more in our treasury and at the same time to forfeit the goodwill of the people of the West? And of what advantage would it be to the people of the West to trade with the United States instead of with the rest of Canada if their domestic and community life were uncomfortable and unhappy? We know that when the western part of our country was divided into provinces, a portion of the natural resources was retained by the Dominion. But these natural resources were retained as a paternal consideration, not because it was thought that they would never be restored to the provinces. It was thought that the administration of these resources would require a large population and large expenditure, and that the provinces could not bear the burden in the early stages of their development. I was a member of the House when, in 1905, the natural resources of the newly-created western provinces were retained under Dominion authority, and I then expressed the hope that their population and general development would ultimately become such as to justify the return of their natural resources to the provincial authority. Perhaps we did not anticipate the rapid development which was to take place in the West and which has excited the admiration of the people not only of Canada but of other countries as well. In less than a score of years a wonderful development has taken place; education has been encouraged; school houses and universities have been established—and all these things have resulted in great benefits not only to the people of the western provinces but to Canada as a whole. The men of the West have worked energetically, day and night when necessary, to provide for their families and promote the general interests of the communities in which they live. The women of the West have grown not only beautiful, but patriotic and industrious, contributing their efforts to those of their husbands and children for the common good of the country. Western people are known as ambitious people, and the development of the natural resources is a noble ambition to cherish. The westerner has sought to make his family happy, and on the happiness of the family is based in a large measure the welfare of the country as a whole. The women of the Prairie provinces have exerted great influence in the matter of bringing about temperance legislation. My hon friend, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) will bear witness to that; he was a member of a provincial government which put through a measure of temperance, largely at the request of the women of his province; and the same is true of other provinces.

As I say, there are two great aspects in a consideration of the question of restoring to the provinces their natural resources. Large subsidies have been paid to the provinces which have not been given the control of their natural resources, and, in the East, of course, there is a feeling that if these natural resources revert to the provinces we are entitled to compensation. But as I say, of what advantage will it be to the people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Quebec to say: You shall not get your natural resources until you pay us a large sum of money? Might not the Prairie provinces in retaliation say to any in the East who suggested refusing the West access to our ports: We will not send you our products for export; we will export through the United States? And of what advantage would it be to the people of the Prairie provinces to say: We will not give up the subsidies, because in connection with the administration of these natural resources we have sustained loss? I have a sympathetic feeling for the people of the Prairie provinces, because I have travelled among them and I know them. What I say in regard to this matter is the expression of conclusions at which I have arrived, based largely on knowledge obtained through my contact with western people. So I say, why not compromise at once? Let the people of the Prairie provinces and their governments say: We will relinquish the subsidy, which we accepted as only a temporary measure until we would have the benefit of the administration of our own resources. And let the people of the East say: We are satisfied; what is a few million dollars as compared with harmony within the nation?

Mr. Speaker, I have submitted these remarks as suggestions of my own and without implicating any of my fellow members on this side of the House, not even any representative from Nova Scotia or New Brunswick. I have made these suggestions because I feel that if we do not arrive at a harmonious settlement it will be many long years before a monetary settlement can be arrived at. I believe it would be for the benefit of all that the Prairie provinces should be given a full measure of freedom in developing their own resources; and if that is done, and if they progress as they have done in the last score of years, I say that Canada will become a country that will command the respect not only of the United States but of Europe as well.

Mr. ARTHUR LUCIEN BEAUBIEN (Provencher) (Translation): Allow me, Mr. Speaker, at the outset to join with those who have preceded me in this debate and no doubt with others from all parts of Canada in offering you my congratulations on your election to the post of First Commoner. Being a new member, I have not had like many other previous speakers, the advantage of personally appreciating the interest and zeal you have shown in the study of the questions submitted to this House, and bearing on the administration of the affairs of Canada. Your zeal seconded by a great love of your country, by eminent qualities, by serious studies of problems to be solved both in and out of this Dominion and by a long parliamentary experience had prominently placed you in the foremost rank of this House. It therefore was no surprise to anyone to hear the Prime Minister forecast your election to the exalted post you now so gracefully occupy. I wish to compliment the mover of the Address in answer to the Speech from the Throne and also the one who so eloquently and cleverly seconded the motion. If we may judge from their debut, we may certainly foretell that these two gentlemen will render valuable service to Parliament and, as a proof of my sincerity in congratulating them, I express the hope that from this new generation will rise a great number of men endowed with the same eloquence and talents, who will spread from ocean to ocean what we believe to be a sound doctrine, the policy of the Progressive party. The Speech from the Throne referred to many aspects of this policy. The most important of which touched on the price of farm products. The foundation of happiness and prosperity in this country is interwoven with the happiness and prosperity of the farming class. It is through the strenuous efforts of the farmer that the products which sustain industry and commerce are brought forth from the land. If the supply from this source decreases we are confronted with industrial depression and the calamities of unemployment mentioned in the Speech from the Throne follow; business is at a standstill, financial institutions are anxious and tottering, and misery—ill adviser—visits many homes, uneasiness is felt everywhere, the world is upset, the whole social structure menaced with destruction totter at the very bottom of its foundation. The Progressive party is well suited for the hour. It is here to ask the Government to ameliorate by well adapted laws the most unfortunate lot of the farmer and thereby strengthen the foundation on which rests all social classes.

The Speech from the Throne seems to presage that laws will be enacted with that aim in view. Those whose object is to reduce the cost of transportation, the lowering of the tariff which will help in cutting down the cost of production, the expansion of our commerce, a greater outlet for our products, the establishment of a commission for the purchase of wheat, the removal of a great number of unnecessary middlemen between the producer and the consumer, the immigration of bona-fide settlers who will help to increase the production of our country, more facilities in obtaining farm-hands, all these measures will receive our hearty approval, because they will become a powerful lever, from the bottom upwards towards raising to a state of happiness all social classes.

The Progressive party is not selfish and does not restrict its work to ensuring prosperity of the farmer alone, exclusive of all others. If it asks a greater measure of justice for the farming class, the reason is that on its welfare depends the welfare of others. One might be led to believe that the farmer is not so badly off as he says, that he is dealt with justice and that he has no more to put up with than others. Let us examine his condition. At dawn of day, and even sometimes before, he is to be found at work and his labours never cease until long after sunset. Where is to be found the labourers who would accept sixteen hours of work a day? No complaint would ever come from the farmer if he could obtain like his fellow-citizens of other classes a dependable return for each hour's work. But for the last two years the farmer's revenue does not suffice to cover his expenses, and he knows that if his hard labour does not receive a just compensation, it is because too many middlemen speculators or profiteers want to reap a portion of the results of his strenuous work, either through the sale of the implements he needs for farming or through the handling of his products before they reach the consumer. All we ask for the farmers, is a just remuneration for their work.

The Speech from the Throne contains a reference to our national railway system in terms rather vague and indefinite. For many years past, the Government has registered a considerable deficit on these railways and we are somewhat astonished to learn that after years of experiment by the late government and of study and criticism on the part of the Opposition at that time, which has now assumed power, no solution has so far been found to remedy this state of things.

According to the Speech from the Throne we must have a through inquiry. It is time to act and we therefore expected to hear in that speech a well defined policy.

The Progressive party's programme is very clear on that point and is in striking contrast with that of the Government. We want state ownership of railways as it is carried on in the best organized states of the old continent. Thus allowing the profits, which will eventually be realized from these railways, to become a source of revenue not to the wealthy shareholders but to the people. I do not wish to close these brief remarks without proclaiming myself with pride a follower of the leader of the Progressive party. No one has made a deeper study of our economic conditions and no one desires more the happiness and prosperity of all parts of the country. There is no greater patriot nor one more worthy of the people's confidence. The day is not very remote when this confidence will spread from coast to coast and will result in a victory which will assure national prosperity.

Mr. EDOUARD CHARLES ST. PERE (Hochelaga) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, before going into the subject of the few remarks which I intend to make in reference to the Speech from the Throne, let me first congratulate you upon your election to the speakership of the House of Commons. You presided over my first political effort and, by a happy coincidence, you preside to-day on the occasion of my first attempt in this House, to take part, the best I can in the patriotic debates of the Canadian Parliament.

I do not wish to go any further without first extending my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. I must add, using an old stereotyped phrase dear to our profession, that they have proved once more, "Qu 'aux âmes bien nées la valeur n'attend pas le nombre des années."

Mr. Speaker, it would be to depart now from our French tradition of politeness, if I forgot to offer our colleague from South-east Grey (Miss Macphail) my most sincere congratulations upon her election to this House.

I have followed closely the different speeches which were made upon the address and I believe, contrary to the claim of a number of our friends on the Opposition benches, that the Speech from the Throne comprised on the whole very important questions which necessitate the immediate consideration of this House. The Government admits that Canada has successfully passed through the economic crisis which the war forced upon us, and notwithstanding what our opponents may still say, I shall repeat with the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) that it is since the advent of the Liberal party to power, that the Canadian people have recovered hope and see that a sound administration has succeeded to one but too oblivious of the public welfare.

Mr. Speaker, the tariff is one of the questions which has a foremost interest in this House. It was much debated during the course of the last electoral campaign and since it is made a primordial question, as member for Hochelaga—even though I am at present but a novice in politics—I am in duty bound to pause a moment, without however entering into all the details of this important subject. Our friends on the Opposition benches seemed to lay stress on the fact that the present Government had not adopted, or rather was not adopting a definite policy on the tariff, so far as conveyed by the Speech from the Throne. In reading over attentively the speeches made by these gentlemen in the course of the last few years, I have yet to find, amongst the governments that have preceded the present one, a Prime Minister who, with regard to this question of tariff or on many other questions had adopted a definite policy. It is, according to my humble opinion, an economic principle that a country must adapt its tariff policy to the modalities of the policy followed by its neighbours and in a more generalized form to that adopted by the great world powers. Briefly, I believe that on this tariff question as well as on many others, we must be up-to-date and that we must not entirely refer to the past to adopt a policy on the subject. Times change and it is by a careful revision well calculated to fit in broadly with the needs of our Dominion that we must consider this question. Personally, being of French Canadian extraction, I am first of all a Canadian and it is my opinion that, in its widest accepted sense, the Canadian must not be provincial but must be first and above all Canadian. From the beginning of this debate, Mr. Speaker, we have also been witnessing a discussion on immigration. The latter is deemed in certain spheres absolutely necessary to the prosperity of the Western provinces, a means to draw greater returns for our railway system; on the whole, according to some, it would be the remedy which would set on a firm basis our country's economic system. Our Western friends seem to insist that it should be recruited mainly in the farming class. That is a very good suggestion; however, on the other hand, Mr. Speaker, it would be difficult to limit immigration to that class only, seeing that Canada must be and, I believe, is a land of freedom to which all classes of people, I mean the good classes—and I especially lay stress, Mr. Speaker, on the word "good"—must have access. But I shall here make a distinction. If we must open wide the doors of our country, let this immigration be selective at the port of emigration so that the refuse of old Europe be not dumped upon our shores. I feel morally convinced that it will be absolutely necessary that this immigration be not too great so as to avoid, in times of economic depression such as we are experiencing, that the problem of unemployment do not become more difficult through over population.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock I was discussing the question of unemployment which was so prominently brought forward all over the country in the course of the last electoral campaign. To-day it outlines itself again under a very keen aspect. I am not in the habit of playing to the gallery, however, belonging to that great political party which has always been the party of the masses, the one which has always so strongly proclaimed "miseror super turbam". I therefore deem it my duty to ask this House to take a special interest on this question. I am the representative of an electoral division made up on the whole of seven eighths of artisans and I feel that these people have given convincing and sufficient proof of their attachment to the Liberal cause and of their approval of its policy by electing your humble servant by a majority of 17,000 votes at the last general election. I therefore request that relief be sought as soon as possible for this abnormal condition and I have no fear of contradiction in stating in this House that the Liberal party was the first to take up that question; the hon. Leader of the Government has given proof of his solicitude when he proposed to the different municipalities and provincial governments of Canada to help them in relieving unemployment by offering to contribute effectively in the furtherance of public enterprises. The Canadian artisan does not cater to that class of writers on political economy who believe that the State should provide for him. He does not wish to beg officially from any one; however he demands that the government concede, through just and most effective legislation, the facilities of earning his daily bread and that of his family, moreover the means of giving to his children that intellectual food so indispensable, to-day, to the prosperity of nations: education.

I therefore believe and I have reason to hope that this Government will even go further than the programme which it has already prepared towards relieving unemployment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the question to be considered and I will venture to say the one most to the fore is that which relates to our railways. Some are partisans of private ownership of our system of railways, others demand State ownership. Opinions are well divided on the subject. I do not pretend to be at my age—and I am comparatively young—an expert on matters of railway management, but I represent in the city of Montreal an electoral division consisting of a great number of employees of our railway system, and at the risk of displeasing a number of our friends on the other side of the House, I feel that I am in a position to state that a number of these employees have admitted to me in their typical way that the present managers of the Government railways "were not railroad men".

The present Government has decided to give a fair trial to the public ownership of railways. Many in this House have spoken of co-ordination. Mr. Speaker, since so much is said in favour of co-ordination, it will not be considered an evidence of jingoism on my part to take up the matter. May I suggest in behalf of my constituents, in behalf of the French-Canadian people of the county of Hochelaga, that, when this co-ordination, this re-organization is being done, it be required from the employees of these national railways, at any rate from those who are supposed to serve the people in my province, that they be perfectly conversant with the two languages recognized as the official languages of this country. There exists at present an evident and well known fact, and that is, our national railways have large annual deficits which have to be met out of the public Treasury. This is a well known thing, and I hope that, thanks to the excellent method to be adopted by the Government in its re-organization of this system, Canada may soon know that not only are our national railway systems well re-organized internally, but that they will soon prove profitable to the country.

Much has been said in this House about redistribution. If I only wished to be selfish on this subject, I should immediately declare myself in favour of this project so much insisted upon but, should the Government ever think it advisable to redistribute the different counties in Canada, I should ask them, before they do so, to render justice to certain parts in my province where the census was not properly taken under the last administration. And this I would ask not only for my own province, but with the breadth of view which shall always be my aim, I am ready to endorse any such request, whatever may be the district it comes from.

A reduction of railway rates has also been discussed. In the United States as well as in Canada, economists, business men, financiers, all agree on the subject. On this point again I feel confident that, owing to the present Prime Minister being a student in economics, this question will be solved to the entire satisfaction of our national interests.

Mr. Speaker, our kind friends of the Progressive party have stated their demands at length. They insist principally on the re-establishment of the Wheat Board. The people of the province of Quebec, which is composed largely of agriculturists, is of course, greatly interested in these demands; I shall therefore request the devoted followers of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) to throw more light on the nature of this Board, why they want it to be restored as soon as possible. What ever may be said, the province of Quebec is anxious for knowledge, and I may affirm, without boastnig, that the people of this province are well educated and take great interest in all important public matters. I therefore ask our kind friends of the Progressive party, and I do not doubt that they will be eagerly listened to by all who, on this side of the House, are not posted as to the activities and the importance of this institution for which they clamour so persistently.

Mr. Speaker, you undoubtedly expect that I should express my various impressions now that I have been sitting in this House for a few days, I must first admit that I have been deeply moved by all the imposing ceremonial of the opening of Parliament; I saw such a display of brilliancy that I have been wondering if we were truly a colony and did deserve to be called a Dominion.

Our country, have we said and repeated, must practise a sound political economy. I have been told that expenses have already been reduced in the Militia Department. I must admit, Mr. Speaker, that I rejoice at the news; not that I condemn all military expenditure; but, being a journalist, upon perusal of the "Canadian Almanack", it struck me that too many brigadier--generals are receiving salaries from seven to nine thousand dollars annually, while our labourers are on the brink of starvation.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said, and I think that this afternoon, the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr Manion) gave us to understand that the present Government had done very little to remedy the present abnormal business situation in which the country has been left by the preceding Government. I agree with him to a certain extent, but think he should make a distinction.

The present Government somehow resembles the medical man who is suddenly summoned following a drowning accident. The country had been left in such a pitiful condition by our friends of the Opposition that, whatever the medical science of the Liberal party, the latter have been endeavouring, since the elections, to practise artifiicial respiration on this half-suffocated administration. The country, I am sure, will learn with pleasure that the present doctor reports progress.

Mr. Speaker, I have noticed something else in the House of Commons. I have spent the greater part of my ife amongst English-speaking friends, and I should never have expected that so many in this House would rise and claim peace, good will and harmony between races; I had thought that it was a well understood fact, and I may truly say that in my native province, I do not know and have never known any ill-feeling, any misunderstanding between the races. It is to be hoped that, for the general welfare of the country, the wish expressed by our friends of the Opposition and of the Progressive party will be realized; it is to be hoped, in the interest of the country at large, that there will be no personal, no racial question, because matters of vital interest will be at stake. The hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River told us this afternoon that his children speak French. I must tell him that, in my own province children of French-speaking parents speak English as well as French; in several of our schools, children are taught to sing in English "The Maple Leaf forever".

In concluding, I repeat it is most desirable that the wish for a better understanding uttered on all sides should materialize. Let us not only preach, but also practise the fine maxims which our friends have given expression to in this connection; and, since we now belong to the League of Nations, let us first practise at home the virtues of charity, of good cheer and helpfulness. Then our representatives at the League of Nations, Mr. Speaker, will be in a position to preach the brotherhood of nations.

[Mr. St. Père.]

Mr. E. B. RYCKMAN (East Toronto): Mr. Speaker, I humbly bespeak your kind indulgence and that of hon. members on this my first attempt to address the House. I desire, in the first place, to associate myself with the many happy and hearty felicitations which have flowed to you, in a full tide, from all parts of the Chamber. I have had, as you may not be aware, Sir, opportunities of knowing the high standard of man—in point of ability, experience, dignity and renown—that we have in the present occupant of the Chair of this House. I think, however, Mr. Speaker, there is one fact, and a most important one, that has not yet been offered to the House, and which should have been mentioned in connection with your elevation to the high position that you occupy. It is a great satisfaction to us to know that we have occupying the Chair a man of dignity and of Parliamentary lore, one who will justly decide in all matters that come up for decision as between opposing parties in this House; but we have here the largest legislative chamber of the land, filled from time to time with distinguished men, and fair women who are visitors to it, and to me—I say it earnestly—it is a great source of gratification that we have presiding over our deliberations the handsomest and the most imposing figure in this whole House.

Mr. GRAHAM: Where is Tommy Church?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I did not intend to take any part in this debate, I had thought that the untutored children of the House should be seen and for the most part not heard; but it seems, from what has fallen from other speakers, that there is a necessity which impels me to make a few remarks and I promise hon. members that I shall not detain them long.

In the subjects which have been adumbrated in the Speech from the Throne there are a number of matters which are to come up for deliberation and decision later on. The only criticism that I have to make in that connection is that in the Speech there was very little that was explicit, and in the speeches that we have heard from members of the Government or their followers there has not been any attempt to give us any more information, if I except one speech which was made by a certain hon. and learned member. I do not know, Sir, that any votes are changed by what may take place in the debate on the Address; I do not know that any opinions are altered. I do know, however, that the meeting of Parliament is a costly business, and I do know that when the clocks of this Chamber, and there are three of them, are ticking out the seconds of time they are also ticking in measures of dollars and cents. And if I may be permitted to offer an observation I would say that I think the factor of expense in connection with this House may be taken as three; when we consider that there are three clocks in the Chamber and all through ink bottles, mucilage pots and other requisites supplied to members, I observe the factor of three. I do not know that anyone can say that I am especially niggardly; I do not know that anyone will suggest that I want to practise an economy that I would not ask any one else to practise; but it does seem to me, as an observation that perhaps may not be lost sight of, that it would be well now when we have this new, clean, economical Government in power that there shall be an effort made to practise that economy which must be generally observed throughout the country. I intend, therefore, to trespass as little as I can upon the time and add as little as I can to the expense of this House.

I have been greatly interested in the illuminating and interesting addresses that we have heard from all quarters of the Chamber. One hon. member made a remark which seemed to strike me as appropriate—that seeing so many of us were here as strangers we should declare our environment, because a man, whether he will or not, is largely controlled by the environment in which he finds himself. Well, Mr. Speaker, I come from the little heard of and much admired city of Toronto. Let me say that I am proud to be a representative of that city. I am proud that we have one united band from Toronto. In that respect we are on all fours with the province of Quebec; and as the representation of the province of Quebec in this Parliament, under the British North America Act, is limited to sixty-five members and as we from the growing city of Toronto are nine and soon to become, I hope, ninety-nine, it will not be long before the province of Quebec and the city of Toronto in their respective units will go hand in hand. I represent in particular the constituency of East Toronto. It is a constituency of about 50,000 voters and contains 200 manufacturing establishments more or less and of more or less importance. As I say we are a happy band of nine. I might say—since his name has been mentioned since I have risen to my feet—that the Dean of our Brotherhood is the member for North Toronto, ex-Mayor Thomas Church, or as he is more familiarly known, Tommy Church. Some members of the House have been pleased to cast some aspersions upon him but just let me say this, and say it as quickly as I can: I have not been particularly associated with him but I know of him and I know what he has done for the city of Toronto. I know that he has been elected mayor seven times; I know that his majority on the last occasion was practically as great as he ever had before and would have been greater if it had not been for the fact that everybody knew he would be elected. I know that the reason he was held in such high esteem by his fellow citizens of Toronto was two-fold: first, that the man was absolutely honest, and second that he had no other idea than service. In the next place, let me tell hon. gentlemen that he retired, I suppose, because he got tired of the position, and for no other reason. He could have been elected seven times more, for the reasons I have stated. That is one instance. Then there is another incident—and I know this for a fact; I put it to my hon. friends from the city of Montreal, who know something about the cost of elections, and I can say something myself upon that point. Before one of these elections a man approached the member for North Toronto and offered him $500 towards his election expenses, a perfectly proper transaction under the circumstances. I had nothing to do with it, and I am not seeking to justify anything in which this gentleman was concerned. He said to this man, "Never mind, old man, keep your money, I do not want it." We have the further fact, Toronto did its duty in sending soldiers to the front. Never did a body of soldiers leave Toronto without the "Godspeed" of the member for North Toronto. There never was a train load of soldiers in health, maimed or wounded who returned to Toronto, no matter what hour of the day or night, who were not greeted by the Mayor of Toronto. Now, when I find an hon. gentleman who says there is no infamy in offering himself as the candidate of a party which has professed before all the world, and pledged itself to carry out, a certain line of policy, the exact opposite of the policy to which the hon. gentleman is pledged, and to which he pledged himself anew last night, throwing stones at the hon. member for North Toronto, I say, Mr. Speaker, let him gather his sticks and stones and continue to throw them.

I believe in a protective tariff. I am a man of good faith. I desire nothing but what is in the interests of this country, and I am satisfied that the people whom I represent desire nothing but what may be for the good of all. Strongly as I desire a customs tariff, I am just as strongly opposed to any privileged class. I believe that the tariff which this country has had benefits the farmer, the merchant and the manufacturer, and I can only say, Mr. Speaker, in reference to that immense sum of seventeen hundred million dollars, or more than one-half the total indebtedness of this Canada, of excess purchases abroad in the last five years, if the manufacturers, the merchants and the farmers had saved of that sum what they could for the benefit of Canada, we would not have found so great a state of depression as we have now, nor such untoward circumstances among the farmers, and the manufacturers of this country. I do not intend to argue this case now.

The matter of exchange troubles me very, very much. To be sure, it is not now at about 20 per cent, as it once stood. I believe, however, it is on the upward swing again and that it is in the interests of all parties in this House, especially of my hon. friends the Progressives, that this should not be so. What in the world would happen to the value of the Canadian dollar, in which we naturally feel immense pride, if the purchases that are made now outside of this country were increased to a very substantial amount?

I have an easy way, although I will admit that it is not an absolute and conclusive way, of testing this question of tariff for myself. All the nations of the world that have any pretence whatever to commercial status have a protective tariff. Not one single commercial nation of importance on earth has anything else but a customs tariff. Many of those nations have a tariff that is higher than ours. Many of those nations since the war, in order to benefit themselves, and build up, as they in their wisdom think, their national prosperity, have increased their tariffs, and the only place that I know of where there is any body of opinion that is against the maintenance of a customs tariff is in a section of the United States and of Canada. I cannot believe, for one moment, that all the world is wrong, and that this body of opinion is right. It is the safest course when you are in doubt—and I believe many of my hon. friends are in doubt—to do as others do. I admit it is not absolutely conclusive, but I cannot help thinking of something that occurred here a few years ago. There was a case before the Supreme Court of Canada. Sir Henry Strong, a man of marked peculiarities, but yet a most eminent jurist, was the presiding judge. Opposing counsel was arguing a branch of his case, when he was interrupted by the Chief Justice who said "Stop a moment, stop a moment, Mr. T"—who is living to-day — "Don't pursue that branch of your argument further. Your argument must be unsound, Mr. T. If I had a mind that wanted to think that way, I would not let it do so, because the Law Lords in England have unanimously decided the other way." Before my hon. friends the Progressives impose upon this House their will as to free trade or as to a low tariff, I want to ask this House, what nation upon this globe has a tariff such as they propose?

Mr. CRERAR: Great Britain has.

Mr. RYCKMAN: I venture to say to my hon. friend from Marquette that I was in Great Britain last year when the new law was adopted. It came into force on Saturday, October 1, last. What does that act provide? That act puts a duty of 33⅓ per cent on every article that is in the schedules to the act. My hon. friend from Marquette will find the Ford automobile, that is used by the farmers throughout the West, upon the tariff list. I want to tell my hon. friend that there are, as I understand it, over 6,000 articles of commerce in the schedule of that act which are subject to a tax of 33⅓ per cent. Nay, more, Mr. Speaker, Great Britain has always been held up as a free trade country, and peculiarly a country which could enjoy free trade. Why? Because she wanted to bear the commerce of the world to and from all ports of the world, but she now has a protective tariff and there is the readiest way in Great Britain of getting your goods subject to the tariff of 33⅓ per cent. You simply make out your case before the Board of Trade and you are given that protection. I should be sorry, Mr. Speaker, to see this Canada of ours robbed of that protection which I know all other nations of the world demand for their subjects. And so long as that great and economically wise nation to the south of us sells its goods to the patriotic sons of this country, and says to them: "Your goods shall not pass our border unless you pay tribute to us"; so long as their tariff is maintained against us and our Motherland—we ought to say to them that we shall mete out to them the same measure as they mete out to us. I want to make it clear that I and those I represent will stand strongly for a countervailing customs tariff for our own protection. One hon. member has mentioned "horse sense". Well, that is my "horse sense"—and my patriotic sense as well, in regard to this question.

I believe in upholding the dignity of this country. Canada may be comparatively small now, but the time will not be long before we shall take our place economically amongst the great nations of the world. But we shall never do that by means of a free trade policy; we can do it only by maintaining our self-respect in matters commercial and in those that touch the welfare of the country. I am willing to do everything in my power to ameliorate the conditions of any class of the community; and let no one doubt my word when I say that the farmers have my special consideration. If it is a question of freight rates, I am with them all the way; but if it is a matter of doing something which is not for the benefit of all, then I invoke the very words that they have used themselves, when they have declared that they want nothing which is in the nature of special privileges. The present conditions are peculiar; there is no doubt about that. But are my hon. friends the Progressives and their constituents suffering alone? Is there no one else who is suffering? Is there no other class that is weighed down by misfortune at the present time? Mr. Speaker, I am strongly of opinion, and I take it from what my hon. friends themselves have said, that if their conditions, untoward as they are, are carefully weighed and the balance struck it will be found that, on this day of grace on which I am attempting to address this House, the conditions of the manufacturers of the country are worse than those of the farmers. I do not expect any enthusiastic reception of that statement, but I may state the situation nevertheless. The member for Swift Current (Mr. Lewis) spoke on this subject in a very illuminating way; he said that the conditions were bad in the extreme. He instanced a case which I commend to the whole House. He told us that he knew of one man, whom I understood to be a friend of his, a farmer, who, on a capital investment of $140,000 had lost $21,000 in two years, and he gave that to this honourable House as the evidence of the "appalling" conditions in which the farmers were placed. I can tell him of manufacturers who, with a capital investment relative to that amount, have lost amazingly more; and there are those manufacturers who if they found that the measure of their loss was $21,000 on $140,000 in two years, without interest on their money and nothing for their labour, would to-morrow declare a national holiday of thanksgiving because their loss was so small.

Mr. McCONICA: Are not your friends the manufacturers now protected by a tariff?

Mr. RYCKMAN: I would say that the majority of them are; and please God, in view of the information that was given to this House by the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), they are going to be protected. And the farmers are going to be protected; and the duties that are now levied not only on the goods that the farmers need, but on the goods that they sell, will, I trust, be maintained.

An hon. MEMBER: How will you protect the farmer?

Mr. RYCKMAN: How are you going to protect the farmer? My answer is that the farmer's condition—I will not put it any stronger—is no worse than that of any other class. I believe that the condition of the farmer will be made better by such a tariff as has been suggested to us by the Minister of Justice, the Laurier-Fielding tariff. That is my view, I hold it sincerely, and I am prepared to give reasons for it. However, I do not wish to debate this particular question. We shall have abundant time before the session is over to go into all the details bearing upon it. If the hardships which my hon. friends complain of were peculiar to themselves, that might be a consideration that would call for immediate redress. But that is not the case. The general manager of one of our well known banks has said that if any manufacturer gave him a financial statement for the year 1921 showing that he had made a profit, that was the statement he would scrutinize, because he believed to begin with, that such a statement could not be true. There are therefore, Mr. Speaker, others who are in the same deplorable position in which the Progressives and their constituents find themselves. And is it not natural? Is there any other country in the world where the condition of the farmers is any better than it is in Canada?

I spent four months last year in England and Scotland and hon. members may be interested to learn that some of the farmers there were declaring they would not raise any more grain crops because of the then state of the market—which was worse, I believe, than it is now—they could not afford to do so. Do not let our farmers, whose condition I sincerely deplore, remain under the impression that the deflation in the prices of farm products is pinching them alone.

The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) said: Find the farmers prosperous and you find the manufacturers, the merchants, and all other classes in the community prosperous. I am not disposed to dissent from that statement, but I am not sure, to put it no stronger, that the hon. member has got the various classes in their right economic order. The prairie farmers might find their fields "whitening unto the harvest," our friends in Prince Edward Island might find their potato hills bursting with a bountiful crop, but unless there was the market provided by the merchants, the manufacturers, and the professional men of the country to pay for that abundant harvest, I submit we would have hard times. I can assure the House beyond a question of doubt that when certain manufacturers, whose cost systems told them the truth, were aware that every single day their wheels turned they were making a loss, they kept their men on that they and their families might be supplied with bread, for those manufacturers were determined that the depressing line of the unemployed, so fearful to see, should not be lengthened if they could help it.

The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) remarked on what part of the customs tariff levied on imports reached the treasury and was available to meet our national expenditure. I am informed, Mr. Speaker, that one hon. member of the Progressive party, a clergyman, in addressing audiences throughout his riding specially emphasized the fact that one-half of all the money received in customs duties was absorbed in the expense of collection. That statement, of course, was very effective. I heard that another hon. member addressed his constituents to the same effect. Thus we know of at least three hon. members, each in different provinces, making this mischievous statement. I do not suggest for a moment that they knew it was utterly untrue, but the damage was done. But I am satisfied that this pernicious statement with a loading of about nine hundred and fifty per cent above the facts, went broadcast throughout the country. When it was made in the House I knew it was incorrect, and I thought it would be challenged, but there it appears on the pages of Hansard, and if those pages come into the hands of any one who does not see the contradiction, because it was not made until a couple of days later, the damage will be still greater. Therefore, I submit for the consideration of my Progressive friends that wherever that statement has been made, wherever it has done its deadly work—and I do not wish to use too hard an expression—it is in the interests of good government that it should be forever killed.

I have enjoyed this debate exceedingly, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to claim any undue merit for my regular attendance, but I have been in my seat during the greater part of the debate. What has fallen from the lips of hon. members has always been illuminating, informative, or entertaining. I find satisfaction in disagreeing with some speakers. I find satisfaction in agreeing with others. But one hon. member gave me the greatest satisfaction, although he was also the dispenser of keen disappointment and distress. I will explain what I mean. I did not return from abroad until October and had no intention of participating in the election campaign, but later on I was asked, under special circumstances, to accept the Conservative nomination for the constituency which I have the honour now to represent. When the platform that had been propounded by the Liberal party, accompanied by the pledge to put it into effect at the earliest opportunity, was read at my nomination meeting, a contra-statement was made that that platform would give place to the Laurier-Fielding tariff. I could not believe that at the time, because I relied upon the honourable men who had pledged their word to put this platform into effect as the platform of the Liberal party if returned to power. During the campaign I asked a well-known manufacturer for the privilege of addressing his employees during the noon hour. He replied, "I am not going to allow you to address them, and, furthermore I am not going to vote for you. You think you are going to have this tariff that is given us in the Liberal platform. Well, I have just returned from Montreal, and I may tell you we are not going to have anything of the kind." If necessary I can give the name of that manufacturer, and as I had a witness with me I can substantiate the statement made. Although that manufacturer said: "We are going to have the Laurier-Fielding tariff," still in my ignorance and confidence I continued during my campaign to discuss the respective tariff platforms of the Conservative, Liberal, and Progressive parties. I heard it constantly stated during the campaign: "Do not concern yourself about the Liberal tariff policy; you will not be troubled about it if the Liberals are the largest group returned and have the making of the tariff." I came to this House, therefore, in some doubt as to what was going to happen, particularly in view of the solemn declaration of the Liberal convention, accompanied by a pledge to put that declaration into effect. I observed my honoured leader wrap up the Liberal party in their platform and their pledge as in a shroud and hand it to the undertaker. Surely, I thought, this is mistaken tactics. You are defying the Liberal party to put their platform into effect. You are reading what has been said in the province of Quebec. You are giving the stand that has been taken by some members of the party with regard to the fiscal policy of the country, and you are defying them to carry out their pledges. I thought that was a mistake. I said in my own mind: Why not let them escape from their platform and their pledge if they want to do so, because if they did fail to carry out their promise it would be in the interests of the country? Why not let them? Why gird at them so that they will carry it into effect? Mr. Speaker, I believe that the putting into effect of that platform as the policy of this country would bring about the crisis to which my right hon. leader referred as well as the crisis to which the Minister of Justice referred. I do not think, however, that such a deplorable crisis would bring about just the results pictured by the Minister of Justice.

Following the speech of my leader, I listened to the hon. First Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). He made use of his little simile, and he told us that we should not take campaign pledges seriously—which was new light for me. He also said that he had stated his intention of surrounding himself with leading members of the party and of accepting their advice as to what he should do with regard to carrying out the Liberal platform. He read the speech that he made during the Liberal convention after that platform had been laid down, and he had been chosen as leader of the Liberal party. I ask hon. members to refer to page 49 of Hansard, where the Prime Minister quotes the speech he made on that occasion, and ask themselves whether any high school boy or girl could attach to what he said during the course of that speech—it is found on page 199 of the proceedings of the Liberal convention--any other meaning than that which his words obviously implied, —"press on from this moment * * * for greater righteousness * * * till we have reached the goal where the principles and policies laid down on this historic occasion will have become, through legislation, part of the law of our land". Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. First Minister was playing with the issue,—as was the case before the 6th of December. I thought we should find out how this matter stands when the legislation is brought down, and not before; that if we were not to know where we stood in relation to the tariff until the tariff proposals were presented, we would at least know then. But to my great joy—and I cannot too much emphasize my feelings in this respect—the Minister of Justice, in his very notable speech and in language which no one could misunderstand—in terms lucid and convincing—said: "My views have never changed during the lest twenty-five years. For fifteen years I have followed, approved, endorsed the Laurier-Fielding tariff. I have advocated that tariff in the province of Quebec; I have advocated it in the city of Quebec. At a gathering held in that city the right hon. leader of the Opposition was present and applauded my declaration with regard to the tariff. I am in favour of the Laurier-Fielding tariff".

My hat was in the air, Mr. Speaker, I came to this House in some doubt and apprehension with regard to the future fiscal policy of this country. But, knowing as I do what the Laurier-Fielding tariff is, I am no longer in uncertainty with regard to the tariff question. My hat is in the air; if I had three hats they would all be in the air, one hanging on each of the clocks in the Chamber, to emphasize the triumphant nature of my feelings upon learning that from this time forth we are to have the Laurier-Fielding tariff as the tariff policy of this country. Do not misunderstand me; I am not forgetting that the Minister of Justice said "with such modifications as exigencies might demand". But I rejoice in the intimation—and I believe this country rejoices in it—that we are to have the Laurier-Fielding tariff.

What was the policy of our party in the last election? What did we say was the most important issue, the one with which we were most deeply concerned? We said that a proper tariff policy was essential to the well-being of the nation; that we should have such a customs tariff as we have had. Regardless of varying political conditions I say that the principle of the tariffs we have had from 1896 up to the present time is satisfactory to the party which I have the honour to support in this House.

Then who won the election in that event? What policy prevailed? Was it the policy of the Liberal party propounded in convention after the deliberations of the thousand or more who, I am told, were gathered there? No, Mr. Speaker, it was the policy demanded by the people of this country that we must have in this Canada of ours, for the benefit of farmers, merchants, manufacturers, the professional classes and of all who enjoy the privilege of living in this country, a protective tariff. That question reminds me of that other one, who won the war? In the United States —and I have had a very considerable amount of business with the United States government in the last three years—it is claimed openly by executive officers that the war was won by that nation which, as a matter of fact, after having propounded and put into effect a policy of neutrality, delayed for over two years until April, 1917, before coming into the war. Yet they say that they won the war. Well, let them claim that, and let any party which announced that it was in favour of the Laurier-Fielding tariff, and that it would put it into effect, claim that it won the election, but, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the election was won by those people throughout the country who believed, as the Conservative party did, that a protective tariff was necessary for Canada. Am I sure yet that we have the Laurier-Fielding tariff? Yes, I think I am. The Minister of Justice has said so, and he is beyond question an important member of the administration. I am also aware of what is the effect of British parliamentary practice in a case of this kind, and that if any other members of the administration should insist now that we must have something other than the Laurier-Fielding tariff, then in accordance with parliamentary practice we must have the resignation of the Minister of Justice. I have therefore unalloyed satisfaction in the effect of his declaration.

If some may say, "Oh, but your leader was unhorsed," I admit that, but if our leader was unhorsed, we will leave our friends of the other side to play with their broken toys and their broken pledges, because we on this side had a definite policy which we believed would make for the prosperity of this country.

I was greatly disappointed with another part of the remarks of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. In my opinion he has been the first in this Parliament to set province against province. His speech is about five-and-a-half columns long in Hansard; I have read it very, very carefully, and nobody can tell me after reading that speech that it was prepared with any other idea in view than the winging of the two arrows which are launched in its last paragraphs. My hon. friend, in solemn tones of injured innocence, appealed to this House. He said that there had been a crisis, that he had not said any more than the right hon. leader of the Opposition had said, that his aim was to serve the country, that the crisis had been averted by the return of the Liberal party to power, that we should recognize that, and that we had an opportunity to learn now that we were in opposition. Then comes the statement that the attitude taken by my right hon. leader was inspired by bitterness against the province of Quebec. Now I submit to the members of this House that there was not one line, one word, or one syllable, uttered by my right hon. leader that was charged in any degree with bitterness against the province of Quebec. Then, in his next paragraph, the Minister of Justice refers to the allegation that he was the master of this administration, and after supporting that allegation by making a statement as to the tariff policy of this country—that declaration did not come from the First Minister, from whom it might very properly have come, nor from the Minister of Finance, in whose department it was, but from the Minister of Justice—he says that my right hon. leader desired "to accentuate the unfortunate differences which have existed between certain provinces."

Mr. Speaker, this is an old, old game, and a wretched game it is. I do not believe that the Minister of Justice desired to set any such ball rolling, because, while he may have done what was done with intention, I do not believe he had any idea that what he said would be taken in the way it has been, or that it would have the results that have flowed from it. What do we find? The word the Minister of Justice used was "bitterness." That is immediately translated into "hatred" by the newspapers, but I shall refer to that later on. Out of a clear sky, without any provocation whatever, we have the allegation that province is being set against province, and that it is the desire of the leader of an important party in this House to accentuate the differences that exist between the provinces. I say that it is an old, old game. The kick-off was with the Minister of Justice. Then the ball was passed to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). What did he say? He said, "Beneath the surface there is an indication of a desire on the part of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition to resuscitate the old sectional feeling," and the matter is enlarged upon there. I submit that my hon. friend had no justification for including that in his remarks. It was wholly amongst the disjecta membra of his address, and he might just as well, and I say it with all respect, have said, "Hon. members, onions do not agree with my digestion," but from a full heart, anxious to keep the ball rolling, he says, "Beneath the surface"—and all things that are beneath the surface are not above board and honourable—"beneath the surface there is an indication of a desire on the part of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition to resuscitate the old sectional feeling."

Why is this matter introduced into this debate? Why does it come from the Government side? Why is it impressed upon us, why does it become important and why has it been referred to by hon. gentlemen opposite ever since the incident in question? The member for one of the Montreal constituencies, in a perfectly frank speech—and I took pleasure in the sincerity of his remarks—referring to this matter asked: Why all this bitter hatred? I submit it is for a malign purpose—to solidify the people of the province of Quebec against my right hon. leader. It has a pernicious effect, it is wholly undesirable, there is no occasion for it and how is expression to be given to the much desired spirit of unity after such an unwarranted attack? How did this movement begin? One of the newspapers translated the incident: "Hatred of Quebec inspires Meighen's attack, Sir Lomer says."

This appeared with different transpositions in different newspapers, but conveying the same meaning. Sir Lomer Gouin, a most important figure in the province of Quebec, is now the Minister of Justice. All honour and respect to him; he has attained his high position through the good will of his countrymen. But what do we find? An attack is made by him which is translated and given currency in the province of Quebec the result of which can only be construed—if they take the Minister of Justice at his word and the public of Quebec do that—as an attack made upon my leader. Now, Mr. Speaker, to say there has been such an attack is most unjust. Let me put the matter this way: Suppose the situation were reversed, that an unsupported and unjustified attack had been made by Sir Lomer Gouin upon the leader of the Opposition, and that the story came out in the newspapers of Ontario headed "Hatred of Ontario inspires Sir Lomer Gouin's attack, the right hon. Arthur Meighen says." What would have been the effect throughout Ontario? Would such a precedure as that tend to develop amity and good will? Would it tend to enlarge the esteem in which the Minister of Justice is at present held in the province of Ontario? I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it would not. I want to see—and this is my humble contribution to the debate—banished once and for all from this House, and banished from the newspapers that report the proceedings of this House, this serpent of discord and all its slimy trails.

I will tell you something, Mr. Speaker, with all the earnestness that I can command: The members of this hon. House should decide that any imputation against a province, or any imputation against the members of a province as a whole, should be forever forbidden and never allowed to occur. Sir, I was born in the province of Quebec. My mother was born in that province, I have lived there myself and an important section of my family still lives in Quebec and enjoys the blessings which obtain there. I have important interests in that province, and there is no blessing that could come to Quebec that I would for one moment withhold. If you will allow me a personal allusion I can never forget the feeling akin to worship which enters my soul when I am in the presence of the mighty St. Lawrence. Such is the spirit which seems to breathe over all its waters that I can well understand how the ancients worshipped their river gods. I regard the province of Quebec with all affection and would deny it no reasonable demand. I moved to the city of Toronto and have lived there for nearly thirty-five years. I know the fair-mindedness of its people. I know there is no section which would seek to deny the province of Quebec anything it is entitled to. There might be a few persons of altered mentality who might desire to say something derogatory of the province of Quebec or of any other province but there is no section of the community in which I live, or of the province of Ontario as I know it, that would for one moment withhold from the province of Quebec anything that it is entitled to. On the other hand, I believe there is no important section of public opinion in the province of Quebec that would withhold from the province of Ontario what it is entitled to.

But what do we find? We come to Ottawa and at first we find everything agreeable but before long within the precincts of this House we hear enunciated this idea of hatred. Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of members of this House, if they wish to serve the cause of their common Canadian patriotism, to see that an end is put to that kind of thing. As far as my race is concerned I am five generations Canadian. As regards my religion I will admit that I ought to have more of it but I am of a different creed from that declared by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) this afternoon. If there are policies or principles or individuals to be attacked here let them be attacked and if they cannot defend themselves or give as good as they receive, let them suffer the consequences but surely attacks should not be made upon any part of the common patriotism of this country. Sir Wilfrid Laurier declared that love is better than hate. He sat for years in this House and knew the spirit that at times invaded it and in these words he has left his condemnation of that very spirit. I am willing to co-operate with other members of the House in doing my level best to see that the spirit complained of shall be forever exorcised.

There are rules of the House which are in the interest of decorum and the maintenance of the amenities of debate which require that no aspersion shall be cast by one member upon his fellow members. If a member offends in this particular, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we put him in a room by himself. This is merely an idea that I have in my own heart, and I say that no member should be permitted to speak disrespectfully of any province, or the people of any province as a whole. I submit if there was some amendment to the Rules of the House carrying into effect that idea, the legislation of this Fourteenth parliament would advance the interests of this country beyond anything that we now imagine.

As far as I am concerned, let me say that I have no other interest than that of my country, Canada. My constituency is East Toronto. I know that it is a legal fiction that when a member is elected for a constituency he becomes, ipso facto, a representative of the whole country, and that he is not allowed to advance something which means the benefit of his own constituency or his own province, if it does not run on all fours with the betterment of the whole country. With that feeling, I want to say that I intend to attend the sessions of this House. I have no other occupation at the present time, and no business that calls me specially away from here prevents me giving my full attention to the sessions of this House. If any member of the House thinks that I, in my humble capacity, can do anything to advance the interests of any portion of this Dominion, or to improve the condition of the people of any part of Canada, I say right now as emphatically as I can, that I am at the service of that hon. gentleman. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this unity, this prosperity which we are sure Canada is entitled to, and which the future will give it, can only be obtained if we, once and for all, really strive to become a united band, with no other object than the advancement of our country.

Mr. E. J. SEXSMITH (Lennox and Addington): I wish, Mr. Speaker, to join with hon. gentleman in extending to you my sincere congratulations. I am not quite satisfied in my own mind as to the advisability of continuing this present discussion. I have been educated and entertained, and I might say that conscientious and constructive discussion may have a place yet in these proceedings. We are told that in a multitude of councillors there is safety. As one just undertaking the responsibilities of a member of this House, I do not intend to delay the proceedings by a long-drawn out speech. I desire, in a very humble way, to summarize some of the principal thoughts that have been expressed in relation to the Speech from the Throne. One hon. gentleman on this side of the House said that it was wise for us to consider the statements that were made in Parliament because they went out through the country. I believe he was right in the declaration, but the thought came to my mind: was it not just as important that this Parliament should consider some of the statements that have been made and sent here from the country? I desire to state frankly that this Government is starting under very difficult circumstances, and an economic recovery cannot be brought about in a day, but it is my conviction that the Government will attain its objective, namely, the restoration of the political, economical and social life of Canada to a state of normality. What are some of the statements that come from the people of Canada to this Parliament? The people of Canada very emphatically stated on the 6th of December last that they wanted a change of government.

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I do not believe in abusing the retiring government. I do not think that we get anywhere by abusing one another. Very definite statements have been made, that there was to be a revision of the tariff, that the railways should be owned and managed by the government, that the natural resources of the Dominion should be developed, and that constructive economy be practised in the administration of the country's affairs. Something has been said about unemployment. I will admit that the condition is very, very serious. But it is serious in the respect that it is an indication of a defect in administration. When these symptoms arise in Canada, it is time for statesmen and for everybody to begin and diagnose the case. Sir, I say that, while there have been world-wide conditions brought about by the Great War, and while there has been reaction resulting in pessimism, deflation in prices and so on, we believe that the national policy has outlived its day of intended usefulness. We are of the opinion that its continuance in force has been the underlying cause of Canada's present condition. We sometimes spend a good deal of time in swatting the fly, on account of the contagion that his little feet carry, forgetting to clean up the cesspools and the slough ponds that are the source of the trouble. We want revenue; of course we do. We have a debt to pay. But a policy that brings in revenue and places a small percentage in the national treasury, allowing the major portion to find its way into the pockets of individuals, is destructive. The present high tariff is destroying the equilibrium of the nation, economically, financially and industrially. One of the main essentials of good statesmanship is the ability to strike and maintain a true balance in national affairs, but we believe that the present system is submersive of the best interests of the country as a whole. What is the solution? It is to be found in a change of policy.

Something has been said about agriculture, and reference was made to the subject in the Speech from the Throne, in a faint, though judicious, way. I am sorry that the Progressive party is sometimes misunderstood. There seems to be a misunderstanding between the people of the rural districts and those of the urban centres, not so much in the West, perhaps, as in the East and in Central Canada; but we trust that the day is not far distant when that misunderstanding will have disappeared. We do know that between the urban interest and the rural interest there is an interdependence; we know that those interests are positively inseparable; and we are also aware that a country must take care of its manufacturing interests. But there is another outstanding truth to be considered, and that is, that no nation that is over-industrialized is in a very normal condition. The greatest source of wealth to a nation lies in the fertility of its soil, and it matters not who tills that soil. If I understood the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) correctly, he said in his speech that the basic industry of Canada was agriculture. That being so, and statesmen having acknowledged the fact from time to time, we feel that agriculture should be encouraged, not, of course, in a selfish, narrow way, but having regard to its relation to other fundamental principles. Much has been said, by men who have pioneered the West and who have laboured in this industry, as regards what should be done by governments. In summing up these opinions, we find that they want markets that are unbarred, they want economic transportation, and they want just remuneration, untampered with. Now, I believe that this Government will see to it that the agricultural industry receives fair treatment.

There is the problem of railways, and I do not think that the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) is to be envied. Indeed, I think it will devolve upon this House to assist him as best it can. This subject will be discussed by men who are eligible to deal with it. It pleases me to hear men, who have the ability and the experience, confining their remarks to this one particular question. We find that the railway freight rates are almost prohibiting transportation. In my own province it costs $500 to remove one hundred cords of wood to a point about eighty miles distant from our county town. Under weak management the railways have perforce fallen into the possession of the Government. If there was anything on this earth that could die twice, I might say that we have been tariffed to death's door and have been railroaded nearly to the grave. There are two prominent factors in successful railway management—honest, competent direction, and the production of the natural resources of the country. I might place in the same category the three paramount problems, the railway problem, the immigration problem, and the problem of developing Canada's natural resources. These matters go together. Now, I do not wish to take up more time, because I do not feel that I have the ability to deal with these questions as they should be dealt with. But it is very necessary that something should be done, and we believe that it will be done.

I should like to say something in regard to the Soldiers' Settlement Board, which has been referred to rather cautiously. I believe that it is in the mind of the Government to do something more for our returned soldiers. Of course, much has been done; but we think that there could hardly be a limit to what Canada should do for those of her sons who fought her battle. Canada cannot afford to forget her returned heroes.

In conclusion, let me say that there are fundamental principles for us to consider. One has been mentioned by a number of hon. gentlemen, namely, unity; but I think that one of the main principles that should govern administration is unselfishness. When personal selfishness enters into the hearts of hon. members to whom the country entrusts the administration of its affairs, such selfishness is not only out of place, but is very destructive. Especially in all our deliberations I believe that we should be careful not to be biassed by racial or party prejudice, for it is only by maintaining a cool, dispassionate judgment that we can best advance the true interests of this great Dominion.

Mr. CHARLES SHEARD (South Toronto): I did not intend, Mr. Speaker, to participate in this debate, but as several important points have been raised, and as some hon. members at least have expressed themselves as though inspired by rather a jealous feeling against my native city, I feel it incumbent upon me to address the House.

[Mr. Sexsmith.]

In the first place, Sir, I would crave the privilege of joining with those who have preceded me in conveying to you my most hearty congratulations on your election to the high position which this House has conferred upon you. I do that with all the more satisfaction because I recall that when I entered Parliament you were one of the first to extend to me that courtesy, friendliness and companionship which a new member very often so earnestly and keenly desires. Moreover, in view of all that has been said regarding the solid Liberal representation from the province of Quebec, I, as a Canadian, cannot be restrained from expressing my admiration at the rising to the position of First Commoner of this country of a Canadian from the old French province of Quebec who has been signally honoured by the great Republic of France in being permitted to wear in the lapel of his coat that, to a Frenchman, very cherished decoration of the Legion of Honour. I hope, Mr. Speaker, you will pardon me this personal reference. I speak it because I am more than ordinarily sincere and earnest in conveying to you my keen appreciation of your election.

Regarding the Speech from the Throne, which is the subject matter of this debate, it raises to my mind only three important points: First, the railways, next, the tariff, and, third, immigration. True, the Speech from the Throne makes reference to the recent election,—to the restoration of good times, so suddenly identified, which have come, according to the hon. leader of the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King) in response to the vindication of the principle that the people rule, while the old government, so full of wrong doing, has been thrown out, with the result that better times have dawned, like the rising sun on a new day, to warm and cheer every corner of this vast Dominion.

Now, when we commence to analyze the situation we need not be at all surprised. I for one was not in the least surprised at the result of the election. We but shared the fate that overtook practically every government of every other country that participated in the war. Our defeat was a natural consequence and a natural condition of the war. Would any man imagine for one moment that any government that had to undertake, with the energy, the force, and the perseverance which the Union Government and, later, the Meighen Government had to pursue, to tax the people, to raise enormous revenues, to restrict them in their liberties, to confiscate their property, to compel in some instances enlistment and service for the defence of the Empire and civilization,—would any man imagine, I say, that that government was going to be popular with men who did not share the views of the great bulk of Canadians, and that those men were going to submit without venting their animosity upon what they conceived to be the authors of oppressive measures against themselves? People as a rule do not like to be taxed, when they are taxed they complain, and if they are taxed inordinately they rebel; which is exactly what has resulted in the defeat and overthrow of the Meighen Government. It has not been due to the lack of policy, to any wrong doing; it has simply been the natural and consequential result of the people objecting to pay the bill when the account is rendered. It is exactly the same as some people treat their doctor. They will call him out at night, they will plead on all fours for him to come speedily and often to their homes —"Don't neglect to call when you pass the door,"—but when he renders his account they will hardly know him as they pass him by on the street.

The political entity is practically the same as the individual, and I may tell hon. members of the Government that a day of reckoning will surely follow. They may take to themselves to-day the great consolation of having achieved victory. Well, I do not envy them their victory. It will be their privilege, their duty, their necessity to impose similar and even greater taxes, and to collect them, the burden is going to be grievously heavy, and the revulsion of feeling will speedily follow. When the tax collector comes for payment, the people will say, "Why this Government is no better than the other; we will have another change and see how it works."

Let us without bigotry approach and analyze the situation as far as we can. We have to-day a Government in power which has not the support of a majority of the members of this House. When the Government look across the floor and see ranged upon this side the Progressives and the old despised Tories, as they would feign make out we are, they must sometimes wonder as they go home at night how long the game is going to last and when the end will come. I hope they will have what the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) promised to give the national railways—a fair trial. It would be the greatest possible misfortune to let them out of the hole they are in until they have had a fair trial so the country will be able to pass judgment upon their acts. I for my part am not going to try to upset the Government,—just yet. I want to wait and see what they are going to do.

We have on this side a bunch of farmers. I remember when they started, I was in this House in the old time when we had the Union party and the Liberal party. Why, many of us who now sit in different places used to go to the same caucus,—the hon. member for Marquette was a member of the government then. Well, we had one or two hon. gentlemen who did not like their environment. They were very uncomfortable; they never loosened up as we felt they should; they were not as friendly as we thought they might be. They manifested a sort of narrow contractedness which did not come from us, and they began to edge off sideways. They did not know what they were, but they called themselves Farmers because most of them came from the West. In those days the hon. member who sat for the constituency of Red Deer, Mr. Michael Clark, was foremost in the expression of independent thought, although that independent thought did not, in most cases, appear to lead anywhere. But I believe he was at that time the right bower, if I may say so—the chief henchman—of the leader of the Progressive party, the hon. member for Marquette. The then member for Red Deer said: Well, as a name, "Farmer" will not do; "Agrarian" will not do, for it means the same thing if it means anything. So, if the people do not understand what Agrarian is we will call ourselves "Progressives", and it was Progressives from that day henceforth. Well, the late hon. member for Red Deer progressed to the very end. Finally he said: "There is nothing more to this. The Progressive party is simply a class; it represents nothing more than class selfishness. I cannot follow them in that line, so I will quit." And now we fail to see that distinguished and outstanding figure in this House. No longer do we hear the eloquence which had thrilled so many of us; no longer are we impressed with his whole-souled conviction of what must really be regarded as the Belial of absolute free trade.

Well, we must now designate our friends to my left as Progressives. But a rose by any other name will smell as sweet. I have listened very carefully to their addresses, and so far as I can gather it, their only text, their only idea, is the defence of the farmer. All they want is to secure redress for the farmer; to see that he is accorded relief. They regard the farmer as the whole of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. SHEARD: No?

Mr. CALDWELL: Open that other eye.

Mr. SHEARD: I want to remind my hon. friend in all sincerity that there are other things in Canada besides farm labour and farm work.

Mr. CALDWELL: Toronto, for instance.

Mr. SHEARD: Oh, you may sneer at Toronto if you like, but Toronto and Torontonians, I may tell my hon. friend, have just as much right to existence, despite his intimation to the contrary, as have the members from the Prairie provinces. And they too may need some things in order to enable them to enjoy independent life and to contribute their little mite to the progress of this country.

I am willing to grant all that can be granted for the benefit of the farmer; I am desirous of doing everything that is practicable in order to assist him. I am willing to listen to his grievances, and if any suggestion can be offered which would grant a measure of relief without ruin to the rest of the country, I for one should be prepared to support it.

I was pleased and edified, Mr. Speaker, by the deliverance of the hon. member for Marquette, leader of the Farmer party, in the early stages of this debate. I will at least pay him this compliment: he said in clear and definite terms what he really meant; his words seemed to carry with them his conviction; there was no humbug or camouflage about them. That went a long way with me, and I thought that if there was anything we could reasonably give him, it should be given. But there is a good deal that we cannot give him, as I see the situation. Let us take a look first at the railway problem. We have a tremendous mileage of railway in this country—twenty thousand odd miles, the result of long-continued maladministration. It does not make a particle of difference at whose door we lay the blame; the fact remains that we have a number of railways that have never paid, that are out of repair, and that cannot be operated without enormously increased expenditure for equipment and improvement of roadbed. I believe as firmly as any one in the nationalization of the railways and will go as far as I can toward carrying it into practical effect. I am with my hon. friends the Progressives heart and hand in the determination to hold what we have or what has been left for us to redeem in the pawnshop of the country. One hon. gentleman, speaking the other day, referred to the railway system as a miserable foundling. It is. It was conceived, I was going to say, in iniquity and born in corruption; it has marasmus of the very worst kind, and whether we can afford it relief or not I do not know. We suffered in this way. Year after year the railway corporations came to this House and received large subsidies which never went into the railways at all, but found their way into the pockets of the profiteers and mandarins who were using the railways as a means of milking not only the Dominion but the provinces as well; using them through the floating of bonds and the borrowing of money upon them. And would you be surprised to hear that for their venture they received a knighthood? Truly Canadians are a long-suffering people.

Well, now, what is to be the result? For some years to come, a decade at least, we shall have to provide $100,000,000 a year to keep up, to put in repair, to equip and operate these railroads and give them a chance to live. When you bring a starved infant to a doctor you are advised that if you want the child to have a chance for life, you will have to feed it. According to our information, and I believe it is correct, that is the condition our railroads are in to-day, and we have to feed them. Take the Canadian Northern; I would ask any man who goes over that road whether he imagines that in its present state it is a going concern? Not a bit of it. It will require improvement, repair, additions, new equipment, and so on. I venture the guess that we will have a deficit brought down close on to $100,000,000 if not more. If we are to maintain the policy of public ownership of railways we must not hesitate to face this condition; we must be prepared to meet it year after year. That is the first thing we have to think of.

In addition to that, we have to provide for the running expenses of the country. At the present time, to pay pensions and the liabilities contracted through the war, we have obligations amounting to $650,000,000 per annum. Our obligations have almost, if not entirely, doubled. The national debt of Canada steadily increased from the time of Confederation down to the beginning of the war, and it now represents a large annual liability which my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) has to provide for in addition to other requirements. Is that a very engaging task for any hon. member when we have on this side, to my left, members clamouring for a lower tariff? Really what they are saying is: We want an abolition of the tariff, but we will be satisfied if you scale it away down. That, of course, would mean a depleted revenue from the tariff. If the Minister can meet their demands and the country's obligations I would like to see him do it. I doubt if there is a single man in this House or in this Parliament who is better qualified to speak on matters of finance than the present Minister of Finance, but I venture to tell him that it is absolutely impossible for him to meet the requirements for carrying on this country unless he maintains the revenue producing element which has entered into the policy of all governments in this country in the past. He may be able to obtain revenue by more taxes, but direct taxation is bad.

Now I come to the question of immigration, and it is a very important one. I am not one of those who are so keen to get immigrants into this country, because having lived in a large city all my life I have seen the evil results of immigration. We must hand-pick our immigrants in the future if we are going to develop. I have had a lot of trouble over this question of immigration, because I have a lot of Jews in my riding. However, to keep to the point, a man coming into this country who knows nothing about farming will make all sorts of promises to get into the country, and may say he is going on the land, but unless he has had experience in farming he ought not to be admitted as a farmer. In my judgment, we do not want immigrants who are going to infest our cities. How can we expect an inexperienced man to succeed as a farmer in the West, where, as the former member for Red Deer used to tell us, the climate is so rigorous as to make that country a close cousin of the North Pole. He must be a sturdy immigrant to succeed in farming in our western country, and unless he is an experienced man with a great deal of energy and perseverance, after a while he will drift into the cities, walk around for some weeks looking for a job, and perhaps get work in some factory that he is not very well fitted for. All the time he runs great danger of joining the ranks of the unemployed, which means that he will have to be maintained and fed, and that is what we in the cities particularly do not want. Let us help to keep the immigrants on the land. It is the duty of this country and of this Government to offer every reasonable assistance to the immigrant to enable him to stay on the land and furnish him with the necessary opportunities that others have had who have preceded him and succeeded in farming. I would not be too keen to encourage even the artisan to come to Canada, but would rather encourage and lay the emphasis upon those who have had experience and training in the real science and practical art of agriculture.

Coming now to the question of the tariff, I am an adequate protectionist. What does that mean? It means that I am in favour of a tariff that is adequate to protect the growing industries that are springing up in this country. It is a tariff that must have the element of protection in it. One hon. gentleman to my left asked how the tariff could possibly help the farmer. Perhaps I may be permitted to answer that question. In the province of Ontario, farming is very different from what it is in the Prairie provinces, where the farmers have advantages which our Ontario farmers never had but would be delighted to have. The farmers in this province have not one-quarter of the advantages enjoyed by the farmers of the West.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. SHEARD: Perhaps you think I know nothing about it. I want to tell my hon. friends that I have worked on a farm in Ontario, and when we grew wheat we had to start in and cross-plough from the spring of the year till the next fall, and then start in again and break the ground and fallow it and rest it before we could get a crop of wheat, and then only a poor one. All that meant money. I was talking to a farmer from Manitoba some time ago, probably an exceptional one, and he told me of the conditions out there. He said, "My land is exceptionally good, I grant you. I have cropped wheat from my land continuously for thirty years, I have as good a crop now as I had when I started, and I do not fertilize at all." What Ontario farmer can say that? In Ontario the farmer has to alternate his crops, and fertilize continuously, and then he cannot grow wheat as the farmers in the West do. For him protection is his only salvation. Why? Because it builds up the industrial centres in Ontario, of which Toronto is one, and furnishes him with a home market which consumes eighty-five per cent of all he produces. The Ontario farmer has to go into truck farming. That, of course, does not appeal to the farmer on the Prairie provinces, but it is a vital thing to the farmer in Ontario, and I am inclined to agree with the hon. member from British Columbia who said the other day that tariff requirements and tariff preferences are largely a matter of geographical location. They are fundamentally that. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie) told us in his speech the other evening that British Columbia needed protection because it was in close competition with the adjacent states of Washington and Oregon which, in some cases, produced better fruit, and therefore they needed protection to keep that fruit out. Some gentleman said "You should not have gone there" or words to that effect. Well if we followed that argument to its conclusion we might say with equal reason that the gentlemen who went to the Prairie provinces to grow wheat should not have gone there not because it was not good to go, not because the soil was not perhaps the best wheat growing soil in the whole world; but you were too far from the market and you should not have gone so far. The same argument will hold in this case; it is a matter of geographical advantages and requirements; and in this wide Dominion, stretching as it does from the Atlantic to the Pacific we must consider the conditions. It is all very well to talk about free trade in England but the conditions in Canada and the conditions in England are not parallel for a minute. We have a country to the south of us producing precisely what we produce, they are our competitors and we, to a certain extent, are theirs, they are producing grain and foodstuffs on certain parts of their soil that are equal to ours. They have been manufacturing with a great deal more speed and efficiency than we have yet been able to attain and the consequence is that in many instances, in many particular branches of industry, they have exhausted their raw material and they want the Canadian material to carry on their manufacturing. If we permit them to enter they will get our raw material, they will work it up into finished products, they will supply all our large centres, and they will then say "Well, the Canadian has not enough ingenuity to work up his raw material into finished products." You may say "Oh, but we will get the advantage, we will get cheaper goods." Yes, you may, those of you who live on farms of 1200 or 1500 acres in extent where wheat is produced and facilities given to ship it to market; but you must realize there are a large number of workers in the centres of population who are employed and gain their living by manufacturing those things which otherwise would be made in the United States at less cost and shipped in here at a cheaper price because over there owing to smaller overhead charges for manufacturing and the enormous numbers in their home market they can produce at far less cost for the Canadian market than we can do with our comparatively small population of eight millions of people. I can take you down to the lower end of New York city and to Jersey City, and through the state of New Jersey, and I can show you factories which are turning out clothing, ladies garments and various kinds of wearing apparel, which factories would sweep Canada and flood the whole of this Dominion with their surplus stock if it were not for the regulations which prevent the importation of such goods in enormous quantities into the Dominion. The tariff helps to keep these goods out and at the same time serves the good purpose of contributing to the revenue.

Mr. SHEARD: However that may be as you like. The Minister of Justice, I think, has declared what his policy is; he has declared for the Laurier-Fielding tariff. That was a protective tariff and that is the tariff which we in this corner of the House are going to support. While we are with you on the railway policy, on the question of public ownership, and will assist you all we can, we are going to stand for adequate protection, which we will maintain, no matter how you may differ from us in opinion, is necessary and essential to protect industries in the large centres of this Dominion, and we hope we will convert you to our way of thinking.

A good deal has been said about differences of policy. I was somewhat surprised to read a new definition of Liberalism which was made by the Prime Minister in an address given in this city on or about the 13th of March last to the Liberal women of Ottawa. He defined Liberalism as an attitude of mind and heart; and I was wondering if it was possible to transform or change Liberalism as it used to be into this new doctrine, and whether that was henceforth to be its condition.

Some remarks were also made by the Prime Minister as to our being Tories. The leader of the House said that he never attempted to stretch Liberalism so as to embrace Toryism. Well I beg to remind hon. members that there are worse things than Toryism.

Some hon. MEMBERS What are they?

Mr. SHEARD: I want to tell my hon. friend (Mr. Mackenzie King) that if he reads history he will find that all the great efforts that have been made in this country, and a great deal of the prosperity and the progress which Canada has achieved, have been initiated, developed and carried to completion principally by the Liberal-Conservative party; and he can call them Tories if he likes. We are asked to-day to make concessions to the Northwest. Who made the Northwest?

Some hon. MEMBERS: The Tories.

Some hon. MEMBERS: We did.

Mr. SHEARD: I hear some hon. gentleman among the Progressives say "We did." The country was made before my hon. friends located there. It was a great Tory chieftain who initiated the building of the railroad that enabled my hon. friends to get there; they must not forget that the opening up of the West was largely due to Conservative efforts. When it came along to the time of Alexander Mackenzie, and I remember that time—the Dominion was practically on the rocks. Talk about farm produce and farming conditions! Why you could not sell anything on a farm anywhere. Potatoes were hawked from door to door in the city of Toronto for 25 cents a bag, and the vendor placed them in the cellar for that price too. It was the protective policy which resulted in the development of our industries, made possible the utilization and direction of our raw materials and enabled our home market to exist at all, it was that policy which gave confidence to the capitalist who put his money into the development of the manufacturing industries of this Dominion; and following this came the opening of mines and storehouses of treasure which are the astonishment of the world to-day and were never previously dreamed of. There is nothing becoming in the sneer sometimes indulged in on this subject by people who do not know the real, the fundamental and basic conditions on which this nation has been built. Then I want to say still further that it was the same party, in the main, who founded, fostered and developed the British preference as against all other preferences.

Mr. LAPOINTE: That is a new doctrine.

Mr. SHEARD: That is something that is still in existence and will be carried on for a long time to come. We on this side are quite determined to wait and see. I am very keenly interested in the Budget which the Minister of Finance is going to bring down. I might venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that I really believe my hon. friends opposite are somewhat seized of the responsibility of their position because we do not hear so much from them this session; they are very silent, a contrast, as you will recall, Mr. Speaker, to their course last session. Why there was not a single debate at that time but we heard from them at length. For example there was the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Cannon); we were certain to hear a blast or two from him and there were two or three others who were equally voluminous in their utterances and their menaces. Well, they are silent as the tomb. They are confronted to-day with a situation which must have astounded them when they realized their position, and probably they are cudgelling their brains to know what to do. It is our privilege to watch and wait.

I do not believe in long speeches. If a man cannot say all he has to say in thirty minutes, he had better leave the rest of his speech unsaid. May I say in conclusion, that I join with my hon. friends opposite, as I join with the party to my left, to work for the common good of Canada, for the development and prosperity of this Dominion, for the strengthening of the Empire as a commonwealth of nations, of which we form a part. We expect them to do their part and not to cast across the floor of this House intimations—I was going to say insinuations—of a sectional character, as if they were meant to taunt those of us who happen to hold opinions contrary to theirs. Such debates, and such distinguished characteristics of debate, cannot, in my humble judgment, contribute to the harmony and unity of purpose which should prevail in parliament. We hope that the result of our deliberations will be beneficial to all concerned, and I am sure this will be accomplished if we will only endeavour to yield a little, and if my Progressive friends will only realize that they cannot get everything they wish from Parliament. Rome was not built in a day, and it will take time to accomplish results. I hope we will all work for the benefit of the country and the peace and prosperity which we hope to see this Dominion enjoy.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): Mr. Speaker, it has been a great pleasure to me to meet face to face, many of the great men from the East whom I only knew previously by name. I congratulate you, Sir, on the high position to which you have been appointed. I have listened with some interest to lengthy speeches for a great many days during the recent debate. I congratulate the member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) on the splendid address he gave. It was very pleasing to most of us to find a young man holding, and giving expressions to, such high ideals. I have taken note of some of the passages-at-arms across the floor of the House, and truly on both sides it can be said that they did whet their tongues like swords and bend their bows to shoot their arrows, even bitter words. But, sitting here in my place listening, I wondered sometimes what they hoped to gain by it. However, I have obtained some information from these speeches. One thing is certain, that both parties, Liberal and Conservative alike, appear to gain inspiration mostly when they are slinging darts at each other.

I am pleased, Sir, with the fact that the Speech from the Throne deals very largely with those planks in the platform of the Farmers', or Progressive party which are most essential. Particularly does it mention the deplorable state of agriculture as regards markets and prices. That agriculture is in a deplorable state in Western Canada to-day is due to a variety of causes. One of these causes is the drought which has prevailed over very large areas of the Prairie provinces. I believe hail to some extent is responsible for hard times. But the worst feature, Sir, as regards agriculture to-day in Western Canada, and to a great extent in the older provinces as well, is the loss of faith and courage, and the dark outlook as to the future which is facing our people, brought about, not by natural causes, but by the persistent manipulation of legislation in the interests of those who control the manufacture and distribution of all our commodities, and who own and control all the facilities which we need to use in a public way.

There are plenty of evidences to-day that agriculture is in a deplorable state in Western Canada. In support of that statement I point to the fact that some of our rural telephone centrals are being closed at the present time, and some of the municipalities are also closing the day schools for the next six months, because the taxes cannot be collected. Mutual insurance companies are finding a hard time to exist, and some of them have already gone under. In every activity in which we engage at the present time, it is impossible to find a market at a price which leaves anything for the producer. In Saskatchewan, we have determined to follow diversified methods of farming and towards that end we have established a system of co-operative creameries. We are also engaged in the live stock business to an extent that does credit to that young province, but at the present time the markets for the products of the dairy are closed to us on account of high freight rates. The chairman of the Co-operative Creamery Company in Saskatchewan is authority for the statement that New Zealand is landing her butter on the coast of British Columbia cheaper than it can be shipped there from central Saskatchewan. The result is that butter cannot be produced and marketed except at a loss. Live stock cannot be moved under the present freight rates and leave anything for the farmer. Now that the prices of all farm products have fallen, in most cases below pre-war prices, it is only reasonable to expect that some consideration will be immediately shown in the matter of freight rates.

These things have darkened the outlook of the Canadian farmer, but the callousness of the late Government and the Railway Commission—place the blame where you like—will bring calamity, sudden and final, to the agricultural interests in Western Canada, unless something is immediately done to relieve the situation. The failure of the Railway Commission to lower the rates on grain before the last crop was moved, as we expected it would, has resulted in filching something like $18,000,000 from this already impoverished industry. We are still paying about $92 per car more than we should to get our wheat to Fort William. The effort to make the railways pay their way by repeatedly increasing the freight rates is only another case of killing the goose that lays the golden egg; it is curtailing production and providing less and less for the railways to earn. Surely it is only common sense to realize that freight rates in any country cannot be made higher than will permit commerce to move freely. Speaking of railways, I claim there is only one policy to be followed if economies are to be effected, and that is a real system of consolidation of all government railways under one management and control.

I was very much struck with the speeches of two hon. members from the Maritime provinces. The member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) gave a long address relating particularly to the Intercolonial railway, but just what he wanted when he said that he did not want that road linked up with any other Canadian system I hardly know. Does he want that railway as a mere toy? The only grievance that I could find in his complaint was that the joy of free riding had been interfered with since the railway had been linked up with the Canadian system. Undoubtedly consolidation would be a benefit to all concerned in that there would be control in a centralized buying of rolling stock, motive power, rails and equipment of all kinds. There must also be union terminals and through traffic rates established before the railways can be economically run. At present the West provides an example in this respect of unified management and control. The Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern, west of Winnipeg, have been incorporated into one system, and the whole of the West is reaping the benefit in service; and I can assure the House that we are proud of the railways in Western Canada, and the improvement that has been effected in the service since this was brought about, to say nothing of the economies.

Now, to enable the agriculturists to go on the land this spring with some degree of hope, faith, and courage, immediate and drastic measures are needed, particularly with regard to transportation and the marketing of our products. This is surely needed in the interests of the country as a whole, if the evil of the unemployment situation and trade depression is ever to be overcome. When you consider the fact that the western crop provides nearly 30 per cent of the value of all our exports, it is obvious that there is nothing that will restore confidence at one stroke, so to speak, so much as the re-establishment of the Wheat Board. It was a short-sighted policy on the part of the late government to discontinue this method of marketing our grain, just when the farmers of Western Canada began to have some faith in the work it was doing. It should have been continued at least during the whole of the reconstruction period, which evidently has not yet passed.

Since our coming to Ottawa it has cheered our hearts somewhat to find that the Government has taken note of the fact that our markets for some years past have been restricted; and we are glad that they are now setting themselves the task of obtaining freer trade relations with other countries, particularly the United States. Had I taken part in the flag-waving campaign of deception that was carried on in 1911, I should not be found as one of the number sitting under that banner to-day, knowing the awful consequences that have ensued.

Speaking of the tariff in general, it is in this system of trade prevention that we find the cause of the great loss in rural population in western Canada, particularly in the older provinces. We find in it, also, the reason for the stagnation of development in the three prairie provinces and the older provinces as well. We see in this system of trade penalties the basis of that perfect organization in the Dominion to-day that controls all manufacturing and the distribution of every commodity which the workers on the land need to use. In the most stable part of Ontario there has been a large loss of rural population. Up to 1911 the rural population of Ontario, perhaps the banner province of the Dominion, had lost some 111,620 souls. I can point to some counties in that province to-day where great losses have occurred. For instance, the township of East Zorra in Oxford County has closed, during the last twenty years, 13 per cent of its farm homes, and Ashville, in Huron county, which I am informed is the finest agricultural township in Ontario, has closed 15 per cent of the farm homes during the same period. Surely there is a cause for all this.

While the Liberal government in years gone by was tardy in dealing with this great system of privilege, which robs the workers of their earnings and concentrates, under the control of the few, the wealth that is created, we are looking forward now with hope to something practical being done, and we trust that before the session comes to a close the Government will take itself seriously and try to implement the promises and pledges it gave in its platform of 1896, 1910-1911, again in the convention of 1919, and the promises it made during the last campaign that brought it into power. When the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) spoke the other day he said he believed in the Laurier-Fielding tariff. I wondered just what he meant. It seems to me there are two phases to that tariff: one, as professed in their platforms and on the hustings during the campaign; the other, what they have actually put into practice. But at this time it is surely plain to all that the old national policy has had a fair trial and that after forty-three years of its operation under the most favourable circumstances conceivable it has brought about conditions that at the present time amount almost to a calamity. This old national policy, which my hon. friends to the right so strenuously uphold, was advocated for the purpose of looking after the working man. He was to have good wages, or as it was expressed, "a full dinner pail," and our natural resources were to be developed. What condition do we find to-day? That policy is responsible for the worst unemployment situation this country has ever faced, and has brought about the very calamities that it was intended to avert. It is no use saying that the war is responsible; the war simply put off the trouble for a time. Unemployment is rife from one end of the Dominion to the other, and, according to my hon. friend from Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Woodsworth), while a quarter of a million men are idle, our manufacturers are importing raw material from any and every country where they can obtain it the cheapest, although our own mines and forests abound with the very raw material needed. What is the matter? I have it on the authority of the late president of the Massey-Harris Company that that company is dependent on foreign countries for seventy per cent of its raw materials. Our agricultural implement companies to-day import large quantities of Georgia pine for the tongues of their binders, drills, mowing machines, and other implements, while our forests abound with timber suitable for that purpose. The old national policy is a failure.

Mr. HARRIS: Will the hon. member kindly tell us where the connection comes in between the national policy and the bringing of Georgia pine into this country to make tongues for binders and other agricultural implements?

Mr. EVANS: I see the connection, Sir, in that the old national policy was advocated for the very reason that it was going to develop our natural resources. Those resources are still undeveloped, and our manufacturers are seeking their raw materials in foreign lands to-day.

[Mr. Evans.]

I find on page 157 of the Report of the Dominions' Royal Commission that although Canada supplies over eighty-five per cent of the world's nickel, yet when that commission went through the Dominion only a short time ago there was not one nickel refinery in this country. I believe that under the pressure of war necessity some small refining plants have been established since then. I repeat, the old national policy has been a failure in that it has failed to do what it was advocated to do.

If trade had been carried on on a freer basis with the great country to the south of us, and with the rest of the world as well, we would to-day have a contented and virile population twice as large as we have now. Hon. members to my right have held up to us the benefits of the home market. I submit that a contented population upon the prairies to-day and throughout the other provinces would provide our manufacturers with a home market which their restrictive policy has destroyed. What folly it is to talk of a home market for the grain of Western Canada, three-quarters of which must be sold in foreign countries. That old theory has been exploded, and when it is put forth now we cannot treat it any more seriously than a joke. Freer trade relations will ensure wider markets. But then I am met with the question: What will you do for revenue, where is it to come from?

On the motion of Mr. Evans the debate was adjourned.

On the motion of Mr. Fielding the House adjourned at eleven p.m.

Wednesday, March 22, 1922

The House met at three o'clock.

PRATT vs. DELPHINE

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. JOSEPH ARCHAMBAULT (Chambly and Vercheres): Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the Government to a despatch which appeared in the Montreal Gazette of yesterday, under this caption:

Suit for £8,000 will be pressed.

Revelations interesting to Canadians expected in Pratt vs. Delphine action.

The despatch proceeds:

Details of great interest to Canadians promise to be ventilated when the case comes for trial. It will be remembered that in another action indirectly connected with this one, but in which Col. Delphine was the plaintiff, it was shown that he had agreed to accept a commission on frozen meat contracts secured while he was associated with the staff of the Canadian mission in London.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is probably aware that it is against the rules of the House to read newspaper extracts before the Orders of the Day are called. He should put his question on the Order paper, or summarize its purport.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but it was in order to put my question that I was reading the despatch. The despatch concludes, that this case might be of interest because it might show—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: —it might show that one of the Canadian mission in London, Col. Pratt, had a commission on the $25,000,000 trade credit extended to Greece by the late Government.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would ask the hon. member to put his question on the order paper as being more in accordance with the rules of the House.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Robb) whether he has been informed of that despatch, and if he intends to investigate it.

Hon. J. A. ROBB (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, until my attention was directed to the despatch by the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres, I had no knowledge of the alleged commission. The matter will be investigated.

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. McMurray for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Tuesday, March 21.

Mr. JOHN EVANS (Saskatoon): (Resuming) Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the tariff we are always confronted with the question: If we have freer trade relations with other countries where is the revenue to come from? This question is always raised by those who desire a tariff high enough to prohibit the entry of any goods on which duty may be collected. One hon. member to my right said last night that the tariff was needed to protect Canada against the influx of American goods from the factories of New York and Massachusetts, as well as to provide revenue. I wonder how he expected to collect revenue on goods prohibited from entering this country! But that is about the kind of reasoning and logic that we have become accustomed to from those who favour a trade restriction policy. I, on my part, may well ask: Where are the earnings of our people now going? Taking my figures from trade reports in the Canadian Year Book, I find that the average production of manufactured goods for the five years from 1910 to 1914 inclusive—this was before the war and when trade conditions were normal—amounted to $1,400,000,000; the average consumption at home during that time was $1,350,000,000. On the average, there was exported $50,000,000 worth each year. That is, twenty-seven times as much manufactured products were consumed at home as were exported. So the situation, so far as the Canadian consumer is concerned, stands thus: The tax that went into the federal treasury was on the average $92,000,000 for those five years; while the total tax due to the tariff on Canadian manufactures amounted to $497,000,000—$405,000,000 of which went into the pockets of the protected interests. The amount we are now getting in revenue from the tariff is only a small portion of our yearly requirements; this year, I believe, it will amount to only about one-fifth.

Now, some manufacturers protest that the tariff does not bring about higher prices to the consumer. Obviously, in that case, the tariff does not protect, and they will not suffer from its removal. But, take one industry alone for one year before the war, when, of course, conditions were normal. I find that in the boot and shoe industry we paid because of the tariff over $3,065,000 in excess of the total wages and salaries received by all those employed in that industry. If we were, then, to consider the interests of the country it would have paid the people to scrap every boot and shoe factory, hand over to the workers their full wages, and pay a direct subsidy to the Government of $3,065,000 instead of the paltry half million which went into the treasury from that industry in that year. Or, to be more explicit: We paid that year on boots and shoes alone, because of the duty, $10,763,890.61; the customs duty amounted to $585,996; the enhancement in price to the Canadian consumer was $10,177,893.90; the wages and salaries paid to all those employed in that industry in that year amounted to $7,698,333, being less by $3,065,557 than what the manufacturers received owing to the tariff. And further, the tariff, we were told, was needed to maintain higher standards of living among the workers of the land. If you divide $7,698,000 among 17,227 employees, you get an average of $446 for the year, or of $1.46 for the day. I think you will agree with me that in a country where the price of every article of food and clothing is enhanced by the tariff, $446 a year will not permit a worker's family to live under very comfortable conditions; nor would it do so even in pre-war days. But we must not forget that this average of $1.46 per day really does not indicate the average amount received by the workingmen, because the salaries of higher-paid officials is included in that calculation.

After all, Sir, I am not sure that the tariff as it stands to-day is the greatest economic evil militating against the workers of this land. But it is the basis or foundation upon which the structure of privilege is built. The hon. member for Yale (Mr. MacKelvie) spoke of the Anti-Dumping Act as being the saviour of some Canadian industries. That act, which was passed in 1904, closed up the last gap of liberty for the consumers of this land; it put a lever in the hands of the protected manufacturers which they have used fully to their own advantage. As a specific instance, I want to point out that the United Grain Growers Company, to whom no manufacturing concern in Canada would sell for co-operative distribution, were forced to seek their supplies from independent companies in the United States. But those supplies were brought into Canada under the dumping penalties of this Act. The invoice prices of the goods were disputed, though the goods were purchased in the regular way; and on the implements which were imported the company paid from 52 to 68 per cent of the total cost by way of duty. In 1916 the price paid by this organization for a gang plough was $87, but the customs appraiser valued it at $103.79. The regular tariff rate then was 27½ per cent. The ad valorem duty, including war tax, on $103.79 amounted to $28.60, and the dumping duty was $16.79, or a total of $45.39, equal to 52 per cent ad valorem on the purchase price, although the regular tariff rate was 27½ per cent. I think it is plain to us all that in many instances the Canadian consumer is forced to submit not only to the imposition of rates as shown in the tariff schedules of to-day, but to the addition of arbitrary rates as well.

Now, I have before me an article from that old champion of liberty, the Montreal Witness, setting forth an incident which occurred some time ago in the city of Montreal. The protected milling combine of Canada put up its prices to such an extent that the bakers had either to increase the price of bread or to seek their flour elsewhere. They took the latter course; they sought their flour in the United States, and after paying the duty on it and the heavier freight rate, were able to maintain the usual price for bread. And then what took place? They were brought under the penalties of this Anti-Dumping Act, and the consumers of that city were handed over to the tender mercies of the protected combine. As I have said, the act closed up the last gap of liberty that had been left open to the consumers of Canada.

We in the West have been trying in every possible way to lower the cost of production on our farms so that agriculture may live, but we have been met at every point. We have been thwarted in every way by the ramifications of the great O.B.U.—One Big Union—which, because of the protective tariff inaugurated in 1879, is now able to control the distribution of every commodity in the land. In fact, Sir, the threat was made some time ago that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, which was described as a young athlete not knowing its own strength, was able at one blow to close every industry in the land, and in a short time to bring millions of workers to the verge of starvation.

I wish now to return to the railway question in order to show, as I have already in some measure tried to do, how this system of privilege is the cause of most of the trouble in our national problems of to-day. Under the bounty legislation of 1897-99, plants for the manufacture of steel rails were installed at Sydney, Cape Breton, and Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario. Both these companies were of American promotion. In 1900 an amendment to the Railway Act was made providing that equipment made in Canada had to be used, by all railways subsidized by the government. This measure was opposed at the time even by the Conservative party, particularly by Sir Charles Tupper, whose name, I believe, is still reverenced by that party. He opposed it on the ground that it was contrary to freedom, but the measure was adopted on July 12, 1900. Although it was 1904 before either of these companies produced any rails, a contract was entered into with the Sault Ste. Marie Company just before the election of 1900 for the delivery of 25,000 tons of rails yearly to the Intercolonial Railway. Neither the government, nor the opposition made known to the public this contract, and not until the new parliament met in the following April were the contract audits terms made public. It then became known that the price of these rails was $8 a ton above the price in England and the United States. The actual figure was $32, with a bounty of $7 added, which made $39 a ton. The world's price for rails at that time was $24 per ton delivered. Yet this kind of thing was defended by the government of that day, on the ground of the national policy. Then in 1903 an act was passed giving the government power to impose by Order in Council a duty of $7 per ton on rails, and this duty came into effect on August 12 of that year. We sometimes wonder why our railways do not pay their way, but when they are capitalized according to the cost of construction in this way, it is not so much to be wondered at. When we built the government section of the National Transcontinental we paid $32 per ton to the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, with a further bounty of $7 per ton, making $39 per ton for the steel rails that we used on that section of the road, and at the same time that company was delivering rails in the southern Punjab for $24. The amount of bounties that these two companies got, particularly between the years 1904 and 1911, amounted to $17,250,000.

Up to 1897 the Liberals, who had long been in power, persistently and vigorously opposed the old national policy in all its features. But democracy in no English-speaking country ever suffered a more disastrous setback than in 1897 when official liberalism capitulated to this new feudalism. Since that time there has been no dividing line between the Liberal and Conservative parties, and there has been no education carried on among the people of this country along the lines of democracy except by the organized farmers of Eastern and Western Canada. That there is no dividing line in principle between the two old parties has been confirmed in the House during this debate when hon. members of both parties have declared that they still adhere to the Laurier-Fielding tariff. To-day the Progressive party is the only body in this House representing true democracy in Canada as it affects the people. While there was only a small number of this party in the last Parliament we are now a unit of no mean proportions, and if the Laurier-Fielding tariff is maintained for another four years I venture to predict that we shall come back in still greater numbers. The Progressive party is not looking for any privileges. All we ask is a square deal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EVANS: Some hon. gentlemen to my right seem to doubt that. I repeat, we are not seeking any privileges, that all we ask is a square deal. You cannot protect the farmer. My question to the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Sheard) last night is still unanswered, and it is as incapable of being answered as it was seventeen years ago, when Sir Richard Cartwright asked it in the House. We seek for ourselves only what we desire for every one else, and that is liberty, but under the old national policy in all its ramifications as we know it to-day the people of Canada have no liberty. If we had complete free trade with the whole world so that we were free to buy and sell where we chose, we would still have no privilege, because the same opportunity would be open to all. I repeat, we are not asking for any privileges, but only for a square deal. The evil day on the farms —and I can speak more for Western Canada than for any other part—has been postponed thus long only by the industry of our people and the fertility of our soil, which we have exploited to satisfy the greed of those who have the privilege of absorbing our earnings. Now the time has come when we can no longer pay monopolistic prices for our commodities and sell our products at prices to compete against the product of the cheap labour of Europe and Asia.

Perhaps the worst feature of the agricultural situation to-day is the effort of the returned soldier to make good under conditions which are driving hundreds of experienced farmers off the land. How can we expect our boys who have been to Europe and faced death to preserve the liberty of this nation, to come back and be satisfied on farms in this country under such conditions of bondage? I say "bondage," and I am using the word in exactly the same sense that Sir Wilfrid Laurier used it in 1893, when he declared that protection was bondage, and he illustrated his meaning by saying it was bondage just as slavery was bondage in the United States. Many of these boys are to-day walking off their farms in despair, and their last state is worse than their first. I say to this House that when these boys fail to make good, it is we who are responsible, and we are in duty bound to see them settled in some way so that their living is assured. No question is settled until it is settled right, and we may as well set ourselves now to solve in a practical way this great twentieth century problem of equity of distribution. It is justice, not privilege that will make this a prosperous country.

Mr. EMMANUEL D'ANJOU (Rimouski) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to join with the hon. members who have preceded me in this debate in extending to you my most respectful and at the same time most sincere congratulations on your election to the eminent and important post of Speaker of this House. Your remarkable talents, your long parliamentary experience, the noted services that you have rendered to your country designate you plainly for the high post of honour and responsibility that you at present fill with such dignity and nobility and I feel convinced that you will continue in your new duties to do honour not only to your race and your province but to the whole of Canada.

I am also happy to congratulate the mover and seconder of the motion to the Address for the excellent speeches they made. The speech of the hon. member for Westmount-Saint Henri (Mr. Mercier) pleased me the more, because in addition to being eloquent it was given in the French language. Ever since I have had the honour of occupying a seat in this House I have taunted the late government for ignoring the rights of the French language in this Parliament, dispensing as they did with a member to second, in the French language, the motion for an address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. I also rise at present to offer the Government, whose eminent leader is the Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, my most sincere congratulations, not only on my behalf, but also in the name of the French race and that of the province of Quebec for having acknowledged that the French language has a right to be heard in Parliament. It may be said that it is a hobby of mine to insist at each session, in order that the rights of the French language be so recognized. It is of little consequence what may be said, I hold that I have accomplished my duty towards myself, my county, my race and towards my province, each time I register a protest. I have been sent here to represent the electors of Rimouski and those of all Canada, and when I rise in this House I always believe that I am fulfilling a duty and whatever certain members of this House may think or say, is of little importance to me.

Since the sixth of last December, Canada has secured at last a constitutional government elected by the people and for the people. I am confident that this Government, whose distinguished leader is the one who was found worthy amongst all to wear Sir Wilfrid Laurier's mantle, will follow the policy that Laurier preached all his life, a policy which has given between 1896 and 1911, an era of prosperity, peace and happiness unknown until then in Canada. I feel that not only the rights of the French language will be shown deference within these parliamentary walls but that in all spheres, in all the departments and in all things which relate to the administration of public affairs, the French language will maintain its rights; and it affords me pleasure, Mr. Speaker, to particularly congratulate you in having given the example yourself in repeating "adopté" after carried; and moreover for having been so thoughtful in having a bilingual calendar placed on the table of the House of Commons. The rights of the French language are in safe hands, that we all know; your patriotism is well known, so is your love for your race and that of your mother tongue and I feel assured that the French language will more and more recover its rights in this Parliament.

On the sixth of December last the province of Quebec did not vote against the late government with the idea of revenge; but united itself to all provinces of the Dominion to sweep from power an autocratic government, which from 1911 to 1917 had governed the country in a most despotic way, and the province of Quebec, as well as all the other provinces of Canada, felt that it was more than time to sweep this government from power, so as to place at the head of the destinies of Canada, a government which would know how to respect the opinions of every one, a government which, whatever be our faith and language, would recognize that every one in this country has equal rights and would treat us all as Canadians. If I have placed my trust in the present Prime Minister, it is because he has always given proof that he was a true Canadian. I express the hope that he will continue to be a Canadian, that he will show himself an anti-Imperialist so as to contrast with the Prime Minister who preceded him; that he will remember first of all that our common country is Canada and not England.

I was glad to learn that the Government had decided to economize and to do so specially where it was most needed. We hear that the budget of the Militia Department is to be reduced. So much the better, for if all military expenditure could be wiped out we would be the better off. I trust the Government will continue in this right path. I also notice with pleasure in the Speech from the Throne, that the Government has also decided to make special provision for the farming class. I have the honour of representing in this Parliament an essentially agricultural county—and I am proud of it—each time the Government will promote the interests of the farming classes, it will necessarily be doing something for the county of Rimouski, and invariably when doing so shall receive my hearty approval; however, if on the one hand it reduces the militia expenditure, I hope it will not reduce the budget of agriculture, but on the contrary will increase it if possible.

Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of prolonging this debate much longer, my aim for the present, is not precisely to discuss the Speech from the Throne, but specially to point out that I was quite consistent when I blamed the late government for ignoring the rights of the French language. This is the reason why I thought it my duty to congratulate the present Government because it had acknowledged that the French language had undisputed right to be heard in the Council of the Nation.

Mr. JOSEPH HENRY HARRIS (East York): Mr. Speaker, I rise with a good deal of trepidation to address the House for the first time. Should I err in not observing parliamentary traditions I entreat your indulgence, Sir, and also the indulgence of hon. members generally.

The Speech from the Throne refers to a great number of questions which doubtless are of great concern to the people of this Dominion; but these references are vague in their nature and have not as yet been amplified in the speeches which up to date have been made by Ministerial supporters. The hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) did, perhaps, enter to a certain extent upon an exposition of Liberal and Progressive thought, as the Prime Minister is wont to say; but I fail to see where my hon. friend's line of Liberal and Progressive thought harmonizes with some of the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond). The hon. member for Westmount-St. Henri (Mr. Mercier) spoke in a similar strain to that of the hon. member for Brantford when he said "We Liberals know the part which industries, large or small, play in the activity and the future of this country." When we compare such remarks as these with the utterances of the hon. member for North Winnipeg in favour of a reduction of the duties on certain commodities, I fail to see that the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite can be regarded as in any way stable. Such utterances recall some of the campaign literature issued during the late election by my hon. friends, which we are now asked "not to take too seriously." Under the circumstances we on this side await with considerable interest the trade policy which is shortly to be announced by the Minister of Finance.

In the absence of the Prime Minister I refrain from making any remarks which might better be said when he is present; but I cannot allow to pass unchallenged his statement, to be found on page 53 of unrevised Hansard, to the effect that the Government will truly represent all shades of Liberal and Progressive thought. I do not for one minute think, if that were the case, that hon. members to my left, Sir, would pay their own railroad fares to the city of Saskatoon and there debate for ten hours the question of whether or not they should be taken into the ministry as pure Liberals. I do not think any such understanding would have caused them to hold the prolonged conference referred to; I am rather inclined to accept the statement of my hon. friend from Marquette (Mr. Crerar) who has declared that he did not understand the approaches made to the Progressives in that light.

The ground with respect to immigration has been pretty well covered, from all angles, during the present debate; but to my mind, Sir, the great essential with regard to immigration to Canada has been entirely overlooked. That essential, which is an important one, is this: it is not only right and proper that the immigrants who come to Canada from European countries should have a clear bill of health, but we should require the further condition that they possess a clear conception of British institutions and of British ideals; and it should be made known to them that they must, to the fullest extent, abide by our Canadian law and our Canadian statutes. There are in the country at the present time a large number of Europeans —and a large number more are wanting to come to our shores at the present time —who will not, if they can avoid it, follow agricultural pursuits. I think that during this session legislation should be brought down to take care of this particular class of immigration. We have in this country a large number of labouring Canadian men and women. We have also these European labourers. The Europeans, Sir, as you know, and as hon. members know, can live on a piece of rye bread and perhaps a red pepper or Spanish onion each day. Our Canadian men and women live more respectably and pay municipal, and perhaps provincial and federal taxes. It would be well if by legislation, an income tax of some description were imposed on immigrants who are wont to live in European fashion, and this tax should be commensurate with the municipal taxes paid by our Canadian labouring men and women. I would place the onus of collecting this income tax on the industries who employ such labour.

A great deal has been said by the hon. gentlemen to my left with regard to the railroad policy of this country, and the policy we ought to pursue. I cannot see where there has been anything very constructive in their remarks up to the present moment. If hon. gentlemen opposite are going to be guided in their administration by the Progressive thought which has been expressed in this House, I submit, they have an abundance of such thought in hand already to guide them. But in reviewing the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Brandon (Mr. Forke) and the hon. gentleman from King's county P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes) and also the remarks of the hon. gentleman from Saskatoon (Mr. Evans), I cannot see where the suggestions are going to help in any way to solve the railway problem. They said—and I am sorry to say that there was considerable applause in this House when they said it—that the natural trend of trade in this country should be north and south. It is to be regretted if the minds of this House are to revert to the generation of Goldwin Smith; if we cannot see within our fair country the possibility of a nation here, and a nation within the British Empire. Having in mind, Sir, that the solution of our railway problem is to get tonnage for our railways, I couple with that the suggestion that we should use our endeavours as far as possible to make trade flow, not north and south, but east and west across this continent. The hon. gentleman from North Winnipeg (Mr. McMurray) quoted Kipling, which intimated in a short space of time there would be no East or West. If my hon. friend to the left and my hon. friend from King's county have their way as to how the trade channels shall go in this country, I venture the opinion that within another generation we shall have an East and we shall have a West in this fair Dominion of ours, and what is more, Sir, I prophesy that the prophecy of the ex-President of the United States in 1911, as to what would happen to us would be fulfilled. That suggestion I do not need to more than mention on the floor of this House. It was that we would be an adjunct to the United States. There is only one policy for this country, and that is unity of the East and the West. If we want to become one great nation within the British Empire, we must keep our freightage going across this continent, in order that the lines of steel might have something to carry. That might solve the railway problem.

We have in this country a number of Canadians who do not get their living from the top six inches of the soil. In this connection, I will make a personal allusion; I am more or less of a farmer. I was raised on a farm, and the biggest part of my life has been spent on the farm. I know what it is to follow the lonely furrow. But I recognize also that we have in this fair dominion of ours 700,000 workers who are sustaining perhaps 2,000,000 of people, and I submit their point of view must be taken into consideration, as well as the point of view of the agriculturists.

Mr. KELLNER: Does the hon. gentleman recognize the fact that the Labour group is on this side of the House?

Mr. HARRIS: I recognize the Labour group, but which faction of the Labour group is on this side of the House I am not in position to state. There are labour groups and there are labourers.

It is to be regretted, perhaps, that in the course of this debate on the Speech from the Throne a number of perhaps half-true statements have been made. I have in mind more particularly a reference made in the late hours last evening to a tendency on the part of some of our manufacturing institutions to buy all the raw material that they possibly can in other countries. Referring to page 314 of unrevised Hansard I find the following statement:

> Our agricultural implement companies today import large quantities of Georgia pine for the tongues of their binders, drills, mowing machines, and other implements, while our forests abound with timber suitable for that purpose. The old national policy is a failure.

I cannot see the connection. The hon. gentleman also intimated that 75 per cent of the raw material used by the firm of Massey-Harris comes from other countries, this statement being in the same paragraph as the statement with regard to lumber. I take issue with him. I hold no brief from the Massey-Harris Company; I do not know any of their executive or any of their officers, I will admit I have bought binders, mowing machines and rakes from them in the past, but other than that I have had absolutely no connectioin with them. I submit for the consideration of the hon. gentleman from Saskatoon (Mr. Evans) the following:

> At least 75 per cent of the lumber used by the Massey Harris Company is Canadian material, and our policy absolutely is to purchase everything possible in Canada, and more particularly Canadian lumber, whenever possible.

I was very much taken with the remarks made by the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin) when he said that the best policy for Canada to pursue was a policy which would make for unity. I agree with that statement in its entirety, and if we are to have unity in this country, I say there is room for expression of all shades of thought, but we must not strive to serve simply our own provinces.

I would suggest that, in order to pursue an immigration policy which will make Canadians out of those who come to our shores, we must first adopt a railway policy which will make trade channels run across the continent, so that, in the course of time, eastern thought and western thought may get more closely together. As a result of this we shall have a more united country. We must have a trade policy that will provide all classes of work for the minds and hands of all classes of people to do.

Mr. HAROLD PUTNAM (Colchester): Mr. Speaker, without undue egotism, perhaps I may lay claim to the full average timidity which comes to us who for the first time essay to address this very august chamber. If I violate any of the standards of discussion, I crave in advance that you will not hold it against me as mortal sin, because it will not be deliberate. I join in the general pleasure at your elevation, Mr. Speaker. In honouring you, we have greatly honoured ourselves. Apart from this incident, your public career has long since stood you forth as an outstanding national figure; and a part of your effort and, indeed, not a trivial part, for I have carefully and constantly read the speeches you have delivered in this House, has been devoted to the promotion of a real spirit of fraternity as between the different provinces of this Dominion. Elementary though it may seem to have sometimes to say so, that, of course, is the corner stone which the Fathers of Confederation have predicated upon which to build their great structure, knowing too well that it could subsist upon no other. Mr. Speaker, may I say something with a personal touch now that you are elevated to your high position as First Commoner? For your patriotism and loyalty you have been penalized by the visitation of the messenger of sorrow. It is a sorrow which is softened and subdued by the recollection of duty magnificently performed; and in common with thousands of other parents in this Dominion in every walk of life, some of them in this House, you have the experience that, when you think of those who, in the glory of their youth have entered into untroubled rest, the mind is prone to wander and to linger amongst the flowers of Flanders. Honour to them! Eternal honour to their names!

May I speak just one word of my admiration of the appropriateness of the speeches of an hon. member from the West and another hon. member from the East, who respectively moved and seconded the Address in reply to His Excellency's Speech? These hon. members were setting a standard by which they tried to approximate the advice of the poet, to forget, sometimes, that there is any East or West at all. With you yourself in that Chair, that elevated Chair, and with the honour of a lady member companioning amongst us in these humbler seats, I think we have the circumstances under which there is particular likelihood that these discussions will be carried on with dignity and with a spirit of sweet reasonableness, however animated the debates may sometimes become.

Somewhat careless of the order in which I might touch on a few topics, I want to give my tribute of praise to the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) the leader of the Progressive party, for the excellence of the contribution which he made to this discussion. I am sure, if he will allow me very humbly to say so—perhaps he is not in his seat, but I can say it to his followers who are present—that his presence, so far as I am concerned, is abundantly welcome. That speech of his must 4 p.m. have justified in full measure the expectations of his friends in the qualities of fairness, lucidity and ability which it exhibited; and without discounting, for one moment, the talent, the spirit that inspired his remarks, it is true that he was in a position more favourable than that of those of us in this House who practise a pretty steady allegiance to the old party system, to make a speech absolutely judicial in its tone. Perhaps, that is one way of saying that the party system has its defects, as undoubtedly it has; but it is, perhaps, a platitude on my part to say that I consider, although I will not develop this argument for many moments now, that the benefits very greatly outweigh the defects. Those of us who adhere, in the main, to the party system, and who belong to one or other of the two historic parties, will find it difficult to obey what seemed like the extremely good advice of the hon. leader of the Progressives, that we should get right down to business, because we conceive that there is a certain duty attaching to us to tell the country or the public of the good record or the good works that we perceive in our own side and of the defects that we think we perceive in the other side, a privilege which, of course, is entirely mutual. In this way, we carry forward these debates and if our fires sometimes burn a little too fiercely, or if our bias carries us a little too far, the great public will make proper allowance for that and will render the verdicts which, after all, are nothing less than steps in our national life. Thus both the House and the country expect, and even await, something of the discussion which we have been having, of which the speeches of the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition were virile examples.

After all I wonder if we cannot detect in the attitude of the Progressives some evidence of that party spirit against which they do not altogether hold up the finger of scorn. In all friendliness I would remind the hon. leader of the Progressive party that his followers did not obey with any slavish alacrity his suggestion that we should immediately "get down to business;" on the contrary they have made very valuable contributions to this debate. And we welcome them. It was interesting to hear those hon. members recount their local conditions, even though those conditions were sad and sometimes bespoke profound depression. Out of the welter of opinions expressed we hope, Mr. Speaker, that there will follow a serious study on the part of us all to solve our national problems, keeping always in view the greater good of the greater number.

Now, the hon. leader of the Progressive party, with whom I happen to have a slight but very pleasant personal acquaintance of a couple of years' duration, declared that in so far as this new administration did what he conceived to be right, he would support it. I take that to be, not a platitude, but a reasonable statement made in good faith, and, so far as I am concerned, I reciprocate it; if I find the Progressives adopting an attitude which I believe to be right and feasible I promise now to support them, and although of course I am not the spokesman for the Government, I think it is likely I can say the same on its behalf.

While I listened to the speech of the hon. Prime Minister—who, I regret, is now passing through the Valley of the Shadow, —I could not help thinking that to his courageous, courteous and brilliant platform work in the memorable campaign just closed is due in large measure the verdict which we so abundantly obtained. In a qualified way I can congratulate the hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), and I do so very sincerely. I humbly congratulate him upon the good voice in which we have heard him in this discussion, and upon his apparent good health, after coming through a campaign which must have thrown an immense tax upon his powers of endurance. I can congratulate him and his supporters upon having immediately prior to this session, discarded a garment which was clumsy and ill-fitting and which bore the trade brand of "National Liberal and Conservative Party." I hope that it is but the beginning on their part of the complete renunciation of camouflage. I congratulate him on the unanimity and enthusiasm with which his supporters are saying that he will make a splendid leader of the Opposition. But I would not be entirely frank if I should also state that their verdict upon him as leader of the late government was similarly enthusiastic and unanimous. However within recent times, rightly or wrongly, the office of leader of the Opposition has been given judicial notice in this House. It is one of the most important offices in our parliamentary institutions. Therefore we patriotically hope that our Conservative friends are right in thinking that their leader is going to fill that office so well. When the great Laurier adorned it, he was the same contented patriot, the same happy warrior as when for fifteen years he had led a government whose record is written in letters of fire from one end of the country to the other.

The right hon. leader of the Opposition was gracious enough to say a kind word to all who came to this House for the first time, and I think we all esteemed this graciousness from a man of his prominence; but I am sorry that later he spoiled its effect because as to those of us who were elected against his government he poured out his condemnation, protesting that we were here because we had misrepresented the issues and humbugged the people. I can try to understand the mentality which could produce that right about change in one speech of an hour or so in length, but as to the ethical standards involved in that change I confess I am utterly at a loss to understand, because it seems to me that I would be best preserving my self-respect by refraining from congratulating any honourable member whose passage to this House was stolen by the ugly medium of fraud and wholesale misrepresentation. For myself I may say that I am not aware of having deceived the people, and if I wanted to argue it on a lower plane, which is not remote from a testing of the probabilities of the case, I would say there was no need to deceive the people, but that the indictment founded upon pure fact against the late government was so conclusive that no human imagination could strengthen it by resorting to deception or fraud. There were two elements upon which we depended for our victory,—the undisputed facts and the common sense of the people.

Now, there are many problems confronting the country at this time, but without disrespect to any hon. members who have preceded me in this debate, I doubt if we have yet received any real practical suggestions. For instance, the problem of immigration compels our attention. If we get a man to come to this country and become a producer of food, and stay contentedly upon the land, he is at least one of the humble units that will help to solve this problem, with which is so closely interwoven the complex railway problem. Can we in time multiply such a human unit by millions? But it is suggested, perhaps insisted, that the immigration be of a drastic selective character; and there you have another difficulty.

On the question of the tariff—and I say it with no disrespect—it is hard for any hon. member to add anything new. And for my part I do not propose at present to try. It is sufficient to say that in my humble view, if there is one man who can bring this country of ours out of the mire into which it has fallen; who can lay down some policy which will tend to do away with the estrangements between labour and capital; who can produce a budget which will relieve the feeling as between East and West; who will keep before him steadily the motto: "The greatest good for the greatest number"—that man is, of course, the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding). I know, too, that in the way of suggestion we shall have the help of the Progressives. So far as they make suggestions which are well-founded I will keep my promise to support them if I believe they are right. Of course, we have to remember what the apostle Paul said, that "all things may seem possible, but that not all things are expedient."

The railway problem is a tremendous one, Mr. Speaker. It has always been a mystery to me why a government elected primarily and by common consent as a union government to finish the war should insist upon taking over some twenty thousand miles of railway. To ask us now if we believe in it would be about as sensible as asking us if we believed in an invasion of small-pox after every house in the community had been quarantined because of its arrival and because of its ravages. I do think that, if the late Government had taken the people into their confidence by consulting them before embarking on these steps, almost infinite in their magnitude, the people would have hastened to vaccin-ate themselves against the introduction of any such disease in the body politic. But in the happy phrase of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and of the Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), government ownership of railways is upon us, and it will have to be given a fair chance.

I could not regard with levity the suggestion of my able friend the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) that as regards the operation of 1,600 miles of the Canadian Government-owned railway in the United States it was possible to foresee that there might be international entanglements. The ex-Finance Minister (Sir Henry Drayton) told the Progressives the other night—this is merely by way of illustration—that if they had got their reciprocity pact in 1911 it would never have survived until to-day; the Farmer bloc in the United States, he said, would have seen to that. Well, I think he is entirely wrong. If that reciprocity agreement had been adopted it would have proved so popular with the people of both countries that there would be no reasonable fear of its revocation for long years to come. But I was amazed, Mr. Speaker, at the positive dogmatism of the hon. gentleman. The poet said that he "peered into the future, far as human eye could see"; this hon. gentleman goes further. I hope he is the only man in the House who says positively that the reciprocity treaty would not have survived until this day. Why was he so positive, why was his government so positive, then, that to run 1,600 miles of government-owned railway in foreign territory could not possibly lead to any revocation or any entanglements; that it could continue until Gabriel should blow his trump, the crack of doom? But I have an open mind as to that; it is a legal question. Having regard to what befell some of the efforts at legislation on the part of the late administration, particularly by Order in Council, at the hands of the highest courts in the land, I am not disposed to accept their ipse dixit for the legality of the proposal that they put forward with respect to the operation of railway lines in foreign territory. But in any event it is a fair matter for serious consideration. I do not think the other hon. gentleman from Toronto was right, either, when he said that co-ordination of the railways could be completely consummated in a time hardly longer than would be required for one of his own marathon speeches in this House.

The question of the Intercolonial involves a tragedy so far as the people of the Maritime provinces are concerned. Come with me, Mr. Speaker, back to the time when Confederation was in the making. The proposal for maritime union was then under way. Our markets lay with the United States, and those markets were dear to us. I admit that the reciprocal arrangements had been temporarily abrogated. But there was more than a fair chance that the New England states would have been only too willing to deal with our Maritime provinces as an entity, in view of the maritime union which we then were on the verge of adopting. But down come the Fathers of Confederation from farther west, Sir, and they say: "True, you have these American markets; true, reciprocity is a potential factor in your relations with those markets; we see the point at once; but come into the larger union and we will build you a railway through which you will obtain a substitute reciprocity with the great and intelligent provinces of Canada." We took them at their word, Mr. Speaker, and we want the understanding fulfilled in letter as well as in spirit. It was never intended for one moment that that road should pay, or that it should be a commercial road in any sense of the term. Scores of reasons could be advanced for reaching that conclusion, but perhaps it is a short-cut to say that the very fact that it was to be a government-built and government-owned road was proof that the Fathers of Confederation thought it was never intended to pay. I know very well they had no data before them in those early days which would make them think that a government-owned railway would be a paying investment for the country. If you read the speeches of Sir Charles Tupper, that outstanding figure among the Fathers of Confederation, you will see that he said time and again, and developed the argument with his usual brilliance, that there was an infinitude of difficulties in operating a government road economically as compared with its operation by a private company.

But, shades of the Fathers of Confederation! When the Railway Commission met at Halifax some weeks ago, delegates from an indignant populace down there went before them and said: "Please give us rates which will not stifle our traffic, which will not destroy our commercial ambition; please give us reasonable inter-provincial rates as well as reasonable rates for our local traffic," what were they told? "We will not entertain any suggestion in regard to freight rates unless the proposal is based upon purely business considerations." It is true that that statement was somewhat modified the same day by the chairman of the board when he said that, after all, the Railway Commission had nothing to do with rates concerning those lines which belonged to the old Intercolonial Railway. But by some device they do assume control over those rates, which are very trying to business in the Maritime provinces. They are discouraging our people in a marked degree, and accelerating in a considerable measure the exodus to-day of our young men and young women to the United States. My opponent in the last election, the Minister of Public Works in the late Government, saw the blunder, the tragic unfairness of this as the campaign wore on, and in his campaign literature, in a newspaper under date of December 2, 1921, there appears this, "Vote for McCurdy and I.C.R. Headquarters at Moncton." Now, "I.C.R." has for railway men throughout this Dominion only one meaning, and that is is the Intercolonial railway, as it is so named in the very Act of Confederation, and if there is anything in the principle of Cabinet unity, I say that my opponent there pledged the Government of which he was a member to give us, if returned to power, nothing short of what my hon. friend the member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) has asked for, namely, the divorce of the Intercolonial from the Canadian National railway system.

The hon. leader of the Progressive party has asked, and very properly, and in a spirit of perfect fair play, what advantages there would be in such a change. I wish to supplement the answer that was given to him by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald). In the first place, if we get that local management at Moncton, to which the Minister of Public Works in the late Government pledged himself in the last campaign, we shall, of course, expect to have there a manager and staff fully and perfectly acquainted with the local conditions. Now, is that something merely academic, or is it something which is intensely practical? Let me give you an illustration. Only a few weeks ago we had a few periods of snow storms, and I am informed by old men in the service of the Intercolonial whose judgment and whose integrity and carefulness in what they say upon any railway question I would not question for a moment, that because of the lack of knowledge of local conditions on the part of the men who were sent down from Toronto,—and I am saying nothing disrespectful of them personally; the same thing would have happened if men had been sent up from Halifax to take charge of the Toronto lines,—thousands upon thousands of dollars of the people's money was absolutely wasted through bungling in trying to keep the road clear of snow, and a great deal of valuable time was lost to the travelling public. You can see at a glance that on a single-track railway one blunder may effectually tie up the whole system and easily run away with ten or twenty thousand dollars or whatever it may cost to rectify the mistake. Well, in this case the blunder was made, and it was made because we did not have local management by maritime trained men who knew every mile of the conditions and exactly where the snowdrifts assert their most treacherous strength. That is only one example; I could give others.

I also put forward as another advantage in having local management by men who know minutely the local conditions, that the men on this road have been railway men and their fathers and grandfathers before them ever since Confederation, and their sons after them. The road is of the genius of their life. With it they grew up, and I will pit them for competency, so far as their territory is concerned, against railway men in any part of the wide world. They have been used from Confederation down, to have managers over them who knew their business and were perfectly acquainted with the local conditions. They worked under such managers in harmony, and their labour was of high and excellent type. But to-day when we are professing so much solicitude for the welfare of labour, we are insulting these men by putting over them bosses and managers and commissioners, and what not, whose bungling orders, much against their better judgment, they have to obey. I think if William Jennings Bryan were here he would say in this case, "You shall not press down upon the brow of Labour this crown of thorns." The London Times, referring once to an engagement in which some British troops had suffered a reverse because of the incompetency and bungling of the officers in command, said editorially, "Here is a case of lions, led by asses," and when I see the humiliation to which our own men have been subjected by these people who have been imported, and who know nothing of the local conditions, I am vastly tempted to use the same figure of speech.

What other local advantages would there be? Heretofore, as our men grew up with the service, if an office worth while fell vacant, it was their reasonable ambition to secure it as a reward for duty long and faithfully performed; but now, if an office falls vacant,—and I could cite only too sadly instance after instance,—a man is rushed down from Toronto, perhaps an outcast of the defunct Canadian Northern, and he gets that prize which by all the rules of ethics and by all the rules of railroading, to my thinking, in a democratic country, should go to one of our maritime trained men.

Then, if we had a local management who knew the local conditions, surely in the future as in the past the supplies for the road would be fairly apportioned along the line. At the front door of this building only yesterday I was talking to a lumberman who lives in the constituency of my hon. friend from Cumberland, and he told me that when immense quantities of ties were rushed down from Ontario and laid by the side of the road in vast quantities he had asked, "Gentlemen, what price do you pay for such and such? We will supply them right along the road for you as cheaply or cheaper than that. Our lumbermen are idle, their horses are idle, we have had a hard winter. The wood I would select for those ties is very much better than the wood which appears in these Ontario ties." But no, under this Czar-like management in Toronto, we are bereft of the privilege of selling anything to the road except actual perishables and such coal as we can force upon them after a great deal of bickering, and after the most determined stand that we shall have at least partial justice in the Maritime provinces.

As to freight rates we have enjoyed our own rates up to a comparatively recent period in accordance with the spirit and the terms of the Confederation Pact,—such terms as permitted us, with reasonable profit and security, to compete in interprovincial trade, and we also enjoyed reasonable rates in the matter of local delivery of our freights. But those rights have vanished. The new Czars who came into control of the railways linked up our rates with the blanket freight rates that obtain in Ontario, and I say that was done in complete defiance of the spirit of the Confederation pact. What we require is local management by men conversant with local conditions: and we entertain the hope that ere long that Confederation pact will again be given effect to and that we shall once more enjoy these reasonable rates which formerly prevailed. Have we the right, as representing the people of the Maritime provinces, to expect anything less than that? Why, Mr. Speaker, we cannot run an excursion train for any purpose—for pleasure or for any other object—even for a few miles, without having to appeal to the powers at Toronto. The other day a trackman was killed at Halifax under sad circumstances, and application was made to Moncton for a pass to enable the widow to accompany the remains to the burial ground. That application had to go to Toronto, and to the distressing circumstances from which the family naturally suffered was added the suspense of having to wait for transportation. It was not until ten minutes before the train left with the dead man's remains that there was handed to the poor widow, on a rush order through the mail, the pass which enabled her to go to the funeral of her husband. Is there another road in Christendom whose rules would have subjected a woman in that sad position to such needless anxiety? Sir, I believe that if the door of a stove in a little rural railway station down there should be found to be broken, a new one could not be substituted for it until slavish, formal and tedious application had been made to the great powers in Toronto. And further as a colleague sitting near me suggests, the article itself would have to be bought in that city. Why, if we had local management of the Intercolonial railway we would be enabled to obtain the return of the proper equipment of that railway which was so shamelessly looted when the line was absorbed into the great national system in which hon. gentlemen opposite seem to take such remarkable pride.

The conditions which have resulted from the change I have described are arraying the people of Nova Scotia against the people of Ontario, because the latter are being blamed for what has taken place. I am sorry, Sir, that under what I might almost describe as a system of slavery they are trying to impose, the natural result is being produced in the minds of the people of the Maritime provinces, a spirit against the people of Ontario which sometimes borders upon hatred. After all, we people down there are free men and have as much right to stand in an honourable position as any other section of the community before the great Jury of this Nation, and we shall strive to maintain our rights inviolate just as we would expect the people of Ontario to do were there any issue in which they were directly concerned.

The leader of the Opposition said he did not blame the Canadian people for putting them out of office, but he did blame the Liberals who deceived them. That is a pretty fine distinction and one not entirely complimentary to the intelligence of the electors. However, I do not wish to be understood as speaking in any unfriendly way of the people of Ontario. I blame the autocratic government, which the Canadian electors so recently dismissed with scorn, for bringing about the state of affairs complained of in the Maritime provinces. I entertain the hope that the fairminded men of this House—and I have faith in the absolute fairness of many of our Progressive friends—will join in investigating our case from their detached and impartial position, and that if it is ultimately found that our claims are justly founded, we shall see in the future a scrupulous observance of our confederation rights.

I was not present when an hon. member from the far West stated what we in the Maritime provinces wanted was the privilege of free passes. I think it was scarcely worth the hon. member's while to indulge in such a sneer as that. I am not aware that the system of granting passes was ever abused in the Maritime provinces. I know that I was in close touch for a good many years with hon. members who represented those provinces on the Liberal side of the House, and I am sure that they at least never received any excessive favours in that regard. I regret very much to observe in the Toronto Globe a comment in regard to the deputation from the Maritime provinces which waited on the Government a short time ago, to the effect that we wished to have a restoration of the good days when the conductor went through the Intercolonial cars and had very little to do except gather up the passes. I desire to say that the young man who penned that comment did not know what he was talking about and that there never was such a state of affairs as alleged. I resent the statement and assert that the evidence does not support it.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) was severely taken to task by hon. gentlemen opposite because he made an observation which to me seemed to be nothing more than a bit of good-natured philosophy. The Prime Minister's remark was that campaign literature during election time should not be taken too seriously.

An hon. MEMBER: He meant Tory literature.

Mr. PUTNAM: The ex-Minister of Customs (Mr. Baxter) pointed a very menacing finger at the Government benches and said that for his part he would absolutely stand by the campaign literature of the Tory party. The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) read the Prime Minister another lecture in the same direction. Well, I am going to ask my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Baxter) if he supports the campaign literature of his late colleague (Mr. McCurdy) as thus embodied in the Truro campaign literature of his party, "Vote for McCurdy and I.C.R. headquarters at Moncton". When the hon. member arose the other day and registered the unctuous resolve that he would stand for the rights of the Maritime provinces I was disappointed that he did not frankly say that he, with his splendid intellect and great influence, would range himself with us who are trying to bring the Intercolonial back to its former status; but plainly and impliedly he did, he said he would stand by it all. And this is what the former Minister of Public Works circulated by the thousands in the homes of intelligent and honest electors of my county.

Mr. HANSON: What does the hon. gentleman mean by wanting to get back to the old Intercolonial days? Does he want a return to the halcyon days of the late Henry R. Emmerson, when it was a political machine pure and simple?

Mr. LOGAN: It was no such thing.

Mr. PUTNAM: No. The hon. gentleman should not give my words a meaning that they do not reasonably bear. We want the ordinary conditions that should enter into the management of any government road. I think our people are reasonable and intelligent, but as between the days of Mr. Emmerson, and the tyranny and stifling of trade and ambition that obtains now, why give us back those good old days.

I am going to deal with this question of the authenticity of campaign literature just a little further for the benefit of those two hon. ex-ministers of the late government. I have here a circular. I had not intended to refer to it at all, because to do so might smack just a little of ungenerosity to a fallen foe, which, perhaps, is more prevalent in politics than it should be. But, Mr. Speaker, I want to see how sincere those men are—perhaps the word is not too strong—in their references to campaign literature. This letter was circulated broadly throughout my good county of Colchester, bearing date November 26, 1921, and at the top there is a real good portrait of the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works, and at the bottom it is signed with his autographic signature. It was very widely distributed in the closing days of the campaign. Here is one paragraph which I particularly submit to the attention of those hon. gentlemen who preceded me:

> Reports from all parts of Canada indicate that Mr. Meighen's government will undoubtedly be sustained.

But I shall forget all that, and come to something better—

> It remains for you to say on 6th December whether Colchester shall continue to hold the honour and be represented in Parliament by a cabinet minister, or by a member who will sit on the back benches.

That is from a cabinet minister, holding no less a portfolio than that of public works. If it were physically possible that he and I could now be both in this House I would love to discuss with him the good or bad taste of saying that my county would hold the honour of being represented by himself. But I pass that by, and I ask any hon. gentleman in this House if he thinks there is a government having a cabinet minister within the realm of democratic institutions anywhere who would make an appeal like that over his own signature—not to vote for a man for no better reason than that he would be a back-bencher. I submit that to the good democracy of my hon. friends the Progressives, most of whom conducted their campaign with very little hope, or very little sordid ambition, that when they came here they would immediately become cabinet ministers. But, Mr. Speaker, you occupy a plane above the rest of the commoners, by common consent, by the traditions of this country, which obtained in England for hundreds of years before. We have this form of government in Canada. But surely no hon. member is to be subject to any such stigma as this because he is not in the Cabinet. Now, the hon. ex-Minister of Public Works might have found a great many legitimate reasons which he could have advanced, why I should not be elected. However, Mr. Speaker, what do you say to this as an indecent and sordid reason—that I was to be voted against simply because I would be a back-bencher? I am very glad my lot has fallen to these back benches literally and truly, because of all the pre-election statements which the former Minister of Public Works made, that is the only possible one that came true. If the whips had not placed me here, I would have been generous enough to insist upon taking a back bench, to break the hon. gentleman's hoodoo. This is the letter which the hon. ex-Minister of Customs (Mr. Baxter) and the hon. ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) say they will back up, and I leave them to their fallen idols.

Mr. T. G. McBRIDE (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker; as a new member, I will not take up the time of the House with any preliminary remarks, further than to say that I feel honoured to belong to a party which has within its ranks the first lady member who has had the honour of a seat in parliament. Since the opening of Parliament I have taken a keen interest in the different speeches that have been delivered, and one thing I remarked in particular was that the first eight members who spoke in the House had not one word to say in connection with that portion of this country which is to Canada what California is to the United States—British Columbia, the land of sunshine—nor did they have one word to say about the unemployed. They did not have one word to say about the oriental question which is to British Columbia the most vital question that will come before this House at the present session, and last, but not least, they did not have one word to say about the men who stood between us and tyranny, the men who ennobled Canada on many a bloody field, the men who withstood the German onrush and accomplished that which was never surpassed in British history.

I say that they did not have one word to say in connection with the oriental question, which is one of the most important questions to the people of the West. It would seem to me that we in the West know more about this question than do the people of any other section of Canada, because, we have to live amongst, and to associate with, these orientals. The people of British Columbia, with their destiny on the Pacific coast, are more exposed to oriental competition than the people of any other portion of Canada, and the effect of oriental immigration is, at the present time, costing this country millions of dollars. We cannot get away from that fact, and the effect it will have on civilization in the future is something we cannot afford to ignore. Experience has proved that they refuse to adopt our standard of living; the white race will never assimilate with them; nor will it want to do so. Therefore, I say that the two races should not be brought together. Why should our boys and girls have to compete with oriental labour that is contracted for in Yokohama and such places? They should not have to do it. It is true that the Federal Government receives a revenue from the Chinese entering this country; but why should the people of Canada and the country itself not come before revenue? Why should these orientals be brought in to compete with the white people of this country? Mr. Kabura, a very prominent Japanese in Vancouver, made this statement a short time ago:

> It is nothing but the ignorant class that is opposed to the Orientals coming into Canada.

He added:

> Wise men wish to suppress such manifestations of ignorance.

That statement is not correct. Some of our eminent statesmen know that the two races will never assimilate; it was never intended by nature that they should assimilate, and they should never be brought together.

The people on the Pacific coast know what the orientals are, because the orientals who come to Canada, as a general rule, remain on that coast owing to climatic conditions there. People in the East do not have the experience that we have in British Columbia, but you may have it if this condition of affairs continues. Let me point out how the oriental population increases. In 1910, there were 20 Japanese children born in British Columbia —not a very great number—but how many were born in 1920?—657. Last year, the birth increase in the white race was seventeen per thousand; but what was it in the Japanese race?—69 per thousand. Is that increase not sufficient, without allowing any more of those orientals to come to our shores? If this state of affairs continues at the present rate, where shall we find ourselves in another twenty-five years? Every one who has a vision of a greater Canada should be interested in this problem.

5 p.m.

Why should the people on the Pacific coast have to build schools to educate the oriental? They cannot afford to build schools to educate their own children as they would like to do, but they have to build schools to accommodate those orientals who come in. Let us see what a school inspector, a man who is not affected by racial prejudice in any way, says along those lines. This school inspector was asked to give a report, and he said:

> Mingling of Chinese with white boys and girls in the public schools constitutes a growing menace, and it has to be stopped.

He does not say "it should be stopped;" he says: "It has to be stopped," and he knows what he is talking about. He continues:

> There is a danger in these Chinese boys, many of whom cannot even speak English, the coming from their unsanitary quarters and mixing with other children. We know that it is not only a tendency with the Chinese to live in unclean quarters, but a practice. In four public schools in Victoria there are 216 Chinese students.

That is what the taxpayer is up against on the Pacific coast. Why should this state of affairs continue? Why should we, as I have already said, have to provide facilities for teaching orientals, when we cannot educate our children as we would like to do? We must realize what we may expect in the future if this state of affairs is to continue. I am told that last year it cost the taxpayers in Vancouver $60,000 to teach orientals. Oriental immigration should be stopped and stopped at once; it has a tendency to lower not only our standard of moral life, but of labour and of civilization. We cannot get away from these facts. Why should the oriental be allowed to supply cheap labour for the benefit of the few at the expense of the many? Is there any man in this assembly to-day who would like to see his little girl, eight or nine years old, having to sit in a school beside an oriental boy, fifteen or sixteen years of age, and that oriental boy having an opportunity of associating with that child of his? If there be such a person, I would not have very much respect for him, and I do not think there is any one here who would entertain such views. Then, why are the laws of this country such that we have to put up with such conditions on the Pacific coast? This state of affairs should be stopped and stopped at once. Why should we not rather try to have this country a country of homes, homes that would be a source of happiness and contentment, homes which will help to build up this country of ours, for there is no teaching to equal that which the child gets in the home? But we can never have home life as it ought to be, as long as the oriental competes with the labouring men of this country. Why should the laws not be such that they will help to make home life what it ought to be? The Government ought to stop, and stop at once, this oriental immigration.

The question of the returned soldier is one that I prefer not to have very much to say about, because so much has been said and so litle done, that it must become pretty tiring to those men who did so much for Canada and for civilization. I need not tell hon. members what the man who went on the land and purchased a farm with borrowed money is up against; I need not cover the ground which has already been covered. We know that at least 95 per cent of our farmers and stockmen did not make a dollar last year, and personally I do not know a farmer or stockman in the district that I represent who has made a dollar from farming. Under such conditions, how do we expect these men, having to pay interest on borrowed capital and taxes, to make the success in life which they ought to? It is up to the Government to appoint a commission to investigate this matter and then to bring in an act whereby those men will get a fair and square deal. That is all the boys want; they are not asking for charity; they do not want it. They made good overseas, and I have no doubt that they will make good on the land if they are given a square deal. In my opinion, those men who are on the land should get a revaluation of their land, stock and implements, and the inflated values at the time of purchase should be squeezed out, and that done at once. Give the men a chance. As for the men who are receiving pensions, a man who was injured overseas and who came back to Canada, should not be obliged to come before a board every month or two in order that the board may see whether it can do something to lower his pension. He should receive a pension, and it should not be lowered simply because he tried to improve his condition through a little work. There is no doubt in my mind that as these men advance in years their war wounds will cause them still more trouble. Therefore I say a minimum pension should be set and those men should be encouraged to improve their condition. Why should a man be divorced from his wife and family simply because he went overseas to fight for his country? Yet that is exactly what is happening to-day, and I see a report in the press that the Government expects to put more of these men into hospitals. Why not try to provide them with homes of some kind, humble though they be, where they can live together with their wives and families? I see no reason why it should not be done. A scheme has been under consideration for some time to take a portion of an Indian reserve near Kamloops and build cottages on half acre plots, where these men could enjoy the comforts of home life and work on their land when they felt fit to do so. This project has been discussed for the last four or five years, but nothing has been done. Why cannot we carry it out? Let me read to the House a report from Dr. Irving of Kamloops in connection with the proposal. I may say that he is one of the most prominent doctors in the West and is recognized as an authority on the treatment of tuberculosis. He reports:

> For many years we have all found that our apparent cures of T.B. on leaving the sanatorium almost always break down when the men take up the struggle for existence in keen competition with able-bodied fellows.

When these men leave the sanatoriums they have to make a living. They are not supposed to be discharged until they are cured, but it is practically impossible to entirely restore them to health and strength. Dr. Irving proceeds:

> Thus the money spent and work done in their case becomes a loss to the country and to themselves.
>
> In order to overcome this economic loss, the plan of Mr. Denison—

I might say that Mr. Denison has no axe to grind, he is above reproach. He has taken a keen interest in the welfare of our returned men back from France:

> Dr. Irving said the plan of Mr. Denison would work out admirably is the opinion of those who have done T.B. work or have lived under climatic conditions where tubercular work is carried on. I am quite sure there is a wonderful opportunity to develop a scheme that will fill a long felt want in our system of treatment and at the same time do much to eliminate much sorrow and suffering that now exists among these returned men.

Cannot the Government do something to carry out this scheme? The late Government, I understand, did take some action, and here is what one of their ministers stated:

I know nothing to prevent the officials going ahead with the work directed by the committee to establish the model city on the edge of Kamloops.

Apparently the details of this project have been worked out to a certain extent, but nothing has been done to put it into effect. Cannot we get some action? Cannot those men who did so much for Canada obtain some relief? Before I came down here I went out to the Tranquille Hospital to talk to some of them who, I know, had comfortable homes before the war; but they let country come first, they went out to fight Canada's battles. Now they are at Tranquille, unfit to go back to the Coast where their wives and families are, and in some cases I know those dependents are getting no help except from charitable institutions. Surely this state of affairs cannot exist very much longer; it is not in the interests of the country that it should; those men who did so much for us are entitled to better treatment and, I repeat, something should be done and done at once.

I am not going to take up the time of the House talking about the elections and election tricks. I do not see why our time should be wasted reading extracts from the press and manifestoes and going over the same old campaign ground again. That is not what we are here for; we are here to make laws for the betterment of the people, and that is what they are paying us to do. Then why should we not get away from that old political game? I should like to know what the Government is going to do with the National railway system. It seems to me that a board of managers should be appointed to take charge of it, but I do not think it should be a board composed of politicians; it should be composed of practical railway men who have a life study of railroading,—have worked themselves from the ground up and know railroading from A to Z. I have no doubt that if such a board is appointed there will soon be a different tale to tell in regard to the conditions of our publicly owned railways.

And what are the Government going to do with respect to the returned men? Are they going to treat those men honestly and fairly? It seems to me that in honour and justice to those men that is the only thing the Government can do. If they do not we shall have met the test of peace far less nobly than those boys met the test of war.

What is the Government going to do about the unemployed? There is scarcely anything said about that question in the speech from the Throne. Have they no scheme of relief? I do not believe this country owes any man a living, but I do believe it owes every man who is willing to work a chance to earn an honest living. I believe the Government should start some work of a practical character that will help to relieve unemployment and at the same time be for the benefit of the country as a whole. There is no reason why such a scheme should not be started, for there is lots of work to do here and Canada has a bright future. For instance, why should we not start the building of a trans-continental highway? Some say that is work for the various provinces to undertake. I do not think so. I think it is up to the Dominion Government to start such an undertaking and carry it to completion. There is no reason why such a scheme could not be carried out, and if properly carried out it should not cost the taxpayers of this country one dollar. Last year over two hundred and fifty thousand tourists came from the United States to British Columbia. If such a highway were built these tourists could be required to pay toll; the cost of the road would thus be met, and the people in the vicinity would have the benefit of it. The carrying on of such a work would also go a long way toward relieving unemployment, and it would give the people of other countries confidence in Canada. I say that it is up to the Government to carry out this work.

As to oriental immigration, what are we going to do about it? I must say I was disappointed that no hon. member who took part in the debate had anything to say on this subject. It was not my intention as a new member to address this House, but I feel it my duty to bring this question to the attention of hon. members. We on the Coast feel it very keenly; we feel what you people in the East will feel within the next twenty-five years if oriental immigration is not stopped. There is no getting away from it; the orientals do not go into the outlying districts to assist in the development of the country. They flock to the cities, and they are more than anything else responsible for the unemployment at present. Why should we encourage the immigration of that class of labour? Why not close our gates against it? I say that we should close our gates against it, in the interests of humanity.

I do not wish to take up the time of the House any further. I simply wish to say that if we have confidence in this country and in our people—that unwavering confidence that we had in our boys at the front even during the darkest days of the war—Canada has a bright and prosperous future.

Mr. CLEMENT ROBITAILLE (Maisonneuve) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I would not be performing my duty if I did not join with the hon. members who have preceded me in this debate in extending to you my congratulations and those of my constituency (Maisonneuve) which had the honour in the last Parliament to be represented by you and which I have the honour to-day of representing. The title of Speaker is most appropriate, for you are one of the most eloquent speakers of this country; the duties attached to the post are specially suited to you because your talent, your experience, and your uprightness have placed you in the Speaker's chair by the unanimous choice of this House. However, if the post is admirably suited to you, on the other hand it deprives us of the pleasure of listening to your eloquent speeches on the important political questions which interest this country, and by mockery of fate, you are called upon to listen the most and to speak the least.

I must also equally congratulate the hon. members who have moved and seconded the motion to the address in answer to the Speech from the Throne. It is not my intention to discuss all the momentous questions contained in the Speech from the Throne. But I shall simply state that the county which I represent is one of the most important in Canada. As you are aware the division of Maisonneuve is a manufacturing, farming and working centre. It is a country where there exists big and small industries and nevertheless, on the 6th of December last, all of these interests united together to give their support to the Liberal candidate, because they had faith in the Liberal policy, because they had full confidence in the Liberal programme which aims at establishing an equitable tariff for all concerned, including the consumer; at re-establishing the finances of the country, at restoring industrial and agricultural activity and providing work for the labouring classes, who have been idle for a number of years. One might be led to say that the late government, in a desperate effort, wished to provide work for your old county, Mr. Speaker, by granting a contract to the Canadian Vickers Company, of Maisonneuve, for the construction of an ice breaker. This matter had been urged previously for many months by the metal workers; many requests had been forwarded to the late government demanding this enterprise; but all in vain, when suddenly, two or three days, I believe, after nomination, in November last, the hon. Minister of Marine of the day, Mr. Ballantyne, granted the contract to the Canadian Vickers for the construction of this ice breaker. It is my belief, Mr. Speaker, that the whole thing was but a put-up job.

So far as to state ownership of the railways, I am very willing to give it a trial, but my personal opinion is that it will never be a success, because first of all the State cannot manage nor promote traffic as well as a private company; another probable cause of failure is due to progress in other spheres, for often progress is made in one sphere to the detriment of another. I refer to the development of the automobile and to road improvement. Without pretending to be an expert on railways, I believe that the largest returns, that is, what is most remunerative for a railway company, is its passenger traffic and freight transportation on short hauls. Now, within the last few years, we have noticed motor busses and motor trucks transporting passengers and goods from large centres to remote places in the country. What therefore happens, is that railways cover the same road without any passengers or freight; consequently without earning any returns. This new development is but in its infancy. However the farmers and the country dealers own their motor trucks and motor cars and carry their products and goods to the large town markets.

Mr. Speaker, another question which I wish to discuss is the one raised by the hon-member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion) when he spoke on the soldiers' return home from the front. He stated that we should not stick strictly to the letter of the law with reference to the Pension Act, because too often injustices are committed. I approve the remarks of the hon. member on this subject. In fact, we are aware that wrongs have been committed. In my own county there are a great number of soldiers who have seen service at the front; some are in poor pecuniary circumstances and cannot obtain an indemnity proportionate to the sacrifices made, or sufficient to provide for the essential necessities of their family. Only a few days ago I received a letter from one of these returned men. He is a South African war veteran and receives a pension of 48 cents a day; in 1915, he joined the Canadian army and he was demobilized in 1919. Here follows what he says:

885 Lasalle Ave.,
Maisonneuve, Montreal, Que.,
March 6, 1922

Hon. C. ROBITAILLE, M.P., for Maisonneuve.

Sir,—I am putting my case in your hands as a Canadian citizen.

1. I am a veteran of the South African War on a pension of 48 cents a day. Am residing in Montreal seventeen years, never been in a police court in that time.

2. When the Great War broke out in 1914, I volunteered my service with the P.P.C.L.I. met with accident on Mountain street and did not proceed to Ottawa with that Unit.

3. In October 1915, joined the C.G.G. without medical inspection, only eye test. Served Canada, England, France and Belgium. Demobilized February 28th 1919 without medical inspection.

4. I have been going through treatment at the D.S.C.R. Montreal from Dec. 1920 until August 1921, and judged as incurable by Doctor Keenan, Chief Medical Adviser D.S.C.R. Montreal.

5. Have been recommended for a 100 per cent disability for increase of South African Pension. I was boarded again and recommended for 20 per cent for Canadian Pension. Was told by Canadian Pension Board I was not entitled to Canadian Pension as I was getting full compensation from the Imperial Government. Imperial Government says they are not accountable for my present disability as I have served with the Canadian Forces.

6. I have been strongly recommended for Pension by Doctor London, Chief Medical Adviser for the Province of Quebec, also Col. K. R. Marshall, D.S.O., Toronto, Ont., whose documents are attached to my medical papers. Now I have been thrown down for the second time by Dr. W. A. Burgess, Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada, Ottawa who over-rides the Doctors in Montreal. I am a Canadian citizen, my wife is Canadian born, my children are Canadian born, I am electrician by trade, cannot follow my occupation through disability; how is my family going to live on 48 cents a day, after me giving my services for my country. Am I to starve also?

I remain, Yours truly,
H. A. GIBB,
885, Lasalle Ave.,
Maisonneuve.

Born April 28th, 1872, at Limerick, Ireland.

Mr. Speaker, this man who on two different occasions served his country is referred from the Imperial to the Canadian Governments and vice versa; nevertheless his pension remains at 48 cents per day, when it is clearly established by all the medical authorities that he suffers from a disability of 100 per cent. I would feel very grateful if the law on pensions was applied in a more humane way, and in a spirit of gratitude for the soldiers who so well defended our country, instead of having it applied too strictly.

Mr. L. J. LADNER: (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I rise with a natural diffidence to address for the first time the Parliament of Canada. I wish at the outset to tender to you, Sir, my congratulations quite sincerely, from a personal knowledge of your long career in Parliament and from having read, as many young men do, diligently and conscientiously the fine debates in Hansard. I must say, however, that in your elevation to the first place in the Commons we are losing one of the greatest and most powerful debaters in Parliament.

It is not for any personal satisfaction or honour that I take part in this debate. I do so because I believe it is a duty I owe to my constituents, as it is the duty of all members of this House who come here with a definite proposal or some concrete matter to lay it before their fellow-members, who may, perhaps, not be so well informed as to the views of his constituents.

We have here, Mr. Speaker, four parties, and I have no doubt but that the addition of two of these parties will have a salutary effect upon the business and legislation of this Parliament. One calls itself the Progressive party. Notwithstanding the scathing denunciations and somewhat exaggerated terms which have been applied to our party by hon. gentlemen opposite, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that while we do not have the word progressive in our name, in all the deeds and acts of the Liberal-Conservative party as found in the pages of our country's history, progressive is expressed. Right down through our history until the 6th day of December, 1921, we find this to be so. I exclude the 6th day of December, 1921, Mr. Speaker, because I do not consider that a day to which the word "progressive" can be either conservatively or liberally applied. The 6th day of December appears to be free of political phenomena—just progressive.

I should like in the few minutes that I shall take part in this debate to avoid as much as possible covering many of the subjects, which have already been discussed at great length and in very general terms, but I cannot in duty to my own province permit this occasion to pass without a reference or two to the question of the tariff.

We are four parties in British Columbia, but we are a solid thirteen, irrespective of party, for a protective tariff. The members from British Columbia have always supported the Macdonald Liberal-Conservative national policy, modified to that of the Laurier-Fielding policy as it has been called in this House by certain hon. members. I submit, however, that at this stage, on this 22nd of March, after listening to the various debates upon that question we can now apply the real and correct name to the tariff policy of this Government. I think the proper name would be the Gouin-Fielding tariff policy, which we heard explained a short time ago. If, however, the opinions and the sentiments of the hon. members from British Columbia, thirteen in number, are not sufficiently convincing to this Government, may I be permitted to read the words of one who leads the Liberal party in the province of British Columbia? I refer to the Liberal premier of British Columbia, "Honest" John Oliver, who has been there for a number of years. On a certain occasion he came to Ottawa, and some hon. gentlemen now present will remember that he made a keen analysis of, and somewhat denunciatory remarks upon, the proposed Liberal tariff as drawn up at the convention held here in August, 1919. It may perhaps be wearisome to hon. members to be continually listening to the reading of newspaper clippings, but this one is so pertinent, the remarks so true as they affect British Columbia, and the ideas so soundly expressed, that I believe it would be informative to the House if I read a few paragraphs. I quote from the Vancouver Province of the 7th of August, 1919; the same quotations are found in the Globe of that day. Addressing the great Liberal convention here in August, 1919, Mr. Oliver says, with respect to the tariff policy enunciated there:

> If you pass this resolution as it is reported from the Committee, you are furnishing, not a weapon of defence for the Liberal party, but a weapon of attack by which the Borden Government will successfully attack the Liberal party. In 1911 I went down to defeat in defence of the reciprocity pact. I went into that fight with my hands tied, and this resolution will have the effect of tying my hands behind my back and the backs of a great many other Liberal candidates in the next election.

And surely enough when the next election took place we found a Liberal Government in control of the legislature of the province and not participating in the election to any extent whatsoever. I am not saying that under the influence of any party bias, or prejudice; I say that to indicate to hon. members that so far as British Columbia is concerned this is a matter of real importance. I trust, therefore, that the Government will take cognizance of the attitude of the thirteen members as well as of the Premier of the province. In the same speech Mr. Oliver continues with respect to the tariff policy which more strongly appeals to hon. members to my left:

> The reasons I call this class legislation and why it is sectional and why it will put a club into the hands of our opponents, are these: Let us take one item—farm tractors. They should be on the free list, but is a tractor any more an implement of production than the power that goes into your factory or the gasoline engine that goes into the fishermen's boat or any other object? Is a plow more an implement of production to the farmer than the machinist's tools to the mechanic or the plumber's tools to the plumber? Is any one an article of production more than another?

And then Mr. Oliver continues:

> You have no answer. It is not a square deal and is not Liberal.

Referring to the tariff also he says:

> It is a get-by proposition and the Liberal party in this crisis should not put any get-by proposition before the people.

I think all hon. members who look at this matter frankly will realize now that the tariff platform of that time was a get-by proposition, and hon. gentlemen opposite hold their seats by virtue of the pledge of their leader at that convention. Now I find it necessary to quote one or two more lines from Mr. Oliver's speech:

> You want free cement. We have three immense plants in British Columbia, all of them idle. Why put cement on the free list and not the reinforcing iron that goes into it? Is it consistently logical? What answer can you give? You have no answer.

Then he concludes with these words:

> If this Liberal party has a policy at all it is a policy of justice to the masses of the people, and if you have to resort to taxation it must be put on the men who can bear the burden. I can not go before these returned soldiers who came to my office and demanded that I give up the reins of Government (and I told them I wouldn't and that I was going to give them a square deal) and say to them that I voted for a resolution that would give free gasoline for millionaires and leave the tax on the little boots and clothing that the veterans kiddies have to wear.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I realize that it is perhaps wearisome to some hon. members to listen to these quotations, but I desire to make the point that the hon. members from British Columbia and the official leader of the Liberal party in that province are against the policy enunciated by the Liberal party in that convention and which seems to have some considerable support in this House, and are in favour of the policy which they have supported consistently from the beginning to the end.

On the motion of Mr. Ladner the debate was adjourned.

At six o'clock the House adjourned without question being put, pursuant to rule.

Thursday, March 23, 1922.

The House met at three o'clock.

NEW MEMBER

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Clerk of the House had received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of Joseph Rodolphe Ouimet, Esquire for the Electoral District of Vaudreuil-Soulanges.

INTRODUCTION OF A NEW MEMBER

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED

Joseph Rodolphe Ouimet, Esquire, Member for the electoral district of Vaudreuil-Soulanges, introduced by Sir Lomer Gouin and Hon. J. A. Robb.

PARLIAMENTARY RESTAURANT

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Acting Prime Minister) moved:

That Messrs: Anderson, Bancroft, Gordon, Logan, Macdonald (Pictou), Pacaud Papineau, Wallace and Wilson be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in the direction of the restaurant, so far as the interests of the Commons are concerned, and to act as members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the restaurant, and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours therewith.

Motion agreed to.

LIBRARY—JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. W. S. FIELDING moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate informing Their Honours that this House has appointed Messrs. Béland, Carmichael, Deslauriers, Drayton (Sir Henry), Euler, Gauvreau, Gouin (Sir Lomer), Irvine, Johnson (Moosejaw), Mackenzie King (York), Lapointe, Lovett, Lovie, Maclean (Halifax), Meighen, Robinson, Ross (Kingston), Ross (Simcoe), Sheard, Sinclair (Oxford) and Walsh, a committee to assist His Honour the Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act on behalf of the House of Commons as members of a Committee of both Houses on the Library.

Motion agreed to.

PRINTING—JOINT COMMITTEE

Hon. W. S. FIELDING moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this House will unite with them in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the Printing of Parliament, and that the members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing, namely Messrs. Baldwin, Cardin, Charters, Chevrier, Coote, Euler, Fansher, Hocken, Humphrey, Jones, MacKelvie, McConica, Malcolm, Marcil (Bonaventure), Michaud, Prevost, Raymond, Rinfret, Robinson, St. Père, Thurston, Turgeon and Wilson, will act as members on the part of this House on the said Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

POWERS OF COMMITTEES

On motion of Hon. Mr. Fielding, the Select Standing Committees of the House were severally empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records; with the exception of the Committee on Debates and that on the Library of Parliament.

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

ADDRESS IN REPLY

Consideration of the motion of Mr. McMurray for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, resumed from Wednesday, March 22.

Mr. LADNER (resuming): Mr. Speaker, at the adjournment of the House last night I had made some casual observations relative to the tariff question; and now I refer to the railway question. We on this side of the House desire that the Government should fulfil their promise of the 13th instant given by the hon. Prime Minister that before this debate closed an expectant House, and no doubt an anxious country, would be made aware definitely and concretely what the proposal of his Government was with respect to our national railways. In order that there may be no misunderstanding in this connection, I should like to read to hon. members the words of the Prime Minister on that occasion:

The reference may not have been necessary on the ground that it did not involve legislation, but it was necessary that the country and Parliament should be informed at the opening of Parliament exactly as to the purpose of the Ministry with respect to the National railroads which are in our possession at the present time.

But I would remind my right hon. friend that the proper person to discuss railway policy is the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy), and I would prefer, until he has had an opportunity of addressing members of the House to defer saying anything further with respect to the meaning of the co-ordination as set forth in the Speech from the Throne. I think the language must be perfectly clear to hon. members. If there is any doubt as to what is in the Government's mind, that doubt will be cleared up by the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals himself.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is very grave doubt on this side of the House as to the policy of the Government in this respect, and I put it again to my hon. friends opposite that it is only fair and right that the people should know now, before this debate closes, the railway policy of the Government. I observe that the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) is in his seat, and he will no doubt, as we say in court, "take judicial notice" of our request.

There has been a noticeable absence in this debate of reference to our returned soldier problems. I do not take it, however, to indicate apathy on the part of hon. ministers that we have had very few observations and even fewer concrete suggestions from the Government on this important question. The Government does say in the Speech from the Throne:

> The work in connection with the re-establishment, medical treatment and vocational training of former members of the Canadian Forces is being sympathetically and energetically prosecuted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there is one thing which should be considered—and which the people will expect hon. members to consider—in a non-partisan spirit, it is this question, and I submit that there are many changes which must and should be brought about in our pension and land settlement regulations. I desire to bring to the notice of the House two instances of the injustice that is wrought by the present pension regulations. I know of a case here in Ottawa where a soldier died some time after he returned from active service overseas. Because his widow could not prove to the satisfaction of the Pension Board that that man acquired the disease to which he succumbed as a result of his war service, she was deprived of the pension to which she should be entitled. Her husband died of cancer, and the onus of proof is so severe and difficult that the widow cannot establish positively that the disease was a result of his war service, although there were indications that it was. I know another case in British Columbia of a young lawyer who went overseas, served faithfully, never cared to admit that he was in ill health or did not feel very well, and got a one hundred per cent discharge, but to-day tuberculosis has become noticeable in him. However, the regulations governing soldiers' civil re-establishment do not permit him to have the advantage and benefit of the assistance which he ought to receive. The poor fellow is in a very bad state of health and has a widowed mother to support. I give those two instances to show how necessary it is that something should be done to modify the regulations which at present result in such injustice and neglect of most deserving cases. I hope the House will appoint a special committee to go into these things, because if there is one matter that is dear to the heart of every true Canadian it is that which pertains to the welfare of the dependents of our soldiers who made the supreme sacrifice overseas. In that connection I would commend to the Government the suggestions made by the Great War Veterans' Association a few days ago through its Dominion Command. Many of those suggestions are practical and sound, as I know from observation and experience.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) in the course of his speech on the 17th instant stated that he would like to see the Royal Northwest Mounted Police removed from British Columbia. I would suggest that he speaks only for himself, not for his colleagues from that province. If there is one body of men which gave us comfort and a feeling of security at a time when our constitutional system was in danger, it was the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, whom everybody respects and only revolutionists fear, and I think it would be a terrible mistake if this fine body of men were to be eliminated. It would seem that the proposal of the Government is to reduce this force.

Now I come to the real point of why I am taking part in this debate.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. LADNER: The hon. member says "Hear, hear." Maybe he made a better point, but I will do the best I can. In the Speech from the Throne reference is made to the handing back of their natural resources to the Prairie provinces. It is stated in very general language, and as the matter is so important I shall read the statement:

> The long standing question of granting the control of the natural resources of three Western Provinces to their respective Provincial Governments has engaged the attention of my Ministers. Sympathizing with the desire of the authorities of these Provinces, which have now advanced to maturity, to have the same control and management of their resources as is possessed by the older Provinces, my Government have made a proposal to the Governments of the several Provinces concerned, which it is hoped may lead to a satisfactory settlement of the question at an early date.

That, Mr. Speaker, is not very explicit, and the Prime Minister was asked by the leader of the Opposition to give a fuller explanation. On March 13, as will be found at page 45 of unrevised Hansard the Prime Minister explained that portion of the Speech from the Throne in these words:

> May I read from the letter which I sent to the Premiers of the different Provinces. The opposite paragraph is as follows:
>
> "If, however, the Governments of the Prairie Provinces would not be satisfied with such an arrangement—"
>
> That is the one similar to the offer that had been previously made.
> "—but would prefer an accounting between the Dominion and the Provinces from the beginning, by an independent tribunal, we would not object to such a plan. In any agreement that might be come to along these lines it would be, of course, necessary, that adequate provision be made for crediting the Provinces with all money received by the Dominion and charging to the Provinces all outlay by the Dominion, directly or indirectly in relation to the management of the resources. Any award duly made by the tribunal should be binding on both sides. Any sums found to be due by the Dominion to a Province or by a Province to the Dominion might be capitalized and interest adjusted in connection with the annual Provincial subsidy."

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are very few questions of greater importance to the Prairie provinces, and there are none of more importance to the other provinces, than the relationship of those provinces to the Dominion with respect to their natural resources, with respect to the land which has been alienated, and with respect to the various cash contributions which have been paid from time to time; and if there is an objectionable feature in what is now contemplated it is the proposal under which the Government of Canada, the federal authority, proposes to enter into a direct and separate transaction with the Prairie provinces in complete disregard of the rights and claims of all the other provinces. I submit to hon. members here that that policy is not only unfair and unsound, but is calculated to accentuate the differences which already exist between the several provinces. I propose to show, Mr. Speaker, that the proper course and policy to be pursued on a matter of this kind is the one which, when it settles the rights and claims of the Prairie provinces, will also settle the rights and claims of the other provinces of the Dominion who voluntarily came into Confederation; and surely it would not be right for the federal authorities to deal with the public domain to the disadvantage of those provinces who when they entered Confederation pooled their resources with the public resources of Canada. Take for example the Maritime provinces. They have on a number of occasions expressed their claims. They say they want compensation and an equivalent for lands reserved for school purposes for Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. They also claim compensation for the cash subsidies paid to Manitoba and Alberta purporting to be in lieu of lands, and they also want compensation for the lands granted to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec in which the people of the Maritime provinces, in common with the people of the other parts of Canada, have a proprietary interest. In short, they claim that they have contributed large sums of money to make and develop Canada; that there were placed in the hands of the Dominion Government, as trustees of the Canadian people, certain great areas of land, certain resources, in which these original provinces have a proprietary interest, and they declare that the Federal Government acts in a fiduciary capacity in that regard for the people of Canada. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that these claims advanced by the province of Nova Scotia and other provinces have a great deal of merit. Under the circumstances, is it fair for the Dominion Government, in total disregard of such claims, to enter into a separate and distinct transaction with the Prairie provinces? The same question may be asked, as I think I can show conclusively to the satisfaction of hon. members, with respect to other provinces in the Dominion.

When Confederation was formed the six original provinces contained an area of approximately five hundred million acres. In addition to these five hundred million acres, there was a vast area of two billion acres which constituted the common domain of the federated provinces of the Dominion. But in 1898 and 1912 the Dominion Government increased the grants of natural resources and of lands to the province of Ontario to the extent of 115 million acres thus making Ontario's total 261 million acres, or in other words practically doubling the original area of the province of Ontario. When we come to the province of Quebec we find that its original area was 124 million acres, but subsequent grants in 1898 and 1912 increased the total acreage of Quebec and her territory now consists of 452 million acres, so that that province to-day is four times the size it was at the time of Confederation. To-day when the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, which exercise a great political influence in Canada say: "No, the Prairie provinces cannot have back their natural resources; we have a proprietary interest in them and we want an accounting for the money they have received"—surely when that takes place the Prairie provinces can say to Ontario and Quebec: "We have a proprietary interest in 440 million acres of the common domain given to you since Confederation, and we are also entitled to an accounting." The point I wish to make is simply this: Any province which desires to make a separate transaction between the Dominion Government and that province without at the same time taking recognition of the proper claims of the other provinces—any policy of that kind is unsound and narrow and is calculated, as I said before, to increase rather than diminish the differences that exist between those provinces.

Now, what do the Prairie provinces say: They say: "We want back our natural resources, we want an accounting for the land that has been alienated, and we want the original annual subsidy of $562,000 that we received for several years past." And they repudiate the right of other provinces in connection with their claims for proprietary interest in their domain. In other words, the Prairie provinces ask for the original grant of lands within their boundaries which the original provinces of the Confederation got at the time Confederation was entered into.

Now, Sir, it would be an oversight on my part if I did not speak upon the very just and very moderate claims of the province of British Columbia, a matter which has been one of great concern in our province for many years. Many hon. members will remember that Sir Richard McBride fought for a long time to bring about an adjustment of this question, and I deem it well to quote a few lines from one of his speeches, towards the end of his career. Speaking on the subject of better terms on 19th July, 1907, he said:

> I say again, ladies and gentlemen, this is not a party question. I am not talking as a Conservative to Conservatives but as a Canadian to Canadians, I say to the people of British Columbia that they should legitimately follow up their grievances and carry them to Ottawa.

Mr. Speaker, hon. members from British Columbia are to-day, once more, presenting the grievances of their province on that question. But we do not want those grievances settled apart from the rights and claims of other provinces; we want to co-operate with the other provinces and decide upon a policy which will bring about a fair and proper adjustment of all these claims at the same time. When our province joined Confederation, one of the terms of union was—

> And the Government of British Columbia agree to convey to the Dominion Government, in trust, to be appropriated in such manner as the Dominion Government may deem advisable in the furtherance of the construction of the said railway, a similar extent of public lands along the line of railway, throughout its entire length in British Columbia, not to exceed, however, 20 miles on each side of said line.

At the time of Confederation the province of British Columbia had a proprietory interest in those lands, and conveyed a belt 40 miles wide and 500 miles long to the Dominion Government in trust, Mr. Speaker, to be appropriated for the purposes of railway construction. The point I wish to make is that the trusteeship has failed. Those lands were never used for railway construction, and, the trust having failed, we are entitled to a return of the lands because we had the reversionary interest in them. In that area there is something in the neighbourhood of $35,000,000 worth of timber alone, taking the price of $1 a thousand. A few days ago the hon. gentleman from Cumberland (Mr. Logan), told us that the province of Nova Scotia came into Confederation also under the terms and understanding that they should have a railway. The province of Nova Scotia got the railway, and paid nothing, but the people of Canada paid $100,000,000 for it. In British Columbia we had a distinct pact, but the Government of Canada, on account of other influences, failed to carry out that pact. Before we got our railway we had to give the Dominion Government what is known as the Peace River block, three and a half million acres of land, conservatively valued at $35,000,000. We had to give a vast quantity of land on Vancouver island, which we should not have been obliged to do under the terms of Confederation. That land was conservatively estimated at a value of $25,000,000. Then, unlike some of the other provinces, British Columbia, since Confederation has contributed to the Dominion Treasury the large sum of $40,000,000 in excess of what it has cost the government. So that when you add together the value of those lands, the cash contribution, and the timber in the railway belt you find that British Columbia, in order to have the Canadian Pacific railway—a national and imperial railway—constructed across the continent to Vancouver, has paid in lands and money the enormous sum of $130,000,000.

I ask you for a moment, Mr. Speaker, to contrast British Columbia with the other provinces. A moment ago I mentioned Nova Scotia. They got their railway and the Dominion Government paid $100,000,000. Ontario secured an area of land out of our common domain double her original size. Ontario has received an appropriation of money grants for canals and things of that kind from the Dominion Treasury, far in excess of $125,000,000. Quebec is to-day four times the size she was in 1867, and has acquired natural resources of great value—timber, mines and lands. Quebec has also received large appropriations from the Dominion Government. The claims of British Columbia are these: we say that the railway belt, given in trust for railway purposes, and not used for such purposes, should be given back to the province. We have paid enough without that. We say that the 2,000,000 acres on Vancouver island should be handed back or that we should have an accounting. We claim that the Peace River block, still intact and of great value, should be returned to us. A large quantity of Indian lands were also conveyed by the province of British Columbia, when she was a Crown colony, to the Dominion Government in trust for the Indians, to be taken care of by the Dominion as guardian for the Indians. We claim that large portions of those lands, which have been practically abandoned by the Indians, should be handed back to British Columbia. On that point I would like to quote a few words from the terms of Union, section 13:

> To carry out such policy, tracts of land of such extent as it has hitherto been the practice of the British Columbia Government to appropriate for that purpose shall from time to time be conveyed by the local government to the Dominion Government in trust for the use and benefits of the Indians.

Therefore, we claim that, the trust being at an end we are entitled to a reversionary interest in those lands.

Now I ask the hon. gentlemen to turn their attention for a moment to the question of subsidies. We find that Ontario, as of the 31st March, 1921, received annually $2,400,000; Manitoba $1,470,000; Saskatchewan $1,753,000; and Alberta, with a population of 582,000, has received a subsidy of $1,162,000. British Columbia, with almost the same population as Alberta, received the sum of $623,000, about one-third of what each of the Prairie provinces received. Hon. gentlemen will surely see that the policy of a government which makes a separate and distinct transaction with the Prairie provinces, and neglects and ignores the claims of other provinces, is not one which is calculated to meet with the approval of the public of this country. We are told that the Prairie provinces, unlike the province of British Columbia, have cost the Dominion of Canada since Confederation something like $40,000,000 in excess of what they have received. British Columbia, on the other hand, has contributed the sum of $40,000,000 in excess of what the province has received. I desire to draw to the attention of those who, perhaps, have not travelled in British Columbia the fact that we have also important physical disabilities. We have great expense for our administration, for the police, for government agencies, for schools, for roads, trails, bridges and for other things—an expense which other provinces do not have to face. The province of British Columbia perhaps may not interest all hon. gentlemen present, but, so far as the policy of the government is concerned, I wish to repeat, and I hope the hon. ministers will remember this—and I am sure that my views are shared by every member from the Prairie provinces—that any settlement of this very important question of provincial rights and of better terms must be made in a broad national way, all at one time, and not piecemeal as has been proposed by the Government.

I trust and hope that when the policy of the Government in this matter is announced in detail, we shall find manifested that spirit of co-operation by my hon. friends to my left, the Progressives, which they profess in their speeches, and which I am sure they will practise in this parliament; and even though they may have the advantage of securing a separate deal with the government, because of their strategic position politically, that in the spirit and understanding of the ideals which they have professed in their eloquent speeches during the last few days, they will be consistent and will refuse to accept from the government the temptation of their natural resources, to the prejudice and the injury of the other provinces of this Dominion.

Mr. ALFRED STORK (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, as this debate is coming to a close, I should like to take up the time of the House for a few moments in order to make some brief observations in connection with matters pertaining to British Columbia. The constituency which I represent is, I think, one of the largest in the Dominion of Canada, and in view of the fact that many members, whose particular constituencies are not so large as mine, have spoken at great length, I will trespass upon your generosity. May I be permitted to state that my constituency embraces an area of 164,600 square miles, and, with the possible exception of the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Black), I travel, perhaps, the longest distance of any member to attend a session of this House. My constituency is larger than England, Wales, Scotland, Ireland, Denmark, Holland and Belgium all put together, so that I think such a territory alone should justify my being given an opportunity of voicing, for a few moments, the aims and ideas of the people who have sent me here to represent their particular interests.

I am perhaps, a little late in arriving here. In the year 1917, the people of the constituency of Skeena elected me by a "home" majority of something like 600; but due to the conditions under which the election took place, I was declared counted out by the overseas vote. I am not here to hold post mortems; we have had sufficient of those up to the present time; I wish merely to say that I regret that I have not been able before to take my seat in this House, for the reason that a great deal of misrepresentation has taken place in connection with the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. I do not believe the fortunes of any particular individual are an issue in this Dominion of Canada; but owing to the fact that, since 1911, that branch of the present Canadian National Railway system, known at that time as the Grand Trunk Pacific, has more or less fallen upon evil days, I have regretted exceedingly that, prior to the present session of Parliament, there has not been in this House some member to correct, from time to time, misrepresentations which have appeared, in the press and upon many platforms throughout the Dominion. In that connection, let me say that the railways, known now as the Canadian National Railway system—known at that time as the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk Pacific—running west from Edmonton as far as Red Pass Junction, run practically parallel, separated by, perhaps, only a few yards.

A great deal of energy has been spent in attempting to discredit the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and the country through which it passes, in order to make it appear that the construction of that railway was not justified but that the construction of the Canadian Northern down to Vancouver was the proper thing to do. A great deal of energy has been spent along that line, and I, therefore, wish to compare, just for a few moments, the territory through which these two railways run. I know no better method of comparison than to state to the House that the territory through which the Grand Trunk Pacific passes is a country immensely wealthy in agriculture, timber, minerals and other natural resources. As I said before, the two railways run practically parallel from Edmonton to Red Pass Junction. The Canadian Northern runs from Red Pass Junction down the Thompson River to Kamloops, and then parallel to the Canadian Pacific from Kamloops into the city of Vancouver. The schools—and I think this is a fair criterion,—built in the years 1916 to 1920 on the Canadian Northern railway in British Columbia are twelve in number; on the Grand Trunk Pacific the number of schools built is 46. In the year 1921, one school house was constructed on the Canadian Northern and 22 on the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Grand Trunk Pacific railway is now a national proposition, and there is perhaps no railway on the continent that has such a mileage and at the same time that is not supplied by feeders or supplied with spurs. In connection with this railway running from Edmonton into the port of Prince Rupert, if we had a twenty-mile spur built to Stewart lake, it would open up a vast new agricultural country. A seven-mile spur built into Francois lake also would open up a vast new agricultural country. A seven-mile spur from Telkwa would open up immense coal areas in that particular region. One hundred and fifty miles of a spur line to the Ground Hog country would bring into the market a vast quantity of anthracite coal. Twenty miles of a spur line into the Copper River country would tap a great and very valuable deposit of iron ore. As this is a national road, the country must get behind it, and we can do no better than develop the natural resources which lie contiguous to the national railway system. I believe that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in his idea of the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, had the proper plan. It was built with an imperial viewpoint; it was part of the "All-red" route. It opens up, I believe, the best country that you can find in the whole Dominion of Canada. In connection with this railway which runs westward to Prince Rupert, let me cite to you what I find in "5,000 Facts About Canada". The editor states:

> Prince Rupert—436 miles nearer Orient than any other Pacific port. Population, 8,000. Assessment, $17,138,492. Single tax. City owns telephone, water and electric light systems. Five schools, including high school.

I may say that we have just opened up a new school at a cost of a quarter of a million dollars.

> Greatest fishing port on Pacific coast. 20,000 ton drydock; largest cold storage plant on Pacific coast, with magnificent harbour, ranking third in world harbours.

I believe Sir Wilfrid Laurier had the proper idea when he decided to construct the Grand Trunk Pacific railway as a national asset.

Before I take my seat, there is one phase of British Columbia life which I wish to draw to the attention of the House. British Columbia entered Confederation in the year 1871, and the agreement under which she entered was that a railroad would be built to link up British Columbia with the rest of Canada. But in that particular bargain I do not find any clause stating that British Columbia must harbour within her borders an oriental population which is designed for the whole of Canada. The people of British Columbia have no desire to be sacrificed upon the altar of international goodwill. The oriental question in British Columbia is reaching a most acute state. The oriental has absorbed the salmon fishing industry of the province, and the truck farms of British Columbia are very largely in his hands. He is also spreading into the timber industry, and I understand the mercantile industry is controlled to the extent of thirty per cent by the oriental population. If we continue at the rate at which we are going we shall very soon find that the whites will have a very small place in British Columbia. The birth rate of the white population in that province is seventeen per thousand, while that of the Japanese is 69 per thousand, or four times that of the white people. The birth rate in Russia is 46 per thousand, in Germany 26, and in Great Britain 24—quite a difference as compared with 69. The oriental question presents another aspect, which is a serious one indeed. We are troubled to-day throughout Canada with the unemployment problem, and as a Canadian I believe that this question should receive the earliest attention of this particular Parliament. I should like to see Canadian resources in the West, and, for that matter, in the East as well, developed by Canadian labour. It is not a pleasant thing to see the vast and ever-increasing oriental population prospering in our own country, while the men who fought overseas for the safety and well-being of this Canada of ours, now that they have come back, have to stand idly by and see the work of the province carried on by orientals. I believe that the country would understand its problems better if people travelled somewhat more. There is nothing like travel to give a man a broader vision. Members of Parliament will soon rise from their session. Instead of taking a trip to Europe to visit some foreign country, they should go to British Columbia. In fact, I invite every hon. member of this House to take a trip to that province. There is no country in Europe that can compare with it. The mountains of Switzerland, the sunny skies of France, and all the varied and beautiful scenery that you can find on the continent of Europe cannot, I assert, compare with the magnificence of British Columbia. Its rivers, its lakes, its mountains, and its forests are inviting. Let hon. members spend their vacation in that province and we in British Columbia will lay before them the problems incident to that great country. If that were done this House could better understand our point of view, and I am sure that its members would return from such a trip very much benefited in health, besides having a clearer knowledge of our problems.

Mr. J. L. BROWN (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention at this late stage unduly to prolong the debate. Were it not that certain documents have come into my hands during the past few days touching a matter of vital importance to all who are interested in agriculture, a matter on which I think we should have a clear understanding as to what this Government's attitude will be, I should not have spoken at this time; and I do so now only at the request of some of my fellow-members. The matter I refer to is the question of the British embargo upon Canadian cattle. Perhaps I may say first, however, that I have listened with a great deal of interest and amusement, and, I hope, not altogether without edification, to the controversy that has gone on across the floor of the House; and I confess that in my unregenerate days, that is, before I became a member of the Progressive party, I might have enjoyed taking part in such an exchange of courtesies. However, I passed a self-denying ordinance for myself which I will try to observe, and I trust that I shall not unduly transgress it in this debate.

I heartily concur in what the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Stork) has said, that it would be well for us to visit other portions of the Dominion. For my part, I intend to avail myself of the invitation that he has given, and I should also like to visit the Maritime provinces to see if I could get their point of view in regard to the Intercolonial railway. Possibly they might not give it to me, but I should be glad to go there in any case.

Mr. LOGAN: We will give you our point of view.

Mr. BROWN: A newspaper suggestion was made a short time ago that the Government should undertake the cost of transporting members of this House to all portions of the Dominion in order that they might better familiarize themselves with the country's problems. In view of the straitened finances of the Dominion, I would not urge that suggestion, although I see the need of it. Perhaps, if I might venture the remark, the most
4 p.m. outstanding illustration of that need has come from the members from the city of Toronto. One of those hon. members indicated what he thought about agricultural conditions in Western Canada, when he quoted from a letter that he had received from a friend, stating that he had raised wheat for thirty years, every year without treatment. Now it is unfortunate that any such idea should prevail in regard to Western conditions. It was Lord Dufferin, I think, who once made the statement—a very unfortunate thing for him to have said—that all you needed to do in the West was to tickle the ground and it would bring forth a crop. Well, hon. gentlemen from Toronto do not seem to have learned anything since that day. The hon. member who quoted that letter wondered why we in this corner laughed in derision when he read the statement. It very clearly indicated that he had simply no conception of the conditions that prevail in the West, and I think that if the Government of this Dominion could not send that hon. gentleman from the city of Toronto to the Prairie provinces, the Prairie provinces themselves might well afford to finance the expedition.

I wish to refer briefly to some remarks made by the Minister of Finance in the late government (Sir Henry Drayton), since they are directly connected with the matter I have particularly in hand. Referring to the question of reciprocity, he said that the Americans desired to get hold of our wheat only because they wanted to benefit by the cost of handling it. That is by no means an altogether correct statement. Hon. members, and hon. gentlemen from Toronto, will understand that we in the northwest produce a grade of wheat that is unsurpassed on the globe. It ought to be remembered also that the area in which that wheat is produced is limited. So far as the United States is concerned, that area consists only of the northern states there—those that touch the international boundary; and it is by no means correct to say that the only interest the Americans have in our wheat is the desire to handle it. We know from past experience when conditions were normal, that there was a demand for a certain proportion of our wheat by the mills of the United States, and we desired to benefit by that demand. We have heard much about the things that go to make for national unity; but I may say that it is not calculated to produce any feeling of goodwill on the part of those who live in the Prairie provinces to be told, on the one hand: You must buy our apples or our machinery; and, on the other hand: You must sell your stuff only to us. It has been this attempt to restrict us both in our purchasing and in our selling that is, perhaps responsible for the presence of the Progressive group in this House to-day.

Now, coming more directly to the question of live stock—and I may say that the live stock industry, next to the wheat industry, is the most important in the Northwest and undoubtedly the most important in Ontario;—I wish to point out that the failure to ratify the reciprocity pact in 1911 was of untold injury to the people of the Prairie provinces. The conditions in those provinces are such that we very frequently find it not only profitable but in many cases necessary to market our cattle in an unfinished condition. Very often a farmer is short of feed and, altogether against his own will or desire, he must find a market for his cattle. The United States under normal conditions is capable of absorbing large numbers of those cattle. A few years ago, if I may be pardoned a personal reference, I sent some steers down to the Winnipeg market. A few weeks afterwards I received a letter from a gentleman in the state of Illinois who had got my steers, my name and address having been on their ear tags. He said: "We like your Canadian cattle; they are good feeders, and we want to get them." Mr. Speaker, if they want to get them, we want to sell them, and in spite of all that has been said about the necessity for trade lines running east and west, there is a trade in respect of which the lines must run north and south. If they do not, then there can be no trade.

An hon. gentleman opposite spoke the other day of Canada's being an absolutely self-contained nation. I was reminded of the remark of the countryman who went to the fair and saw a giraffe for the first time: "There ain't no such animal." It is futile to talk of a self-contained nation in this year of grace when the absolute interdependence of nations is being shown as never before. There is not and cannot be such a thing as a self-contained nation.

I think I have shown the necessity for our having access to the United States market for a certain class of cattle. It is the market that has absorbed the class of cattle which are not suitable for export to Great Britain, even under the most favourable conditions,—even if the embargo were removed. At the same time, the necessity for the removal of that embargo is apparent. Hon. members undoubtedly understand the situation as it has prevailed for nearly thirty years. The embargo was originally imposed ostensibly for the purpose of keeping out disease, but really to protect certain British interests. It is now recognized that there is no disease, and the embargo is being continued purely for the purposes of giving protection to British interests. In this connection I want to acknowledge, on behalf of the organized farmers, the debt we owe to the Hon. Manning Doherty, a member of Mr. Drury's government. By the way, I was amused when one of the members from Toronto sought to appeal to the Progressives by intimating that Mr. Crerar might be satisfactory to certain interests, but that Mr. Drury was not. We in the West, however, were told during the campaign that if we only had Mr. Drury, everything would be satisfactory in regard to the Progressive party. Well, we are satisfied with them both, and I want to pay every respect to Hon. Mr. Manning Doherty for what he did in connection with the cattle embargo; he brought the matter before the British authorities in a way in which it had never been brought before.

[Mr. Brown.]

Unfortunately, there seems to have grown up an impression in Great Britain that the official attitude of the Canadian Government toward the question of the embargo is one of indifference. I have before me an extract from The Canadian Gazette, published in London, dated February 16. I would like to direct the attention of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) to this paragraph. I cannot think it correctly represents his attitude; indeed, I am prepared to believe that the attitude of the Minister of Agriculture would be in perfect harmony with my own in respect to this matter. But here is an indication of the impression that has grown up:

> "We are sorry, of course, but it is really your business, and not ours." That, in a sentence, is the impression which Canadian cablegrams bring to us of the Canadian reception of the decision of the British Government not to remove the cattle embargo. Mr. Motherwell, the new Dominion Minister of Agriculture, says in effect: "This is essentially a question for the home authorities", and he adds: "Since we ourselves in our own interests have now imposed an embargo on British cattle we have little to say on the subject." Of course, the embargo abolitionists may reply: "Yes, but Canada's embargo on British pedigreed cattle is because of admitted disease; Britain's embargo on Canadian store cattle is, on the other hand, in spite of the admitted absence of disease."

I think our position would be well expressed in that last sentence. There is a very great difference between our attitude in excluding pedigreed cattle because of admitted disease and the attitude of Britain in excluding Canadian cattle when there is admittedly no disease. I am prepared to recognize that in any event this is a matter to be dealt with by the Imperial authorities. I am prepared to recognize also that we who have imposed protective tariffs against British goods are not in a very strong position to protest against their imposing protection. But I think it would be very unfortunate if we should in any measure countenance the impression that we are indifferent in this matter. There has grown up in Britain during the last few months a very strong body of public opinion in favour of having that embargo removed. In an Associated Press despatch in to-day's paper it is announced that there is shortly to be called by the Lord Mayor of London a national conference on live stock at the Guildhall, which representatives from many large cities will be invited to attend. I deem it my duty to express, Mr. Speaker, as I believe I have a right to do on behalf of the organized farmers, the view that this question of the removal of the embargo is by no means a matter of indifference to us. Great uncertainty exists as to where the market for our live stock is going to be; we are not sure of the American market, and we are not sure of the British market. I shall not undertake just now to discuss the relative merits of those two markets, but if we do not get one or the other, then the live stock trade, it may almost be said, is doomed. It would be very unfortunate to allow that impression to prevail over here, and I trust that the Government will make it very clear that so far as their official attitude is concerned it is in harmony with the views that I have expressed.

Mr. A. E. MacLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few observations in this debate I wish, in common with hon. members who have preceded me, to offer to you my sincere congratulations. I know that your rulings will be fair and impartial and that we shall all receive every courtesy from the Chair. I wish also to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address who were to me perfect strangers, but who have become my personal friends since my coming to this House.

Each member in presenting his views has spoken largely from his own local viewpoint, and I think that I may be pardoned if I follow somewhat along the same lines. Indeed, it seems to me to be the duty of a representative to ascertain the wishes of his constituents, to interpret them to the House, and to endeavour to have them embodied in legislation, if such legislation is not detrimental to the country as a whole. I do not know that I should have taken any part in this debate but for some remarks made by some hon. members who have preceded me. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Baxter) the other day made the following statement, and although I cannot say that I have caught the true significance, of his remarks, I wish to read it to the House. Referring to the Prime Minister, he said:

> My hon. friend said that the entrance of a third party gave the Conservative party in many cases the opportunity for victory; but he will find that in many constituencies which his own party carried, their success was very largely due to the same fact—I am told his own former constituency, for example. I do not know whether down by the sea it is only a wraith of political mist, but something drifted to us there in the atmosphere—perhaps it came over from Prince Edward Island—that there would not have been entire sorrow or great heartburning in my hon. friend's party if there had been a minority instead of a majority for him in North York.

Now, I fail to understand what my hon. friend means. If he has any reference to the county of Prince, which the hon. Prime Minister represented in this House for two years, and which I have the honour to represent at the present time, I may say that he is altogether astray in his supposition. If there is one constituency in this Dominion more than another where the Prime Minister is regarded as a personal friend to whom the people wish to pay every tribute of respect and wish every success, it is the county of Prince, P.E.I. Further, if I may be pardoned any personal references, at the time that the hon. Prime Minister was chosen leader of the Liberal party I, along with some other local men, was spoken of as a possible contestant for the seat, but we were only too glad to make way for our leader and allow him to enter this House through the portals of the county of Prince. Again, when the general election was on this fall, a delegation came from the province and waited upon our leader and again offered him the opportunity of allowing his name to go before the Liberal convention. I heartily concurred in that action. If the hon. member for St. John has reference to our attitude in the province of Prince Edward Island, I wish to tell him that he is drawing on his imagination, and that is equally apparent if we apply his reference to the Dominion generally, for throughout the length and breadth of Canada the election of the Prime Minister in North York was hailed with delight.

Reference has been made from time to time to the province of Quebec. Down in Prince Edward Island we are sometimes termed "Little Quebec", because we are pretty strong Liberals in that part of the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS: What about Nova Scotia?

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): Nova Scotia is all right. We elected one hundred per cent of our representatives to this side of the House at the last election, and I believe that if we had had the six members that were conceded to us under Confederation in that province we would today have two more members on this side of the House to swell the Liberal ranks The county I have the honour to represent contains a large percentage of French-Acadians, and a more loyal and more patriotic people cannot be found in any part of this fair Dominion. Their war record can safely be put in comparison against that of any other part of the country, and their patriotic services on that occasion brought forth plaudits from the whole of Canada. Personally, I am very proud to represent one of the constituencies of Prince Edward Island whose people of every class proved themselves so patriotic and so true to our national ideals. In this connection I would pay special tribute to our noble women. I do not say that the people of the island are all Liberal, they are divided in their political allegiance as are the people of every other province; but whether Liberal, Progressive or Conservative, they have high ideals and take a great interest in the government of the country.

Possibly I should be over on the other side of the House with my farmer friends. I happen to be a farmer, and in that capacity I represent largely the viewpoint of the agriculturists.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: You are in the right place here.

Mr. MACLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): Previous to the election some of my Progressive friends did me the honour to suggest that possibly I might let my name go before their convention as their candidate. I appreciated the honour very much, but believing that possibly within the lines of the Liberal party we could achieve our ends and get as good legislation in the interests of our agriculturists as in any other party, I could not accede to their request. I was only too glad to take up the fight for the good old Liberal party again, and I am glad to say that in a three-cornered contest we were able to win with the largest majority that was ever rolled up in the history of that constituency.

Now, Sir, I have every sympathy with the views advanced by our Progressive friends on the opposite side of the House. I know they have their own difficulties, and I understand their desire to improve their marketing conditions. They are to-day, I believe, asking for a Wheat Board, and if I understood the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell) aright yesterday, I think he tabled a memorandum on that subject. We are willing to give our Progressive friends every assistance. If the establishment of such a board is equitable, just and right, it is only fair that they should have it. I am not conversant with every phase of the subject, but I am eager to learn, and I shall be glad if our Progressive friends will give us on this side of the House every information in relation to the subject so that we may be able to discuss it intelligently and endeavour to understand their viewpoint.

Down in the Maritime provinces we have our own difficulties to overcome, as has been pointed out by previous speakers in this debate. Our natural market is the New England States, and we would naturally desire to sell our products there whenever possible. Just to give an illustration of how we are handicapped in the matter of trade at the present time on account of the Emergency Tariff which was put in force by the United States about a year ago, I might cite one or two experiences that have been encountered. First of all let me say that I have pointed out to our people at home that no party in Canada can remove that Emergency Tariff; it is up to the United States to say when they will remove that barrier and let our products enter that market, and we can hardly expect them to do it until they are good and ready. But here, for example, is what we are up against in the province of Prince Edward Island. We enjoy a large trade in potatoes, but this year we are obliged, when shipping potatoes to the American markets, to pay a duty of 25 cents a bushel. This money had to be paid at the port of entry in American funds before the produce would be received for shipment. Yet in the face of that handicap the Seed Potato Growers' Association shipped to the United States over 160 carloads of potatoes. We also produce in Prince Edward Island a large number of lambs which we are obliged to market each fall; and last year we could get a better price for our lambs in the American market, even after paying $1 per head duty, than we could elsewhere. I think these illustrations should cause our friends who opposed the reciprocity agreement in 1911 to realize what an injury the rejection of that agreement was to the Maritime provinces at least. If there is any province in this fair Dominion that would be benefited by such an agreement it is the province of Prince Edward Island. I think the same thing applies with equal force to the provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

It has been said on different occasions that our channels of trade should run east and west, but for our province the natural channel is in the other direction; and we have lost money every year when we could not sell our surplus products in the United States market. Despite this fact various politicians have been making efforts to divert our trade from its natural channel. Of course, the law of supply and demand exercises an important influence in trade matters, and in years when there is a crop shortage at home we may find a market in Canada. Generally speaking, however, when we have a full crop there is no possibility of our selling our surplus products in the home market. Past history therefore has not substantiated the theory that the building up of manufactories in Canada can be depended upon to provide a home market for our products.

I do not know that I need to discuss the immigration question at any length. I believe this country of ours has within its borders at the present time about all the people that we can handle and support to the best advantage. There is one thing, however, that I would like to touch upon: For some years past we have had railway harvest excursions from the Maritime provinces to the West which have induced a large number of our young people to leave home. In the West they obtained a few months' work, but I am sorry to say that our Progressive and farmer friends there do not go in for mixed farming to the extent that they perhaps ought to do, and failing to get employment upon the farm many of these young folks from the East have drifted to the large cities of the West and joined the great ranks of the unemployed. The result of this process is that the Maritime provinces are being, to a certain extent, depopulated. Hence I question whether this policy of running excursions from the East to the West is one that should be continued; perhaps the western provinces might find labour closer home and the present policy of draining the eastern provinces of young men might be discontinued. As to immigration I think the immigrants brought to this country should be very carefully selected.

It would seem that one has to be very careful in making remarks upon the Civil Service Commission—it is a very delicate subject to speak about. The ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton) brought the hon. members for Halifax to task for having appointed a committee from their constituency to deal with civil service organization. The civil service system is possibly a good thing carried too far, but the question is, has it in the past been fairly administrated in the best interests of the country? Our friends opposite, when they came into power, indulged in wholesale dismissals. The vacancies thus created were not filled upon merit but in accordance with record of the appointees as good party workers and good party men in their respective ridings. Immediately afterwards, when all positions were filled with their friends, the Civil Service Act was invoked and the lid was nailed down with respect to future appointments, which was not a fair deal. To give fair effect to the Civil Service Act all public positions throughout the Dominion should have been vacated and refilled on the basis of merit, after passing a successful examination.

An hon. MEMBER: The Civil Service Commission should be an independent tribunal.

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince, P.E.I.): Certainly it should be. If the appointments were made in the impartial way which I have suggested there would be no dissatisfaction with the civil service. The people may not want all the patronage system back, but there is considerable dissatisfaction with the manner in which appointments have been made in the past.

With respect to the railway question a peculiar position obtains in our own province. There, the question is not so much one of co-ordination of the whole railway system of Canada as it is, perhaps, one of standardization. It may not be clear to all hon. members just what is meant by that. Let me explain that in Prince Edward Island we have a narrow-gauge railway. A few years ago the car ferry was put into operation between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, which enabled mainland cars to be brought over into our province. As a result, part of our railway system was standardized to allow the standard-gauge cars to run over our railway, but there are still large portions in the eastern and western districts of Prince Edward Island which have not yet been standardized, and over which the wide gauge or standard trains from the mainland can run. With reference to the question of shipping potatoes at the present time, we can only ship them over the standardized portion of the road, or the main feeders. Only in the spring months can our farmers get cars and ship out potatoes safely, and the farmers on the narrow-gauge section of the railway are handicapped and are unable to ship their potatoes at all till the spring of the year. I say it is very unfair to operate this road in this way. We had the Minister of Railways down there, and, after seeing the conditions, and looking at it from a business standpoint, I am sure he is convinced that it would be in the interests of the railway system, even from a business standpoint—because it would save all the transferring of freight—to standardize that road immediately, and put each section of the province on an equality with respect to the railway accommodation. I have every confidence that that matter will be taken up and brought to a successful conclusion at a very early date, and also that improvements needed at Alberton and Cape Traverse will be made.

Regarding the Intercolonial railway, I am entirely in accord with everything that has been said by the members from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Immediately upon the headquarters being moved from Moncton to Toronto, we in the East began to get the worst end of the deal, and ever since then freight rates have not worked to the advantage of the shippers of our province. No doubt the other members that are here from Prince Edward Island are in the same position as myself. They are flooded with telegrams from merchants down there, asking for reduced rates on shipments of potatoes. The market for potatoes is so limited, and the freight so high, that it takes almost one car of potatoes to put two others on the market. The people down there are asking that a special freight rate be arranged to allow us to ship out this year's crop. Our friends in the West are asking for a Wheat Board. Wheat can be kept over the season, it is not a perishable product. We have a perishable product; if it is not shipped out within a month or so, it is an entire loss to the producer. I think if this matter is brought fully before the Minister of Railways he will see that we get some relief. We are all at one regarding the lowering of the freight rates substantially on all products. The fisheries of the Maritime provinces are a very important question, which I will not touch upon, but I think, in view of the large amount of money spent yearly on agriculture, that more assistance should be given to fisheries in the Maritime provinces, and I trust this Government will use their influence in that direction.

The tariff has been discussed from different angles, and we have heard some people say they want a tariff for revenue purposes, and some say they want a protective tariff. And some contend that a protective tariff and tariff for revenue purposes are the same thing. To my mind, there is all the difference in the world between a tariff for revenue purposes and a protective tariff. A protective tariff, to my mind, defeats the object for which it was intended—that is if it was intended to produce revenue—because once you put a tariff as high as 25 or 35 per cent, which shuts out importation, you get no revenue; you protect the manufacturer to a certain degree, and any extra amount on the price of the article you buy goes into the pockets of the manufacturer, instead of into the revenue of the country. A tariff for revenue purposes should be a low tariff, say 10 or 12 per cent, or as low as it could be made, which would allow the people of this country to import goods from the United States if they required them, at a reasonable price, and, at the same time, contribute a reasonable amount to the revenues of the country. I believe that our Progressive friends are with us to a large extent on that question. I do not think that they believe the time is opportune now for introducing free trade in this country, because they realize that the financial conditions of the country are such that we should move very carefully. But we want a revision of the tariff. I think if any company cannot now compete with a foreign company on a tariff of 10 or 12 per cent, or a low tariff, it would be better for that company and better for the country that the company should go into some other line of business than for us to have to pay the increased price and so keep them in business, at the expense of the consuming public.

I come now to a question which has received some attention from members on the opposite side of the House, and I think I shall be pardoned if I refer to it. That is the question of the natural resources of Canada. The hon. leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen) in speaking the other day, did me the honour to refer to the campaign literature that was used in my constituency at the last election. He said—

> Why, the leader of the Government elected one of his supporters in this House, even the hon. member who succeeds him in the representation of the county of Prince, by advancing a claim on behalf of Prince Edward Island that that province had millions of dollars of interest in the resources of Western Canada. I read from an advertisement published under the heading "Why vote for MacLean?" Among other reasons, none of which appeal very strongly to those who have had experience in this House, the following is given:

"Because by doing so you will be upholding your birthright in the public domain of the western provinces, in which millions of dollars are involved and justly coming to us, in spite of Mr. Crerar's contention and assertion to the contrary, and we can surely do with that money now."

Now, Mr. Speaker, if this is not true in its entirety, I can surely say that the last portion of the paragraph is absolutely true, that we can do with that money now, because in Prince Edward Island we have to pay fairly high taxes as a province. The candidate of the Opposition in the last election, a gentleman for whom I have every respect, was one with me on this question, and he had helping him in that campaign an outstanding constitutional lawyer, who elaborated this claim to a very large extent, and pointed out that the Maritime provinces certainly had an equity in those lands. Referring to the article which appeared in the paper down there, it is news to me if the Conservative party are taking the opposite stand to-day. I feel that in our province it is not a political question. Both Liberals and Conservatives down there are one in regard to this question. I may tell my Progressive friends that the candidate representing their party, a very intelligent gentleman, took the stand that we had an equity in these lands, and that he was very sorry the leader of the Progressive party had taken the stand he did in regard to the western lands, and that it would be his duty, if elected to this House, to try to show them that the leader of the Progressive party was wrong in his attitude as far as the eastern provinces were concerned, and that he would use his best endeavours to make his Progressive friends see eye to eye with the eastern provinces on that question. I was glad to hear the hon. gentleman who has just spoken develop the claim of British Columbia on this question to some extent. The Maritime provinces—Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—take the same stand, and I wish to also give some attention to this question. I wish to quote from an article prepared by a gentleman in Nova Scotia, a member of the local legislature there—Mr. Tory. This is a good Conservative name, and one would suppose that his compilation of the facts would be fairly conservative. He sets forth a claim somewhat as follows, and with which I am in accord:

Compensation as an equivalent for lands reserved for school purposes for the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Compensation as an equivalent for cash subsidies paid to the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, purporting to be in lieu of lands.

Compensation as an equivalent for land granted to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec in which the people of the Maritime provinces had a proprietary interest in common with the people of the other provinces of Canada.

Compensation for the nonfulfilment of certain obligations respecting the Maritime provinces, clearly set forth or implied under the terms of the British North America Act.

I do not wish to quote at too great length from this article; but on March 26, 1919, certain questions which had been put on the Order Paper of this House with regard to those western lands which were received, were answered, as per Order Paper No. 17,412, as follows:

1. How many acres of land have been set aside by the Federal Government for school purposes in each of the provinces of Canada?

The answer was:

Manitoba, approximately, 7,993,600 acres; Saskatchewan, approximately 8,421,000 acres; Alberta, aproximately, 7,798,600 acres.

In answer to question No. 2, it was stated:

Provided, that on a township being surveyed, should such sections or either of them, or any part of either, be found to have been settled on and improved, then and in such case the occupant or occupants, conforming to the requirements of this Act shall be confirmed in such possession.

Question No. 3:

What is the amount to the credit of each province on account of school lands with the Federal Government?

In answer to this question, we find that there is to the credit of the three Prairie provinces the following amounts in round figures: Manitoba, over $4,000,000; Saskatchewan, over $7,000,000; Alberta, over $4,000,000; making a total, in round figures, of about $16,000,000.

Then question 4 reads:

What amount has been paid by the Federal Government to each of the provinces to date on account of school lands?

The answer being:

Manitoba	$2,576,568 52
Saskatchewan	2,397,978 45
Alberta	2,108,440 35
Total	$7,082,987 32

Of course, interest at the rate of 5 per cent is all that is supposed to be paid on that amount.

The fifth question reads:

What is the average amount received per acre in each province on account of school lands?

The answer is:

	Per acre
Manitoba	$ 9 72
Saskatchewan	17 92
Alberta	13 54

Question No. 6:

What is the approximate value of the school lands unsold in each province?

And the answer is:

Including the unsurveyed territory, and estimated at $7 per acre in Manitoba, $10 in Saskatchewan, and $9 in Alberta, which is considered a fair valuation, the approximate value of unsold school lands in each province is as follows:

Manitoba	$49,778,000
Saskatchewan	69,672,000
Alberta	55,408,000

If those answers are anything like correct, it will be seen that a very large amount of money is involved in these western lands. I do not say that possibly this money can be realized, but that is the price that was set upon those lands in the answers to the questions put on that occasion.

Coming down to the question of what proportion should go to each of the Maritime provinces, I have the following figures: Nova Scotia, with a population which is 6.8 per cent of the population of Canada should be credited on actual credits, with $8,000,000, and on contingent credits, with $65,000,000; New Brunswick, with a population which is 4.9 per cent of the population of Canada, should have actual credits of $6,000,000, and contingent credits of $46,000,000; and Prince Edward Island, with a population which is 1.3 per cent of the population of Canada should have actual credits of $1,710,000. On this item alone, at 5 per cent, the province of Prince Edward Island should receive $85,531 annually. Therefore, the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Meighen), who took exception to this little editorial that appeared in a Prince Edward Island newspaper, will see that in view of the facts given in this House when his government was in power, he cannot complain too much regarding this article:

Coming to the claims of Prince Edward Island, I think we have outstanding claims other than those outlined in the remarks that I have made so far. When Prince Edward Island entered Confederation, we were credited with $50 per head of the population or $4,700,000. Prince Edward Island was building her railroad at that time, costing in round figures $3,000,000. Immediately upon our entering Confederation, that railroad was handed over to the Dominion Government, and the cost of the railroad was deducted from our credit at Ottawa. If we had been paid 5 per cent on our first credit allowance, we would be receiving $235,000 annually, as a subsidy from this source alone; whereas, on account of the cost of the railway being deducted from this credit allowance and then the railway handed over to the Dominion—although this railway may not have been a great asset to the Dominion, it cost the province that amount of money —along with other withdrawals that were made from capital account, our credit balance was reduced to $775,000, on which we received five per cent, or the small sum of around $38,000 annually in subsidies. I leave it to my hon. friend from British Columbia who made a case for his province, if that is a fair proposition. If it is fair that land in British Columbia, which, they claim, was handed to the government before they could get their railways built should be handed back to the province of British Columbia, now it is equally fair that this $3,000,000, which we paid for the railways of Prince Edward Island, should be put back to our credit and we should receive 5 per cent on that amount.

Another question is this, that we received a subsidy of $20,000 some years ago, and Sir Charles Tupper advanced the claim then that we should receive that on account of large developments of railways and canals throughout other parts of this Dominion. That being the case, what is the situation to-day when the Dominion has taken over the Canadian National railways and become responsible to all the provinces for their huge railway obligations, that it has wiped off the slate and taken over those obligations along with certain other obligations to the banks of our country? If it was true back in Sir Charles Tupper's time that we should receive $20,000 annually on that score, what is our position to-day when we consider the tremendous expansion of railways and canals throughout this Dominion?

Another question is with regard to population. When Prince Edward Island entered Confederation, we were to receive fifty cents a head of our population up to 400,000. It was anticipated then that the population of Prince Edward Island would increase to such an extent that we would receive this fifty cents per head on 400,000, and Quebec and Ontario were in the same position. This agreement worked out splendidly for the provinces of Ontario and Quebec, because their population kept increasing by leaps and bounds, and we find that after reaching a population of 400,000, those provinces came back, in 1905, and had all those limitations swept away and the population limit set at 2,500,000, on which they were to receive 50 cents per capita in subsidies.

What do we find with regard to Prince Edward Island? Prince Edward Island's population has remained practically stationary since her entry into Confederation, and on account of not being able to retain her population on the whole, her participation in the Canadian Confederation has not been greatly beneficial to her; in fact it has been detrimental. In the matter of population we are, if anything, rather in a worse position than we were in 1871 before going into Confederation. Prince Edward Island, as well as Quebec and Ontario, was allotted 80 cents per head of population up to a population of 400,000, but that little province, far from attaining that population, has, as I have said, remained stationary and her sons and daughters have gone to the western provinces to swell their population on which they secure $1.50 per capita in subsidy. When Quebec and Ontario reached the limit of 400,000 they applied for an increase, and the subsidy for those provinces was fixed on a new basis, the limit of population being increased from 400,000 to 2,500,000. Where does Prince Edward Island come in on that score? We undoubtedly have a strong claim in this matter that cannot be controverted, because it is overwhelmingly obvious that Prince Edward Island has not benefited to the same extent under the Confederation as the other provinces have done and should claim consideration. I submit that this question is one that should receive the most careful attention. I do not wish to take up too much time of the House, but I am fully in accord with what has been said by hon. members from British Columbia, that when the question is opened up it should be given sympathetic consideration and that a fair and equitable adjustment of the whole matter ought to be made, having regard to the peculiar claims of every province. I believe that our friends have a right to their natural resources, and I suggest that they should be equally fair to other provinces, especially to Prince Edward Island, the little sister of Confederation. On the question of natural resources, as on the question of the tariff, I take exactly the same position as I took during the recent campaign.

Mr. C. H. DICKIE (Nanaimo): In my first address in this House, Mr. Speaker, I purpose being very brief; but I cannot let the opportunity pass without extending to you, Sir, my sincere congratulations on your elevation to an office which I know you will fill, as you are so eminently fitted to fill it, with dignity and satisfaction. I also desire to congratulate the younger men who moved and seconded the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. They acquitted themselves splendidly in their maiden speeches, and in the discharge of a difficult duty.

As regards the lady member who represents Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail), I hope she will find political life pleasant and will exercise a refining influence on our assembly. Some mention was made of the fact that the Conservative party had extended the franchise to the women of the country. I may say that a great many of us in the West did not at one time view with pleasure the granting of the franchise to women. We had, as we still have, a profound respect and regard for them, and we thought, perhaps in an old-fashioned way, that it might detract from their charm if they entered the field of politics. We believed that the sex for whom we have so much admiration and love were temperamentally not fitted to cope with the intricacies and the intrigue of public life, and at that time we would rather have seen them engaged in an occupation less open to unpleasant influences.

But I come from a part of this great Dominion which has, perhaps, a greater proportion of British-born people than any other; and while I am not going to "wave the flag," I may say that when the call came from the Motherland, our country was denuded of its male inhabitants. Even men as old as I am dyed their hair and moustaches, locked their doors and boarded up their windows, and went to the war, without any flag-flapping. The younger women went as nurses, and those that remained at home donned the clothes that their fathers or their husbands had left, went to work in the fields, and even performed the hard task of cleaning cowsheds. I have seen women of gentle birth, Sir, toiling all day long in the fields in male attire, and, at night, making bandages and knitting socks for the men who were away. When we witnessed these things we learned a tremendous lot about our women folk of which we had no conception before, and we concluded that there was nothing that we would not willingly concede them. We therefore gave them the franchise unreservedly. In contradistinction to this class of people, we have in our Western country a disturbing element of Socialism. We have men waving the red flag, men without any patriotic instincts, men without regard for country, frustrating our efforts; and while these noble self-sacrificing women did all they could to further our cause, these other people put every obstacle in their way. If therefore you can give such men the vote, then by all the rules of the game, the ladies ought to have it.

I was much impressed with the eloquent remarks of the member for Port Arthur (Mr. Manion) in his appeal for tolerance and a better feeling among the people. That is what we feel in British Columbia. We have no sectional animosities there. In the district I come from there are many French Canadians, who are among the best men I have known, and they work as heartily as the rest of us do. They did all they could to promote the great things that happened a few years ago. We have the best wishes in the world for them, and I wish we had thousands more like them.

Now, as you know, we have in our province of British Columbia a little railway trouble such as exists in other parts of the Dominion. We have a railway known as the Pacific and Great Eastern, and I understand that quite recently the Premier of British Columbia paid a visit to Ottawa to try to induce this Government to round out in some way the national system of railways so as to take over our road. We in British Columbia were led to believe that this was one of the reasons of his visit; but so far as we were able to learn, he went back with his Pandora's box intact. I have not heard that he accomplished what he sought to have done. As a resident for many years in British Columbia, although I might look at this matter purely from a parochial standpoint and might contend that it might not be in the best interests of that province that the request of its Premier should be acceded to, at the same time, considering the matter in a broader light, from the standpoint of the whole of Canada, I would offer no objection to the Dominion Government's taking charge of the Pacific and Great Eastern railway. The railway policy has been dealt with by men who are better qualified to speak upon it than I am. I intended to say somewhat harsh things in respect to the Grand Trunk Pacific, but I have been in a way disarmed by the remarks of the member for Skeena (Mr. Stork), whom I have known for a long time. I have known his city since its inception, and its people have striven hard to advance its interests. No one who has not been in that northern country knows what men have to confront there, the obstacles they surmount in their supreme optimism and the great efforts they make to develop the potentialities of that country into a realisable asset that will benefit the whole Dominion.

The Grand Trunk Pacific was a tragedy. However, geologists tell us that the great Laurentian plateau is the greatest mineral-bearing area in the world, and it may in time make all these railroads profitable. You can see what has resulted from the little development that has taken place in Northern Ontario, and the Laurentian plateau embraces the largest body of pre-Cambrian rocks in the world, in which we might expect to find greater mineral deposits than anywhere else in the world. There may come a time, Mr. Speaker, when that northern unknown section of Canada may be our chief asset. There is every reason to believe that we have wonderful potential riches in that country, and who can say whether or not the Grand Trunk Pacific railway will become one of the most important railways in this great country of ours at some distant date? We certainly hope it will.

I may say, however,—and in doing so I am not going against any of the tenets of the Conservative party—that I hold very strong views with respect to government ownership of railways. I do not think it is possible for a great railway system to prosper under government ownership. I have seen a great deal of it in my time, and I know you do not get the same loyalty from the officials of a government-owned road; you do not get a hundred different things that are necessary to the success of a railway and that are found in efficiently managed private enterprises. I will not go any further into that question for fear I should say something which would embarrass the people who occupy higher positions than I do. But if the time ever comes when these roads can be turned over to some other competent management, I say, let them go. We in Canada are big enough to exercise proper supervision over any corporation, no matter how big it may be. Parliament is supreme in the land, and can say: "Thus far shalt thou go, and no further." If every part of Canada sends to Parliament its broadest and most able men, we need not fear monopolies or anything else in that line; we can look for what is great and good and best for all the people.

Our manufacturers, without whom we cannot exist, seem to be entirely ignored by the good people to the left of me. And I am not going to sugar-coat any pills for these gentlemen, as is done by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. I have not heard from members of the Progressive party a word of anxiety for the welfare of our great manufacturing class, and our great labouring class, who depend upon those manufacturers for their livelihood. Hon. gentlemen to my left seem to say: "If we can get our machinery a little cheaper, we do not care what becomes of the manufacturers." Let me tell you that if the tariff were completely abolished on all mining and agricultural machinery—we have in mind the doleful picture which members of the Progressive party have presented of themselves—they would not be made prosperous. The whole country is almost in the throes of despair, and in the United States it is the same. Hon. gentlemen say we have restricted markets. Well, what have we to do with the restricted markets? They are due to the action of just such a body of men as my hon. friends to my left, except that they are on the other side of the imaginary line. The Fordney tariff is designed to protect farmers; it was forced on the United States Government against the wishes of the consuming classes by a great body of just such earnest gentlemen as my friends of the Progressive party are. And I admit that they are very honest and very earnest gentlemen. Why, one hon. gentleman, speaking this afternoon, blamed the late government because men out west could not ship their cattle, owing to the restricted market for cattle. What have we to do with that market? How can we control the situation? We should be pleased to send our cattle across the line, but we have nothing to do with the Fordney tariff. You may come back and say: Well, the Conservative party is to blame for not accepting reciprocity when it was introduced by the gentlemen whom we all admire and who are now in office. But there was a proviso in that pact to the effect that it would be terminated in two years, I believe, on the wish of either party.

Mr. FIELDING: If my hon. friend will permit me, he is quite mistaken; there was no proviso of that character. It was not a treaty at all; it was an agreement for mutual legislation, which either party could abrogate at any time. No particular time limit was mentioned.

Mr. DICKIE: I thank my hon. friend for the correction, but that makes it all the worse.

Mr. FIELDING: It is all the better.

Mr. DICKIE: I have spent many happy years with our friends across the line. I know them and respect them. You can deal with American corporations and with American individuals amicably and pleasantly; they are among the most pleasant people in the world. But when you submit to that great country a pact or treaty which has to go before their Senate, you are confronted by the most cold-blooded men in the world, men who talk in United States terms and United States terms alone. Unless therefore, your pact or treaty was such as to be regarded favourably by that Senate, I do not think it would amount to much. I am sorry indeed that such troublous times prevail in the West, but you hear the same story from the farmers in the United States. The farmers are as hard up there as they are in our Northwest.

The manufacturers of Canada are not making any profits. People cry out and say: This and that concern; this manufacturing interest, is away over-capitalized. What, Sir, does it matter whether the capital is $1,000,000 or $10 if no profits are being made? Very few corporations in Canada to-day are operating at a profit.

Now, I wish to say just a few words with respect to the province in which I reside. I thought when I came here that hon. members would speak as representing the whole of the country, but I find that each man is talking for the particular district he represents. Hon. gentlemen from the Maritime provinces—that weird, spooky land—have spoken of nothing relating to matters beyond their own confines. I could not help thinking, when listening to some hon. gentlemen from that part of the country, that past eminent statesmen must have turned in their graves and that their shades are walking nightly over that country as a protest against political actions at the present time—which may account for the spooks.

We have in the district in which I live, and in that politically lawless region of my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), the most important coal mines in the West. Unfortunately, owing to the nature of the geological formations, the mining of our coal is an extremely expensive operation. It could be mined at a profit until petroleum or fuel oil came down to $2.75 a barrel. Three barrels of fuel oil represent in heat units one ton of coal, and our coal cannot be mined and put on cars at less than $8 a ton. The result, therefore, is detrimental to the development of our coal mines. I realize that the use of fuel oil is of great advantage on steamships, and I should hate to see the duty upon it placed so high as to keep it out of our country, much as some of my constituents would like to have that happen. I remember some years ago in a trip across the Pacific that one day we were going very slowly. I happened to be well acquainted with the captain, and I said to him: "What is the matter; we are not making time?" He said: "I am not running this ship, Dickie; the Firemen's Union of San Francisco is running it." That is what was happening on that ship; when the firemen wanted to work a little harder they could speed her up, and vice versa. I understand that the same condition applies in many cases to coastwise vessels. if you go down into the engine-room or stokehole of a steamer on which fuel oil is used, everything is clean and in order, and no effort is required to keep the ship going at full speed. Now, when that Quebec manifesto was given out as to what the Prime Minister was going to do with other matters, it was stated that fuel oil was to be placed on the free list. My opponent in Nanaimo, the editor of a paper, immediately took the matter up with the present Prime Minister. You can understand that the announcement created a great deal of anxiety among the coal mining population of twenty thousand people; because if the duty were taken off fuel oil all these people would be idle, and the result would be a menace to the country. Mr. Booth undoubtedly wired for some consolation on the subject, and the hon. Mr. Mackenzie King replied as follows:

> Replying to your wire I would say that in any revision of tariff under a Liberal administration in the interests of producers and consumers as proposed, our first consideration will be the position and needs of our own industries as related to competing industries of the other countries. This applies, of course, to coal mining operations on Pacific coast in relation to fuel oil industry, as well as to all other branches of industry in Canada. Tariff revision under a Liberal policy will take due account of both consumers and producers and such revision as may be necessary will be effected only after most careful investigation of the probable effects in every direction.

Well, this telegram was spread broadcast. We simply laughed at it and remarked that it did not say anything,—which was pretty nearly right. Another message apparently came here, and another wire was sent in reply by Hon. Mr. Mackenzie King, in these words:

> Your wire received respecting statements being made by supporters of the present Government that if the Liberals are returned duties will be removed on fuel oil thus destroying the Nanaimo coal industry. Such statements cannot be too vigorously denied and you have my full authority to give them the most explicit denial. I have repeatedly stated in the present campaign that no legitimate industry earning a legitimate profit need have any fear of the consequences of a Liberal tariff revision.

That was right straight from the shoulder, Mr. Speaker, and it allayed the fears of that coal mining population, and undoubtedly added to the votes which my opponents received, but it gave us a better feeling all round, because, although we have decided views on politics, we want to see done that which is best for the country. If that coal mining industry had been prostrated it would have been most disastrous to our western country, for we were at our wit's ends with fellows waving the red flag and crying out for this and that, and I do not know what might have happened.

There is another matter I wish to speak on very, very briefly now I see the genial face of our Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Lapointe). As you know, we have on the Pacific coast immense fisheries. I can remember years ago when I used to go to Alaska and knew the coast very well, from Alaska down; you would see nobody but Indians fishing, and they were fairly good fishermen. A little later the white men came along, and they and the Indians did all the fishing, making good big pay at the work. Whether or not they became lotus eaters in that mild climate I do not know, but they did not exert themselves quite as hard as they might have. Later on we used to see a few Japanese at each cannery. But now you can go in that north land, as my hon. friend from Skenna (Mr. Stork) has said, and you will see nothing but Japanese. They control absolutely the fishing all the way down the coast. You may look at the returns and say that they have not all the fishing licenses, that there are fishing licenses given to white men. But the comparison does not disclose the actual condition: the Japanese absolutely control the fishing on our coast, which is a very serious thing when we come to take into consideration the thousands of white men we have out of employment.

I am not speaking against the Japanese evil from the standpoint of Labour leaders or of any other class. I am speaking against this evil from the standpoint of all the white people in British Columbia. I have made a close-up study of the Japanese. I have been in their country and have seen the myriads of men in the streets of their cities, and the thousands of bright eyed children going to school; I have seen men come in and take away the filth on their back and pack it up to the terraced spaces on the snow-capped mountains. They have a crowded population, and they must expand in some direction. You are treated with civility wherever you go in Japan, and the people are just as law-abiding as our own people, notwithstanding what some travellers may say. These Japanese came to our country as they had a right to do, but now they are pouring in and are increasing all the time although we do not know just where they come from. I know at the present time they are negotiating the purchase of immense timber holdings; I know they are negotiating the purchase of one of the largest sawmill plants in British Columbia; I know they are interested in our fruit lands and are buying more land everywhere. This is a shame, and I say to you, Mr. Speaker, it is a case for the diplomat, not for the demagogue, and it must be settled one way or the other and settled quickly. Our discontented white people cannot see these Japanese making money and rearing families while they themselves and their dependents are starving for the necessaries of life.

It is a sad admission to have to make, but the white man on our Pacific coast in the fisheries and some other occupations cannot compete with the Jap; he is a virile little fellow and will live on one-third of what the white man requires and yet do just as much work. It is impossible for the white man to compete with him under these conditions, and, moreover, the Jap is very industrious. You can easily see that with a little agitation what might take place on the Pacific coast to-day. Therefore I was very sorry indeed to hear my hon. friend, the eloquent member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill)—where political questions are formulated on the ouija board—I was very sorry indeed to hear him advocate that the Mounted Police be taken away from our province. We have a big socialist population—I have four thousand red flag fellows in my constituency, and he also has a large number—and we all know that but for those brave fellows working quietly, with their finger on the pulse of those fellows all the time, there would have been a very serious condition of affairs in British Columbia when we were at war across the sea: I know it.

Another matter that must be gone into very thoroughly is the condition of the returned soldier. We have heard from the farmers that they cannot succeed in the Northwest, and they are all good practical men—you can see it by looking at them. I am not saying it to get their votes, because eight out of ten of them would be Liberals if they were not Progressives. But when those gentlemen, Mr. Speaker, are a unit in saying that it is impossible to succeed in the Northwest country that they are familiar with, and they are young and virile, how can you expect to put returned soldiers on the land anywhere in the Northwest and have them succeed? That condition prevails pretty much in British Columbia. We have tried, God knows everybody has tried, to do what was right for the returned soldier, for he is dear to the heart of everybody. We have those poor fellows there who came back looking in the best of health, but now they are beginning to fade away with this miserable tuberculosis due to their having been gassed. We are doing the best we can for them. We have settled them on land under the same conditions, but they cannot succeed. Why should they when trained agriculturalists cannot succeed? There is an era of everything bad sweeping over this country at the present time, it embraces those engaged in manufacture, in mining—as I have been for many years—and everything else. The depression is not confined to this country. I do not know any of those men who are making money, unless it is the colonies of Danes we have in there, good law-abiding men, but they work harder than we would like to see our men work, and they are used to living very poorly in their own country. Without exception they are succeeding in the chicken and strawberry business.

There is just another point I wish to make in respect to the Japanese. I had to pay a visit to a district outside the great city of Seattle in the state of Washington. There were fine farm buildings everywhere and good farms, but every farm was occupied by a Japanese. The farmers that formerly lived there had leased their lands to Japanese, and were making more money out of their leases than they could by cultivating the land. I saw farms on which those Japanese were raising strawberries and whitemen were picking these strawberries. Can you not see what that means to our country? Can you not realize what the influx of such a nationality, with a birth rate such as they have, means to us? Can you not understand what will happen a few years from now, providing we do not have action in the meantime on the part of an unsettled element in our province that will precipitate international trouble? We want no trouble with Japan because that country at the present time affords a splendid outlet for our lumber and we have big dealings with it. If only our diplomats could go to the very decent and notable representative that Japan has in Ottawa and could talk matters over with that gentleman he, wise and subtle as he is, would understand that conditions cannot continue in British Columbia as they are at the present time without working to the detriment of Japan as well as of Canada.

We cannot gloss over the facts and I must speak frankly, although perhaps in doing so I may incur the hostility of some big interest in British Columbia. I do not know that I will do so if everybody out there takes a broad view of matters. After all no body could take any objection to the statement I am now making unless perhaps it might be the cannery men. I have talked plainly with the cannery men as to the existing conditions. Last year was to be one of the big years for our canners. As you know the salmon run every fourth year is supposed to be a big one. Last year it was a complete failure; and I may say that nine cannery men out of ten lost money; next season we expect the same thing. You will see, therefore, that just as soon as the cannery men can sell out their canneries to the Japanese they will do so. The Japanese will make the canneries succeed where white men cannot, by resorting to different methods and working for less profit.

Our salmon fisheries are practically being depleted. I remember the time they were so prolific that we could supply the world. Salmon when coming in from the Pacific ocean to the Fraser river go very close to the coast of British Columbia. Then they cut out into deeper water and touch Point Roberts in American Territory. The Americans erected big traps there and the salmon would come round the point and enter those traps—there was no escape for them. We protested and held conference after conference with those gentlemen asking them to abolish the traps for unless they did so it would mean that the Fraser river salmon fishing would go like that of the Sacramento and other rivers to the south. However we could do nothing with them. Then we made representations to the authorities here in Ottawa and said: "These Americans are catching all our salmon. Why should we in British Columbia be deprived of that privilege?" So traps were allowed at this point I speak of, the coast of the Island, part of which I represent. This resulted in immense catches of salmon; so between the traps and the Japs the salmon will be so nearly extinct that it will not be a profitable industry to try and can the sock-eye salmon from this time forward. So we are told by our Fishery Commissioner Mr. Babcock, and I think there is no man who is more familiar with piscatorial life in Canada or elsewhere than is that gentleman. So we see what has been the result of intensive fishing by traps and by Japanese.

There is another fish in our province whose importance I would like to draw attention to—what we call the ground fish. In all our island waters there are cod fish, salmon and other choice fish. Only a few years ago poor people who came down to the coast to spend the hot weather could get a living by going out fishing and catching these fish in abundance. Now you can go there and you would not catch one. That is the result of fishing operations carried on day after day by the Japanese. I have been there and seen them fishing the bottom of the sea just as carefully as they would pick strawberries on the soil. They would fish at one point and then by just a movement of the oar move to another place and would use live bait. If the Minister of Fisheries were here I would tell him it was one of the curses of that method of fishing to use live bait. The result is our cod banks and other fishing banks have been completely cleared out. Whereas formerly hundreds of people could provide themselves with valuable food fish and live a great deal better than many other people in the world, none of those fish can now be obtained. That is another thing the Jap has done in our country. I appeal to you gentlemen when this question comes up for consideration, as it will come up on a more appropriate occasion, to give it your best judgment. It is a matter upon which I feel very, very strongly, and I can safely say I represent the sentiment of nine people out of ten in British Columbia.

There is another question to which I desire to refer although I do not consider myself very competent to deal with it. As you know we have a dry dock in our country. There has already been expended upon it about a million and a quarter of money, and when completed it will be one of the biggest dry docks in the world. That dry dock is in my constituency and if work on it is suspended now it will mean that at least 500 people will be prevented from obtaining the necessities of life. When I last came through the port there were actually at work 280 persons. We have had the fear that perhaps operations on the dock would be suspended after the last of the present month. I certainly hope that in the interest of economy, to say nothing of good politics, work will not be discontinued on this dock at the present time with the unemployment situation as it now is. On a distinct promise that the dry dock would be constructed an important shipbuilding firm was brought out and they are extending their operations from day to day so that they may be in a position to do work on any ship that floats on the Pacific. For it must be remembered that there are many vessels operating on the Pacific which cannot be accommodated in our dock at Esquimalt. It must be remembered too that there are sixteen docks farther down the coast in American territory; and if ships needing repairs cannot enter British Columbia docks they will cross to the docks on the other side. Ships like the Manila Maru have been obliged to leave our ports and seek the other side of the line for dock accommodation which has meant a loss of thousands of dollars to Canada. Under the circumstances I ask you gentlemen to consider very seriously before endorsing the discontinuance of operations on the dock in question. I have had very many requests for money to be expended in needed directions in my constituency but I have replied that the time is not opportune to make public expenditures for such purposes. My position has been: Let us get the country on a paying basis in some way before we ask to have any money expended that we can possibly get along without. Therefore I am not going to ask the Government to expend money on a great many undertakings. I suppose I shall disappoint a great many people by that course, but I hope that I shall never be willing to sacrifice national interests to political expediency. The work on the dry dock in question should however be proceeded with at the present time.

Now in respect to the Progressives. I think, perhaps, I have said all I can say for and against these gentlemen, but I have this further utterance to make: Some statements that have been made on this side appear to have been received by the Progressives with disrespect. I have heard good arguments advanced by our party jeered at by the Progressives. I hope my hon. friends will not jeer at anything that I say. I have worked just as hard as any hon. member among the Progressives. I have never been a farmer but I have lived and worked in the mountains and it seems to me that life up there gives men a broader outlook than does life upon the plains. I hope that in my consideration of questions in this House I shall view them from a national point of view rather than from any mere narrow local outlook. I would advise our good friends from the prairies to take a trip through the great manufacturing plants of Canada and see the thousands of workmen to which they give employment. In the province of British Columbia we have some 500 manufacturing industries that I can assure hon. gentlemen would not exist for one month if we removed the duty now levied upon goods coming from the United States. That is our position in British Columbia. I do not know whether we want the Laurier-Fielding tariff exactly, but we certainly want nothing less than it provides for at the present time. I can tell my hon. friends that as a mining man and a man familiar with lumber we have been very hard hit by the duty on implements. We have to pay the duty on grain, and have to buy expensive logging machinery and other things. These machines are manufactured in the West, but they are for a particular kind of logging, which does not exist in this country. However, we would rather pay more for our machinery, and we do pay more, and many thousands of dollars go out of the western country both for logging and mining machinery. I think we are broad enough out there—because I have heard no serious protest—to realize that we have to stop this flow of gold across the line into the coffers of United States manufacturers, if we are going to succeed. We are willing to be handicapped, even considerably, if the manufacturing industries of this country can be made to succeed, and I think they should succeed. There is no reason why they should not manufacture the implements cheaply, and if they are not doing so, I think the Government should say to them "Thus far shalt thou go and no further." I can assure hon. gentlemen that the Government has very effective machinery for dealing with manufacturers who make excessive profits.

Mr. J. ARTHUR DENIS (Saint Denis) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, representing one of the large sections of the metropolis of Canada, I deem it my duty to express my feelings and especially my views on the all important questions referred to in the Speech from the Throne. For some—fortunately the small number—little is found of much importance to satisfy their curiosity; for others—and they comprise the greater number—it is the enunciation of a policy essentially Canadian of a nature to bring about beneficial results as regards the future of our dear Canada.

Allow me, Mr. Speaker, to join with those who have preceded me in this debate—and to extend to you my most sincere congratulations for the honour just bestowed upon you when selected Speaker of this House. It is an honour which reflects on all the citizens of the province of Quebec, moreover it is an homage paid to our race, of which you are one of the most distinguished and esteemed citizens. Your long experience in political life and profound knowledge of the rules and regulations of this House are a sure pledge that you will fulfil with dignity and impartiality the important duties which now devolve upon you. I must also convey my congratulations to the hon. members who moved and seconded the motion to the address in answer to the Speech from the Throne; they acquitted themselves of their task with an eloquence, ability and clearness worthy of the most tried parliamentarians. Although young, they have shown that courage is not born with years. To our colleague from South-east Grey (Miss Macphail) I wish a cordial welcome.

I shall now discuss, Mr. Speaker, the important questions which are to be considered by the hon. members of this House. Unemployment is one which specially needs our consideration. I congratulate the Government for having helped to relieve the hardships which were brought on by the lack of work. I trust they will carry on so that in the near future, our poorer classes may obtain work so as to allow them the means of providing for their families. Hard times are here and we must act. Representing a division made up of workmen, this question is of the utmost importance to me and I shall be greatly obliged to the Government for whatever they may do toward helping the working classes.

Incidentally, I come to the question of immigration, referred to in the Speech from the Throne. If we do not wish to increase unemployment, I believe we should, for some time to come, restrict immigration. What we are in need of at present is settlers, good settlers to clear our land which only requires strong arms to produce rich harvests. I shall now take up the tariff question. I have listened with much interest to the several speeches which have been made on the subject. Some lean towards a high protective tariff, others favour free trade. May I, Mr. Speaker, express my humble opinion? I believe that these two theories will not promote success nor help in the progress of our country, and if we truly wish to see Canada prosperous, we must give it a tariff consistent with its needs and with the necessities of its commerce and its industries; it must have a tariff for revenue, shaped on the whole upon the one which the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, of happy memory, gave to this country. It is the Laurier-Fielding tariff, the same which the leader of the present Government intends to adopt by applying it to the needs of the day. I place my trust in the Government, and this confidence is the more strengthened by the declaration which the Prime Minister made in this House, that he intends to govern this country with a truly Canadian spirit and that he does not wish to have his policy dictated by people across the ocean. Mr. Speaker, there are still other questions that I would have wished to express my opinion upon, but knowing that the Government will give them its special consideration and that its policy will rally all parties in the general interest of the country. Such is the hope expressed by the member from St. Denis and by the 34,000 electors whom he has the honour of representing in this House.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. D. W. WARNER (Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps, necessary for me to offer an apology for rising to speak at this time, because this debate is nearing the point where most of us would like to see the end of it in order to take up other business. I have, however, a few observations that I desire to make. I wish to congratulate you, Sir, on having been chosen to fill the position of Speaker of this House, as I think there could have been no better choice. I was very much impressed with the remark you made when you took the Chair, that: "At this moment I cease to be a party man." I was glad to hear you say that, and I am sure every one who heard you believes that you meant just what you said. I desire further to congratulate all my colleagues, because I consider it one of the greatest privileges that a man can have to come to this House to serve his country. It seems to me that greater satisfaction and pleasure could come from that position than could come from any other position that a man might be chosen to fill.

There is a reason why there has been such a large increase in the ranks of the Progressive party. The people of my constituency felt that they wanted to see their member come to Parliament as free and independent as it was possible for him to be. Considerable interest was aroused in the campaign, and throughout the campaign this political view was held and presented, that they wanted their member to come to this House to serve them, to assist in the administration of the affairs of this country and in passing such legislation as was necessary in the interest of the people. They gave me to understand, all the way through that campaign, that they did not expect me to spend my time here talking politics and working for party interests; they expected me to serve them, and they were very free in telling me all the time that they would attend to the electing part and that, when the next election came around, if I had served them properly, they would see to it that I was elected again. They wanted that job themselves; they did not want to see me spend my time here setting up a machine that would get me back into office again. No doubt there are many in this House who would not agree with that point of view; but we have been thinking new thoughts, and we have been trying to do new things. Our idea of doing new things is growing and after the next election, Parliament will either be more Liberal in its view along party lines, or have Progressives enough in it to take control of this House. That is my honest conviction.

During this debate a great deal has been said from all points of view. The Farmers have, I think, presented very well what they have had to say, and they have, I believe, spoken as clearly and logically as any hon. member, on the other side of the House or to my right, who has taken part in this discussion. This debate has, perhaps, served to acquaint us with each other and, as a result, we shall know each other better.

I have tried to listen as best I could to the speeches that have been delivered; I have tried to take every one's point of view and to consider it, and it seems that some hon. members feel that the farmers would not be satisfied no matter what they got or what the conditions were. We have, however, some idea as to what we want. I reside and have resided for practically a quarter of a century in a community where, as regards natural conditions and the handiwork of our Great Creator, wonderful opportunities have been afforded for people to live and thrive; but after a quarter of a century amongst those people, I am amazed at the condition that some of them are in, although there has never been a year in which we did not have enough for man and beast as well as something to ship out. When such a condition prevails in a country like that, there must be something radically wrong.

We are not asking for any special privilege; we object, and we intend always to object, to special privilege. The farmers have had to put up with a condition that has been almost intolerable. A great deal of the time they have been just able to make a fair living; and they have not been able to accumulate any great wealth. There are many reasons why the farmers have not prospered better than they have, although they are industrious, work longer each day than any other class of people, and work throughout the year. In the community in which I live they follow the mode of farming which is supposed, and which I believe, to be the best, namely, mixed farming; the raising of a certain number of cattle and hogs. Possibly our conditions are similar to those that obtain in other parts of the country, but I say this because we have good reason to believe that the farmers have not had a square deal compared with the advantages that have been enjoyed by some other classes in Canada.

We have a freight rate that absorbs so much of the profit to-day that it takes more to ship grain to Fort William than the farmer gets out of it himself. Our hogs and cattle are subject to about the same conditions. Our people are getting quite discouraged, and personally, I do not believe it is in the interests of other classes in Canada that the farmers should carry the burden they have to bear to-day. Perhaps this is an old story; nevertheless it is absolutely true. There has been a suspension of the Crow's Nest Pass agreement in order that the Railway Commission could fix a higher freight rate than could be charged under that agreement. We hope that this suspension of the agreement will be revoked; it has nearly everything in Canada in the air at the present time. Business cannot settle down, and transportation will not pick up unless people can ship at a profit; and while conditions are such as exist to-day people certainly cannot buy enough to pay the manufacturer what he is asking. We hope that the Government will weigh the matter seriously before disposing of this question of the Crow's Nest Pass agreement, because we believe that freight rates can come down to pre-war level at least if the agreement is once more put into effect.

Now, we have an immigration problem in Canada which demands careful consideration. It is a very important problem. I think that the whole welfare of Canada is bound up in the immigration policy which we pursue. We have too few people in Canada to exploit our natural resources, and unless we can develop the country we cannot pay off the heavy debt which we have. I quite agree that in considering the immigration question regard must be had to the proper sort of immigrant. We want people who not only know how to farm, but who will farm. But there is among the farmers a condition that is not very conducive to the encouragement of this sort of immigration to the country, and this condition must be ameliorated. The Government must realize that the first step towards securing proper immigration is to better conditions for the farmers who are already in the country.

When I came to this country, nearly a quarter of a century ago, there were coming into Canada a class of people against whom there were some complaints, and I myself rather questioned the advisability of admitting them. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, however, that I have been among those people and have observed the progress which they have made, and I have come to the conclusion that they are good settlers. They have proved a good asset to Canada. Of course, I do not say that, once in a while, there is not an objectionable one among them, but those who came here twenty or twenty-five years ago and settled on new land have done as well as farmers could be expected to do under the circumstances they have had to cope with; and it is due to them that Canada has reaped so large a profit from the soil. There was an element about the election of 1917 that was not very satisfactory. Those people were berated, and many of them were condemned without personal reasons. Now, Sir, I can quite conceive the feelings, under such condemnation, of any man or woman, who has taken the oath of citizenship in this country. I took that oath myself. I made the pledge that I would be a good citizen of the Dominion of Canada and that I would do the best I could to uphold its dignity and promote the welfare of all its people. I think, therefore, that any naturalized citizen who has observed the laws of the country and has played his part in developing its resources is entitled to the consideration of its citizens.

In the election of 1917 many Canadian citizens who are just as good as I am were disfranchised. I do not say that we should throw our doors open to the extent of allowing into this country people who will not be patriotic, who will not be faithful to Canada and her traditions. But I want to tell hon. members of this House that when I became naturalized it was as an individual, not as an American. Everyone who becomes naturalized in this country does so as an individual, and if he keeps his pledge; if he is a good citizen, honest and honourable, it is no credit to Canada to take the franchise from him. I am not complaining, but I myself came very nearly being disfranchised at that time. One of the improvements that we ought to bring about in this country is to make our naturalized citizens feel that they share all the privileges common to the other good citizens of Canada. When I became naturalized I felt that the Canadian people were giving me all they had to give; that henceforth I should be on an equality with every other Canadian or Britisher in whatever part of the Empire he might have been born. I felt that I got that privilege, and I want to feel that I still have it. That is one thing the Government must do: make a man feel that he has good cause to be patriotic; that he has ample inducement to be a worthy and useful citizen.

Once we have the foundation prepared, then an immigration policy should be embarked upon that will bring as many good people to this country as can be assimilated; as many as we can find homes for. But we want the ground well prepared; not until those who are already on the land are living under the best possible conditions can you hope to bring in people from other countries, no matter whether they are farmers or labourers. If you pour water into the middle of a basin, it will spread out and find its level. If you make conditions on the land attractive to those who are now working there, others will be very glad to take up farms and produce. All we ask is that something be done along this line, and that the Government do the best it can to find markets for the produce of the farms. We do not ask that we be paid more for our produce than it is worth, but we do ask the privilege of getting it to a market and getting out of it all that is possible, less transportation to that market. We believe that it is possible for the Government to obtain for us some sort of regulated market, to inaugurate some sort of co-operative, consolidated marketing scheme through which we may sell our produce without being fleeced as we have been in the past.

Speaking before the Kiwanis club of Montreal, or Toronto—I have forgotten which—Colonel Dennis, immigration agent for the Canadian Pacific Railway company, said that it was up to this Government to inaugurate an immigration scheme and get all the immigrants that it was possible to bring into the country. I agree with Colonel Dennis to this extent: we want these immigrants after we have the foundation laid. You cannot build a structure unless you first lay the foundation, and I have pointed out what that foundation must be. But if the Canadian Pacific would forego part of their guaranteed ten per cent dividend when the rest of us are making nothing, it would be as good an immigration policy as I know of. I am not suggesting that the Canadian Pacific should do business without profit, but many of the rest of us have been doing business without profit for quite a while, and at such a time we do not like to see the Canadian Pacific earning ten per cent and more.

I want to say something further about the tariff. Our friends on the right are a pretty good-looking bunch of men, and I believe they are reasonable fellows. Let me say to them: We are not asking for any privilege; we are simply asking that they and their friends get off our necks. If they are helping their friends, the manufacturers, because they are patriotic enough to keep the manufacturing of Canada going, that is all right. But we are not asking for tariff; it can do nothing for us except keep us poor. Of course, if we got too rich we might be just a little bit too hard to manage. The manufacturers are asking for special privileges. Their raw material is not on the free list, but they get a ninety-nine per cent drawback on it. We simply ask that our raw material, farm implements, be placed on the free list. We are not asking for special privilege; we are asking for equality.

But I want to say further to my hon. friends on my right that we will support them in a protective tariff on one condition. The country needs revenue, we want the country to have revenue, and if they are patriotic enough to help us to this end we will stand for a tariff. I am only speaking for myself, but I think I can speak for my colleagues also when I say that if my hon. friends on my right will stand for an excise duty on all goods manufactured in Canada, as well as a tariff on all imports, we will support them in a protective tariff, but we want the Government to get that duty instead of the manufacturer; that is what we want. Now, if those hon. members are patriotic enough to get protection on those terms and so give the treasury the money needed to meet our national expenditure, we will stay with them. I did not intend to talk tariff at all when I started in, but my hon. friend who was sitting behind me before we adjourned brought this into my head, and I want to tell you what I think. I think if our manufacturers continue their present protection policy there is going to be a sentiment strong enough to say to them: If you have protection you are going to pay the excise duty. And I will help make them do it. Then the country will get the full benefit of that duty instead of its going into the pockets of a few manufacturers.

In order to show the difference in condition between the farmers and the manufacturers, I am going to repeat a statement that I made all through the campaign which was not refuted; and I do not believe it can be refuted. Among our farmers 16,652 paid income tax amounting to $611,735. Now, that is not very many farmers when you take into account the total number. That was for the year 1920 when we had a fair crop in most parts of the Dominion. During the same year 277 manufacturers paid an average income tax of $29,087 apiece. If you take the amount of income on which their income tax was assessed compared with the income on which the farmers were assessed, you will see the great disparity, and you will also see who has been getting the money away from the farmers.

I wish the hon. member that brought these things into my head was here. I should like to tell him that he may some day be thankful to the farmers for stopping special privileges before it shall have caused the waving of more red flags in this country. The waving of the red flag I think has been caused more by special privilege than any other thing that I can remember. The hon. member, it seems to me, hinted that the Farmers were waving the red flag. I want to tell him and other hon. members that we do not see it. We want to be absolutely sure, and we are absolutely sure, that we are not asking for anything that is not best for the whole Dominion. We are not asking for special privileges that will cause the waving of the red flag. We are anxious to have better conditions, but we are not asking for those better conditions for ourselves alone; we are just as anxious for all the people to share in them.

Without going into any detail I am trying to review a little of what has been brought before this House by my hon. friends to the left. We have a banking institution that is going to be talked about, and it is going to have to be dealt with during the next year or so, and I hope this Government will see fit to amend the banking laws in such a way as will permit of the money of the country serving our people as the first consideration. That is what it was created for, to serve the people of Canada. If it is used to enrich the corporations that are doing our banking business, then I say that we are only willing for them to have a fair amount of return on the business they do and for the service they render. We want a banking system that will serve our people; that is to say, a banking system so that we can trade with all the other nations and have them feel safe to trade with us. We do not want to upset our banking conditions, but since I have been in this country on two occasions I have seen our money, or our credit, go across the line for speculation in Wall Street when we needed that money to do business. I do not believe it is conducive to the welfare of Canada to allow trading in futures and in short call loans in another country when we need that money here to carry on our business.

I have just one more suggestion to make. I referred a short time ago to taking the franchise away from a part of our people. We had an Election Act that lent itself to the most unfair conditions in 1917. Although amended for the last election, it was not yet satisfactory and it brought hardship on a great many people. We want to discard that act. I have tried to figure out how we could amend it to make it satisfactory, and I have made up my mind, after carefully studying this piece of legislation, that the best thing to do is to throw it away and enact a new measure. I believe we can have an Election Act that will permit every individual who is eligible and entitled to vote to cast his or her vote without any undue difficulty and trouble such as the present act causes, and I believe at the same time that we can embody in this new Act such restrictions as will curtail fraudulent voting and still give every citizen a chance to vote under conditions fair and just to every one.

I have talked at greater length than I intended, and it is time I brought my remarks to a close. Let me say in closing that the opportunity afforded every one of us to serve the country has never been surpassed. I believe we have problems to solve and that we should apply ourselves forthwith to the solution of them. That being the case the sooner this debate is brought to a close the better it will be.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. WARNER: The manner in which hon. gentlemen have received that statement looks like an invitation for me to resume my seat.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, go on.

Mr. WARNER: We are here to do the business of the country and I feel that in speaking at such length I have imposed upon the patience of the House, but I promise to do better in future. On resuming my seat I wish to thank hon. members for the attention with which they have listened to me.

Mr. MURRAY MacLAREN (St. John City and counties of St. John and Albert): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to discuss some of the subjects which are referred to in the Speech from the Throne, I desire to associate myself with preceding speakers in extending congratulations to you, Sir, on your elevation to the high position which you now hold, and to say that I am fully of the opinion you will discharge the duties appertaining to the chair with distinction to your self and to this House. I also desire to express my regret for the cause which has necessitated the absence of the Prime Minister from the House at this time.

Public ownership and operation of the national railway system is a question of outstanding importance which is now engaging the thoughts of the House and of the country. The Government proposes to continue the policy of public ownership and operation, and has stated that the policy will have a fair trial, carried out under the most favourable circumstances. One of the most favourable circumstances demanded, I think, is the confident and undivided attitude of the Government that will stand behind the policy. This, I take it, is lacking. It is an inherent weakness and therefore it appears to me that there is not proper justification for using with respect to this trial the term "under the most favourable circumstances." Mr. Speaker, public ownership and operation of the national railways should be viewed from a strong, broad national standpoint. The interests of all sections of the country are to be considered; and the very breadth of the Dominion adds to the difficulties in meeting the diverse requirements of the various sections of the country. What adds to the prosperity of one section adds to the prosperity of all; what creates adversity in one portion of the country has its effect on the rest. Therefore there is an interdependence, a community of interest, involved which should stimulate us to arrive at the most perfect arrangement which can possibly be reached so that all portions of the country shall receive equitable treatment.

This being the case, I deem it my duty to my constituency and to my country to draw attention to the uneasiness and dissatisfaction that now exists in the Maritime provinces concerning the railway question. This, I may say, is not due to local feeling; it is not sectional; their vision is not restricted. I am glad to be able to affirm that no portion of the country is freer from narrow prejudice or sectional feeling, or more truly inspired by patriotic and national ideals, than are the Maritime provinces. It will be admitted that for the administration of the country to be successful all portions of the Dominion must receive equitable treatment. But a feeling of uneasiness and dissatisfaction exists in the Maritime provinces; it prevails among people of all shades of politics and is reflected in the press representative of all political views—in a word it is general. Much regarding this matter has appeared in our newspapers; and the comments of the press of other provinces, principally of the Liberal press—the press supporting the Government—have been such that the condition of uneasiness to which I refer has been greatly increased.

There are two phases of the railway question on which I desire to make some remarks. The Government has taken over the Grand Trunk railway and a portion of that line runs to Portland, Maine. The question that arises is what shall be the policy of the Government regarding this portion of the Grand Trunk which runs to the seaport of Portland? Shall governmental control, to the extent that it can be made available, be directed toward the development of our own ports, or shall it partially or completely assist in the building up of Portland, or other foreign ports, to the detriment of the cities on our own coast? This is a question that is now engaging the attention of our people, especially the Maritime provinces, because it is a matter of vital interest to them and it also greatly affects the interest of the country at large. I propose to read to you extracts from some of the newspapers dealing with this subject wihch will illustrate public opinion; and I shall quote from papers supporting the present Government for the reason that they cannot be credited with any desire to embarrass the present administration, and also for the reason that hon. gentlemen opposite will give more attention to the utterances of those journals than they will to expressions of opinion by other newspapers. I propose first to quote from some of the Liberal newspapers in the Maritime provinces on this subject, and I shall now read from the St. John Globe of March 7, an article in reply to an editorial in the Toronto Globe which has not viewed the situation in the same light. It is stated here:

On another page to-day will be found a Toronto Globe editorial on Portland and the Canadian ports. The article, intended as a reply to the insistent demand of this paper that in working out the national railway problem the ports of the Maritime Provinces must be protected against government operated competition through Portland or any other foreign port, takes the broad general ground that if the government does not do this business somebody else will.

This refers to the Toronto Globe editorial:

The answer is obvious. Let them try, but do not use the resources of Canada to help them. The Dominion of Canada by and through a government commission must not own and operate a railway designed to carry to and from a foreign port trade that could and would go through the ports of the Maritime Provinces if the national system was devoting all its energies to the building up of trade through those ports. The long haul on which our Toronto contemporary lays so much stress is by no means the important factor it is represented to be. Gradients on the national system to New Brunswick are so much better than to Portland by the Grand Trunk that mileage advantage is nullified. That national system was built to keep Canadian trade in Canadian channels, but will be made to do so only if the administrators of the road are very plainly told what must be. Only a few weeks ago, when a United States Congress committee was considering a proposal which would have compelled the use of American shipping for the American carrying trade representatives of British steamship lines now doing business with the Grand Trunk at Portland declared they would have to transfer their ships to Maritime Province ports. Is it not the business of Canada to study ways and means to help them to do that very thing? The Maritime Provinces can be built up and developed only if there is Canadian co-operation. Competition by the Canadian National Railways system through Portland, with Canadian money spent to improve the terminals there, to encourage trade there, and with every Canadian National Railway employee from Montreal west to the Pacific an agent for Portland business, means stagnation in the Maritime Provinces. Canadian National co-operation with the C. P. R. in developing trade through the home ports means continued prosperity and steady development. The national idea must ever be kept uppermost in mind in the working out of the national railway scheme.

Then the same paper on March 4, says:

The fact that business has been done through St. John and Halifax is the proof that it can be done. What share will the Maritime Provinces have in Canada's trade if under the National Railway system Portland is made the national winter port? Neither the long haul nor the shipper's routing is a matter of the great importance which is so often suggested by the special pleader. It will always be for the shipper to route his freight as he likes. What is required in the Maritime Provinces is full protection against the government agents—the railway officials—routing via the competing port. The question of real importance is whether Canadian government interest is to centre in the development of home or foreign ports. Everything in reason must be done to prevent the Canadian development of a foreign port in competition with the ports of the Maritime Provinces, and everything in reason must be done to keep Canadian trade in Canadian channels.

And then it says,—and it is a Liberal paper:

That was the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier which must not be departed from by any Canadian Government.

Might I say it was also the policy of the Conservative party. The Daily Telegraph, of St. John, a well-known Liberal paper—in its issue of January 4, says:

There is a new government at Ottawa. In the near future it will be developing policies in connection with the great system of railroads under public control, and one feature of the railroad situation of sharp interest to St. John and Halifax is the Portland complication in connection with the Grand Trunk. Existing conditions would seem to demand strong co-operation by the Maritime Provinces, which are now well represented at Ottawa, in order to present the need for systematic development of Maritime ports in accordance with the policy of all-Canadian transportation.

I therefore, desire to draw the attention, especially of the Government, to the views expressed in various papers supporting their policy. I would urge, Mr. Speaker, that the policy of Canadian trade for Canadian ports be confirmed, and that the Government, so far as it is concerned, shall not be instrumental in carrying trade to foreign ports to the detriment of our own. This is vital to our interests and our prosperity.

The second phase of the railway question which I desire to deal with is that regarding the Intercolonial. We have heard speeches from the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and other members on this subject. The railway was built as a condition of Confederation, and it is so stated in section 145 of the British North America Act. It surely will be conceded that in the construction of this railway is involved its operation, and its operation under favourable circumstances, so that the provinces may do business with each other and with other portions of the Dominion. The very high freight rates which now exist are so many barriers against the profitable operation of the railway. In many cases they restrict the trade, and in some cases even prohibit it. I shall read another extract, dated February 7, which deals with an article which appeared in the Toronto Star written by an

Ottawa correspondent. The Daily Telegraph says:

> Political blackmail is the description applied by the Toronto Star's Ottawa correspondent to representations made by maritime members of Parliament to the Government in connection with Intercolonial freight rates, and the relation of that railroad to the development and prosperity of this part of the country.

I think I should state that we are informed through the press that a deputation of Liberal members of parliamemnt from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick interviewed the government recently with a view to establishing headquarters of the railway in Moncton. I am not aware of the exact request that was made, but, in general terms, I understand that it was a request that the headquarters be restored to Moncton. Then the Toronto Star's Ottawa correspondent makes some comments. The article reads as follows:

> The Star's correspondent lectures the Maritime M. P.'s at some length, and then proceeds to threaten this part of Canada with the expansion of Portland at Canadian expense—expense to which we would contribute—for the purpose of reducing the people of the Maritime division to what some people in Toronto regard as a proper state of subjection. Having declared that nearly every community in the world is to-day complaning of industrial depression and high freight rates, and having dwelt upon the need for national thinking and national unity, The Star writer proceeds as follows:
> "Furthermore, the Maritime Provinces should be the last to begin the game of political blackmail in Canada, for they are the worst equipped for playing it with success. After the next redistribution their political power will be considerably less than half the strength of either Quebec, Ontario or the West, and their proportionate weakness will steadily increase. If they set this fashion, the West or Ontario may imitate it with demands which the Maritime Provinces acutely dislike. What if Ontario and the West combined to insist that in order to save paying heavy freight rates, Portland should be made more use of as a winter port?"

There is something further that I shall not detain the House by reading. I do not know what the Liberal representatives from the Maritime provinces who waited on the Government think of this article from the Toronto Star, a paper supporting the present Government, has written regarding the nature of their views and actions. I would think questions of such moment should be discussed in a reasonable, tolerant way, so that the matters could be fairly and equitably dealt with.

The fact of the headquarters of the Intercolonial railway being situated in Toronto, a distance of something like 800 miles from the seat of operations, has proved anything but a success. I would have my hon. friends from Toronto understand that the objection is not any more to the headquarters being in Toronto than it would be to their being in Hamilton or any other town in that vicinity, but it is to the distance which separates the headquarters from the field of operations. They are simply not in touch with the wants and needs of the people using the railway. The proper place for the headquarters of a railway system is in the midst of its work. What then do the people desire? I take it that their desire is the restoration of something like what formerly existed; that is divisional control at Moncton, in order that officials might be in close communication with the business people and the industries of the locality, so that business might be done in an understanding way and that difficulties that always arise might be promptly adjusted.

It is important for us to remember that the right hon. Prime Minister of the preceding government (Mr. Meighen) made a pronouncement on this situation. He stated that, on the reorganization of the national railways, his policy would be to found a grand division of the national railways for the Maritime provinces, with headquarters at Moncton. That, I believe, would satisfy the people of those provinces and would add greatly to their prosperity. I would commend the policy of the right hon. the Prime Minister of the preceding government to the careful attention of the Government which is now in power. So much for these matters.

I wish to refer very briefly to the question mentioned in the Speech from the Throne of granting their natural resources to the three Prairie provinces. There can be no objection to that; it would seem a proper thing; but it is stated that there will be an accounting and other investigations in reference to this matter and that, on the completion of that, a report will be brought down to the House. I regret that apparently no provision is made for there being a reference so far as the other provinces have claims. The other provinces have claims. It seems to me that it is due to the provinces to be granted an opportunity of presenting those claims; and when the report comes to the House, surely it is desirable that we should have a comprehensive report rather than only a partial one concerning the Prairie provinces. I would, therefore, urge that when this matter is taken up, it be taken up in a thorough and comprehensive way, so that all questions bearing on it may be considered properly and a comprehensive report made to the House.

I have just one subject further to refer to, and that is the question of the returned soldier, and more especially the disabled soldier. It is a matter of great gratification to all Canadians to be aware of the fact that Canada has led the world in its care of returned soldiers; but we also understand that there can be no finality in a measure of this kind, because experience is of value and experience teaches that new problems arise occasionally to be settled, and naturally, from time to time, these will, I take it, come before the House for such readjustments as are found necessary and proper. In all cases and events, I assume that these matters will receive the very sympathetic attention of members of the House.

Mr. MILTON N. CAMPBELL (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with those who have preceded me in expressing to you my congratulations on your elevation to that high and honourable office that you now hold. In congratulating also the mover and seconder of the address, I wish to state that I heartily concur in the remarks of the hon. member for NorthWinnipeg (Mr. McMurray) regarding the inequalities in the franchise. Let me say that if we are ever to make good Canadian citizens of the many races that come to our shores, we must frame our institutions to command their respect and appeal to their sense of justice.

I regret exceedingly that, through an incomplete knowledge of the French language, I am not in a position to discuss the speech of the hon. member who seconded the address (Mr. Mercier), and who spoke in French. It is one of the principal regrets of my life that I have not a full and complete knowledge of the French language, and I think the time has arrived when we of the Anglo-Saxon race must give to the French language the prominence that it deserves in our national schools. I would like to live to see the day when every school child in this Canada of ours would have at least a reasonable knowledge of the tongue of our brethren of Quebec.

I also wish to congratulate the hon. members of this portion of the House, particularly our honoured leader (Mr. Crerar), for the high moral tone, the mild and conciliatory nature of their remarks and the lack in their speeches of that acerbity, so noticeable in those from the other benches. But I may assure you that a legion of avenging angels with flaming swords will not be more terrible in their wrath than will this mild and domesticated looking group if no relief is granted the farmer during this session of Parliament. Like the dame of the nursery rhymes, who went to the cupboard in search of food for her starving canine, we have come from the rural districts to see what the legislative cupboard contains for our suffering and impoverished tillers of the soil. I tender no apology to the farmer of the prairie for comparing him to that much abused, long suffering and highly intelligent animal of domesticity, for at the hands of those possessed of power, and lacking in appreciation and sympathy, the treatment accorded him has very often been singularly similar.

I do not believe that the financial position of the western farmer is fully appreciated in Eastern Canada to-day. Never in the history of the country has his burden of taxation been higher, and never before has the purchasing power of his products been lower; and I would point out that a reduction in tariffs and freight rates, and better marketing conditions, are not only necessary for a return of prosperity to the West and, incidentally, to the whole country, but are vital to the very existence and continuation of the farming industry in the Prairie provinces to-day.

Each increase in freight rates during the past four years has added a 5-degree angle to the backs of our farmers, and, in all, has moved the West a thousand miles further from the East. Tens of thousands of acres of grain stand rotting in our fields to-day because, after threshing, it would not realize the freight to ship it out. The farmer's overhead expenses have been heavy, and for the past two years he has operated at a tremendous loss that in a great many cases has meant complete ruin; and many thousands to-day, after a life time of hard work, self-denial and privation, have not sufficient assets to equal their liabilities. To the hon. members of this House, I would say: that their hands are extended in supplication to you to-day and I trust that history, in this case, will not repeat itself, but that the family cupboard will contain some small morsel essential to the preservation of the life of that most important of all industries.

I must apologize to this House for any distinction I may draw between the East and the West. I would be the last to raise any geographical discriminations. But nature has created them, our Governments have fostered and intensified them, and it is only by a reduction in the tariffs and freight rates that the work of man can be undone; and we will be left with only nature's handicap, under which we are quite satisfied to labour to the end of our days.

The question of freight rates brings into the limelight the whole railway situation, which is a problem so great as to be staggering in its immensity; and I would say to the honourable leader of the Government, (Mr. Mackenzie King) that the place that will be accorded to him in the future history of this country will be largely determined by his ability to lead us out of this railway wilderness.

Perhaps it will be considered presumption on the part of an obscure and inconsequential individual like myself to offer suggestions to this House as to how this difficulty could in part be met, but I have the word of President Wilson that the suspicion is beginning to dawn in many quarters that the ordinary man knows the business necessities of the country just as well as the extraordinary man, and emboldened by this suggestion, I now go so far as to risk some proposals of my own.

I do not wish at this particular juncture to inflict on this House a lot of wearying facts and figures. I will leave that for a future time; but I am convinced that handled in a business way, our railways can be made to pay, and I heartily agree with many hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this subject before that to this end our first duty is to consolidate, under one management, the existing roads held by the Government in order to eliminate to the fullest extent any duplication of service, either passenger or freight.

From my personal observations, and I may say that I am a practical railroad man, I am convinced that the whole system is overmanned and overstaffed, particularly at the official end, and a ruthless wielding of the pruning knife, and the total elimination of all deadwood and surplus timber, is absolutely essential to put these roads on a paying basis.

Attempts have been made to convince the public that the increases in freight rates were made necessary on account of the wages demanded by the men; but in so far as the wage of the men in charge of the rolling stock is concerned, freight can be moved more cheaply to-day than twenty years ago on account of the heavier types of engines in use, and coal consumption is less by about 70 per cent on account of improvement in the modern locomotive.

Now it is not my desire to inflict my opinions on the Government, but I submit, Mr. Speaker, that a more scientific handling of freight could eliminate a lot of waste and loss on the Government railways to-day. Any practical railway man will admit that from April 1st to November 1st freight can be handled for less than half the cost of moving it during the winter months, and in revising our freight rates we should give the summer customer the benefit of at least a part of this saving and have in effect a winter and a summer tariff which will encourage the handling of our heavy freight during the summer season. From this source alone many millions of dollars that are sacrificed to nature could be saved to humanity. By creating more steady employment this plan would also materially assist in solving the wage question. I am not unmindful of the many difficulties in the way of holding part of our grain until the following spring, but to effect the saving, farmers would soon provide extra storage, and credit conditions would in time adjust themselves to the change. We need the most competent railroad manager that North America can provide, and no salary is too big for the right man. We went to the United States to get a Van Horne; let us not stop outside the planet Mars for what we need for this big man's job. It is needless to remind you that this type of man will brook no political interference and must be given a free hand. A Roman emperor once said: "It is the fate of princes to be ill spoken of for their good deeds," and whatever policy is followed by the Government they must expect criticism. But the organized farmers are not destructionists, but constructionists. Their mission is not to destroy but to build up; and I can assure hon. gentlemen that the criticism that shall come from this portion of the House shall not be hurtful but helpful, and I trust, Mr. Speaker, that in the handling of this gigantic problem he shall also have the co-operation of the group to your immediate left.

I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speech of the hon. member for Kings, P.E.I. (Mr. Hughes), and had I been dozing or been sitting behind a screen I would have thought that the hon. member was a Progressive. At all events, he gave a Progressive speech, and I am sure he is Progressive in sentiment. I therefore take this opportunity of advising him —I am sorry he is not in his seat, but this remark will no doubt be brought to his notice—that if at any time he finds the atmosphere of the Government benches rather frigid, and the surroundings not quite as congenial as he would like, there will be a light in the window for him in this portion of the House, and the latch string will always hang on the outside. In fact, we have been seriously considering the advisability of making room at this end of the chamber for the whole Maritime group. I was also greatly interested in the speech of the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond). I regret that he, too, is absent. It was very eloquent and very lucid; in some respects it was one of the finest speeches we have listened to during this session. One thing I must give the hon. member a great deal of credit for is his frankness with regard to his stand on the tariff. There is nothing particularly wrong in that, Sir; I admire the man who will come out and tell you just where he stands, whether he is against you or not. The hon. gentleman's opinions happen to be diametrically opposed to mine, but that makes no difference. But in hearing him through I was quite convinced of the truth of what one of the hon. members of the official Opposition told me in the corridors the other day: that the hon. member for Brantford had been elected because he was more consistently protectionist than the Conservative candidate. I was surprised to hear the hon. member quote from John Bright. If I understand John Bright correctly, he would have had little sympathy for the high tariff and protectionist doctrines of the hon. member for Brantford.

I was also very much interested in the speech of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan), particularly where he described the conditions under which the Maritime provinces entered into Confederation. It is something, Sir, that I have always known but which I had earnestly tried to forget, because I wished to pass on to my children the idea that the Fathers of Confederation were actuated by higher and nobler aims than those described by the hon. member. If you will excuse a personal reference, Sir, I may say that I, too, come from the Maritime provinces; my parents still reside there, all the cherished traditions of my boyhood days cluster round the land of Evangeline, and, if you will pardon my unpoetic language, the land of the potato and of the herring. What the hon. gentleman told us was, in a few words, that in entering Confederation the Maritime provinces sold their birthright,—otherwise their fiscal freedom—for a mess of pottage, —otherwise a railway built for military and not for commercial purposes. British Columbia has a similar tale to tell and that province was on the point of withdrawing from Confederation when the promised railway was not built within the time prescribed and guaranteed by the Dominion Government. Quebec and Ontario conceived the idea of having "colonies", as one hon. gentleman described it,—I hate the word, Sir, in that connection, but I feel that I must use it,—colonies in which they could sell their manufactured goods under a protective tariff. After sizing up the situation from every conceivable angle we must frankly admit that the whole structure of Confederation was erected not on the solid rock of national unity but on the yielding sands of provincial selfishness, and I have seen enough, Sir, in the short time I have been in this House to convince me that this spirit dominates our public life to the same extent that it did in 1867.

I wonder if all hon. gentlemen actually realize the financial position that this country is in at the present time. The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Carmichael) in his speech the other evening mentioned the fact that our national debt is now $2,300,000,000, but I would add to this the debts of our provinces and the bonded indebtedness of our towns and cities, which brings it up to the enormous and staggering total of over $4,000,000,000. It takes about $15,000,000 more to pay the interest on our national debt to-day than it took to run the whole country before the war. Our railways are losing us, or were until recently, nearly a quarter of a million dollars a day. I was doing a little figuring while one of the hon. members for Toronto was speaking in the House the other evening—he spoke at a considerable length—and I came to the conclusion that during the time he was speaking in this Chamber the interest on our national debt had accumulated to the extent of about $125,000. I trust, Sir, that the hon. gentleman will be presented with a bill for that amount and be asked to settle it before the end of the session.

Hundreds of our schools are closed to-day for want of money to run them. Tens of thousands of working people are walking the streets without work and without any immediate prospects of getting it, while their families are insufficiently provided with food and clothing, boots and shoes.

Thousands of our farmers do not know where their seed is coming from; many thousands more do not know where they are going to get the supplies necessary to put them through until the next harvest. And yet, Sir, there is a tendency on the part of the best intellect and statesmanship of this House to waste time in pugilistic, and, shall I say, gladiatorial exhibitions for the amusement of the galleries. We are fiddling to-day, Sir, while Rome is burning, in a manner worthy of Nero himself. Let us away with these petty animosities. Let us turn our backs on the past and set our faces toward the future; and may the fate of Lot's wife befall him who looks behind.

I have in my hand a letter addressed to the Progressives in Parliament from one of the grand old men of the organization to which we belong and whose insignia I am proud to wear on my lapel. I refer to Mr. E. A. Partridge, of Sintaluta, Saskatchewan, who with the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), called in 1901 that historic meeting at which was formed the Territorial Grain Growers' Association, the forerunner of all that we represent at the present time. In part, this is what he says:

> Does this Progressive movement now propose to take on all the characteristics of a parliamentary party, dub its nominal chieftain, "Official Leader of the Opposition", and proceed to perpetuate the old party struggles under new party names? If it does, the clock of progress will be set back at least a quarter of a century, a most unseemly act for men calling themselves "Progressives". With solemn earnestness let it be urged that the Progressive members go to Ottawa prepared to treat the Premier-elect, not as a political opponent to be harassed and thwarted at every turn, but rather as the regularly elected chairman of a convention of two hundred and thirty-five delegates assembled to find solutions for grave national problems, chief among which is the problem of providing every honest citizen with the opportunity of making a decent living.

Further he says:

> There are exceedingly grave conditions to be dealt with by the Fourteenth Canadian Parliament.
>
> Unemployment is rife and increasing.
>
> Farm products are selling below the cost of production.
>
> Many retail merchants are in financial difficulty.
>
> Debts, public and private, are piling up, because outgo exceeds income.
>
> The cost of decent living is beyond the means of a majority of the people.
>
> Interest rates are so high, an involved debtor must remain a debtor or become a bankrupt.
>
> Freight rates have gone so high that commerce has been in many cases crippled and in others actually killed.
> Home markets are narrowing. Seemingly the same people possess both the goods and the money. The majority of would-be customers are too poor to buy. It is a case of under-consumption, not of over-production.

"Dirt" Lord Palmerston said, "is only matter out of place. The good food from your dinner table becomes dirt when it touches your clothing; it is simply matter misplaced." I would ask you if we have any statesmanship left in this Canada of ours? Have we any of it in this House? I am quite convinced, Sir, that we have an abundance of it, both on the Government benches as well as on those of the Opposition, but it is misplaced and misdirected and its efforts destroyed. Let us display some of the spirit manifested by our boys in France when they went over the top. They did not wait to ask whether the next fellow was from Nova Scotia or British Columbia, whether from Prince Edward Island or Alberta. They did not waste their time in petty animosities, but, animated by a single idea, they went over the top and they emblazoned the name of Canada on the heavens of fame, where it will remain as long as the Anglo-Saxon and Gallic races shall last. If we have any of this spirit—and I am assured that we have—let us get down without delay to a solution of our grave and serious domestic problems. The situation is not hopeless, Sir. We have the intellect; we have the ability, we have the statesmanship, but like our railways they need consolidation. Let them be consolidated and made one great driving force for the good of the country; then we need have no fears for the future.

We can make of this Canada of ours the happiest, the most prosperous and the wealthiest country on the face of the globe. Let me quote from a speech delivered in the British House of Commons over a century ago which, although referring to a different country and to different conditions, is equally applicable to Canada to-day:

> God has blessed Canada in soil, position and in climate; He has not forgot his promises nor are they unfulfilled. There is still the rain and the sunshine, still the seed time and the harvest, and the affluent bosom of the earth yet offers sustenance for man. But man must do his part—we must do our part, we must retrace the blunders, I might even say the crimes of our past legislation, and then, and only then, will we find that Labor, hopeful and remunerative is the only sure foundation on which can be reared the enduring edifice of union and of peace.

Mr. J. L. STANSELL (East Elgin): Mr. Speaker, at the request of the hon. member for Strathcona (Mr. Warner) I rise at this late hour in order to relieve the pressure on the necks of hon. members to my left. Let me say that I am not unfamiliar with the art of riding, but I never did feel that I could get anywhere with a mount that persisted in travelling in a circle.

I wish to associate myself, Mr. Speaker, with the many kind and complimentary things that have been said in connection with your elevation to the high office which you now occupy, and which have been expressed by other hon. members in a much more eloquent manner than I could hope to do. I will only say that I am most heartily in accord with the sentiments they have given expression to.

So many hon. members have prefaced their remarks by stating that they were new members and craving your indulgence on that account, and then have delivered such excellent and eloquent addresses, that I hesitate, Sir, to declare myself a new member lest too much should be expected of me. But I am a new member and, of course, am under the disadvantage of that ignorance of parliamentary procedure which is natural to a new member. However, I sincerely desire to extend credit where credit is due, no matter with what party that may be associated, and in this connection, despite some references to the contrary, I should like to compliment hon. members on the Government side for their prompt action on two questions that are of pressing moment to this country; I refer to the extremely critical railway situation and the tariff policy. My congratulations are the more hearty and sincere because so far as we have been enlightened, —I refer to the remarks of the hon. Prime Minister, the hon. Minister of Justice (Sir Lomer Gouin), the hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Raymond) and others—they evidently are going to carry out the policy of the late government.

Some time has been spent during the last few days in attempting to give a definition of party names. This practice has been indulged in by members on both sides of the House. I have been very much charmed with some of the definitions offered, but I noted that while hon. members opposite seemed to be willing to name those in this corner Tories, there was no reference made on either side to any similar name that hon. members on the Government side were once known by. I was very much pleased with the definition given, I think by the hon. member for Stanstead (Mr. Baldwin). He described the elements of sweet charity that were to be found in Liberalism, but I must observe that those elements are much more conspicuous in his definition of charity than in his demonstration of its qualities. Now, Sir, I believe that what we on this side of the House are most concerned in, indeed, I think I can safely go further and say what the majority of the people are most concerned in, is not the definition of the name, but the policy of any party and the way in which that policy is implemented by legislation. I believe this is what the country is calling for to-day,—a party not of a certain name, but a party that is known by its performances and the way in which it keeps its pledges; not a policy that is like the wind, subject to change without notice. And I might say that in some respects the policy of hon. members opposite has been similar to the wind in another important respect, and that is that while for months past we have heard the sound thereof we do not yet know whence it cometh or whither it goeth.

I have been struck by the reference made by hon. members on my left to certain matters, and I must say that I am very much in sympathy with the statement of their situation. I can appreciate that situation very well, although not a western farmer. The situation that they so eloquently described is the more easily understood by me because I happen to be a farmer myself. I am much more familiar with the handling of a plough or a herd of dairy cattle than I am with the Rules of this House. I believe that hon. members to my left have presented the situation just exactly as it is, and I sympathize very much with them. I should like to point out, however, that the farmers in Ontario—and I believe most of the references have been to the farmers of the West—the farmers of Ontario, and I speak from experience, during the past year, have been operating their farms also at a loss.

Now, perhaps because I am a farmer it may seem to hon. members to the left that I could not be a protectionist. Well, Sir, I think I can explain my position in a very few words. I am a protectionist for this reason: I have given some study to the question, and the conclusion I have arrived at is applicable to conditions now prevailing. Since coming to this House I have been confirmed in my conclusion because the leaders of all three parties have expressed themselves along the line that at least some basis of protection is necessary. Some difference of opinion has been expressed as to how it should be described; whether it should be called a protective tariff, a tariff for revenue only, or a tariff such as I believe the leader of the Progressive party would characterize at the present time as a tariff of necessity. No matter what name it masquerades under I prefer to call it just what it is; and so long as the tariff is fixed at a certain rate it matters not whether you call it a protective tariff or a tariff for revenue only. As I view it at the present time that is the main difference between our policy on this side and the policy of the hon. members opposite—but it is a difference in name only. As an Ontario farmer I am a protectionist and possibly I take a selfish view because my constituents, owing to their geographical location, are mainly protectionists. Perhaps the views entertained on this question by hon. members from the Prairie provinces are due to the same influence. I have no quarrel whatsoever with any person who holds such views; I believe it to be the duty each hon. member owes to himself and to his constituents to fairly represent their views.

During the debate reference was made to the cause of the defeat of the former government; but very little has been said respecting what I believe to be, in the opinion of members on both sides, the real reason. It is a matter of history, and a well known fact that hardly any government ever passes through the period of a devastating war without later suffering defeat. I would like to draw the attention of the House to the fact that during that great struggle the strain under which the members of the late government laboured was simply tremendous; and those who indulge in criticism should recollect that burdens were placed upon the shoulders of the members of the Cabinet greater than were ever borne by any previous administration in Canada. I would like to say too that I do not believe any group of men in this House or elsewhere, or any group of self-constituted critics, could have carried the public administration through those trying times more creditably to themselves than did the late administration, and in my belief no government would have fared any better at the hands of the electorate when the election took place. In my opinion it is only fair to give credit where credit is due.

In connection with the work of the late government, there was one man who, more than any other in Canada, sustained the burden and the heat of the day—I refer to the right hon. gentleman I have the honour to acknowledge as my leader (Mr. Meighen). From all sides have come expressions of satisfaction at his return as a member of this House; and I believe, Sir, that the majority of people in Canada, no matter to what party they belong, share in the satisfaction that this capable leader, who went through those trying times with such distinction, is still in a position to give his services to Parliament and to the people that are so proud to claim him as a fellow citizen. We on this side have unbounded confidence not only in his ability, but in his candour, his courage and his desire to serve his country to the limit of his power.

A good deal has been said in this debate with respect to economy, and many expressions on the subject have been uttered by hon. members to my left. That is one question, Sir, upon which we cannot lay too much emphasis. Economy under present conditions should be practised not only in the home but also by the municipalities, by the provincial authorities, and in the federal arena. I am bound, however, to say with respect to certain hon. members on my left who have talked somewhat on economy that they do not extend the application of this principle to the department of the King's Printer.

Allusion has been made to the cattle embargo. That question is one in which members of the House in general are intensely interested. Unfortunately the decision of this question is in the hands of the British Government and not in ours. Were it possible for us to raise that embargo I believe we would unanimously agree to do so. Let me point out, however, that efforts to have the embargo removed have not been confined to the Minister of Agriculture for Ontario. To those hon. members who have expressed themselves as so well satisfied with the work of the Minister of Agriculture of Ontario towards removing the embargo, I would suggest that the provincial minister be also sent to Washington there to make an effort to bring about the removal of the Fordney tariff.

Much has been said on the existing railway situation in Canada. I do not propose for one minute to take up time in endeavouring to solve such an intricate question, one of the most important issues before the people of this country to-day. There is one thing however that I would like to point out, and before doing so I must make a confession that were it possible I would be inclined to favour private ownership rather than public ownership. But there are many things to be considered and the situation to-day in Canada is the result of private ownership. I am not an authority on the railway question but I believe this phase must be carefully considered for this reason. Immediately after my election I became the recipient of certain papers—I may say they were published in Montreal—containing articles on the railway question showing the awful consequences that would come to the country from public operation. No doubt other hon. members received copies of these articles which were marked in pencil so that the reader should not overlook them. I have also received various circulars, apparently emanating from the same source, all dealing with the awful results consequent upon public ownership. Now, Sir, are we to suppose that this propaganda is being financed and directed by some great-hearted benevolent and patriotically minded citizen who is doing it all for his country's good? If so, I expect that we shall receive pamphlets and other literature, from the same source pointing out the horrible consequences that will flow from private ownership by reason of the situation that has developed in connection with the Merchants Bank. Now, Sir, while I do not profess to have mastered the railway situation I believe I am safe in saying—and I commend the thought especially to hon. members on my left.—that all this propaganda must have something behind it, that it is more than the work of a mere patriotic citizen, and should be taken with more than the usual grain of salt.

Allusion has also been made in this debate to racial differences. That such should exist is a surprise to me but let me say that condition will exist just as long as hon. members of this House, or people elsewhere, continue to use the question for selfish or political purposes and no longer. I trust hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will rise above any such suggestion. Now I reach a point which, possibly more than any other, was the cause of my taking part in this debate, although there has not been very much said in regard to it yet. I have felt, Sir, that since the war we, as a Canadian people, have been so troubled with the many perplexities and difficulties that have arisen out of that great struggle, that we have forgotten our duties and responsibilities as Canadian citizens and that we have developed a sectional and provincial spirit rather than a national one. This has been exemplified by the debate in this House. Almost every question that has been brought up has been discussed almost entirely from the point of view the particular member represents. I appeal to all hon. gentlemen in this House that, at this stage of Canada's existence, while it is quite right to have our personal convictions, it is only possible for us to progress if we are able to approach the questions of the day in a spirit of compromise and unity. Let us hope, Mr. Speaker, that we in this Parliament, having aired our views in a political way, shall manifest that spirit of unity and compromise, in order that we, as representing the Canadian people, may help Canada to achieve that destiny that she, by reason of her great natural resources and the indomitable spirit of her people, is justly entitled to attain.

The motion of Mr. McMurray for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General agreed to.

On motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) it was ordered that the said Address be engrossed and transmitted to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this House as are of the Hon. Privy Council.

SUPPLY

On motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) it was ordered that the House will, on Monday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

On motion of Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance) it was ordered that the House will on Monday next resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Fielding the House adjourned at 9.55 p.m.

Friday, March 24, 1922

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS

Bill No. 9, respecting The Canada Trust Company.—Mr. White.

Bill No. 10, to incorporate Canadian General Insurance Company.—Mr. Lanctôt.

Bill No. 11, respecting La Compagnie du Chemin de Fer de Colonisation du Nord. —Mr. Lafortune.

Bill No. 12, respecting The Interprovincial and James Bay Railway Company. —Mr. Parent.

Bill No. 13, respecting the Montreal Central Terminal Company.—Mr. Ethier.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 2, to incorporate British Empire Assurance Company.—Mr. Sinclair (Oxford).

Bill No. 3, respecting The Burrard Inlet Tunnel and Bridge Company.—Mr. Clark.

Bill No. 4, to incorporate Canada's Sons. —Mr. Gordon.

Bill No. 5, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Knox.

Bill No. 6, respecting The Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company.—Mr. Tolmie.

Bill No. 7, respecting The Kettle Valley Railway Company.—Mr. MacKelvie.

Bill No. 8, respecting The Ottawa Gas Company.—Mr. McGiverin.

THE DEPUTY SPEAKER

ELECTION OF MR. G. N. GORDON, WEST PETERBOROUGH

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Rule 13 of the House provides that a Chairman of Committees shall be elected at the commencement of every Parliament as soon as the Address has been agreed to in answer to His Excellency's Speech. I beg, therefore, to move:

> That Mr. George Newcombe Gordon, K.C., member for the electoral district of Peterborough West, be appointed Chairman of the Committees of the Whole House.

The hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Gordon) was a member of the last Parliament. Although he was not present for the enire Parliament, he quickly acquainted himself with the rules and procedure of the House, and I think that all hon. members who have had the pleasure of knowing him will agree that he possesses the ability, temperament and attainments necessary for the discharge of the responsible duties of this important office. I hope, therefore, that the House will support this motion.

Motion agreed to.

ESTIMATES, 1922-1923

A message from His Excellency the Governor-General transmitting Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1923, was presented by Hon. W. S. Fielding (Minister of Finance), and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): The Estimates are submitted in both French and English, and at the next sitting of the House I shall make the customary motion that they be referred to the Committee of Supply.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENCE

SALARIES ACT AND SENATE AND HOUSE OF COMMONS ACT AMENDMENT

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Militia and Defence) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 14, to amend the Salaries Act and the Senate and House of Commons Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GRAHAM: To conform with another bill that I wish to introduce, it will be necessary to have this bill become law, in order that certain salaries in connection with the new Department of Defence may be paid to the head of that department rather than to the head of the Department of Militia and Defence.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the first time.

BILL RESPECTING DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Hon. GEORGE P. GRAHAM (Minister of Militia and Defence) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 15, respecting the Department of National Defence.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. GRAHAM: In brief, the object of this bill is to bring under one head the various departments of defence in this country, including the Naval Service Department, the Air Service, Militia and Defence, and the Canadian Royal Northwest Mounted Police. I shall make a more extended explanation on the second reading of the bill, but that is the substance of its contents.

Motion agreed to, and bill read the first time.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 16 to amend the Immigration Act. He said:

This bill has to do with the amendments to the act made in 1919. As the House will remember, at that time, shortly following the war, when there was considerable hysteria with regard to what was taking place in the country, certain amendments were made to the Immigration Act, the effect of which was to deprive those who were not born in Canada of the right to trial by jury and to subject them to deportation without trial. The purpose of this bill is to repeal those sections of the act, so that every man in this country, whether a Canadian by birth or one who has lived in Canada, will be assured of the right of trial by jury.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Centre Winnipeg) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 17, to amend the Criminal Code.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The Criminal Code was modified at the same time as the Immigration Act along somewhat similar lines. The legislation is all of a kind, and if the bill which I introduced a moment ago becomes law, it will be almost necessary to pass this bill in order to make the law at all consistent.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

HALIFAX TERMINALS

JUDGES AND COMMISSIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. How many Superior or High Court Judges are there in the province of Ontario and in view of Section 34, R.S.C. 1920, why are these Federal Judges allowed to serve on Provincial Commissions?
2. How many days during the years 1919, 1920, 1921 and 1922 were Honourable Justice Sutherland, Honourable Justice Riddell and Honourable Justice Latchford absent from their judicial duties serving on Provincial Commissions?
3. What was their remuneration from these several Commissions and were they paid two salaries while so acting?
4. What were the names of the Commissioners, the number of days employed, the salary and rate per day and pay?
5. Are there too many Superior Court Judges in Ontario?
6. Who replaced the above-mentioned Judges while they were absent from the Superior Court Bench, and did not their absence from duty cause a congestion of litigation?

7. Is it the intention of the Government to enforce Section 34, R.S.C., 1920, in the future and to introduce legislation with penalties in this regard?

8. Is it the intention of the Government to introduce legislation this session that a Judge serving on these Commissions shall automatically vacate his judicial office from the Government of Canada, or will legislation be introduced to the same effect?

9. Does the Government intend to ask for the resignations of the Judges aforesaid?

Hon. Sir LOMER GOUIN:

1. Nineteen including the Chief Justices. The question whether this section has the effect of preventing Judges from receiving remuneration for executing Commissions to which they were appointed prior to the coming into force of the section was submitted by the Government of Ontario to the Supreme Court of Ontario, and, according to information received from the Attorney General of the province, answered in the negative.

2, 3, 4. The Government has not been informed.

5. Not so far as the Government is aware.

6. The Government has not been informed.

7. The Government intends to enforce the existing law, but not to enact penalties.

8, 9. No.

MERCHANTS BANK CASE

*Mr. CHURCH:

1. Has any application been received by the Minister of Finance for the merger of the Merchants Bank with the Bank of Montreal, and what action has been taken in this regard?

2. Is it the intention of the Government to hold a proper and adequate enquiry into the affairs of the Merchants Bank of Canada?

3. If so, what form will the enquiry take and where will it be held?

4. What loss has been sustained by the shareholders of the Bank as a result of negligence or inefficient management?

5. What does the Government propose to do further to impose penalties on directors, auditors and others responsible for mismanagement in the affairs of banks or other financial institutions?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING:

In reply to the first question: The fact that such application was received and has been approved by the Government has already been made known. As to the second and third questions: Instructions have been given for the prosecution of those who are being held liable for supplying false returns to the Department of Finance, and the necessary steps are being taken in the city of Montreal to-day. We have no information which would enable us to definitely answer the fourth question. Everything depends upon the price at which the shareholder bought his shares. If he bought them at anything like par he has sustained no loss; if he bought them at a high figure on the market he sustained a substantial loss. The House will see that it is not possible for us to give an exact answer to that question. The subject of the fifth question would be a very proper one to be considered when we reach the question of the revision of the Bank Act.

LIFE SAVING STATIONS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What was, and is the policy of the Department of Marine and Fisheries as to life saving at the ocean ports and inland lakes and rivers of Canada, and what stations, if any, does the Government maintain?

2. (a) Has the Government discontinued active aid to life saving and life saving stations at Toronto, and (b) other places on lake Ontario and other inland waters, and what stations, if any, have been closed?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to provide adequate life saving stations at Toronto, Hamilton ,Niagara and Port Dalhousie and other lake Ontario ports, and what report did the wreck commissioner make on the subject of life saving?

4. (a) Why have the Toronto civic authorities been forced to provide life saving crews at a cost of $160,000 for 1922, and (b) what is the policy of the department in future on the Great Lakes?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. The policy of the Department of Marine and Fisheries is to provide by regulation and the maintenance of stations at isolated points as adequate a life saving service as may be possible in connection with merchant shipping and fisheries. Stations are being maintained at the following places: Little Wood Island, N.B.; Bay View, N.S.; Bamfield, B.C.; Clayoquot, B.C.; Long Point, Ont.; Point Pelee, Ont.; Cobourg, Ont.; Port Stanley, Ont.; Southampton, Ont.; Cape Tormentine, N.B.; Escuminac, N.B.; Baker's Cove, N.S.; Blanche, N.S.; Canso, N.S.; Clark's Harbour, N.S.; Devil's Island, N.S.; Duncan's Cove, N.S.; Herring Cove, N.S.; Scattari, N.S.; Seal Island, N.S.; Westport, N.S.; Entry Island, Magdalen Islands, P.Q.; Cascumpeque, P.E.I.; Charlottetown, P.E.I.; Souris, P.E.I.; Alberton, P.E.I.; Priest Pond, P.E.I.; Goderich, Ont.

2. (a) Active aid has been discontinued to life saving stations at Toronto.

(b) Stations on the Great Lakes are maintained at Point Pelee, Long Point, Cobourg, Port Stanley, Southampton and Goderich.

3. There is no definite determination by the Government as to where stations may be provided in the future

The following is the report of the wreck commissioner:

His Worship Mayor T. L. Church brought to the attention of the court his impressions with regard to the establishment of life saving stations at the ports of Niagara, Port Dalhousie, Oakville, Grimsby and other places on lake Ontario, similarly to those which the United States Government is maintaining on its side of the lakes which I beg to bring to the attention of the Dpartment of Marine for its consideration.

4. (a) No information. (b) See answer to No. 3.

POSTAL AFFAIRS

Mr. CHURCH:

1. What were the total receipts of post offices of Montreal, Winnipeg, Toronto, Victoria, Quebec, Vancouver, Ottawa, Hamilton and St. John, respectively, for the years 1917, 1918, 1919 and 1920?

2. Why does the Government not restore one-cent drop letters in Toronto, and is it their intention to do so in the near future?

3. When does the Government propose to build a new post office in the city of Toronto?

LIGHTHOUSES AND WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY

Mr. GAUVREAU:

1. Has the attention of the Honourable Minister of Marine and Fisheries been called to the following press article, relative to experiments made by the British Admiralty with a view to replacing old lighthouses by wireless stations:

ARE LIGHTHOUSES DOOMED?

British Admiralty experiments with what are known as wireless beacons naturally give rise to the question, "Are our lighthouses doomed?" The London Daily News understands that these experiments are believed to have met with success. If the principle of the wireless beacon is accepted by Trinity House, it will, of course, be an untold boon to all coastwise shipping. The number of wrecks will be reduced.

The chief advantages of the wireless beacon is that in any weather, by day or night, in fog or blizzard it can be picked up by a ship fitted with wireless as easily as a lighthouse in clear weather.

Should the wireless beacon replace the lighthouse it would be essential for all ships to be fitted with wireless. In this way the safety of coastwise shipping in all weathers would be enormously increased.

2. If so, is it the intention of the Government to investigate this matter?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1. The experiments now being carried out with a view to utilizing wireless stations as aids to navigation are being carefully watched by the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

2. Any developments that appear to be of value will be promptly taken into consideration.

ROYAL CANADIAN ARTILLERY

Mr. PARENT:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to make changes in the administration of the Royal Canadian Artillery?

2. If so, where will the headquarters be located?

3. Where have the headquarters of the said Royal Canadian Artillery been located since its foundation?

4. What rank is held by officer in charge of this Corps?

5. What is the name of the officer second in command of this Corps?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM:

1. The matter is under consideration.

2. The headquarters for administration are at present at Kingston, Ont.

3. From 1871 to 1883 at Kingston; from 1905 to 1914, Quebec; from 1914 to 1917, Halifax; from 1917 to 1919, Ottawa; 1920, Quebec; 1921 to 1922, Kingston.

4. From May 1st, 1905, the rank held was that of Colonel. The Corps is now administered by a Lieutenant-Colonel.

5. There has been no officer designated as second-in-command.

ILLEGAL FISHING IN PRINCE COUNTY

Mr. MacLEAN (Prince):

1. What are the names of the persons who were fined for illegal fishing in the County of Prince, Prince Edward Island, during the years 1920 and 1921?

2. What were the respective amounts of said fines and how many have been paid in full?

3. Were prosecutions brought against any persons and no fines collected?

4. If so, what are the names of said persons?

5. What are the names of the officers who brought the charges?

6. Were any fines or part thereof refunded to said persons?

7. If so, to what persons were refunds made?

Hon. Mr. LAPOINTE:

1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7.

* Not an officer.

a Defendant owns no real estate, is married and has a large family of small children. The collection of this penalty would mean a great hardship to him. Under the circumstances the Justice suspended payment of penalty with a warning that a further infraction would entail collection of it.

b Owing to extenuating circumstances the Judge decided to suspend payment of fine during good behaviour.

DAYLIGHT SAVING

*Mr. CHURCH:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to introduce legislation for uniform daylight saving for the whole of Canada?
2. If not, will the Government through its post offices, customs houses and other federal agencies, adopt hours of daylight saving in municipalities which adopt daylight saving hours?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING: It is not the intention of the Government to introduce legislation requiring uniform action in the matter of daylight saving, but the Government in regard to its official service will adapt itself to the determination of each local community.

LONG BRANCH RIFLE RANGE

Mr. CHARTERS:

Is it the intention of the Government or any department thereof, to sell any portion of the property in the township of Toronto, known as the Long Branch Rifle Ranges?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: The matter has not yet been considered.

THE RIORDON COMPANY

Mr. KNOX:

What amount, if any, has been collected by the Taxation Department on the notes tendered by the Riordon Company in payment of their taxes?

Hon. Mr. FIELDING: None.

GOOD ROADS—ONTARIO

Mr. SIMPSON:

1. What amount of the grant of $20,000,000 made by the Dominion Government, for good roads, has been paid to the legislature of the province of Ontario?
2. What portion of the amount paid to the province of Ontario has been spent on roads north of the Severn river or that portion of the province commonly called Northern Ontario?

Hon. Mr. KENNEDY:

1. To date the sum of $1,317,508.61 of such grant has been paid to Ontario.

2. The province has not filed for approval under the Federal Highways Act any project for highway construction north of the Severn river. Roads in Northern Ontario are built and, where necessary, maintained by the Colonization Roads Branch of the Ontario Government, which is distinct from the Ontario Highways Branch.

QUESTION STANDING AS ORDER FOR RETURN

Mr. McBRIDE:

What amount of money has been spent by the Federal Government in harbour improvements of all kinds in each of the ports of Quebec, Montreal, Halifax, St. John, New Brunswick, Victoria, Vancouver and Prince Rupert, during the years 1900 to 1921, inclusive?

[Mr. Lapointe.]

NEWSPAPER EXTRACTS BARRED FROM QUESTIONS

Mr. SPEAKER: In reference to the question relating to Lighthouses and Wireless Telegraphs I wish to convey the information to new members of the House that it is not permissible to quote press extracts in questions. In the present case the extract was originally much longer but was reduced by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau). The usages of the House, hon. members will understand, require that extracts from newspapers should be eliminated from questions.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. MARTELL:

For a copy of all letters telegrams, petitions, accounts and all other documents in possession of, or under the control of the Government of Canada, relating to the musical instruments of the 112th Battalion Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Mr. MEIGHEN:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Department of Immigration and Colonization or any of its officers or employees, and W. A. Rae, and Mr. Crandall, representing the department, or between said department and any one else relating to the case of Lee Holland and the question of his deportation.

Mr. MEIGHEN:

For a copy of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents exchanged between the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the Harbour Commissioners at Quebec or any of them, since the taking of office of the present Government.

Mr. MARTELL:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions, Orders in Council and all other documents in the possession of or under the control of the Government, relating to the application or request made for a lease of the lands and premises of "Fort Edward" (so called), in the town of Windsor, Nova Scotia, for a public play ground, or for the right of use of the Windsor Golf and Tennis Club.

Mr. MARTELL:

For a copy of all petitions, letters, telegrams, memoranda, Orders in Council, and all other documents in the possession of or under the control of the Government, relating to the establishment of a Department of Fisheries for the Dominion of Canada, to be presided over and administered by a Minister of Fisheries and officers independent of the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, and other documents exchanged between the Departments of Justice and Marine and Fisheries and the Compagnie du Parc St. Charles, Limited.

Mr. CHISHOLM:

For a copy of all petitions, letters, memorandum and other documents in any way referring to negotiations carried on for the last three years between the Government of Canada or any department thereof, and the Inverness Railway and Coal Company, concerning the purchase of said road by the Government.

SIR ROBERT BORDEN

APPOINTMENT TO INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE—CORRESPONDENCE

Mr CASGRAIN moved:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, correspondence and other documents exchanged between the Imperial Government and the Government of Canada, concerning the appointment of Sir Robert Borden as Canadian representative at the International Conference for the limitation of armaments at Washington. Also a copy of any Orders in Council in this connection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In relation to this motion, I would suggest, if the hon. gentleman would agree, that it be amended by adding after the word "document" the words "and all correspondence passing between officers of the Government and Sir Robert Borden".

Amendment agreed to.

Motion as amended agreed to.

INTERIM SUPPLY

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Minister of Finance): As the fiscal year is about ended, and we shall be entering immediately upon a new year, it is very desirable that we should have an Interim Supply Bill. I have already communicated with my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton), and while, of course, until the Estimates were brought down, no arrangement could be made, I would desire that, at the next sitting, the House agree to vote one-fourth of the Estimates. It might be convenient to vote one-fourth of the whole; but if any hon. gentleman would like any particular service reserved, we would be quite willing to discuss and consider the matter. The main point is to obtain the necessary supply for salaries of officials in the different departments of the public service.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I think my hon. friend will recognize that it is hardly possible for me to say anything to-day as to the attitude that ought to be taken as regards the proposed vote.

Mr. FIELDING: I quite agree to that.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I have not had an opportunity of looking at the Estimates; but from the length of time it has taken to prepare them, I judge it will take some time to consider them, and the time between now and Monday would be rather short for that purpose. Perhaps my hon. friend could give me, between now and Monday, new and cogent reasons why interim supply should be voted. I confess to being at a little difficulty in the matter, because, amongst other things, I have very great respect for my hon. friend and for the precedents which he has from time to time set. At the last session of this House, apparently, those precedents which he gave us in the past were wrong and a certain course was adopted, that being a course which said that there ought not to be an interim supply vote; that consent would not be given; that it was a moral wrong to make these large interim votes without proper consideration of the items, and so on, and so forth. Perhaps my hon. friend will be able to show us that the attitude taken last year by the then Opposition was entirely in error, and that he was not free to make a new precedent for us to follow.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend will find that there is no inconsistency between my attitude of last year and my attitude of to-day, but I do not want to discuss that. My right hon. friend is quite right in saying that he should have a reasonable time to consider this matter, but I cannot give him any reason further than that we desire to make provision for the public service chiefly, owing to their not being able to wait until the money is voted. That is the only reason.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid that the same reason obtained last year.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King for the adjournment of the House:

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is it intended that we adjourn at a quarter to four? Surely we should have some business to go on with. If there is nothing ready, I would suggest that we go back to the debate on the Address, when we could give the Minister of Railways (Mr. Kennedy) an opportunity of making the speech promised by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Minister of Railways and Canals will make the speech at the appropriate time.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What business will be taken up on Monday?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Monday is Private Members' day. We will take up the Orders as they appear on the Order Paper, and then, if there is time for some of the Government measures, we will go on with some of them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What Government measures?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Estimates.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What Estimates?

Mr. FIELDING: I think, we shall take up, first, Civil Government. If it were important to mention a particular department, I would do so; but, perhaps, the right hon. gentleman will agree that while the votes for civil government are under discussion we shall be free to take up any of the items, with the understanding that if any item is objected to, it will be left over.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 3.45 p.m.

Monday, March 27, 1922

The House met at three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEE

On the motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the name of Mr. Boivin was substituted for that of Mr. Kyte on the Select Standing Committee on Miscellaneous Private Bills.

GRAND TRUNK ARBITRATION

On the Orders of the Day:

Right Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with I desire to draw the attention of the Government to an article which appears in the press of Canada this morning, evidently despatched by the Canadian Press from London, England. It refers to an article in a British paper of the standing of which I have no knowledge, but inasmuch as the article has doubtless, through the Canadian Press, received very wide circulation—possibly world-wide circulation—and as, in my judgment it is defamatory to the honour of Canada I wish to call it to the attention of the Government and ask what action they propose to take in the matter. The article in question refers to the late arbitration on the value of the stock of the Grand Trunk Railway Company and I shall quote a short sentence which reads as follows:

[Mr. Meighen.]

> It is not more than two years since the manipulators of Ottawa, by daring and unscrupulous trickery, befooled this railway organization into an arbitration.

Later it refers to one of the arbitrators, Hon. Mr. Taft, as "a man not likely to be amenable to Canadian political and financial pressure," thereby implying that the Board of Arbitrators was subjected to political and financial pressure in the discharge of an onerous duty. Further on the article says:

> If some Central American country swindled British investors out of not less than $48,000,000 by methods which were used in Canada, we think collision with the Monroe Doctrine might be risked in an effort to do something about it.

Whatever may be thought of the merits or demerits of the policy of acquisition I am sure that all the members of the House—of this House and the last—are agreed that nothing but honourable methods on the part of Canada were adopted as between this country and the British shareholders—nothing but the most honourable and fair methods throughout. A newspaper article defaming individuals may perhaps be lightly treated, but such an article defaming a nation, and circulating throughout the world, is not a matter we can afford wholly to ignore. A Government exercises some supervision over such matters in so far as they may impugn the honour of another country. The British Government has its obligations in this regard, the same as the Government of any country. I have not had the opportunity of mentioning the matter to the Prime Minister, nor to the Government, but I call their attention to it now and ask that they advise us now if possible, if not, later, what they propose to do with regard to this article that has gained such world-wide circulation.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It is a little difficult to know exactly what course it is most advisable to take in regard to newspaper articles, even articles apearing in one's own country, to say nothing of articles appearing in the press of another country. However, I am sure that the remarks of my hon. friend will be quoted abroad, and in so far as they go to indicate that the methods of this country in its transactions have been honourable I wish to associate myself entirely with him. I think that will be sufficient for the present.

Mr. SPEAKER: I wish to say that, although the reading of newspaper extracts on the Orders of the Day is not, strictly speaking, permissible, yet I am in the judgment of the House in holding it as proper that, on a subject of public importance, especially when the honour of the country is affected, an hon. member may be allowed some latitude in calling the attention of the Government to the matter.

PRIVATE BILL

SECOND READING

Bill No. 12, respecting The Interprovincial and James Bay Railway Company. —Mr. Parent.—

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

GERMAN REPARATIONS

Mr. MICHAUD:

1. Has Germany paid to the Allies up to the end of the year 1921, the sum of $1,620,000,000?
2. If so, what proportion, if any, of the said sum has been or will be paid to Canada?

Hon. Mr. COPP:

1. Germany has paid to the Allies to the 30th November, 1921, the sum of 6,424,000,000 gold marks ($1,528,912,000 par of exchange) in cash and by transfer of property; of this sum Great Britain has received 470,000,000 gold marks ($111,860,000 par of exchange), out of which sum £29,500,000 was paid over on account of the British claim for cost of occupation up to 1st May, 1921.

2. The Canadian Government has received from the British Government the sum of $6,314,500 on account of the Canadian cost of the army of occupation. No further payment than this has been received.

BRITISH PREFERENCE GOODS IMPORTED VIA UNITED STATES

Mr. LOGAN:

What was the value of imported goods, subject to British Preferential Tariff, brought into Canada via ports of the United States during the years 1919-20 and 1920-21?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU: The Statistical records show the value of goods imported from each country via ports in the United States but do not show the value of goods, subject to British Preferential Tariff, brought into Canada via ports of the United States.

SALES TAX COLLECTIONS

Mr. MORRISON:

What amount has been collected each month from the Sales Tax, since its inception?

Hon. Mr. BUREAU:

RICHIBUCTO REPAIRS WORKS

Mr. LEGER:

1. Did the Department of Public Works purchase a motor boat during the years from 1911 to 1921, for the use of the foreman on the repair works at the North and South Beaches, Richibucto, Kent County, New Brunswick?
2. If so, is it still owned by the Government, and in whose possession is it at present?
3. Has this boat been disposed of by the Government?
4. If so, to whom and on what date?

Hon. Mr. MURPHY (for the Minister of Public Works):

1. Yes, for use by the district engineer and staff.

2. Yes, still owned by the department.

3 and 4. No. Tenders were called for, but sale was not completed.

COAL ROYALTIES

Mr. KNOX:

What is the amount of the coal royalties collected by the Dominion Government in each of the fiscal years from April 1st, 1906, to March 31st, 1921?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

RURAL AND URBAN POPULATION

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain):

1. What are the figures, by Provinces, for the rural and urban population of the Dominion of Canada, as shown by the last census?
2. What were these figures in 1911?

Hon. Mr. ROBB:

1. Final figures of 1921 census classification as rural and urban not yet available.
2. Rural population in 1911, 3,925,679; Urban, 3,280,964.

DOMINION LANDS—SASKATCHEWAN

Mr. JOHNSTON (Last Mountain):

1. What is the total acreage and value of lands sold by the Dominion Government in Saskatchewan from September 1st, 1905, to December 31st, 1921?
2. What is the total acreage and value of lands sold by the Dominion Government in Alberta from September 1st, 1905, to December 31st, 1921?

Hon. Mr. STEWART:

As school lands sales are not in the same class as other sales, the money collected being held in trust for the provinces, they are shown separately in the following statement:

	Province	Area Sold	Approximate value
1.	Saskatchewan	5,538,878	$16,619,107
	School Lands Sales "	1,457,274	26,967,218

MOUNTED POLICE

Mr. MARCILE (Bagot):

1. Is it the intention of the Government to discontinue the services of the Mounted Police in the different Provinces of Canada?
2. If so, when?
3. If not, why?

Hon. Mr. GRAHAM: The reorganization of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police will be fully considered when Bill No. 15, an Act respecting the Department of National Defence, becomes law.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

Mr. MANION:

1. Has the Committee appointed to report upon the St. Lawrence Great Lakes Canal made a report to the Government?
2. If so, has this report been tabled?
3. Will said report be printed and distributed to the members?

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE KING:

1. The report referred to I have just presented and laid on the Table.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. It is entirely for the House to say if it wishes to have this report printed. It is rather a bulky report, and would be expensive to print. In the meantime I have asked the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs to distribute to members of both Houses copies of the report as printed by the Government of the United States. Through the courtesy of the United States government copies of the report as printed at Washington have been obtained in numbers sufficient to supply hon. members of both Houses. If the House wishes to have further copies printed, all right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are enough copies of the report for members of both Houses?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. CHISHOLM:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, petitions and other documents in any way referring to the superannuation of John C. McQuarrie, section foreman at West Bay Road, Inverness County.

Mr. HANSON:

For a return showing the names of all persons dismissed from the Sorel Shipyards since the 29th of December, 1921, together with the cause of dismissal in each case. Also showing the names of all persons taken on at the said shipyards during the same period, showing the cause for employment of each person.

Mr. MARTELL:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports, memoranda, informations and warrants, minutes of evidence and convictions, and all other Court proceedings relating or in anywise appertaining to the trial and conviction of Clyde Heath and Gurney Young of Tancook, Nova Scotia, for a violation of the Migratory Birds Convention Act. Also a copy of the Order in Council dated on or about the 19th day of November, 1921, authorizing and empowering the remission of all fines and forfeitures occasioned by the conviction of said Clyde Heath and Gurney Young.

QUEBEC FISHERIES

On the Order:

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure):

For a copy of the correspondence and all other documents, regarding the transfer of fisheries to the Province of Quebec.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I see no reason why this notice should appear among the Notices of Motion. I think it should appear among the Orders as a notice of motion for the production of papers. And I see no reason why it should not pass.

Mr. LAPOINTE: I understand the hon. gentleman from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) desires to speak on this motion—at least so he told me—and I desire to speak also.

Mr. MARCIL (Bonaventure): It may stand until Wednesday.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then I will not raise any objections.

Mr. LAPOINTE: And perhaps my hon. friend desires to speak to it.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Minister of Agriculture) moved:

That the Memorandum laid before the House on March 23rd instant, regarding the Re-establishment of the Canadian Wheat Board, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization.

He said: When the memorandum referred to in the motion was brought before the Government the first minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) intimated that every expedition would be given to the request to have this matter taken up and possibly referred to the Committee on Agriculture. This suggestion seems to meet the wishes of the Council of Agriculture, but they made a request that the matter be expedited in every possible way, and we are proceeding to comply with that request.

Mr. CRERAR: I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Motherwell), or the Government, if it is the intention that the Select Standing Committee on Agriculture will take this matter up and press it immediately that committee gets to work.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Did my hon. friend ask if it was the intention of the Government to request the Committee on Agriculture to proceed immediately to consider this matter?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Certainly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not wish to delay the carrying of this motion, but I do not want to waive a right. It seems to me that notice must be given to the House that it shall go into committee on the motion. I am quite willing to have the rule waived in this case, as, indeed, I am in favour of having the motion carried.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am informed that notice of this motion was given in the Votes and Proceedings under rule 40.

Motion agreed to.

INTERIM SUPPLY

The House in Committee of Supply—Mr. Gordon in the Chair.

Mr. FIELDING: In accordance with an intimation previously given, I desire to move now this resolution on which will be based an Interim Supply Bill covering one-quarter of the present Estimates:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $76,499,-371.88, being one-fourth of the amount of each of the several items to be voted as set forth in the main estimates for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1923, laid before the House of Commons at the present session of Parliament, be granted to His Majesty, on account, for the fiscal year ending 31st March, 1923.

I am asking for one-quarter, which will cover Supply for three months. In some cases only one-sixth has been taken; and if my hon. friends opposite prefer that the Interim Supply be limited to one-sixth, I shall have no objection; but we shall be making, as it were, two bites of a cherry. The time is not far distant when we shall have to have a second motion, and if it be agreeable, I shall take one-fourth. At a previous sitting, there was some discussion as to the procedure as regards this matter; but I think there will be a rather general recognition of the propriety of the motion, so I assume that it will go through without opposition.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid I am very much where I was the other day. The only difficulty in connection with this matter is my hon. friend himself, his hon. leader, (Mr. Mackenzie King) and his party. We had an idea that the King's business had to be carried on in a particular way, and one of the ways which, as we then thought, were necessary, was this very question of interim supply. When the matter was under discussion the other day, I told my hon. friend that he could possibly remove a good many objections which we might have to this matter, if he would indicate wherein he was wrong last year and whether or not the practice which, as we pointed out last year, had obtained from time—well it is not immemorial, because we have not had a Parliament for that length of time, but practically from time immemorial, so far as Parliament is concerned—was wrong and whether the practice insisted on last year was right; whether it is wrong, immoral and improper to do this sort of thing or whether, for the purpose of obtaining campaign literature, it was thought to be a good thing to force a government, that required this interim supply to carry on the public service, to employ the closure. If the latter be the reason, we are not following my hon. friend in any of those tactics. If it be right that the public business should go on—and we used to think that it was—and the real motive of last year was something along the line which I have described, there will be no difficulty this year, because what the Opposition wants to do is to see the public business carried on. I desire, however, to point out to my hon. friend that last Friday he stated that his position then and his position now were not at all contradictory. If my hon. friend's position is: Last year, because the House had had ample opportunity to consider the Estimates, and did consider them, and knew something about them, it was a wrong thing to pass interim supply; and this year, because the Estimates have not yet been reached and we have not yet considered them, this proposal of interim supply is proper—if that be the position, my hon. friend is not inconsistent. But I desire to point out to the House that last year on the 8th of March the Estimates were tabled, and on the 15th of March we started going into committee on the Estimates. We were in committee on the Estimates practically all the time from then on until the 7th of April when this question of interim supply was brought up, with the result that we could receive no accommodation. On the 13th of April the item was passed after a good deal of discussion and after several rather heated arguments as to the way in which supply was being blocked by the then Opposition. Last year, the interim supply vote was put through only on the 13th of April, so that every opportunity was given to the House to go into the Estimates, and every member knew exactly what the Estimates were and what they meant. No attempt was made to rush the House. On the other hand, the then Opposition refused to accommodate the government in the conduct of public business after having had full six weeks' time for consideration of the Estimates and of the demands which the government were putting forward. I have pointed out that there is a great deal of difference between the attitude then taken by my hon. friend and the attitude which is being taken to-day. My hon. friend's attitude of last year is really the chief point of difficulty which we have on this side of the House as regards giving consent. It may be that my hon. friend believes he is consistent because he thinks, with a ministry which is blessed and honoured by his presence, he has the absolute right of interim supply without delay, whereas, on the other hand, any other ministry is to be denied it. If consistency be advanced on that ground, I entirely agree with my hon. friend, but I hardly think he is going to advance that. I invited an explanation before our consent was further asked, but my hon. friend has given no explanation. He says that the business of the country requires this vote. Last year he held the view that the business of the country was requiring too many votes; that there was too much business. If volume of business to be done with the burdens that were then upon the country, many of which burdens have since disappeared, and if urgency and pressure constituted the real reasons, there would have been no trouble with my hon. friend giving consent to interim supply last year. We realize that business has to be carried on, but our difficulty is to square what my hon. friend is doing this year with what was declared to be a settled policy of his party last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If what my hon. friend says is correct, I do not think there should be the slightest difficulty in our coming to an arrangement. The position taken by the Opposition last year was that the Government should not try to force the Estimates through the House of Commons by closure, and that there should be no attempt to pass a one-sixth vote without any opportunity of conference between the two sides of the House. The whole point was that a conference between the Government and the Opposition should be held before the House was asked to vote an interim supply; the Opposition were quite willing after a conference to give the Government whatever was needed to carry on the business of the country. I have by me the remarks I made in the House last year, and I may quote from them for the benefit of my hon. friend. Speaking on April 12 in reference to a statement made on April 7 I said:

> I pointed out at that time that we of the Opposition had no desire to embarrass the Government in the matter of any amount which might be necessary to pay salaries and wages, and, indeed, to carry on the public service to the extent that might be absolutely necessary. I pointed out that it was customary, when interim supply was desired, for a conference to be held between both sides of the House, and I left the door open very wide to hon. gentlemen opposite to meet the Opposition in a friendly and courteous way in that connection.

Elsewhere in the course of my remarks on April 7 I said:

> But in taking this stand we have no desire in any way to embarrass or penalize the Civil Service because of any neglect on the part of the Government. We will be perfectly willing to consider any arrangement with a view of providing what may be necessary in the way of salaries both for the inside and outside services. As respects other expenditures, however, we contend that except as agreed upon, this Parliament should have the full right of examining in the closest detail every item of the Estimates before voting any portion of them.

I said further in conclusion:

> May I repeat, in a word, the position which we take? We are ready at any time to meet hon. gentlemen opposite in conference, to agree to give them what is necessary in the way of meeting salaries and wages for employees of the public service. We are prepared to go further and to give them what is needed to carry on the public service of this country in a manner which will not embarrass public business, which will help to maintain the good faith of the Government, and its credit, which will enable the Government to carry out commitments to which my hon. friend has referred; but this must be as a result of a conference between both sides of this House, surrounding whatever may be granted with such conditions as, in the public interest, seem to be absolutely necessary at the present time.

That was our position, and if my hon. friends opposite will take the same attitude on this occasion there should not be the slightest difficulty in our coming to an agreement as to what portion of the Estimates are to be permitted to pass as an Interim Supply. We are asking of our friends opposite nothing more than we when in Opposition, were prepared, to concede to the Government of the day. I may, however, point out to my hon friend this circumstance, which I think is an important consideration: The Government of the day fixed the time at which the general elections should be held. The date was fixed as December 6. As a consequence it was not humanly possible for the present Government to prepare the business of Parliament in shorter order than we have despatched it. I might also remind my hon. friends that when we were discussing the question of the Interim Supply last year, the Government of the day had not at the time brought down the Auditor General's report in full. We, on this side, laid the Auditor General's report in full on the Table of the House the very day the House opened.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Volume 4 is missing.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was under the impression that all the volumes were brought down; volume 4 was the only volume then, that was not brought down.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Volume 4 is the only important one.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my hon. friend has what he wants. However, all we ask is that hon. gentlemen opposite shall not embarrass the public service; and if they prefer a conference before we press for this Interim Supply, we are ready to meet them and discuss matters, and withhold any part of the Estimates which they would like to have reserved for further consideration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Prime Minister, on this question, is in the fortunate position, in which he will often find himself in the House, of being able to quote himself on either side of the question, whichever happens for the time being to be the side that he wishes to advance. It is true that last session, after the motion was introduced for one-sixth of the Estimates to be voted in bulk, the Opposition took the stand that there should be a conference between themselves and the Government, and that they were ready to confer on the question as to the voting of salaries to the civil servants. That was the first proposal, after the introduction of the motion for one-sixth of the Estimates: But the session before, the leader of the Opposition peremptorily notified Parliament that in the session to come, namely, last session, the Opposition would unconditionally oppose all bulk Estimates, whether a quarter, a sixth, or any other proportion. No conditions whatever were attached; we were simply notified that that was the last of bulk Estimates that were to go through this Parliament except over the heads of, and by closure on, Opposition. Well, in the face of that notification, would it have been courteous for us to have gone to the then leader of the Opposition (Mr. Mackenzie King) and ask him whether he had recanted? We did not feel that that would be complimentary to the hon. gentleman, and we did not do it. We did him the honour of taking him at his word. I have this quotation from the speech the hon. gentleman made the year before. We introduced our Estimates and submitted them to Parliament; and we were told—not the day that we brought down our Estimates, not before a single member of the House knew anything about what the Government was going to request, not before a single item of the Estimates had been considered, but a month after they had been presented to the House, and after Parliament had had an opportunity to consider them for days and weeks together—we were told that we should have a conference with the Opposition and that they would be ready to vote salaries so that the civil servants might not go without their pay. That was the second position the Opposition took. Well, it was pointed out that if salaries were voted, and there was no money to work with, there would not be much use in keeping the civil servants employed. The Opposition were pledging their willingness to allow the officers of the Pension Board and all the staff to be paid their salaries, but they were taking the position that no pensions should be paid. They were willing, for example, to support the Soldiers' Settlement Board, and pay the thousands of men and women employed therein, but they were not willing that any soldier settlers should get help. When that was pointed out the Opposition changed their attitude. They shifted their position and said: Well, we will let the salaries go through, and if you will confer with us we will let the necessary services be voted. The Government then took the stand that the Opposition had had the Estimates before them for at least five weeks. It was then, not the 27th of March but the 7th or 8th day of April, eight days after the fiscal year had closed; and we said that, having had the Estimates before them for that length of time, if they could show us any items that should be reserved, as respects which they thought the one-sixth should not apply, we would confer with them on any one of those. Now that seemed to me to be reason able last year, and it seems to me to be reasonable to-day. But what is the circumstance this year? The Government introduced the Estimates one day and now, on the next day, they demand one-sixth. They said: We will let you study the Estimates over Sunday and we will be back on Monday, when we want this portion voted. How different hon. gentlemen are to-day from what they were a year ago. No; what they wanted a year ago was merely to be able to go to the country and say that the Government had forced its hand into the Treasury and extracted millions of money, using in this House the power of the closure, so that the Opposition, representing the people, were not given a chance to discuss the votes.

They declared. "We were broken through, overcome by closure, the voice of the people was stifled and the money taken from the Treasury." That was all they were asking for a year ago, and that they got, and hon. gentlemen to my left and the people they represent listened to the tale of woe about the extortion of money by closure. The actual circumstances were simply the circumstances I have just disclosed. All manner of time was given for discussion.

Now I do say this. The last thing I want to do is to imitate the tactics of the Opposition last year. But I want to discharge as best I can the duties that now appertain to me as leader of the Opposition. I do not think we know enough about these Estimates to vote in bulk at all; I do not think it is necessary yet to vote them in bulk. We did not take the vote last year till 13th April. The payments made at the end of March can be taken out of the Estimates passed last year. The next payments will be coming due about the 15th April, and I say we ought to know more about the Estimates—we ought especially to be able to go over them carefully and see whether there are not items that should be exempted from this bulk vote—before we are asked to vote it to-day.

Furthermore, we ought to have information not only as to what the Estimates were last year, but what amount was spent last year. The Government have sought in bringing down these Estimates—which, anyone who knows the slightest thing about public affairs would easily understand would necessarily be very much smaller than last year's Estimates—to convey the impression that the axe has been unmercifully wielded and that the people of this country, as a consequence of the economy of hon. gentlemen opposite, are going to save all sorts of money in taxation. They compare the main Estimates this year with the whole Estimates last year, and forget to advise the public that there will be Supplementaries this year the same as last. The fact of the matter is that, notwithstanding we are a year farther away from the war, notwithstanding the fact that all war services are necessarily and rightly contracting, and have been contracting every year since the war, we are asked to vote main Estimates this year amounting to fifty million dollars more, I do not doubt, than the whole expenditure of last year.

Comparing the main Estimates this year with the main Estimates last year there is a difference of $113,000,000. Of that $113,000,000 difference $81,000,000 odd is made up of advances necessarily made last year on account of the Canadian National railway betterments, because we had just taken over one great system and had to vote $89,000,000 to put it in shape. The advances made last year for the railways of this country are not needed this year, for the most obvious reason in the world,—that last year the railways of this country were put into condition which was necessary in order that the people might get from the system the service they were entitled to. Instead of $50,000,000 being required this year on account of the Canadian National railway only $42,800,000 is required; the Canadian National railways are showing improvement; these railways that, according to hon. gentlemen opposite, had brought the country to the brink of ruin so that they had to come in and arrest the hand of nationalization,—yes, force back the hand of nationalization— in order to save this nation from bankruptcy and despair. The railways are showing improvement. The Grand Trunk last year, having just been taken over, required $89,687,633, not for a year, mark you, but for a year and a quarter, because the moneys voted for the railways last year covered fifteen months from January 1, 1921 to March 31, 1922. They took care as well of the Grand Trunk on its being taken over at a time when there were large outstanding obligations that had to be provided for if the railway was to stand up at all. Necessarily that $89,000,000 is not required this year; the vote for that system therefore is only $25,750,000. The Grand Trunk Pacific, which also had been taken over just the year before, required last year $26,000,000 in assistance. This year the vote is $15,900,000. There is no individual in Canada who in honesty of mind, would attribute for a moment any intention to economize on the part of a government in relation to advances to assist, when those advances, having been made, are necessarily not required to be made again. That accounts for $81,237,000.

Then there is the Soldier Settlement Board. I wonder if the Government are economizing with the soldier settlers. Last year the vote was $35,017,000, and this year it is $12,000,000, a difference of $23,017,000. That can hardly be attributed to economy. It is because of the fact that we took care of the soldiers when they returned, obviating the necessity of taking care of them later on and having them look after themselves in the meantime. I do not at the moment question that the vote asked for this year will be sufficient to take care of the situation. Indeed, it turns out that of the $35,017,000 voted last year, something less than $12,000,000 was required, because large sums of money came in from the soldiers themselves and took care of a large amount of what was required.

Then also, as we recede from the war the number of men to be taken care of in the Government institutions naturally diminishes, and as it diminishes the requirements of the Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment decline. Last year's vote was very many millions—I do not know the exact figure—less than the year before. This year the vote is $4,956,500 less than last year, and that can be saved, I do not doubt at all, without very much necessity of the economical pruning knife of the Minister of Finance. The vote last year, I understand, was $21,000,000 less than the vote of the preceding year, and this year the decrease is $4,956,500.

The housing appropriation, which is not spent, but merely loaned to provincial governments, naturally goes down as we recede from the war and war conditions. The decrease there is $2,449,920. It is not a matter of economy in the slightest degree. Those items account for $111,660,000 of the $113,626,000.

The shipbuilding programme brought down in 1919, and never added to since, was completed altogether, I am inclined to think, or within a few dollars. I do not know that it will be suggested that it is an exercise of very great wisdom not to build the ships over again. They are built already. The money does not need to be spent over again. That accounts for $10,000,000 odd. So, aside from those items to which the word "economy" has no application whatever, the Government is $8,000,000 over the Estimates of last year, and is approximating $50,000,000 over the expenditure of last year all told.

That is an outline of the situation. Consequently, the argument advanced last year that, the expenditure being more than was required ten years before they could not be asked to give the same liberal consideration to a vote on a bulk estimate, has no application whatever. Indeed, it turns against hon. gentlemen opposite, for in every respect in which economy can be exercised to public advantage hon. gentlemen opposite are already $8,000,000 and more over the vote of last year.

I notice a decrease of $235,906 in the vote for the Imperial War Graves Commission. That is accounted for, of course, by the fact that the war graves have been attended to and do not require to be attended to twice over. I do not presume that hon. gentlemen would claim to exercise economy in attending to the graves of our soldiers. It is simply a matter of the work having been done and not requiring to be done again.

Again, last year a vote of $500,000 was required under the Canada Temperance Act for taking the vote in Ontario. That is not required this year. A vote of $500,000 was taken as well last year for the Battlefields Memorial. That is not necessary this year. So the Government, if we leave out those items as to which the word "economy" has no application whatever, is $10,000,000 over last year's main Estimates, with the supplementary Estimates still to come, and approximately $50,000,000 over last year's actual expenditure.

That is a summary of the position today. Consequently it behooves the Opposition, it behooves the supporters of the Government as well, to see to it that these Estimates are scrupulously proven, and before we vote any Estimates in bulk we ought to at least have a sufficient opportunity to go over the votes one by one and make up our minds whether or not there are items as respects which the bulk vote should not apply. That is all I asked of the Opposition last year; but they were not satisfied. Nothing could exceed the unreasonableness of the attitude they took—except perhaps the representations, or rather the misrepresentations they made in the course of the campaign. I do not want to follow their example; but I do ask that this vote stand for a few days, at all events, in order that we may have an opportunity to go over the Estimates with care, and then to confer with the Government concerning such items as in our opinion should be exempt from the bulk vote we are asked to pass.

Mr. FIELDING: Mr. Chairman, I am much more interested in getting this appropriation made in the proper way than I am in reviving the discussion of last year. But I am surprised that my right hon. friend has deemed it expedient to enter at this stage into a general discussion of the Estimates. He says we have been claiming great economy. When? Where?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In the press.

Mr. FIELDING: Not a single word. We brought down the Estimates and laid them on the table; no member of the Government said a single word about them. My right hon. friend seems to have got the notion that the people may themselves see something in the direction of economy. I hope they will, but if they do, it will have to be of their own motion; it will not be due to anything that has been said by any member of the Government. My right hon. friend has invented, as it were, a boast of economy, for we have been absolutely silent on the subject.

The right hon. gentleman says also that we have brought down the Estimates in such a way as to make a comparison with those of last year. Have we not brought them down in the usual form? He also says that the supplementary Estimates have to come. That is true, but has it not been so every year? In what other form could the Estimates have been brought down, so far as comparison is concerned, than that in which they are set out in this blue book? My right hon. friend implies that we have been making exceptional claims for economy. He is drawing upon his imagination. He is alarmed by the thought that the people may on their own account see that there is economy; therefore, he feels it necesary to warn them that there is none.

Mr. Chairman, we have no desire to press these Estimates. The vital difference between the position to-day and that of last year is, as has been stated by the Prime Minister, that the Estimates last year should not have been pressed before the House as they were without a proper conference. I have under my hand correspondence which I have had with my esteemed friend the ex-Minister of Finance (Sir Henry Drayton). Even before the present Estimates were brought down, I wrote to him, informed him of our intention, and said I wanted his co-operation. I intimated that while it might be convenient to have a general vote—one-quarter of the whole, or one-sixth, as he might prefer—if hon. members wanted to reserve any portion of the Estimates we were quite ready to do so. There will be no closure in this matter, Mr. Chairman; this vote will be given freely and voluntarily or not at all. If my right hon. friend is trying to lay some plans whereby he may force us to bring on the closure, I tell him at once that his effort will fail. Closure is necessary, in a measure, I suppose, in some things, but it is not the desire of this Government to use it in a case like this. If hon. gentlemen opposite want these Estimates delayed for a few days, I am willing that it shall be so. The leader of the Opposition has said that he has had no time to examine them. Well, he has made quite a criticism of them; if he has not had time to examine them, I do not know where he got the amazing amount of information he had to-day, be it correct or not.

As I have said, my great desire is to have this appropriation made in a fair and proper way; it wil be done that way or not at all. My right hon. friend says he wants the matter delayed for a few days; I at once agree to that. My only desire is to provide for the urgent and pressing needs of the public service. If my hon. friends opposite, now or later, stand in the way of those needs being met, they will have to take the responsibility for doing so.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I desire to congratulate the Minister of Finance upon his frankness and his fairness. He says he has made no claim for economy. That is right, and he could not fairly have done so. But many claims have been made for him —made to such an extent, indeed, that my hon. friend's own statement, strong as it is, and respected as he himself is, would seem to be unnecessary on the present occasion. He has many influences working for him, and they have been working very well indeed. The claim of economy certainly came from somewhere—a statment to the press making claims for economies amounting, if I remember rightly, to twenty-three per cent in respect of the main Estimates. However, my hon. friend now agrees that there is no claim to be made for economies.

Mr. FIELDING: Not that there is no claim to be made, but that none has been made.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Very good: and perhaps he had better not make any such claim. Here is really one of the reasons why there should be a little delay in order that careful examination of the Estimates may be made. I have been able to give a little more time to the Estimates than my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen), and I find that last year the main Estimates amounted to $582,000,000; this year they are $466,983,000 a reduction of $115,079,000. I agree with what the Minister of Finance says as to the procedure in presenting the Estimates; he followed the ordinary course. But for the purpose of comparing votes with votes the usual thing is to look at your main Estimates. There is, as I have pointed out, a reduction of $115,000,000 in those Estimates. But I want to point out that in the railway vote, item 112 of the Estimates, there is a saving of $1,417,000; in the Canadian Northern vote a saving of $7,200,000; Grand Trunk, $63,900,000; Grand Trunk Pacific, $10,100,000, —a total saving of $82,655,627 on railway account alone. Most of this will be found to have reference to construction and betterments which have been carried out; and whether or not the present alleged economies will prove to be extravagances, I do not know. It is an indication, however, of the fact that the railway property is in a very much better condition to-day than it was. My leader has pointed out the position with reference to the Grand Trunk. Why, Mr. Chairman, there were millions of dollars of deferred claims which had to be got rid of, and when they were paid off they ceased to be annual charges; they were eliminated for all time. So we have in the railway vote a saving of over $82,000,000. Then there is a reduction of $8,330,000 in the shipbuilding items. I am referring to things which are largely outside the sphere of administration by the present Government, items which cannot result from any action taken by them. In the interest on public debt there is a reduction of $2,229,393, the result of the cancellation of bonds purchased by the late committee that was looking after the stabilization of war bonds. We cancelled, if I remember rightly, some $97,000,000 worth of outstanding bonds. Now, the total of the items I have mentioned, including the figures with respect to soldier land settlement and soldiers' civil re-establishment, referred to by my hon. leader, and including also items with respect to Canada Temperance Act, loans to provinces, and war graves, is $124,339,346.

4 p.m.

[Mr. Fielding.]

These items, as I have pointed out, have little if anything to do with the cost of government administration proper; they relate to projects that had previously been carried or to liabilities that had previously been met. Of course, I do not know the last state of the accounts; the Minister of Finance knows that. But I want to point out one of the reasons why we ought to consider carefully these Estimates. Down to the 20th of this month, when the last statement was issued, the total amount spent out of the consolidated fund amounted to $307,000,000. Of course it is true the financial year has not yet expired, but the late government did not run above that amount. On the other hand we have requisitions here to the amount of $466,000,000 in the main Estimates. It is true that my hon. friend opposite has a right to set up other claims, although that used not to be done. For example last year, down to 20th March, under the accounting practices of governments of the past, there was a surplus—that surplus representing the difference between Consolidated Fund receipts and Consolidated Fund payments,—of $53,991,334. We adopted the process of writing off investments which cannot be looked upon as active. Payments therefore on their account cannot be deducted from the debt. For example, railway investments and the Quebec harbour investment have been regarded as unremunerative; but the fact remains that even if we take all the public works capital, all the railway capital, all the investments in railways and in the Quebec harbour, and the cost of the few items that still remain of the war, the whole payments down to 20th March last, only amount to $372,000,000. But here, in the face of a claim for a reduction of $138,000,000 in the Estimates, we have estimates calling for a total expenditure of $466,000,000, and if the railway guarantees given during the year as of March 20th, of $50,000,000 are added to the total expenditure for the year down to March 20th, would stand at $422,889,000. I do not think we are at all unreasonable in our demands under the circumstances. We now find ourselves in this situation. The Government have brought down estimates showing a saving of $138,000,000 and yet their total costs of operation down to the 20th of March, as nearly as I can make out amount to $422,889,000. Nevertheless in the face of that enormous paper saving the Government requires a substantially larger vote than the whole of last year's expenditure. I quite understand the dilemma in which the Minister of Finance finds himself. Of course he is not going to put the closure through. How could he do that in the face of his actions of last year? My hon. friends opposite last year said the asking of an interim vote was iniquitous. They did not care then whether the King's government went on or not; they did not care whether wages were paid or not. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance says the responsibility is ours to-day, but he is not going to apply the closure. So far as we are concerned, we want to see the public business properly carried on; but we must have time to look into and consider these little things. If my hon. friend says now he is perfectly willing to consider the Estimates with us and have a conference we are perfectly willing to go into a conference with him.

Mr. FIELDING: I have been trying to ascertain to my own satisfaction what was the point in my hon. friend's remarks, and I think I have discovered it. Apparently he is aiming to show, by reference to the expenditure down to 20th March,—I hope he is correct—that when he came into this House the last session he brought forth estimates which were absolutely preposterous and did not represent the probable expenditure of the country. That is the only conclusion to be drawn from my hon friend's remarks. Let me, however, warn him that the expenditures down to 20th March are not to be judged the total expenditures for the year. He knows that in any business transaction when you are cleaning up accounts your expenditures are likely to take on a most serious form. My hon. friend can take to himself any credit that he wants to take to-day as to his economy last year; but he can only establish his economy of last year by proving that the Estimates of a year ago were so preposterous that the Liberal Opposition were well justified in objecting to them. However, it is understood this resolution will remain for further consideration.

Resolution stands.

SUPPLY

Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment, $30,820.

Mr. CRERAR: Where is that item?

The CHAIRMAN: Item 29, and the details will be found on page 113 of the Estimates.

Mr. STEVENS: We would like to have those details read, so that the item can be considered.

The CHAIRMAN:

Deputy Minister	$6,000
Assistant Deputy Minister and Secretary	5,000
Supervisor of expenditures	5,000

Mr. MEIGHEN: Why this increase of $500 in the salary of the Supervisor of Expenditures?

Hon. H. S. BELAND (Minister of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment): When the services of officials are recognized by the deputy minister as being very satisfactory, an increase is granted.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman has not been reading the Civil Service Act. These increases are under the Civil Service Commission, and follow a certain course, as recommended by the Commission. I do not know who the supervisor is, but I know of no rule where salaries go up $500 at a bound—that is salaries of the class of those higher officials of the department.

Mr. BELAND: I do not personally know the Supervisor of Expenditures. I know him by name only. I understand his services are extremely valuable, and he has been of the very greatest service to the department. He was thoroughly conversant with the very important work of supervising an expenditure of over $40,000,000, and I assume that, for such services as he rendered the department, a salary of $5,000 would not be considered excessive. I have not the details of the matter at the moment. If I had I might be able to give the hon. gentleman all the information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not question the ability of the holder of the office. I presume the hon. minister is right in his description of the man, because the gentleman was carefully selected and appointed by the late government.

Mr. FIELDING: Do not hold that against him.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is not now within the province of the Minister to say that this salary or that salary should go to this or that officer. Under the present system that is subject to the supervision of the Civil Service Commission, and I want to know how that system works out to give this officer an increase of $500.

Mr. MICHAUD: I would ask the hon. minister who has charge of this estimate to move down towards this part of the House, so that we would understand what is going on. At the moment we are unable to follow the debate.

Mr. BELAND: I think I will make the hon. gentleman hear me, without moving any nearer to him. If my hon. friend will put up with me for a few moments, perhaps I can satisfy him entirely.

Mr. SHEARD: I would also re-echo the statements which have been made—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder, louder.

Mr. SHEARD: Well, all right, you will hear what I have to say, and much comfort may it bring to you. Here is an estimate providing for an increase of $500 to an official. I want to be assured by the hon. minister that that $500 is strictly in accordance with the regulations of the Civil Service Commission, and I do not propose to vote that money until the minister can give us that assurance. We have worked out all the details of the arrangement of the Civil Service, we have scheduled the salaries, and we want to know as to any additions to salaries, if they are in accordance with those schedules and with the provision of the law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Perhaps I could help the minitser in this regard, and I am surprised he has not learned the facts. I have never had the department under my charge, but I am advised the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment is not under the Civil Service Commission, nor under the act.

Mr. BELAND: I am aware of all that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I presumed it was, but I find it is not.

Mr. BELAND: The increase was granted to this gentleman because of his important and very able services in the control of a very large expenditure.

Mr. STEVENS: Here is a department which is being reduced. A large number have been laid off during the past year because of the falling off in employment in the department. The Estimates show that the expenditures this year will be much less than last year and there is a continual reduction in work, in the number of employees and in the amount of expenditure, and yet there is an increase of $500 to the Supervisor of Expenditure; the less work he does the more he is paid—is that the principle?

Mr. CHAPLIN: And furthermore, I notice that a number of the smaller officers have been let off while all the big fellows have been kept on. If the organization is dying why not lop off some of the larger-salaried men?

Mr. BELAND: None of the officials to whom the hon. member refers can be dispensed with at this time.

Mr. MEWBURN: I do not know if this is an appropriate time, but I would like to call attention to a matter, so that if possible some early action may be taken in regard to it. I do not want to see the vote for Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment cut down in a way which will cause our soldiers to suffer in any way. But I should like to call the minister's attention to a suggestion, which is in no way a criticism, and I would urge the Government to take into serious consideration. Suggestions have been made and during the last election, I think, the Prime Minister, members of the present Government, and hon. members who ran in the interest of the present Government, made many promises to the returned soldiers. One matter, that is very close to my heart, and, I believe, close to the heart of every hon. member, is the problem cases which we have to deal with throughout this country. I believe it has been suggested that another committee of the House, similar to that which sat during the last two sessions, be continued again this year. That may or may not be necessary. We know the great care which that committee of which the minister (Mr. Beland) was an honoured member, devoted to the various problems that came before it. I have, however, a suggestion to make which, I think, might meet the situation more expeditiously, instead of months and, perhaps, almost a whole year being wasted before the problem cases can be reached and dealt with. I would respectfully suggest that the Government appoint, if necessary, a royal commission, composed of either four or five members, one being a very highly experienced medical man,—preferably one who has served overseas—another a business man who has sympathy with the returned soldier, and two returned soldiers; that they visit all the large centres of this Dominion, and that the visit of this commission to any large centre be advertised, perhaps two weeks in advance, so that all problem cases will have an opportunity of being heard. Those men should be compelled, prior to coming before the commission, to send in their names and full particulars, so that the members of the commission may have before them at the time the proper files relating to his service. We all know that there are hundreds of problem cases throughout the Dominion. It is well known that during demobilization the great anxiety of the men was to get their discharge as quickly as possible, and in hundreds of cases men discharged as one hundred per cent fit, are now suffering from disease contracted as a result of war service. It is unfair simply to have a parliamentary committee sitting at Ottawa, for many of these cases cannot be heard by such a committee. I believe a large number of our problem cases could be satisfactorily dealt with if this commission of which I have spoken could go through Canada from the Atlantic to the Pacific and allow these men to come face to face before it, and, if necessary, to have a medical examination by the medical officer on the board. I would even go so far as to give the commission power to meet these urgent cases that come before it. I know that in the last Parliament, hardly a day passed when some poor unfortunate man did not have to come before one of the representatives of the Government or a member of Parliament to try to get his case heard. The Pension Commissioners are not to blame; they are tied down by hard and fast regulations, and that is quite right. There is no elasticity in the Pension Board or their regulations, or in the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, to deal with these problem cases. I can instance hundreds of cases; probably I have had to do with more of them than the average man has. As long as I live, it will be my great privilege and endeavour to help the returned man wherever I can, and I am sure that is the desire of every hon. member.

Let me give one or two instances. A man served overseas for some years; he was gassed; he came back; he was demobilized and passed out class A; and later on he developed tubercular trouble. The late government was in charge then, but this is no political matter. Every effort was made to have the department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment deal with this case, but they turned up the man's file, his medical history sheet showed no case of disability. An expert in tuberculosis examined the man and declared that his complaint was caused by active service. After a great deal of difficulty we got him into a sanitarium at the public expense—in another similar case the man was got into a sanitarium at his father's expense. Then I took the matter up with the department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and the officers there, after weeks of correspondence, replied that the man to whom I first referred was not entitled to treatment or pay. In the meantime, however, the man was in the sanitarium and he died there. I then wrote to the department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, to ask if the department would help to defray his funeral expenses. Two weeks afterwards, with all this correspondence before them, they replied stating that the man's file did not show that his illness was caused by active service, and that they could not give any treatment—and this although the man had been dead for two weeks. If a commission is appointed with power to deal with these problem cases, a great deal of this trouble will be avoided, and I ask the minister to take the matter into his serious consideration. I am bringing this matter up while the minister's Estimates are before us, so that the Government will have time to consider it without further delay, the claims of these men can be dealt with, and the promises made by hon. members now on the government side may be carried out.

Mr. MANION: Having had the honour, for a very short time unfortunately, to preside over the department over which the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Béland) presides at the present time, I should like to say just one word, and that is to the effect that the fact that the expenses of this department are cut down—and I am sure the minister will be the first to admit this—is because the medical attention, vocational training and so forth, which have been given to returned soldiers, have been lessened. One of the first things that I learned on going into that department was that it was then in a position to lay off nearly 1,000 employees. At that time, I took the stand—I thought then it was the wisest stand, and I have no reason now to change my opinion—that those employees, 1,000 in number, should be laid off gradually, because of the rather severe unemployment conditions which prevailed in Canada then. That has been done, I presume, although I do not know that the 1,000 employees have all been laid off yet. I point this out, in justice to the late government and to the management of that department, before I took it over and during the time I supervised it, because the reductions in expenditure in that department were due mainly to the facts which I have named. I have nothing to say regarding the increase in salary for this officer; I do not remember being acquainted with the gentleman at all; but as regards the officers in general of that department, they were a very capable, able group of men. I should like also to point out that, to my mind, this is the one department of all others that should be given every attention and every sympathetic care. If there is any other which should be given the same sympathetic care, it is the department of Pensions, and I am sure the minister may feel quite certain that this party in this corner of the House—and I am sure the same is true of all parties in the House—will support him when he brings forward his Estimates for that department, so that the men who have returned from overseas may receive fair treatment. I am quite sure my hon. friend and the party with which he is associated, would not claim any particular economy in regard to that department because of the reductions.

Mr. HOCKEN: Increases are given to seven of the ten officials in this vote, one increase amounting to $500. The minister of this department will learn from the Minister of Labour that wages are on the decrease in every trade and calling in Canada. Why, therefore, should we make such enormous increases as we find in this estimate? A salary of $4,500 to-day is equivalent to $5,500 a couple of years ago, and will increase in value until wages strike the bottom. If the Government intend to economize they might very well start with the salaries of the civil servants, especially salaries as high as $4,500 a year. I have had very few minutes to look over the Estimates, but what we find in connection with this department is true in the case of nearly every other branch of the Civil Service. The Government, I submit, should begin with such salaries in any attempt to economize.

Mr. BELAND: This increase of $500 is for the Supervisor of Expenditures. It is about the largest increase for the year, and a few moments ago I gave the reason for it. The Committee will readily realize how valuable and important must be the services of an official who supervises an expenditure of nearly $50,000,000 a year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, no.

Mr. BOYS: Fifteen millions.

Mr. BELAND: Fifty millions, if pensions and expenditures in connection with the Board of Pension Commissioners are taken into account. The Board of Pension Commissioners and the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment are now merged into one department, as my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) knows, since it was the late Government that effected the amalgamation.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are under the same minister, but does my hon. friend say that this officer supervises pension expenditures?

Mr. BELAND: He will supervise all the expenditures in the department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That supervision will be purely formal.

Mr. BELAND: Now, in regard to the other salaries, there are three increases of $120 each, which are provided by the reclassification, one increase of $60, also in accordance with the Civil Service regulations, and one increase of $40. I do not know of any other increases.

My hon. friend (Mr. Mewburn) suggested the appointment of a royal commission to inquire into the complaints and the needs of ex-service men. The practice up to the present has been to appoint a parliamentary committee every session; that, at least, has been done since my return from the Old Country. It has been deemed advisable to confine the inquiries of that committee within certain limits, and I have been of the opinion, as I think every member of the House has been, that it was a proper course to follow. As my hon. friend has said, it is somewhat difficult for special cases to be brought before the parliamentary committee, especially when the men concerned reside at any considerable distance from the Capital. But if the Government appointed a royal commission to travel, as is suggested, from one end of the country to the other, though it might be able to hear every special case on the spot, still thousands of cases would have to be examined, and the inconvenience would be so considerable as to render the process unsatisfactory. Altogether I do not think there could be any advantage in a royal commission, from the point of view of either the public or the returned man himself. I submit that as a consideration, although I do not want to say that I am opposed to the appointment of a royal commission. The parliamentary committee has dealt, in years gone by, with numberless special cases. I well remember, that there were brought before the attention of a sub-committee, appointed by the parliamentary committee on Pensions and Re-Establishment, cases which were examined in the presence of the Chairman of the Board of Pension Commissioners, two other commissioners, and some of the highest officials of the department. How could it be possible for a royal commission, which should travel from one end of the country to the other, to take all the officials of the departments along with them? How, for instance, could they have the Pension Commissioners with them all the time in Calgary, Vancouver, or Halifax during four, or five, or six months, as the case might be? I fancy it would take a long time to conduct this investigation, and the difficulties that impede the parliamentary committee would exist, perhaps in a larger measure, in the case of a royal commission such as is suggested. Most of the cases considered by the parliamentary committee at the last session of Parliament and the session before were, I think, satisfactorily solved. My hon. friend is conversant with the subject, and, as he has pointed out, there are a very large number of cases which ought to be submitted to some tribunal for a more exhaustive investigation. There is no doubt about that. In the few weeks that I have been at the head of the department, I have convinced myself, from the correspondence I have received, that there are many complaints amongst the returned men as regards their treatment, especially in connection with pensions.

I am not prepared to lay the blame at the door of the late Government for everything that has happened. This committee must remember one thing: A Board of Pension Commissioners has been created by a statute of this Parliament, and that statute provides that the decisions of the Board shall be final; there is no appeal to the minister, no appeal to the Governor in Council. The only tribunal to which the men who are not satisfied with an award may have recourse is a parliamentary committee, or in other words, Parliament itself. I have been two or three months at the head of this department, and I have not yet received any complaint as to the action of the parliamentary committee of last year. I do not know whether my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Militia (Mr. Mewburn) has heard of any complaints against that committee. I think the men have had every possible opportunity, through their various organizations of laying their whole case before the committee, and the committee of last year was composed of men who had only in view the reconciling of the public interest with the interest of the returned men, because those two interests must be reconciled.

My hon. friend has referred to the special cases, those known as "problem" cases. Those cases exist in fairly large numbers throughout the country, such as tubercular cases. I am a medical man, and I would not declare offhand in the case of a soldier who has been gassed and discharged as 100 per cent fit, and who subsequently develops tuberculosis three years after his discharge, that the disease was not due to his war service, and I hardly think that any chest specialist would go that length. Those are cases which require the special attention of the committee and of this Parliament. Justice should be done to those men, and if any doubt should exist as to the cause of tuberculosis in any man who has seen actual war service in the trenches, and who has been gassed, he should be given the benefit of the doubt. I think that that was the policy of the late Government; I think it is the policy of this Government; and I think it would meet with the approval of every reasonable and humane man in Canada. The question is, how are you going to establish that such a disability, appearing subsequently, is due to war service?

Mr. BOYS: How can those cases reach the parliamentary committee, or this House, if there is no appeal from the Pension Board?

Mr. BELAND: I would point out that last year the question of these tubercular cases was gone into very fully by the parliamentary committee, and some reports which would be a credit to any country in the world were prepared and submitted regarding tubercular cases. I expect that this question will come before the committee again this year with a view, very likely, to more being done for these tubercular cases.

Mr. BOYS: I am not disputing that at all. I am absolutely in favour of it, but if there is no appeal from the board, I cannot see how you can get a remedy unless the proposition is to amend the act. If that is the minister's proposition, it is well worth considering.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend is perfectly right. There is no remedy except by amending the Pension Act. The board are bound to abide by the provisions of the law.

Mr. BOYS: Would the minister favour an amendment along that line?

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend may be a member of the committee that is to be appointed. Last year the committee made a number of recommendations to Parliament in their report, and with very few exceptions all those recommendations have been carried out. There were some important amendments to the Pension Act last year, and undoubtedly there will be further amendments this year. As far as these problem cases are concerned they can be dealt with otherwise than by amending the Pension Act. Special legislation might deal with these problem cases, or departmental action might be sufficient following recommendations to Parliament by the committee.

I might say that I did not expect to go into this question at all to-day. I am a very inexperienced minister in the matter of soldiers' civil re-establishment, though I am free to confess that I am extremely happy to have been able to supply this information to the committee. I had expected, however, that the discussion this afternoon would be confined to the civil government estimates. When the general estimates of the department are under consideration, perhaps we may go a little more fully into this important subject.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There is a provision in the Pension Act which allows the pensioners to commute their pensions. The underlying idea of this privilege of commutation was to give the pensioner an opportunity to capitalize his claim against the country—it had particularly to do with the smaller pensions for minor injuries—so that, on the one hand, the pensioner would be saved a good deal of trouble, and on the other, he would get a lump sum which might be very useful to him, and at the same time the cost of administration would be decreased. I am a little bit afraid that this plan is working out very badly, and that under financial stress and the pressure of circumstances many soldiers, very often under a misapprehension as to the nature and extent of their injuries, have given a complete release to the country. I do not know what my hon. friend's view may be, but it does seem to me that in deserving cases such a release ought not to be considered as having the slightest bearing on a proper consideration of the pensioner's case. After all, he is the ward of the nation in more ways than one. The important thing is that the right thing be done by the soldier, and the mere fact that he has improvidently, and, perhaps, improperly given the country a quittance of all his claims is no reason why he should not again be put upon the roll if, for example, his old trouble comes back in aggravated form.

Mr. CALDWELL: As I understand it, the act provides that if a pensioner sustains a subsequent or further disability, he has the right to go back for re-examination and to be given further pension in respect to that disability. That leads up to one point I would like to make. Having been a member of the Pensions Committee for the past two years, it does not behoove me to say how well its members have fulfilled the purposes of the committee. However, in my opinion our Pension Act is fairly adequate, but it is not being administered sympathetically by the pension commissioners. The large end of the complaint I have heard throughout the country with regard to pensions is that the per cent of disability is kept lower than it ought to be by the examining physicians or by the Pension Board. I know of a number of cases of men whose disability was such that they were unable to work but who were allowed only a ten or fifteen per cent disability. The Pension Committee has no power to deal with things of that kind. They may make recommendations for the amending of the act or for changing some of the regulations, but they have nothing to do with the carrying out of the act. The decision of the Board of Pension Commissioners is final. The minister will find that that is the chief cause of complaint—that the per cent of disability is kept too low. I wish just here to say that I am pleased to see in charge of this department a minister who himself served overseas, a man whom I know to be in perfect sympathy with the soldiers and their claims. I feel that at this time it is necessary not only to give the soldiers justice, but to treat them with a certain amount of sympathetic consideration.

Mr. BOYS: I am much interested in this question of appeal. I know of cases in my own county where men have not, so far as I have been able to judge, received justice. To give every one an appeal to the House or to the Pension Committee might be a mistake, but I would advocate an appeal to the House on the fiat of the minister, thus safeguarding against the making of appeals for which there is no foundation. I do think these men should have an opportunity of coming before the parliamentary committee when the circumstances warrant their doing so. Possibly some amendment to bring that about will suggest itself to the committee when it enters upon its work. I want to endorse what the hon. member for Victoria and Carleton has just said, that the administration of this department has fallen into excellent hands. I am quite sure that the minister will deal kindly with these men, who require at our hands the most sympathetic consideration.

Mr. CLARK: The hon. minister has intimated that the parliamentary committee can arrive at a satisfactory solution of the various questions involved in re-establishment. I have no doubt that the Pension Committee has done splendid work, and we are all very grateful to it on that account. But many cases have not been satisfactorily dealt with. I notice that this committee has not yet been appointed, and my suggestion is that it be appointed without delay and instructed to give immediate attention to these problems so that action can be taken before the House prorogues. I have not given serious consideration to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Hamilton; it is something new. But many individual cases have to be dealt with, possibly the most common being the refusal of attention on the ground that the disability is not the result of war service. I think, therefore, that the committee should get to work at once so that we may properly arrive at a solution of some of these most pressing questions.

Mr. HANSON: Mr. Chairman, the hon. minister has pointed out that the official to whom an increase of salary is proposed supervises the expenditure of over $50,000,000 annually. I can scarcely believe that that statement is correct, having regard to the provisions of the Pension Act, and to the fact, as has been stated here this afternoon, that the powers of the board are absolute and also to the fact that the expenditure of the $33,000,000, which I presume is included in the $50,000,000, is under the board's direct control and supervision; there is no appeal to the minister or to any one else. Furthermore, I observe that the amount of controllable expenditure in the department has been reduced by some $5,000,000. We have the spectacle of the Government increasing the salary of an official—he may be a very good official; I do not know him—by a very large sum, at a time when commercial enterprises throughout the country are reducing to rock bottom the salaries of executive heads as well as of workingmen. The Government is doing quite the reverse, and it seems to me that that is not a policy we should pursue at this time.

I concur in the suggestion made by the hon. member for East Hamilton (Mr. Mewburn), because I know of cases which in my opinion cannot receive adequate attention from or adequate consideration at the hands of a parliamentary committee, no matter how good the work of that committee may be. I know of cases in my constituency where the sympathetic touch of a personal interview through a responsible commission would have a very beneficial effect. I hope the minister will give this suggestion his very serious and sympathetic consideration. Although I am a new member of the House it is my opinion that a parliamentary committee can of necessity deal only with general principles; it cannot in the very nature of things deal with individual cases. Some such machinery as has been suggested by the hon. member for Hamilton should be created by the Government to deal with these cases.

It has been suggested that the Pension Act is adequate but that the working out of the regulations has been carried on in a parsimonious spirit. I would like to say, Sir, that my experience has been of an entirely different character. I have found the members of the Pension Board, within the limitations of the act and of the regulations thereunder, to be most sympathetic; and I am satisfied that if there is in any given case a tendency to restrict the expenditure in this regard, it is not because of any shortcoming on the part of members of the board themselves, but because of the limitations under which they find themselves confined by the act in question.

Some suggestion has been made here in favour of an appeal from the decision of the Pension Board. I hope, however, that the House will go very slowly before it provides for an appeal from a board composed of independent men as the Pension Commissioners are. All of them, I believe, are men of very high standing; all are returned men and in sympathy with the subject matters with which they deal. If you grant the right of appeal to Parliament it will only be another step in the direction of the spectacle of special acts being introduced here to grant pensions to returned men, who otherwise could not get them, such, for example as they have had in the United States Congress year after year, a procedure whereby men who are not entitled to pensions may get them through special acts.

Mr. BELAND: Regarding commutation, I am informed it is only given in disability cases between five and fourteen per cent inclusive; it is not granted in a disability case of, say thirty per cent. This plan was recommended last year by the parliamentary committee at the special request, I believe, of the veterans' organization. In the case of a man whose pension has been commuted requiring treatment, my impression is that the department grants free treatment in our hospitals to such persons.

Mr. CALDWELL: Is treatment allowed for these men after they have commuted, if their disability has not increased? I think not. If their disability has increased I think they are allowed treatment. If their disability does not increase they are not allowed treatment after having commuted their pension: I think that is a hardship.

Mr. BELAND: Where the disability has not increased a man would not require treatment.

Mr. MANION: My hon. friend will pardon me for the correction. I believe that any case of disability which is due to the world war recurring at any time is treated by the department.

Mr. CALDWELL: I may be wrong but I thought it was only if the disability had increased.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The medical treatment for injuries received in the war is always in addition to pension—that is the men are entitled to it so long as they live. It has no relationship to the pension; that is to say the special medical treatment is in addition to the pension. Consequently, it would not lapse because of the commutation of the pension.

Mr. BELAND: That is my impression; I think the right hon. gentleman is right. The deputy minister is not here at the present moment but if he were I think he would corroborate the statement that even in case of commutation if the man's disability were to become such at any time as to cause him to require further treatment he would have a claim on the department for that treatment.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If he ever received medical treatment at all.

Mr. BELAND: As regards the discretion of the Pension Board, that is given to it by statute. It is I believe, absolutely impossible to frame a Pension Act which would not give to the Pension Board a certain amount of latitude, or certain discretionary powers. Whether the board uses these powers too much in favour of the returned men or insufficiently in his behalf is for each hon. member to judge for himself. The hon. member for Victoria and Carleton, (Mr. Caldwell) has sat on the Pension Committee for the past three years and he thinks the Pension Board is not sufficiently broad in its interpretation of the act; while the hon. member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) believes that the board is exercising its discretionary powers in the other direction. If I were to rely on the correspondence I receive I should conclude that the board does not use that discretion too much in favour of the returned men. Let me say further that it is my intention, at a very early date, to submit to the House the names of the parliamentary committee who will this session deal with matters of re-establishment, etc.

Mr. MANION: Before we leave this item I would like to say a word on behalf of the Board of Pension Commissioners. I have had, I think, a good deal of experience with them as an ordinary member of Parliament and I must confess that I think, on the whole, they have proved themselves a pretty reasonable group of men. The position they occupy to-day in Canada is perhaps as difficult a position as any men could possibly have because there are many men who come back from the front feeling they have a pension coming to them when they really have not. In justice to the Board of Pension Commissioners be it said that though there is no appeal to this House, there is an appeal back to them; and in cases where the men were not satisfied with the award of the Medical Board which granted them a pension, I have never found any particular difficulty, when I appealed to the Pension Commissioners, in getting these men another. If the Medical Board which re-examines the man changes the award of the previous Medical Board then the Pension Commissioners will come up to that award; and I have in fact had very many cases, changed.

In regard to the remarks of my hon. friend from York-Sunbury (Mr. Hanson) regarding the permitting of appeals to come to this House I want to supplement what he says—I was thinking of making the same observation when he said it. You would have a terrible condition of affairs, I think, in the House of Commons if every man who felt that he had a right to a pension, or a right to appeal, should bring it before the House most of the members of which are not medical men and cannot therefore judge the real disability of the man. I do not suppose there is any likelihood of the question being thrown back upon Parliament, but if there is that aspect of the matter should be kept in view. Nobody should have an appeal over the heads of the Board of Pension Commissioners back to the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I was glad indeed to hear the minister commend the practice that this House followed so consistently for so many years of appointing each session a joint committee, composed of members from all sides of the Chamber, to consider the whole question of civil re-establishment and how far in any direction the country still might go in providing for the wants of returned men or, as he phrased it so well himself, consider how to reconcile their interests and their wants with the interests of the country as a whole. The late Government adopted that course in order that there might be some medium through which the various grievances and desires of the returned men might find expression. and might be co-ordinated and placed before the country, in order that the country could fully grasp just what they asked for and the grounds therefor, and as well, along side of that, the general situation of the country. It was adopted also in order, if possible, to keep out of the arena of party politics the question of the treatment of returned men who had suffered in the war. To a large extent it was successful. It was successful in securing the unanimous approval on each occasion, of that committee. All sides joined and all sides worked faithfully. I thoroughly endorse the words of the hon. gentleman from Victoria and Carleton (Mr. Caldwell) in that regard, but notwithstanding that fact, notwithstanding that by means of that joint committee we did secure unanimous recommendations, and we did meet the longings and desires of those men to the utmost possible extent, the opportunity for party advantage presented itself to hon. gentlemen opposite, and, though their own representatives on that committee, session after session, joined with us in fixing the length to which the country could go, they went before the country and complained that we had not gone far enough, and promised the returned men that they would go further, particularly that they would make another cash grant all around to all the returned men of this country. That was to be the chief step in the way of re-establishment that they were to take beyond what had been done before. I read from the pledge they made, and I ask the House to recall that this pledge was made to that class of our population who, of all others, should be treated with the utmost good faith, and should never be misled in any way whatever. The resolution reads:

> Resolved that this convention declares—

That is the convention at which the present Prime Minister was made leader, and this is the resolution unanimously passed, a promise unanimously given:

> That this convention declares that the adoption of a system of cash grants to the soldiers and dependents of those who have fallen is the most satisfactory and effective means of Civil Re-establishment, such grants to be in addition to the present gratuity, and to any pension for disability resulting from service.

There has been no increase since. That was in August 1919. Hon. gentlemen opposite went before the country, appealed to all the returned men of Canada, and promised that, if returned to power, they would make cash grants to these men, in addition to what had already been done by the Government, and in addition to all that had been recommended by the joint committees of the House. This clause of the platform of hon. gentlemen was paraded on many platforms in the Dominion. It was reprinted and scattered through the streets of our cities. There are hon. gentlemen in this House now who can confirm what I say, and the men had the promise that this would be done. I am not going to charge that it is not going to be done, but I notice the main Estimates are down, and there is no provision for it. Surely, it is not something that is to wait for the supplementary Estimates. However, that may be, I want to impress on the hon. minister the pledge that he made, that his government made, and that his party made, and the character and situation of the men, to whom particularly this pledge was addressed. I would like him to give an intimation to the House now as to whether the pledge was a mere lure, as to what extent the pledge was honest, and to what extent it was not.

Mr. BELAND: I am very glad the right hon. gentleman has brought this question to my attention. If he wants an answer from me, I will give it to him. The plank in the platform which he has just read was, no doubt, adopted by the convention. At that time it was apparent, at least to the members of the convention, that a general feeling existed in the country in favour of a cash grant. I had myself been able to perceive it in many quarters of the land, though in absolutely none of my public utterances have I once referred to it, and I think I have been speaking in all the provinces of Canada, with the exception of British Columbia. Lately, during the sittings of the parliamentary committees, it has been made plain to me that the large majority of returned men were not favourable to a cash bonus, and at the parliamentary committee last session I do not think in one single instance was the claim pressed for the payment by the country of a cash bonus to returned men. If my hon. friend wants to know what my attitude would be on the subject, it could not be any different from the one taken by the large majority of the returned men themselves, and that is not to grant the cash bonus.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have listened with intense interest and curiosity to the hon. minister's explanation of the plank. May I ask him if the same kind of reasoning will apply to the tariff plank?

Mr. BELAND: If the question were in order, I would have a ready answer, but happily it is not in order, and I do not want to be called to order by the Chairman. But we can rely, I think, on the Minister of Finance to give a proper answer in due time.

Mr. POWER: I would like to say a word with reference to cash bonus. If the ex-Prime Minister will remember, the plank which he read was inserted in the Liberal platform at the convention of 1919. Parliament met in September, 1919, shortly after the convention, and during that session we had a parliamentary committee on pensions and re-establishment. If the hon. leader of the Opposition will remember, that was the year in which the great agitation took place about the bonus. Hon. members from the other side of the House were bombarded with telegrams from all over the country. Those who had announced, in election addresses throughout the country, that they were in favour of a cash bonus for soldiers were asked to remember their promises when it came to implement them by legislation. In spite of this, the committee reported that no bonus should be given to the soldiers, because, if the Prime Minister will remember, when the report of this committee was brought before the House, the leader of the Opposition, now the Prime Minister, moved that the report be sent back to the committee for further consideration on the ground that adequate provision had not been made for the re-establishment of the ex-soldier. This motion was voted down by the majority at the back of the right hon. the present leader of the Opposition. At the following session of Parliament a committee was appointed to deal with the question of pensions and soldiers re-establishment. Shortly after the committee was convened and about to begin its labours, a delegation came from Toronto, headed by one Harry Flynn. He was received by the acting Prime Minister, Sir George Foster, who announced to him that, under no consideration, would the then government discuss with them the matter of a cash bonus to returned soldiers. This having been the definite decision of the government, a committee decided that it was useless to study the question of bonus, since, even if they recommended it, it was the government's policy not to grant it. The bonus question, in so far as the committee on re-establishment was concerned, was then dropped. Since then, a year and some months have elapsed. At the last convention of the Great War Veterans' Association held at Fort William, the question of a cash gratuity was submitted to the convention, and it was decided that it was not the policy of the Great War Veterans' Association to insist on a cash gratuity or on the veterans' scheme any longer. Under the circumstances, I hardly think it is the duty of any hon. member to bring it before the House any longer if the veterans themselves do not see fit to pass resolutions to that effect or to submit such demands to the House or to the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that anything could excel the casuistry of the minister himself, unless it be that of his first lieutenant on the subject. A great party meets; it considers a question of enormous consequence to the country, involving, not hundreds of thousands, but millions upon millions of dollars, involving the welfare of a vast section of our population, and that section the most deserving of all. It weighs and considers all subjects, all considerations, pro and con. It determines that the Government of the day is wrong, and it determines to pledge its party to do something that the Government of the day refuses to do. That party is returned to power. It is asked if it intends to carry out its pledges made to those men, who saved the honour of this nation, those men who served as no others in our history have done, those men to whom we owe to-day the best that this country can give. What do this Government say? "Oh," they say, "We adopted that, it is true, but a year afterwards the Government opposed to us said that it would not carry it out." Well, in the name of common sense, why would they adopt it if the Government opposed to them was ready to carry it out? It was because the Government opposed to them was not ready to carry it out that they adopted it. If we had been ready to carry it out, there was no need for its adoption; it would have been done. The hon. member for South Quebec (Mr. Power) says:"You, when you were Prime Minister, refused this money." Certainly I did, and I said so to the country; but did hon. gentlemen say so to the country? No, they scattered that platform throughout the length and breadth of Canada right on election day. They have members sitting in this House because they got votes on the pledge made in that platform. Undoubtedly, at the session before last, I very frankly told the House that the Government had shut the door on further gratuities. In face of that, this House was moved for a reference back of the committee's report as a protest of the then Opposition against the stand which I took before Parliament and the country.

Mr. POWER: At the time this House was moved to refer the matter back to the committee, the right hon. gentleman was not Prime Minister. He had not shut the door on bonuses, but the Hon. Mr. Calder had.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government to which the right hon. gentleman belonged had. I am glad I am disclosing the rocking foundation on which hon. gentlemen rest. The Government had shut the door. The next year the Government maintained the shut door consistently. They did not seek to deceive the returned men. Did the hon. gentleman state in this House that he had abandoned all claim on behalf of returned men to increase their gratuities? No, he waits until his party is in power before he does that.

Mr. POWER: The right hon. gentleman stated a few minutes ago that every member of this House who sat on that committee had always adopted the reports of the Committee on Re-establishment. That would mean that members on this side of the House had acquiesced in the Government's decision to close the door. In that respect, may I correct the right hon. leader of the Opposition, because I, for one, have never acquiesced in the decisions of the committee, have always kept the door open, and have said so in this House.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly, did I not say that the committee was unanimous?

Mr. POWER: It was not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The comimttee agreed; but, as the hon. gentleman points out himself, the members of the committee took the position that they should not press for any further cash gratuities because the Government had made known that it was worthless to do so. I admit that to be true. We did make it known to the world; we took the country into our confidence; we did not seek to gain votes by pretending to hold open the door which really was closed. Then, the next session, when we came back again, we took precisely the same position, and, in view of that the committee did not consider the question of further cash gratuities. All these sessions go by. Hon. gentlemen then go to the country; they go to the country on this platform; they scatter it abroad and they get votes on it. They get the consideration, and hon. gentlemen now laugh, having deceived the soldiers of this country and having obtained, as their reward, seats in Parliament.

Mr. POWER: Supposing what he says is true, does the right hon. gentleman think it is any worse for hon. members on this side to have deceived the soldiers in that respect, than it was for hon. gentlemen on the other side to have deceived the same men when they told them in 1917 that, when they should return, Canada would be theirs and then, when they did return, not to give them what they almost unanimously demanded?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Anything that any member of the government of that day told the soldiers of this country was carried out.

Mr. DUFF: What about the soldiers' votes?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Every one of them had a vote.

Mr. DUFF: The right hon. gentleman stole them afterwards.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They would not have had votes if the hon. gentleman had had his way.

Mr. DUFF: Is that so? We did not steal the election as my right hon. friend did, sending code telegrams.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Quebec South has almost admitted you did and the minister himself says: "Yes, we promised that; we walked right up to the ballot boxes with that promise in our pockets; we flared it on the billboards; we took the soldier to the booth and we voted him on the strength of it; but now we find the Great War Veterans' Association is against it."

Mr. POWER: It is true that we took the soldier to the polling booth, but we did not steal his ballot nor stuff the ballot boxes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am glad to be assured that there are depths of infamy into which the hon. gentleman has not yet fallen. Is there any clause in the resolution of 1919 which states that it is subject to confirmation by the Great War Veterans' Association? I suppose, when we come to the tariff, we shall be told that we cannot carry out the tariff policy because the Y. M. C. A.—

Mr. POWER: The Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —or some other organization has failed to approve it since. Imagine a great party determining on its policy on a great subject, more than that, on a sacred subject of public polity, getting into power on the strength of it, and then standing in their places and telling the nation: "Oh, the day of repudiation is come; the day of betrayal is come; we got your votes, and we sit and smile at the success of our trickery."

Mr. DUFF: Very dramatic.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, but I think it is very infamous.

Mr. DUFF: Yes, on my right hon. friend's part.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think there is anything dramatic about it. Is this to be an indication of what we are to expect all this session?

Mr. DUFF: Speak for yourself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does this apply to the whole of this voluminous document that acquired so much fame, that was used so widely, so profusely, throughout the country? Is this the style of reasoning every time we remind hon. gentlemen of the faith they pledged? Have hon. gentlemen no opinions of their own? Have they no principles of their own? Do they depend for their principles on organizations outside of this House? Or, having advanced them, have they no means of putting them into effect? Have they no intention of doing so? Now let us put the matter in a kernel again.

Mr. POWER: Is that a question? If it is, I will give the answer.

Mr. MEIGHEN: All right.

Mr. POWER: We do not depend for our principles on organizations outside of the House, but I imagine that the Government should depend on recognized organized public bodies to learn the opinions of the members of those bodies. The Great War Veteran's Association, I may remind my right hon. friend, represents possibly the great majority of the soldiers throughout Canada, and it is the Government's duty to consult them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would it not be wise, not to say honest, to get those opinions before making any promise or pledge? How does the opinion of any body outside of the House come in between the pledge made and its fulfilment?

Mr. POWER: It is no longer necessary; the right hon. gentlemen established the soldiers so well that it is no longer necessary to carry out the pledge.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think we did establish them well; that is what we said. We had gone, we believed, so far as the country, under the circumstances, was able to go. We took into account the circumstances of the country and frankly told the soldiers what we were able to do. We said: "This we can do; more than this we cannot concede. We disdain to ask your vote on a pledge, implied much less expressed, to do more than we intend to do." In that we are proud to distinguish ourselves from hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The leader of the Opposition seems to forget that there are times and places for all things, and that a course which at one moment may be the most advisable may not be the best at another time. When the Liberal Convention held its meetings in 1919 we were not faced in this country with the condition that we have since been obliged to recognize, of huge deficits arising out of railway properties taken over by the government under the administration of my right hon. friend. The financial situation as it then presented itself to the country was entirely different from that with which we are faced to-day, or which confronted the people at the last general election. I think that the Liberal Convention was thoroughly sincere—nay, more, it was thoroughly right—in the position it took at that time. The men were just returning from the war and were about to be re-established and we felt that to have given them a cash grant would have been the best means of meeting the situation that then existed. But to-day we are not in 1919; this is the year 1922, and we have before us a financial problem which is appalling.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Will my hon. friend permit me a question? Did he, after he knew what the railway deficits and obligations were, say to the country that this pledge would not be carried out?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am happy to tell my right hon. friend that I did.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I would reply by asking my right hon. friend, or anyone associated with him, to point to any utterance of mine, on any platform in the country, in which I declared that if the Liberal party were returned to power we would give cash grants?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not asking that. The promise was here; there was no need of a further promise. The hon. gentleman says: "We will not carry out that promise because of the railway obligations." Well, it was his duty to inform the country, in that event, after the railway obligations became known to him, that he would not carry out his pledge. Now, let him point out where he did that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If my right hon. friend will allow me to make my position clear, I will repeat what I have said.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That will not do.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It may not serve my right hon. friend's purpose, but it will serve the purpose of the House and of the country. The important consideration in this matter is the position taken by myself and hon. gentlemen associated with me in the recent campaign, when we asked the people to return us to office, instead of hon. gentlemen opposite; and on no platform at any time during the whole campaign did I in any way, directly or indirectly, promise cash grants to the returned men. On the other hand, I think I am quite right in saying that when I was questioned on the subject, once or twice, I declared emphatically that under the changed circumstances we would not consider cash grants.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have never seen the declaration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend says he has never seen it. He has watched the papers very closely, if he ever saw any utterance of mine wherein I promised cash grants to the returned soldiers if my party were returned to power, let him quote the statement. If he cannot produce any such, then I say he should be careful in the language he uses.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Is not this platform a promise?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will give my right hon. friend all the opportunity he wishes to speak on this subject. He may have all the time he likes, but I think he should accord a like courtesy to those on this side of the House. I challenge him and hon. gentlemen associated with him to point to any utterance of mine in which I promised cash grants to the soldiers. If he is unable to find any utterance of that kind, on the part of myself or any of my colleagues in the last election, he is clearly not justified in saying so far as we are concerned that there has been any betrayal or deception. What I did say was that the government of my right hon. friend was not a representative government, that the following behind him was not representative, and that the returned men were entitled to have all matters of concern to them considered by a committee of a new Parliament which would be directly representative of the people, which could take account of the position of the country as it is, and which I trusted would, deal generously with the proposals put before them. That promise has been implemented or will be implemented in full shortly, and my own hope is that when the committee meets it will take a generous attitude towards the questions placed before it.

Mr. CRERAR: I think the discussion is getting rather out of order, and I suggest that the committee come back to the consideration of the matter in hand. Does the minister (Mr. Béland) think that it is necessary to have all this supervising staff for whom we are asked to vote this afternoon? There is a deputy minister, an assistant deputy minister, a secretary, a supervisor of expenditures, an assistant secretary, a chief clerk, etc. It seems to me that we might possibly be able to get along with a little less supervising expenditure than is asked for. The tendency in government departments is usually to increase rather than to decrease staffs. We must face this fact, however, that if $100 can be saved here or there, it is that much reduction in the national tax bill, and consequently it is a question that should receive the earnest consideration of the House. I have full confidence in the intention of the minister to administer the department as economically as possible. At the same time I know how easy it is to have increases in departmental expenditures, and I do trust that in small matters, as well as in large, not only the minister, but every member of the Government, will exercise the strictest economy in the conduct of the public business.

Mr. HOCKEN: This department is not under the Civil Service Commission, but the minister is increasing salaries as if it were, and that is not to the advantage of the commission. There is no maximum in the department under present circumstances, so that $120 may be added every year indefinitely. The authority of the commission is denied so far as fixing a maximum is concerned, but the department proceeds to make increases just as though the department were under the control of the Civil Service Commission. If this department is not under the commission, it should be; or, in the alternative, all departments should be removed from the control of the commission. If I might answer the question that my right hon. leader put, as frankly as a similar question has been answered in this House before, I would tell him that the reason why that pledge is not implemented is because—"we are here and you are there."

Mr. POWER: May I ask when this supervisor of expenditure was appointed. It seems to me the position is somewhat useless. I share the opinion of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) that we should economize as much as possible. I understand that the expenditure in the department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment, irrespective of pensions, amounts to something like $15,000,000 or $16,000,000. With regard to pensions, I do not care who the supervisor is; he has nothing to do. The Pension Act exists, the Board of Pension Commissioners fixes the pension to be allotted to the pensioner, and it is the duty of the Government to pay this pension irrespective of whether there is a supervisor of expenditure or not. The question to my mind is whether the office should exist at all, rather than whether the supervisor should get an increase of $100 or $200. May I ask the minister when, and for what purpose, the office was created. There does not appear to be any supervisor of expenditure in any other department, and I wonder why one is necessary in this department.

Mr. BELAND: I am not in position to give the committee the exact date when Mr Waddington was appointed supervisor of expenditure, but I am under the impression he was appointed some two or three years ago. As to the necessity for the position, I think the committee would be unanimous in appreciating its importance. It is true that the amount of pension to be paid in each case is fixed by the board, but the total expenditure is large, and has to be supervised. The total outlay of the department this year is between $45,000,000 and $50,000,000. Personally, I think the position is an indispensable one. There are very few departments paying out so much money. I do not know Mr. Waddington personally, but from reports I have had from many sources he is one of the most capable auditors and accountants in the country. I confess that I cannot understand my hon. friend from Quebec South when he says that the position could be done away with. I do not believe that it would be in the interests of the department or the country to dispense with the position, for the present time at all events.

Mr. CHAPLIN: As I pointed out some time ago, this office has got rid of sixteen clerks. Now sixteen junior clerks must have had a head clerk over them. Why is this head clerk retained? Is it to look after the sixteen juniors who have gone? We have to practise economy; that is why I am bringing up this point. This is a department that is finishing its work, and I believe that in letting out men, we should start at the top, instead of at the bottom. We have here a deputy minister, an assistant deputy minister, a supervisor of expenditure, an assistant secretary, a head clerk, a principal clerk, a storekeeper, and a departmental librarian. We have a lot of head men left, but the tail has all gone. Let us get rid of some of the ones higher up.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend is quite right in his contention that some of the higher officials should be dispensed with. I can assure him that both before I took charge of the department and since, very high positions in the department have been dispensed with, and others will be as time goes on. I have in mind the case of an engineer who is in receipt of a salary of over $3,000 whose services have been dispensed with in our unit in Montreal. All over the country from Vancouver to Halifax we are dispensing with the services of highly paid officials. I submit, when you consider that the number of employees in the department is somewhere around 5,000—I speak subject to correction, but that is about the number, and at one time it was 11,000—it is necessary to retain some of these higher men; but I repeat to the Committee, we are dispensing with highly paid officials all over the country. In Toronto, for instance, a highly paid official with a salary of $5,000 is being released by the department on the 1st of April. I hope that will be satisfactory to my hon. friend.

Mr. CHAPLIN: That gentleman would be outside the department of civil government.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend will, of course, realize that those at the head office have to do with the service all over the country.

Mr. HANSON: The minister has not yet answered satisfactorily why there has been an increase.

Mr. STEVENS: Before the House rises, let me point out to the Prime Minister in answer to an explanation he made a moment ago, that the reason for abandoning this pledge was that subsequent to the making of the pledge by the convention it had been discovered that there were heavy railroad obligations incurred, that he officially, as leader of the party, and with the sanction of the committee directing the affairs of the party, published this handbook which was sent all over Canada and was the bible of the speakers for my hon. friend. He has challenged us to produce something, and I now produce it. This handbook contains in the early pages a repetition of the pledge exactly as read by the leader of the Opposition. A little further over I find several pages devoted to an exposure, according to their view, of the railway indebtedness and obligations. Now we have in this same official speaker's handbook, containing a photograph of the Prime Minister on the front page, and his autobiography on the inside, the pledge of the party for loans to the soldiers, and an acknowledgment of the nation's obligations as well. In other words, in spite of the country's enormous indebtedness, these gentlemen on the eve of the election pledged themselves to the payment of cash grants to soldiers in exactly the terms of the 1919 platform. This is published in the Liberal handbook issued in October last. My hon. friend the Prime Minister will not repudiate that handbook? I pause to give him an opportunity to do so. He says emphatically, no;—he will not repudiate it. There is an answer to my hon. friend's challenge. In 1919 I went home to my constituents; I faced the returned men and said exactly what the right hon. leader of the Opposition had said; I told them very plainly that we felt the country could not stand a cash grant. But in my riding and in other ridings throughout the country my hon. friends opposite persisted in their pledge as a bait to the returned men. They are now on the treasury benches, and we know perfectly well that they have no intention whatever of implementing that pledge. The hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) said a moment ago that the reason why they did not implement the pledge was because, forsooth, they were prevented from doing so by us; that we blocked them. Will he not call upon his leader now to implement the pledge? Does he not stand to-day exactly where he stood then? I say to the Prime Minister: Either admit frankly that our position was the correct one, or take steps to implement the pledge which was so seriously made by hon. gentlemen opposite at the Liberal convention and during the late campaign.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought it conceivable that when the apology offered by the leader of the Government for breach of a public pledge in this matter was hopelessly riddled by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) there would be at least an attempt to substitute another. It will be remembered that the excuse given was: Oh, when we made our pledge in 1919 we did not know the country's obligations. Since then we have found out and because we owe so much money we cannot redeem that pledge. It has since been pointed out that the obligations had been incurred then; hon. gentlemen opposite knew all about them. It has been pointed out, moreover, that in the campaign a party of which the present Prime Minister is the leader, issued to this country an official document with the imprimatur of the party and the leader, as the programme of the Liberal party, reaffirmed that pledge and declared it to be the aim of the Liberal party. That was issued in the month of October, 1921, more than a month after the elections were declared, indeed after the writs had been issued for the general election. Now, where goes the excuse that at the time it was given hon. gentlemen opposite did not know what our debt was. They knew everything in October, 1921. Then the need for votes arose, and then went forth the affirmation of the pledge to the whole people of this country and candidate after candidate stood upon it, candidate after candidate held out that bait to the electors of this Dominion. I have some of their manifestoes before me. I hold in my hand a document issued uniformly by three candidates of the present Prime Minister—not by one remember, but by three—in the city of Vancouver, with the photographs of the three to the left and this pledge given:

> The Liberal Candidates pledge themselves to a system of cash grants to the dependents of the fallen as the most satisfactory and effective means of civil re-establishment—such grants to be in addition to the present gratuity or pension.

Could any fault be found with these three candidates for repeating that pledge given on November 19, 1921? No fault could be found with them. They had the confession of faith of the whole Liberal party; they had the pledge of its leader; they had that pledge reaffirmed just one month before this was given; they were authorized to make it; they were authorized to solicit votes upon it. They did make it, they did solicit votes upon it, and they did get votes upon it—doubtless votes by the hundred. Their position is just the position of numerous gentlemen opposite, I doubt not; it is not the position of every one. Now what are hon. gentlemen going to do about it? Sit in their seats and smile at the success of chicanery of this kind? If that is to be tolerated, how can we raise our voices later on and protest against the prostitution of other pledges that possibly more than this mean something to hon. members? If this goes by without protest, merely with a smile, if we accept the cynical assurance of the Prime Minister that we must not take election promises too seriously, what is to become of responsible government in this country? Oh, he declares, what we told the people was that we were going to restore responsible government. The Prime Minister, the leader of the party, goes to the country, holds in his hand a pledge and asks for support upon it, spreads it through the country and gets support upon it—gets support upon it and declines to fulfil it. When he does that he does more to subvert responsible government than he could do with the worst parliament ever elected. He strikes at the root of all responsibility; all responsibility is gone. How are the public to know after this what they are going to get if they vote for this man or vote against that man? There is to be no assurance of what they will get. Hereafter if this conduct goes without protest on the part of this Parliament all the elector knows hereafter, if he votes in favour of a certain set of commitments, is that he will either get them when the elections are over, or be told by the elected Prime Minister not to take his pledges before the contest too seriously. If he is so to be told, where is responsible government? Now I put this to hon. gentlemen opposite—one or two of whom at least I know were not parties to either making the affirmation or the breaking of this pledge—what are they to say, now that the time has come for us to pass upon this matter as a principle of public policy? The time has come now for hon. gentlemen to express themselves. That the pledge was made there is no doubt; that it was reaffirmed, and again reaffirmed, and reaffirmed officially, there is no doubt; that it was never repudiated until the goods were delivered upon it there is no doubt—none whatever. Is the repudiation now to go without protest at the hands of the Parliament of Canada?

Mr. MILLAR: Mr. Chairman, sitting pretty close to the official Opposition I find myself somewhat in sympathy with the criticism they have offered in regard to these increases; with a lot of what they have said I find myself entirely out of sympathy. I am not going to take time now to tell about the faults and the wrongdoings of either of the old political parties; if I were to do so I think we would be here all night and all day to-morrow. I am thoroughly convinced, however, from what I have heard them say about each other that the Progressives should have been here several years ago—that is a fact of which I am thoroughly convinced.

I would like to say that I am very much disappointed that so many increases are asked for in the Estimates that have been brought down. It is very nice, indeed, that those engaged in the government employ as civil servants shall receive additions to their salaries, but what about those who are receiving very much less, who have to pay these increases? I felt when I came here—and many of my Progressive friends had the same feling—that we should be prepared to give every degree of credit to the Government if they were deserving of credit, and that we should also give credit to the official Opposition where it was deserved. I felt determined, when I went back to my constituents, that any degree of credit that was coming, either to the Government or to the Opposition, should be given them as honestly as I could give it. I considered that in that way I would be doing something towards the good government of the country, and the Government, knowing our attitude, I believe, would be more apt to do the right thing, but looking as we are, for retrenchment and economy, and finding these increases asked for which I cannot justify, I feel very much afraid that I shall not be able to say the good things I intended to say with reference to the Government and their economy. As the people in the West know that $5,000 per anum in Ontario, say in the city of Ottawa, will go as far as $7,000, or perhaps $8,000, in the West, I am inclined to think that, under present conditions, with the economic depression under which we are suffering, and the necessity for strictest economy, they will consider that such increases as have been asked for here are not justified.

Much has been said about the condition of the West, and I am not going to deal with it. It has been discussed at considerable length, but I assure you that what has been said has not been overdrawn. We are living in critical times. There has been such a keen competition between the different factions, and the different industries throughout the country, each striving to get what it could, without any thought as to the other fellow, that these industries have driven the agricultural classes pretty well to the wall, and if the crop this year should fail, I shudder to think of the result. I am afraid the industrial and commercial life of Canada would almost topple over like a house of cards.

I have been looking, and hoping, for the strictest economy in connection with the Civil Service. It is hard to get proof of many things I believe, but I think that a great many more officials are engaged than are required. While there are many who are giving efficient service, who are earning their money and are not getting any more than they should receive, on the other hand, there are men engaged in the Civil Service who are not required. How do you suppose the returned soldier who was placed in a position of want and need, would feel when he went into the Soldiers' Settlement Board in the city of Regina, was kept waiting two hours before he could see the party he wished to see, and observed twenty stenographers, not one of whom, during those two hours, handled the typewriter? He would get the impression —and I think many have the impression— that, while a large sum of money may have been expended, as has been pointed out here, in re-establishing returned soldiers and paying them pensions at figures that would seem to indicate that they have been better treated in Canada than in other countries—too much of the money has gone into administration, and too much to the officers rather than to the private soldiers. I would like to see an analysis of the figures, and see how much has been spent in administration, how much has gone to officers, and how much to private soldiers. I have met many private soldiers who, I am quite convinced, have not been fairly treated. I am not going to speak at length on this matter, but I do not feel like backing up the action of the minister or the Government in increasing salaries all along the line.

Mr. BELAND: I quite appreciate the remarks which have been made by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Millar). I am also of the opinion that the strictest economy and retrenchment should be practised in administration, not only in this department but in all other departments of the public service. It is true that in every department there is a considerable number of officials who are receiving somewhat high salaries, but I may be permitted to say to my hon. friend that those salaries are based on a classification which has been made. The salary attached to each particular class is fixed by the Civil Service Commission, or by the reclassification board employed by the late government for the purpose. This afternoon some remarks were made on the subject of the increase of $500 to the supervisor of expenditures, whose salary was already $4,500. The right hon. gentleman, in explanation given to the House, stated that these officials were not subject to the Civil Service Commission or rather, to be exact, that the Department of Soldiers' Civil Reestablishment did not fall under the jurisdiction of the Civil Service Commission. In a large measure that is true, but in so far as the civil government employees are concerned, they come under the supervision of the Civil Service Commission and in this particular instance the $500 which is asked for as an increase cannot be paid to Mr. Waddington, or the supervisor of expenditures, until it has been authorized by the Civil Service Commission, and that applies to all other officials whose salaries are under study and observation by the commission at the present time. As to the other officials, the increase is the regular increase provided for all officials—absolutely the same. As regards the promises and pledges made during the election campaign, my hon. friend is undoubtedly better posted than I am. Though it was my privilege to cover a large part of Canada during the last campaign, I never heard either the leader of the Government or any gentleman associated with him on the platform making threats of the kind that have been referred to. I cannot, of course, speak for those who delivered public addresses in my absence. The manifesto of a certain gentleman, who stood as Liberal candidate in British Columbia, has been quoted in this House. I am not in a position to answer for him. I am not, moreover, exactly informed in the subject, and, perhaps, other hon. gentlemen are not.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about the official Liberal handbook which I hold in my hand?

Mr. BELAND: I explained before six o'clock to my hon. friend that it is quite evident to-day, after recent conventions of the Veterans, that the sentiment of the latter, and the veterans at large in Canada, is unalterably opposed to the payment of a cash bonus.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The Great War Veterans' Association was never in favour of paying a cash bonus; it was a little body of returned men headed by a man called Flynn.

Mr. BELAND: My hon. friend has been, for a long time, a member of this House, and I know he wants to be fair; but if he sat with us in the parliamentary committee two years ago when that committee convened at the Museum, he will remember that, outside of Mr. Flynn or his followers, three or four gentlemen representing very important bodies of returned men submitted to the committee a definite plan for the payment of a cash bonus. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) was present, and he will remember that it was a well-elaborated plan. It was, indeed, an attractive plan, but at that time it did not carry with the committee or with Parliament. Since then, as everyone is aware, it has developed that the veterans, with the exception of a very few, are opposed to the payment of a cash bonus. If I am not mistaken, listening to the hon. gentleman who leads the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King), I took it that his idea was not so much that a cash bonus should be paid to the returned men, as that our duty towards the returned men would be measured by the ability of the country to pay; that he would go as far as the financial resources of the country would warrant. That is what I took from the remarks of the present Prime Minister all through the campaign while it was my privilege to accompany him. I do not know why my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen), who leads the Opposition so ably, should attempt to make a little political capital out of this thing. I sat for three years on the parliamentary committee as a member representing the then Opposition in this House, I had associated with me, a number of Liberal members, and not on one occasion did we seek to gain a particle of political advantage out of a proposition that we might have made at the time, not only in the country, but on the floor of this House. Hon. gentlemen who sat in the previous House, many of whom I see here, will remember that when the then hon. member for London, Mr. Cronyn, presented to this House the report of the committee, I for one rose in my seat to concur in it, and it was adopted unanimously. Who would deny that, such an opportunity being offered to me, I could not have availed myself of it to propose something that I knew the government could not carry out. I never did that. Why? Because I think it is really criminal, in the case of returned men and their cause, that we should seek any political advantage. It is beyond doubt that, in a heated campaign, some men will publish something that may attract a few votes to them. That has happened undoubtedly amongst some of the Liberal candidates, and who can say, without fear of contradiction, that some of my right hon. friend's friends have not, on some occasion, resorted to the same tactics. I am quite sure they have. But we are here to study the important problem of re-establishment, as we have been engaged in doing in previous sessions, and let us examine this question without allowing ourselves to be biased by political or partisan inclinations. That is my view of the subject. I think I have given the committee, in all good faith and sincerity, the reasons why these salaries should be voted. Whether it be the desire of the committee that they should be passed, is another matter.

Mr. ARTHURS: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that he believed a great majority of the returned soldiers were unalterably opposed to a cash bonus. Is that correct?

Mr. BELAND: Yes, that is what I said.

Mr. ARTHURS: I am afraid the hon. gentleman has in mind an indiscriminate cash bonus. Will he also say that he believes the returned soldier is not in favour of a cash bonus which is dependent in amount upon length of service?

Mr. BELAND: I am not aware of any such resolutions being adopted by any of the veterans' organizations. The returned men have submitted a number of suggestions to this Government, as they have to the late government. These suggestions in due course will be submitted to the parliamentary committee that is shortly to be appointed for the purpose of studying the important questions of re-establishment generally, the treatment of special or problem cases, the problem of amputation cases, the insurance feature of re-establishment, the treatment of patients generally, the granting of pensions and the care of the disabled soldier. Upon all these subjects we have received a number of suggestions, and they will be studied in due course by a committee that will be appointed. My personal opinions on the subject are well known. Anything which can be done on behalf of the returned men and which is compatible with the resources of the country, I for one am in favour of doing.

Mr. MANION: I quite believe my hon. friend is sincere in his remarks; but when he states that neither the leader of the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King), nor any one of the men who were associated with him, ever on the platform spoke in favour of the $2,000 gratuity, or anything verging upon that—that is about what I understood him to say—I think, perhaps, he is a little mistaken, because I hold in my hand an article which I remember reading at the time during my campaign in my constituency stating that when the leader of the present Government spoke in Port Arthur he begged the Liberals of Fort William to bring out a candidate against me, a thing which they did not do. When he spoke there, he had accompanying him Colonel Thompson, a personal friend of mine, a gentleman for whom I have a great deal of respect. Colonel Thompson spoke in the presence of the present Prime Minister, because he spoke right after the Prime Minister. According to the Fort William Times Journal of November 11, this is what Colonel Thompson said:

> Colonel Thompson spoke briefly, as he said the previous speakers had handled the questions of the day so completely there was little for him to say. He pledged the loyalty of the returned man to the country, declaring at the same time that the $2,000 bonus was not more than he deserved, in view of the high wages paid during the war to the men who remained in the industries. But the returned men were loyal, etc.

And he goes on with other remarks. Now, I admit that that is not an express endorsation of the demand for the $2,000 bonus; but if it is not an implied support of that demand, particularly in view of the fact that the Liberal party's platform pledged itself to the grant, then I do not quite know what it is. The leader of the Government (Mr. Mackenzie King) was on the platform when Colonel Thompson made this speech, and he had spoken a few minutes before Colonel Thompson did. In fact, just before the account of Colonel Thompson's speech is a report of my hon. friend's remarks, and he certainly had at that time an opportunity to put himself on record as being opposed to the $2,000 grant, just as I did. I remember well making a speech which was used against me in my election, because I had taken a stand against the grant. May I say to my hon. friends on the left, before I sit down, that some of them have been unfairly critical of hon. members in this corner of the House because they have thought it necessary to consider this question. Hon. gentlemen on our left speak as though we were wasting time. I presume, however, that when we come to the tariff they will take up the plank of the Liberal platform and deal with it from their point of view because it happens to suit their purpose. Just at the moment the party at this end of the Chamber think that the question of the grant to the soldiers is one that can fairly be discussed, and I think that if my hon. friends on the left of us can discuss any question that suits them, we should be able to do the same. I may say that I ran against a gentleman who supported the member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar), and although I have nothing to say against him personally, many of the friends who worked in his interest carried on against me as lying and slanderous a campaign as was ever conducted against a man in any fight in the country. I do not see, therefore, why we should be chided because once in a while we spend a little time discussing this matter, which was embodied in the plank of the Liberal party's platform.

Mr. CRERAR: Before six oclock, Mr. Chairman, I drew your attention to the fact that the discussion was out of order. We are considering a matter of voting salaries to pay nine employees in the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. I can quite understand that it may be a pleasant occupation to hold political inquests, and I could do a little inquesting myself under this head if I cared to do so. I submit to my hon. friend (Mr. Manion), however, that the whole discussion of the bonus is out of order under this head, and I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANION: May I speak to this question before you give your decision, Mr. Chairman? I think that on these Estimates any part of the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment vote comes up for consideration, and to my mind the question of the $2,000 bonus is certainly a part of this whole question. The grant was claimed by a large percentage of returned soldiers headed by Flynn, and it is still claimed by many; and I repeat that the question was used against me in my own constituency. So long as it is a claim on the part of the returned soldiers in the country, it is, in my opinion, just as right to discuss the bonus as it is to consider the wages of the men who carry out the re-establishment.

The CHAIRMAN: The member for Marquette (Mr. Crerar) has asked for a ruling on the relevancy of the discussion respecting a bonus to returned soldiers. In my opinion there is very much ground for the position taken by the hon. member, and I feel that the discussion has exceeded reasonable bounds. I do not think that the remarks of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) are entirely relevant to the subject before the committee, but this being my first day in the Chair, I have been inclined to allow some latitude to discussion. Perhaps I should have been within the strict interpretation of the rules had I called hon. members to order before, but the discussion, I think, is now distinctly out of order.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In view of the fact that there is no item in the Estimates for soldier appropriations, it would be useful to the committee, Mr. Chairman, if you would suggest under what item we might discuss this subject.

Mr. CRERAR: There are various ways in which my right hon. friend can bring the matter before the House. He can do so by way of private member's resolution in condemnation of the Government.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But in committee.

Mr. CRERAR: I submit that if on any item before the House we are to wander over the whole field of political inquesting, we shall never get through with the business of the session. I have a good deal of sympathy with the attitude my right hon. friend has taken, and the leader of the Government is perhaps in a rather difficult position in giving an explanation; but I submit that this is not the proper place in which to discuss this question. I want to see the business of the House proceed and the minister in charge of the department get his estimates through, with such reasonable explanations as the House is entitled to have.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think the minister has given an explanation on one question I asked before, and I shall put the question again as clearly as I can. The department last year had twenty-five clerks and officers, and sixteen clerks have been discharged because there was no more work for them. At least, that is what we infer from the Estimates: to use the words in the Estimates, "the position is not required." The Government has retained nine of these officers, and they are the highest paid. Surely some of the highly-paid executive officers could have been dispensed with if the Minister could discharge two-thirds of the staff. The answer suggested by my hon. friend, that the Civil Re-establishment Department includes the Pension Board, does not affect this question at all; the Pension Board carry on all their business with their own staff and with their own appropriation, and all that the minister has to do is to act as a medium of approach between the Pension Board and Parliament. His staff has very little, if anything, to do with the Pension Board administration. We should therefore have an explanation as to why the Government cannot dispense with some of the highly paid executive staff in conjunction with the sixteen clerks for whom there is now no work.

Mr. BELAND: The officials for whom the salaries are being asked administer the department of Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment. At the present time this department comprises in round numbers, not twenty-nine, but five thousand employees in the different units throughout the country from Vancouver to Halifax. In Ottawa we have some eleven hundred employees, and we have units also in Vancouver, Calgary, Winnipeg, London, Ont., Toronto, Montreal and Halifax.

As regards these sixteen clerical positions not required, we are not dispensing with these men. We thought they would probably be required, but have found that they will not be required for this year. Perhaps my hon. friend was absent from the House before six o'clock when I stated that a number of the higher officials are being dispensed with. I cited the case of an official in Toronto drawing a salary of $5,000 a year whose services would terminate on the last day of this month. If I am not mistaken, his name is Mr. Coulthard, in charge of the surgical appliances branch. I am informed by the officials of the department that he will not be replaced. I also cited the case of an engineer in Montreal, drawing a salary of over $3,000, whose services have already been dispensed with, and there are other cases. I could have supplied full information to the committee and had the deputy minister with me had I known that these questions would be raised. My hon. friend may rest assured that it is not only the officials drawing small salaries that are being dispensed with, but, proportionately, an equal number of the higher officials.

Mr. STEVENS: Not in Ottawa.

Mr. BELAND: If my hon. friend were minister of this department he could realize that these officials are actually required, to carry out in an efficient manner the work of the department all over the country, and unless my worthy predecessor thinks these men should be dispensed with, I doubt whether we should let them go, at the present time at all events. It was represented to me that these men are necessary for the efficient carrying out of the work of the department.

Miss MACPHAIL: Starting with the lower salaried officials and going up the list, there is first an increase of $40; one of $60, and three of $120, the last one being an increase from $3,240 to $3,360. Then we have a rather large jump in the salary of the Supervisor of Expenditures, from $4,500 to $5,000. I should like to ask the minister whether the Supervisor of Expenditures has any particular educational or technical qualifications to justify that increase. What is the explanation for this jump in his salary? An increase of $120 seems quite reasonable, but it almost looks as though it were a case of the higher the salary the higher the increase which is really quite a familiar thing to-day.

Mr. BELAND: It will be to my eternal honour that some explanations of mine have drawn into the discussion in this committee the first lady member of the House. I hope that I shall be successful in answering the question which she has so gracefully asked. The increase is always, I think, based on the amount of the salary, and is regulated by the Civil Service Commission. In the case of a man drawing a salary of $4,500, I would think that if an increase was granted at all, it should be $500. In the case of the next man down the list, who is now receiving $3,240, the increase is proportionately less, $120. Lower down the list, as my hon. friend from Southeast Grey (Miss Macphail) has pointed out, the increases drop from $60 to $40. I would repeat that no increase in salary in these cases can be granted unless it is approved by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. STEVENS: Not in this case.

Mr. BELAND: Yes, in this case. There can be no increase in salary unless authorized under the Civil Service Act, which means, by the Civil Service Commission. Answering the question by my hon. friend from Quebec South (Mr. Power) this afternoon, Mr. Waddington was appointed after competitive examination three years ago.

Mr. SPENCE: Is the Supervisor of Expenditures working on a graded salary?

Mr. BELAND: I am not in a position to give that information at present, but I shall be glad to do so when the Estimates of the department are up.

Mr. SPENCE: I think raising a man's salary in this way is a bad precedent to establish. I have a great interest in the returned men, and anything the minister may do for them will have my sincere sympathy and support. I was inspired to suggest this afternoon that a royal commission be appointed to deal with these special cases, so that the returned men who had grievances could appear before the commission as it travelled over the country and lay their cases before them. I might mention one particular case, that of a fireman on one of the railways. He went overseas, came back and was discharged, and since has been invalided. I am sorry to say he had to be sent to an asylum, and now he has a seizure every day or two and is not fit to carry on any work. He has a wife and child, and nothing to support them. The D.S.C.R. refuses to support him. They say that under the Act they cannot do anything for him. It is such cases as this that the royal commission could take up. I have the honour, Mr. Chairman, to be a supporter of the right hon. Arthur Meighen—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPENCE:—a man possessed of distinguished qualities, a man who has both backbone and ability; a man who is highly regarded in all parts of this Dominion. I may say that at a meeting at which the right hon. Arthur Meighen was to speak—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: I wish to call the attention of the hon. member to the fact that while it has always been the custom under the items of the Estimates pertaining to civil government to discuss the general policy of the department concerned, he is, I think, travelling rather far afield. We have spent a good deal of time on this resolution, and I would ask the hon. member to deal particularly with the matter under discussion as found on page 113 of the Estimates.

Mr. SPENCE: I am not transgressing the rules any more than other hon. members did, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. SPENCE: Then if I may not go ahead I will take my seat.

Mr. WHITE: I am not just clear in my mind as to what jurisdiction these particular salaries come under. It has been pointed out by the leader of the Opposition that they do not come under Civil Service Commission; yet the minister has referred to increases which are granted under the rules of that body. I am at sea as to what those rules are, as regards maximum salary and so on. The increases asked for cannot be justified by the increased duties of the officers concerned, because sixteen clerks have been dispensed with, as well as other officials; so that the work of the department must surely be lessened. Nor can the increase be based on the cost of living, because reports issued by the Department of Labour go to show that the cost of living has come down in all branches. It seems to me that the more serious part of this question has not yet been touched on. There is an increase of but $960 in respect of six positions, but there is a precedent being established which may affect a great many positions in the gift of the Government. The Minister of Railways, through his heads of departments, will have to convince some of the railroad men that they should accept lower wages in order that freight rates may be reduced. If the principle involved in the increases now proposed is adopted in one case and not in another, some difficulty may result. If these increases are put through, what about the principles of economy that were preached before the election? The Government would be well advised to forego any such increases as are now proposed.

Mr. JELLIFF: I have been waiting patiently throughout this discussion to hear some justification of these increases. If the efficiency of the minister's department is going to be proportionately increased by adding $500 to the salary of one employee, $120 to the salaries of several others, $60 and $40 in other cases, I should offer no objection, because I do not believe we can have in any of these departments too high a degree of efficiency. But that has not been established by any explanation made by the hon. minister. It has not been shown that there is any logical connection between the increases asked for and the reduction in the total personnel. If additional duties or responsibilities were to devolve upon remaining employees because of a reduction in the numbers of the staff, we could reconcile ourselves to increases, provided, as appears from these Estimates, there is a considerable reduction in the total amount required by the department. I was elected, as was almost everyone sitting on this side of the House, on a platform of strict economy.

Mr. McMASTER: Not including the hon. members to your extreme right.

Mr. JELLIFF: Oh, no. Mr. Chairman, I come from a portion of the country where in municipality after municipality the farmers, to the extent of seventy-five per cent of the population, are unable to pay their provincial taxes. Furthermore, in order to redeem that portion of the country, in order to make it a national asset instead of a national liability, those farmers have assumed a burden amounting to $5,000,000 for the purpose of irrigation. In order to put that country on its proper footing they have assumed an indebtedness that it will take nearly all this generation of farmers in the district to discharge. I cannot go back and face my people there if I vote for increases which are not justified by efficiency or by some other good and sufficient reason. There is a large decrease in the total amount asked for this department. I believe that the minister is heartily in favour of doing all he can for the returned men, and I would like to stand behind him. But I would like a further justification of the increases asked by this vote.

Mr. GARLAND (Carleton): The Minister has said that under the rules of the Civil Service Commission the maximum salary of employees now getting $4,500 is $5,000. The Estimates, however, show that that rule does not apply in other departments. I do not think that is the scale adopted by the Civil Service Commission.

Item agreed to.

Department of Railways and Canals—salaries, $191,970; Contingencies, $29,500.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: Explain.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. MEIGHEN: One moment. Surely the Minister of Railways is not going to ask that all his civil government estimates go through without any explanation, particularly when that minister permitted an ambiguous, almost meaningless, assertion of policy in the Speech from the Throne to come before Parliament to be voted on without any details as to what the intention of the Government was, and after a promise from the Prime Minister that the desired explanation would be given. We ought to have had that explanation even before being called upon to pass the Address. Surely it is now the duty of the minister to tell the House what the policy of the Government in relation to the railways is before we are asked to vote the civil government estimates providing for the salaries of the officers of the department. For example, would it not be interesting to know whether the Intercolonial railway is to be taken out from the management of the national railways and placed again under the Department of Railways and Canals as was promised by certain members supporting the Government? Is that promise to be carried out? If so we may be required to vote these estimates and more, because the railway department will have more to do then than it has to-day, and we will have a lot of questions as to who are going to be necessary and who are not. These estimates may be necessary if the Intercolonial is really going back under the administration of the Department of Railways but may not be necessary if the administration of that railway stays where it is. Now is the time, when we are entering upon the consideration of the railway estimates, to know what the railway policy of the Government is. I hope the desired explanation will not be deferred again. I hope we shall not be asked to vote money from the Treasury to carry out the railway policy of the Government without knowing what that policy is.

Hon. W. C. KENNEDY (Minister of Railways and Canals): My right hon. friend the Prime Minister is not more anxious—

Mr. MEIGHEN: I beg my hon. friend's pardon?

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I should say the ex-Prime Minister; we have been so accustomed to refer to my right hon. friend as the Prime Minister that I for the moment forgot the change that has taken place. I want to tell my right hon. friend that I am just as anxious to make a statement to the House as he is to hear it. I hope, however, he will agree with me that in order to present an intelligent statement it is necesary that we should be in possession of all the facts and figures essential for the purposes of comparison when considering the main Estimates. The railroads that are under the jurisdiction of the Government have to make their returns at the end of the year and these returns should be embodied in the railway statement. They have not yet been submitted to the department. I am awaiting these statistics and they cannot come too soon; I am doing everything I can to hurry them up. Then I shall be glad indeed to make a statement of the Government's railway policy as far as I can and explain the transactions of the past year. To-night we are simply called upon to discuss the civil government estimates of the department. In so far as the main Estimates are concerned it will be necessary to have the story of the past year's operations before we can discuss them intelligently. All that I am now asking, Mr. Chairman, is that we go on with the estimates of civil government.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): In the Speech from the Throne it is stated that the policy of the Government is to co-ordinate the different railway properties that belong to the Canadian people, and it does seem to me that before being asked to take up any railway estimates at all we might very well have from the Minister of Railways a statement of just what the Government means by the use of the word "co-ordination". The word is susceptible of a great many meanings. It may mean just what this Government believes to be the proper policy, it may mean many other things; and it does seem to me that the Minister of Railways ought, before going on with any part of his Estimates to give to the committee a statement of exactly what the Government means; how they propose to manage the different properties; what they propose to do with the properties now managed by the Grand Trunk Board, and what they propose to do with the properties having regard to the management under the board of which Mr. Hanna is the head. These are matters that in no way depend upon the annual reports to which the minister has just referred. We on this side urge that that statement be given to the committee, that the committee be told in clear terms exactly what the policy of the Government is—either that or that the items we are now asked to consider stand until that statement has been given.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat was Minister of Railways for two or three months just before the out-going government went to the people. Nobody knows better than he, therefore, that in so far as these estimates are concerned the question of co-ordination does not bear on them at all. These are civil government estimates, there is nothing in them that will be affected by the meaning of the term "co-ordination." I have told his leader and I have told the committee that before the main estimates are brought in I will submit a statement giving in full the policy of this Government. To-night I am asking that the civil government estimates be taken up and it is for the committee to decide whether they care to do so or not.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): It seems to me that the question as to how the Government proposes to handle the railway properties is one that has direct reference to the items we are now asked to consider. These officers for whom salaries are sought will have to do with the management of the railway properties; and whether these properties are to be managed as they are now, or managed by two boards, or whether we are to follow the advice of the member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) and the member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and have another management of the Intercolonial—these are all matters that surely bear direct reference to the estimates we are now asked to consider. The two hon. members referred to have laid it down as a part of the Confederation pact that the Intercolonial railway must be taken away from the management of any of these boards. That must be done they say, in order to carry out what preceded Confederation, and to give effect to what I understood the member for Cumberland to say was contained in Section 142 of the British North America Act.

Mr. LOGAN: Section 145.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Very well, Section 145 of the British North America Act—that in order to carry out its terms we must place this road back under government and political control, and with that control must go the regulation of the rates without any regard to either the cost of operation or the judgment of the Board of Railway Commissioners. It does seem to me therefore that the whole question of the administration of the Railway Department is one which depends upon how these properties are going to be handled, and it is surely a reasonable request that we either have the statement asked for, or that these items shall stand until that statement is presented by the minister.

Mr. KENNEDY (Essex): I have again to say to my hon. friend that he simply wishes to anticipate the statement that will be made when I am in possession of the facts that bear upon it and when the right time comes it will be presented. There are many questions arising in connection with the subject and everyone will have ample opportunity to present his views when that time comes; but such a discussion to-night is entirely out of place. In the debate in the Speech from the Throne the leader of the Government told my hon. friend perhaps the one thing he is most concerned about and that is that there is to be one control. That will be dealt with at the right time, and to-night I do not think it is out of the way to refer to the discussion that took place when the railway estimates were before the House on former occasions. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the discussion a year ago, when the hon. Dr. Reid had charge of railways and canals, he will find that we discussed the civil government estimates without the statement of the minister, and I am only asking the House to do what has been the practice in the past, with the full assurance that at the right time, and in the very near future, I will be able to give the hon. gentleman the full information which he desires.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): The items we are asked to consider are not urgent. If they were, there might be something in the claim that is now made by the minister. Last year, when the House was asked to consider these same items, under the conditions that have been stated by the minister, we were on into the middle of April. None of these items is required. The amount provided for in the votes is not required at the present time, and no interests will suffer by delay. If it were a question of the money not being available to pay the items at the present time, it seems to me the minister would be justified in making the request which he has made to-night, but, in view of the fact that the money is not required, it seems to me that the request we make on this side of the House, that these matters be allowed to stand until we are able to take up the whole question, is a reasonable one.

Mr. FIELDING: I suggest that the same objection might be raised to any item that is not urgent. All the items in the Estimates are urgent. We are anxious to advance business, and, therefore, the criticism is not a strong one. We are proceeding in the same way as Parliament proceeded in former years. I do not hesitate to say that if hon. gentlemen think this item should not be hurried along too much, I will offer no objection, and I will advise my hon. friend the Minister of Railways to consent. But the same thing might be said for every department. You might say "It is not urgent, what is the hurry?" There is no particular hurry, except that all business must be put through.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): Surely there is this difference between this department and any other department; that the minister himself has stated that there is due the House a statement, which was not only promised in the Speech from the Throne, but in the remarks made by the Prime Minister himself upon the Address. There is that difference between this department and any other department that might be considered. In that respect I do not think, as the hon. Minister of Finance has said, that it is exactly on all fours with any other department and the objection that we urge in this connection could not be urged with the same force against any other department. The question of urgency is an incident. It is not the objection on which we are asking for delay. We are asking for delay, not because the items are not urgent, but because we have not the statement that has been promised to the House by the minister, and for that reason we request that the items be allowed to stand.

Mr. FIELDING: Does the hon. gentleman think there is material difference between the procedure now and the procedure in other sessions? The statement of the minister is due, but, it is not always brought in. Whether promised in the Speech or not, the statement has to accompany the main Estimates of the Department of Railways and Canals, and always did, and that is the practice now. However, if the hon. gentleman thinks it is desirable that this item be held over, I do not wish to suggest that it should be pressed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We certainly ask to have it stand. As to the railway policy, there is uncertainty. Hon. gentlemen opposite would not dispute that there is uncertainty as to what the Government propose to do on major questions of public policy. There is uncertainty, and doubt, even in the Speech from the Throne itself. No one on this side of the House knows what is going to be done. We do not know what are to be the responsibilities of the Department of Railways. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen opposite do or not, but I venture to suggest over half of them do not, and I venture also to suspect that at least a third of them expect something to be done that is not going to be done.

Mr. FIELDING: That is a good reason for objecting.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Unquestionably there is doubt as to the railway policy. Now, I put it to the Minister of Finance: Is there any subject, is there any department, as to the policy of which there is no uncertainty on the part of this Government? If there is one I should like to take up the civil estimates of that department.

Mr. FIELDING: I am afraid my hon. friend would say there is none.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, and perhaps the hon. gentleman will admit the truth of that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Let us take up my Estimates. They are practically the same as the Estimates of the right hon. gentleman last year.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I expect there is no policy with regard to the hon. gentleman's estimates, so that perhaps we can take them up.

Item stands.

Privy Council, Salaries,..	$44,810
Contingencies..	10,000

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The bases of this estimate are the figures that my hon. friend caused to be inserted last year. There are no increases in the staff, and there are no increases in any of the salaries, excepting those that are statutory.

Mr. CHAPLIN: I see there is an extra clerk required. The minister tells us that the increases here are statutory. Is that one clerk a statutory increase, or how is that?

Mr. CALDWELL: He is trading an office boy for a private secretary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is a private secretary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: How many private secretaries has the minister? All those formerly employed are apparently to be employed again, except the office boy, and I do not really recall who that was. I cannot remember any office boy. And the next is "allowance to private secretary $600". That is the ordinary allowance. In place of those two items, there is to be another private secretary at $3,600 and another assistant at $3,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think the amount the hon. gentleman just mentioned of $600 was the amount voted in addition to the regular allowance of a clerk who served as a private secretary. That was adopted last session because my right hon. friend had a private secretary appointed as a clerk, and gave him the additional allowance of $600. Under the new Civil Service regulations, the appointment to the staff is made at the salary named in the estimates, no additional allowance being given to the official as private secretary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is correct, but it means an additional cost to the country of $5,610. Why not do it in the old way and save the country $5,610?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think my right hon. friend will recall that there are two departments—Privy Council and the Department of External Affairs. I think he had control of only the one when he was Prime Minister. At the present time the office of President of the Privy Council has been consolidated with that of the Prime Minister, a saving of $10,000 being effected thereby. That has imposed an additional duty on the Prime Minister, and under the circumstances, it seemed permissible to allow him an extra private secretary. We save $10,000 by not having a separate portfolio, and all we add is a little extra for a private secretary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think that explanation will go. There was more under the Prime Minister before. The Mounted Police Department was under him, and I think there was some other department as well that is not now under the hon. gentleman. It is true the Presidency of the Privy Council is held now by the Minister of External Affairs; but the management of the Privy Council is merely a duty in Council; it is not a duty involving administrative functions particularly at all, not at all events since the mounted police, who formerly were under that department, and the Department of Health, have been moved out. I think there is, perhaps, one portfolio less in the present Government than in the previous Government, but I think my calculation is correct that there are two more than in the Government which administered affairs during the last session of this House. There is an increase of about $20,000. The diminution is only over the government that was formed in the month of September, 1921; consequently, over what has prevailed substantially for a long time back, instead of there being a diminution, there is an increase, and I may say that I am not very hopeful that even this saving of $10,000 will last very long. How many private secretaries are there? I do not see how more could be utilized; I do not know of any cause of more being utilized. I managed to keep those we had fairly busy, but I do not see how any minister could utilize any more.

Mr. McMASTER: Before the Prime Minister replies, might I make an observation? One of the duties of private members on the Government side of the House is to listen attentively. Their work can be rendered much easier and much pleasanter for themselves, if Prime Minister, ex-Prime Minister, Ministers of the Crown and ex-Ministers of the Crown would speak in an audible voice.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would the hon. member kindly tell us who the two additional secretaries are?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Beaudry is private secretary, and Mr. Talbot is assistant secretary.

Mr. HANSON: Would the Prime Minister be good enough to tell us whether these private secretaries have been approved by the Civil Service Commission, or is this the extension of a little patronage on his part?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Civil Service Commission have approved their appointment in accordance with the regular method prescribed.

Item agreed to.

Civil Government—External Affairs—salaries and contingencies, $110,030.

Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): There is a change of one in the number of clerks; but with that exception, the amounts asked for are identical with what was asked for last year by the then Prime Minister when he was in charge of the Department of External Affairs. The only increases are those which are allowed by statute.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: There seems to be 100 per cent increase in private secretaries again. There was one private secretary before, and we now have two private secretaries. Is there a boom in private secretaries?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If there is any explanation needed in that regard, it is simply that the Estimates, as now presented, state exactly the position in which the clerk is employed. I am informed that in previous sessions a vote had been taken under the designation "secretary clerk," and the official having that position would fill the position of private secretary. I have tried to make it plain that the positions which these officials are intended to fill are those of private secretaries.

Sir HENRY DRAYTON: I am afraid the Prime Minister should look at his Estimates for he is not getting rid of his secretary clerks. There were three secretary clerks before, and there are three this year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad my hon. friend has mentioned that. It illustrates one of the difficulties set in the way of the Government under the working of the Civil Service Commission. My right hon. friend had a couple of very estimable gentlemen as his private secretaries. Under the working of the Civil Service regulations both of these gentlemen have to be retained in the Department of External Affairs at the salaries which they were then receiving, very high salaries, one being $3,800 and the other $4,000. I think it is obvious to hon. members that it could hardly be expected that an incoming Prime Minister should take over the private secretaries of the outgoing Prime Minister. Under these circumstances, it has been necessary to retain in the Department of External Affairs at the high salaries mentioned, the gentlemen who were secretaries to my right hon. friend. I might explain that one of these gentlemen has since been transferred by the Civil Service Commission to another department of the Government, a department for which he is well suited, and I hope that before long it will be possible to have the other gentleman also transferred to some other department, but under the working of the Civil Service Act as it is to-day, the Prime Minister is obliged to keep both of these gentlemen on the permanent staff at the salaries mentioned in the Estimates. I think both of them are splendid men, have filled their positions with credit to themselves and have rendered real service to the country. It is a misfortune that we are restricted in the manner we are in the matter of making transfers.

Mr. BOYS: Practically all the officials in this branch down to the last four have their salaries increased, and strange to say, those who can least afford a reduction, namely, three confidential messengers and one messenger clerk, have their salaries reduced. The three confidential messengers suffer a loss of $180, and one messenger-clerk a loss of $120. It seems strange that those who get the larger salaries should be increased, while those with smaller allowances are cut down.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is a matter regulated entirely by the Civil Service regulations. There are many aspects of the work of that body that are difficult of understanding and appreciation, and this would appear to be one of them. In regard to any decreases, unless there has been a transference of some clerk at a higher salary to some other department, which has necessitated the bringing in of another at a lower salary. I cannot see that there is anything to indicate that anyone has been reduced.

Mr. BOYS: I appreciate the increases, because they are statutory; but surely there is nothing that compels you to reduce the salary of the lowest paid men.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What has taken place is this. One high paid confidential messenger has been transferred to another department, and instead of bringing into the office another man at a similar salary, a messenger has been brought in as a junior who will have to work his way up.

Mr. BOYS: What about the three confidential messengers? Have they all been transferred, or are they new messengers?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is one new one, but the others were there when my right hon. friend (Mr. Meighen) was in the department.

Mr. BOYS: I can understand the explanation regarding one, but not the four.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I owe it to the Prime Minister to confirm the principle which he expounded as regards secretaries. Efficient secretaries cannot be obtained if at the expiration of the term of office of their minister they are to be merely turned out and let loose on the world. Consequently, it has been a rule that they shall be given the salary that they had before, without the secretarial allowance, and in so far as these Estimates provide for that, I commend rather than criticise them. I am not clear, however, as to how that was effected. I understand that my secretary, who was with me a considerable time, is going to the Interior Department, where certainly he can render his best service, and therefore there need be no provision for him here. But as regards the others, I see that $4,000 for one was voted last year, while this year there are two, one at $3,800 and one at $3,000. It may be that he is accepting a lower salary; if so I make no comment at the time. But still there appears to be another secretary, that is to say, there are two instead of one. In other words, there are two for the office of External Affairs and two for the office of the President of the Privy Council. I am afraid my hon. friend will not be able to get out of his office for secretaries.
